ness to attempt to collect my thoughts enough so as to frame them into a letter. My complaint being that of nervousness and dyspepsia, such has been my condition that I have felt that I was of no earthly use or comfort to those around me, and certainly not to myself. This, together with the darkness of my mind, feeling the most of the time that I was but an outcast and an alien from God, has caused me to feel that should I make the attempt to take down from the willow my harp, its notes would have more the sound of a funeral dirge than the joyful, melodious sound of a liberated captive. Yet, however heart-rending and bitter have been these trials of my own soul during this time, I think there has never been a time but my mind has been drawn to read and to more clearly understand the holy Scriptures and the precious promises to Israel, the chosen people of God; while of myself I would say, "I will bear the indignation of the Lord; for I have sinned against him." Although it has been so seldom of late that I could claim anything for myself, there have been times when I have felt reconciled to know that God did have respect to some, and that many of the redeemed of the Lord were permitted to come and sit down in the kingdom, though myself were cast out, where was weeping and wailing. Precious Israel! beloved of the Lord! Once they were thorns in the crown of the crucified Savior, but soon transformed into priceless jewels, to adorn the head of the risen and exalted Lord. What a wonderful God! Surely he is a God doing wonders. Just and holy is he. "And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins." Though your sins were as scarlet, they are, through the suffering of your Savior, made whiter than snow. Then how can one be so unmindful of these things as to once grieve his Holy Spirit? Though I am being daily tossed to and fro on the waves of life's tempestuous sea, my prayer is that I may never wholly lose sight of the Captain of our salvation, who has so safely guided and guarded us through life's journey, thus far keeping our frail vessel from becoming shipwrecked upon the treacherous waves of adversity; and we are still left as living monuments of God's eternal care and watchfulness. Yet how forgetful have we been of all this at times! How needful is the chastening rod, that we may be brought to a realizing sense of our dependence at all times upon God. It seems to me that I have very lately been made to feel more sensibly than ever before in all my life, my entire dependence upon him who giveth freely of such as he has (which is all things), without money and without price. It has all come to me so plainly, and burst in upon my soul with such heavenly rapture and sweetness, that thy Maker is thy Husband, the God of the whole earth shall he be called. Yes, the God of the whole earth: the God of providence, as well as of grace; of the body, as well as of the soul. How glad then we are that the wife is bound to her Husband as long as her Husband liveth. "Because I live, ye shall live also." "Members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones." "When he could swear by no greater, he swore by himself," and says, "I live forever." Then how anxious we feel to rest right here the remainder of our days, where we can trust him for all things, both for time and eternity. "Though thou wast angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortedst me." How sweetly do we rest upon the Rock of ages, right at the feet of the blessed Savior. We rest so quietly for a time that nothing can disturb our peace of mind. Our tears, which for so long a time have been of sorrow and of woe, have been turned to tears of joy. Jesus, blessed Jesus, I am thine, and thou art mine. How earnestly have our thoughts went out to God by day and by night in prayer, "Thy kingdom come." How sweetly has he answered prayer. "Thy will be done." Joy and peace in the Holy Ghost is not of this world, neither is it received by the world. With what confidence do we draw near to that God who rules the inhabitants of the earth, as well as in the armies of heaven, and ask that we may never more grieve his Holy Spirit. Ever let us rest under the shadow of thine almighty wing. Stretch forth thine everlasting arm, O our God, that we may lean upon it the remainder of our days. Keep us, if it be according to thy will, from bowing down to idols, or worshiping things made by men's hands. O keep us, our Father, from wantonly reaching out our hand to covet or envy the rich of all they may have gathered to themselves of the things of this world, which are to perish with the using, knowing that the time of their glorying is short. Hasten upon us that thankfulness of heart that is ready to receive just what our heavenly Father in his wisdom sees fit to bestow on us, holding even that with a very loose hand, ready to yield it up if it be found needful of him who had not where to lay his head. I do feel it to be one great cause of the suffering and sorrow of God's people in this world, because their sorrow is so much of this world, which worketh death. "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die." We are apt to forget the Rock whence we were hewn, so unmindful are we of the things done in the green tree. We ought not to ask that our lot be more easy than that of our Master. "Follow me," he said. O may we remember, when we get so fretful, as I know I do oftentimes, that our suffering Savior passed through the darkest shadow of the valley of Achor, to the highest pinnacle of the temple, where all the riches of this world were offered him if he would but fall down and worship the devil. But what does he answer? "Get thee behind me, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

But I think I will draw this to a close, as I have already written more than I intended. I never can think of sending on my remittance without saying a few words in addition. The last time before this it was handed to you personally; and if it could have been the will of God, who orders all things, I would have desired that it be so now. I can hardly realize that I have so recently seen so many of my dear friends face to face. It seems more like a dream than a reality to me. Yet I would be still, and know that the Lord is God, resting in the blessed assurance that "There is a land mine eye hath seen

In visions of enraptur'd thought;
So bright that all which spreads between
Is with its radiant glory fraught."

"A land upon whose blissful shore
There rests no shadow, falls no stain;
There those who meet shall part no more,
And those long parted meet again."

"Its skies are not like earthly skies,
With varying hues of shade and light;
It hath no need of suns to rise,
To dissipate the gloom of night."

"There sweeps no desolating wind
Across that calm, serene abode:
The wanderer there a home shall find,
Within the paradise of God."

May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ rest upon his Israel, is the sincere prayer of your most unworthy sister, if one at all,

ABBIE CODDINGTON.

P. S.—I would like to ask Elder Beebe's views on Acts xix. 2. Here we find disciples of Jesus, believers, who have not so much as heard of the Holy Ghost. How could they have believed, or in what did they believe? It is written in the Scriptures that none can call Jesus Lord but by the Holy Ghost. And there are numerous other passages concerning the Holy Ghost which are equally as dark as this one to me. Will you try and explain the meaning of the words, Holy Ghost? We read, "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one." A. C.

THE SECRET OF THE LORD.

A GENTLEMAN not long since said to me, "If I believed such trash [referring to the SIGNS OF THE TIMES] as it advocates, such as election, I would go insane." I simply referred him to the fact that many had gone insane at the protracted meetings and excitement revivals. I wish to say a few words in relation to God's secrets of providence and grace; for they are of great comfort, instead of discouragement, to me; and indeed I know not how I could bear the burdens of life, and the needful experience of sorrow through which I have been led, without some abiding confidence in the full and complete purpose and electing grace and callings of God.

I consider election to refer to the personal relationship that God's people bear to his eternal and unalterable purposes, and in that sense is a secret of God; and the varied events of time are but the continual manifestation of those events. Hence there is safety in them; there is comfort in them; there is faith alone in them; for they are the substance or actual embodiment of all that pertains to the individual experience of the saints. They who have this faith are the only people who can rejoice in God's righteousness all the day, and feed upon that manna that cometh down from heaven. Carnal men may suggest vanity and carnal mirth as a soothing and quieting balm for the christian's weary or troubled mind; they may fear the evil effects of a quiet and holy confidence in the election or choice of God, and fail to derive consolation from even the feeblest hope, or the least faith, that is the only refuge of God's tried and tempted children; but I am sure that one feeble ray of God's secret love, one cheering glimpse of that faith that looks away out of all the darkness of earth, the gloom of fear, and the terrors of death, can yield more real joy to the soul than all the vanities of time together. This is "the secret of the Lord." Remember, dear child of God, that this secret is alone with "them that fear him." What consolation is in these few words, "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." If God has put his fear in our hearts, it is a true index of that book of life in which our names are written. The true believer in election and God's secret purposes of providence and grace is in no danger of a distressed mind while under the hallowed influence of that faith that enabled the apostle Paul to say, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?"—Rom. viii. 33. Dear reader, after reading the remainder of this chapter, can you not at least see that Paul was not afraid that election would injure him? Nay, this was only one of the all things that worked together for good to them who love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose. The condition upon which all things work together for good to them is not based upon what they purpose or do, but upon the very and only act of God, who hath called them; and their lives are but the open manifestation of God's eternal purpose concerning them.

I once was endeavoring to call an aged brother to account for his disorder and stubbornness in not endeavoring to settle a matter involving his fellowship with the church, when a minister, who doubted the absolute predestination of all things, very haughtily and sarcastically said, "If I believed in the predestination of all things as strongly as you do, I would not labor with anybody; for if they were predestinated to do it, they could not help it." "Well," said I, "I feel that it was predestinated that I should labor with him." I do not speak of this to revive old memories, but to manifest the unwavering faith that has sustained me under trials of the severest nature. I have had a very checkered life, full of trials that I do not wish to disclose to the public gaze. Not that my own interests require secrecy, but I feel a delicacy in referring to many of them. While I hold in sacred reverence the secrets of the Lord, and desire a spirit of holy resignation to his divine will, yet I hold that I am entitled to indulge in the luxury or advantage of but one secret order, and that is the church of God. I consider that that order is secret, sacred and divine. It originated in heaven, and is mysteriously preserved and administered on earth. None of her laws or ordinances are indigenous to earthly authority, nor to be bartered for earthly considerations, nor surrendered for earthly policy. Jesus said, "Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven."—Matt. v. 19. While some would assume that "these least" spoken of refers to the simple "decalsogue," I most truly believe they belong to that new law of liberty spoken of by James (ii. 10), and minutely correspond with the secret law of God as written in the heart of his elect people. I therefore unhesitatingly declare my belief that no member of the true church of God can find time to fulfill the laws, ordinances or rites of any other body or organization of people that conflicts with the time, order or honor of the church of God. Secret orders of men, while under the providential control of God, are not only outside of, but most positively opposed to those laws that God has ordained for the government of his church. While I confess that my experience is but limited, yet I do know that they are all based upon human policy, for selfish ends, and are not what they are claimed to be, charitable institutions. Just here I wish to confess that I once belonged to a secret order; but I trust that that

A Mason told me only yesterday, unsolicited, that he had as much confidence in that order as he had in the churches; that there are fewer hypocrites in it, for it does not pretend to be religious. But he found as much benefit in their rites, &c., as he found in the churches. I acknowledged that there was no difference between them and the modern churches, for they are all of a selfish, and not of a true religious nature. My own experience and observation prove to me the correctness of this fact; and while I do not feel at liberty to divulge those secrets that I in honor promised to keep, since there was no criminality connected therewith, yet I do know that in that order, as in all others, there must be opportunities to gratify improper ambition, and unsafe and unguarded confidence in the secrets of men, rather than a true christian and humble confidence in "The secret of the Lord." I also feel to confess the weakness of my present nature, and its liability to enter into a union with whatever promises good to me. Hence I feel the daily need of the secret working of God's holy Spirit to guide me into the way of all truth. I cannot, however, find an easy conscience in sacrificing any part of my time, or money, or labor, to the beggarly elements of the secret orders of the day; for I feel that not only does my experience prove the error of "forswearing" myself, but the blessed Master has forbidden it.—Matt. v. 33. It may be that Masonry is very ancient; but if so, I have wondered if that were not the order that Jesus warned his disciples against in Matthew x. At least a negative reference is made to secret things of "darkness," and things spoken in the ear, as if to contrast Jesus' gospel with the ways of the world. He says, even in view of all the dangers attending the faithful ministrations of his word, even to the liabilities to death itself, "Fear them not therefore: for there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, and hid that shall not be known: what I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in the light: and what ye hear in the ear, that preach ye upon the house-tops." Now, instead of laying over his disciples the perpetual menace of the "death's head and cross bones," as a motive of fear to compel secrecy, he teaches them of the blessed assurances of the heavenly Father's own care of them, and assures them that he is so much wiser in the glorious plenitude of his providential grace than they are, that he has even numbered the very hairs of their head. Behold what a wonderful secret! What if we do not know all? It is enough that the "secret of the Lord" will, in due time, be revealed. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

There are many thoughts relative to the subject that I feel sure would be good for thought, but I refrain for the present, hoping that other brethren will touch upon them as opportunity affords.

As ever, in gospel bonds,
A. B. BREES.

WHITESTOWN, N. Y., May 7, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I inclose a letter which sister Parker received from sister Cheney, which if you think profitable, you are at liberty to publish. Hoping you are well, and enjoying the presence of the Lord, I remain your brother in tribulation, JOHN BRIMSON.

DIX, N. Y., March 3, 1889.

DEAR SISTER PARKER:—It is now more than four months since that well-remembered visit at your place and the dear friends at Utica. I often recall that Sunday and the sermon, and the christian fellowship that I experienced while there. I have attended religious services but twice since. Once I went to Bartlett to an evening prayer meeting; also the funeral of sister Knapp, who has finished her course and gone to her reward. So you see that if I were wholly dependent upon the preaching of the gospel for sustenance, I should be well nigh famished. I do indeed get very hungry, and am often led to inquire, Why is it that I am so far removed from all social intercourse with the visible church of God? Dear sister, is this murmuring against the just and holy God? I fear it is; and am often asked in my reflections, "Shall not the God of all the earth do right?" While I believe it right to "hunger and thirst after righteousness," and that the blessing, "for they shall be filled," is sure to follow, yet I think it possible to mistake our unreconciliation and complainings for hungering and thirsting; and I find so much in my nature contrary to the teachings of the Spirit of Christ, that I sometimes distrust all my feelings, thoughts and actions. I am alone most of the time, and consequently have much time for reflection; and sometimes I think I can say, to the honor of God's name,

"He takes my soul ere I'm aware,
And shows me where his glories are."
Yea, dear sister, he fills my cup to overflowing, and makes me exclaim, "I will go in the strength of the Lord God, and make mention of his righteousness, and his only."

I have been reading the SIGNS OF THE TIMES lately, kindly loaned me by sister Desire Edson, and find much to encourage and cheer me in the contributions of our dear household of faith; and while reading I felt inclined to add my testimony; but I am so conscious of my inability to do so in a manner to comfort or encourage any of the dear saints, that I tremble at the thought. Nevertheless I do believe that God has called me out of darkness into his marvelous light, and set my feet upon the Rock, and established my goings, and put a new song in my mouth, even praise to his name. Yes, nearly fifty years ago. But O! how have I spent all those years? I have to say, to my shame, that very much of the time has been spent groveling amidst these low ground scenes, and toiling for that which satisfieth not; and many times I have been made to feel that the Lord visits my transgressions with the rod, and my iniquities with stripes. Nevertheless his loving-kindness he has not utterly taken from me, nor suffered his faithfulness to fail. I have to glory to-day that my salvation does not depend upon my faithfulness, but wholly upon the eternal God, who cannot fail, who is my only refuge, and whose everlasting arms are constantly underneath me, and all the subjects of his grace.

I was most especially interested in the letter of sister S. A. Ellis, formerly of this place, probably because we had been acquainted from early childhood; also that we espoused the cause of Christ at nearly the same time, it being in August, 1841. While reading her excellent letter, how my thoughts went back to the time when we were watching beside the sick bed of her father (which proved his death bed), and our conversation on the subject nearest our heart, as we were each feasting on the sweets of sins forgiven and iniquities pardoned, and hence a crown laid up for us. Her father, whom we supposed was sleeping, spoke, showing that he had listened to us; and although I do not recall his words, I remember that he reminded us that we must look for trials; that much of the path would be thorny; that God took that way to teach us discipline, and our weakness, as well as his strength. And I wish to say of brother Ellis, how well I remember the last time we met, when he last visited these parts. We met for the first time at the house of a friend, at a prayer meeting, and O how my soul swelled with the sweet fellowship and union that must always exist among the members of that body of which Christ is the head. I learn also that dear brother E. has lost his eyesight, which must be a sore affliction. Yet brother E. knows by long experience that God, who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, is able to do all things for him, and to bear him in his loving arms gently down to the brink and across the vale that intervenes between him and that bright land where he will see as he is seen and know as he is known. There the gates stand wide open by day, and there is no night there; and there is no need for sun, moon or candle, for the Lamb is the light thereof. My sister, I have written nothing that I thought I should when I commenced; but I think, if my means would, allow, I would endeavor to meet with you each month.

Please excuse this long scribble, and write to your unworthy sister,
A. L. D. CHENEY.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Delaware Old School Baptist Association, to the churches composing the same, sends greeting.

BELOVED BRETHREN:—In sending you this our Circular Letter it is our desire that you may be comforted in the Lord. While meeting together in this associate relationship we hope we are made to realize the presence of the Lord, not only collectively, but individually—that he is not one that is afar off, and for whom we must seek; but our hearts are made glad to acknowledge his omnipresence. He is ever with us and about us. In the hours of our deepest midnight darkness his all-searching eye is upon us. It is written, "O Lord, thou hast searched me, and known me. Thou knowest my down-sitting and mine uprising, thou understandest my thought afar off." "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me." Although we are continually in the presence of the Lord, we are not at all times conscious of it. When we are puffed up in our own pride, and in the sufficiency of our self-righteousness, following after the gods of this world, it is then that we shut ourselves out from the consciousness of his presence. At other times, when cold and lifeless, being led through unacquainted paths, we would give all the world contains (were it ours) could we but fly into the sunshine of his glory. Again, when harassed with doubts and fears, our souls bowed down with groanings too great for utterance, how refreshing would be but one drop of water from that river, the streams whereof make glad the city of God! When by reason of his loving-kindness we become conscious of his glorious presence, how easy is his yoke and how light his burden! We become clothed in the garment of praise, and the spirit of heaviness is removed far from us. This is the condition in which Jacob of old found himself when he awoke from the dream wherein "he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it." "And he said, Surely the Lord is in this place; and I knew it not. And he was afraid, and said, How dreadful is this place! This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." How beautiful the figure presented to his view! It was truly the gate of heaven, presenting Jesus as the ladder, and the only way for the poor, lost sinner to reach his heavenly home; and the ascending angels (patriarchs and prophets), with prophetic finger, pointing to that living way, and by faith climbing up and arriving into the everlasting presence of God; while the descending angels (apostles and preachers) bring down through the same living way the glad tidings to the poor. Jacob knew it was not the certain spot of earth that made the place holy and the gate of heaven, but that it was the felt presence of the Lord. So with the saints at this meeting. We are conscious that the earthly surroundings of this place do not make this associational gathering a heavenly place in Christ Jesus; but it is our absolute faith in his promise that where a few are gathered together in his name he is in the midst of them. There is yet another sense in which we are made to feel the presence of the Lord. It is written, "For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins." This is when we realize that it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, and that this is an offense against the Holy Ghost, for which Jesus does not make intercession; therefore we fall under the direct and awful condemnation of God. He presents himself to us as a just and righteous Father. In his hand the chastening rod is laid upon us, and while in this condition we are no less his children; yet how great the torment ensuing from that which we have done, making plain to our tortured minds how just his righteous indignation. While passing through these low grounds, and looking back upon our past experience, we can see how the guiding hand of our blessed Lord has never left us.

Now, dear brethren, when we separate from each other after this meeting may we each be enabled to realize his continual presence with us, whether in darkness or sunshine, in sickness or in health; for it is written, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

E. RITTENHOUSE, Mod.

J. L. STATON, Clerk.

The Elders and messengers of the Delaware River Association of Old School or Primitive Baptists, in session with the church at Hopewell, Mercer Co., N. J., May 29th, 30th and 31st, 1889, to the several churches whose messengers we are, send love in the Lord.

BELOVED BRETHREN:—Through the abounding goodness and watchful care of the immutable God we are spared to meet again, according to our previous appointment, for which great privilege we surely ought to render thanks to him who keepeth Israel in safety, and supplies all our needs, bestowing every blessing upon us, both temporal and spiritual. As it has been our established rule, from our organization to the present time, to present an annual address by letter, we now would call your attention to the following declarations of Scripture: "And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God. For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling. And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power: that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God."—1 Cor. ii. 1-5.

It had been declared unto the apostle concerning the church at Corinth, that there were "contentions" among them; but did the inspired servant of God countenance their divisions, or show a desire to be the leader of a faction or party? No; he fearlessly and faithfully rebuked them all, showing no favoritism to any man or men in the church; but their carnality was severely rebuked. He asks, "Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul? I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius; lest any should say that I had baptized in mine own name. And I baptized also the household of Stephanas: besides, I know not whether I baptized any other." We have only to read carefully the eighteenth chapter of the Acts to see what course the apostle pursued while at Corinth. In his first epistle to the Corinthians he reverts to his course while at Corinth, and with a holy boldness shows that while there "a year and six months teaching the word of God among them," he gave no occasion for such divisions among his brethren; for notwithstanding their contentions, he calls them all brethren. Now we will particularly notice what he says concerning his preaching.

"And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God." He said, "I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all; yet in the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that (by my voice) I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue. How guardedly he also speaks when he says, "Now, brethren, if I come unto you speaking with tongues, what shall I profit you, except I shall speak to you either by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine?" Excellency of speech and worldly wisdom have fascinating power; and God's dear children too often show that they are under the controlling power of the excellency of speech and worldly wisdom, instead of adhering to the written word of God. Paul said to Timothy, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." In the epistle to the Romans the apostle says, "Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offenses contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple." The apostle besought his brethren to mark and avoid such characters; and such should be marked and avoided in our day, for they are disorganizers. The apostle says in his epistle that he did not go among them with excellency of speech or of wisdom, but he came declaring unto them "the testimony of God." He does not say, "I declared unto you my views, or I understood the Scripture thus and so;" neither did he have any "peace propositions" to offer to his brethren, framed according to his judgment, but declared "the testimony of God," knowing that nothing else could cause peace and harmony in the church which would be permanent and enduring, if God's testimony did not. "The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream; and he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully. What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the Lord?" The apostle was not a dreaming prophet, nor a "chaffy" preacher, but spoke the word of God faithfully; for said he, "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us." Also, "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ." In whatever place, and among whatever people, the apostle's preaching was the testimony of God; and he did not wander off into the barren deserts of rationalism, nor into the quagmires of metaphysics; and whatever branch of the doctrine of God our Savior he dwelt upon, he always produced a "Thus saith the Lord." If we read the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians we can see with what positive declarations he spoke of the resurrection of the redeemed church of our God. Also, in writing to the Thessalonians upon the same glorious subject, he says, "But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." In these awfully sublime and glorious declarations, is there any theorizing? No; does he argue the matter upon the principles of modern science? No; for he declares that he says so "by the word of the Lord." He also says, "Comfort one another with these words." It matters not how well-informed any one may be literally, if there be not living faith these words will not comfort such professor of the religion of Jesus Christ. Paul, in his defense before king Agrippa, did not prevaricate; and why did he not seek to evade the truth? Because he had already declared, "And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there, save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying, that bonds and afflictions abide me. But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God. * * * Wherefore I take you to record this day that I am pure from the blood of all men; for I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." How sweetly and gloriously do his declarations harmonize with what his dear Redeemer had declared, "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." Before king Agrippa he said with a holy boldness, "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers." He then declares, "For which hope's sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?" Again said he, concerning his accusers and persecutors, "Who ought to have been here before thee, and object, if they had aught against me. Or else let these same here say, if they have found any evil in me, while I stood before the council, except it be for this one voice that I cried, standing among them, Touching the resurrection of the dead, I am called in question by you this day." Because Paul "preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection," he was called a "babbler," "a setter forth of strange gods," "a new doctrine," &c. But Paul preached thus because it was "the testimony of God;" for Jesus said, while God incarnate, "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." "For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified." The declaration of "the angel of the Lord" to Joseph was, "And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." The apostle said, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief." Said Jesus unto Thomas, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me." The one who feels the most feeble and ignorant has the same almighty Savior that a learned Saul of Tarsus had; for in the salvation of sinners all, whatever may be their condition in life, are saved through the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ; for again the apostle said, "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ." Can any one of God's dear children feel less than "the least of all saints?" It should not be lost sight of, that Paul not only preached Jesus, the Savior, and Christ, the anointed One, but "Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ, the power of God, and the wisdom of God." The apostle says, "But when the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." Also, "For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly. For scarcely for a righteous man will one die; yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." And, "Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish." A vast amount of Scripture might be quoted to sustain the glorious doctrine that Christ died for, or instead of, sinners; but sufficient has been quoted to corroborate and sustain the great and glorious truth; for "In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established." This great truth shines in the types and figures under the law, in all of which is constantly held forth that Christ would die for sinners; and in those portions of the prophecies and Psalms which speak of him, the same truth is clearly set forth, especially the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah and the fortieth Psalm. These awfully momentous declarations show why Paul preached Christ crucified; because it was "the testimony of God." In closing these quotations we make an affirmation, and hope we do so in the fear of God. There is not a sentence recorded in the Bible stating that eternal, spiritual life ever sinned or died; neither is there a sentence showing that Christ died for any other than sinners. Let it be distinctly understood that we have not chosen this text to discuss the subject of the new or spiritual birth in this Circular Letter, but to dwell on the text under consideration; for in a number of communications during the past two years the birth, and the experimental salvation which succeeds or follows the birth, have been so mixed as to constitute a perversion of both.

"And I was with you in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling." Said the apostle, "Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which worketh in you, both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Also he said, "And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews; to them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law; to them that are without law, as without law (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ), that I might gain them that are without law; to the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak: I am made all things to all (men), that I might by all means save some." Now it should be distinctly kept before the mind that the salvation spoken of here is not eternal salvation; for it has already been shown by the same apostle how that momentous matter has been accomplished. But the anxiety of the inspired man was that, if according to God's will, they all might be saved from error of every kind, and be brought fully into gospel liberty. These declarations clearly and positively show that the gospel of the grace of God does not make men heady, high-minded and arrogant; but instead thereof, it clothes their minds with humility, as with a garment; for "Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall." As the apostle was with (not above them, nor lording it over them) his brethren in weakness, in fear and much trembling, he was prepared by reigning and abounding grace to enter into their feelings, both of sorrow and joy; because he says, "Blessed be God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, who comforteth us in all our tribulations, that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God; for as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ." These momentous declarations recorded in the Scriptures show clearly and absolutely that no man, however eminent, and however much ability he possess as a man, can comfort God's dear children, unless he has been with them in weakness, fear and much trembling; for he has to learn these things, not by reading modern authors, but in the same school that the prophet Jeremiah did. For said he, "And I said, My strength and my hope is perished from the Lord. Remembering mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and the gall, my soul hath them still in remembrance, and is humbled in me. This I recall to my mind, therefore have I hope."

"And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power." Of the apostle it was said, "For his letters, say they, are weighty and powerful; but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible." But he boldly states, "Let such an one think this, that such as we are in word by letters when we are absent, such will we be also in deed when we are present." What is the lesson taught in this last quotation? Is it not that there was no prevarication concerning the truth of God, whether he wrote letters to his brethren, or was present with them? To the Galatians he said, "Am I therefore become your enemy because I tell you the truth?" Anciently there was a class of characters "Which say to the seers, See not; and to the prophets, Prophecy not unto us right things: speak unto us smooth things; prophecy deceits." Also another character is thus described, "The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart: his words were softer than oil, yet they were drawn swords." Frequently we hear words about like these, "I like that preacher, because he is so pleasing in his manners, and he dwells on experimental things, and lets others alone. Really he has magnetic power," &c. But such seldom mention anything concerning the grace of God, but talk about the person's eloquence and oratory; and sometimes persons are brought into the visibly organized church under just such an influence. But such are merely nominal professors, and when there comes a time that God's servants are constrained to declare the truth openly and boldly, it will be said by such enticed persons, "These are hard sayings: I do not care to hear them;" and soon they are found walking no more with the church. We will now particularly notice how it was with Paul when defending himself before Agrippa, and see if his speech was with enticing words of man's wisdom; for "as he thus spake for himself, Festus said with a loud voice, Paul, thou art beside thyself: much learning doth make thee mad. But he said, I am not mad, most noble Festus, but speak forth the words of truth and soberness. * * * King

Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest. Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a christian. And Paul said, I would to God that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost and altogether such as I am, except these bonds." Also, "As he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season I will send for thee." When Paul was not only reasoning before his accusers, but defending himself against false charges, did he speak with enticing words of man's wisdom? No; but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power. Such speaking had its effect, in causing one to say he was mad; and another was made to tremble; and to-day the demonstration of the Spirit harmonizes with what was declared by patriarchs, prophets and apostles. Wheresoever, or by whomsoever, there is caviling concerning Scripture testimony, whether it be the eternal purpose of God, his immutability, his everlasting love, particular redemption, his working all things after the counsel of his own will, or any other branch of divine truth, we may rest assured that it is not the demonstration of the Spirit, but the vagaries of the carnal mind. It should never be forgotten by the children of our God that although the heavenly Comforter, the Holy Ghost, is the author of all meekness, the God of all grace and consolation, yet he hath inspired his servants, the prophets and apostles, to write the severest things against them who "utter error against the Lord, to make empty the soul of the hungry; and he will cause the drink of the thirsty to fail. The instruments also of the churl are evil; he deviseth wicked devices, to destroy the poor with lying words, even when the needy speaketh right." In such declarations made by the prophet, are there any enticing words? No; but the character of such is demonstrated by the Spirit. In perfect accordance with this was the conduct of our Lord, for his whole character was made up of meekness, kindness and love; yet what severe language did he use against those builders, the scribes and Pharisees. In this he is also followed in measure by all his faithful disciples, whom he had so earnestly warned to beware of false prophets, who come in sheep's clothing. Paul said to "Elymas the sorcerer (for so is his name by interpretation), O full of all subtilty and mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" Now, even at this present time, as true believers are humbled with spiritual discoveries of the divine glory in the way of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ, will their zeal be kindled against every corruption of the gospel, so as not to "bear them that are evil," not even to receive them into their house, nor bid them God speed. In the twenty-third chapter of Matthew, Jesus calls the scribes and Pharisees seven times hypocrites, and once a generation of vipers. A vast amount of Scripture might be adduced to show that not only prophets and apostles, but our Lord Jesus Christ, used the most severe invectives against false teachers that are recorded in the Bible; therefore the Holy Ghost describes men exactly as they are.

"That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." The inspired servant of God arrives at the conclusion of the reason that his speech and his preaching were of a kind, showing that the faith of God's children should not stand in anything but the power of God; and that is conclusive evidence that the faith of God's elect rests on the testimony of its author; for the apostle said to the Hebrews, in unequivocal language, that such is the fact. His words to them are, "Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. For consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds." The apostle, after he had withstood Peter "to the face, because he was to be blamed," said, "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." Here we can see plainly that living faith is not to be found where Christ is not; also, that faith always, when in exercise, looks to its author; therefore it stands not in the wisdom of men, but the power of God. The word of God clearly and fully makes the distinction between the righteousness which justifies the sinner, and the faith which receives it. Our God in his love, wisdom and purpose has given to his church and people all the record they need; for the declaration was, "Bind up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples." If the testimony has been bound up, and the law sealed among his disciples, there will be no addenda made to the testimony, nor alterations therein; and woe be unto the man or men who openly attempts to do so; for such can only alter the letter, and change some of the outward forms. The purpose of God can no more be changed than Jehovah can cease to exist. But let us hear with trembling and fear what is said concerning them who would add unto or take from anything recorded in prophecy. "For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book: and if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book." It is clearly demonstrated by the Spirit that if our faith stands in the wisdom of men, such a kind does not stand in the power of God; and no spirit can cause any of the children of men to have a just understanding of any declaration of Scripture except the Spirit of God. "For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God." This last quotation settles the matter as to whom the divine Instructor is, and no power or powers can ever change this matter.

Now, brethren of this association, as we are about to close our letter, we wish to address you by way of interrogation and affirmation. Do we, as an association, confide in the wisdom of men concerning any of the principles of the doctrine of God our Savior? Or do we with child-like simplicity receive the testimony of God as recorded in the Scriptures, absolutely confiding in his everlasting love, his infinite wisdom and almighty power, to accomplish everything declared concerning his eternal purpose of love and mercy to his dear people, as well as his wrath and vengeance to his enemies, and that no event ever has and never can transpire by chance? If such be our blessed condition, our faith stands not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. Next to being born of the Spirit, the greatest boon with which a child of God can be blessed is to be established in the truth. What did Paul say while on his perilous voyage to Rome? Hear him. "For there stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve, saying, Fear not, Paul: thou must be brought before Caesar; and lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee. Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer; for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me." In the midst of that terrible storm the apostle believed God; therefore his faith stood in the power of God, and that he would exactly accomplish what he had promised. If our faith stands in the power of God, we shall believe his word as recorded in the Scriptures. We are to heed the declarations of no man or men unless the same are sustained by the Scriptures; neither the doctrine of any association, if such doctrine is not clearly established by "the testimony of God." Said an apostle, "We have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye witnesses of his majesty."

Now, in closing our letter to you, we feel to exhort you to heed none of the vain theorizing that is now so prevalent, but take the Scriptures as your guide; and in what seems dark and obscure, do not be led away by the comments of uninspired men. If such a course is pursued, the result will certainly be confusion and strife; but if we receive the testimony of our God with child-like simplicity, peace, love and harmony will abound in the churches composing this association.

"Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Savior, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen."

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Delaware Baptist Association, to the several associations in correspondence with us, addresses the following epistle.

BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—We are assembled with the church called Rock Springs, in Lancaster Co., Pa., which is one of the extreme points of this association, and somewhat inconvenient to most of the associated churches. On this account the churches are not as well represented as on some other occasions; but they are all represented by letter and by some messengers, showing general health, unabated interest in the cause, steadfastness in the truth, and a good degree of prosperity. We have messengers present from quite a number of corresponding associations, who have mingled with us in the most perfect harmony, and with every manifestation of christian love and gospel fellowship. The ministry of the word has displayed much variety, reaching to the depths of the riches of gospel truth, and has been received evidently with readiness of mind, and to edification and comfort. The congregation has been large and very attentive to the word. We have had all things common for the time being, and all seemed to feel that it was good for them to be here. There has been no jar or note of discord during the session, neither has there been in any of the churches during the year.

Our next session is appointed to be held with the church called Cow Marsh, Kent Co., Del., to commence on Wednesday before the last Sunday in May, 1890. We hope still to be remembered, and that you will be disposed to share with us in these privileges in the future as in the past.

THE DAY OF VISITATION AND PERPLEXITY.

"WOE is me! for I am as when they have gathered the summer fruits, as the grape gleanings of the vintage: there is no cluster to eat: my soul desired the firstripe fruit. The good man is perished out of the earth; and there is none upright among men: they all lie in wait for blood; they hunt every man his brother with a net. That they may do evil with both hands earnestly, the prince asketh, and the judge asketh a reward; and the great man, he uttereth his mischievous desire: so they wrap it up. The best of them is as a brier; the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge: the day of thy watchmen and thy visitation cometh; now shall be their perplexity."—Micah vii. 1-4.

It is needless to say that the prince and judge who ask a reward, as charged in our text, do not represent the true Prince and the just Judge of Israel. When our Lord was serving under the law of Moses he taught his disciples, saying, "The scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat; all therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do; but do not ye after their works; for they say, and do not." In this sense those rulers among the Jews were princes and judges; and they may well represent those who assume to be rulers in the organized church, and who usurp authority to criticize and condemn all who fail to acknowledge their dictation as righteous judgment. These self-constituted rulers and judges always ask a reward. It may not be in money or material wealth; but they always seek personal advantage, though it may be the coveted reward is like that which Diotrephes loved, simply "to have the pre-eminence."—3 John 9. The covetous principle which originates such a desire cannot be found among the fruit described as produced by the Spirit.—Gal. v. 22, 23. It is evidently among the works of the flesh as presented in contrast with the fruit of the Spirit. It is not specified in our text what reward is demanded by the prince and the judge. The object of that demand is declared to be "That they may do evil with both hands earnestly." Whatever may be the plausible appearance of the motive which actuates the saints when they demand any such reward as may be gratifying to the selfishness of carnal nature, it must always be in reality just what is here stated. Since "both hands earnestly" are engaged in doing evil, it is evident that there is no possibility that they should even incidentally accomplish any good.

When carnal feelings and natural reason are allowed to direct the conduct of the saints, the result will always prove that the effect of the most innocent devices of the natural mind is to destroy the peace of those who resort to such things. In the end they shall certainly see that they have done evil "with both hands earnestly," that is, with confident assurance that they are doing right.

"And the great man, he uttereth his mischievous desire." The great man here described is not that only Man whom God recognizes as great. Of him it is written, "Cry out and shout, thou inhabitant of Zion; for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee."—Isa. xii. 6. There is neither mischief nor folly in any utterance which proceeds out of his lips; neither is it possible that any mischievous desire should arise in his heart. The great man of whom this testimony is recorded is that character among the saints of God who is puffed up with vain confidence in his own strength and superior merit. He may even so impress his associates with his importance that they look upon him as entitled to extraordinary deference and reverence; but this only gives him ability to inflict more extensive mischief. Many afflicted and poor saints have been robbed of their rest in the comfort of the gospel by the erroneous doctrines and commandments of men who have been esteemed as great among their brethren. These are the traditions and doctrines which exalt their teachers, while they bring no balm of consolation to the mourning heart which feels its own sinfulness. In such utterances of the mischievous desire of the great among men there is no tribute of praise to the infinite grace of God. This is a safe test to apply for discriminating between truth and error at all times; while truth always comforts the conscious sinner with the glorious revelation by that grace which is manifested alone in our Lord Jesus Christ, every false system tends to distress such characters by requiring impossible conditions to be fulfilled by them. Every false theory is subservient to the mischievous desire of them who trust in their own merit for acceptance in the sight of God; so that it is only the truth which humbles the sinner under a realizing sense of his utter helplessness. When any true child of God becomes vainly confident in his own greatness he is too rich for entrance and enjoyment of the kingdom of heaven. Until such shall be converted from that self-confidence, and made utterly helpless, even as a little child, there is no possibility of their entering into the kingdom of God. There is no room there for any great or strong ones. While that heavenly house has ample room and mansions enough to shelter the innumerable hosts of little children who are led by the Spirit of God, there cannot be made room within its glorious portals for one great and strong man who is able to enter by his own merit. The mischievous desire of the great man would banish peace and joy from that blessed abode if it could by any possibility enter there. But when the light of the knowledge of the glory of God shines in the heart, it never fails to produce humility in that heart. It is only as walking after the flesh that any saint can ever become great in his own estimation. They who are most abundantly blessed with gifts and graces of the Spirit are thereby enabled most clearly to feel their own nothingness. It is not mock humility in Paul when he claims to be "less than the least of all saints." The abundance of the revelations which he received enabled him to see his own destitution just as clearly as he saw the perfect glory of his gracious redeeming Lord. So it is always when the saint has the deepest sense of his own unworthiness and sinfulness that he sees most of the glory of that grace which brings salvation to them that are lost. The Lord says, "Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven."—Matt. xviii. 4. The natural mind cannot comprehend this standard of greatness. Reason calls the proud happy, and says that prosperity attends the ungodly. Every "mischievous desire" originates in that carnal mind which is great in its own estimation. "So they wrap it up." If wicked and rebellious devices were presented in their true character to the mind of the saints, they would never be deceived by them. The sinful suggestions of the tempter and of the carnal mind are not presented in their real character, when they are suggested to tempt the saint. Their wickedness is always wrapped up in some plausible appearance of goodness. Hence the need of the exhortation of one another daily, "While it is called To-day; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin."—Heb. iii. 13. The tempter always comes under the pretense of bringing something desirable to the subject of his wiles. His first work in the garden was to deceive the woman. He has never been anything but a liar since that time. He and his associates, the world and the flesh, still wrap up their allurements in the appearance of good designs. No other policy could succeed in deceiving the saints whom they continually assail. "The best of them is as a brier; the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge." The application of this terrible denunciation is not to be understood with reference to persons among men, as to Peter in distinction from John. Each individual who is taught of God must feel the force of this description as applied to the corruption of his own carnal mind. Blind Pharisees may repudiate the charge of indwelling sin and corruption, as having reference to themselves; but the conscious sinner in whose heart God has shined, knows that it is impossible to overdraw the description of that awful corruption which is there hidden. Of those whose example is left for our learning, the inspired record witnesses that they were not in themselves in any way better than their fellow-sinners.—Rom. iii. 9; Eph. ii. 3. This testimony of the inspired prophet, as recorded in our text, is exactly in harmony with the words of Paul in the passages cited. So it is written of Israel, "Take ye heed every one of his neighbor, and trust ye not in any brother; for every brother will utterly supplant, and every neighbor will walk with slanders." This is the best which divine truth can say of the natural man. Again, "Thus saith the Lord, Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord."—Jer. ix. 4; xvii. 5. When any subject of divine grace is led by the carnal mind he is sowing to the flesh, and of the flesh he will certainly reap corruption. The flesh of the saints is no less corrupt than that of those who are dead in sins. The works which are directed by their carnal mind are all evil. It is in this state of conformity to their natural mind that the language of our text is descriptive of them. Not only does this sinful enmity manifest itself in making those who are led by it as briars to annoy and tear those with whom they are associated, but the most suffering is inflicted upon the one in whom that evil spirit dwells. Even when it is cast out by the authority of the Lord Jesus, it often tears and severely wounds its victim. But never is one wounded so seriously as to be beyond the healing power of the divine Physician. The one who has been brought to the lowest depth in his own experience is best qualified to testify to the infinite power of that grace by which he was raised up. Among men there are some who are esteemed better than others, by reason of their conduct and conversation being less repulsive; but even the best of them only differs from the worst as the mercy of God restrains the evil which is their nature. Of all the children of Adam it is true, that "They are all gone aside, they are all together become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one."—Psa. xiv. 3. The whole experience of the saints is needful to enable them to know the truth of this just judgment of our God. It is the same distressing fact which extorted from Paul the cry, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Still, to will is present with them, but how to perform that which is good they find not. Their whole pilgrimage is a perpetual warfare against the law of sin which is in their members. When they are left to their own strength they are soon overcome, and in their distress they can witness to the piercing cruelty of that oppression under which they are held by their sinful lusts. This was typified by the heartless severity of those carnal rulers under the legal dispensation, who bound heavy burdens and grievous to be borne, and laid them on men's shoulders; but they would not themselves move them with one of their fingers.—Matt. xxiii. 4. Where this tyrannical spirit prevails in an organized church, it will not fail to develop all the dreadful effects of carnality in the alienation of the members from each other, and the cessation of manifest love among them.

"The day of thy watchmen and thy visitation cometh; now shall be their perplexity." There is no distinction between the day of the watchmen and the visitation of the true Israel. The watchmen throughout the long night of the legal dispensation ceased not to proclaim the coming of that glorious day of the visitation of God to reveal his great salvation to his people. That day of vengeance of our God is the acceptable year of the Lord; and its proclamation is "to comfort all that mourn." There is sweet assurance in the very perplexity of the saints. Paul says, "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed." The abiding principle of faith and hope, in perfect unity with divine charity, saves the saints from despair, however they may be perplexed. Even their visitation and perplexity is evidence that they are the children of the day. Their very chastening is made to yield to them the peaceable fruit of righteousness. The result of this visitation and perplexity shall be as declared in the following context, "Therefore I will look unto the Lord; I will wait for the God of my salvation; my God will hear me."

MARRIAGES.

IN North Berwick, Maine, June 1st, 1889, by Elder Wm. Quint, Mr. Albert E. Quint, of North Berwick, and Miss Myra B. Shorey, of South Berwick, Maine.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—In North Berwick, Maine, May 26th, 1889, sister Betsey Ham.

She was confined to her bed only a few days, but her sufferings within that time were great. All was done for her that could be done by earthly friends; but death was the only thing that could relieve her, and it did come at the appointed time. She was one of our oldest members in the church, and there never was the least thing brought against her in the church. All who were with her in life considered her a fine woman. In 1860 she was married to brother Gilman Ham, who had a large family of children by his first wife, and she was a good step-mother to them; but she is gone, leaving them and two brothers and one sister, with many other relatives, to mourn.

WM. QUINT.

NORTH BERWICK, Maine.

My beloved husband, John Carson, departed this life July 27th, 1888, aged eighty-five years and twenty days. I am left to travel life's journey alone. I miss him very much; but it is God that hath bereft me, and he can all my sorrows heal. He said he wanted to go home and be at rest. I ask an interest in your prayers.

"A precious one from us has gone,
A voice we loved is stilled,
A place is vacant in our home
Which never can be fill'd."

"God in his wisdom has recalled
The boon his love had given;
And though the body molders here,
The soul is safe in heaven."

RUTH CARSON.

MONONGAHELA CITY, Pa.

DEPARTED this life, May 5th, 1889, Naomi Asenath Banks, aged eighteen years and two days.

She was paralyzed in her limbs and hips two years ago last winter, and for more than a year had no use of them whatever. Then she got so she could move them very well, yet had not strength in them to walk. She could sit up most of the time, and could also ride in a carriage, and walk some with assistance, and was generally quite cheerful. She read a great deal, and sang the songs of Zion with a clear voice. Her only hope was in Christ's atoning blood.

She was the only daughter of R. S. and Lucy Ann Banks, and was born in Marion Co., Iowa, May 3d, 1871. She leaves her father, mother, three brothers, and many relatives and friends to mourn their loss; but we must be reconciled to the will of God, for all he does is right. She is at rest, and we shall soon follow her to the sweet paradise of peace and joy above, and see Jesus as he is, and be like him. What more could we ask or desire?

Mary Ann Harris, wife of brother Joseph Harris, departed this life at their home in Grand Ronde Valley, Union County, Oregon, Dec. 28th, 1888. She was the daughter of Joel and Raches Sturgill, and was born in Ashe Co., N. C., March 16th, 1819. She moved with her parents to Lee Co., Va., when nineteen years old, and there was married to Joseph Harris, June 9th, 1842. In the fall of the same year they moved to Linn County, Mo. Sister Harris professed a hope in the Redeemer in her girlhood days, and united with the Old School Baptist Church in Missouri, being baptized by Elder Caleb Colyer.

Brother and sister Harris, with their family, emigrated to Oregon in the year 1865. Here they were destined to live several years without any church privileges, and the only preaching they had was what they read in the SIGNS. I became acquainted with our old brother and sister in the fall of 1877. In 1878 there was a little church organized at their house, and since then I have been intimately acquainted with her. She was sound in the faith and well established in the truth, and no ordinary circumstance would keep her from attending meeting, for it did seem to be her meat and drink to meet with her brethren. She was a faithful and devoted wife and mother, and our old brother feels his loss very much. May the dear Lord reconcile him and the children to his providence toward them. The little church in Grand Ronde Valley has lost in the last year two of its members, whom we miss very much.

NEAR GOLDENDALE, Wash. Ter.

DIED—March 6th, 1889, at his home in Shelby Co., Ky., our dear father, O. R. Williams, in his eighty-sixth year.

The deceased was born July 21st, 1803, in Clark Co., Ky., and was married to Miss Nancy Robinson in 1827. To them were born a daughter and a son, the son having died when young. His daughter Sallie is now the wife of Albert Money. His wife dying in 1880, he married Miss Mildred Flynn in 1882, and moved to Shelby Co., where he died. To them were born thirteen children, four daughters and nine sons, five of whom have died. His wife preceded him to the grave twenty years, since which time he has lived with his children. Father joined the church called Bethel, in Shelby Co., in 1873, and was baptized by Elder J. F. Johnson, since which time he has lived the life of a humble christian. He filled his seat among his brethren in church when not providentially hindered, and was always ready to help the needy and afflicted, and to distribute to those who preached the glorious doctrine of salvation by grace, feeling it a pleasant duty to sustain the worship of God and maintain the order of his house. He was sick but a short time before his release came, and was confined to his bed only ten days. He said his hope was in Jesus, and that he would soon be at rest. Thus calmly he passed away. His body now rests in the family grave-yard, by the side of his children and beloved companion, there to await the glorious resurrection morning. He leaves nine children to mourn their loss, besides a host of friends; but we feel to say, "The Lord's will be done." May our hope be as bright as his when we cross the cold Jordan of death. The following verse was a favorite with him:

"No sorrow be vented that day
When Jesus has called me home;
But singing and shouting, let each one say,
He's gone from the evil to come."

HIS CHILDREN.

DEACON Thomas Crampton died April 16th, 1889, in the eightieth year of his age. The immediate cause of his death was perhaps heart disease. He was a man of great vigor, both of mind and body, and had enjoyed, up to a very short time before his death, unexceptionable health, which made his death so much more unexpected. He was found dead in his room, and the probability is that the struggle was but short. He called his boy at the usual hour in the morning, and at six o'clock a. m. he was dead.

To speak of the many traits which adorned this man's character would require more space than is usually allotted an obituary notice. If in the building of nature and of grace the great Architect should use only such material as may stand the test of conscientious devotion to duty, purity of purpose, and honesty of aim, this man was much more likely to be needed than many who were much more pretentious. He was one of whom I think it may be said that he was wise without adversity, cautious without the experience of age; these only lending the golden touch of softness to their inherent traits. Reform in nations and individuals change according to condition and circumstances; but he who prepares a man for the abode of justice is God. Nature does not change itself, neither does God change it, for he made it right; but he does create in his people a new nature—heaven mysteriously blended with earth—God come down to man. This was true of brother Crampton, his enemies being judges, but joyfully true with those who knew him best. He was calm in the midst of storm, and a guide in the midst of confusion. I would not speak of all that we at Mill Creek felt him to be to us. Suffice it to say, he was an Israelite indeed, in whom was no guile, and a Deacon in whom we saw no fault. He was the close companion, the sympathizing friend, the wise counselor, of us all. Though we feel that our loss is irreparable, yet we loved him too well to wish him back, but would ever hold him as a gracious gift from God to us.

If I mistake not, he was first baptized by Elder Jones, with which baptism he was not satisfied, and in 1849 he was baptized by Elder George T. Elgin. His membership continued with the Mill Creek Church until his death. He leaves neither wife nor children, but many relatives and warm friends to mourn their loss, to whom we would extend our sympathy.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SUTHERLAND'S CORNERS, Ontario.

DEAR BROTHER IN THE LORD:
—It was a pleasure for me to hear from you again. I feel you are much favored in having our brother, Elder J. G. Eubanks, to come among you preaching the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. May he long be spared to labor in your midst, to your edification, and to the praise of our God.

It is a comfort to me, my brother, to read in yours of your soul's exercises in divine things. It is a life unknown by the world; and sometimes I ask myself if some who profess to hold the doctrine really are in "the way." I have found some ready to argue about points of doctrine, ready to make ridicule of those who advocate erroneous doctrine; and if some poor weakling in Christ's flock, who has not yet come "unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ," should show that he is not as yet very deeply taught upon some point of the doctrine, or is in error, and tossed to and fro by winds of doctrine, these strong ones that I am speaking about seem to me to be like the strong cattle mentioned in Ezekiel xxxiv. 15-22, who thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with their horns, till they have scattered them abroad. Yes, these strong ones speak very contemptuously of the weak. But when you speak of the doctrine as it is learned in the soul's experience of the children of God, if in their presence some dear child of God shall tell how the doctrine was revealed and made sweet in his soul, do they ever respond? Do they speak a word, or even give a look, that would indicate their sympathy? Can you ever enter into experimental conversation with them upon the doctrine of Christ? Do they tell of their own ups and downs, of the night seasons, and times of healing sunshine, of trials, and conflicts, and tribulations, and also of the triumphant halleluiahs that we feel in our own hearts when we are enabled to trample all our foes under our feet, in the grace and strength of Jehovah, our Salvation? Not a word can you get out of them, which has caused me many times to wonder. There is a way wherein the redeemed of the Lord walk, and wherein the uncircumcised can never walk. Whether the creed they have in their heads be the letter of the truth, or error, they cannot and do not walk in "the steps of that faith of our father Abraham." Except the Spirit of Christ dwell in us, except we are born of the Spirit, we cannot see or enter the kingdom of God. How blessed is the man who can by the grace of God say, "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

As there is a profitable blessedness when the dear children of God talk one with another of what things are done in the way, so I have felt it good to communicate in writing one with another concerning the things most precious to us, the "things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ." "Talk ye of all his wondrous works." For the past few days, in addition to many other things, my mind has been exercised in contemplation of the relation and unity of the people of God, and how, wherever this relationship truly subsists, it is called forth into holy exercise one toward another; not in a sound of mere formalistic, pretentious display of seeming duties, but in a living, loving and Christ-like manner, which belongs only to the household of faith, who serve one another because they have the Spirit of Christ dwelling in them. To this end I find that God has been very mindful of us, and in his word are found full and encouraging directions to stir up our pure minds by way of remembrance. Where the vital bond subsists, and is felt by the church of Christ, might we not ask, dear brother, How can it be otherwise than that we should be found manifesting our love and tender care one of another? I know this will sharply discriminate; it will prove a sieve that will sift out all that are destitute of God; but not the least grain will be lost, though the wind will carry away all the chaff, all mere carnal professors. O, my brother, there have been times when I have been so cast down at what I have felt in myself, and the absence of that which was so desirable, that a terrible fear has assailed my soul that I was nothing but chaff; but when I have been brought very nearly in despair, the Lord has appeared to my relief, and has revived my hope that he has called me by his grace. To have this consoling evidence is far beyond all price, all wealth and honors; yea, all earthly things fade into utter insignificance, if brought into comparison with "the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord." It is written, "For as we have many members in one body, and all the members have not the same office, so we, being many, are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another."—Rom. xii. 4, 5. How very near! How close the affinity of the members of the body of Christ! This is not some nice fine spun theory for such like the Athenians of old to spend their time in vain, speculative and profitless discussions.—Acts xvii. 21. But the very doctrine of Christ, having actual being in those whom God hath called by his grace, and which self-same glorious and precious truth God hath wrought in his people to his own praise, is a living and divine reality, bearing fruit in those who are in sincerity members in particular of the body of Christ. If we, dear brother, are "members one of another," there surely will be manifested precious God-glorifying proofs of this relationship. Saith the apostle Paul, "The body is not one member, but many;" and, "God hath set the members, every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him." And as "no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church," so in measure the members should have the same care one for another. Then as it is unseemly to see a man biting and devouring his own flesh, so it is altogether at variance with our relationship one with another to despise or in any way injure one another. "The eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you. Nay, much more those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary: and those members of the body which we think to be less honorable, upon these we bestow more abundant honor, and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness. For our comely parts have no need; but God hath tempered the body together, having given more abundant honor to that part which lacked, that there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another. And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it. Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular."—1 Cor. xii.

14-27. It is clearly manifest, according to the teaching set forth in this quotation, that there will in some degree be declared the most affectionate watchfulness, and tender, loving service, one toward another; for the members of Christ's body, the church, are in such sympathetic union that they suffer and rejoice together. Was it not thus with our exalted head? When the members suffered, Jesus our head felt it, and said, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" So Paul saith, "Who is weak, and I am not weak? Who is offended, and I burn not?"—2 Cor. xi. 29. "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep."—Rom. xii. 15; Isa. lxvi. 10.

Some time ago I was at a certain place, in the midst of many of the dear kindred in Christ who were gathered together, whom I found much disquieted and cast down in sorrow, because of distressing evils that were robbing them of their peace, joy and fellowship in the things of the kingdom of our dear Redeemer. I felt to pity them, and as I beheld them in the valley of Achor (trouble) I thought I could from some higher place speak to them some words of consolation and of good cheer; but, or ever I was aware (although all were strangers to me in the flesh), I found their troubles and sorrows were mine; that I, with them, was in the same vale of tribulation. I was thus their "companion in tribulation." To that God, our God, who knows the oppressions and sorrows of his heritage, my heart was poured out, that he would have compassion upon us, that he would show us mercy, and grant to his people deliverance and enlargement from all their distresses, to the praise and honor of his glorious name. O that I were always alive to my relationship (as I hope) to the body of Christ! But what shall be said of the one who professes to be in the body, yet is ever insensible to the sufferings and tribulations of the church of God, who is unmoved and untouched by "the afflictions of Joseph?" Is not the evidence lacking of his being a member of the body of Christ? Our dear Savior saith, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." This is a proof of our discipleship. Can we abide the test? I know not whether all of God's dear children are like me, but I am often inquiring and searching for our signs; and there are times when things with me are wrapped up in such obscurity that in distress I sigh, "I see not my signs."—Psa. lxxiv. 9. Is it a proof of our love one to another, if we are "puffed up for one against another?"—1 Cor. iv. 6. No; this is to be shunned; this we are to beware of. This but exhibits the carnal, fleshly nature that is in us, the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts. Then it will not declare the grace of God in us to despise, to speak lightly of, or to make sneering remarks about, this or that brother or sister in the church, or concerning the gifts in the body. No, my dear brother, this is a grievous evil, and, if we are guilty, will work to our own discomfiture, and our God will bring us under his chastening rod. All the members have not the same office, but "there are diversities of gifts," and all in the measure that God has designed are to the edifying of the body of Christ. "Who maketh thee to differ from another? And what hast thou that thou didst not receive? Now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it?" Christians are under law, not to Moses; for to him and to the law they are become dead by the body of Christ. So then we are not under the law, but under grace. Believers in the Son of God are not without law to God, but under law to Christ. This is the "perfect law of liberty."—James i. 25. It belongs, not to the children of the bond woman, but to the children of the free, the children of the new covenant. This law is not written upon tables of stone, but written by the finger of God upon the fleshly tables of the heart. One of the items of the law of Christ thus engraven in the heart is, "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ."—Gal. vi. 2. Our burdens are various. Sometimes we see a brother is pressed down by his peculiar burden, and we feel we cannot touch it. We feel our incapacity to be such that we are not capable, we feel, of knowing how to speak even a word of sympathy. But our heart goes out for him, and we wish that we might bear a part of his trouble; but O how helpless we feel! What then? Why, we go and tell Jesus, our gracious Burden-bearer, who hath said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and he shall sustain thee." Yes, we tell our God about our sorely weighed down and oppressed brother or sister, and supplicate our King to support, to comfort, and to enable our suffering kindred in Christ to endure the burdens that have been appointed them, and in his own time and to his own praise bring them out from under their burdens. A word of sympathy, a kind and compassionate glance, is sometimes quite a lift to a burdened soul. "When any of our brethren are brought into temporal straits," says one, "I pity them—I feel for them." But do we, dear brother, according to our ability, feel in our pockets for the relief of our brethren? "Well, really, I would like to do something to help the brother, but just at present I am hard pushed, and at my wits' end to know how to gather in a sufficient amount to make another payment on property that I am in debt for. If I had it paid for, then I could do something." Ah, poor, stingy, covetous one! I fear that before the last payment is due you will be looking for some more property to buy; and the poor brother that you say you pity and feel for might die in the poor-house for all you care. Do we not, dear brother, need the grace of God, that we may be found to love our brother, not in word only, but in deed and in truth? How precious is the following testimony: "She hath been a succorer of many, and of myself also."—Rom. xvi. 2. "For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity."—Phil. iv. 16. May we be found so fulfilling the law of Christ, "distributing to the necessity of saints."—Rom. xii. 13. Another blessed item recorded in the law of our King is, "God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him. Wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another, even as also ye do."—1 Thess. v. 9-11. I feel, dear brother, that there is need to be continually consulting the law in Zion, that we may be able to discern how near our behavior is to that which is required of such professing godliness. When we find a brother that is weak, we ought to bear his infirmities, and not please ourselves. "Let every one of us please his neighbor for his good to edification."—Romans xv. 1, 2. When our brother does wrong shall we crush him—shall we destroy him? No; let us in a gospel way, according to the rule, seek to save him. If this cannot be done, then have no company with him. If a brother is in error in doctrine shall we make ridicule of him, or despise him? No; but may the Lord grant us grace, that in meekness we may instruct those that oppose themselves, if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth, and that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will.—2 Tim. ii. 25, 26. If we discover in a brother indications of becoming cold and indifferent and worldly minded, shall we talk sharply or unkindly to him? Shall we speak to him and of him in such a way as to leave the impression that we consider ourselves better and holier? Here again we need the grace of God, lest we be carried away with high-mindedness. O how good it is to affectionately and faithfully admonish our brother, to tell him how his indifference has pained us, to make inquiries concerning the state of his own mind, and pray for him to our great Physician, that he may be healed.—James v. 16. "Let us consider one another, to provoke unto love and to good works."—Heb. x. 24. What say we, dear brother, to these things? Is not this blessed employment? Is not this what we desire, and how we would live? I know your heart will respond in the affirmative. As for me, though I am away behind in these precious exhibitions of the grace of God, yet they are what my soul loveth; and I would ever, both privately and openly, live to the praise of God, and to the edifying of the body of Christ.

May you, dear brother, and all the dear kindred in Christ in your midst, be favored to walk in love one toward another, that thus you may show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light. With christian love to you and to your dear wife, and to all that love our Lord Jesus Christ, I am, I hope, yours in the fellowship of the gospel,

FRED. W. KEENE.

DEAR BROTHER F. A. CHICK:—When you were at our house you requested me to give you a copy of a letter I had written to a friend. I felt a delicacy in sending you the copy, as I expected you might have it published, if you thought it fit to fill a space in our family paper. Combined with your request is the request of some of our dear sisters that I should send it to you. You can do with it as you think best.

We feel to thank the Lord for your visit to us a few weeks ago, for we enjoyed your company and preaching very much, and hope soon to see you again, praying that the Lord may give you strength to stand every trial and temptation that may beset you in this life, and comfort you with a knowledge of the truth as it is in him.

Your brother in Christ, I hope,
BENJAMIN WHITE.

POOLESVILLE, Md., March, 1889.

DEAR SIR:—I received your note, referring me to Deuteronomy xxx. 19 as proof that eternal life or salvation is set before every man to accept or reject at his will. I acknowledge my ignorance of the Bible, and also of spiritual things; but I am sure of this one thing, no matter what we believe, if it is not according to the Spirit of truth it will not do us good in that world to which we are fast hastening. If I am wrong, will you, by the teaching of the Bible, try to convince me of my error? for if I know myself, my desire is to know the truth, for that alone will do us good. I hope this will not seem so lengthy but what you will give it your earnest consideration, for I do feel to know that the truth is worthy of all men. I do not intend to make any argument in this, but merely to quote some passages of Scripture which I wish you to consider, and see if you can reconcile them to your theory or understanding; for it is evident to my mind that the Scriptures do not contradict themselves. If you cannot answer these satisfactorily to yourself, will you please get some one to do so in whom you have confidence?

You refer to Deuteronomy xxx. 19 to prove your assertion. I do not think that eternal life is there under consideration, but it has reference alone to the temporal life of national Israel in the land which God had promised them. For proof of this I will refer you to the fourth chapter of the same book, twenty-sixth verse, where you will find a part of the same language. Then examine the fifteenth verse of the thirtieth chapter of the same book, and you will find another portion of the same language; and for the balance of the language of that verse I will refer you to the twenty-eighth chapter of the same book; and you will see that the blessings and cursings were of a temporal nature. Now, if your idea be correct, that God has set before all men eternal life, to accept or reject, how can you reconcile the following Scriptures to such a notion? You told me that some people construe the Scriptures to suit themselves. It does not matter with me how they are construed, so it is in accordance with the teachings of the Bible and our experience. First, we will take the word "saved," and see what man has to do with that. Psalm vi. 4: "Return, O Lord, deliver my soul: O save me for thy mercies' sake." Is there any condition in this? Isaiah xlii. 12: "I have declared, and have saved." Isaiah xlv. 17: "But Israel shall [not if they will] be saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation: ye shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end." Zephaniah iii. 17: "The Lord thy God in the midst of thee is mighty; he will save, he will rejoice over thee." I will refer you to Zechariah viii. 7, 8; xvii. 14; Matthew i. 21: "And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus: for he shall save his people from their sins." Are there any conditions in this? Do you think, when Christ cried upon the cross, "It is finished!" that salvation was complete? or do you think that salvation was not complete, but that there was a part left for man to do? Luke xix. 10: "For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." Did he accomplish that work, or is there left a part for man to do?—Luke xiii. 23, 24. See 2 Timothy i. 9: "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." How does this suit your theory? Does Paul say that it was according to anything we could do that we are called? When was it that this grace was given us in Christ Jesus? He says, "Before the world began." I think that will take you too far back for you to have a hand in that salvation. I will refer you to Hebrews vii. 25 and Ephesians ii. 5. "For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God."—1 Cor. i. 18. Is there any offer of salvation in this? But it says, "Unto us which are saved it is the power of God." Already saved; but unto those who are not saved it is foolishness. I refer you to Acts ii. 47.

Now let us examine repentance, and see if that is attainable by the will of man. Acts v. 31: "Him [Christ] hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Savior [for what?], for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins." The prophet Jeremiah (xxxi. 18, 19) said, "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned." "Surely after that I was turned, I repented." So I take the position that the sinner must be turned before he will repent; and after he is turned he will repent. "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance."—Rom. xi. 29. "For godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of: but the sorrow of the world worketh death."—2 Cor. vii. 10. Is this worldly sorrow caused by our fear of punishment? If so, does it not work death? But tell me how you are going to get this godly sorrow, without which you cannot repent unto salvation. I will refer you to Hebrews xii. 7.

Now we will consider eternal life, and see if there is any offer of that to poor worms of the dust. Psalm xxxvi. 9: "For with thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light." If we are not in that light, do you think we can get in that light? If so, how? John iii. 36: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." Do you not think from the reading of this verse that the one spoken of had eternal life before he believed? or do you think that this eternal life was set before man to choose or reject?—John xi. 25; xiv. 6. I refer you to Galatians ii. 20: "I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." What kind of a life did Paul say he now lived? The life of Christ. Why? Because Christ loved him, and gave himself for him. Is that the reason why he lived the life he did? or was it because he accepted of that life? If so, tell me how he went about it. "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."—Col. iii. 4. I will quote you one more verse (1 John v. 12): "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." I take it that some have not the Son of God;

therefore they have not eternal life, but are dead in sin. If you can tell me how a dead man can accept anything, please do so, for it is a very important question.

I fear I am making this letter too long, and that you will not read it; but I hope you will, for we do not know but that you may be an instrument to enlighten my dark understanding of these Scriptures. But I wish to quote a few more Scriptures for your consideration. Isaiah xlii. 5-13: "Fear not: for I am with thee: I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west." "Even every one that is called by my name [Why will he do this?]: for I have created him for my glory, I have formed him; yea, I have made him." "Yea, before the day was I am he; and there is none that can deliver out of my hand: I will work, and who shall let it?" Can vain man say in the face of this that he can resist God? Isaiah xlv. 7-12: "I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things." "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherd of the earth. Shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands?" Jeremiah xvii. 9; xxiv. 7: "And I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the Lord: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God: for they shall return unto me with their whole heart." Jeremiah x. 23: "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." The apostle says, "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy." "Not by works of righteousness which we have done [What is it by then?], but according to his mercy he saved us."

I must bring this to a close, and will say in conclusion that if salvation is by grace, it is by grace alone; if it is not by grace, then I am lost.

I remain yours to serve,

BENJAMIN WHITE.

GURDON, Ark., Jan. 15, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Having finished the business part of my letter, I thought I would write a few thoughts "To them who are called."—Rom. viii. 31. "What shall we then say to these things?" What things? Evidently the things mentioned in the text. Let us examine them. "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God." Does "them that love God" mean the apostles alone? or the Jewish disciples alone? or those alone who at that particular time loved God? or all who ever would love God? I trust none will dispute that all lovers of God in all time are meant. But there is another expression, which is simply another description of "them that love God," "To them who are the called according to his purpose."—Rom. viii. 28. This means all that are meant by "them that love God." And as all things work together for their good, it necessarily follows that none are called, in the sense in which the word called is here used, but those for whom all things work together for good. But are there none called, in any sense, but those to whom all things work together for good? Certainly. "Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; but ye have set at naught all my counsel, and would none of my reproof. I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; when your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction as the whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you."—Prov. i. 24-27. "For many are called, but few are chosen."—Matt. xxii. 14. I regard this as the external call of the gospel; but none will heed but those who experience the internal, effectual call of the Spirit. Let us see what the Scripture says about internal calling. The promise is to "as many as the Lord our God shall call."—Acts ii. 39. What is the promise? It includes the remission of sins, mentioned in the previous verse. It is "sure to all the seed."—Rom. iv. 16. It is the "promise of eternal inheritance."—Heb. ix. 15. "Among whom are ye also the called of Jesus Christ."—Rom. i. 6. "But we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness: but unto them which are called [all of them], both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God."—1 Cor. i. 23, 24. "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called."—1 Cor. i. 26. "The vocation wherewith ye are called."—Eph. iv. 1. "But when it pleased God, who called me by his grace, to reveal his Son in me."—Gal. i. 15, 16. "And for this cause he is the Mediator of the new covenant, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance."—Heb. ix. 15. "Even us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles."—Rom. ix. 24. This is enough as to the calling; but now the "purpose." "The called according to his purpose." This means that the calling results from the purpose. The purpose is eternal. "According to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord."—Eph. iii. 11. It is immutable. "I am the Lord, I change not."—Mal. iii. 6. "To show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel."—Heb. vi. 17. It is certain to be accomplished. "But he is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth. For he performeth the thing that is appointed for me."—Job. xxiii. 13, 14. "The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed, so shall it stand."—Isa. xiv. 24. "For the Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it?"—Isa. xiv. 27. "According to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."—Eph. i. 11. The subject having been thus introduced, the apostle proceeds to give us the golden chain of five links, reaching from eternity past to eternity future. The links are foreknowledge, predestination, calling, justification and glorification. The conjunction "for," which connects this with what has just been said, shows that just the same persons are meant by this that were meant by that; although much that is meant by verses twenty-nine and thirty was still in the future, yet the apostle uses the tense which shows completed action, without reference to the time when. Read Isaiah liii. 4-12 for example of this use of the past tense. In John xvii. 4, our Savior uses the aorist tense in speaking of a work not yet finished. "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." To show that part of the work was not yet done, read John x. 17, 18. "Therefore my Father loveth me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself: I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father." To lay down his life and take it again was part of the work his Father gave him to do. This had not been done when he uttered the prayer in the seventeenth chapter of John; yet because the completion of the work was absolutely certain, he speaks of the whole in the aorist tense. So in Romans viii. 29, 30, although part of the work was future, Paul speaks of it all in the aorist, because the final completion was absolutely certain. "Whom he did foreknow." In the sense of presence, God foreknows all things, which includes all men. Yet none but a Universalist will say that all men will be glorified. But you may say it means whom he foreknew as believers. There is no indication that there was any ellipsis at this point, and we have no right to supply an ellipsis unless it is indicated. The solution of the matter is to be found in the use of the word "foreknow." The word know sometimes means to affectionately regard. "For the Lord knows the way of the righteous."—Psa. i. 6. "You only have I known of all the families of the earth."—Amos iii. 2. Affectionately regarded. "He knoweth them that trust in him."—Nahum i. 7. "I never knew you: depart from me."—Matt. vii. 23. "The Lord knoweth them that are his."—2 Tim. ii. 19. So to foreknow, as in Romans viii. 29, is to regard with affection beforehand. "Them he also did predestinate." What? To glorify them, because he foresaw that they would be conformed to the image of his Son? No; but "to be conformed to the image of his Son." What is the result of this conformity to his image? It is this to which we are predestinated. Then it is not predestination to something after we are regenerated, because of foreseen regeneration, but predestination to regeneration itself. "According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world." Not because he foresaw what would be, but "that we should be holy and without blame before him in love."—Eph. i. 4. This predestination is identical with the "purpose" of the previous verse. "Whom he did predestinate, them he also called." The calling is the same as that in the twenty-eighth verse, which we have already noticed. "Whom he called, them he also justified." No one called by the Spirit, "with a holy calling," stops short of justification. "Whom he justified, them he also glorified." No justified one ever fails of eternal salvation. "What shall we then say to these things?" The apostle tells us what some will say: "Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will?" How does the apostle treat this objector? He rebukes him, and reiterates the same doctrine.—Rom. ix. 14-24.

Much more might be said, but this will suffice for the present. Brethren Beebe, this is written for publication, but is submitted to your judgment.

Yours in Christ,

D. S. BUNCH.

CLEVELAND, Tenn., Jan. 6, 1889.

DEAR EDITORS OF THE SIGNS:—

After receiving the weekly SIGNS yesterday, and reading the great truth which it advocates, I am constrained to write my experience, if I thought it would be any benefit or consolation to the readers of your precious paper. In the first place I will say that I am the youngest son of Elder Jesse Stith, who died February 24th, 1875, near Pleasant Run Old School Baptist Church, in Fairfield Co., Ohio. I have heard something about this one way of sinners saved by grace from my infancy up to manhood, and could not understand one word of it. I was blind, and could not see; and deaf, and could not hear, nor understand how it was brought about, till January 27th, 1871. I was then living in the state of Illinois. I was then and there brought to see myself a very great sinner. There were times previous to that particular time that I felt something was wrong within me; but at that time the good Lord showed me my condition. I do not think that any one else ever saw their case as bad as I saw mine. It is almost impossible for me to describe my feelings. I was a lost, undone, ruined sinner, in the sight of a just God. I could not see how God could be just and ever have mercy on such a wretch as I. I thought if the earth would open and let me down, it would be better for me than the place I was occupying here. I had thought before this that I was a very good, moral man, and perhaps it would assist me some day to get into God's favor. But all my goodness was as filthy rags before him now. There seemed no hope for me. Others there might be hope for, but my case was an outside one. No one had ever been such a sinner as I. God would be just in sending me to perdition, and I felt I was near there then. I had no faith that my condition would be any better. Some would say, "Why do you not go to praying, and get yourself better?" Ah, I had read that the prayers of the wicked avail nothing. What! a wicked sinner go to praying? I had come to the end of all my strength, and to the end of the law, and mine was a hopeless case; and when I could see nothing that I could do within myself, I fell upon my knees, and said, "Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner." I immediately arose from that place, and walked some four or five rods, when the great burden of guilt was removed in a moment. I then saw the brightest morning I ever saw. My soul was set free, and I was full of praises to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. I had communion with God the Father and my Savior, and felt that I loved everybody on earth, and God supremely. Now I could see what I could not see before, how God could be just and the justifier of so vile a sinner as I. My Savior had borne my sins in his own body on the cross, had paid the debt, his blood had atoned for me, and his free grace was sufficient to save me. It is not of works, but "by grace are ye saved." Why I fell upon my knees and said what I did I cannot account for, except that I was constrained by the higher power that was then working in me. I was flying in this love from Monday till Thursday morning. I would think, Is it possible that I am saved? Am I one of God's children? This surely is a great change. I will have no more trouble now. It is all gone, and I will always be happy. The world looked better than it did before to me. My God was permitting me to enjoy enough of this world's goods to make me comfortable, and I would be kept by his almighty power from sin. I expected always to be getting better, instead of worse. But alas! Thursday morning came and found me with God's presence withdrawn, and I left alone. O! I think it was the darkest day I ever saw. If I were back under that load of sin that I was under last Monday, I thought, I would be far better off. But it was gone, and now what is the matter? Why, you have been telling all over the neighborhood, and almost boasting about it, that you have been saved. Now you are deceived, and have tried to deceive others. I had written a very lengthy letter to my father, describing the way I had been brought through. I thought if I could have that letter back now, I would never write another such to him. Toward evening my trouble began to disperse, to some extent, and my mind became a little clearer. It left me by degrees at that time. Still those doubts will rise in my mind to this day.

I get encouragement in reading the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, when I read that much better Christians than I am pass through such scenes of doubt. I think when we depend on our own strength, and get to feel that we are great Christians, then our heavenly Father withdraws his countenance from us, and lets us see what we are of ourselves when left alone. We are as nothing, weak worms of the dust, not capable of thinking one good thought, or doing one kind act, without his aid. It was my misfortune at the time of this change to be some distance from the church of my choice, which was and is the Old School Baptist. I was told that I had better join in with the Methodists. I gave my hand to the preacher, and they took me in on what they call probation, for six months. I did so well in two months that they let me off. I then joined the Missionary Baptists, and was baptized by them, they being nearest the church of my choice. I remained with them till I came south, in the year 1882. I will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. When I came here I could not find any Old School Baptist Church, and I once more joined the Methodists. It has been money to pay the preacher, money to pay missionaries, money to pay for colleges to give a Christian education to daughters of members of the church, money for Sunday Schools, and money for broken down preachers. Please excuse the expressions. There is another very important institution that needs money, and that is the Biblical seminary to educate preachers and qualify them to go out and preach what they claim as the gospel. Some of them are good orators, and can tickle the ear, but not touch the heart. How different is this from the old apostolic way. I am out once more, and will stay out till I can find the church of my choice. If they would accept as unworthy a being as I am, I do not care if they would not accept my baptism. I would be baptized by the proper administrator. I find several of the same faith here in this county that belong to the New School Baptists, wishing to unite with the Primitive Baptists.

I fear I have been too lengthy and uninteresting. Do what you think best with this scribble; consign it to the waste-basket if you think best. I still retain that hope within my breast (if it is small), that some day through God's mercy I will be permitted to enjoy his saving grace in that better world to come. Pray for unworthy me when it goes well with you.

Yours in hope of eternal life,

W. R. STITH.

GOD.

THIS name is the most glorious and precious of any that was ever uttered by man, and yet was never uttered by mortality in the glory and power of the name. It can only be expressed by faith. It is only seen and felt by faith. To know God is eternal life; to see him is perfection. To say we have been with and seen Jesus, is to feel his power. God is power, and the only power in existence. He has all power in heaven and earth—power to give and to withhold. Christ said to his accusers and crucifiers that they could have no power at all except it were given them from above, and that his Father had power to send or give him legions of angels, if necessary. "This is your hour, and power of darkness." God is supreme, and holds the keys of death and hell. Death has no power except of God. Hell cannot claim any except by God's decree. "I am God, and beside me there is no Savior." "Before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me." "I wound, and I heal; I kill, and I make alive." "I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil. I the Lord do all these things." Here we have, to my mind, every stage of life or creation by which men are governed, both naturally and spiritually. God formed the light; not merely the light of the sun by day, but every kind of light, both natural and spiritual. He has also created all kinds of darkness, and has power to hide from our natural view the sun in midday, as also to form light in the darkest night. And in the midst of great darkness of mind, when the darkness hides his smiling face, in the night time, when all the beasts of the forest do creep forth, and while waiting for the morning, God only has power to form or make light, and in the darkest hour can show forth the Sun of righteousness, and form or manifest in the child of God a glorious light, in the presence of which the darkness flees away. This is none other than God, the "power of God." In all the conflicts of life, the children of God have much to contend with in this world. Besides foes without, they have fears within, fightings and wars. And while the warfare goes on, and the battle waxes hot, none can make peace but God. "I make peace." To say there is peace when there is none, does not bring or make it. But he who alone makes peace can give it; and when he makes peace there is peace indeed; and there is no need to publish it, for it will manifest itself, and also manifest from whence it came. "And create evil." "Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?" We cannot infer that because God is pure and perfect, and every good and perfect gift cometh from him, and has power to form light and create darkness, and to make peace, that he has not power to "create evil." To create evil is very different from doing evil. Let us closely examine this expression of "our God," the all-power, and for one moment consider what or who God is. He is the Creator of all things. "For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist."—Col. i. 16, 17. When Adam was created and formed of the dust of the ground, it was with the same nature that he had after the transgression; and the first manifestation of this evil created in him was when he ate the forbidden fruit. How could he have become disobedient if there was no evil in him? But some one may say, The devil tempted him. Admitting that he was tempted, or beguiled, it was of his own lusts. "But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin." But who or what was this devil or serpent that is said to be "more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made?" Adam was of the earth, earthy. Could there be any good in that? His carnal lust or evil that was created in him suggested this transgression. If any one can imagine a more sly or subtle creation than their own carnal lust, it is more than I can. I find all the devil or evil in myself that I want to know anything about; and this is God's creation. The serpent being "more subtle than any beast of the field," we are wont to inquire, What is this field? I think we need go no further than our own carnal mind to find this great and large field. The mind is filled with all manner of beasts, and among them this sly serpent. This is a new thought with me, but it comes up so forcibly in my own experience that I cannot ignore it; and I would like to enlarge on this part of the subject if I had space. Therefore let us not charge this great God and all-power with being the author of sin; for if he was, he would be in the same condemnation as we; for the author of sin is the one that must die. Without the creation of evil there could be no transgression, neither any need of law. The law was given before transgression; and evil did not come in consequence of transgression, but the transgression on account of evil. The creation of evil is one thing, and the transgression of a law is quite another. There can be no transgression without a law; and as God gave the law, and is entirely above it, and not subject to it, being himself the law and condemner, he therefore cannot be brought under it. And unless we feel that all this evil and sin is in us, and that we have inherited it from our head, as created and formed by our God, we will continue to find fault with God and his decrees, and say, "What doest thou?" Is not this so, my dear brethren?

To the household of faith this is submitted by a sinner saved by grace, I hope.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—The inclosed letter was not intended for publication, but the writer has many friends and relatives in Maine and elsewhere, besides the Old School Baptist Church in this place, where she and her husband are worthy members. As I thought it would interest many readers of our truthful and ever-welcome visitor, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, I send it to you, trusting that you will dispose of it as you think most proper.

A. A. CHADBOURN.

CRESO, Iowa, April 20, 1889.

MRS. A. A. CHADBOURN—DEAR SISTER:—I will try to write a few lines, and thank you for your kind remembrance of poor, unworthy me. My mind is much of the time far away, in my own dear native land, and the place where it most delights to linger is at the old church gatherings with all the loved ones there; but it makes me sad when I think that we may never meet again on earth. It is sweet to live over again in thought our last happy days in Maine. Then we had the privilege of hearing the gospel preached in its purity, and our souls were bountifully fed with the bread which cometh down from above. It seemed that it must be a foretaste of heaven. I could but say, "Entreat me not to leave thee, nor to return from following after thee," &c. But, dear sister, shall I meet them beyond the river, if never again on earth? I still have a hope that I shall, though I often fear I am too vile to enter there. Indeed, I have no merits of my own to bring to view; nothing but free, unmerited grace can fit me for a home over there. O what a wonder, that God should be mindful of such a worthless worm as I! I am so forgetful of his mercies, and so soon murmur at his will; and I often feel much like saying, Why must this and that be thus and so? Yet I have felt at times to say, "Lord, I would clasp thy hand in mine, Nor ever murmur nor repine; Content whatever lot I see, Since 'tis my God that leadeth me." I fail to do the things that I would, and the things that I would not them I do. It is a sweet assurance to me that his mercy endureth forever. We have read "Life's Journey and Lessons by the Way," and it was very interesting. Many of the places I feel that I too have traveled, and others I fear I have not; but there is still this precious token of grace, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." This has been as an anchor to my soul when there seemed not much else in view to lean upon for a hope in Christ.

My husband came in one day and said there was a tune kept running through his mind, but he could not recall the words. He took the book and found it, and that hymn seemed to speak right to our hearts, and strengthened our drooping spirits. He reads to me from the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and it gives rest and comfort to our weary souls. I wish I could write something worthy a place there, but I cannot. It is cheering to learn of your strong faith and trust in the all-wise Father in your late afflictions. I am glad to hear that brother Chadbourn is improving, and seems likely now to recover from his injuries. It does seem a wonder that his life was spared. I felt to rejoice that brother Butler's wife and Miss Alice Ford had gone forward and united with the church. Please remember me to them.

Now, dear sister, since you are so thoughtful and anxious to hear about the trouble on my face, I will tell you that I have been passing through a trying and painful season. As I found that I was receiving no lasting benefit from the doctor in Chicago, we decided to try a Dr. Nichols, of Waterloo, Iowa, and three weeks ago he came here and commenced treatment. In nine days from the time he applied his plaster he took out the lump. We were afraid there was a small root under my eye that he did not get, so he came and put on another small plaster, and it has just come out. O that that may be the last of it! How many times I have thought of you and other dear ones through those long days and nights. How I wished I could see you, and talk with you of better things than earth can give; and when your letter came it brought so much to cheer and strengthen my poor, desponding heart, that I felt the Lord had directed your thoughts and pen for the comfort of one of the least of all who have hope in his mercy. At times the sweet assurance comes to me that his loving arms are beneath me, and that whatever may befall this earthly house of clay he will shield and keep me to the end.

You spoke in your last letter of Elder F. A. Chick. I often think of him with the warmest christian love. Perhaps you do not remember it, but I can never forget when I went before the church, feeling so small and unworthy that I dared not ask for a home with them, and said something to that effect. Elder Chick then spoke and said, "There is always room for little ones." O how it did strengthen my poor heart! for I felt there was one who had fellowship for me, unworthy as I was. How I wish I could hear him preach once more. I have been hoping and planning to go east this fall and meet you all again; but I must give it up now.

"But when afflicted and distressed,
And earthly hopes grow dim,
How sweet to have a hope in Christ,
And leave it all with him."

I will now say good-by, hoping to hear from you again soon.

S. J. LIBBY.

RICKER, Texas, Jan. 27, 1889.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Of late my mind has lingered on many very precious things of God, and I have tried to note some thoughts on the seals, or part of them, and have had very pleasant reflections; but they are so imperfectly written that my son said he could not transcribe them. I will now try to give you the substance, and would be glad for you and others to enlarge upon it.

"And I saw, and behold a white [emblematic of purity] horse: and he that sat on him had a bow [implement of warfare]; and a crown [signifying kingly power] was given unto him: and he went forth conquering and to conquer." This did Alexander and Napoleon, and many others, as monarchs. But to "conquer" is beyond the ken of mortal man, and signifies the supreme ruling power of Christ the Lord.

"And there went forth another horse that was red; and power was given to him that sat thereon to take peace from the earth." This opened the way for the Conqueror to manifest his supreme reigning power, restoring peace and manifesting his kingly dominion. All the gates of hell seemed to be opened; but our Lord has said that they shall not prevail. Please notice that the taking of peace from the earth was simply by an act of disobedience. "By one man's disobedience many were made sinners." His good state being destroyed, peace is taken from his posterity. Hence the necessity of a conquering power, such as the King of Salem, which is King of peace. That man is impotent to keep the law, is clear from the fact that all are gone out of the way, driven from the garden, barred by cherubim and flaming sword, turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life.

"Who but the Lord shall take the book
And open every seal,
His mighty counsel to fulfill,
And work his wondrous will?"

Methinks I hear the saints respond,
"Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven."

The bottomless pit was opened, the smoke arose, pregnant with locusts, or false Christs, false prophets; in a word, all false teachers.

"And they had a king over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit," namely, the devil. But our bow-crowned Conqueror has led the monster in chains a thousand years, and hence his ability to bring his children off more than conquerors through him that loved them. The virtue or strength of the bow would depend on the strength and skill of him that wielded it. For the strong man armed keepeth his palace until a stronger than he cometh upon him and overcometh him. But we see that our Champion is equal to the task, as the Scriptures and the experience of the saints abundantly testify. "Thou hast a mighty arm: strong is thy hand, and high is thy righthand."—Psa. lxxxix. 13. Again,

"Mine own arm brought salvation."
 "To whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" Here is strong consolation to the weak, the halting, the backslider, and those in captivity, for certain is their deliverance. And why? Because Jesus has destroyed him that had the power of death, and delivered them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage.

Dear brethren, this is submitted, hoping that, if published, it may be blessed to the comfort of some of the disconsolate; and to the Lord's name be the praise.

Yours in hope,

RICHARD EATON, SR.

ELDER G. N. TUSING—MY DEAR COUSIN:—You will doubtless think it strange that I should write you at this time, and more strange when I make known to you the reason why I write. I have long felt it a pressing duty to be baptized, and have often thought that I would ask you to bury me in a watery grave when I should next see you; but when the opportunity offered something was always in the way. Methinks I hear you ask, "Why does he not go to the church? Why does he come to me?" My reason is plain and honest. I am entirely unfit to offer myself to a church. I cannot consent to bring disgrace and reproach on a church or on the cause of Christ. You ask then, "Why does he want to be baptized?" Because I feel it a bounden duty, which distresses me every day. You say, "That is only a notion. If he had met with a change of heart he would go to the church, where all sensible christians go, and not come to me." I can assure you that I have met with a change, and that is just where the trouble lies. I once thought I had a good heart—one that had more good in it than most hearts around me; but that time is gone forever. If Paul was the chief of sinners in his day, I do feel that it is impossible for any one else to feel so weak, so poor, so helpless, so wretched and so unworthy as poor me.

Now, George, can you come down soon and put me in Black Lick? I want to be buried at home, where I can look down to the place almost every day that I live, and rejoice to know that I have been buried with Christ, to whom I have long and often prayed to only let me live until I could follow him down there and I should be satisfied. I do not expect to live long, and do not wish to, if it is the Lord's will to take me away from this dark and troublesome world. I am sorry to have to ask you to do such a strange thing; but if your conscience is not perfectly at ease, and you cannot come with pleasure, do not come, and I will try and bear my troubles a little while longer. If I am not mistaken, I have as strong a claim on you as had the eunuch on Philip, for I hope and trust that I believe also that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.

Please forgive my weakness, and answer, or come down.

WILLIAM SMITH.

REASON AND REVELATION.

"At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight."—Matt. xi. 25, 26.

Between the natural powers of reason and the testimony which God has given by revelation through faith concerning himself, there is an unceasing conflict, which can never be reconciled by any finite intelligence. The origin of this contest is found in the fact that "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."—1 Cor. ii. 14. To the carnal mind this truth seems to forbid that the things of the Spirit should ever be known to men, since reason is the only power by which the natural mind of man can receive the knowledge of anything. What is foolishness in the estimation of reason can never be accepted by that mind as the wisdom of eternal truth. This irreconcilable opposition against the doctrine of God our Savior is not an unexpected development to forbid the execution of the eternal purpose of his love. Indeed, it is an essential link in the chain of events through which that purpose is developed in the providence of God. It is not consistent with the infinite perfection of God to suppose that he was surprised or disappointed by the appearance of sin in the world which he had created. Nor can it be reconciled with the testimony of the inspired Scriptures to hold that the glorious grace of God in salvation could have been manifested without the existence of sinners to be the objects of redeeming love. To the fleshly mind it must ever be an impenetrable mystery how God can be just in the salvation of justly condemned sinners. Reason must vainly strive to comprehend this wonderful display of divine love and mercy. This is shown to every saint in his first experience of that grace of God which bringeth salvation; yet so deceitful are the insidious wiles of the adversary that they are often found endeavoring to reconcile the truth to their natural comprehension.

Reason constantly seeks to present considerations which tend to subvert the testimony of faith in the saints; and to this end every power of the natural mind is exerted. Not only the baser passions are in array against the truth, but even the affections and natural sympathy are brought to bear. Satan will not hesitate to resort to any suggestion which may lead the tried saint to deny the truth of divine revelation, and thus rob him of that rest which is experienced only in perfect reconciliation to the will of God. In this deceitful work he is always successful when he can direct the attention of his victim to the things which are earthly and temporal. These things which are seen by reason are not the testimony on which the comfort of the saints depends. That faith which is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen, is the fruit of the Spirit; consequently its testimony is hidden from the sight and comprehension of the natural man, to which reason belongs. The tempter often suggests that the witness of faith be tried by reason; and his plausible allurements will entice the saints if left to their own wisdom to comply with the proposition. The result is always that they are led into darkness and the denial of their hope. Then they realize their helplessness, and out of the depth of distress they cry unto God for deliverance. Their cry is always heard, and they are saved out of all their troubles by his present help. This salvation comes to them through that faith which lifts them above all their carnal reasonings, and not by answering the cavils of unbelief with arguments tangible to their natural senses. Such arguments would be only of the earth and temporal; but the power by which the saints are given the victory in every conflict is eternal and divine. Because heaven is infinitely above the earth, it is impossible that the natural mind should comprehend heavenly things. As applied to material and temporal things, the mind of man can understand its want of ability to penetrate the mysteries of the boundless heavens. Yet men claim the power to fathom the deeper mysteries of those spiritual heavens which are hidden by the express will of God. Realizing its utter blindness to those unsearchable things, reason denies their existence altogether. Thus the wisdom of man unconsciously verifies the testimony of inspiration by confessing that these things which testify of Jesus are foolishness unto the wise and prudent of this world.

Those who are taught of God by the revelation of his Spirit can bear witness that they have not received their knowledge of heavenly things by the instruction which comes through the channel of natural reason. In vain they sought by diligent study to attain to that incomprehensible mystery, how God could be just and yet be the justifier of those sinners who believe in Jesus. It is impossible that finite intelligence should discover what God has hidden. This is known only by the direct revelation of the Spirit of truth which searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. Although Paul could claim to have been thoroughly educated in that religion which was taught according to the letter of the divine law, yet he was destitute of the first ray of the light of the knowledge of God, or of his own condition of hopeless condemnation. If any sinner ever might have attained to that knowledge by his natural advantages certainly Paul should have been successful in that effort. But all were unavailing. When he heard the voice of the Lord calling him by name, his first breath confessed his ignorance, "Who art thou?" With every advantage of natural relationship and parentage, and after all the training which the best theological school could afford, this eminent and devout Pharisee had not even learned to recognize the voice of God. So clearly is the failure of natural intelligence manifested when it is directed to the attainment of the hidden wisdom of God. Paul has left on record his confession that all his study had availed him nothing in the knowledge of God. After summing up all his advantages and religious advancement, he says, "But what things were gain to me, I counted but loss for Christ."—Phil. iii. 7. Reason cannot be so cultivated as to be able to receive that knowledge of God which is eternal life in its manifestation through faith to those who are led by the Spirit into all truth.

The pride of the carnal heart revolts at the truth that its boasted reason is at fault, and stubbornly denies that it is blind to the things of the Spirit of God. Innumerable questions are suggested even in the mind of the saints, all of which may be resolved into the one sentence of rebellion against the doctrine of sovereign grace in the salvation of sinners. Sometimes the natural affections are set in array against the truth by representing the doctrine of grace as denying the hope of salvation to some one who would desire it, while it saves others who are no better in themselves than the worst of those rejected. This specious device of the adversary is well calculated to disturb the comfort of the little children who can have no hope in any other doctrine. It appears like a very serious objection when presented in this deceitful form. But when examined in the light of divine truth all the mist of carnal sophistry is dispelled, as the shadows of night are scattered by the morning light. The revelation of the gospel of divine grace brings salvation to every one who feels the need of that salvation. No sinner is forbidden to hope in that grace who longs to be delivered from the power and bondage of sin. Indeed, there is no better evidence of the sealing of the Spirit of truth in any sinner than the fact that he desires to be free from the principle of sin. Every one who bears that seal is included in the command of Jesus, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." This omnipotent word never fails to bring those who are addressed. None such can fail of that rest which Jesus gives. But caviling reason objects that those sinners who are not included in the command of our Lord have no chance of obtaining that rest. Why should not the same sympathetic appeal be made on the behalf of devils as well as of men who are destitute of the love of God? The truth is that there could be no more terrible punishment inflicted upon a sinner than to be compelled to dwell forever in the presence of that holy God, which is the heaven of infinite glory to all them who love righteousness and hate iniquity. Of such it is written, in the day of wrath, they "said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb."—Rev. vi. 16. This is in exact agreement with the desire expressed by those evil spirits in the afflicted Gadarene. They did not wish to dwell in the holy presence of Jesus. No calamity can be so intolerable to any sinner as the presence of the perfectly holy God. It is therefore a false sympathy which would grieve that such are not included in the company of those whose everlasting bliss consists in dwelling forever with the Lord, and rejoicing in his infinite holiness and sovereignty.

No further inspired testimony in support of the absolute dominion of our God can be needed after the expression of Jesus in our text. But so fully is the truth attested in the whole record of the Scriptures that without its recognition there is no logically consistent escape from rank atheism. The saints who hope in the grace of God for salvation cannot afford to be deprived of the rich comfort derived from resting in the assurance of this divine principle of truth. Indeed, it is only as this eternal purpose of God is recognized by them that the saints can have any confidence in their final deliverance from sin, and find rest in the promise of awaking satisfied with the likeness of our glorified Redeemer. In our text Jesus does not merely accept the fact of which he speaks, as if it were a barren doctrinal truth; he fervently declares his gratitude to the Father that he has hid from the wise and prudent the things which he has revealed to babes. That must be a false emotion of tenderness which moves any one to regard as unkind this display of divine sovereignty in which our loving Redeemer found cause for earnest gratitude. He does not give thanks more for the revelation of these things to babes than for their being hid from the wise and prudent. While reason can only murmur and rebel against this sovereign discrimination of God, the revelation of the Spirit of truth shows through faith to the saints that there is no other hope for salvation from sin but in the display of that same sovereignty of God in the exercise of his electing love. The love and grace bestowed upon his chosen people by our God is not because of any merit in themselves; since they "were by nature the children of wrath, even as others." There is not one sinner under condemnation and wrath who can claim that he does not love the state of sin in which he is. Sin is the element of all its votaries, as earth is the chosen abode of all natural living creatures. Even reason should be able to see the absurdity of extending sympathy to fishes because they are by the providence of God compelled to live in the water; it would certainly be no kindness to them to remove them to the dry land. Yet water is no more the natural element of the fish than sin is the element wherein sinners ever wish to abide. The desire to be conformed to the perfect holiness of Jesus can never arise from the natural mind of any sinner, for the reason that his whole mind is enmity against God. That enmity can never be reconciled, because God has declared that it cannot be. In perfect agreement with this truth, our Lord expresses his gratitude to the Father because he has thus by his own election made the difference among men. It is only as governed by the Spirit of holiness which was in Jesus, that any saint can truly pray, as he taught his disciples to do, saying to the Father, "Thy will be done." Natural selfishness would prefer our own will to be done.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Warwick Old School Baptist Association, convened with the church at New Vernon, Orange Co., N. Y., June 5th, 6th and 7th, 1889, to the churches of which it is composed.

BELoved OF THE LORD:—Grace to you, and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. We have abundant cause for gratitude and thanksgiving for the great goodness and mercy extended to us, in preserving our several churches in the unity of the Spirit and bond of peace. It is to be presumed that all the members of our several churches are led by the Spirit to desire the peace and prosperity of their church organizations, and a continuation of the christian intercourse and sweet fellowship we have enjoyed in the past in our association. This bond of union is in our risen and exalted Savior, whose name is above every name, and who is head over all things to his church. Therefore it becomes us as members of his body to hearken to the admonition of Jesus by the apostle Paul, "Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshiping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind. And not holding the Head, from which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God."—Col. ii. 18, 19.

The experience of the saints and their testimony in all ages of the world witnesseth to the completeness, perfection and beauty of the church in Christ as without spot or wrinkle or any such thing. Therefore if we have not left our first love and ceased to do the first works, we still behold the beauty of Zion with love and admiration, desiring to fill our place in the house of God in the assembly of the saints in love, peace and sweet fellowship, saying from the heart, tuned by the Spirit,

"Give me, O Lord, a place
Within thy blest abode,
Among the children of thy grace,
The servants of my God."

In our intercourse with and deportment toward each other, both as churches and members thereof, we are constrained by experience to confess and say with the prophet, "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. O Lord, correct me, but with judgment; not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing."—Jer. x. 22, 23. An experimental knowledge of ourselves and our dependence upon him "Who of God is made unto us wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption," teaches us in all our intercourse with the church to earnestly desire to be supported, instructed, reproofed, guided, kept and directed in all things pertaining to life and godliness by the meek and humble spirit of incarnate divinity, the Spirit of Jesus. "Who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously."—1 Peter ii. 23. We rejoice to know that the church is as unchangeable as the head thereof, which is Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day and forever. When it pleases the Lord to reveal the church to our spiritual vision, we can realize the voice of the beloved, saying, "Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee." Now, as it ever has been, and ever will be, not a stake thereof is removed, nor one of the cords thereof broken. "But there the glorious Lord will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams; wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby. For the Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our King; he will save us."—Isa. xxxiii. 20-22.

Now, brethren, we commend you to the faithful admonition of Paul to the church at Corinth, "Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you."

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Delaware River Old School Baptist Association, in session with the First Hopewell Church, to the associations, corresponding meetings and churches with which she corresponds, sends christian love and salutation.

BELoved BRETHREN:—God, who is rich in mercy, has blessed us in bringing us together in an association, to hear of the glories of his grace, and of that salvation revealed to lost and ruined sinners through the atoning blood and righteousness of Christ. Your messengers have come to us laden with the rich fruits of the Spirit, declaring unto us your continuance in the faith of the gospel, and in the order and practice of the church of the living God. Our pure minds have been stirred up, and we have sat together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus our Lord, receiving your correspondence in love and fellowship, and desiring a continuance of the same for our mutual comfort and edification.

The churches composing our association are walking in the old paths, and contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints; and although coldness and darkness surround our pathway, we trust alone in him who said, "Let there be light; and there was light," for a revival of his work in our hearts, and for his manifest power among us in bringing the redeemed of the Lord into the glorious liberty of the gospel. Our session has been conducted in love and harmony, and we have realized how good and pleasant it is to meet together in the spirit of holiness, and in the worship of him who hath redeemed us, and made us kings and priests unto God.

Our next session is appointed to be held with our sister church called Kingwood, at Locktown, Hunterdon Co., N. J., commencing on Wednesday before the first Sunday in June, 1890, when we hope to again receive your messages and correspondents in the love and fellowship of the gospel.

MARRIAGES.

At the bride's residence in Brooklyn, N. Y., on Monday, June 10th, by Elder E. Rittenhouse, Arthur W. Rittenhouse and Miss Eleanor J. Hooton, both of Brooklyn.

At Andersonville, Sumpter Co., Ga., June 2d, 1889, by Elder W. Lively, Miss Lena Gardner and Mr. Thomas R. McKenzie.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—June 13th, at his late residence near Iron Hill, Cecil Co., Md., brother Wm. M. Campbell, of paralysis, in his fifty-ninth year.

Brother William had been gradually failing for the last year, and about a week before he died he was made entirely helpless. He did not seem to suffer until the last hour. Our oldest brother has passed away, making the first break in a family of eleven children. We have been wonderfully blessed by a merciful providence. May we be reconciled to his will at all times.

S. A. CAMPBELL.

My dear, bright, sweet babe, Fannie Winnie Hassell, who was born Dec. 9th, 1888, and whose mother died Jan. 6th, 1889, was, after two months of great suffering, released from her prison-house of clay May 30th, 1889, and borne, I believe, to the arms of the Savior's love. After the death of her mother, sister Cordelia Slade, the daughter of my father by his second wife, and her husband, brother Wm. Slade, took her to their pleasant home, and loved and cared for her as though she were their own.

Innocence, humility and peace were written upon the features of my dear babe in death. Her remains were deposited near those of her beloved mother, on Friday afternoon, May 31st, in the cemetery at Skewarkey.

SYLVESTER HASSELL.

WILLIAMSTON, N. C., June 1, 1889.

William Smith, son of William and Christina Smith, was born Dec. 20th, 1823, and died May 24th, 1889, aged sixty-five years, five months and four days.

He was baptized by Elder G. N. Tusing, Feb. 9th, 1877, and became a member of the Predestinarian Baptist Church in the village of Reynoldsburgh, where he lived during the last few years. Throughout the sore troubles of the church a few years ago, resulting in the rending of the church on points of doctrine, he steadfastly adhered to the old landmarks as laid down in the Scriptures of truth, contending earnestly, but not angrily, for the faith once delivered to the saints, and died a firm believer in the doctrine of salvation by grace, unmixed with any works of human origin. He was a constant Bible reader, and a worthy example for all, either as a christian or a citizen.

Besides a host of friends, both in and out of the church, he leaves behind an aged and feeble widow (to whom he was married Aug. 14th, 1845), two sons, one daughter, one sister, two half-brothers and two half-sisters. One daughter preceded him to the spirit land October 5th, 1875. His funeral was largely attended on Sunday, May 26th, when the writer addressed the people assembled from First Corinthians xv. 49.

THOMAS COLE.

ROYALTON, Ohio.

DIED—In Flemington, N. J., May 21st, 1889, Mrs. Maria Webster, aged seventy-three years, two months and twenty-six days.

The subject of this notice had been in a delicate state of health for a number of years, but I think she was confined to the house and not able to walk out only about six weeks. She passed away from the scenes of earth in a very peaceful frame of mind, and said to her husband a few hours before she expired, "Jesus will soon come," which caused her beloved husband (our dear brother, Abel Webster) mingled emotions of joy and sorrow; joy that his dear partner was prepared to leave this world, and sorrow to know that he must soon be parted from his dear companion, with whom he had been united in the dear relation of husband for about fifty-four years. Sister Webster had been a member of the church about fifty years, during which long period of time she showed her faith by her works, in all the relations of life literally, as well as in the church of which she was a worthy member.

Her funeral was on Tuesday, May 28th, at which time a goodly number of relatives and friends were present. The declarations of Scripture used as a text at her funeral are recorded in Second Corinthians v. 1-8. May our God sustain our afflicted brother, now in the evening of his days, by giving him that consolation which will be a balm to his wounded heart!

"Fearless she entered death's cold flood,
In peace of conscience, clos'd her eyes;
Her only trust was Jesus' blood,
In sure and certain hope to rise."

WM. J. PURINGTON.

HOPEWELL, N. J., June 8, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I wish to write a notice of the death of our sister, Elizabeth Mason. My first acquaintance with her was in 1878, when I rode about forty miles to see her, and spent one night and part of two days with her. I can say that I never felt better paid for any trip I had ever taken. Although isolated from her kindred in Christ, and having heard no preaching for a long time, she was a shining jewel in the kingdom of our God. She went back over fifty years and traced the hand of God in leading her in a way that she knew not, and in paths that she had not known. I felt that truly we were spiritually related, though our faces were strange. She was a miracle of God's grace. Although thirty miles from any Primitive Baptist, she found no convenience in making a compromise with any of the free-will worshipers around her, showing that the Israel of God must dwell alone. I visited her several times until her death, and found her always with a word of comfort for me. She had much to render against herself, and much to the praise of God for his preserving grace. Her family were very interesting to me, Miss Mary in particular. They all seem very much afflicted, and have my deepest sympathy and earnest prayers, I hope. I received a telegram, and responded, and tried to comfort the sorrowing, using as a text First Thessalonians iv. 13, 14.

Her daughter Mary writes me that her maiden name was Boggs, and that she was the last of a family of eight children, her parents being Arthur and Susan Boggs. She was born Oct. 26th, 1808, and was married to Wm. Mason on Nov. 5th, 1829. He died Dec. 3d, 1866. She was baptized by Elder Dellastacios in July, 1839. For more than seven years she has been an invalid, having fallen out of doors in September, 1881, and was never able to walk any more. She often said, "What I have suffered since I was crippled no human tongue can tell; but the dear Lord has afflicted me, and I know it is all right. Not one ache or pain too many will he let me have, but just what I need, and no more." "Why should I doubt the good Lord? He has cared for me and been kind and good to me all my life." Her faith and hope were bright to the last. She was no worse than usual until a week before she died, and was not thought to be seriously ill; but her work was done, and the good Lord took her home to rest.

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. ## CORRESPONDENCE.

THE WORD OF GOD IN SYMBOLS AND SIMILITUDES--THE NUMBERS SEVEN AND TWELVE.

"AND being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks; and in the midst of the seven candlesticks one like unto the Son of man."—Rev. i. 12.

For four thousand years the Creator of the universe spoke to the people by the prophets, with visions and similitudes.—Hosea xii. 10. It was foretold of the Messiah, hundreds of years before his advent into the world, that when he should come he would open his mouth in parables, and utter dark sayings that had been kept secret since the foundation of the world.—Matt. xiii. 35. True to the prediction, which could not fail, though the heavens and the earth be removed, "without a parable spake he not unto them."—Matt. xiii. 34. Just before the close of his ministry on earth he declared to his chosen ones, "These things have I spoken unto you in parables [margin]: but the time cometh when I shall no more speak unto you in parables, but I shall shew you plainly of the Father."—John xvi. 25. The word of God thus delivered in visions and similitudes was not only at "sundry times," but it was also in "divers manners."—Heb. i. 1. The Lord by the prophet says, "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt."—Hosea xi. 1. Apparently he was speaking of the deliverance by Moses and of Aaron of the children of Israel from the land of bondage; but by divine inspiration this is interpreted as a prophecy of Christ.—Matt. ii. 15. Hassell says, "All the Old Testament is one great type and prophecy, which finds its full accomplishment in Jesus Christ."—Page 177. The disobedient spirit of Jonah, resulting in his being swallowed by the whale, is made to portray the sojourn of our Lord in the tomb, and, probably, also the sojourn of his body, the church, in the world, a thousand years for a day. All these things are written for our learning, and not one of them is superfluous. If you should ask why they are delivered in visions, parables and similitudes, the answer is already given, "Because to you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; but unto them it is not given." We have received the Spirit of God, that we might know the things that are freely given us of God.—1 Cor. ii. 12. Not even the favored apostles of the Lamb, until the seven seals were loosed, until the mighty vail was taken away, could understand the import of the Scriptures, although they saw their daily fulfillment in the work of their Master, and even in their own work. But after the taking away of the vail, and the Holy Ghost is given, they remember that thus it was written of him, and that they had done these things unto him.—John xii. 16. The natural man subsists upon bread; but the child of God, as a pilgrim on earth, has two natures, and does "not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Food for the sustenance of the body must be masticated and prepared in the head. The body cannot act independently of the head. "Without me ye can do nothing." Without him we can understand no part of the mystery of the kingdom of heaven. By his Spirit the most mysterious portions are revealed, even unto babes and sucklings, while they are securely hidden from the wise and prudent of this world. This excludes, or should exclude, glorifying in the flesh. For if thou hast nothing thou didst not receive, wherefore dost thou glory, as though thou hast not received it?—1 Cor. iv. 7.

"And being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks." The number seven, from some cause, has come to be generally regarded as "a note of perfection;" a "complete" number. If any number is used in the Scriptures with such a meaning, in our judgment it is the number twelve. Although the church, the city of our God, is in the Scriptures represented by seven candlesticks, or one candlestick with seven branches, let it be remembered that the city complete has twelve gates, and the wall twelve foundations. "All Israel shall be saved."—Rom. xi. 26. And, conversely, none but Israel will be saved. "They are not all Israel that are of Israel;" but the true Israel are the redeemed of the Lord in all ages of the world, of which the literal Israel was a type; and Israel was divided into twelve tribes. In our solar system, according to astronomers, there are twelve planets. Whether this is true or not, we are not able to say; but Joseph in his second dream saw the sun and the moon and the eleven stars making obeisance unto him.—Gen. xxxvii. 9. There is a group of seven stars (the Pleiades) standing alone in the heavens, which all of us may see. When God set them in the heavens

he said, "Let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years."—Gen. i. 14. By Laban's violation of his contract, putting Leah upon Jacob, instead of Rachel, for whom he had served seven years, forcing him to serve seven more years for Rachel, and causing him to have two instead of one; and by an envious spirit between these two, causing each to give their handmaid to Jacob to wife, making four in all; and by Dinah not happening (?) to be a boy; it came to pass that Jacob had just twelve sons, the heads of the twelve tribes of Israel. When these had increased in number to exactly threescore and ten, according to God's purpose previously made known to Abraham, they went down into the land of bondage. When the years of their appointed bondage and evil treatment are ended, God sends Moses to deliver them, now increased to more than half a million. They take their journey by the pillar of cloud and of fire three days into the wilderness, and encamp at Elim, "where were twelve wells of water, and threescore and ten palm trees."—Ex. xv. 27; Num. xxxiii. 9. These seventy palm trees (emblems of victory) correspond exactly to the number, all told, of the children of Israel who went down into Egypt, and had probably been growing there ever since before Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees. The twelve fountains of water had of course been there since the foundation of the world: thus showing to the house of Jacob that it was in size, number and mutations just what God from eternity purposed. But what consolation to Israel in all this? Viewed from Israel's standpoint, in what could there be more? To a child kicked and abused by every one until it feels as if it were an outcast, the slightest mark of friendship, though manifested even by a Negro, is more precious than the gold of Ophir. In all ages of the world Israel is an outcast, hated and persecuted by all. "They wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented."—Heb. xi. 37. "And they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field: all their service, wherein they made them serve, was with rigor."—Ex. i. 14. As if this were not hard enough, their tender offspring (to most people dearer than natural life), if a male, must be slain, to prevent their increase. Could a nation's condition be worse? To all human appearance there was not even an eye to pity, nor one to sympathize with them in their forlorn condition. They refuse to hear Moses and Aaron, "from anguish of spirit, and from bitter bondage." Now, being delivered from their enemies, and from the hand of all them that hate them, they are suddenly confronted with unmistakable evidence of not simply friendship, but the everlasting love and protection of him without whose will not even a sparrow can fall to the ground. To the "afflicted and poor people" of God nothing could be more transcendently sublime and glorious. To them a simple manifestation of God's protecting care and love is more precious than all the treasures of earth. "That I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth, and say unto Zion, Thou art my people."—Isa. li. 16.

Moreover, it is a peculiar and distinguishing characteristic of an Israelite that his greatest joy in all his tribulations is inseparably connected with the thought that "By the grace of God I am what I am." To one who considers himself possessed of ability to run, to accept overtures, and to do "many wonderful works" in the name of the Lord, such doctrine is of course distasteful. There is a sinew upon the thigh that gives ability to run. The angel touched this in Jacob, and it shrank, and of course he was ever afterward lame. "Wherefore the children of Israel eat not of it unto this day." "Until this day" a child of God will not eat of the doctrine of man's ability, which is preached in and relished by every religious denomination under heaven, with the bare exception of the church of God. Being himself afflicted, and lame, and poor, he can only rejoice in the thought that what he is, his inheritance, his all, is in accordance with the eternal purpose and predestination of God. His theme is, "In whom we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."—Eph. i. 11. It is a mystery to some why any should rejoice in the doctrine that makes the creature wholly passive and dependent. If a great king should make proclamation that he was going to bestow great inheritance upon certain of his subjects, and there should arise a misunderstanding and dispute about the characteristics of the persons, the one contending that it was to him that willeth and him that runneth, and the other that it was to the lame and halt, who could not run, we should of course expect to find one who felt his inability, who felt that he was lame, rejoicing in that construction of the proclamation which declares, "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth." The palm trees and fountains of Elim are evidence to the house of Jacob that what they are is not of themselves, but of God's appointment, in consonance with the whole tenor of the Scriptures. "Not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace." "If I had called, and he had answered me, yet would I not believe that he had hearkened unto my voice."—Job ix. 16. "Whatsoever his soul desireth, even that he doeth;" and he giveth account of none of his matters.

"Chained to his throne a volume lies,
With all the fates of men;
And every angel's form and size,
Drawn by the eternal pen."

As the twelve tribes journeyed on through the wilderness, moving as the pillar of cloud moved, and abiding in their tents, whether it was a day, or month, or year, when it stood still, the Lord gave Moses the pattern of the tabernacle, and other things connected with it. Among them was a candlestick with seven lamps, all of pure gold, and to be made of one piece, and according to the pattern of things in the heavens. It was made of gold, not to represent the value of what it typified alone, but because gold will stand the test of fire. "When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold."—Job xxiii. 10. When Abraham asked for evidence that his seed should inherit the land, the Lord commanded him to take an offering and offer it according to directions. "As the sun was going down, a deep sleep and a horror of great darkness fell upon Abraham." "And when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold, a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces."—Gen. xv. 17. Abraham is the father of the faithful. "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." The church (Abraham's seed) being the light of the world, is appropriately represented by a burning lamp. Having the fires of persecution kindled around and upon her by her enemies, she is typified by a "smoking furnace." "Behold, I have refined thee, but not with silver; I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction." "The Lord's fire is in Zion and his furnace in Jerusalem." If the trial of the church be thus severe, what could more fitly represent her than pure gold, since it is known that the hottest furnace does not and cannot injure it a particle: it only burns up whatever alloy may have become mixed with it, without the loss of a single particle of gold; but the hotter the fire, the purer the gold comes forth. This is, in our judgment, the reason why the candlestick was made of gold. Why its lamps were seven, may be more difficult to explain. Moses was charged to make it according to the pattern shown him in the mount; and Paul declares that they were "patterns of things in the heavens"—the gospel heavens. The prophet Ezekiel, in portraying the inheritance of the saints in the gospel kingdom, says, "Thus saith the Lord God, This shall be the border whereby ye shall inherit the land, according to the twelve tribes of Israel."—Ezek. xlvii. 13. "They shall divide it into seven parts. Judah shall abide in their coast on the south, and the house of Joseph shall abide in their coasts on the north." "But the Levites have no part among you." "And Gad, and Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh, have received their inheritance beyond Jordan on the east, which Moses the servant of the Lord gave them."—Joshua xviii. 5, 7. The twelve tribes of the children of Israel coming up out of the land of bondage pass through the wilderness by the twelve fountains of Elim; and coming to Jordan (the river of judgment), "Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the feet of the priests which bear the ark of the covenant stood; and they are there unto this day."—Joshua iv. 9. "And took up twelve stones out of the midst of Jordan, according to the number of the tribes of the children of Israel; and carried them over with them unto the place where they lodged, and laid them down there."—Josh. iv. 8. Being now in the land of Canaan, the type of the inheritance of the antitype of the seven golden candlesticks, the stronghold of the enemy must be destroyed, not by carnal weapons, nor might of the assailants, but "Seven priests shall bear before the ark seven trumpets of rams' horns: and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times: and the priests shall blow with the trumpets. And it shall come to pass when they make a long blast with the ram's horn, and ye hear the sound of the trumpet, all the people shall shout with a great shout; and the wall of the city shall fall down flat."—Josh. vi. 4, 5. They subdue seven nations of the Canaanites. There seems to be a curious resemblance of the mystery of iniquity to the mystery of godliness. "And the whole congregation of the children of Israel assembled together at Shiloh [a place of rest] and set up the tabernacle of the congregation there: and the land was subdued before them. And there remained among the children of Israel seven tribes, which had not yet received their inheritance."—Joshua xviii. 1, 2. There are too many things here in remarkable coincidence with events in the gospel kingdom to be purely accidental. They "assembled together at Shiloh." Shiloh means a place of rest; also applied to him who is said to be a hiding place from the wind, a covert from the tempest, and the shadow of a great rock in a weary land: to him who said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "Until Shiloh come: and unto whom shall the gathering of the people be." "And set up the tabernacle of the congregation there." The time of Shiloh's coming and of the gathering of the people was the time when the tabernacle of David (the antitype of this tabernacle at Shiloh) was set up, "that the residue of men might seek after God, and all the Gentiles upon whom his name is called." "And there remained seven tribes, which had not yet received their inheritance." Joshua commanded the children of Israel, "Give out from among you three men for each tribe." If all the tribes are included, this requires thirty-six men. "And I will send them, and they shall rise and go through the land, and describe it according to the inheritance of them." "And they shall divide it into seven parts."—Josh. xviii. 4, 5. "And the men went and passed through the land, and described it by cities into seven parts in a book, and came to Joshua to the host at Shiloh." The books of the Old Testament seem to have been written by twenty-nine persons, which lacks just seven of the thirty-six. There are in the Scriptures a number of other books referred to. The writers of seven are given in their titles, viz., the books of Jasher (Josh. x. 13), Nathan, Gad (1 Chron. xxix. 29), Ahijah, Iddo (2 Chron. ix. 29), Shemaiah (2 Chron. xii. 15), and Jehu (2 Chron. xx. 34). While the great Author of revelation has for a purpose of his own sealed to us these seven, he has also for a purpose of his own revealed to us that they were written, giving us the names of the writers. "And I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud; and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire: and he had in his hand a little book open: and he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot on the earth, and cried with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth: and when he had cried, seven thunders uttered their voices. And when the seven thunders had uttered their voices, I was about to write: and I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Seal up those things which the seven thunders uttered, and write them not." This angel "swore by him that liveth forever," "that there should be time no longer." "But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets."—Rev. x. 1-7. According to the purpose of God, whose way is in the deep, what was uttered by the voices of these seven is sealed to us; yet according to that same purpose it is revealed to us that they uttered their voices. God evidently had a purpose in its utterance, notwithstanding he commands it to be immediately sealed. The writers of the seven books referred to, but not contained in the Bible, with the twenty-nine books it contains, make just thirty-six (three from each tribe), the number sent by Joshua to describe the land of Canaan into seven parts in a book. They arose and went through the land. "Searching what, or what manner of time, the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow."—1 Peter i. 11. The land of Canaan was a type of the inheritance of the saints in the gospel kingdom, which is minutely described in the Old Testament, "as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began."—Luke i. 70. "Until the times of restitution [fulfillment] of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."—Acts iii. 21. "Wisdom hath builded her house, she hath hewn out her seven pillars."—Prov. ix. 1. Canaan was divided into seven parts. The candlestick had seven branches. But why was it divided into seven parts? "What mean these seven ewe lambs which thou hast set by themselves?"—Gen. xxi. 29. There were just twelve tribes. "Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come," said the apostle of the Gentiles.—Acts xxvi. 7. "This shall be the border whereby ye shall inherit the land, according to your twelve tribes." Two tribes never cross the river, and two more (Judah and Joseph, both figures of Christ) abide in their coasts, one on the south, and the other on the north; and the Levites (called in Scripture "my ministers") "have no inheritance among you." This makes five tribes without an allotted portion in Canaan; and five taken from twelve leaves seven. Judah and Joseph were to abide in the coasts of the seven. Christ walks "in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks."—Rev. ii. 1.

C. W. ANDERSON.

RAYMOND, Ill., April 26, 1889.

JAMES WAGNER—DEAR BROTHER:—I have this morning read your article dated April 5th, 1889, and printed in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, for April 24th, 1889, from which I will make a quotation or two. On page 130, near the bottom, I find these words, "From these texts we learn that the internal thoughts as well as the outward acts of men are under the direction of the Lord, whether morally good or evil" (italics mine). Now I know that the Bible teaches the sovereignty of God, and he does his will in heaven and earth; and I believe it with all my heart. But how are we to reconcile these two opposing principles, good and evil? Did they both spring from the same fountain? I do not believe in an eternal devil. I believe God made all things, as stated by Paul (Colossians i. 16, 17), even the devil. But the question is, Did he (God) make that wicked principle that makes the devil God's enemy? Or, to apply it to us, did God make us sinners? We are sinners, and we are also God's creatures; but did not we become sinners by transgression? And if that is the way one set of God's creatures became sinners, is it not reasonable to conclude that is the way all his creatures became sinners? I know the devil is a sinner, for John says so.—1 John iii. 8. But he certainly was not created a sinner any more than we were. Now, dear brethren, do not think hard of me. I am asking for information. But one more question: How is it possible, according to your article referred to, for such a thing as a sinner to be in God's universe, if all are doing God's will? Jesus says that they that do his will shall enter into the kingdom of heaven.—Matt. vii. 21. I have yet to see where it is so stated that every creature is doing God's will; but we do find that God does his will. Again, if the elect are doing God's will while they are unregenerated, do they need regeneration to enable them to do God's will? The Old School Predestinarian Baptists in this country teach that men must be born again, or regenerated, before they can obey or serve God acceptably. Now, if their teaching is correct, all men that are unregenerated are opposed to God, are serving the flesh, and are haters of God and his laws. Their mouths are full of cursing and bitterness, their tongues are using deceit, their feet are swift in shedding blood, destruction and misery are in all their ways, and the way of peace have they not known. They are all out of the way. Not one of them is doing good. But if, as you say, God is directing all their actions, both good and evil, they are all (while doing the above things) doing God's will. Do we, must we, believe this proposition in order to be Old School Baptists? Paul's Galatian brethren were bewitched. Did they not do wrong then? They believed a falsehood to be the truth, and acted contrary to the commands of the gospel. Were they then doing the will of God? If so, why did Paul rebuke them? Paul knew what the will of God was; and knowing this, he knew they were not doing it, so he rebuked them sharply, and commanded to rebuke others. The word repentance implies that man is in some sense away from God, and doing contrary to the will of God; but your position would make us believe that they, before repentance, are doing the will of God; and if so, do they need repentance? My position is that Christ gives them repentance for this express purpose, to bring them into subjection to the will of God, that they might do his will. Take this passage from Christ's own language, "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter the kingdom of heaven," or do his will. Therefore before men can do the will of God, that is, enter the kingdom of heaven, or the church, they must be converted. Whatever conversion may mean, men must have it before they can obey God by entering his church or kingdom. And we know that men converted, joining the church, and following Christ, are doing the will of God. Again, Christ says, John xiv. 15, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." Do those that love him, and do not his commandments, do his will? No! no! Are we (the saints) not chastened all our days, for no other reason than that we are disobedient to the will of God? I cannot bring myself to believe that you, brother Wagner, would claim that you have done the will of God altogether since your conversion, not to speak of the time before you realized that you were a lost sinner. I have been traveling among the old order of Baptists for over a fifth of a century, and I yet have to meet the first one who can claim that he is in all things doing God's will. We are all endeavoring to do his will. But do we not often, very often, fall on our knees and ask God to pardon and forgive our shortcomings and imperfections? Is not this the history and picture of God's people in all ages of time up to the present? We have all along the path of our life (saints' life), for nearly seven thousand years, confessed that we have been and are pilgrims and strangers in the world. The world knows us not, because it knew him not. No one can ever know then until he first knows Christ. Such is my faith. I hope it is of the same character of Abraham's. His was, believing on him that justifies the ungodly. Such a faith is of God counted unto those that possess it for righteousness. This thought cuts off and explodes the idea of doing God's will for righteousness, and puts the ground or foundation of righteousness on something else entirely, even faith, that works by love and purifies the heart. Faith is produced by the Spirit.—Gal. v. 22. Nor can it exist without him. This thought places the true foundation of the righteousness of the saints in the Spirit. The Spirit is the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost of Paul is the Jehovah of Isaiah. So the whole thing, from first to last, is founded in God, the Eternal. Here is a righteousness that the saints are clothed with. So the righteousness of faith is the righteousness of God. Now, brother Wagner, you can see that I am no Arminian. I detest the name. I wish you would write me a private letter; or, if it suits you best, if you think my poor letter is worth answering, you can answer it through the SIGNS, as I am a subscriber and reader of that paper. I have been interested, and many times comforted, by reading your communications in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I therefore come to you, and ask you to help me fix up these things, that are so distressing to us feeble ones, and are to some extent causing rents in our beloved Zion. I am anxious for the truth to prevail. Let God be true, and every man a liar.

I am yours in hope of immortality beyond this world,

B. F. QUERRY.

BLANCO, Texas.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Since my last article was published in the SIGNS, I have received a private letter from brother B. F. Querry, of Raymond, Ill., in which he takes exceptions to some of my premises, and infers conclusions so much at variance with my religious sentiments, that in compliance with his request and that of others who wish me to write for your paper on the subject hinted at in the article above named, I send for your inspection and disposal his letter and my notice of it. I will state here that were it not in deference to the request of brother Querry and others, I should not trouble you or others with this matter; but as there may be some or many who deduce conclusions from the premises taken so antagonistic to the spirit and the very life of christianity, I hope to be pardoned for this intrusion. God forbid that I should ever hold or advance a system that would exclude or supercede practical godliness, or even be susceptible of such consequences, in the christian life. I shall be brief in my notice of this subject at present. A few plain, pertinent texts of Scripture should be as conclusive as hundreds to the reflecting mind. I hope to be imbued with the same spirit that seems visible in the letter of brother Querry, who quotes me as follows: "From these texts we learn that the internal thoughts as well as the outward acts of men are under the direction of the Lord, whether morally good or evil." Brother Querry then says, "I know the Bible teaches the sovereignty of God, and he does his will in heaven and earth, and I believe it with all my heart." He afterwards says, "I do not believe in an eternal devil." This confession of brother Querry seems very timely, or else from some remarks of his we might have arrived at a different conclusion as to his view of divine sovereignty and an eternal devil. The texts of Scripture forming the basis of my conclusions, to which he took exceptions, read as follows: "The preparations of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, is from the Lord." "A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps." "Man's goings are of the Lord: how then can a man understand his own way?" "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." "There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless the counsel of the Lord that shall stand." The first text does not limit the operations of God on the hearts of men as they are good men; neither does it limit his operations as to the actions of good men. But man in the text is a representative man, and what is said of him is true of all orders of men; so that, if the preparations of the heart and the actions proceeding from thence are from the Lord in some instances, it is so universally. Though a man's (or men's) heart devise their way (in the actions of life, in their intercourse with each other), yet the Lord directs their steps, and they succeed only in their enterprises when their designs are in harmony with the counsels of heaven. As man's goings are of the Lord, he cannot understand his own way. To all this undoubted testimony the prophet sets his seal, by appealing to his own personal experience, "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." Now, if man's ways (that is, his acts) in the various relations of life are not in himself, his way must necessarily be in another, even in his Creator and Preserver; and the only difference between the prophet and some others is, that he was assured of the truth of this declaration from personal experience, and some are not, though equally and as much at the disposal of their Sovereign as he. For as the Lord turns the king's heart whithersoever he will, so he does every other man's.—Prov. xvi. 1, 9; xix. 21; xxi. 1; Jer. x. 23.

From a view of the above texts, in connection with numerous others, it seems to my mind that the position excepted to by brother Querry has indubitable grounds to rest on; that is, that the internal thoughts as well as the outward acts of men are under the direction of the Lord, whether morally good or evil. It also seems evident to me that if brother Querry had duly considered my closing remarks in the article he quoted from, he would not have asked the questions, "How are we to reconcile these two opposing principles? Did they both spring from the same fountain?" In those closing remarks I say, "Although the same harmony prevails both in its parts and operations in nature as in grace, yet there is this difference in the manner of their manifestation, that grace flows from God as a principle of his nature or character, whereas all created existence is merely under his control and direction, as being separate and distinct from himself. For though he is the Creator of all things, and moves and directs the things created, yet he is not mixed with any of them. In this sense sin, as a principle, or in its operations, is no further removed from him than others of his creatures, as they are all equally (that is, infinitely) inferior to and removed from him."

Again, brother Query seems to conclude that I hold that the converted and unconverted are alike doing the will of God. But I am far from believing such; and I do not believe, when duly considered, that such a conclusion is deducible from any position taken in my article; for in that there is not one word about men, either regenerate or unregenerate, doing the will of God; but the whole burden of that article goes to show that our God executes his own good will and pleasure in the use of such agencies as he ordained to that end; and prominent among those agencies are the wills of men, which he controls and directs in such channels as will accomplish his purpose. I do not believe that a mere creature can do the will of God, whether men or angels, only as their wills are held in subordination to God's will and directed by his Spirit. When God works his will in his people, they are then commanded to work out what he has worked in them.

Again, brother Query's remarks about the good and sinful acts of men being alike according to the will of God, will not apply to me, any further than he can show that I hold that the acts of men are independent of their Creator. Instead of believing this, I believe that God does as he will with the wills of all his creatures, and holds them in subordination to his own will. Therefore whenever God's believing children even do his will from the heart, it is always under the direction of his Spirit. God's will is sovereign and omnipotent, and must be accomplished. It is just, holy and good, and is perfect rectitude itself. Therefore whatever he does in pursuance of his will is absolutely right, whether we discern the harmony of his acts with his being and attributes or not.

Again, brother Query says he knows the devil is a sinner, but that God did not make him a sinner. Then he must have perverted his own nature; or being made a good devil by his Creator, he made himself a wicked devil. This seems to give him power to reverse the laws of nature; for in nature the effect can neither rise higher nor sink lower than the cause.

Again, he says, "How is it possible, according to your article, for such a thing as a sinner to be in God's universe?" Here again it is taken for granted that in my article the idea is conveyed that both regenerate and unregenerate men are doing the will of God, and that as independent actors. In what brother Query says about the Galatian brethren, and Paul's reproof of them, he takes the liberty to clip the chain of predestination at the wrong point; for it was as much the purpose of God that Paul should reprove them, as that this and other heresies must needs be.

and others of your readers, to texts of Scripture that cover the whole ground as to the points of difference between us. Before doing so, however, I will say that as accountable beings God gave his reasonable creatures a law in their federal head, Adam, and to violate it is sin; for sin is the transgression of the law. "It must needs be that offenses come; but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." "There must be heresies also among you."—Matt. xviii. 7; 1 Cor. xi. 19. This "must be" is according to the will of God; for he does according to his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth, and works all things after the counsel of his own will; and yet there is a woe denounced against the introducers of heresies. As our Savior was the most innocent and just person that ever lived, so his crucifixion was the most horrible deed ever perpetrated by men; and yet Judas (and all concerned in his crucifixion) was but fulfilling prophecy, and acted according to the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God; consequently according to the will of God; and with wicked hands, or acrimony of heart, they crucified the Lord of glory, for which they are held guilty. If brother Query will agree that this is in harmony with my article, but that it was necessary in order to the redemption and salvation of God's elect, and is a departure from his usual course of procedure, that view of it would be a great reflection on our God; for it would have him depart from himself, and put himself on a level with his creatures. For if other instances wherein God controls and directs the wills of wicked men in effecting his purpose are not compatible with his glorious attributes, neither is it in the case of Christ's crucifixion; and if that is, all others are. The Lord "is in one mind, and who [that is, none] can turn him? and what his soul desireth [or he wills], even that he doeth. For he performeth [here is his providence] the thing that is appointed [this is his predestination] for me." If this was so with Job, so it is with every other being on earth. Therefore providence runs only (but always) in the channel or line of God's appointment.—Job xxiii. 13. His hand formed the crooked serpent, or Satan.—Job xxvi. 13. From the acrimony of his heart Shimei cursed David; yet the Lord bade him. The Lord appointed to defeat the good counsel of Ahithophel, that he might bring evil upon Absalom.—2 Sam. xvi. 10; xvii. 14. "The Lord hath made all things for himself; yea, even the wicked for the day of evil."—Prov. xvi. 4. Eli's sons hearkened not to his reproof, because the Lord would slay them.—1 Sam. ii. 25. "Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?"—Amos iii. 6.

I have produced a very few of a large class of texts that teach the absolute sovereignty of God over all his works; and why we cannot take this class of Scriptures according to the plain import of their terms, as well as others, is more than I can discern, unless it is upon a supposal that God's holiness and justice are impeached by doing so. But by not doing so, do we not impeach his sovereignty, and place ourselves in the position of those rebuked by the apostle Paul? "Who art thou that repliest against God," or proposes terms by which he should regulate his conduct in order to be just? But I believe that the sovereignty, predestination and providence of God are perfect unisons. Predestination is the plan, of which providence is the execution in all the details and in every minutia of God's government over his creatures. This I wish understood is no idol or pet theory with me; but in view of the creation and providence, in connection with the word of God, these are my unavoidable conclusions. I defy all the erudition and the most acute penetration of the world to strike a line where predestination ends and blind chance begins, or draw a line between them, unless it is supposed there is some independent, conflicting power operating; or it may be some ideal intangible something that is in conflict with the works of God.

Brethren Beebe, as some of your readers have written to me to give my views through your paper, I wish to say to them that my crop at this time requires all my attention. I hope to write more lengthily when I have leisure. In the meantime I will refer them to former numbers of your paper containing my views as clearly presented as I may be able to give them hereafter. They will be found in the following numbers: April 15th, 1886, July 1st, 1886, August 15th, 1886, November 15th, 1887, October 15th, 1887, February 1st, 1888, April 1st, 1888, May 15th, 1888. I will therefore receive it as a kindness if you will publish this as soon as convenience will allow. It would be quite a task to write private letters, giving my views to all the brethren who request them. I have not noticed brother Query's letter in detail, but think my notice covers all the ground as to the points of difference between us. I hope that brethren House, Davis, and others of Nashville, Tenn., will excuse me for not answering by private letter. If you do not decide to publish all this immediately, please publish this notice to brethren requesting my views of the divine sovereignty, and oblige. I send you with this brother Query's letter containing his request to publish his also in connection with this, for which you will oblige your unworthy brother, I hope, in gospel bonds,

JAMES WAGNER.

TIFFIN, Ohio, April 18, 1889.

ELDER F. A. CHICK:—Though a stranger to you personally, I have read many of your communications to the SIGNS OF THE TIMES for the past eleven years, and sometimes hope I am not a stranger to the Spirit that is manifest in your letters. Your recent article on the subject of prayer was a reminder of my own reflections and experiences. Often have I questioned whether I knew anything of the true spirit of prayer when I found such painful embarrassment in attempting to formulate words fit to be addressed to him before whom angels veil their faces. To speak to brethren or friends is comparatively easy, for these seem more nearly on the same plane with myself, and therefore more easily approached. But I will not dilate upon this subject. Having read many of your letters containing practical suggestions for christian conduct in walk and conversation, I am encouraged in asking you a few questions in relation to church government, or the duty of organized bodies of christians in watching over individual members for their welfare, and for the peace and harmony of the whole.

1. Is it disorderly for one member to summon another into a law court to settle a difference, refusing to leave the matter to an arbitration by brethren of the same faith or church?

2. When one of the parties kindly asks for such arbitration, and the other replies, "Pay my claim or meet me in [a heathen] court," and a scandalous law-suit results, which is responsible for the scandal?

3. When, in addition to the shame and sorrow caused by such suit, the defendant is put to costs which might have been avoided by a reference to brethren, is the one choosing litigation justly responsible for such increased costs?

4. When a case of the above kind exists, and the matter is of public notoriety, is it a question between the contestants only, or is it an offense against the whole church, whose authority and judgment were slighted by the preference for a court of law?

5. If an offense against the whole church, whose duty is it to call attention to the case, and what the duty of the church?

Now, brother Chick, I am aware that ministers and editors dislike to answer specific questions, lest they take sides in an unpleasant matter; but when through weakness or the spirit of "party" brethren get confused, is not this the time above all others when unbiased truth should be proclaimed? Not to add to trouble, but to point the way out. Of what profit are the rebukes and corrections and instructions of God's watchmen if given in such vague terms that they meet no actual case? Do not the real things demand our attention more than the imaginary? I shall be glad to have your views on the above questions, either in a private or public way, as you may deem best. While the church has no right to make rules or establish tests not in line with the law of her Head, yet as the moon reflects the light of the greater luminary, so should Zion let her light shine.

Hoping to receive gratefully your reply soon, I am, I trust, yours in the love of truth and charity,

JOHN SEITZ.

REISTERSTOWN, Md., May 7, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I send you the inclosed letter, and a few thoughts in reply. The theme is a Bible one, and the questions are important and pertinent; and to me but one answer seems possible to each of these questions. If there be any case of the kind named in brother Seitz's letter anywhere in his section I know nothing personally about it. Brother Seitz gave me no information more than is found in the above letter. It is evident, then, that I can have no bias toward any one or against any one.

Question 1: "Is it disorderly for one member to summon another into a law court to settle a difference, refusing to leave the matter to an arbitration by brethren of the same faith or church?"

In answer, let Paul speak; and let all remember that when Paul speaks it is the holy Spirit of God speaking through him. He says, writing to the church at Corinth, "Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints? Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world shall be judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels? how much more things that pertain to this life? If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, set them to judge who are least esteemed in the church. I speak to your shame. Is it so, that there is not a wise man among you? no, not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren? But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers. Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to law one with another. Why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? Nay, ye do wrong, and defraud, and that your brethren."—1 Cor. vi. It seems to me that I need not add one word to this. If any one loves the law of Zion, that one will not, in the face of these words, go to law with a brother before the world, but will be willing that even those of feeblest judgment among his brethren shall judge his cause, rather than a worldly court. If language means anything, this is what Paul teaches; and he makes no exceptions to this rule.

Question 2: "When one of the parties kindly asks for such arbitration, and the other replies, 'Pay my claim or meet me in [a heathen] court,' and a scandalous law-suit results, which is responsible for the scandal?"

I have no hesitancy in saying at once, The one who forces the law-suit. Honest differences of opinion often do arise in business where both aim to do right; but the brother who is not willing that even the least esteemed among his brethren shall decide his case, shows at once that he means something wrong. I should say at once that he was more intent upon success than upon right being done. God says that he shall not go to law—that he should suffer himself to be defrauded first. He shows the spirit of the world, and not of the humble, child-like disciple, in going to law.

Question 3: "When, in addition to the shame and sorrow caused by such suit, the defendant is put to costs which might have been avoided by a reference to brethren, is the one choosing litigation justly responsible for such increased costs?"

I answer that if God ever gives such an one to see his fault and sin, he will feel that he is responsible not only for the costs, but for all the shame and sorrow that have resulted. Of this I am sure.

Question 4: "When a case of the above kind exists, and the matter is of public notoriety, is it a question between the contestants only, or is it an offense against the whole church, whose authority and judgment were slighted by the preference for a court of law?"

I answer that it is a sin, first, against God, and then against the whole church, and lastly against the brother whom he forces to go into court; for it transgresses God's command, it slights the church (or rather the Spirit of Christ in the church), and it forces a brother into vexation and trouble, and perhaps into sin.

Question 5: "If an offense against the whole church, whose duty is it to call attention to the case, and what the duty of the church?"

It is the duty of any and every member who may know the facts, and who loves the erring ones, and who loves the cause of God and truth, to first warn, reprove, exhort, and try to win the offender to a better state of feeling; and then, if unsuccessful, bring it to the church, that all may unitedly endeavor to make a righteous peace. The duty of the church is to continue the efforts being made to reclaim the erring one, and failing in that, to withdraw fellowship from him; but this last step must not be taken until all other steps have failed.

I have thus briefly answered these questions as seems to me right and scriptural, but I wish to add a few reflections. The brother who appeals to the law courts may have a just claim, but even if it be so, he sins in his way of doing. The brother who resists his claim may be in the wrong, and may hope for a more favorable judgment from his brethren than the law or justice allows; but this does not excuse the one going to law, for he is told to suffer himself to be defrauded and to suffer wrong first. The brother going to law may say in his heart that the brethren are too ignorant of business to be capable of judging aright; but let him remember that saints are to judge angels and the world. Surely then, Paul says, they can judge the least things; and thousands of wealth in this world is nothing compared to the least spiritual thing. He may also imagine that some prejudice may exist against him in the church. If so, the spirit of the church is carnal, and we must not fight carnality with carnality. Even this would not excuse his going to law before the unbelievers; nothing will excuse it. God forbids it; and God will see that no real injury shall befall him in obedience, while God will also see to it that his transgression shall receive a just recompense of reward.

Is not the honor of the cause of God more than all things besides? What a spectacle it is to see two children of the King of peace quarreling and wrangling for the mastery in public court! How will men of the world laugh and rejoice. Surely at such a time the witnesses are slain, and lie exposed in the streets of Babylon, a laughing-stock and jest for men! The religion of Christ is love; but what love is there when, as brother Seitz says, a heathen court is called in to settle a dispute? The brother who is willing to appeal to the judgment of his brethren, and does all he can to have it settled in that way, will have the approval of God; and if forced to meet his brother in a court of law, he will not be condemned in the estimation of his brethren. The church should say to both that the honor of the cause of God demands that you settle this matter among the family, and avoid public scandal. It is a shameful thing in the judgment of all right-thinking men when natural brothers appeal to the law against each other; how much more shameful is it for Christians!

If any man can go to law without committing sin, it is more than I have ever seen. Such a thing may be. I do not say it cannot be, but I have never known it to be. Anger, enmity, unjust and abusive language, evil insinuations against the opponent, always accompany such disputes; and how wrong these things are let the Scriptures testify.

How can a man worship his God, and at the same time love not his brother? How can he love his brethren, and at the same time have no confidence that they will decide righteously between him and his brother? When we came asking for membership in the church we desired them to judge our experience, and we believed them capable of doing so. Are they then not much more capable of judging the least things, viz., our trivial worldly concerns? I will leave these remarks. If published, I trust they may do good, and not harm.

F. A. CHICK.

OLUSTEE CREEK, Ala., Feb. 25, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—BELOVED BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—If indeed such a one as I feel myself to be can thus address you. I am a new subscriber to the SIGNS, as you know, and feel to say to you, I highly appreciate it, and thank God there is such a medium through which the poor, afflicted ones can often speak one to another. I do hope its circulation will be such as you can continue it a weekly messenger to those that love it as I do. It is laden with rich food for a poor, hungry one like myself. I find from reading the communications from different parts of the country that the dear brethren and sisters write my feelings much better than I can tell them, until I exclaim, Surely the Lord is good. It finds me at times cast down, and careworn, and filled with doubts and fears, and asking myself the question, Can any one be like me? Are there any of the Lord's dear people that ever feel to be cast away, and that the Lord is gone forever? I cannot even think a good thought, and am all unholy, all unclean. Then I find such sweet and comforting communications, until I am enabled to say, If "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." For a time I forget my doubts and fears; but they return again. Then I can but say, "Am I his, or am I not?" If I am, why this cold and lifeless frame? My spiritual life, if any at all, is ups and downs, and it seems to me my downs are more, and last much longer, than the ups. O is there any one like me? This is not what I took my pen to write. I wanted to say to you that I have been reading the SIGNS a little for several years, before I was identified with the Old Baptists, and must say that then, and for a time after I joined the Old Baptists, I could not understand or indorse all that was contended for in the SIGNS; I mean some points of doctrine. The "predestination of all things" I said I could not nor would not believe. But when I was a child I thought as a child. I want to say to you that now it is my life. Take it from me, and I am lost. It is a precious truth to me. I had to give up one child that I loved and cherished. I thought a great deal of it, for the hope of all my further life was in the child. It was self-pride and self-ambition. It hurt me to give it all up, and come down to the dust of humility, and acknowledge myself to be nothing in the hands of my Creator. And to deny myself and take up the cross, I felt to be my duty; to leave the popular order I was with and go to the people that I loved and believed to be the people of God. But leaving all and denying all did not hurt like it would now to take from me this most heart-cheering and comforting doctrine of predestination. It is so precious to me I cannot divide it. To hurt it would hurt me. It is one of my stays, and what would I do without it? It is this that gives me comfort in my dark seasons, in my bereavements, in my affliction. I will quit. I have not written as I expected when I took my pen. I had no idea my mind would run where it has. I just wanted to say to you, dear brethren Beebe, that I love the doctrine that has been called Beebe, Dudley and Johnson doctrine. I believe it is the doctrine of eternal truth.

May the Lord bless you, and sustain you, both temporally and spiritually, to send out the SIGNS with its able editorials, that the Lord's dear people may be comforted and built up in the truth of the gospel, is the desire of one of the least of all saints, if one at all,

J. A. MILLS.

HOOVER'S RUN, Pa., June 9, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN—If one so unworthy may use so endearing a title. Although we are strangers in the flesh, I feel to hope that we have the same spiritual Father; but many times I am made to mourn and sigh like one far from home; for I have no home. I have my name among a people who profess to be doing great things for the Lord, but I fear they have lost sight of the old paths. I feel to exclaim, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him." Then how can we sing one of Zion's songs in a strange land? Yes, it seems to me I am like one alone, and am often reminded of what Job said when he was so sorely afflicted, "They whom I loved are turned against me." Be that as it may, I want to be found walking in the strait and narrow path. They say we must keep up with the times; but I have not so learned Christ. He said to his disciples, "Ye are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." Yes, thanks be to his great name, he has a people whom he has chosen out of the world, who are not reckoned with the nations of the earth. If it were not for my Bible and the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, I know not how I would contain myself; but through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES I find the Lord still has a people that trust in him and stay upon their God. When I read in our family visitor the soul-cheering editorials and rich communications, I sometimes feel that I could almost fly, that I might hear those golden words as they come warm from the heart of the Lord's servants. I never was in an Old Baptist Church, nor do I know where I might find a member of that church, only those I learn of through the SIGNS. But I am truly sorry that I am not permitted to see them with my eyes. I think if I could see the true ark of the Lord set up in our midst, I could say, as did Simeon, "Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace." Dear brethren, pray for me, and the people round about me, and may the Lord's blessing rest upon all his people, is my prayer.

P. S.—Will Elder F. A. Chick please give his views on Habakkuk ii. 15?

E. J. S.

BEN FRANKLIN, Texas, Dec. 11, 1888.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—It becomes my duty to write for the columns of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, our much esteemed family paper. When I use the word "family" I mean the household of faith. Some time ago two of the beloved brethren requested me to write something for publication. At the time of their request I felt too unworthy to even promise to attempt such a thing, and do yet feel inadequate to the task. But, dear ones, may one so unworthy as I feel myself to be, be allowed to call the redeemed of the Lord by that endearing name? I say redeemed of the Lord, for in him God's people, the church, the bride, the Lamb's wife, stand justified; for through his sufferings and shed blood she is redeemed from all iniquity. God has declared, "I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more."—Heb. viii. 12. O what a glorious thought for those who have been quickened by the Spirit, and been made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, and by the Spirit been made to see him as the chiefest among ten thousand and altogether lovely. I must bring this imperfect scribble to a close, for I cannot think that it deserves space in the SIGNS, when there are so many able writers, whose writings are so instructive and edifying.

Yours in hope of eternal life,

J. C. KILGORE.

FAIRBURY, Ill., June 4, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—By request, I will forward to you the information wanted by brother J. S. Corder and others in regard to brother Levi Hess.

Elder Hess came to this church in 1865, and left here in 1877, going to Missouri, and from there to Kingman Co., Kansas, where he died some four or five years ago. Elder Hess was a dearly beloved and highly respected brother and father in Israel, having come to us shortly after being left destitute by the removal of Elder John Darnall to Oregon. Sister Hess still lives in Kansas, and may be found by writing to her son-in-law, Mr. R. S. Cates, Kingman, Kingman Co., Kansas. Respectfully,

J. G. STEERS.

LONDON, England, June 7, 1889.

GILBERT BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR FRIENDS:—I am sorry to see from the SIGNS OF THE TIMES that Elder Hassell is so much a loser by his and his late father's Church History. I went over the book with much pleasure, and gave it a good review in the Christian's Monthly Record, which periodical I hope you regularly receive. Please accept of one pound sterling (£1) for Elder Hassell.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN GADSBY.

REASON AND REVELATION.

"At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight."—Matt. xi. 25, 26.

Remembering that the Spirit of Christ never inspires any wish contrary to the will of God, it will be evident that all thoughts of murmuring and rebellion arise from the carnal mind. This will be readily admitted by the saints, who have learned the sinfulness of their own hearts; but they are not always able to accept the truth which is the necessary converse of this, and rest in the assurance that their wish to be able to pray for the will of God to be done, is conclusive demonstration that they are led by the Spirit of God, and are therefore the sons of God.—Rom. viii. 14. Some tried child may be ready to say, "I cannot claim this comforting testimony, because I find in my mind a disposition to complain of the afflictions which are given me to endure." While this is clearly an evidence of opposition against the will of God, it does not necessarily follow that there is not in the one who thus complains a desire to be submissive, and to rejoice that the will of God is done. If there is a longing to be conformed to the will of God, that is the work of the Spirit of Christ in your heart, dear child, and he will never forsake the work which he has once begun. "Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ."—Phil. i. 6. There is no more conclusive manifestation of this good work of the Spirit than the feeling of grief under the power of sin. All who thus mourn are blessed of the Lord.

"These things" which are hid from the wise and prudent are the same things which are revealed unto babes. In his prayer to the Father Jesus explains what these hidden things are. "Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee; as thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him: and this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." This is that wisdom of which Paul says, "Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect; yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to naught; but we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory; which none of the princes of this world knew; for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory."—1 Cor. ii. 6-8. All the resources of reason are at the service of the princes of this world. If earthly wisdom could have comprehended eternal truth the wise and prudent would have been the very characters whomight have attained to the knowledge of these hidden things. Then the princes of this world would not have crucified the Lord of glory; and the purpose of God in salvation would have been defeated. Herein is shown the true meaning of the expression of gratitude in the answer of our Lord as recorded in our text. It was not less needful that these things should be hidden from the natural wisdom of men than that they should be revealed to babes. Hence the dear Redeemer could give thanks alike for both these manifestations of the sovereign will of the eternal Father.

There is deep significance in the time specified in our text, when "Jesus answered and said" what is here written. In the verse following this saying of our Lord he declares, "All things are delivered unto me of my Father." In this infinite favor of the eternal God he might well find occasion for thanksgiving. Yet even this is hidden from the sight of natural wisdom. Reason still says with the mocking chief priests and scribes and elders, "If he be the King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him." Not only would such a demonstration of his omnipotence have been tangible to the natural senses of men, but it would have given praise to their reason which suggested that condition as the basis of their believing the word of truth. But they were mistaken in regard to the effect which compliance with their own proposal would have produced upon them. Instead of causing them to believe him, it would have been a ground of exultation in their selfish pride, in that they had dictated that condition. Therefore they would have been confirmed in believing in themselves and in their own reason. The same false suggestion is still urged in the mind of the saints in their daily trials. Reason asks for such evidence as it can grasp; and because it is not presented, unbelief says their hope is all a delusion. Under the weight of such strong arguments as are thus arrayed against them, the trembling saints, if left to their own strength, would sink in hopeless discouragement. It is only when the Spirit of Christ by revelation shows the tried one his refuge in the perfect righteousness of Jesus, that he is able to rejoice and give thanks to God, because of his sovereign grace in saving his people from their sins. Since reason is not able to see this fact, it is ever found denying it. But when the testimony of the Spirit is revealed in the saints they are thereby made to believe and rejoice in the assurance that the God of their salvation has unlimited power over all things both in heaven and in earth. When firmly established in this truth they do not merely submit to it as an abstract point in the doctrine of God; by the Spirit of Christ which is in them they are made thankful that God has done all his will, both in hiding these things from the wise and prudent, and in revealing them unto babes. In no other way could salvation be brought to those who were without strength, destitute of righteousness, and justly condemned by the holy law of God. No hope could come to such sinners but that which is revealed in the sovereign grace of the omnipotent Savior of sinners. In the light of this revelation all who are led by the Spirit of God are by grace enabled to feel that same thankfulness which Jesus expressed in the text. It is only "at that time," however, that they have this gracious experience. As well might the benighted wanderer try to recall the light of noonday to illumine his midnight path, as the saint might seek to command the light of revelation at any time other than when it is given him by present manifestation of the Spirit. Every subject of divine grace must continually learn by experience with the psalmist to say, "My times are in thy hand." In spirit all such do rejoice that all things are delivered unto their gracious Redeemer, and with him they do thank God that he has not left these heavenly things to be learned by diligent study, or attained by brilliant powers of reason. Upon that system not one of the little babes in Christ, who feel their weakness, could have any hope in the salvation which God has provided for his chosen people. The grace which saves them must be sovereign, infinite, and omnipotent. Less than this will not bring them deliverance from the condemnation justly resting upon them. Such grace can be displayed only by that divine Savior who has all things in his own hands.

While it is impossible that reason should ever see the evidence of the gift of eternal life in any saint, it is manifested clearly through faith unto every one who has received the seal of the Spirit as an heir of that immortality which is revealed in Christ Jesus. The result of the opposing testimony of faith and reason in the same individual is a perpetual warfare between the flesh, which is guided by reason, and the spirit, which has the knowledge of divine truth revealed by faith for its direction. The flesh never can be reconciled to the government of God as controlling all events and all beings; much less can it be thankful that God has exercised his sovereign right in hiding from the wise and prudent those things which he has revealed unto babes. The unavoidable deduction from this fact is that every one who has the desire to be reconciled to the will of God, however he may mourn his own rebellious feelings, must certainly be led by the Spirit of God. Nature can never really feel the submissive disposition which is expressed in the closing words of our text.

"Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight." When brought to that point where they can honestly adopt the sentiment of this language of Jesus, his saints have already entered into that rest which remaineth to the people of God. Language fails, and the finite mind is lost in the effort to comprehend the unsearchable riches of Christ, as experienced by those who are led into this sacred dwelling place. They have received the victory which overcometh the world. They are favored to reign with their triumphant Lord and to bask in the glorious light of his countenance while thus lifted above self and all earthly allurements and desires. While harboring one wish at variance with the will of God, as manifested in his divine providence, we cannot truthfully say, "Even so." It is indeed a very solemn thing to pray to that God who sees the secret thoughts of the heart, and say to him, "Thy will be done!" when we feel a desire to dictate to him what his will should be. Consciousness of this truth often causes the trembling saints to hesitate even to cry out of their distresses unto the holy name of the Lord. The Lord has put his fear in their hearts, which causes them to see their own ignorance and sinfulness so clearly that they shrink from the thought of choosing their own pathway, or asking the Lord for what they think they desire. There is no surer evidence that one has the fear of the Lord than this trembling at the thought of calling upon his sacred name. Yet the accuser of the brethren often suggests to them that this very fear is an evidence against the genuineness of their hope in the salvation of God. From untold thousands of lips the words of this petition are daily uttered, while it is doubtful if many have ever thought of their true significance. Without the direction of the Spirit of Christ it is impossible that any one ever can really desire what these words express. Nature can never rise above itself sufficiently to wish for the subjection of its own desires even to the righteous will of God. Hence, all carnal worshipers are found dictating to their idols according to their own will, instead of praying in the submissive spirit which was in our Lord Jesus.

The whole work of our Lord in his humiliation, when he learned obedience by the things which he suffered, clearly shows that he sought not to convince the reason of men that he was the very Messiah. Had he designed to build his kingdom upon such a foundation, it would have been needful only that he should command the legions of angels to appear for his defense, and strike his opposers with terror and death. Such a display of his omnipotence would have been conclusive to the wise and prudent; and the princes of this world would have hastened to render homage to him. But this was not the will of the Father, which he came to fulfill. In that eternal will God hath chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him. That choice is the election of divine grace which is manifested in our Lord Jesus. It is "according to the will of God," and not subject to the capricious mind of sinful men. God has so effectually hidden these things of his Spirit from the wise and prudent that they cannot even seek to know them. There can be no desire to see these unsearchable things, which are thus hidden, until the Spirit of Christ has shined in the heart of the sinner, revealing the corruption and sin which are therein concealed. Wherever this light has entered there is already manifested that life which is "Christ in you the hope of glory." Reason cannot receive this revelation, but it is made known through the faith of the operation of God. The same subject of grace who has to mourn that his reason can find no evidence of his interest in the salvation of God, in the light of this revelation has the perfect assurance of knowledge by faith, enabling him to say, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Herein is the comfort and strength which this answer of our Lord bears to his afflicted and poor people. The desire for the light of this revelation by which they may say, "Even so, Father!" is positive evidence of the leading of the Spirit of God. All who have this desire are therefore certainly sons and heirs of God, and joint heirs with our Lord Jesus Christ. Thus the very sense of sin and rebellion against God under which they mourn, is made through that mourning to bear witness that they have received the revelation of that knowledge of God which is eternal life. Without the spirit of conformity to the will of God there could be no mourning over the sinful rebellion of their own carnal mind. In this manifestation of the Spirit's revelation has the victory, while reason is crucified with the affections and lusts of the flesh, to which it belongs.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Elder Lewis Seitz was born in Fairfield Co., Ohio, June 11th, 1820, and died June 3d, 1889, aged sixty-eight years, eleven months and twenty-three days.

His parents, John and Magdalena Seitz, moved to Seneca Co., Ohio, in 1823, where he became a member of the Old School Baptist Church called Honey Creek, in 1856, at which place he was ordained to the full work of the gospel ministry in March, 1866. The same year he moved to Wyandot Co., Ohio, where he died. He was married Oct. 13th, 1853, to Elizabeth B. Bretz, and to them were born one son and six daughters, who, with an afflicted widow, three brothers, and a host of brethren, friends and neighbors, were called to mourn the departure of a loving husband, a kind father, and a christian citizen.

The day before his death he preached with unusual liberty, about eighteen miles distant from home. The next day, about noon, he dropped dead near his yard gate, without a moment's warning, fulfilling to the letter a dream or vision given him in 1864, in which his Savior came to him and took him by the hand; and being asked by brother Seitz if he had come for him, he replied, "Not now, but I will come again for you." "Shall I suffer much in departing from this world?" he asked. He was answered that his death would be instantaneous and without a moment's warning. Within two weeks of his death he referred to this dream, as he had frequently done since it appeared, and fully believed in its fulfillment, and desired it to be related on his funeral occasion. He expected to attend, as a messenger from Rocky Fork Church, the Sandusky Association, which met June 7th; but he was called to the great association above. He was an able minister of the New Testament, and was a warm-hearted and feeling preacher.

His funeral was largely attended on June 5th, at Rocky Fork meeting-house, where memorial services were held by four of his ministering brethren and two of his intimate neighbors. According to his request, the vision above referred to was related to the assembled multitude. His face in death bore evidence of the spirit having departed in view of celestial beauties. Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord.

"Brother, farewell! No more shall we meet here on earth thy face to see;
But hope to meet in heaven above,
With all the saints, where all is love.

"While up and down life's way we go,
Mid mingled scenes of grief and woe,
To loss and sorrow, grief and pain,
You've bid adieu, sweet rest to gain.

"And now we bid farewell again—
Farewell, a last farewell to thee;
But hope to meet thee on the plain,
The plain of blest eternity."

THOMAS COLE.

ROYALTON, Ohio.

I AM requested by the bereaved family to announce in the columns of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES that our dear and aged sister, Mrs. Hannah Lane, of Corfu, Genesee Co., N. Y., departed this life May 28th, 1889, aged eighty-six years and ten months.

She was born July 27th, 1802, in Duanesburgh, Schenectady Co., N. Y., and was a daughter of Robert and Mary Scott. She moved with her parents to Sharon, Schoharie Co., N. Y., while yet in her infancy. At the age of nineteen she experienced a hope in Christ, and was baptized by Elder L. Marsh. She was a meek and devoted follower of her Lord and Master, always ready to strongly defend the Old School Baptist cause, and was greatly attached to the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. She was united in marriage June 16th, 1833, with Asher Lane, and has lived a widow fifty years. She leaves two daughters, Mrs. Mary E. Banton and Mrs. Nellie Louise McDonald, to mourn their loss; but they mourn not as those who have no hope. Their dear mother was so well prepared to die that she said they must not mourn for her, as she was going where all was peace. She was patient, uncomplaining and resigned, being conscious up to the last moment of her life. In May, 1888, she sent me two dollars to aid me in paying the Church History debt, and in April, 1889, four dollars more; and one of her last requests, which her daughter, Mrs. McDonald, has complied with, was to send me six dollars additional for the same purpose, expressing her sorrow for my motherless children. Of about a thousand contributions toward the debt, only three others, one of twenty dollars, and two others of fifteen dollars each, have been larger than this amount of twelve dollars, given by one who had lived a widow fifty years.

Sister Lane suffered with disease of the stomach quite severely during the last ten weeks of her stay on earth. She resided the last fourteen years in western New York, and lived and died with her youngest daughter, Mrs. N. L. McDonald.

SYLVESTER HASSELL.

WILLIAMSTON, N. C., June 12, 1889.

DIED—Sept. 28th, 1888, Fred J. Darland, son of G. H. and Lucinda Darland, aged three years and twenty-three days.

ALSO,

DIED—May 27th, 1889, of inflammation of the bowels, G. H. Darland. He was sick only five days, and suffered terrible agony the last day of his life. He realized that his time to depart had come, and told me to dry my tears, and that I had done my duty. He called for his little children, kissed them, and bade them good-by. I asked him if he was willing to go if it was God's will. He said he thought he was. O how hard it was to see him laid in the cold ground, and to think that we should see his loving face no more! He was a kind husband, always ready to sympathize with me. He has left three boys and two girls to mourn their loss of a kind father; but our loss is his eternal gain. O that I may be reconciled to God's holy will, and that he may give me strength, and guide me in the truth, and when my days of exile are ended, take me to that happy home where sickness, pain and death never can come, and where our blessed Redeemer lives. Your unworthy sister,

LUCINDA DARLAND.

PATAHA CITY, Garfield Co., Wash.

SISTER Sarah E. Daniel departed this life Jan. 23d, 1889, aged sixty-seven years, three months and twenty-four days.

Sister Daniel was the daughter of Daniel and Elizabeth Kenida. She was born in Duplin Co., N. C., and moved to Sumpter Co., Ga., in 1837. She was married in February, 1841, to Ezekiel Daniel, who departed this life in November, 1872. She joined Beulah Primitive Baptist Church, in Lee Co., Ga., in 1856, and was baptized by Elder Alison Culpeper. She moved from there to Ouachita Co., Ark., in 1867, and joined Bethesda Church by letter. She lived an orderly, christian life, and was a kind mother and companion. Her sickness was paralysis, and for eight months she was confined to the house, but bore it with christian fortitude.

She leaves five children, brethren and sisters, with many friends, to mourn. Two of her children were members of the church with her. May the Lord comfort those that mourn.

MARY E. McDONALD.

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. ### THE WORD OF GOD IN SYMBOLS AND SIMILITUDES--THE NUMBERS SEVEN AND TWELVE.

"AND being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks; and in the midst of the seven candlesticks one like unto the Son of man."—Rev. i. 12.

But notwithstanding the inheritance of the saints in the gospel kingdom, as typified by the land of Canaan, and the seven golden candlesticks are minutely described in the Old Testament Scriptures "by all his holy prophets since the world began," yet so long as the mighty vail of the temple remained in tact, by which the Holy Ghost signified "that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest," the whole was obscure, sealed to mortal vision. "And I saw in the right hand of him that sat upon the throne a book written within, and on the back side, sealed with seven seals." "And no man in heaven, nor in earth, neither under the earth, was able to open the book, neither to look thereon. And I wept much, because no man was found worthy to open and to read the book, neither to look thereon. And one of the elders saith unto me, Weep not: behold, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof." These seven seals, closing the seven parts of the book describing the antitypical Canaan, signified in particular what the vail of the temple did in general. They are not used to mark or identify, but to close from view. Being thus sealed by the omnipotent God, no one in heaven, nor on earth, was able to open the book or to look upon it until the Lion of the tribe of Judah should prevail to loose its seven seals. In that book was written all the events of his kingdom, however great, however small, from his death upon the cross to the turning aside of his parents upon their return from Egypt into a city of Galilee, a complete history of the seven candlesticks in the midst of which he walks.—Matt. ii. 22. "And I beheld, and, lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven Spirits of God, sent forth into all the earth. And he came and took the book out of the right hand of him that sat upon the throne. And when he had taken the book," "ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands," cried with a loud voice, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing."—Rev. v. It was not until after the Lamb had been slain that he took the book and loosed its seven seals. The idea prevails that the seven seals were the seven "divine attributes of the Deity," sealing the condemnation of man. But as a seal, to be opened, must be burst (the vail was rent), this would represent the bursting of the "attributes of Deity" in the release of man from condemnation. In our judgment, the seals were none other than those which closed to mortal vision "the hidden wisdom of God in a mystery," the thing which had been kept secret for ages; "which none of the princes of this world knew"—the spiritual meaning of the Old Testament Scriptures. Not only the princes of this world failed to understand the Scriptures, but even the chosen twelve could not understand when Christ told them that they must go up to Jerusalem, and that all things that were written by the prophets concerning the Son of man should be fulfilled, that he should be delivered unto the Gentiles, and spitefully entreated, and spitted upon, and scourged, and put to death, and that the third day he should rise again. "And they understood none of these things: and this saying was hid from them, neither knew they the things which were spoken."—Luke xviii. 31-34. Notwithstanding, as the Master told them, "Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead," yet they say, "Certain women also of our company made us astonished, which were early at the sepulchre," when they brought the news that Christ was risen from the dead.—Luke xxiv. 22. Notwithstanding the Scriptures, which were read every Sabbath day in the synagogues, and with which the Jews were so familiar, minutely described all these events, from the parting of his raiment to the very time that he should remain in the tomb, they were "astonished" to hear that he was risen from the dead! Does it not rather seem stranger to us now, since the vail is taken away, and the seven seals are loosed, so that "the invisible things of him from the foundation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead," that they should have been eye witnesses of all those events, and yet fail to understand them? They had seen him rebuke the winds of heaven, and stop the cyclone in its course; they had seen the raging of the waves of the sea instantly cease at his command; they had seen thousands of invalids restored to health and vigor by his word; they had seen him cast out devils and raise the dead; yea, they had cast out devils themselves in his name, and yet understood not; they had seen him "numbered with the transgressors" upon the cross, and put to death, "according to the Scriptures;" they had seen on that day the heavens grow dark, and the earth in convulsions; the rocks rent, and the vail of the temple, which hid from view the most holy place, torn asunder from top to bottom; they had seen all these things, and had from childhood read the prophecies which foretold them, and yet understood not. They were "astonished" to hear of his resurrection. "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken." "And beginning at Moses [Moses wrote the first five books] and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself."—Luke xxiv. 25, 27.

Abundant proof has been cited to show that the Scriptures were sealed to the understanding of the people until after Christ's resurrection. To quote all upon this point would be to transcribe a large portion of the New Testament. But when the appointed time arrived, "then opened he their understanding, that they might understand the Scriptures."—Luke xxiv. 45. The seals are loosed. We no more find them at a loss to understand the Scriptures. "When the day of Pentecost was fully come," and the happy saints speaking with tongues are accused of being drunk with new wine, Peter answered, "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel."—Acts ii. 16. When Jesus plainly told his disciples that which now seems so plainly taught in the Scriptures, "how that he must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day, Peter took him and began to rebuke him, saying, Be it far from thee, Lord."—Matt. xvi. 21, 22. But now when David says, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell," he readily understands that this is a prophecy of Christ's resurrection. Can we account for the utter inability of the disciples to understand the Scriptures until after the resurrection of Jesus, and their subsequent astonishing ability, unlearned as some of them were, except upon the ground that there was a time when they were sealed, and a time when they were unsealed, or opened to their understanding?

"And I saw when the Lamb opened one of the seals, and I heard, as it were the noise of thunder, one of the four beasts saying, Come and see." Come and see something that has hitherto been hid from mortal vision; something brought to light, or revealed. The very book from which these words are taken is styled by inspiration "The Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to shew unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass;" not in heaven, not in hell, but upon the earth, among men; things which must come to pass from now to the end of time; things with which every individual stands connected, and in which every one has an interest; and therefore to every one, the time for his part is at hand. Hence it is said, "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things that are written therein: for the time is at hand."—Rev. i. 3. This book is not, as it is too often construed, something in the line of a moral code; but it is a book of "prophecy," a revelation of events which must come to pass; a history of the future. "Come and see"—see something that has been kept secret, "sealed," since the foundation of the world; something that although written and seemingly revealed, has until now been concealed. "Come and see."

"And I saw, and behold a white horse: and he that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given unto him: and he went forth conquering, and to conquer."—Rev. vi. 2. "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all."—Psa. civ. 24. "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was. When there were no depths, I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water." "When he prepared the heavens, I was there: when he set a compass upon the face of the depth." "When he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment: when he appointed the foundations of the earth: then I was by him, as one brought up with him; and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him; rejoicing in my habitable part of the earth; and my delights were with the sons of men."—Prov. viii. 22-31. "Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect: yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to naught: but we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory."—1 Cor. ii. 7. "Known unto God are all his works from the foundation of the world."—Acts xv. 18. There is a sense in which "the works were finished from the foundation of the world."—Heb. iv. 3. "The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun. Is there anything whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath already been of old time, which was before us."—Eccl. i. 9, 10. It has become a proverb among men, doubtless from observation, that "coming events cast their shadows before them." But while they use the doctrine contained in it, at the bar, in the halls of Congress, and in the political press, whenever it suits them in argument, yet they become enraged and inspired and profane, is full of it. Our own daily experience, if we would but notice, proves it. When Jacob, through fear of Esau, divided his children and flocks into two bands, he probably only thought of giving Rachel and her children a chance to escape, in case the others were destroyed. But in the light of the history of his posterity, from the days of Jereboam and Rehoboam on, this little affair becomes wonderfully significant. "With my staff I crossed over this Jordan; and now I am become two bands."—Gen. xxxii. 10. In the very creation of man, he was made "the figure of him that was to come." When a sign or figure of a coming event or thing is given, it must be according to the representation made by the figure in every particular, or the figure to that extent proves false; hence there can be nothing contingent about an event or thing that is in any way foretold. From the time of the giving of the figure or prophecy, at least, the thing foretold must be determined in all its bearings, or the figure or impression could not be given. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth."—Gen. i. 26. Apparently speaking of this literal dominion given to man in creation, "one in a certain place testified, What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou visitest him? Thou madest him a little lower than the angels; thou crownedst him with glory and honor, and didst set him over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet."—Heb. ii. 6-8. But by inspiration this is shown to prefigure the dominion of him who in the opening of the first seal is seen seated upon a white horse, with a bow and a crown, going forth conquering and to conquer. Before man can exercise his dominion "over all the earth," he must conquer its wild elements to his service. When we behold millions of horses and cattle and other animals toiling patiently day after day; when we see even the antagonistic elements of fire and water harnessed into his triumphal car, which, though freighted with a load almost sufficient for an army of men, rushes onward with the most astonishing velocity, devouring the distance by miles and by leagues; when we see a Franklin lassoing, as it were, the very lightning of heaven, and a Morse making it speak the English language, and it is forthwith sent as his messenger, outriding the sun in its course round the earth; when we see all these things, great and magnificent and gigantic and astonishing, as the dominion of man appears "over all the earth," over all creation, both animate and inanimate; it is but a similitude, of the dominion of him who "must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet." Again, on some calm, still night we may pass through the camps of the army of an earthly king; no foe is near, and they are sleeping, as it were, in the very embrace of death. But by the voice of their king, though he be but a mortal like they, this sleeping host can be in a few moments transformed into a living whirlwind of destruction, trampling mercilessly under foot everything that resists its course. If "where the word of a [earthly] king is there is power," how much more him who hisses for the fly that is in the uttermost part of Egypt, and it comes at his command; who commands the ravens (and they did not learn to obey in a Sunday School either), and they feed his servant; yea, the very pillars of heaven tremble and are astonished at his reproof.

Now that the seals are loosed, "the invisible things of him from the foundation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead."

"And he went forth conquering, and to conquer." Although "by the working of his mighty power" he is able to, and will, "subdue all nations unto himself," will "put all things under his feet," yet "a bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory."—Matt.

xii. 20. Although "the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke i. 33), yet he himself compares his kingdom at first to a mustard seed, which is indeed the least of all seeds; but when it is grown up it becomes a great tree, so that the fowls of the air lodge in its branches. Ah, to the limited view of mortals; what was the size of this kingdom when the two disciples journeying toward the village called Emmaus, as they walked and were sad, and could only say, "But we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel?" But now they could not say, "We trust," but, "We trusted." How weak! how feeble! Their faith is so near gone that they cannot realize that it yet exists; but they remember that they had "trusted." Ah, feeble one, can thy faith survive? Is this the victory that overcomes the world?

Can it be possible that this is the stone that was cut out of the mountain without hands, that was to become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth? Few and feeble as it now appears, it has started on its march to victory, and the eternal pillars of heaven are no more sure. "The Lord their God is with them, and the shout of a king is among them."—Heb. i. 8-12. "He hath as it were the strength of a unicorn."—Num. xxiii. 21, 22. When it grows sufficiently to attract attention, it is not to obtain either help or sympathy among men of the world, but to provoke the frantic efforts of men and devils at its own extermination. "These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also."—Acts xvii. 6. When it first attracts the attention of governors, it is regarded as "certain questions of their own superstition, and of one Jesus, which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive."—Acts xxv. 19. But now it draws the attention of great men of the earth, and the edicts of emperors, popes and kings are issued to stay its progress, and the earth is deluged in the blood of her sons, and they are seen evaporating in flames, until "When he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and the testimony which they held."—Rev. vi. 9. Still, without the use of carnal weapons, this kingdom, the seven golden candlesticks, in the midst of which walks her King, moves onward, until (as is seen through the opening of the sixth seal) she has produced a fearful tumult in the earth. Though inoffensive as sheep, and harmless as doves, without weapons of aggression, and none of defense, but the oath and promise of her God, she seems to have produced such commotion in the elements that "there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heavens departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places. And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in dens and in the rocks of the mountains, and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne."—Rev. vi. 12-16. He went forth conquering, and to conquer.

"He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness; he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye."—Deut. xxxii. 10.

The Scriptures of truth furnish us with a very interesting history of a certain family to whom God manifested himself in a very striking manner; and those manifestations present to us in a lively imagery the principles and glory of God's discriminating grace, or that grace which was given the saints in Christ Jesus before the world began, who are represented and brought to view in the text. It is very natural for us to inquire, and is, perhaps, the first inquiry which strikes the mind on reading the text, who it was the Lord found in a desert land, and in a waste howling wilderness. We are told in the ninth verse that it was Jacob. In this verse we are told that the Lord's portion and Jacob are one and the same. In the examination of this point, if we rightly apprehend it, there is a sublime glory brought to view, and much is wrapped up in it that will instruct the mind in the great and glorious economy of God's grace. Grand and sublime beyond description have ever been the manifestations of God in the revelation of his grace to his chosen seed. He revealed himself to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and declared unto them that he was their God. When we contemplate the discriminating grace of Jehovah, we cannot, perhaps, find a more instructive manifestation than the one now before us. In the history of Jacob and Esau we trace in lively characters the sovereignty of God, and therein discover the unfolding of the eternal purpose of Jehovah, and the sovereignty of his will, in having mercy upon whom he will have mercy. The reasoning of the natural man is, that originally, and in the purpose of God in the great plan of salvation, all mankind stand in the same relation to him, and that in his purpose the provisions were so ordered that the will of man should control the result. Such are the reasonings of blind nature, and such are the theories which have been instituted through the ignorance and blindness of the mind of men. But it becomes christians to turn away from nature's reasonings, and listen to what God the Lord hath said; for he hath given them line upon line, and precept upon precept. Surely the Lord hath spoken in relation to both Jacob and Esau. The eternal One, who is of one mind, and changeth not, hath said that he loved the one and hated the other. Must not this love therefore be the production of the obedience of the one, and the disobedience of the other? Must they not be born into the world, and must not their conduct decide this point? Carnal reasoning at once answers, Yes. To this sentiment responds the wisdom of this world. But the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. The word of God upon this question is, "For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth, it was said unto her [their mother], The elder shall serve the younger. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated."—Rom. ix. 11-13. Possibly some may take the ground that God loved Jacob because he had pious parents, and that they had extended to him that preparation which they contend is the duty of pious parents to bestow upon their children, and are consequently made lovely in the sight of the Lord, and prepared for an acceptance with him. But this is a mistake. God said that he loved Jacob, and hated Esau, before they were born. Besides this, they had the same parents; and we have the greatest reason to believe that the father, at least, lavished his affections, tenderness and anxiety quite as much upon Esau as upon Jacob. We cannot therefore find the difference here; but we do find it in the purpose and predestinating will of God. If any are curious to know why this was the will of God, they will do well to listen to what Jesus has said about it, and be still, and know that the Lord is God. Said the Redeemer, "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight."

But where did the Lord find Jacob? Here we will introduce Jesus, whom God hath made both Lord and Christ. Did the Lord find Jacob in the garden of God, in a pure and innocent state, or did he find him in the desert, and waste howling wilderness, and under the law and its awful curse? Here, methinks, he found all Jacob, all the spiritual or true Israel of God. This finding must refer to their time state and natural condition through the fall.

Jacob did not find the Lord, but the Lord found him; and he found him in the state and condition described in the text, compared to a desert land and a waste howling wilderness. "And he led him about, and instructed him, and kept him as the apple of his eye." Some vainly imagine that they know all about the things of God, and that they know the way, and are able to travel on to heaven without a leader; and it is no uncommon thing to hear such ones contradicting and condemning the truth of God, and passing judgment upon that of which they know nothing, only, as Jude says, "What they know naturally as brute beasts; and in those things they corrupt themselves." But Jacob was lost, and needed to be found; was ignorant, and needed instruction; was helpless, and needed leading; and these things the Lord did unto him. If we view the subject in its spiritual light, all must admit that he had been made alive spiritually, for a dead man could not be instructed and led about. "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Until there is a communication of spiritual, eternal life to man, which was spoken of by the Savior when he said, "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live," there can be in men no spiritual capabilities, no spiritual discernment or action whatever. But when they are made alive, they see how ignorant and weak they are, and are prepared to receive instruction. God has said, "And I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known; I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them."

The Lord not only found Jacob in a desert land, and in a waste howling wilderness, and led him about, and instructed him, but he also kept him as the apple of his eye. The rage of Esau, the perils and dangers by the way in his journey to a distant land, while he journeyed lonely and unprotected by any human arm, could not set on him to hurt him, for God was with him to lead and keep him. It was at a time when, we may suppose, the presence of the Lord would be most cheering to him, that he appeared to him, saying, "I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Israel. The land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed. And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth; and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south: and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed. And, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of." During his journey onward, and his sojourn in Laban's house, he had the most convincing proof that God was with him, and that he kept him as the apple of his eye; and he was finally brought back to his own land, as the Lord had promised; and the Lord did not leave him until he had fulfilled all his promise unto him. It was on his return to the place which God had given to him, and to his seed in him, that he was blessed with that most wonderful display of God's love and mercy unto him and his seed. Jacob wrestled all night with the angel of the Lord, and prevailed not, until the break of day. Then the angel touched him, and he lost his own strength, and halted, being unable to wrestle longer. He then prevailed, and received the new name of Israel. Spiritual or true Israel is the name of all the family of God, the seed of Christ, and it belongs to no other seed. The Lord has said, "In thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." That seed is Christ, who is the head and life of the whole family. "He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ," who is the head and life of every member of the body or family. If we now turn our attention to the context, we shall at once see that the name Jacob embraced all Israel. "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. For the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance. He found him in a desert land, and in a waste howling wilderness." Here we see that the church is the inheritance of Christ. Where the members were in their fallen and polluted state, there did Christ go. He went unto them, and bore their miseries and reproaches, and redeemed them from all their troubles. He was made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law. He was made a curse for them; as it is written, "Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree." But was the church in her fallen state really wretched and polluted? Let the voice of inspiration answer. When the Lord God commanded the prophet Ezekiel to cause Jerusalem to know her abominations, all Jerusalem was embraced in the message. What was their condition? There was no eye to pity them, for the law knows neither pity nor mercy; there was none to have compassion on them, for there is no compassion in the law; and they were cast into the open field, to the loathing of their own persons, and were weltering in their own blood. But they can have no just idea of this until after they are made alive from the dead; yet it nevertheless shows where the Mediator found them in their fall in Adam.

If they are thus polluted, wretched and miserable, condemned by the law, with no eye to pity, none to have compassion on them, in a desert land, wandering in a waste howling wilderness, is there any fountain of mercy to be opened for them? Is there any one to find them and turn them about, to lead, instruct and keep them? Yes; and let the glad tidings spread abroad. While shepherds are watching their flocks by night, they are visited suddenly by a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and saying, "Glory to God in the highest." "Unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord." May all the redeemed of the Lord sing his glory in rapturous song. The star appears in the east and travels onward, a guide to the wise men; and it leads them to Jesus of Bethlehem. No human directions can reveal him, or lead to the place where he is; but an infallible guide leads them onward, until it comes where the Savior is, and then and there it stops. Its mission is now at an end. All glory centers in Christ; and when we find him, we find the substance, and here we rest in fond delight. But will not this Jesus be ashamed of these outcasts, who are ashamed of and abhor themselves? By no means; for they are bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh. "For both he that sanctifieth, and they who are sanctified, are all of one; for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren; saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren: in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee." He is not ashamed of his brethren, though they have sinned, and are all polluted, and are cast out into the open field, and are exposed to all the tempests and storms of wrath, and are in the desert, where there are no supplies. Though in the wilderness, and wandering away, with none to pity, lead or protect them, Jesus has redeemed them from this awful curse, in being made a curse for them. He will lead them about, instruct them, and keep them as the apple of his eye. He loves them, for they are bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh. No man ever yet hated his own flesh, but cherisheth it, and nourisheth it, even as the Lord the church. There can be no mercy flowing to the children of God but what is traceable to this vital union with God our Father, in Christ.

"Ye saints, this union can't dissolve,
By which all things are yours;
Long as eternal years revolve,
Or Deity endures."

As the Lord found Jacob as an individual, and gave him promise, and performed all things for him, even so will he find all the heirs of promise, and manifest and apply the blessings of that promise unto them, and watch over them, and keep them with that same jealous care.

We shall now attempt to trace, in a slight manner, some of the dealings of God with them, in putting them into the enjoyed possession of these blessings of heirship. It is true that, in relation to situation and condition in worldly circumstances and matters, there may be and is a great difference with the children of God; but relative to their standing before God, and under the condemnation of the law, and in their spiritual relation to Christ, their preservation and final triumph in him, it is a unit. The Lord said, "And I will bring the blind by a way that they know not." God not only finds his people, but he brings them to himself. We should not so blend this finding with the bringing as to make them in all respects the same thing, and represent God as coming to the sinner's terms. The Lord finds or appears to his children when he communicates spiritual or eternal life to them. In a state of nature they are dead in trespasses and sins; and when eternal life is communicated, they are capable of being instructed. Now, as we have said, God does not come to the sinner's terms, but he brings his people to bow with holy gratitude to him. When God brings and reconciles his people to himself experimentally, he humbles their proud heart, and makes them feel its awful depravity, its enmity to God, and makes them feel their extreme wretchedness, helplessness and poverty. He shows them that they are lost, that they are in a desert land, which can yield them no supplies; that they are in a wilderness, surrounded with sorrow and death. He effectually teaches them, takes their own strength from them, and Jacob-like, they can do nothing more than to halt. All Israel shall be thus found by and led experimentally to the Lord. "For thus saith the Lord, Sing with gladness for Jacob, and shout among the chief of the nations: publish ye, praise ye, and say, O Lord, save thy people, the remnant of Israel. Behold, I will bring them from the north country, and gather them from the coasts of the earth, and with them the blind and the lame. They shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them: I will cause them to walk by rivers of water in a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble: for I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is my first-born."—Jer. xxxi. 7-9.

We have already noticed the loss of strength and the halting of Jacob; and so it is with all who are brought experimentally to rejoice in the salvation of God. They must not only be found, but they must be turned from all human strength and helpers, to Christ and his strength; for there is no spiritual strength in any other. Christians in their experience learn something of this truth. They, like that poor, helpless creature who sat by the pool, when Jesus came to him (and all who are brought to that place will soon see the adorable Redeemer as their Savior; for he sees them before they see him; and he it is that hath brought them there; and he hath brought them there to manifest unto them his healing power) realize and know that they do not possess the ability to reach the healing fountain; and unless God has mercy on them they must perish in their sins. What a mercy it is that Jesus is ever with such, although they knew it not; and that before death can seize the broken-hearted mourner, Jesus stretches forth his hand, and takes the poor beggar from the dust of the earth, and seats him among princes, and gives him the throne of glory. But before this, like the poor beggar who had never walked nor stood upright in his life, but sat begging at the gate of the temple called Beautiful, they can neither stand nor walk until Christ is revealed to them as their wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption, and is made manifest unto them in healing power as their only and sufficient strength. But what was the effect which was produced by the revelation of Christ to this poor begging creature? Did he fold his arms and sink into slumber? By no means. With a heart overflowing with gratitude, in strength which he had just received, and in a perfect soundness which he had never before possessed, with joyful haste and heavenly emotions he goes into the temple of God, leaping, and praising God, in the flood-tide of the holy joys of salvation, having Christ within him, the hope of glory. The lame man leaps as a heart, the tongue of the dumb sings, waters break out in the desert, and pools in the wilderness.

The Lord finds, leads, instructs, keeps and saves all his children, as it is written, "And so all Israel shall be saved." "For the Deliverer shall come out of Zion, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." The Savior said, "It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me." When Christians are first taught to rejoice in God, and to sing the new song, many of them are ready to suppose that their sorrows and fears, temptations and buffetings, are now at an end. But they soon find themselves mistaken. While it is a never-failing and most heart-cheering truth that God has taken them out of the horrible pit and the miry clay, and put a new song into their mouth, and established their goings, yet they have many trials to endure, and many temptations to encounter. Various indeed are the exercises they are led through; and it is in passing through these fiery trials, awful temptations, gloomy doubts and shaking fears, that they learn how high and deep, how long and broad, the covenant of peace is; what glorious provisions God has treasured up in Christ for them; how glorious and mighty Christ is, as their Prophet, Priest and King; that they may know how precious he is unto them; how rich God is in mercy; that they may be exercised by all these things, and rejoice therein, that God's glory may be thereby made manifest in the earth. Though these things attend them, they shall never fail. Their spiritual life can never be taken, for it is hid with Christ in God. Jesus has said to all his brethren, "Because I live, ye shall live also." They can never be lost, for Jesus keeps them, and underneath and around about are the everlasting arms. Jesus will bring them all off more than conquerors through himself; for he loved them, and gave himself for them. He it is that leads them like a flock, guides them with the skillfulness of his hands, and feeds them in the integrity of his heart. Almost any savior will do for some professors, those who are gliding along in a silver-slipper religion; and almost any pilot will do where all know the way, where there are neither billows, rocks, nor dangers of any kind; but the Lord leads his children in that way which they knew not, and through those perils and dangers that none but he can, who is enthroned in light and glory, and whom the winds and the sea obey. None other can do them any good. None but Jesus can be sufficient for them. He leads them in that way, and teaches them those lessons, that they may cast off all confidence in the flesh, and cast all their cares on him, knowing in whom they have believed, and being fully persuaded that he is able to keep that which they have committed unto him. He will keep the feet of the saints, while the wicked are silent in darkness; for by strength shall no man prevail. Hence, ye trembling, doubting and fearing saints, look unto Jesus, the author and finisher of your faith. He hath said unto you, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."—Isa. xlii. 2. If we have any faith or experience that waters can drown, or the fire can consume, the sooner we are divested of them the better. The Christian has a faith and an experience as high and as imperishable as Christ, who is enthroned at the right hand of the Majesty on high; and no waters can ever flood the throne, neither can any fire ever reach it. Though our pathway may lead us over what appears to us as troublesome hills, insurmountable mountains, and impassable seas and rivers, let us remember that the Lord is our Leader and Keeper, and that he goes before. Before him the mountains flee, and the rivers are dried up. If we are the sheep of his pasture, we can adopt the song of David, and sing, "What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back? Ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams; and ye little hills, like lambs? Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the God of Jacob."—Psa. cxiv. 5-7.

May the Lord enable us, dear brethren, to put our trust in him, and may we, like the blessed disciple of old, lean on Jesus, and cast all our cares on him, knowing that he careth for us. May it be his pleasure to give unto us such manifestations of his presence, power and protecting care, that we can say with David, "By my God I have run through a troop, and by my God I have leaped over a wall." May we be enabled ever to realize that the Lord found us in a desert land, and in a waste howling wilderness, that he led us about, instructed us, and that he keeps us as the apple of his eye.

A HALTING ONE.

"WALK as children of the light."—Eph. v. 8.

The foregoing has been impressed upon my mind to offer to the dear readers of the SIGNS.

In the first place we will notice the subjects addressed. Paul was not addressing the unregenerate, as the world would presume. I would here say that there is not an epistle in the Bible addressed to any but the living subjects, who have passed from death unto life. Paul addresses the church at Rome, church at Corinth, churches of Galatia, church of Ephesus, &c. Peter writes to the elect according to the foreknowledge of God, who are begotten again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ. John writes to the "elect lady and her children." Jude writes to them who are "sanctified by God the Father, preserved in Jesus Christ, and called." John writes to "the seven churches which are in Asia." Jesus spake to his followers, and admonished them. The Old Testament is to Israel. Hence there is none addressed to the world in a state of nature. I have no impressions to preach to any but living subjects. The subject heading this article was addressed to those who "were sometime darkness," but are now "light [not offered light upon conditions for the creature to preform] in the Lord." They were once strangers and foreigners, far off, but are now made nigh by the blood of Christ, and become equal citizens in the family of grace. Once they were dead, but now they are alive, being quickened into life by the Spirit; being born again, being regenerated, being delivered from under the law of sin and death. They are now spoken of as children of the day, and not of the night. Now, brethren, you who have been so abundantly blessed, "walk as children of the light." First, in the assembling of yourselves together to worship God at your stated meetings. Some have become very careless and indifferent in this respect. A short time ago I was at a church that numbered perhaps fifty, or nearly so, and there were not more than ten or twelve members present. Some were at one place, and some at another.

One was engaged as a clerk in a bar-room, and could not take time to go to meeting. I do not think it right for brethren to engage in any employment that will prohibit them from going to their meetings and worshipping God. I would be glad if Primitive Baptists would stay out of such places. I believe we would get along better, and it would not give the gainsayers room to talk. You should not wait till your meeting days to go to mill, or to have your log-rollings. You should not put the ox in the ditch on Friday, so that you will have to pull him out on Saturday of your meeting. You can stay away from meeting and live after the flesh till you will die, to a great extent, and become lifeless. Did you not say by your actions, when you joined the church, that you were no longer of the world, and that you had turned your back upon the world, to follow Jesus? Then why will you go back into disobedience again, walking in darkness, or after the allurements of the flesh? Let us not sleep, as do others: but awake, and be sober. Children of God, do not fall asleep to this important duty of assembling yourselves together to worship the Lord. Remember the many weary days the poor pastor has to leave his family, as a widowed mother and orphaned children, and travel through heat and cold, to serve you; and yet you cannot meet him once a month. Do you love him as a pastor? If you do, you will desire to hear him preach, and to be with him. Where your treasure is, there your heart will be also. If your treasure is in Jesus, you desire to be with those that bear his image. Meet often, and talk about the goodness of God, and hold up the hands of the preacher, and encourage him by your presence. Many times the minister leaves home in great distress, feeling that the Lord is clean gone, that he will never have any more liberty, and that it is impossible for him to preach. Thus he goes to the meeting house, and meets about half a dozen, and they are talking about their cotton, sugar cane, tobacco, cattle, &c, and Jesus is not mentioned. And now what an awful task! The poor one feels like he cannot speak, for the brethren are not exhibiting any light, but all darkness. When you meet, assemble in the house, sing praises to God and show by your actions that you appreciate your meeting together, and it will be animating to your preacher.

Secondly, we are not walking as children of light should walk, in regard to letting brotherly love continue. My heart has been made to bleed to see the indifference among the saints toward each other. It seems that some brethren have almost thrown one another away, and the topic of conversation among the saints seems to be pointing out the faults of brethren, and making them appear as ridiculous as possible. When they meet they can barely shake hands, and many times just say, "Howdy?" and pass on like they were speaking to a worldling, and do not brother him. I do not like to see such things among us. I want to see Baptists shake hands up to the thumb, and call each other brother and sister when they meet. Where love is existing, we cannot see many faults among our brethren, and we are watching one another for good, and are walking as children of the light. It is a shame to hear the dear brethren talking about each other to the world. If any are overtaken in faults, they that are spiritual should restore such in the spirit of meekness. "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice: and be kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." "Be ye followers of God as dear children, and walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savor. But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints; neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which is not convenient; but rather giving of thanks." "He that hateth his brother abideth in death." "Love is of God; and he that loveth is born of God." "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." "Let brotherly love continue." Let us so act, by an orderly walk and godly conversation, and the regard that we should show toward our brethren, that nothing will hinder a continuation of that love. Brethren can act in such a manner as to cause confidence to be lost, and that love to a great extent will cease. Hence the necessity of our walking as children of light, and letting our light shine. Those who follow Jesus should be very careful to tell the truth at all times, to pay their just debts, to live soberly, and let their communication be yea, yea, and nay, nay, and shun every appearance of evil. Why is it that you love some better than others? It is because they bear the image of Jesus more. We cannot expect love to exist among us, if we have unsound doctrine among us. We should put all such out from among us, and keep the house clean from all errors. Then the light will shine so brilliantly that you can find the peice of silver that was lost, and the brethren will come and rejoice with you, seeing that you have set yourself in order. Avoid all unsound preachers, that would have a tendency to divide asunder the flock of God. "Avoid them." The church should watch preachers. Watch well your pulpits, for there is where heresy and confusion often enters Zion. If any fail to bring the true doctrine, do not receive them into your house, nor bid them God speed.

There are many things that have a tendency to get brethren separated, and we should watch such, and keep it out. If the church would be more strict in her discipline, more love would abound. Then, little children, walk worthy of the vocation wherewith Christ hath called you, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love, endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. There is one body and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling. "One Lord, one faith, one baptism." Then you are one, all born of the same parentage, all brethren and sisters in the Lord, all heirs to the same inheritance. When we are dwelling together in unity, it adds much to our enjoyment here. It is not simply enough to say that I love my brethren, and never prove it by my actions. If a brother is in need, or afflicted, and you shut up the bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth that love in you? Actions speak louder than words. Let us prove that we love one another by our actions.

We ought to visit each other when in distress, and administer to the necessities of the poor. That proves that we love them. Brethren many times will say to a poor preacher, "I love you; I love to hear you preach;" yet the poor minister has to toil very hard, and be gone a great portion of his time from his family; and some never love him well enough to supply his needs. There are but very few churches here that bear a preacher's traveling expenses. Hence the result is that our preachers are generally the very poorest class, having to be gone so much from home, and having to depend upon their labor for their entire support. My opinion is that the brethren would get along better if they were to make some sacrifice upon their part, and help the preacher by bearing a part of the burden.

Remember the poor wife he has to leave, and his poor children; and many times they are in want. Brethren, discharge your duty; show that you love them. Upon the other hand, if your preacher is working for the fleece, and will not agree to serve you without pay, you had better let him alone. One should love a church, and feel weighted with it, before he consents to serve it, and should not be influenced by money. The true preacher, who has the cause at heart, will go and serve the brethren, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind, for the love he has for them.

Some of the sweetest meetings I ever enjoyed were when I walked from twenty to thirty-five miles to be with the brethren. It seemed that I was more humble, and realized my dependence to a greater degree upon the Savior. Now I can walk but very little, as I am so very feeble, and have heart disease, dyspepsia, and am almost paralyzed in my lower limbs. But I feel like I would go to meet my dear brethren if I had to almost crawl, for my sweetest enjoyment is when I have a few moments to spend with the dear saints. I love that light that is existing among the saints. Jesus is their light, and none follow him but the children of light. If you follow Jesus, you will evidently walk in the light, for in him is no darkness at all. If ye walk in that light, as he is the light, ye will have fellowship one for another. O that Zion could ever be as a city set upon a hill, whose light cannot be hid. But O what inbred corruption, that groaning within on the account of sin! O that we could live nearer and nearer to Jesus! I am made to abhor myself, and hate my own life, when I see how sinful I am. I cannot control my wicked thoughts, and often think that surely, were I a christian, I would not be so vile and sinful. But, blessed hope! The creature itself also shall be delivered from this bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God." Then we shall be satisfied, when we awake, with the likeness of Jesus. Then our bodily sufferings, and all jars and schisms, will cease, and we will enter that sweet and blessed rest in that haven of repose, where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest. Sometimes in my great sufferings I can say,

"Reach down, reach down thine arm of grace,
And cause me to ascend,
Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbath's never end."

May the Lord bless and spare you long, brethren Beebe, together with Elders Durand, Chick, Purington, and all the dear writers of the SIGNS, to write such sweet messages of love to the little ones.

A poor boy in hope. Remember me.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Although my mother is a subscriber to the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, I (having been absent from home for some time) have not had the privilege of reading it. I am not aware that the SIGNS has contained anything in reference to the Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by Senator Blair, of New Hampshire, last session, and which is now pending in the United States Senate. I inclose herewith a copy of the proposed Amendment, and ask that you will give us the benefit of your ideas as to the propriety of making it the duty of the teachers in our common schools to instruct children in the principles of the christian religion. Does not the first beast, described in Revelation xiii. 1-10, symbolize the papacy? Was not that bloody and tyrannical power developed as the result of the establishment by Constantine of christianity as the religion of the Roman Empire? Is not false Protestantism symbolized by the beast described in Revelation xiii. 11-17? Would not a complete image to the papal beast be formed, should false Protestantism secure the aid of the civil power to enforce its false christianity?

Would not a religious amendment of any kind to our National Constitution tend to subvert the principles upon which our government is founded? *

[The following circular, forwarded with the above letter, is a condensed statement of the proposition for a legal definition of Christianity, with the sentiments of prominent statesmen upon the subject. It is worthy of the attention of our readers.—Ed.]

THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

SHALL IT BE PRESERVED AS IT IS?

"Every man who conducts himself as a good citizen, is accountable alone to God for his religious faith, and should be protected in worshipping God according to the dictates of his own conscience."—George Washington.

"Religion is not in the purview of human government. Religion is essentially distinct from government, and exempt from its cognizance. A connection between them is injurious to both."—James Madison.

"Almighty God hath created the mind free; all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burdens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the holy Author of our religion, who, being Lord both of body and mind, yet chose not to propagate it by coercion on either, as was in his almighty power to do. To compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves, is sinful and tyrannical. Be it therefore enacted by the General Assembly that no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry, whatsoever; nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burdened, in his body or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer, on account of his religious opinions or belief; but that all men shall be free to profess, and by argument to maintain, their opinions in matters of religion, and that the same shall in no wise diminish, enlarge, or affect their civil capacities.

"We are free to declare, that the rights hereby asserted are the natural rights of mankind; and that if any act shall be hereafter passed to repeal the present, or narrow its operation, such act will be an infringement of natural right."—Thos. Jefferson, in General Assembly of Virginia, 1785.

"The only proper objects of civil government are the happiness and protection of men in the present state of existence; the security of the life, liberty, and property of the citizen; and to restrain and encourage the virtuous by wholesome laws equally extended to every individual: but the duty that we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can only be directed by reason and conviction, and is nowhere cognizable but at the tribunal of the universal Judge. To judge for ourselves, and to engage in the exercise of religion agreeably to the dictates of our own conscience, is an inalienable right, which, upon the principles on which the gospel was first propagated, and the reformation from popery carried on, can never be transferred to another."—Presbytery of Hanover, Va., 1776.

"It is not the legitimate province of the Legislature to determine what religion is true or what false. Our government is a civil and not a religious institution. Our Constitution recognizes in every person the right to choose his own religion, and to enjoy it freely, without molestation. The proper object of government is to protect all persons in the enjoyment of their civil as well as their religious rights, and not to determine for any whether they shall esteem one day above another, or esteem all days alike holy. What other nations call religious toleration, we call religious rights. They are not exercised in virtue of governmental indulgence, but as rights of which government cannot deprive any portion of citizens, however small. Despotism may invade those rights, but justice still confirms them."—U. S. Senate, 1829.

"Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the church, and the private school, supported entirely by private contribution. Keep the State and the Church forever separate."—U. S. Grant.

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."—U. S. Constitution.

"MY KINGDOM IS NOT OF THIS WORLD." "RENDER THEREFORE UNTO CÆSAR THE THINGS WHICH ARE CÆSAR'S; AND UNTO GOD THE THINGS THAT ARE GOD'S."—Jesus Christ.

As the United States Constitution now stands, there is a total separation between religion and the State; but when the proposed Amendment shall have been adopted, there will be a union. Which of these shall we favor? is the question before us. The Amendment to which we refer is sometimes called the "Blair Educational Amendment," but it would more properly be called the "Church and State Amendment," or the "Blair Religious Amendment" to the Constitution of the United States, because that is what it really is.

The Amendment is as follows:

SECTION 1. No State shall ever make or maintain any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

SEC. 2. Each State in this Union shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools adequate for the education of all the children living therein between the ages of six and sixteen years inclusive, in the common branches of knowledge, and in virtue, morality, and the principles of the Christian religion. But no money raised by taxation imposed by law, or any money, or other property, or credit belonging to any municipal organization, or to any State, or to the United States, shall ever be appropriated, applied, or given to the use or purposes of any school, institution, corporation, or person, whereby instruction or training shall be given in the doctrines, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances peculiar to any sect, denomination, organization, or society, being or claiming to be, religious in its character; nor shall such peculiar doctrines, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances, be taught or inculcated in the free public schools.

SEC. 3. To the end that each State, the United States, and all the people thereof, may have and preserve governments republican in form and in substance, the United States shall guaranty to every State, and to the United States, the support and maintenance of such a system of free public schools as is herein provided.

SEC. 4. That Congress shall enforce this Article by legislation when necessary.

This Amendment to the national Constitution has been presented by Senator Blair, and is now pending in Congress. It is a singular sort of document, though hardly any more so than was to be expected in the promotion of the purpose which underlies it, i. e., the establishment of a national religion. The proposed Amendment is just about as flatly self-contradictory as any proposition could be. Section 1 reads:

"No State shall ever make or maintain any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

The first sentence of Section 2 reads:

"Each State in this Union shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools adequate for the education of all children living therein between the ages of six and sixteen years inclusive, in the common branches of knowledge, and in virtue, morality, and the principles of the Christian religion."

That is to say, No State shall ever make or maintain a law respecting an establishment of religion; but every State in this Union shall make and maintain laws establishing the principles of the Christian religion. And to make assurance doubly sure, Section 3 declares that—"The United States shall guaranty to every State, and to the people of every State and of the United States, the support and maintenance of such a system of free public schools as is herein provided."

And that is to say, the United States Government pledges itself that every State shall establish and maintain the principles of the Christian religion. This proposed Amendment therefore at one stroke establishes Christianity as the national religion, because it declares that every State shall maintain the principles of the Christian religion in the public schools, and the nation is pledged to see that this is done. Therefore there must be a national decision of some kind declaring just what are the principles of the Christian religion. Then when the decision shall have been made, every State will have to receive from the nation just those principles of religion which the nation shall have declared to be the principles of the Christian religion, and which the nation will have pledged itself shall be taught in the public schools of every State. In other words, the people of the United States will then have to receive their religion from the Government of the United States, and no longer from the Bible, as their own conscience, enlightened by the Spirit of God, may dictate. Therefore if Senator Blair's proposed Amendment to the national Constitution does not provide for the establishment and maintenance of a national religion, then no religion was ever established or maintained in this world.

But how shall this national decision be made as to what are the principles of the Christian religion? It would seem that the second sentence of Section 2 makes provision for this. It declares that no "instruction or training shall be given in the doctrines, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances, peculiar to any sect, denomination, organization, or society, being, or claiming to be, religious in its character; nor shall such peculiar doctrines, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances, be taught or inculcated in the free public schools."

As therefore no religious tenets, doctrines or beliefs can be taught in the schools, except such as are common to all denominations of the Christian religion, it will follow inevitably that there shall be officially called a national council of the churches to decide what are the principles common to all, and to establish a national creed, which shall be enforced and inculcated by national power in all the public schools in the United States. And that will be the establishment of a national religion. And that is exactly what Senator Blair's Constitutional Amendment assures, so surely as it or anything similar to it shall ever be adopted.

Another important consideration is this: Under this Amendment the teachers in the public schools will have to inculcate the principles of the Christian religion. Who are to compose the examining board that shall pass upon the qualifications and orthodoxy of the teachers? Assuredly none but the leading theologians in the churches. This will require that such a board shall be statedly convened to deal out what shall have been decided by each successive council to be the principles of the Christian religion.

It was in this way precisely that the thing was worked in the fourth century and onward. Constantine made Christianity the recognized religion of the Roman Empire. Then it became at once necessary that there should be an imperial decision as to what form of Christianity should be the imperial religion. To effect this an imperial council was necessary to formulate that phase of Christianity which was common to all. The Council of Nice was convened by imperial command, and an imperial creed was established, which was enforced by an imperial power. That establishment of an imperial religion ended only in the imperious despotism of the papacy.

As surely as the complete establishment of the papacy followed and grew out of that imperial recognition of Christianity in the fourth century, just so surely will the complete establishment of a religious despotism after the living likeness of the papacy follow and grow out of this national recognition of Christianity provided for in the Constitutional Amendment proposed by Senator Blair, and which is now pending in Congress.

ENFORCEMENT OF A NATIONAL RELIGION.

IN the anonymous communication on page 213 of this issue of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, attention is called to the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by which the power of the civil government is to be authorized to dictate the religious education of children throughout the whole country. This is a matter of vital interest to every lover of religious liberty. With political questions as the disciples of Christ we have nothing to do; but when the civil powers propose to usurp control of the consciences of the people in their relations to matters of religious belief and practice, it is time for those who appreciate the value of their rights in this important matter to be earnestly interested. It may be that the proposition to which attention is called has not at present sufficient strength in the civil government to be immediately enacted as law, but the fact that it is proposed is an important indication. Liberty of conscience has been in the past the especial glory of the favored citizens of this country; and from the adoption of the Federal Constitution the advocates of religious tyranny have struggled to destroy this peculiar treasure, the brightest jewel in the crown of American citizenship. It was first assailed as being a movement devised by infidels for the overthrow of the christian religion, and its most prominent defender, Thomas Jefferson, was denounced as an infidel. The incorporation of the principle of religious freedom in the Constitution can be ascribed alone to the favor of God, by which this land became the asylum for oppressed saints from every country. Under various devices it has been attacked repeatedly by the popular clerical influence. Heretofore it has been preserved by the jealous regard for liberty which has been innate in the minds of the whole people. How much longer it shall continue is known only to that God who gave its blessings to our favored country. Every encroachment upon the constitutional principles by which this liberty is secured, may well be regarded with serious apprehension by all who value the right to be honest in their devotion to God.

With the policies of political parties we have no disposition to interfere. Much less do we desire to take any part in the contention of those who have no higher aspiration than the attainment of political honors and rewards. As followers of Jesus, we would remember that the kingdom which claims our allegiance is not of this world. Yet when the religious liberty of the saints is endangered by any proposition of men, it is our privilege to enter our solemn protest against such infringement of the rights which God has bestowed upon us.

As legislation is necessary in the enforcement of constitutional provisions, the contradictory clauses cited by our correspondent would afford ample occasion for the enactment of such laws as might be demanded by the dictation of persecuting religionists. The concession that any religion shall be taught by legal authority necessarily requires a legal standard of religion. When this definition is legally given, personal religious freedom is destroyed. As suggested by our brother, the Papal power to persecute was established in the precise manner in which this proposition contemplates the use of the civil power. When the government defines christianity, the saints are certain to be outlawed and persecuted. The church and the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ cannot be sustained by any earthly government. As well might men attempt to illuminate the noonday sun by means of artificial lights, as propose to render assistance to our omnipotent God in the maintenance of the church which he has established, or in supporting the divine principle of everlasting truth in which his gospel is revealed from heaven.

The passages cited by our correspondent from Revelation, doubtless refer to the combination of civil and ecclesiastical power under the pretense of sustaining the religion of Christ. The first beast therein described clearly points to the persecuting system inaugurated by Constantine, as suggested by our brother. By the two horned beast we have understood the description of the same persecution under the pretense of protestant religion. With all its lamb-like appearance the establishment of this second beast by secular power spoke as a dragon in cruelty and bloodshed. At the command of this second beast the image of the first was to be made. This image appears now to be ready for reception of that life (or as it is rendered in the margin, breath), by which it will be enabled to "both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed." In enforcing this decree it will be necessary that the popular mind shall be prepared for such persecution by education which shall lead men to suppose that they are doing God service in killing those who refuse to join in their worship of this legalized image of the first beast. To this end the powers of antichristian religion seek to control the schools of the country.

Regarding the prophecy of the first and second beasts as descriptive of Papal and Protestant persecuting powers, the saints need not be apprehensive of a repetition of the establishment of either of them in their original form; it is the image of the first beast which is to utter the voice of the dragon of bloody persecution, in fulfillment of the inspired testimony. The voice of the dragon may be very distinctly detected in the exultant and intolerant boasts of the popular orders of professed christians in our day. Nothing is wanting but the secular power to enable them to compel every man to worship by contributing to support the idolatrous image which has been made to the first beast. With the control of the education of the coming generation they can readily obtain that power. Already have the popular clergy repeatedly threatened Congress with the vengeance of God if their demands were not obeyed. Nothing but the especial mercy of God has preserved the liberty of our favored people up to the present time. While looking with most serious apprehension upon the present threatening indication, the saints can only pray for the gracious interposition of the hand of God for the defeat of the designs of the workers of iniquity. May the Lord in his mercy overthrow the evil designs of the wicked, and perpetuate to his saints the liberty of conscience with which they have been favored in this country for the last century. From no other source can we hope for the defeat of the schemes of the votaries of antichrist.

While the whole testimony of divine revelation assures the saints that they shall have tribulation in the world, and therefore they have no right to expect permanent rest in their sojourn in this temporal state, they are not left comfortless. However the heathen may rage, and the people may imagine vanity against the Lord, it is still true that his kingdom ruleth over all. Even the wrath of man shall praise him; and the remainder of wrath he will restrain. The wickedness of evil men can go no further than the fulfillment of the purpose of that God who has given the assurance that "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." Often his saints have to say, "Thy way is in the sea, and thy path is in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known;" yet it is true that "The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet."—Psa. lxxvii. 19; Nah. i. 3. In this truth let his people rest, and ever wait his sacred will.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

WITH much sadness I attempt to write this tribute of respect to our little boy, Thomas J. Byrd, son of John W. and Elizabeth M. Byrd.

He died very suddenly, of croup, Nov. 28th, 1888, aged six years, five months and sixteen days. He had been quite a sufferer most of his life. At the age of two years he was paralyzed in his left side, from which he suffered a great deal at the time, and never fully recovered from the effects of it. He leaves a father, mother and sister, besides others, to mourn; but we hope our loss is his gain. This is the second time that death has entered our door and taken a little one from us; but we want to be resigned to the Lord's will, and to say that he gave and has taken away. Our first was an infant son. He was born Feb. 10th, and died the 17th of the same month.

The above was written by their mother. I will add that the reason of the delay of this notice is that I was away at the time of the last death, and the parents thought they would wait until after the funeral, which took place on the third Sunday in June. I used for a text Ecclesiastes iii. 1. The parents have our deepest sympathy, and we trust that the Lord will give them reconciling grace.

T. M. POULSON.

DIED—Of diphtheria, Ann Elizabeth Furr. She was born March 2d, 1880, and died May 22d, 1889.

Mary Furr was born July 13th, 1881, and died June 5th, 1889.

Rosie Furr was born June 21st, 1885, and died June 5th, 1889.

These were the children of brother Henry and sister Rosie Furr. Thus in the short space of two weeks these dear parents were called to mourn the loss of all they had. "How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out." They were lovely children—lovely in face, lovely in gentle, sweet disposition, and lovely in the loveliness of Jesus. I am told that throughout their terrible sufferings they were not heard to utter a single complaint, but every word that dropped from their lips was like honey in the honey-comb. One to whom Elder Wm. L. Beebe sent his photograph, clasping it to her bosom, declared she would not take a world for it. Another sang songs of praise so long as her feeble voice would allow. How hard for this poor, frail nature to exchange such sun-beams for midnight darkness! If bleeding hearts and weeping eyes could suffice to help our beloved brother and sister bear their heavy affliction, then would they need nothing more; but O! how weak our sympathies, yea, our prayers. God only can probe to the depths of such a wound. May our dear brother and sister be enabled by God, as was Peter, when they stood around him weeping, and showing the coats and garments which Dorcas made, to put them all away and look to Jesus. The good traits of our beloved ones should not cause us to murmur against God, but rather to bless his holy name. I tried to preach from the words, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

ALSO,

Robert L. Davis was born in Loudoun Co., Va., Aug. 31st, 1852, and died June 19th, 1889, at his brother's, Jas. E. Davis.

He said he experienced a hope in March last, and that the Lord's gracious dealings with him at that time wrought a peace in his soul never before known. After he was too weak to read himself, he often called for the Bible to be read to him. His special pleasure was in that portion which speaks of the sufferings and death of Jesus. The nearer he approached death the more anxious he was to depart and be at rest with Jesus. His disease was consumption. He passed away as calmly as one falling asleep, without a struggle or a groan. He was the son of Wm. B. and Virilinda R. Davis. We mourn not as those without hope.

May the Lord sanctify his death to the good of the mourning ones. I tried to preach on the occasion to the sorrowing relatives and friends.

E. V. WHITE.

LEESBURG, Va.

DIED—At Laconia, Ark., June 2d, 1889, sister I. P. Blackburn. She was born Oct. 12th, 1809. I have never known a more devoted christian. She rejoiced in the theme of salvation by grace, and loved to talk of the time when God revealed to her her helpless, undone condition, and that nothing but the atoning blood of the precious, crucified and risen Redeemer could suit her condition. Her evidences were bright, but she often complained of her leanness and want of conformity to his divine image. The Bible and SIGNS OF THE TIMES were her chief reading; and when she got so that she could not read (she had cancer in the face and eye), it was a great comfort to have them read to her. She would go through almost any difficulty to mingle with the people of God and to hear the gospel preached in its purity. She joined the Old School Baptist Church at Versailles, Ky., when she was quite young, and was baptized by our lamented brother, T. P. Dudley. She afterward joined either at Bryan's Station or Georgetown, Ky., I do not remember which, where her membership was when she died. She married Mr. G. E. Blackburn, and had a large family of children; but her husband and children (except one son, her youngest child) preceded her to the spirit land. Her home has been with her son since he was married, and all that loving hands and hearts could do to render her happy was bestowed on her. The only drawback was that she could not meet with her brethren and sisters and hear the comforting sound of the gospel, except when visiting friends in Kentucky and Tennessee, which she often did.

CHURCHES CONSTITUTED.

ELDER J. H. Ring, Mary J. Ring, Averilla Gwartney, Virginia Gibson, Joseph Bruce and Barbary Bruce agreed to be constituted into a Regular Predestinarian Baptist Church of Jesus Christ, to be known by the name of SALEM, in Lancaster Co., Neb. Therefore, on June 15th, 1889, by their request, the following Elders and Deacons came together at school-house No. 40, four miles southeast of Cheney, and two and one-half miles northwest of Bennett, in Lancaster Co., Nebraska.

After an appropriate discourse by Elder True, from Hebrews viii. 5, Elders James M. True, Pallas McCay, Isaac Irwin, Deacons Wm. H. Shoemaker, B. W. Magee, R. S. Scroggin, Shelby Davis and M. A. McBride, organized as a presbytery by choosing Elder James M. True Moderator, and Wm. H. Shoemaker Clerk.

Called for letters and Articles of Faith, and finding all in order, proceeded to organize the church.

The charge was given by Elder P. McCay.

Right hand of fellowship by the presbytery and all the brethren present.

The church organized for business by choosing Elder True Moderator, and Wm. H. Shoemaker Clerk.

The church agreed to hold her meetings on the third Sunday in each month, at 11 o'clock, and on Saturday before at 2 o'clock.

Articles of Faith and Rules of Decorum to be written and presented at the next regular meeting.

By the unanimous voice of the church, Elder J. H. Ring is to serve as pastor of the church, and brother Joseph Bruce as Clerk.

Adjourned until the next meeting in course.

ORDINATIONS.

By request of New Hope Church of Regular or Primitive Baptists, located at Greenbush, Warren Co., Ill., the following Elders of the same faith and order met with her on Saturday, June 15th, 1889, viz.:

Elder Warren was chosen Moderator, and Elder Vanmeter Clerk.

HENRY E. PURIS, one of the members of the said church, was then presented before the council for ordination to the work of the gospel ministry.

After a thorough examination of the brother, it was unanimously agreed to proceed in his ordination, which was done as follows:

Prayer by Elder Humphrey.

Laying on of hands by all of the eight Elders.

Right hand of fellowship by Elder Warren, and then by the whole church and council.

Charge by Elder Vanmeter.

The meeting lasted three days, and was very solemn and deeply interesting.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

THE MANY MANSIONS.

"LET not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also. And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know."—John xiv. 1-4.

DEAR BRETHREN:—A few days since I received a letter from Elder Lee Hancks, of Alabama, and, after expressing his most cordial approval of the Circular Letter of the Baltimore Association this year, he asked me to write something about the "many mansions" spoken of in the above text; and this morning I feel like trying to comply with his request. I wish to say, first, that the language quoted above has always seemed wonderfully sublime to me; and yet I am sure that under its glowing imagery lies concealed, but yet seen by faith, the same simple yet profound experimental truth that is taught elsewhere in holy writ. While I cannot undertake to bring out all the various beauties of this language of our Savior, yet I feel like trying to suggest a few things, which I hope may not be out of harmony with the theme. It is no doubt true that brother Hancks and many others can see more in this text than I can present, but the same is true of every subject upon which I might write; and I never speak or write upon any theme without feeling that what I may say is as the talk of a child among grown men. How little I, at least, know of the deep things of God!

The words at the head of this article are the beginning of the last recorded discourse of our Savior. They were spoken under the very shadow of the cross. The scenes which were soon to follow were entirely unanticipated by the disciples. Jesus had indeed given frequent intimations that he must be betrayed and crucified, but they were slow to understand and believe. They indeed believed in him as the Messiah, and hoped for the setting up of his kingdom; but it was a mistaken faith and hope, carnal in its origin and nature, and must be removed to give room for the building up of a true faith and hope in Jesus. Now, Jesus, knowing their wrong expectations, and what was about to befall him, and how they would be perplexed and troubled, out of his great pity and love for them, and in full view of the awful agony that was just before him, turns to them and speaks these words of hope and trust which they could not then understand, but which, in days to come, must have ministered comfort to their hearts. To their short sight the scenes which were to follow must have seemed the death knell of their every expectation and desire. They could not see through this darkness, so thick that it might be felt. If they stood at all it must be by faith, and not by sight. Jesus does not tell them, "Ye understand or comprehend God, now also understand and comprehend me;" but he simply says, "Ye believe in God, believe also in me." It is the testimony of an inspired apostle, "We walk by faith, and not by sight;" and in many a dark hour the soul has been kept quiet and restful simply because of unfaltering trust in God. It is a poor thing to be restful and joyful when we can see the good which God gives us as the result of trial; but when we can see no good, but can yet believe there is good, this is the triumph of faith. Jesus here in effect says that we cannot understand his ways, but it is not needful for our comfort that we should. He says trust in him. As he said shortly afterwards to his disciples, when he was washing their feet, "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter," so could it be said of every act and word of his.

With these general remarks let us notice these sayings of Jesus clause by clause more particularly. "Let not your heart be troubled." This involves the idea of perplexity, of fear, and of disappointment. The hearts of the Lord's people are often troubled. The chief cause is always the fleshly desire to see, rather than trust in God. Unbelief in reality is at the bottom of all our fears and questionings and wanderings. In this view of the matter to be restless and anxious and worried is to doubt God, and is therefore sinful. O how often have the Lord's people to mourn their sinful heart of unbelief! How often have they to lament the smallness of their faith, which does not seem to them to be even as a grain of mustard seed! How vain it is for them to strive to increase their faith! Their hearts are like the stormy deep, where wave follows wave, and only one can be obeyed when he says, "Peace, be still." Jesus spoke these words to the ears of his disciples. But when spoken simply to the ear they could not be obeyed. He must also speak to the heart. Afterward he said the Comforter should take of the things of his and show them unto his disciples, and should guide them, not to the truth, but into all truth. Then the word of Jesus would come with power, and then would it work within them its own fulfillment. Then indeed would their hearts obey these words, "Let not your heart be troubled." How many of the tried and tempted followers of the Lamb have been troubled, and have desired not to be, and yet nothing would work peace. They have bowed the knee in prayer, they have read and thought upon the promises, they have besought the prayers of the Lord's people, but all to no avail, when suddenly, at last, at an unexpected hour, some precious word has come from the Lord in the power of the Holy Spirit, and at once they were not troubled. It might have been these very words, or it might have been some other words, or there might have been no words conscious to their minds; but they were not troubled any more, and they could not be. Thus Jesus speaks to the heart with power; and he still speaks. In the midst of all our trials may we hear his voice, saying, "Let not your heart be troubled."

"Ye believe in God." This one thing distinguished the Jews from all other nations. God has revealed himself to patriarchs and prophets; and in his dealings with that people had he made known his power and glory as he had to no other people. Now when he says to the disciples, "Ye believe in God," it meant, "Ye believe in his power, mercy and providence as these things have been displayed to you." We find this statement of our Savior exemplified in the case of many who afterward believed in Jesus, of whom record is made in the New Testament. Nicodemus believed in God before he came to Jesus. Lydia worshiped God ere her heart was opened to attend to the preaching of Jesus by Paul. So the disciples believed in the one true and living God, and in his entire sovereignty, and acknowledged allegiance to him. They believed in him as a God of providence. This they did even in this dark hour of their history as Jews. Few evidences that he thought of them as his people appeared, but in spite of all that looked to be against it, they yet believed and trusted in him.

Now he says, "Believe also in me."

While it was true that they had believed in him as the Messiah that was to come, yet they had but a fleshly, carnal view of him, and the work which he was to accomplish. They had no anticipations of death for him, and least of all did they expect such a death as he was about to endure. That which was about to take place would destroy the fleshly hope which had possessed them, and as yet they had not been guided into the conception of him as the Sin-bearer and the Redeemer of sinners from the curse of a broken law. That which was about to take place with him, while it would destroy this former fleshly hope, would on the other hand be the open door into the truth, in which their faith should forever rest. There could be no true belief in him except by the dark road of the crucifixion and the tomb. True faith in Jesus is to believe in him as the crucified and risen Redeemer. All belief that leaves this out is not that faith which is of him, and which is acceptable to God. So it seems to me that these words of Jesus were intended, when applied by the Spirit, to carry their minds away from their false faith in him as an earthly potentate, to a true faith in him as the Redeemer of sinners; and when presented by the Spirit it would be seen that the very scenes which they were about to witness were the fulfillment of prophecy, and calculated to confirm and increase their faith. So it seems to me that by these words he called away their minds from the false to the true faith; and when these words were applied by the Spirit they who believed in God could also believe in him. In this very thing do we all have to be crucified to the flesh, that we may live in the Spirit; and how hard it is to be weaned from carnal views of Christ! If we ever believe in him aright it must be by the power of his almighty word working effectually in us.

"In my Father's house are many mansions." The figure of speech used here will not in itself seem strange to us when we remember that the term "house" would apply to the whole palace of the king, while the word "mansions" would mean the abode of those who belonged to the king's household, and who lived in his palace. Each favorite in such a case would have his own special building or suit of rooms, here called a mansion, or dwelling place. The "Father's house" I understand to mean the kingdom of God set up on earth. It means the same thing as the holy city, the new Jerusalem, which John saw coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. The idea set forth is that of a house in which the kind and loving father provides for his children, giving each his own special place in the household. In such a case, however numerous the family, each one, even the smallest and feeblest, or the most erring and disobedient, has his or her own place, and there is always room. So, though disciples may be multiplied, though they may err from his ways, though they may be little and feeble, yet they need not fear but what there is room for them. The mansions are many, but all are within the Father's house. Whatever may be our especial place, we are not outside our Father's house. If we consider the Father's house as represented by the visible church, here also are "many mansions," that is, there is ample room for every hungry and needy soul. Here is rest for the weary; here is a home for the homeless. Poor sinners saved by grace always find a welcome here. The happy gates of our visible Zion stand open night and day. Here is ample room for all who want a home here; but I will say that I have long been disposed to believe that the "many mansions" meant every place where we find Jesus. Jesus is in his Father's house. Home even there would not be home unless we could see Jesus. Paul says that we are blessed "with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ." The apostle also says, "For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ." In this view of the matter it seems to me that the Father's house represents the new and everlasting covenant of redemption, while the mansions represent every special blessing of that covenant into which the people of God enter, and in which they abide; and here also are many mansions. Not one of the disciples of Jesus but has ample provision here for his every want; and in this gospel covenant special provision is made for each one. What each is to do, to suffer, or to enjoy, is all prepared beforehand. The gift each one has, his usefulness in the church, whereabouts in the vineyard he is to labor—all this, it seems to me, is found in the mansion that is designed for each. No child of God need fear that there is no place for him for usefulness, for suffering, or for enjoyment. There are many mansions.

Jesus confirms their faith and confidence by saying, "If it were not so, I would have told you." What strong consolation there is in these words for every feeble, lowly child of God! If it were possible that one of the least could fail of the promised rest, if his atonement could prove inefficacious in any instance, if the Holy Spirit could be hindered from the accomplishment of his work in any heart, so that one of these mansions might miss its inhabitant, or one disciple miss his proper mansion, then Jesus says, "I would have told you." What a confirmation is here found of the doctrine of the final preservation of every child of God to glory! For if the mansions here below are secured to them, surely it must be much more sure that they shall not fail of the final glory.

"I go to prepare a place for you." In this sentence Jesus sets before them the comfort which his death provides for them. Their hope, their joy, their life above, their very name as children of God, hinged entirely upon his death upon the cross. Not a single mansion of joy, rest, peace, or blessedness, not a spiritual privilege in the church of God below or above, could ever be theirs except as they had it prepared for them by his crucifixion upon Calvary. Every joy of every believer comes to him by the cross. This the disciples could not then see. Once, when the Lord had said that he must go up to Jerusalem and suffer and die, Peter began to rebuke him, saying, "Far be it from thee, Lord; this shall not be unto thee." But the Lord rebuked him, and called him Satan (an adversary), and told him that in no other way could his (Peter's) soul be saved; and so here they are assured that while he goes away, it is to prepare a place for them. Jesus must go away. Once he said, "If I go not away the Comforter will not come." So that we here learn that communion with the Holy Ghost is also secured to us by the cross of Calvary. Again, he said, "Thus it is written [by the will of God in prophecy], and thus it behooved Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory." Only by death could he accomplish his Father's will, fulfill the Scriptures, and enter into his glory; and his glory was and is the redemption of the heirs of promise. It is no doubt true that the disciples did not then enter into the fullness of his meaning in these words, and it is equally true that we do not now see all. The unfolding of the truth couched in these words will be the joy and wonder of saints to all eternity. At best what I have written only draws the veil a hair's breadth ajar.

"And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself." The coming of Jesus again to his people is a theme common to the New Testament, even as his coming in the flesh as a Sin-bearer is the one promise of the Old Testament. That he might come to his people in the spirit it was needful that in fleshly manifestation he should go away. An inspired apostle has said, "Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more" (that is, after the flesh). Now the coming of Jesus to his people makes any place or any circumstance a heavenly mansion to them. He is the life and joy of his Father's house to them. Without him all is dark, but with him there is unspeakable joy. We must not think of these words as relating to locality. His coming is not from some point in the skies whither he has gone for a time. But he comes in the revelation of himself to them as a Savior, in conforming them to his holy image, in revealing in them his power, love, mercy and grace, and in every hour of sweet communion in heavenly places that they enjoy. These words assure the trembling saint that in the midst of the most gloomy and intricate pathways of temptation and sorrow they are not separated from Jesus. All the pathway of trial which he endured they must also walk in. All the joy that is his they must also share. As he is glorified at the right hand of God, so must they also be. "Received unto Jesus!" "Where I am, there ye may be also!" What wonderful words they are! They embrace all that is meant by "knowing him," all the "fellowship of his sufferings," and the experience of the "power of his resurrection," having first been made conformable to his death. They also contain the assurance of final victory over death, hell and the grave, and all the joy of the heaven to come. I cannot tell the fullness of these words. I am sure that many who may read this have felt more of what it is to be received to Jesus and to be where he is than any words can ever tell. All this could not have been except he had first gone away. They thought when they saw him in the hands of his enemies, buffeted and spit upon, and then hanging upon the cross, and then laid in Joseph's new tomb out of their sight, that their Messiah had gone away forever. But no! He had but withdrawn from their natural vision, that he might come still closer in the joy and fellowship of the Spirit, that he might so receive them to himself as to become their life, and abide in them the hope of glory. They now should be received unto himself. Himself! his true, proper, spiritual, divine self! So now they should be indeed like him, for they should see him face to face; and beholding him now with open face as in a glass, they are changed into the same image from glory to glory as by the Spirit of the Lord. "We shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." This is indeed to be received unto himself. O how glorious the consummation! How delightful the anticipation! Whether Jesus is present or absent, it is for this end.

"And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know." Yet we read that the disciples said they did not know either the way or the place. The reflection in my own mind is, How little we comprehend the mysteries of our own experience. The flesh spoke when they said, "We do not know." But Jesus said they did know. His words are always true. If his going away had been simply a removal into some other part of space, then indeed they could say, "We do not know." But what he was about to do was to just supply the need of hungry, perishing souls. They were poor and needy and hungry and sinful and perishing. This that they needed, he went away that he might supply to them. Within their hearts was there the abiding faith of God's elect. This faith knew the truth and saw the meaning of the mystery of the cross. It was not this faith that said, "We do not know;" but the weakness and blindness of the flesh spoke. So John afterwards could say, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things." I have but hinted at these glorious things. May the Holy Spirit show us all clear light. I leave these remarks with brother Hancks and all who may read them.

I remain your brother in hope,

BRETHREN EDITORS:—It is written, "The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favor to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all."—Eccl. ix. 11. I wonder if there is such a thing as chance. I have been setting fence-posts this afternoon, and I know that unless the work is well done it will be washed out by the water in time; but while setting the posts I was meditating about David feeding his father's sheep. "And Jesse said unto David his son, Take now for thy brethren an ephah of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and run to the camp to thy brethren; and carry these ten cheeses unto the captain of their thousand, and look how thy brethren fare, and take their pledge. Now Saul, and they, and all the men of Israel, were in the valley of Elah, fighting with the Philistines." David went to his brethren as the host was going forth to fight, and shouted for the battle, and ran into the army and saluted his brethren; and, behold, as he talked with them, there came up the champion, the Philistine of Gath, Goliath by name, out of the armies of the Philistines, and defied the armies of Israel, as he had previously done for the space of forty days. All Israel were sore afraid because of this Philistine; but when David heard this uncircumcised Philistine defy the armies of the living God, he said to his brethren and those around him that he would fight with this Philistine. Moreover, the king had said that to the man who killed him he would give great riches, and also his daughter, and make his father's house free in Israel. "And David said to Saul, Let no man's heart fail because of him; thy servant will go and fight with this Philistine. And Saul said to David, Thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him: for thou art but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth." But David was moved by some unseen power, and told Saul how that he had slain a lion and a bear. "And this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God. David said moreover, The Lord, that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. And Saul said unto David, Go, and the Lord be with thee." Saul armed David according to his own notion, with a coat of mail, a helmet of brass, and a sword; but David essayed not to go after that fashion, for he had not proved them. "And David put them off him. And he took his staff in his hand, and chose him five smooth stones out of the brook, and put them in a shepherd's bag which he had, even in a scrip; and his sling was in his hand: and he drew near to the Philistine." Now we want to notice closely the conversation that took place between David and the Philistine. "And the Philistine said unto David, Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? And the Philistine cursed David by his gods." "Then said David to the Philistine, Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield: but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. This day will the Lord deliver thee into mine hand; and I will smite thee, and take thine head from thee; and I will give the carcasses of the host of the Philistines this day unto the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth; that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel."—1 Samuel xvii. When a prophet prophesieth, and it shall come to pass as he prophesied, then we know that was a true prophet. They came together in haste. "And David put his hand in his bag, and took thence a stone, and slang it, and smote the Philistine in his forehead; and the stone sunk into his forehead; and he fell upon his face to the earth." David ran and stood upon him, and took his sword, and cut off his head. So Goliath lost his head that self-same day, and by his own sword.

Now the question is, Was it chance work by which the Philistine lost his life, or was it predetermined by the eternal God? The skeptic will say that it was because David was the stronger of the two. The infidel will say that it was because of chance. Some will say that God suffered or permitted it so to be. The predestinarian will say that God had absolutely determined beforehand who should kill Goliath, and how, and why. There was no chance work about it. There was no permission in the case. The time and place where David should get the stone, and where it should hit the Philistine, were fixed and settled in Jehovah's mind before time began. Also Saul's conduct toward David afterward, when an evil spirit from the Lord had entered into him, or came upon him, was in God's arrangement. A man may arrange and determine how he will have his own affairs, but the disposal thereof is with the Lord, even to the killing of a sparrow. Men may undertake to twist this, and say that it only means the sovereignty of God. We will, by divine permission, examine the sovereignty of God a little. It was in the sovereignty of God that Adam should sin. No, it will not do that way. He suffered or permitted Adam to sin, that he (God) might predestinate some of his fallen sons and daughters to the adoption of children; that he might have mercy on some, and others be suffered to go to destruction.—Rom. ix. 15. He suffered or permitted Samuel to seek among the sons of Jesse, to find a king for Israel. He suffered David to hide behind the tent in the fodder-house, lest Samuel should find him; and when the lot was cast it would not work until David was found. Then it was in the sovereignty of God that David should be found, and be anointed king of Israel, instead of Saul, whom the Lord had suffered to become a wicked king. The Lord suffered a wind to blow down Kish's fence, and let out his horses, so that they strayed away.—1 Samuel ix. 3. Kish suffered his son Saul, with one of his servants, to seek after the horses; but the Lord suffered Saul to act rather foolishly, and to go the wrong way. He suffered him to wander in the wilderness, in a round-about way, up to Gilgal; and there the Lord suffered Samuel to meet him, and take him up to the high place, where a feast had been prepared. There the Lord suffered Samuel to pour a vial of oil on Saul's head; and it made Saul very happy. He also told him that the horses were found; and Samuel, or the Lord, suffered Saul to go on his way home, but he was found by his brethren, who had become uneasy about the poor fellow, and had gone seeking after him, and found him among the prophets. The Lord had suffered him to wander there—a warning to us, who have simple boys, to keep them near home. Ah, what folly! If this was not in the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, surely he has not determined anything. Are all worlds and beings, in the order they stand, but works of chance, or merely happened so? Skepticism, infidelity, or a mild form of Arminianism. All Arminians admit that sin is in the world, and that it is a dreadful thing, and, as they say, they are trying to help the Lord put it down; but they are only adding sin to sin. The Lord is able to do his own work, and needeth not that any should help him, seeing that he hath all power in heaven and in earth. "Without him was not anything made that was made." The powers that be are his; and it is in his sovereign will that sin shall abound until the mystery of iniquity shall be fulfilled.—2 Thess. ii. 7; 1 John ii. 18. God purposed in his Son Jesus Christ to save sinners, and that before time began. Sin has its origin in time; salvation is eternal. Men must of necessity be sinners, or salvation is null and void. Sin is the transgression of law. The law entered that the offense might abound.—Rom. v. 20. Sin hath reigned unto death. It was appointed that men should die, not in the sovereignty of God alone, but also in the predestination of God. On examination we will find that purpose, appoint and determine are equal terms with predestination, only to predestinate is to appoint, to determine and to purpose beforehand. God's purposes are eternal.—Eph. iii. 11; Isa. xlv. 10, 11. But did God purpose that Adam should sin? We answer, Yes; he had the devil in the garden for that very purpose, else what did he allow him there for? Had he not control over him?

Again, to the sovereignty of God. Some who oppose the absolute predestination of all things tell us that they believe in the sovereignty of God, and that God governs the world, as a king governs his kingdom. We want to notice this a little. In the first place, a king does not create his kingdom, but endeavors to govern it according to his pleasure. If men transgress his commands he punishes them with death, imprisonment, or banishment; and it would be a curious affair that a king would suffer or permit a man to transgress his command in order to punish him. A king may kill (and that might be doubted), but he cannot give life.—John xix. 11; Deut. xxxii. 39. The wicked are the sword of the Lord (Psa. xiii. 14), by which he executes his decrees among the children of men. Does a king do this? We think not. When a king selects men to fill posts of honor he selects his wisest men. The Lord, to the contrary, calls the ignorant, and they are loth to go, saying, "I cannot go." The Lord called Jonah to go to Nineveh; but Jonah rose up to flee unto Tarshish. The Lord suffered him to go only part of the way, and suffered a mighty wind to rise and follow the ship. The men became afraid, mistrusted something wrong, and cast lots to find the guilty man. The lot fell on Jonah, and they cast him overboard, when the wind ceased to blow. There must have been some chance work in this transaction, or happen so, according to the theory of some in this country. The Lord suffered a great fish to swallow Jonah, but it was not suffered to bite or injure him in the least. The Lord suffered the fish to go close to the shore, and there spewed out Jonah on dry land. Then Jonah was made willing to do as the Lord had commanded him.—Psalm cx. 3. The Savior refers to Jonah and his being in the whale's belly, which was for a sign.—Matt. xii. 40. It was a figure of something to take place in the future, something that was treasured in the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God.—Acts ii. 23. But we hear some saying that they also believe in the predestination of God, so far as the church is concerned; and so we say too. That is good enough; but remember that

"Creation proclaims the great work of thy hand,
All beings and things in the order they stand.

Productions of chance we are led to deny—

'Twas made for the lifting of Jesus on high.

"All things for his sake did Jehovah prepare,
For of him, and to him, and through him,

they are;
All systems and worlds that revolve in the sky

Were made for the lifting of Jesus on high.

"When man was created, what wisdom we see!

The whole he possessed was the image of thee!

But O! in his fall we are led to espy

'Twas all for the lifting of Jesus on high.

"When Adam to eat of the fruit was inclined,

It answered the end which Jehovah designed;

No purpose of wisdom was altered thereby—

'Twas all for the lifting of Jesus on high.

"Here Satan was nonplussed in what he had done;

The fall wrought the channel where mercy should run

In streams of salvation, which never run dry,

And all for the lifting of Jesus on high.

"From hence it appears he made nothing in vain,

For Adam thus formed was a link in the chain;

In him 'twas decreed that his members should die,

And all for the lifting of Jesus on high."

As the poet has it, we believe it to be in unison with the following Scriptures: "For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him."—Col. i. 16; John i. 3; Romans xiii. 1, 2.

"But time and chance happeneth to them all." It does appear to us, talking after the manner of men, that there are things transpiring daily and hourly that look as though they had nothing to do with the sovereignty or decree of the eternal God. We get sick, and cannot account for it. There are things transpiring in the neighborhood, creating disturbances, turmoil and strife, that disturb the peace and quietness thereof, which we have to charge to evil doers; but has not God a purpose in all? Even a sparrow cannot fall without him, and the very hairs of our heads are all numbered. "The Lord hath made all things for himself: yea, even the wicked for the day of evil."—Prov. xvi. 4. "I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things."—Isa. xlv. 7. Now the question arises, Do these things transpire by permission or by purpose? This sums up the differences among the old order of Baptists. We must admit that God sees all things, and that he governs all things, and turns all things to his own praise; and further, that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose, which he purposed in Christ Jesus before the world began. When we admit this, we admit the absolute predestination of all things, and must sing, with the poet,

"His decree who formed the earth
Fixed my first and second birth;
Parents, native place and time,
All appointed were by him.

"He that formed me in the womb,
He shall guide me to the tomb;
All my time shall ever be Ordered by his wise decree.

"Times of sickness, times of health,
Times of penury and wealth,
Times of trial and of grief,
Times of triumph and relief,

"Times the tempter's power to prove,
Times to taste the Savior's love;
All must come, and last, and end,
As shall please my heavenly Friend."

There are some who do not want predestination in anything; while others will admit that God predestinated some of the fallen race of Adam to the adoption of children by Jesus Christ, to the praise of his grace, but say that God had no other purpose in view, no other matter determined, and that predestination reaches no further. When questioned about sin getting into the world they will say that God suffered or permitted it to enter, and they will not have it any other way; but if we question them a little further upon the doctrine of God our Savior they will tell us that they think it not profitable to be harping so much upon the doctrine, for if too much doctrine is preached it has a tendency to drive away the congregation. "Let us have more experience," they say; "on that we can all agree." What is doctrine and what is experience? Is it not that which flows from the most holy and righteous God, teaching us what we are—that we are nothing, and less than nothing, while he is from everlasting, immutable, unchangeable in all his ways, and past finding out, yet making known all things to his predestinated sons and daughters, whom he has loved with an everlasting love, teaching them how he bare them and carried them all the days of old? Our experience then is that which flows out or emanates from the doctrine, and we cannot separate them. What is the doctrine but that which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began? It is election, predestination, justification, and eternal redemption. These principles each and every one of the children of God must know for himself. They are all brought one way, are all taught in one school, and through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God. It is tribulation that worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto them.—Rom. v. 5. Then why should they not rejoice to hear their election proclaimed, and their justification by the imputed righteousness of Jesus Christ, and his being the end of the law on their account, and by his blood hath redeemed them from all iniquity? What can be more glorious to the saints in their experience than to hear of the doctrine, how that Christ died for their sins, and rose again from the dead for their justification? These things they know and love; and they know that the world does not know them. Why? Because God has seen fit in his own purpose and predestination to hide these things from them, so that they should not see.—Luke x. 21. "But the election hath obtained it, and the rest were blinded."—Rom. xi. 8. Hence God has done something more than to suffer the ungodly to choose the road to destruction; for he has given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they cannot see, ears that they cannot hear, and hearts that they cannot understand, lest they should see, and hear, and understand, and be converted, and be healed. But the saints are made to see and hear and understand that it is amazing grace that has turned them; that grace would not suffer them to follow the road which they had chosen. Is this election and predestination? Let all the world stand in silent awe, while men of understanding answer.

Your brother in hope of eternal life, which God hath promised before the world began,

JESUS.

"On Christ, the solid Rock, I stand;
All other ground is sinking sand:
My hope is based on nothing less
Than Jesus' blood and righteousness.
His oath, his covenant and blood,
Support me in the whelming flood."

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—In a former article I wrote of the titles of our Jesus; and now to you and all lovers of the truth I wish to speak of the mission, office, work, teachings, doctrine and lessons of this Jesus, of whom the angel of the Lord told the shepherds that "Unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord." Volumes have been written about this wonderful character; the theme is inexhaustible. I cannot promise to say any new thing, or even to present it in a new dress. When we stop to think of the titles, so full of meaning, we are filled with wonder. Let us try to think of all there is in some of them. Who can tell it all? It has not entered into the heart of man to understand the fullness, the completeness of this Jesus. Just think for a moment how highly favored were Paul and John, and even then some of the things shown them were not to be told or written. Yet even to them, I apprehend, not a tittle of the majesty and glory of this Sun of Righteousness was revealed. Angels desired to look into the mysteries and glories of this majestic and matchless Christ. I love to think of this Jesus as one mighty to save, and unchangeable in purpose. He came to save, he came to redeem, he came to ransom, he came to pay all the law's demands against us. He came in power, with a specific work before him, or for a specific purpose. He told just what that work or purpose was. He also said that he had finished that work, had accomplished that purpose. He said that all power was given him. All is a complete word. He said that he came to do his Father's will. He tells what his Father's will is; and this is that will or wish, that he should save all that the Father gave him. Here is a covenant. Will we presume to say that he was a failure? Will we dare to say that he worked in part only, and left even the most infinitesimal part to chance, contingency, or man's choice? Dare we suppose that there is any element of uncertainty in it all? O! the bare suggestion is revolting; it is derogatory to his power and wisdom, and impeaches his veracity. If we would only take the plain, positive declarations of Jesus, we would never go astray in matters of doctrine. The Bible without doctrine would be little else than a literary and historical work. We see doctrine in every utterance of Jesus. He spake as never man spake. Hence he turned the world upside down. His very titles are full of doctrine. His were not merely empty titles; they have a world of meaning in them when we come to study them, to analyze them, to define them. Words are used to express thoughts and ideas. His names or titles express so much that is in common to each other that we will necessarily have to repeat much in speaking of them. But I hope the repetitions will not be irksome to my readers. Just note some of his titles even briefly, and you cannot fail to find much beauty and meaning in them—much comfort and consolation, from the very fact that they express all that is sacred and dear to us in a doctrinal sense. Son of God, meaning begotten of God; likeness, unity, everything God-like, is expressed and implied in the name, and yet clothed upon with flesh, so that the Word was made flesh and dwelt among men. He was the Son of man; felt as we feel; suffered as we suffer; lived as we live; was tempted as we are tempted, yet without sin. How mysterious! how amazing! Who can solve the mystery? O, my soul, can I think of all this, believe it, receive it, love it, and yet doubt the power and wisdom of this Creator and Maker of all things? No, no; a thousand times no. This wonderfully, transcendently glorious being is the Maker and Husband of his bride, the church, the Lamb's wife, glorious in her apparel and adornments, leaning upon the arm of her beloved, clothed upon with the righteousness of Christ. O what an entrancing vision was vouchsafed to the apostle John! Savior and Redeemer! What worlds of meaning in these names. Do you not love to think of this Jesus as your Savior, your Redeemer? Are you willing to divide the praise and glory with another? Will you claim any of the merit or glory for yourself? Are not these names suggestive of doctrine? Is it not a rich mine of wealth? I love to meditate upon these themes. I love to talk with my friends of like faith about this blessed Savior and Redeemer. It comes home to sinners. He came to save sinners. I love to think of him as the Creator and Upholder of all things; as the omnipotent and omniscient God who controls and governs all things; who works everything after the counsel of his own will; who is entitled to all praise and worship; and yet it is sweeter far to me to think of him as my Savior and Redeemer. The redeemed will find sweet employ in the communion and companionship of this Jesus throughout eternity. Is it not a consoling and delightful thought that Jesus remembers sinners? The thief on the cross prayed to be remembered. There is much confusion in the minds of many in reference to the teaching or doctrine of Jesus as to the regeneration and quickening of the dead sinner. Many, very many, mistake the manifestations of life in the sinner for the life itself. Many are taught by men to think that they obtain life by repenting, by doing good deeds, ingratiate themselves into the divine favor in that way. That is erroneous and illogical too. Life, the gift of God, precedes all else, and that life is bestowed while the man is dead. With life follows the manifestations of life. After life is given the dead sinner there is an awakening. Then he can see, hear and realize something of his lost or undone condition. All this is the result of the gift of eternal life. It is God's way in bringing him to know something of his fallen estate. Whenever the sinner is regenerated he will give the evidences of the possession of that life. Then and not till then are there to be found any manifestations, such as repentance, an abhorrence of sin, mourning on account of sin. Just as surely as the mourning comes, so comes the Comforter into the heart of the awakened sinner. Mourning is a blessed state, in this sense, that Jesus said that he would send the Comforter. Then he is given faith, belief, hope, love, joy, peace and rest, all the gifts of God; for he has promised to freely bestow these blessings upon the poor and needy. These spiritual gifts all flow from Jesus to sinful man. The tree must be made good that it may bear good fruit. Just so with man. He must be regenerated before he can do good works; for it is God that worketh in him first; implants the good desires; for without God we can do nothing. The teachings of Jesus and the Bible are that regeneration is the work of God, and that without that work is wrought in the heart man cannot see God and heaven. We have other teaching or doctrines of men. The pulpits of the land are filled with them. I mean a very large per cent. of them. We hear much said about the power of the proclamation of the gospel to save sinners. Why, my dear reader, there is not a word of truth in the assertions made every week in the pulpits and papers of the Arminian fold in reference to the preaching of the gospel being a means in the eternal salvation of souls. Christ did not thus teach, so let us have none of it. Let us hear Jesus' declaration, and have it just as he says it is. He says all that the Father gave him will come, and that no man can come unto him except the Father draw him, and that the Spirit quickeneth whom he will. The apostle says, "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." Jesus told the Jews why they did not believe. It was because they had not life. Life, both natural and spiritual, comes from God. Our natural life was given us in Adam in the creation; our spiritual life was given us in Christ Jesus. We can no more regenerate ourselves spiritually than we can generate ourselves naturally. Spontaneous generation is a myth; but ten thousand times more improbable is it that the spiritually dead sinner can give himself life eternal by any means, or modus operandi, of all the churches and preachers in christendom. Some puny, but proud and boastful mortal, stands up in his pulpit, and tells his hearers that if the church folks, yes, even a small per cent. of them, will do their part, the entire population of this world may be saved to God by the close of this century. How is it to be done? you will naturally and eagerly inquire. It is all demonstrated by a mathematical calculation in geometrical proportion. He called to his aid a Professor of Mathematics. They figured it up, and here is the result: He found that if 2,754,375 workers would each one bring a soul to God each year, and if each soul so brought should bring another soul each year, that at the close of this century not one soul would be left out in the cold (or heat, as you please). There you have it in cold types—2,754,375 workers to commence with, and that is a small per cent. of the professed christians of to-day. He says that God is just waiting for the co-operation of the churches to bring about this grand consummation. He suggests, too, that this "would be a fitting climax to this century." I presume he makes the suggestion to the churches. Now what do you think of such blasphemous utterances from the pulpit? They seem horribly impious to me. He is intensely liberal, is as broad as the broadest can be. He leaves out no churches or sects who profess to be christians. He is as broad as error can be. But there is a narrow way. Jesus says, "I am the way." "No man can come but by me." Will you not rather believe Jesus than these false teachers? Blind guides are they, leading the blind. They would deceive the very elect if it were possible.

The same "divine" says that he feels confident that the whole world can be saved in the time specified, because they have all manner of machinery requisite. They have the printing press, the railroads, the telegraphs, the preachers, and above all else, they have the money. But Jesus said salvation is without money and without price. God says, "I will do all my pleasure." I am so glad that God's work goes on unaided and unhindered by men or devils. Jesus saves, and he alone; yes, he made a finished work, left nothing to chance, left nothing contingent upon the part of puny, erring man. Let God be true, and every man a liar who contradicts our most royal King and Potentate. The above scheme for the world's salvation in this century can be found in Talmage's sermon of April 14th, 1889. The great drawback or trouble in the proposed scheme is this, that it is lacking in the element of truth for a foundation. There is nothing of Jesus in it. "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." The word of inspiration, yes, this single quotation just given from God's words, leaves out all machinery, appliances and apparatus for the eternal salvation of souls. One might write pages, and quote much Scripture in reference to that foundation; for that is this Jesus. Thus it is when we discuss or consider Jesus, his teachings, his doctrine and his work. When we attempt to write or speak of the work of Jesus in reference to what he has done for fallen man, we might exhaust all the words in our language, and all, all could only faintly express all that Christ is to us. He is all and in all to us. We see only in part, and a very small part at best. We are his by creation, choice, adoption, purchase and inheritance; for we are heirs and joint heirs with Jesus, God's own Son. O how the field widens as we get a glimpse only of what all this means. You see in this the doctrine of election. I mean God's election—the doctrine of relationship to God. Just think of it; in the family of God's dear Son, with all that means. Can we ever tell it all? Can we ever cease to love to think of it all, to speak of it, to take comfort too from the pleasant contemplation? The subject widens immeasurably, and is so far-reaching, reaching to that within the veil. It is an anchor to the soul. Did not Jesus say that he would send the Comforter? He gives us such glimpses of his lovely self as are calculated to strengthen and cheer us on the way. O! who can weary in telling of the loving-kindness of this blessed Savior and Comforter of ours? Let us speak of him often to one another. The subject is inexhaustible. It is so kaleidoscopic in character that we can always see new beauties as we read, investigate and look upon it. Look at it, view it as we will, when led by the Spirit, we will always see Jesus in it, with self and self-works and self-righteousness left out. I love to rest upon the precious promises of God. Jesus says, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me, and him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." The coming unto him is a sequence of the gift to the Son; for without him we can do nothing. The good book tells us that the heirs were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world. Let us try to think what that means. How much there is in it to cheer and console! In Christ! O what a thought! and to think of it being God's choice (not poor, fallen, puny man's choice). More yet, it was before the foundations of the earth were laid, before creation's dawn, before man was made. Just think of the security of the heirs, and it cannot fail to comfort you. Heirs to what? The word of God tells us much about that rich inheritance that is in store for the children of the kingdom. It says to the heirs, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." We see God's purpose and preparation in this. The preparation is all of God, so there can be no mistake or miscarriage. The doctrine of election, God's election, is a consoling, comforting one to me. It is the doctrine taught by our blessed Savior. The doctrine of predestination on God's part is cheering to me. It is Jesus' doctrine. I see him in it all, turn it as I will. It is satisfying; it is enough. Christ is our Advocate. Can we lose our case with such an Advocate? He ever liveth to make intercession for the saints; and to make it more comforting still, we are told that he maketh intercession for them according to the will of God. Could it be any stronger? Can we ever realize what a blessed thing it is to have such an Advocate? Is it not a most comforting and consoling doctrine that all the powers of darkness cannot pluck them out of the Father's hands? O! is not the doctrine of Jesus better, infinitely better than any other, and all others? O the blessedness of the certainty and efficacy of Jesus' atonement! O the joy and consolation that is in the hope that is set before the children of the kingdom! Its fruition can only be realized when we reach the New Jerusalem. We sometimes have a little foretaste of it, methinks, in this time state. How sweet it is to hear of this Jesus and heaven from our faithful watchmen and instructors, when they preach Jesus as our Savior, our Life, our elder Brother and our Friend.

"I will walk to the altar with those that I love,
And delight in the prospect revealed from above."

"You may talk of your prospects of fame or of wealth,
And the hopes that oft flatter the favorites of health;
But the hope of bright glory of heavenly bliss—
Take away every other, and give me but this."

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—Inclosed please find six dollars, the amount due you for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES for the year 1889. We feel, while you are laboring so faithfully to furnish the brethren and sisters with our dear family paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, that we all ought to be equally faithful to remit to you the pay for the paper. But we feel that we, as well as others, are often neglectful of performing our duties as we should. We hope that all the dear brethren and sisters who are behind with you may be stirred up to a felt sense of their duties, and pay you up, and be more punctual in the future, and keep their subscriptions paid up. If we like to read the SIGNS, and believe the doctrine contained in it, surely we should like its editors well enough to help them bear the heat and burden of the day. It is through this medium that we are blessed to hear from the Zion of our God, from the east, west, north and south; and we do feel (if one may speak for all) that our poor hearts are comforted when we hear from the poor and afflicted people of God, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, standing firm in the doctrine of God our Savior, contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. We appreciate the SIGNS, and especially since it has become a weekly. May you long be spared to wield the "Sword of the Lord and of Gideon," and put the craftsmen to flight. We believe that wherever the SIGNS is introduced, the Arminians begin to feel that their craft is in danger. There are some in these parts who are fighting the doctrine contained in the SIGNS. One preacher, not long ago, advised the brethren to have nothing to do with the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. But, dear brethren, we do not wonder at that; for a man that wants to sap the fountain of the Primitive, Predestinarian Baptist, and build up Arminianism on its ruins, doubtless would want to keep the people from reading the SIGNS. Brethren, you need not wonder when we tell you that this preacher claims to be an Old Baptist; for it is in fulfillment of a declaration of Scripture, which reads, "We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel: only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach."—Isaiah iv. 1. The brethren in these parts who are taking your valuable paper are well pleased with the doctrine advocated in the SIGNS. We say, Go on, dear editors and correspondents, and still contend for the perfect sovereignty of God. When we hear men preach, and they begin to set bounds for God, and limit him in power, such preaching does us no good; for we believe that God has all power, both in heaven and earth, working all things after the counsel of his own will. We understand "all things" to be "all things." Then if any one wants to know who works all things, we are prepared to tell them that God works all things after the counsel of his own will. But the Arminian seems to be very much afraid that if we hold that God has the supremacy over heaven and hell, men and angels, and has fixed men's bounds and habitations, it will make God the author of sin. We have not so learned Christ. We believe that the creature man is the being that has sinned, and not God. Even men's sinning God knows how to work to his own glory and the good of his people. Men are not justified in their acts of wickedness; but if any man is justified, it is by the righteousness of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. We believe that God is all-wise, and saw in eternity every event that would or could transpire in time. Then all must come in the way he saw it; and he saw it all. The wickedness of men, as well as the righteousness of Christ, is all in his hands, to work after the counsel of his own will. We do not think that it is our business to say that God can work this, but that he cannot work that, or he would be the author of sin. It is said in holy writ that God rules all nations as with a rod of iron, and as the vessels of a potter dashes them to pieces. Then he is omnipotent, omniscient and omnipresent, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure. Then it undoubtedly will come to pass in the way he has declared it; for he has said, "As I have thought, so shall it come to pass: as I have proposed, so shall it stand." Brethren, there is predestination in every one of God's shalls.

We must close for this time, submitting these few lines to your better judgment. If you think they would be of any benefit to the dear people of God, give them a place in our paper, the SIGNS; if not, all will be well.

Yours in hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began,

CRAMER, Ill., June 17, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—I arrived safely home, after an absence of five weeks, during which time I attended four associations—the Baltimore, Delaware, Delaware River and Warwick. I intended to attend the Chemung also; but being so strongly impressed to return home, I felt it my duty to follow the impression of my mind. I reached my home on Wednesday evening, June 12th.

Although a little has appeared in the SIGNS from my pen, yet I have ever felt that I was not capable of writing anything fit for publication. I will say to one and all the dear brethren and sisters that I met on my journey, that it was a glorious time to me, and one that I will not soon forget. If I ever did thank the Lord for his glorious blessings I did so all through that journey. My tongue utterly fails, and I have not language to tell how sweetly I did realize his blessing. It seemed I was so full that I had nothing to say. Indeed I felt too unworthy to enjoy such a glorious privilege. All were so good and kind to me, a poor, sinful worm of the dust, and I feel to thank you all for your kindness, love and fellowship to me. I hope we have all been taught in the heavenly school, and born of the same heavenly Parent; and if we love him that begat, we love them also that are begotten of him. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God." The world does not know us, because it knew him not. Do we not know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren? This is a strong evidence to me at this time. I feel to have no doubt as to who my brethren are, and I feel that I do love them. It seems to me that this love is stronger than death, for I do not believe that death can destroy it. It has been my lot during the most of my pilgrimage to travel low down in the valley, in doubt and fear, sensibly feeling a law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members, so that I cry out, "O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" It is well that we realize we are sinners, and are weary of sin, and hate sin, and love holiness. This morning I felt forcibly the words of the poet,

"O land of rest, for thee I sigh!
When will the moment come
When I shall lay my armor by,
And dwell with Christ at home?"

I feel that this world is a wilderness, and that all under the sun is vanity. "What profit hath a man of all his labor which he taketh under the sun?" But give me the assurance of that glorious hope beyond the grave, and it is worth more than all the world.

In conclusion I will say to you all, Remember me in your prayers, that I may be kept in the strait and narrow way. May he who is able to keep us from falling, present us faultless before his throne, and to him be praise now and forever. Amen.

COTTON HILL, Ill., Jan. 20, 1889.

ELDER BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—For the satisfaction of myself and other brethren I would like your views on the following subject, if I can explain myself so as to be understood. Was it not at the time of the manifestation of God in the flesh that our sins and iniquities were laid upon him? No doubt that in the purpose and wisdom of God it ever stood as complete as after it actually took place. With God there is neither past nor future, but one eternal now. Nothing new nor old comes before him. He is in one mind, infinite in wisdom, almighty in power. While I believe all this, and that everything that ever has, did, or ever will exist derives its power from him by which it does exist, there was a time when our sins and iniquities did not actually lay upon him; if so, I fail to see it. If Jesus Christ, who was God manifest in the flesh, was ever a sin-bearing victim until this manifestation in the flesh, the sense in which he was is what I desire to know. He was always the life of his people in that he bare them and carried them all the days of old. This was life eternal, in which they never sinned; but the life in which they did sin Jesus did assume in his conception, and in his birth was brought forth a Sin-bearer, bearing our sins in his own body; for in that life we had sinned; and in order that he might suffer and die must he not assume the life that the law held its claims against? Being made under the law, and sin being the transgression of the law, is this not where the sins of his people were laid upon him? This is my present view. In that he died, he died unto sin once; but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. In that he now lives, he never died; in that he died, he never lived again. Our hope is not in the life that Jesus died unto sin, but in that he liveth unto God, in which exists almighty power, by which we were begotten, brought forth and kept; all other being destroyed in Christ's crucifixion. We also were crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that we henceforth should not serve sin, because we are dead to it by the body of Christ; and being married to Christ we bring forth fruit unto God. This fruit we have unto holiness, and the end everlasting life; very different from the fruits of the flesh, which are brought forth unto death. Having lately had some conversation with brethren on this subject, we desire your views.

Your unworthy brother,

C. C. PURVINES.

CHRIST THE SIN-BEARER.

"ALL we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all."—Isa. liii. 6.

The inquiry of our esteemed brother Purvines, on this page, opens an unbounded field for investigation. In discussing the wonderful mysteries involved in the subject presented, it is impossible to use words which will be certain to convey the exact thoughts which are designed by the writer or speaker; hence there is great reason to fear lest our best intentions may be misapprehended by readers who sincerely desire to correctly understand our meaning. It is not profitable to follow the curious promptings of the carnal mind in trying to investigate what God has not been pleased to reveal in the experience of his saints. In what we desire to present in this article or at any time, it is our earnest prayer that we may never be left to the seeking out of inventions at variance with the doctrine which is known by revelation to all who are led by the Spirit of truth. Nothing but that "doctrine of God our Savior," which is attested by the personal experience of every saint, can be profitable unto the edification of the church, or to the comfort of those who hope in Christ for deliverance from the bondage of sin and its consequent death. Whatever satisfaction our own theories may afford us, the perfect rule limits us to the infallible standard of revelation, in which to "Follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another." May the grace of our Lord enable us ever to follow after no other things but such as are profitable to the comfort and edification of the saints.

While in the text above quoted it is clearly stated that "the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all," it is not so clear that this was said in reference to the actual humiliation of our Lord when he was made a curse for us by being nailed to the tree of the cross. This was doubtlessly included in the bearing of our sins; but this was not all of the wonderful truth which was therein written. The events of time are but the manifestation of the eternal purpose of God, in which our dear Redeemer is revealed as "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." When the heavens and the earth were created by the command of the eternal God, as it is written in Genesis, that was but the beginning of the manifestation of the immutable will of God. With him there is no more certainty of those events which are already past than of the fulfillment of his purpose in every minute particular until the close of the existence of all temporal things. In the execution of his purpose "The Lord bringeth the counsel of the heathen to naught; he maketh the devices of the people of none effect. The counsel of the Lord standeth forever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations."—Psa. xxxiii. 10, 11. This truth is of inestimable importance to the saints, since it is declared by the Lord himself, "I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed."—Mal. iii. 6. This omnipotent word assures the final salvation of all the chosen objects of eternal love. On the established testimony of personal experience our inquiring brother, with all who hope in the salvation which is revealed by grace, recognizes that in purpose God does declare the end from the beginning, saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Since that eternal purpose is declared to be "in himself," nothing in time could affect it.—Eph. i. 9. In considering the subject presented in our brother's queries, it is necessary to remember that this immutability of the counsel of our God is revealed as distinctively characteristic of his eternal Godhead. It is therefore infinitely beyond the comprehension of created minds. All that can be known concerning it is what the Spirit of truth is pleased to reveal; and that revelation is one testimony in the experience of those who are led by the Spirit, and in the record of inspired Scripture. When anything is suggested as divine instruction which is not clearly revealed in the inspired Scriptures, it is safe to regard it as a delusion. Especially is it evidence that any sentiment is of our own invention when we are unwilling to subject it to the test of comparison with the infallible standard. "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." There is no occasion for adducing scriptural evidence that the sins of all the objects of electing love were laid upon our Lord Jesus, and the one offering of himself without spot to God was the acceptable sacrifice by which all his people were cleansed from sin; for of that there can be no question in the mind of those who have hope in his blood for salvation from sin. In the statement of his question our brother concedes this essential ground of the hope of every saint. The point submitted for discussion is whether it was "at the time of the manifestation of God in the flesh that our sins were laid upon him."

It is far from our design to attempt to present any new theory upon this subject. If the Scripture has left it unsettled, no argument of reason can throw any light upon it. It is declared by the Lord God himself in the curse pronounced upon the serpent, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel."—Gen. iii. 15. There can be no question that the Seed of the woman, here spoken of, is Christ. No other one ever born of a woman had power to bruise the head of that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan. Of him it is written, "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage."—Heb. ii. 14, 15. In the preceding context Jesus recognizes these children as his brethren. This is not spoken of as merely a prospective relationship. Indeed, the relationship of brethren necessarily involves original unity of origin. This kindred can be manifested only by being born of the same parentage. In a natural sense, it is absurd to suppose that one can become the brother of one who has different parents. Even by the legal process of adoption the natural relationship is not changed. In this word of the Lord it is evident that divine justice charged the sin of the chosen vessels of mercy upon their Head and Life, who is here called the Seed of the woman. In vital unity with every member of this body, when they in their earthly relationship were involved in sin, the Lord Jesus Christ was thereby involved as the only life which could satisfy divine justice. This will more clearly appear in the type. When Eve had fallen under sin, was not Adam already involved just to the extent of the strength of that unity which he recognized when he said, "This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh?" Her life was identical with his own, for she received it in him. So, in the antitype which is represented in the first Adam, Christ Jesus was under the curse of divine justice as soon as his body and bride was polluted by sin. His hanging on the tree only manifested that he was made a curse for us. Another typical expression of the same principle is used in the text quoted at the head of this article. The wandering sheep have no sooner become trespassers, than their shepherd is involved in the whole responsibility incurred by them. The law does not look to the sheep for redress; it demands full payment of their shepherd. Is the shepherd under more obligation when served with an execution than he was the moment that the sheep committed the trespass? The officer collects the debt which was due before he demanded its payment of the shepherd. Is it not so in the case of our great Shepherd? We so understand the decree of the supreme Judge, which was issued when sin entered into the world by the first transgression. Upon what other principle could justice have decreed that the Seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, and that the serpent should bruise his heel?

In our text it will not be questioned that the confession of our wandering is the acknowledgment of that which is a present truth. There is no prophetic or figurative construction to be put upon this part of the expression. It is just as clearly a statement of existing fact as is the language of Paul when he says, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."—Rom. v. 12. Every conscious sinner knows personally that his own case is truthfully stated in this inspired language. The fitness of the illustration of the straying sheep is very manifest. As the wandering sheep must be sought and brought back to the fold by the shepherd, so we who have wandered in sin can never return by our own wisdom and strength to the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls. Our sins are an impassable barrier in the way of our approach to that God who desires truth in the inward parts. The light of divine life shows that without holiness no man shall see the Lord (Heb. xii. 14), and the same light also shows our utter destitution of that holiness.

Now comes that revelation of the infinite grace of God that bringeth salvation. It is not that there is to be a provision made whereby to blot out the sins of the chosen subjects of eternal love; it is the amazing display of divine wisdom and grace, in which all the sins of every member of the body of Christ are already removed from them. "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us."—Psa. ciii. 12. This glorious assurance was revealed to Abel with no less present realization of its truth, than to the saints who have seen it in the light of the gospel day, which was ushered in by the resurrection of our Lord from the dead. "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." It is not a mere covenant agreement that in the future he will relieve us of our load of iniquity. Our guilt was laid upon our Surety from the time that his people were involved in sin; and of him alone divine justice required the awful penalty. Upon no other principle could justice have accepted his sacrifice for our sins. Our iniquities could not have been borne by the most favored angel of light had he offered himself as our substitute. Even when our Redeemer came to do the work, he proved his right to bear the sins of his people by reference to the record. "Wherefore when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me; in burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure: then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me), to do thy will, O God."—Heb. x. 5-7. The "volume of the book" cited by our Lord is not the Scriptures of the Old Testament; for this language is quoted from the fortieth psalm. It is the same book which is spoken of when the Spirit of Christ declares, "My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance [margin, strength or body], yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them."—Psa. cxxxix. 15, 16. That book is none other but the eternal counsel of our God.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Chemung Old School Baptist Association, in session with the Old School Baptist Church at Vaughan Hill, Bradford Co., Pa., June 12th, 13th and 14th, 1889, to the churches composing the same, sends greeting of love and fellowship in the Lord Jesus Christ.

AS IT has been our custom from year to year to write a Circular Letter, we will call your attention to the words of Jesus to his disciples, as recorded in Matthew xxviii. 20, which reads as follows: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen."

It is our desire to set forth nothing in this letter but what God has taught us in holy writ. In the nineteenth verse Christ says, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Now, dear kindred in Christ, we are to observe and teach just what Jesus has taught us—no more and no less; for all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, reproof, instruction, &c.; that the man of God shall be thoroughly furnished unto every good work. Holy men of old wrote and spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. If we are the children of God, and write and speak as we are moved by the Spirit of God, we will write and speak to the edification of each other. We hear Jesus say, "Even so it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish." Who are these little ones that Jesus has reference to? All for whom he died upon the cross, all whom the Father gave to him, all who were chosen in him before the foundation of the world; no more, no less. "Well," says one, "did not Jesus give himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time? All means all—every son and daughter of Adam's race." We say no; the Scriptures do not give us authority for teaching such doctrine; but they do teach us that God has chosen his people out of the world, out of every nation, kindred and tongue; a people that are not reckoned among the nations, but shall dwell alone. "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him." "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God, that sheweth mercy." So we see that it is not the will of the creature, but the will of our heavenly Father, that any of the fallen sons of Adam's race are saved. The apostle says, "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." So we see that God's people were saved in Christ before time began; and we believe that the church of Christ stood as complete in him before the world began as it ever will. Not one can be added to that royal family, nor one taken from it. All the so-called preaching of the day has not nor ever will add one member to the royal family of our God.

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

He speaks, and it is done; he commands, and it stands fast forever. He is of one mind, and none can turn him. He declared "the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." This is the God that we worship, the God that brought us out of the bondage of sin and death, and put a new song in our mouth, even praise to his holy name. He has taught us that he is the author and finisher of our faith, and so we feel that we have the authority to teach that our God is the predestinator of all things; that everything acts and moves as God desires it to; that the wrath of man shall praise him, and the remainder of wrath he will restrain. The wicked acts of those men that crucified the Lord of life and glory accomplished what God had before determined that they should. The prophet Isaiah, speaking of the sufferings of Christ, says, "He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not." "Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief: when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand." So we see, dear, trembling child of God, that it pleased the Lord to lay the sins of his people upon him; and not one of them can perish. We dare not say that our God predestinated what men say are good things, and the bad things come by chance. If he predestinated one thing, he has everything. So we believe, and so we preach.

May the Lord lead, guide and direct us into all truth, and keep us from the delusions that are in the world, is our prayer, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A SEARCH FOR TRUTH.

I WAS born in Russell County, Virginia, February 8th, 1855. My parents emigrated to North Carolina when I was about six months old, where I resided until 1874. My father engaged in the Confederate cause in 1861, leaving my mother with myself and three brothers to care for, the eldest being eleven years old. Father left us in moderate circumstances financially; but when the bloody conflict ended, we were reduced to extreme poverty. As for father, we received no intelligence as to his fate, but supposed he fell a victim to the enemy. Mother finding it impossible by her own industry to acquire a sustenance for herself and family, it became necessary to procure homes for myself and eldest brother, where we could earn a support for ourselves and aid in the support of the two younger brothers. This being accomplished, we were employed to labor on the farm. So I labored very hard during the week, anxiously waiting the arrival of Sunday, which I spent with young associates in juvenile sports. During this time I cultivated the acquaintance of a Methodist lady noted for her piety and her zeal in the cause she advocated. She admonished me to refrain from evil and lead a holy life, asserting that if I would do so, God would bless me, and save me in heaven; but if I lived in sin, I would be lost in an awful hell, where the wicked continue to burn eternally.

The promise of prosperity through life and a happy heaven after death were no inducements to leave off sinning, for I loved it, and was satisfied with myself; but the thought of the state of the wicked after death gave me some uneasiness, and I resolved that at some future time I would omit sinning, and (to use the common phrase) get religion. This I thought I could do at any time by refraining from sin and praying to God. But as I was quite young, and might live to be old, I could yet enjoy the pleasures of this world, and still have time to prepare for death. However, I commenced the work much sooner than I contemplated, as will be observed by reading the following incident I append.

When I was fourteen years of age I was employed to labor for a term of six months by a gentleman who had a son afflicted with epilepsy.

His son's reason was at times entirely dethroned by such paroxysms, and he remained insensible for days at a time. I became very much afraid of him, so much so that I could not sleep at night, as we both were occupants of the same bed. I was afraid he would kill me, and the thought of future punishment caused me much trouble, so I concluded to leave off sinning and get religion. I made a solemn vow to God that if he would protect me, I would cease from sinning the remainder of my life, and live a holy life. This I thought I could easily do, so I began the work very earnestly, by abandoning the use of idle words and praying the most of my time. In a short time my fears somewhat subsided, and I fancied that God had heard my prayers. In short, I considered myself a christian; and to continue such, I thought, I must lead a sinless life. I succeeded, as I thought, pretty well during the week; but when Sunday came I was always indulging in my usual sports with my young associates, despite my efforts to the contrary. During all this time I thought but little about heaven, but the fear of punishment was the prompting cause of all my struggles to live a holy life. If I could have believed there was no such thing as future punishment, I would have abandoned my religious career, for it had already become a loathsome task, as I loved the pleasures of sin much better. I remained at this place about three months, feeling at times quite secure; but at other times, especially when I would get angry, or participate in any kind of revelry, a sense of uneasiness would steal over me, until at last, wearied with this state of affairs, I resolved to leave this place and procure a situation elsewhere. This being accomplished, and feeling myself out of danger, I concluded to abandon my religious career for the present, and enjoy the pleasures of life. This was in the year 1869. About this time my eldest brother emigrated to Missouri. The elder of the two younger brothers was now able to earn a support for himself. Mother had abandoned housekeeping, and procured a situation for herself and my younger brother. From this time until 1874, few excelled me in the practice of sin and folly. I participated in almost all kinds of evil, as I was under no restraint but society, and this restrained me very little, inasmuch as my associates were very profane and dissipated.

Early in this year I emigrated to Virginia, and obtained employment on the railroad, among the most dissipated class of men. Here I practiced gambling, and other vices equally as degrading. In July of this year I was seized with a very severe attack of neuralgia of the optic nerve of my right eye, which rendered me unable to labor. I returned to North Carolina. After several weeks of intense suffering the pain abated, leaving me nearly blind in that eye.

About this time I attended a Missionary Baptist meeting, with no motive in view other than idle curiosity, where I heard the following hymn sang, "There is a fountain filled with blood," &c., when a strange feeling came over me. Something seemed to say, "Your sins helped to crucify the Son of God." I now viewed myself to be the most guilty wretch on earth. Everything seemed dark and gloomy around me, and I felt myself to be a lost and ruined sinner. Not wishing any one to know my feelings, I arose with the intention of repairing to the woods, to try to implore God's mercy in my behalf. After I had gone some distance from the house, I thought I would kneel and try to pray; but something seemed to say, "Every one will see you here." So I concluded to go still farther, that I might be obscured from observation. After going some distance farther, and not finding the desired place of seclusion, I prostrated myself on the ground, and it seemed to me all the sins I had ever committed were fresh in my memory, weighing me down like a cart laden with many sheaves. This was early in the morning. After I had been here, I know not how long, one of the members of the church came to me, and requested me to retire to the house. This I refused to do. He then asked me if I desired an interest in the prayers of christians. I told him I did, as I felt to be the vilest sinner on earth. I remained in this place until about noon, when I retired to a neighbor's house, feeling less troubled. Still everything seemed to be dark and gloomy, and seemed to speak forth the justice of my condemnation.

I had resolved to attend meeting no more; but being requested by a friend, I attended the meeting that night. On arriving at the place, they sang the hymn above referred to. Here again a deep sense of my condemnation came with such force that I could not refrain from weeping. After preaching, an invitation was extended to those who desired an interest in the prayers of christians to come to the anxious-seat. This I looked upon as being useless; but to gratify the request of an uncle, whom I esteemed very highly, I consented to do so. I had not been here long before some of the mourners (for there was quite a number of them) professed religion, and quite a revival ensued. On hearing others rejoicing, and seemingly blessed in their efforts, and my load of guilt and condemnation still weighing me down, I charged God with injustice and partiality. About this time I was trodden upon by some one, as the congregation was in a great tumult, at which I became very angry, for which I have ever been ashamed. However, I arose and retired to myself, feeling that I had blasphemed the name of God. I now regarded myself as the most hardened and degraded sinner that ever lived. I could not pray or weep, although I desired very much to do so. I did not attend the meeting any more, but concluded to travel, for I could find rest neither day nor night. So I left North Carolina for Virginia. In about a month from the time I left North Carolina, I had another severe attack of neuralgia. For six months I lay prostrate, and suffered severely, physically and mentally. I would sometimes conclude I would rather die than live. Then a sense of my condition would present itself to me, as being without hope and without God in the world. At the expiration of six weeks I had regained my health, although I was entirely blind in my right eye. During the year 1875 I still continued in such a frame of mind as to render me unfit for business. I resorted to places of mirth, to drown my sorrow, but all to no purpose. In fact, all my efforts to get rid of my trouble increased my burden. I could not be content anywhere long at a time. I would willingly have exchanged my situation with any of the brute creation. I even contemplated committing suicide; but I felt if I did so, I would continue to exist where hope is a stranger, and mercy never intercedes. I felt that if I could even take the wings of an eagle, and fly to the uttermost parts of the earth, or if I made my bed in hell, God was there. I felt my doom was sealed, and my case was an outside one. I would often take up my Bible and search for a promise therein; but all seemed to condemn me. It is true I could find many precious promises in this book, but none of them were applicable to me. I spent this year traveling from place to place, and like Cain, considered myself a vagabond in the earth. Thus this year ended, and a new one came, but my load of guilt and condemnation remained. During all this time I had told no one of my troubles, but all who knew me pronounced me partially insane. My health was fast declining, and I felt that death would soon end my troubles here, but increase them hereafter. In January of this year (1876) I retired one night, but not to sleep (for I often spent whole nights without), when a sense of my condemnation presented itself to me more forcibly than it had before. I thought I would die before morning. My prayer was, "God, be merciful to me, a sinner." Then something seemed to say, "You need not pray longer; you have sinned away the day of grace." I considered my condemnation just, for I felt I had committed enough sin to condemn the whole world; and,

"Should sudden vengeance seize my breath,
I must pronounce him just in death;
And if my soul were sent to hell,
God's righteous law approves it well."

Thus I lay, lamenting my deplorable condition, my pillow wet with tears. While meditating upon my lost and ruined condition this Scripture came to my mind, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him." Then I thought, Can it be possible the Lord has drawn thee to himself to seek salvation? I thought if he had, it was not a voluntary act of my own. At this time these words came to me, "Him that cometh I will in no wise cast out." Then my load of guilt and condemnation left me, and I was rejoicing; for I felt that I had been drawn by the Father to the Savior, and felt an interest in the promise, "Him that cometh I will in no wise cast out." I now felt that my troubles were ended, and that I should never sin again. Pen cannot depict nor language portray my feelings at this time. I slept but little that night, but had a dream, which has caused me much trouble. While I had never before placed any credence in dreams, as to their indication of anything, yet this one so impressed my mind that I have never been able to forget it. I dreamed that I was conversing with a person clothed in white, with the most pleasant countenance I ever beheld, who said to me, "You have got to preach; if you don't you will never see any satisfaction, and will finally die." I awoke, and could scarcely believe but that I had been in conversation with some one. However, I considered it merely a dream, after meditating upon it; yet it made impressions on my mind I have never been able to get rid of, although I have tried to do so.

In the morning all nature seemed to present a different aspect. Everything seemed changed, and it seemed as though I were in a new world. The birds and the trees, in fact everything, seemed to unite with me in praising God. I now desired very much to be baptized, and should have been if I could, without joining the church. I did not want to unite with any denomination until I had tried myself, to see if I could live as I thought those professing christianity should; resolving that after I had done this I would join the church, provided I became convinced I would not bring reproach on the cause of my Maker and the church. I now commenced, the second time in my life, to try to live without sinning, but actuated by different motives from the first. First it was from fear of punishment; but now I desired to refrain from sin because I hated it. Things that had formerly been a pleasure to me I now abhorred. While I had once desired the society of the dissipated and profane, I now desired to live the remainder of my life with the children of God. I resided this year in North Carolina, during which time I underwent sore trials. I found that instead of living without sinning, I sinned continually. I found that I was inclined to do evil, rather than right. I now seemed to be in possession of two natures, one warring against the other. The dream which has already been related gave me much trouble, for I felt at times that I must preach. At other times I thought it was only a dream, and I was mistaken, for I could not see how the Lord could require such a one as I was to perform so important a work.

In February, 1877, I moved to Tennessee, and located near a Missionary Baptist Church. I knew but little about the different denominations, and I thought it made but little difference which I belonged to, though I was somewhat partial to the Baptists, for I believed that nothing was christian baptism except immersion. Finding I could not live as I wished to, and having a desire to be baptized, I thought I would go forward and do what I considered to be my duty. Accordingly, in June of this year, I offered myself, and was received by the Missionary Baptists. My impressions to preach became so deep that I could not rest. So I told my feelings to one of the members of the church to which I belonged, and he advised me to go forward in the work. This I resolved to do, but thought I must at least defer it until I had studied the Scriptures for awhile. I devoted as much time in studying them as circumstances would permit. As I had to labor on the farm for very low wages, my reading was during inclement weather, Sundays and nights. I would often read until midnight.

young licentiate and myself passed the afternoon in conversation upon different portions of the Scriptures. The church had already considered the question of liberating me. During the discussion upon portions of Scripture by this licentiate and myself, we agreed until we came to this verse, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him." He contended that the manner in which sinners were drawn was by the preaching of the gospel, and it was left to their volition whether they accepted or rejected; while I maintained that the unregenerate were not subjects of gospel address, and that they must first be quickened directly by the Spirit of God. Quite an argument ensued. He seemed to become agitated, and accused me of heresy, saying he could not fellowship such doctrine. I suggested that we leave the decision of the question to the pastor of the church, who was a well-informed man, of unquestioned integrity, and had attained the title of D. D. He refused to do so, remarking that the decision would be favorable to him. As soon as I had an opportunity I asked the pastor for his views on the subject, and to my astonishment he decided in favor of my opponent. The Scriptures seemed to so clearly substantiate my argument that I could not be convinced otherwise. For to become a christian was to be made a new creature, and I could not see how a creature could assist in its own creation.

Shortly after this occurred I heard a conversation between this pastor and a private member in regard to a sect of people with which I was not acquainted. The member wished to know, if they were the true church, why they received members from the Old Baptists on their baptism. He replied that the Old, Regular Baptist Church was the oldest; and if they denied their works, they must deny their own. Shortly after this I came in possession of a debate between J. R. Graves, of the Missionary Baptists, and a Methodist by the name of Ditzler. In the debate Graves argued that the church with which he was identified bore the characteristics of the primitive saints. He endeavored to prove their succession as Baptists back to the apostles. On reading this debate I thought of the remarks of the pastor of the church, that they were younger than the Old Baptists. This was a phenomenon to me. I could not see how the Missionary Baptists could reach back to the apostles, and be younger than the Old School Baptists. During all this time I had been diligently reading the Bible. The more I read, the firmer I became in the belief of the correctness of my argument above named; for I believed sinners were saved by the righteousness of Christ being imputed to them, without any effort on their part, as to their eternal salvation. I was now very much dissatisfied with my situation. I desired above all things to know the truth, and felt like I would contend for it if the whole world opposed me.

In August of the same year I told the church I could not believe as they did, and requested them to erase my name from the church-book. This was very painful to me, as I was a stranger in that country. My impressions to preach continued to cause me much trouble; but I now thought that I could not preach, inasmuch as I did not belong to any denomination, and was not licensed; besides, I learned there was no sect in the country that believed as I did, but was informed there was a church of Old School Baptists about twelve miles from where I resided that believed as I did, with one exception. I was informed by one of the members of the church with which I was identified that he had heard one of their ministers preach infant damnation—that there were infants in hell not a span long. So from this testimony I had but little use for this denomination. I now determined to know, if possible, what the Bible taught, and compare the teachings of that book with the teachings of the various denominations I came in contact with. So I read diligently, and within six months I had read the New Testament through seven times, besides reading a great deal in the old Scriptures, studying only one subject at a time, to ascertain the truth of it. After reading a great deal, it seemed so difficult for me to understand the Scriptures that I was almost ready to give up in despair; for it all seemed a profound mystery to me, and I did not think with all my good intentions I could learn the truth by reading them, as I was too ignorant to understand them; until one day, when I was reading in James, I read these words, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth liberally to all, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him." I had not thought of asking God to give me wisdom to understand his holy word; and now I felt I lacked this wisdom, and had the promise that if I would ask him he would give it me. This seemed to redouble my energy in the reading of his word; for I considered the subject in this way, that if I was a child of God, he designed I should know the truth; and if I knew anything of myself, I desired to know it; and I believed if I asked God to lead me in the way of truth, he would do so. So I determined to discard all other books, and take the Bible as my commentator, trusting God to be my teacher.

My impressions to preach were so forcible, it seemed I must begin at once. Then I would think, You have never been licensed; besides, you don't belong to any church. I could rest neither day nor night. While in this condition I have often started to a neighbor's house, and taken the wrong road. My mind was so perplexed I could not labor alone. I thought I must go somewhere; but where, I knew not. I thought if I would try to preach, my mind might probably be relieved. I resolved to commence the work immediately. Accordingly I published an appointment, and tried to preach. This was my first effort; and as soon as my discourse was ended I thought it should be my last; for I got along so poorly, I felt sure the Lord had not required it of me. My mind at the time was greatly relieved. However, I did not continue in this frame of mind very long until my old impressions were again troubling me, and I felt I was compelled to try again. I tried to preach some three or four times in this country. Finding my views very unpopular, and making such complete failures, as I thought, on every occasion, I now resolved to leave this country, and go where I was unknown, and never try to preach again. In fact, I thought I would not even let any one know that I had ever professed a hope in Christ. The more I perused the Scriptures, the more they seemed to expose the fallacy of the teachings of the various sects of religionists around me. I thought I was alone in the world, and the world seemed to oppose what I thought the Bible taught.

In the spring of 1880 I left Tennessee, thinking I would go to the state of Missouri; but on arriving at Nashville I changed my intentions, and started for New Orleans, La. On arriving at Natchez, Miss., I had a severe attack of bilious fever, and was unable to go farther. I began to reflect upon my motives, and thought that probably my afflictions were sent upon me because I was acting the part of Jonah. I now tried to ask the Lord to forgive me for my rebellion against him, vowing I would try to do that which I thought to be my duty. I had not been at this place many days until I was again able to travel. I now concluded I would go to Texas. I thought I would do all my preaching in private conversation. Accordingly I was continually conversing on the Scriptures, whenever an opportunity presented itself. I had not traveled many days when I had an attack of the ague. After a chill every second day, for two weeks, I concluded to travel north until I found a colder climate. On the first of September I arrived at Monticello, Ark. I had not been many days at this place when I was taken with typhoid fever. I was confined to my bed about three weeks, at the expiration of which time I resumed my travel northward. I had not traveled exceeding fifteen miles when I found my strength was such that I could not travel. I abandoned traveling until I had regained strength. I called at one I. B. Friars', and told them my intentions and recent afflictions, upon which they insisted I should remain with them until the next spring. I gladly accepted their kind offer, and have great reasons to feel very grateful for their kindness, and to thank God for his providence in directing me here. I had not been here exceeding two weeks when I was seized with neuralgia of the optic nerve of my left eye. (It will be remembered I was blind in my right eye from the same disease.) After five weeks of intense suffering, the family physician entertained no hopes of my recovery, and I felt my life was drawing to a close. I was lying one night, meditating upon my situation, when these words seemed to be spoken to me, "You will not die. You will yet preach. God has required it of you, and he cannot be disappointed." I then told them I would not die, as I believed God had required me to preach, and I had never as yet done so.

My health began to gradually improve, but my eye was getting worse, and in a short time I was well nigh blind. This seemed more than I could endure, for I felt I would rather die than be blind. I thought my search for truth was ended, as I could not see to read, and I had resolved to commit the New Testament to memory, after which I thought I could study the old Scriptures at leisure. Within a few weeks I was able to travel. During the period of my sickness I had renewed correspondence with my brother in Missouri. I had, through neglect and cares of a different nature, failed to correspond with him for nearly five years; but after I had informed him as to my whereabouts, he insisted I should come at once to Missouri.

On the 12th day of February, 1881, I left Arkansas for Missouri, arriving at my brother's residence in Dallas County on the 18th of the same month. My mother arrived from North Carolina a few weeks later. This was the first time I had seen my brother for twelve years. I had not seen my mother for about seven years. I felt that God in his providence had cast my lot with my nearest relatives, and had blessed me with the happy privilege of meeting those that were dear to me. My eye was slowly improving. I was informed by my brother that the Old School Baptists held a meeting once a month within one-half a mile of his residence. As soon as an opportunity presented itself I attended their meetings out of curiosity (for I must confess that by this time I had become prejudiced against all religious sects, and had well nigh concluded that they had all departed from the doctrine of the Bible); but on hearing Elder W. C. Wisdom preach I was astonished. He was the first one of this order I had ever heard, and also the first man I had ever heard preach that I believed his entire discourse. However, I was not entirely satisfied until I had formed his acquaintance personally; for I had heard men preach one way in the pulpit, and another way in private conversation. So I made it convenient to dine with him that day at the residence of a friend. After a short interview I was fully convinced that our views were the same, the only difference being that he could express my views better than I could. I now thanked God that he had blessed me with the privilege of meeting one that was able to instruct me.

During our conversation he asked me what I thought the unregenerate had to do in order to become a Christian. I replied that I thought they could no more aid in being created anew in Christ Jesus, than the dust out of which Adam was formed could aid in the creation of Adam. He then asked me if I thought it possible for those who are born of the Spirit to finally fall away. I told him I thought it as impossible for them to do so as it was for Christ to die again, since he was the life of his people. I continued to attend their meetings during the spring and summer; and the better I became acquainted with them, the more I became attached to them, for I believed they were Christ's visible church or kingdom. The love they manifested to each other excelled anything I had ever seen among any other denomination. I desired to cast my lot among them, but felt too unworthy to do so. On Saturday before the third Sunday in September my mother presented herself to the church, and was received for baptism at their next monthly meeting. I never shall forget my feelings at this meeting. When they announced the way open for the reception of members, they sang the following hymn, "Come, humble sinner, in whose breast," &c. My feelings were such that I arose and left the house, weeping like a child. At their next monthly meeting I related my experience to the church, and was received, and mother and myself were baptized by Elder W. C. Wisdom.

At a sister church, on the following Sunday, I had the privilege of meeting with the dear saints of God and commemorating the sufferings of our blessed Redeemer, and of seeing the example of feet-washing followed. Such solemnity seemed to prevail over the entire congregation, I fancied I could see the meek and lowly Lamb as he handed the bread and wine to his humble followers. Also his humiliation in washing his disciples' feet, leaving his church an example to follow until his second coming. I cannot find language to express my feelings at this meeting. I now felt that his hand had lifted me out of a horrible pit of sin, and had led me out of Babylon, as well as out of many afflictions and sore trials, and had at last conducted me into his visible fold, where I could hear the gospel of his Son preached in its purity, and where the ordinances of his house were practiced in the order delivered them. This was a feast I had never enjoyed before. I felt that the Lord had led me to his banqueting-house, and his banner over me was love.

On Saturday before the third Sunday in May, 1882, I was liberated to preach wherever God in his providence should cast my lot. Since that time I have been trying to do so. Although I have undergone many trying scenes, yet the Lord has delivered me out of them all. Though I am almost blind as to natural sight, yet I trust that God has given me spiritual light, and strength to support in time of need; for I know it is through much tribulation we must enter the kingdom triumphant; and all our sufferings then shall close, and heaven afford us sweet repose, where we shall sing the song of redemption.

Now, dear reader, I have given you an abridged outline of what I trust to be the Lord's dealings with me; first, in translating me out of nature's darkness into the glorious light and liberty of his dear Son. Secondly, in leading me out of Babylon, and into his visible church, the pillar and ground of the truth. Now, dear child of God, let me ask you, Where are you? Are you in that church that Christ set up, and has said, "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it?" Or are you in Babylon, which is the institution of men and the church of antichrist? Have you not come out from the world, as he has commanded you? If so, I admonish you to go home to your friends, the church, and tell them what great things the Lord has done for you. Do not be as the slothful servant who hid his lord's money; but let your light so shine before men, that others, seeing your good works, may be constrained to glorify God. If you are in Babylon, the Lord's admonition is to come out from among them, lest you be partakers of their sins and receive of their plagues.

Do you ask me how to know you are in Babylon? Carefully and prayerfully study the Scriptures of divine truth, and compare the teachings of the denomination with which you are identified with what is taught therein and in your own experience. If the doctrine taught by your denomination does not agree with the above named witnesses, then you are in Babylon. I trust you will seriously consider this matter; for God has said that he will not give his glory to another, nor his praise to graven images. All institutions instituted by men, claiming to be the church, or part of the church of Christ, are graven images, graven by the cunning devices of false teachers, communicated by the prince of the power of the air.

Do you ask how you may know the church of Christ? When you find an organization that advocates a doctrine that agrees with your experience and the Bible, you have then found a pearl of great price. Remember, they only are apostolic who are such in faith and practice. The church of Jesus Christ has perpetually existed since it was set up. Although the storms of persecution have raged against it, the winds of false doctrine have beaten heavily upon it, and the gates of hell have been arrayed against it, over eighteen centuries, yet it stands firm on the rock, Christ Jesus, upon which it was built.

We will now briefly notice the calling of the church, as presented in the Scriptures, in order to more clearly understand the requirements by Jesus of his bride. We will notice what God required of Israel as a nation, which is a type of the church. They were forbidden to intermingle with other nations; and when they disobeyed these requirements they forfeited their enjoyment of a land flowing with milk and honey, and God's chastisements were heavy upon them. Whatsoever was written aforetime was written for our learning. God calls his people to separation from the world; and if we are disobedient, we may expect to share a like fate. There are many benevolent institutions of men that are beneficial to the world in a literal sense, but the world has never instituted any organization that the people of God should affiliate with. If you belong to Christ, he has commanded you to have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. If you are unequally yoked together with unbelievers, you have descended from your high calling in Christ Jesus to the weak and beggarly elements of the world, and the church should not fellowship you. If she does, she disobeys the mandate of him who has said, "Withdraw yourself from every brother that walketh disorderly." It is true, if we belong to secrete organizations of men, we can by that means cultivate friendship with the world; but it is written, that their friendship is enmity with God. "Whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God." "If then ye be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above;" and remember that the path of obedience is the path of happiness; for what is there in all the pomp of the world, and the enjoyment of luxury, or the gratification of passion, compared with the tranquil delight of a good conscience? It is the health of the mind. It is the sweet perfume that diffuses its fragrance over everything near it, without exhausting its store. Unaccompanied by this, the gay pleasures of the world are like brilliants to a diseased eye, music in a deaf ear, wine in an ardent fever, or dainties in the languor of an ague. To lie down on the pillow, after a day spent in temperance, in beneficency and piety, how sweet it is! How different from the state of him who has erred from the faith, pierced himself through with many sorrows, and has to be delivered over to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

While we cannot aid in the salvation of our souls in ultimate glory, yet the enjoyment of the people of God in this world depends much upon their obedience to the mandates of their heavenly King.

A. A. EDWARDS.

LOXA, Ill., June 3, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—It has been several years since I have written anything for the columns of the SIGNS. My silence, however, has not been prompted, or rather occasioned, by indifference or lessened interest in the cause of truth as set forth therein; but plenty of others have always been on hand with able and instructive communications with which to fill the paper with comforting and edifying reading, to say nothing of your own suitable and well-written editorials that appear in every issue. To you and the rest of the brethren I have felt to accord whatever space I might, under the rules of courtesy, be entitled to.

In the past two or three years especially, the communications of brethren Durand, Purington, Chick, Cox and others have been very full of food and comfort to my soul; and the arguments presented, the scriptural doctrine brought out, and the way so clearly and plainly drawn up, that it does seem that he who runs might read. Allow me also, brethren, to say that if I have ever been even a very little learner in the school of Christ, and know anything by experience and the work of grace in the heart, I can cordially and without a qualifying sentence indorse what you have written on the subject of the Bible-taught doctrine of the new birth. It is just what I have understood you to preach years ago, as also the SIGNS OF THE TIMES to advocate and contend for; but there are times when the doctrine presents itself with more force, and in a clearer and more beautiful manner, than at other times or seasons. This is not because the doctrine changes or loses its importance. The fault is in our inability to see clearly at all times. The doctrine becomes in this respect both new and old; and it is always most comforting when seen in the light of God's revealed truth, as taught us in our experience. Then it becomes plain, reasonable and conclusive. Though grand, glorious and wonderful, it is deep, mysterious, and entirely beyond the reach of the worldly-wise. Enlightened sages have failed to penetrate its hidden depths. The proud Jewish ruler, with whom Christ conversed, was confronted with a problem he could not solve. "How can these things be?" is his astonished reply. Even the disciples of Christ can only see and know in part. By faith they accept the rest. Yet all they have or see or know or feel of this truly wonderful doctrine is revealed unto them by the Spirit, which "searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." Notwithstanding our own ideas, thoughts and notions, often crude and hastily formed, the truth proclaimed by our Savior while on earth has stood the test of centuries of assault and criticism from its zealous and untiring foes; but it has lived, still lives, and will continue to live, until every heir of the kingdom realizes its potent power, feels its gracious touch, hears its charming sound, and sees, though it may be as through a glass darkly, the beauty of holiness in the face of Jesus Christ. "Ye must be born again." Marvel not at this, brethren, for ye know that without it ye cannot enter into or see the kingdom of God. "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." "It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing."

But I began this letter to say something of my recent visit to Kentucky. Though brief, it was nevertheless a most pleasant season that I experienced among the brethren composing three of the churches in Anderson County, that were formerly under the pastoral care of the late Elder J. F. Johnson, whom I knew in my boyhood. After I grew older, and became interested in spiritual matters, it was my privilege to be often in his company and hear him speak of the beauties of a finished salvation, until his removal to Kentucky. My desire to visit him there, and become more acquainted with the churches and brethren of that section in his lifetime, never was gratified. Since he left the shores of time I have found a desire to go there still present with me; so, after preliminary arrangements had been made, on the morning of May 24th I took up my journey thither. Reaching Frankfort in the afternoon of the same day, I was met at the station by our esteemed brother Farmer, who is little less than a host within himself, and was conveyed to his hospitable home, where I was kindly cared for until my first appointment, which was at Little Flock Church on Saturday morning. Here I had the pleasure of meeting a goodly number of the brethren and friends whom I had never before seen in the flesh. The words of inquiry uttered by the man whose eyes had been so miraculously healed, in his reply to the inquiry of the Savior as to whether he (the man) believed on Christ or not, seemed impressed on my mind for a text. The words referred to read, "Who is he, Lord, that I might believe on him?" The Lord gave me a door of utterance, and I feel quite sure that our coming together was not in vain in the Lord. My earnest desire and prayer to God was that I might preach the things that become sound doctrine, and bear testimony to the truth as it is in Jesus. Very few, perhaps not more than two or three, of those present but what were entire strangers to me in the flesh; yet as I spoke I could discern the index that tells of a soul yearning for the truth, and desiring to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ, yea, and to know more of Jesus and his righteousness, as so touchingly inquired after and sought for by the character in the text. Joyfully too did I realize that the Lord had gone before and prepared the way, that I might by grace divine follow him. Surely the people unto whom the Lord sends a message are prepared to receive his word, as were Cornelius and his household. Thus the servant goes and delivers the message or words that the Lord puts into his mouth; while to them that hear the glad tidings of salvation become as rivers of water in a dry place—a river broad and deep, the streams whereof make glad the city of God. It is true that there is but one God, body or Spirit; yet in our experience he appears to us "a place of broad rivers and streams." Our meeting on Sunday was equally pleasant, and there seemed to be a strengthening of the ties of brotherly love and fellowship; and I was reminded of what the psalmist David said, when looking at the peace and order of the church, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" At Salt River on Monday, and at Goshen on Tuesday, our meetings were well attended, where I met a warm welcome and hearty greeting on the part of the brethren, as I verily believe, for the truth's sake; but O how unworthy to be thus blessed! How I did feel my nothingness and poverty! But a corresponding joy of soul was mine in the thought that all my sufficiency came from God, and that he was present to give the speaking tongue, the hearing ear, and the understanding heart. Would it be presumption for me to say, in the language of the prophet, "The Lord hath given me the tongue of the learned, that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary?" Also, "For the Lord God will help me; therefore will I not be confounded; therefore have I set my face like a flint, and I know that I shall not be ashamed." The door of utterance, once opened by the "Lion of the tribe of Judah" to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to speak as of the oracles of God, becomes an easy and pleasing service. Then, too, God is in all things glorified in Christ.

The brethren and churches visited are all in peace, so far as could be discerned. What and if they have passed through fiery trials? Such things serve to strengthen the bonds of fellowship. The trial of their faith fully consummated, and coming out of their sharp trials on the Lord's side, the wonderful unity of the one faith of the Lord's people is most beautifully set forth; for the Spirit and glory of God rest upon them, and they rejoice together that they were counted worthy to be made partakers of Christ's sufferings. At the meeting at Salt River on Monday I had the pleasure of meeting Elder Hawkins, the pastor of the church, whom I found to be a humble and faithful laborer in the vineyard. Though much indisposed in health on Monday and Tuesday, yet at our meetings there was a spiritual enjoyment and pleasure that I shall not soon forget. My illness was quite serious for several days after leaving Lawrenceburgh, Kentucky, which was on Tuesday afternoon. At this writing I am better, though in poor condition to write. The brethren and friends, one and all, have my heartfelt thanks for their kindness to me during my absence from home.

Now may the God of all grace sustain you, and lead you in straight paths, is my sincere desire.

Your brother in hope,

J. G. SAWIN.

TAYLORS, Miss., June 10, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—A friend, who signs himself B. F. Liles, of Fair Play, Texas, requests my views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on Matthew xix. 9, and says, "That portion of Scripture has troubled my mind of late." With your permission I will offer such views as I have, desiring that they should be received only so far as they may harmonize with the general tenor of the inspired word.

The Scripture cited reads as follows, "And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery: and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery." This language of the Savior was in reply to the Pharisees who came to him, tempting him with the question, "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?" It is well to notice that this conversation took place before the crucifixion of Christ, before "he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us." Also, the question is, "Is it lawful?" There are some things which are lawful that are not expedient. Jesus begins his reply by saying, "Have ye not read that he which made them at the beginning made them male and female, and said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh?" He tells them that Moses, because of the hardness of their hearts, suffered them to put away their wives; but from the beginning it was not so. It seems to me that Jesus answers in the affirmative, so far as the law of Moses is concerned; but Paul says, "For the law made nothing perfect." "The law was given by Moses; but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." "But from the beginning it was not so." It seems to me that notwithstanding the law of Moses tolerated the putting away of wives and marrying others, yet the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which makes us free from the law of sin and death, does not tolerate these things. Men who are destitute of the grace of God, and of the law of God written in the heart, and especially Pharisees and hypocrites, are glad of all the latitude that the law will give them, and generally take advantage of that latitude to plunge as deep into vice and wickedness as the law will allow them, believing that whatever the law tolerates is not sin, and that, so long as they do not go beyond the limits of the law, they are upon safe ground. So thought the Pharisees, and they believed that their eternal destiny was hinged upon their obedience to the law of Moses; but Jesus gave them to understand that although the law of Moses tolerated divorce and marrying again, yet "from the beginning it was not so." I believe that the real spiritual meaning of this Scripture is designed to teach the oneness of Christ and his church, or bride. Adam was the figure of Christ; and I regard Eve as a figure of the church. Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it; and Solomon says that she is but one, the only one of her mother, and the choice one of her that bare her. To my mind, the very fact that Christ has but one wife, or bride, shows that it never was in harmony with the teaching of the Holy Spirit for a man to put away his wife and marry another. Suppose Christ was to act upon the principle of putting away; then he might put away his church and marry another.

"Except it be for fornication." It seems to me, from this expression, that from the foregoing cause (fornication) a man would be justifiable in putting away his wife and marrying another, but for no other cause; but the church or bride of Christ does not commit fornication. "A garden inclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed." "Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee." I will here remark that the sin of adultery is no worse than any other sin that is embraced in the ten commandments, or in the works of the flesh. It is, I am sure, a mistaken idea that one who has been guilty of the sin of adultery can in no possible way become a member of the visible church. If so, then one who has stolen, or one who has lied, and a great many other things, could not be received into the church. The truth is, God's chosen and redeemed people are no better by nature than the rest of Adam's race, and so far as the law is concerned, it condemns them all; but the grace of God abounds to the very chief of sinners. A person who has been guilty of adultery can no more undo that sin than any other sin. If I should put away my wife and marry another, I would be guilty of adultery, and the death of my first wife would not nor could not release me from the sin of adultery. Adultery, like other sins of a similar character, when once committed, cannot be undone by any act of the party that committed the deed, nor by any act of any other person; but the blood of Christ can and does cleanse from all sin. My opinion is that the church has no right to go behind an application of the blood of Christ to any sinner. In his letter to the saints at Corinth Paul says, "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. And such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God."—1 Cor. vi. 9-11. We see a number of things here that are mentioned in the same category with adultery; and he tells these Corinthian brethren that "such were some of you: but ye are washed," &c. This ends the matter. If a person who had committed the sin of adultery were to offer to a church of my membership, and gave evidence that he or she had passed from death unto life, I would be as hearty in his or her reception as I would in the reception of any other quickened and saved sinner, because I would have no right to go behind his or her experience of grace; but if one who was a member of the church with me were to commit the sin of adultery after uniting with the church, I could not fellowship such a person in the church, because I would consider this, to say the least of it, a reproach upon the cause of Christ, and it would be to tread under foot the Son of God, and to count the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing, and doing despite unto the spirit of grace. Paul says of such characters that they are thought worthy of a sorer punishment than one who despised Moses' law, and died without mercy under two or three witnesses. In this sense "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." "For the Lord shall judge his people." Friend Liles will understand me to believe that adultery is a grave sin, but no worse than other sins of the same character; and that a person who has committed adultery is not necessarily beyond the reach of the grace and mercy of God; and that such persons as have been washed and cleansed by the blood of Christ have a right in the church of God, and they should go and sin no more, as Jesus said to the woman taken in adultery. If after they have been thus washed, sanctified and justified, they should commit such a sin, they should be delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of Jesus Christ. Said Paul, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief."

I hope these remarks will be satisfactory to Mr. Liles, and I would be glad to hear from him again.

Yours in gospel bonds,

H. J. REDD.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., May 29, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—We have knowledge of several instances in which brethren passing through Philadelphia (and stopping over night) were compelled to go to a hotel, because of their inability to find any Old School Baptists with whom to stay. This has caused a feeling of sadness and regret in the hearts of those whose chief desire in this earthly life is the communion with and entertainment of the saints. I would like to give to the readers of the SIGNS the addresses of a few of the Baptists families who are convenient to the railroad stations, and whose doors are always open to those who love the truth. Sister Craven, 1735 North 7th St., is and has been for many years foremost in entertaining the brethren and sisters. Her home has been looked upon as the Baptist home of Philadelphia by all who have been made sensible of her kind and loving disposition, and also that of her late husband. The brightest hours of her present life are those in which she is giving entertainment to and listening to those who delight to speak of the things of her Father's kingdom. Brother and sister Thomas, 1116 Hanover St., both of whom have passed beyond four score of the years allotted to them, have always a glad smile and a kindly welcome for all who cross their threshold. Brother and sister Walton, 1952 Crosky St., seek no greater enjoyment than that of entertaining those who desire to follow him who is their all and in all. Sister Barnsley, with her husband and mother, 1923 Croskey St., welcome all who enter their pleasant home, with such kindness that they feel to exclaim, The Lord has been here before me. The house of Robert Tawressey (formerly of Wilmington, Delaware) is so well known that it is hardly necessary to mention it. Their present address is 2022 North 7th St., this city. My own address is 1910 N. 22d St. Our latch-string is always out. I do not feel that Old Baptists ought to wait for invitation or stand on formality. We are in the world, as the apostle tells us; and I am glad he also declares that we are not of this world. As the children of Israel were in the wilderness, having no certain abiding place, traveling their weary pilgrimage of forty years, their hopes and affections were not set upon that wilderness land in which they sojourned, nor aught that it contained; but they looked for a better country, a land flowing with milk and honey, which the Lord their God had promised them. So the remnant according to promise, the chosen vessels of God's mercy in all succeeding ages, as they pass through the wilderness of this world, look not with favor upon the vanities of the world, turning their eyes neither to the right nor to the left, their hearts being directed to the heavenly Jerusalem by the faith which is given them in Christ Jesus our Lord. If it is our province to journey from one part of the country to another, it is certainly our desire to endeavor to find out those on the way with whom we may have godly conversation; for by experience we are aware that in the times past we walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit which now worketh in the children of disobedience; among whom we also had our conversation in times past, in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others (Eph. ii. 3); but now our desires and our conversation have been led into another channel; for we have been brought out of darkness into God's marvelous light; and he hath quickened us together with Christ, and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. Sometimes the journey is long and tedious, and we are made weary, and are troubled by reason of the thorn in the flesh. The trials and afflictions by the way many times overcome us, and we faint, all our strength being gone. Then we remember the Lord, that he is our strength and our salvation. So, dear brethren, let us come together on all possible occasions, and encourage one another. Let us feel at all times that we are one company; that no condition in or circumstance of this present life can estrange us; having, as we hope, within us that love of God which passeth all understanding, and an abiding love for the truth as it is in Jesus. We are admonished that when one is taught of the Lord, he should communicate that which has been taught him. And how can we communicate unless we meet often one with another? Had we a thousand tongues, they would be inadequate to tell to each other all that our dear Savior has done for us, poor, lost sinners. Much is comprehended in the word "lost," and no sinner of Adam's race can realize its full meaning until he is awakened by the power of God to his own lost condition. Then does he look into his wicked and depraved heart, exclaiming with the old patriarch, "Behold, I am vile." And when we are brought to that condition in which our sense of helplessness is complete, and our dear Redeemer has unfolded to us the glory of his presence and the fullness of his salvation, our desire is at once to go to those whom we know have a like precious experience, and communicate to them our hopes, our fears, and our exceeding joy in the Lord; for we are now fully conscious that no power except the Lord's could quicken such a totally depraved creature into life as we felt ourselves to be.

Oftimes we are timid about calling upon our brethren at any or all times in the day, fearing by so doing to give trouble or cause inconvenience, and so we refrain; thereby losing many sweet and precious conversations. It seems to me we should endeavor to overcome those feelings, as much as is in our natural power. How often have we been carried along joyously for many days on one sweet word of comfort dropped by a brother during a brief conversation; and when we look back over those bright days we invariably see that our comfort has come from a different direction than we had natural reason to expect. When the manna was given to the children of Israel in the desert, there was always enough for all, and none to spare. And so with God's grace; it is always sufficient for us, and none is ever wasted. Jesus is our sufficiency; and, secure in him, our riches are greater than anything the earth can afford. The admonition to let brotherly love continue should be always uppermost in our minds, thereby keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. May we labor, as God giveth us ability, for the welfare and comfort of the saints, building up ourselves in our most holy faith, that we may become established in the truth, and so contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints.

Yours in hope of life eternal,
B. F. COULTER.

GRIFFIN'S CORNERS, N. Y., June 26, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—As I have to write to you on business, I feel like telling you of our glorious yearly meeting, which was held last Saturday and Sunday, with the Clovesville Church, in the Lexington Association. We had a very large attendance, and the words of David were truly and feelingly expressed, "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name," &c. The brethren and sisters manifested that love one for another, so that we could say, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." The preaching was so mixed with faith that it was meat to the hungry and drink to the thirsty; and while the followers of the Lamb were drinking such fresh supplies, they did declare with David, "There is a river the streams whereof make glad the city of God." May the Lord still comfort us with apples and stay us with flagons, that we may follow our Savior through evil report as well as through good.

At the close of the meeting on Saturday, hymn 471, with the chorus, was sung, and all were united in heart and hand, joined in one band completely.

Yours as ever for the truth's sake,
JAMES MILLER.

CHRIST THE SIN-BEARER.

"ALL we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all."—Isa. liii. 6.

In the unsearchable mystery of that sacred book the names of all his saints are indelibly written by the sovereign hand of our God. Our Lord says that this record is in heaven.—Luke x. 20. Nothing earthly or temporal can affect the unchangeable purpose of God as therein already written. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ hath blessed all them whom he hath chosen in him, and this blessing is not in earthly things, but in heavenly, in Christ. No other reason is revealed for this divine blessing but that which our Lord declares, "Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight." Included in this election, and inseparable from it, is the wonderful truth expressed in the name of our incarnate Lord, as announced by the angel to Joseph, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." The manner in which he should accomplish this miraculous work was declared by Isaiah, in the same chapter with our text, "By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities." While the eternal purpose of God had appointed the time when this work should be manifestly fulfilled in the crucifying of our Lord, it seems clear to our view that divine justice held him under its condemnation from the instant that his body and bride came under the contamination of sin. "Without the shedding of blood is no remission."—Heb. ix. 22. Consequently, the determinate counsel of God appointed our Redeemer unto death in the very choice of his redeemed ones unto life. When he was manifested in the flesh, it was that he might satisfy the demand of that law which his people had violated. Nothing but the life of the sinner could be accepted as that satisfaction. No substitute could atone for the sin of any transgressor of that perfect law. "The soul that sinneth it shall die."—Ezek. xviii. 4. Such is the unity of Christ and his people that they could not be under condemnation without bringing that condemnation upon him as their Head and Life. Thus Paul says that God "hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."—2 Cor. v. 21. It is by virtue of this indissoluble unity of Christ as the life of all his members, which comprise the whole body of his redeemed people, that they are saved from sin by his death. Our Lord Jesus himself assigns this as the reason of their deliverance from the power of death. "Because I live, ye shall live also."—John xiv. 19. As long as this unity has existed, so long the sins of all his members have been laid on him, and not imputed to them. Since the saints are chosen in him from the beginning, even "before the foundation of the world," that election is before time was created, and consequently before they were involved in sin. This everlasting provision of sovereign grace is the very foundation of the hope of every sinner whose trust is in the Lord. But for this real identity of the chosen members of the body of Christ with him as their true life, there is no revelation of any principle upon which created things could have survived, even for one instant, the entrance of sin into the world. The omnipotence of our Savior bore and carried his chosen ones, with all the weight of their sin and pollution, "all the days of old." "In all their affliction he was afflicted; and the angel of his presence saved them."—See Isa. lxiii. All that is there written is the testimony of true unity embracing the Lord Jesus as the eternal life of his body, the church of his election, who are saved from their sins through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. From the beginning they were chosen in Christ, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love; from the same beginning he was the victim who must bear their sins in his own body on the tree. This was not by a transfer of their guilt to him as a merely voluntary sufferer. It was impossible that any other offering should be accepted by the holy law of God. The body was convicted of sin; the Life must pay the penalty. In the contemplation of the deep mysteries of revealed truth, much confusion arises from the fact that we are creatures of time, and our thoughts cannot grasp the unknown things of eternity. We talk of the events of time as if they were to the mind of our God past or future, as they are to finite intelligence. It is impossible that reason should form any correct conception of the things of the Spirit of God, because God has purposely hid them from the search of natural wisdom. It is impossible that any words which can be used shall definitely express to the natural comprehension of those who hear or read, the hidden mysteries of which the saints delight to commune together. Even the very language of the inspired Scriptures can only be correctly understood when the Spirit of truth takes it, and shows to the saints in it the glorious testimony of Jesus. Therefore it is very essential that we be careful in all our conversation and correspondence, lest we either use inappropriate words, or misconstrue the expressions of others, when a correct understanding would show that our difference was merely striving about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers.—2 Tim. ii. 14.

It certainly seems clear, and every conscious sinner must believe there is salvation in no other name under heaven given among men, but in the name of Christ Jesus. That salvation can only be revealed in strict harmony with infinite justice. When sin brought death into the world, immediately the promise of deliverance was given. The Seed of the woman was the Savior of all the saints who were manifested in time before Jesus was born in Bethlehem, just as truly as he is the Savior of those who have since that time been brought to the knowledge of the truth. They were saved not merely on the promise of the Redeemer that he would assume their sins when he should come in the flesh; they had no sooner gone into transgression than their sins were laid on him who was their Surety, their Head and their Life. This will not be questioned by our brother. A prospective Savior would not have been sufficient for the present need of those ancient saints, any more than the letter of the Scripture concerning him can bring comfort and assurance to the afflicted and poor people who now hope in his grace. He was to them "a very present help in trouble," and it was the "angel of his presence saved them." Being "full of faith and power," Stephen said, "This is he that was with the church in the wilderness, with the angel which spake to him in the mount Sina, and with our fathers."—Acts vii. 38. It is certain that this is spoken of that Prophet whom the Lord should raise up, who is unquestionably the Lord Jesus Christ. It was not merely a promised Savior who was with the three Hebrews in the fiery furnace, who delivered Daniel in the den of lions, and who brought David up out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set his feet upon a rock, and established his goings. While in the time of those old saints many centuries must drag their slow length along before the angels' song should be heard in Judea, in the eternal truth of God "The works were finished from the foundation of the world."—Heb. iv. 3. This is assigned as the ground upon which believers do enter into rest. This truth is beyond the comprehension of men; yet it is the only assurance upon which the hope of salvation can be safely founded. Justice could not accept a compromise of its demands upon any plan devised after the violation of the law. There is no interval of time between the entrance of sin and the death of the sinner. Death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned. Jesus did not come to keep his people from being sinners; he saves them from their sins. So Paul says, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief." The subjects of redemption are those who are lost, and "were by nature the children of wrath, even as others."

It is upon our Surety that the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all, not by an arbitrary transfer of guilt from the actual transgressors to Christ as a substitute; but by the just requirement that he must render satisfaction to the holy law for the sins of those for whom he was held responsible as their Surety. In consequence of this relationship to his saints, it is evident that they had no sooner become involved in sin than their Surety was under obligation to pay the penalty. In this figure, there is no time when the debtor is held under the claim of justice separately from his responsible Surety. The law demands satisfaction, not of the insolvent debtor, but of the Surety on whom the obligation rests. In the typical relation of husband and wife, she cannot contract a debt which is not justly charged against her husband. As our Life, the sentence of justice rests upon Christ from the instant when the body is defiled by sin. Hence, he says, "I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened until it be accomplished!"—Luke xii. 50. That terrible burial under the billows of just condemnation might well extort from him the sweat "as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground." But this was only the manifestation of the burden of our iniquities which were laid on him when he received the curse due to our transgressions. Had that curse come upon us without the intervention of his omnipotent salvation, we must have sunk to hopeless ruin. No other arm but that of our mighty Savior was able to bear the weight of that condemnation. The dreadful visitation of almighty wrath which he endured was not confined to the dark hours on the cross of Calvary. It was for that very purpose that he came into the world. His whole mission here on earth was the work of putting away the sin of his chosen people by the offering of himself without spot to God. In that great work, "Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered; and being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him."—Heb. v. 8, 9. If there had been no just principle upon which Christ Jesus was responsible for the sins of his people, his death could not have ransomed them from sin. But because he was their living Head justice demanded satisfaction of him for all their iniquity. We cannot find any time when that demand was against his people without his all sufficient grace as the Mediator whose intercession is always effectual, because he has borne their iniquities. All the days of old he bare and carried them even when they wandered from his right way. "He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."—Heb. vii. 25. Without this real vital unity of Christ and the subjects of his salvation, it is impossible that he should bear their sins. If in his infinite compassion he should voluntarily propose to receive their punishment as a substitute for the guilty, justice would be doubly outraged by the acceptance of such an offer. "He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the just, even they both are abomination to the Lord."—Prov. xvii. 15. Thus the doctrine of mere substitution of the sinless Redeemer for the guilty sinner, would not only fail to relieve the sinner from condemnation, but it would add an awful abomination against the holiness of God.

It is possible that we have failed to answer the precise point of our brother's inquiry. If so, we can only crave his charity. Language at best is very defective for the expression of the deep things of the revelation of God. It is only as they are taught of the Lord that the children of Zion are led into the knowledge of heavenly things, and that teaching always serves to promote their peace. In their experience of the gracious work of justification the saints are all taught the same truth of the grace of God as revealed in our Lord Jesus Christ. However they may differ in the use of words to express what they have learned in this one school of our great Teacher, they must agree in the essential fact that they have no hope for salvation from sin and death but in the perfect redemption which is in Christ Jesus. While the personal consciousness of sin brings to every subject of grace the knowledge of divine justice in their condemnation, it is not until the revelation of Christ as their Redeemer that they can know anything of that salvation which he has already provided for them. There never was a time when the life of the whole redeemed church of God was not in the Lord Jesus Christ. That life must be laid down for the purging of the sins of his people; and this is what we understand to be the bearing of our sins by our Lord "in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness; by whose stripes ye were healed." In Christ himself there was no sin, even when he was flesh, and in his humiliation under the law. Certainly no sin could attach to him in his eternal Godhead. Yet the iniquity of all his people was laid on him from the moment when they were sinners, and it was for this cause that a guilty world was preserved from instant destruction. The everlasting covenant recognized in him the ability to magnify the law and satisfy its utmost demand; therefore its provisions are ordered in all things and sure. It was through this covenant that he could say, "The reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen upon me."—Psa. lxxix. 9. From the existence of this covenant divine justice holds him as the Life and Surety of his elect people; therefore, to our view, their sins were ever laid upon him, and his coming in the flesh was the necessary consequence of that eternal unity in which he is the only life of "the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all."

While we have thus presented our own understanding of the subject embraced in the inquiry of our brother, we have no design to controvert the view which he briefly expresses. To finite understanding there is no possibility that the Lord our Righteousness should bear our sins, and yet be infinitely holy and righteous. This can only be known as it is revealed by the Spirit through faith. Our limited reason cannot receive it. In manifestation, the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among men, when Jesus was born in Bethlehem; but in the eternal truth of God that same Word was in the beginning with God, and the Word was God. So, Moses says, "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou God."—Psa. xc. 1, 2.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—May 25th, 1889, at the residence of her son-in-law, James Campbell, Howard, Ontario, Canada, Mrs. Catharine Kerr, in her eighty-eighth year.

She was born in Scotland, Oct. 26th, 1801, and crossed the ocean in 1818, on the same vessel with Elder Campbell, who afterward baptized her in the fellowship of the Covenanted Baptist Church, of which for nearly fifty-eight years she remained a faithful and orderly member. As the infirmities of age increased it was cheering to hear her tell how that, after being some years under conviction, she was raised to hope by the words, "It is the voice of my Beloved that knocketh, saying, Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled; for my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night." Also, "My Beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand." The next morning she was received by the church. After a few months she saw her husband (Colin Kerr) die rejoicing in hope, and these words were given her (Song vi. 6), "Thy teeth are as a flock of sheep which go up from the washing, whereof every one beareth twins, and there is not one barren among them." Her funeral was largely attended. Brother Keene accompanied us twenty-seven miles to the cemetery, where we laid her remains in the same grave where she had so sorrowfully laid her husband fifty-seven years and two weeks before. She leaves one daughter, grandchildren and great-grandchildren to mourn their loss; but we feel that

"She's gone, she's gone to realize
Those sacred truths beyond the skies,
And all their fullness prove;
No more to sip the cheering rill,

But at the fountain drink her fill
Of everlasting love."

SARAH CAMPBELL.
NORTHWOOD, Ontario, Canada.

DIED—At his residence, near Winterton Station, Sullivan Co., N. Y., on Tuesday, at 12:30 a. m., July 9th, 1889, after a lingering illness, brother Salmon W. Hoyt, aged sixty-five years, three months and two days.

He was a son of the late Archibald Hoyt. He was married to Miss Henrietta S. Benedict, a daughter of the late Deacon Miner Benedict, April 14th, 1859, by the late Elder Gilbert Beebe. There were born unto them ten children, nine of whom survive, one having died June 9th, 1874. He is survived by his companion, who is an esteemed member of the New Vernon Church, four sons, five daughters, two grandchildren, three sisters and two brothers.

Brother Hoyt experienced a hope, and with several others was baptized in the fellowship of the church at New Vernon by Elder Gilbert Beebe, March 18th, 1860. On July 3d, 1886, he was chosen to serve the church as Clerk, which office he filled until his last sickness, to the satisfaction of the church. He was a good and pleasant brother, and will be much missed by the church, as well as by his sorrowing companion and children. May the God of all comfort be their stay and support in this and every hour of sorrow and trial.

The funeral services were conducted by his pastor, Elder Benton Jenkins, and all that was mortal of the loved one was deposited in the cemetery of the New Vernon Church, on Thursday, July 11th.

POETRY.

THE INDWELLING SPIRIT.

"He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you."—John xiv. 17.

O WONDROUS words! More wondrous grace!

Blest Spirit, can it be That thou, the Infinite, Supreme,
Canst stoop to dwell with me?

Not as a transient, earthly guest,
Who goes and comes at will;
But through the changing scenes of life
Abiding with me still.

Mysterious power, yet clearly known;
For they to whom 'tis given
To dwell with God on earth, oft find
His presence makes their heaven.

Then, holy God, the Infinite,
The Father, Spirit, Son,
In fellowship with thee I find
My heaven on earth begun.

EXPERIENCE.

In a desert place I wandered,
Through a long and cloudy night,
And the shadows gathered round me,
With no ray of heavenly light.

All my sins, as high as mountains,
Rose before my troubled view;
Doubts, and fears, and vain delusions,
Added to my sorrows too.

Long the way, and dark and dreary,
Rough the path, and steep and wild,
And I grew foot-sore and weary,
By my sins and guilt defiled.
Bowed beneath my weight of trouble,
And distressed on every hand;
But when earthly help had failed me,
Jesus kindly took my hand.

He raised up and bade me trust him;
Gave me life, who once was dead;
Gave me sight to look unto him;
Smiled, and all my troubles fled;
Led me high upon the mountain,
Far from doubts, and far above;
In green pastures, by still waters,
Filling me with peace and love.

O what joy and peace possessed me!
Then my grateful heart could sing,
Praise the Lord, O praise him ever;
He's my Savior, Lord and King.
Then I thought, I'm free from trouble,
Smooth's my path, the way is clear;
But, alas! soon in the valley
I was plunged, in doubt and fear.

For I found out, to my sorrow,
Sin still reigned within my breast,
And between the flesh and Spirit
Found but little peace and rest.
But in times of darkest trials,
Often almost in despair,
I have found my help in Jesus,
For there's always solace there.

Trials to us are appointed—
May we kiss the chastening rod;
Let us heed the admonition,
"Be still; know that I am God."
When our journey here is ended,
And the hour of death has come,
We will hear the welcome summons,
Child, your Father calls, come home.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Ghent, Ky., June 25, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Moses closed the blessing that he pronounced on the children of Israel with these words, "Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency! and thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee; and thou shalt tread upon their high places."—Deut. xxxiii. 29.

After these words were spoken, Moses went up from the plains of Moab, unto the mountain of Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, and from that lofty eminence beheld that land which the Lord swear unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, saying, "I will give it unto thy seed." But he could not enter that land, for he was the representative of the law covenant. But he beheld it, for his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated. While the law could not enter into the gospel dispensation, prefigured by the land of promise which flowed with milk and honey, yet it looked into it by its more than wonderful figures, types and shadows. The Lord had said unto Abraham, "Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; and also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance." That the children of Israel were a type of spiritual Israel is a truth so plainly taught in the sacred volume that we need not now stop to demonstrate it. You, dear saint, were in bondage, led captive by the devil at his will, as completely as were the children of Israel when in Egypt. Then you had hard task-masters (the world, the flesh and the devil), and they were saying to you continually, "Work, work, work." But when you, like the children of Israel, were delivered from that bondage, you, like they, began to wander; but you knew not whither you went. Even then you had a leader, but he could not lead you into a land of rest, for he was the representative of the law of sin and death. When he had led you to the borders of spiritual Canaan, he could go no further. You then did not desire the company of that leader any longer. Under his leadership you had long been hearing the awful thunderings of Sinai, saying to you, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Jordan had to be crossed before the children of Israel could enter natural Canaan; and when they were on its banks it was full to overflowing. The name Jordan means judgment. They must cross that river before they could enjoy the delights of that land which had been promised them. You, dear saint, must cross, must pass, that judgment. When you by a sweet and precious faith beheld your great Leader, Jesus, who by his own power has driven back the waters of that river of judgment which you so much dreaded, it was then you could appropriately cry out, "Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord?" Under that great Leader you were then about to enter the church, where the thunderings of Sinai could no more disturb your rest. In that spiritual Canaan there were many mansions of rest. Your great Leader, Jesus, had led you into that peaceful abode of the saints, and said unto you, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." Under that law covenant you had been toiling, working, and finding no rest. Like Israel of old you had been laboring; but now by faith you beheld your great Deliverer, who was made the end of the law to you; who had for you and in your room and stead fulfilled it in all its jots and tittles. Then surely you had great cause to rejoice and be happy, and from the deepest recesses of your heart to accept in its full extent that language of inspiration, "Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord?" But when Israel entered Canaan, Jericho was before them, and it must fall. There were also there the usurping tribes. They had taken possession of that land, which was not theirs. They must be driven out, or sorrow and affliction would befall Israel. The Lord said unto them, "Observe thou that which I command thee this day: behold, I drive out before thee the Amorite, and the Canaanite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Hivite, and the Jebusite. Take heed to thyself, lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goest, lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee."—Ex. xxxiv. 11, 12. But they failed to obey that command of the Lord. It is written, "Yet it came to pass when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute, but did not utterly drive them out." They proved to be a sore curse to Israel. But you, dear saint, will remember that the church, the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ, was set up on the earth, and all the members of that kingdom had an earthly relationship, with all the corruptions pertaining to that relationship; and when you were led by your great Leader into the sweet and ever-precious enjoyments of that kingdom, you were not enabled to drive out entirely the Canaanites (the corruptions of that earthly nature), and they have been a snare to you all through your earthly pilgrimage. The corruptions of that Adamic nature, represented and prefigured by those Canaanites, have not been utterly driven out, and O how often have they become a snare unto you. Yes, when you have waxed strong, full of pride and boasting, and numbering your hosts, and full of vain glorying over your money, it was then that those corruptions, prefigured by the usurping nations in the land of promise, drove you into captivity. The candle of the Lord then ceased to shine about you. You then forgot that your Lord had said to you, "Unto this man will I look, even unto him that is poor, and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word." When your confidence was fixed on earthly things, and your trust in the power of money to aid your Lord in carrying on his work, you ceased to tremble at his word, who had said to you, "Not by might, nor by power; but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." Who also had said to you, "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God, that sheweth mercy." When you then saw the Canaanites in your land, and by reason of their presence was driven into captivity, you, like your prototype, the children of Israel, were made in deep sorrow to cry out, "How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?" The glories of Zion were not then before you, and you wept because you were by the rivers of Babylon, which mean confusion and strife; and in sorrow you hung your harps upon the willows in the midst thereof. Ah, yes, you could not sing with the heart and with the understanding in that land of confusion and strife. But let us remember that Israel was delivered from Babylonish captivity; and so you, dear saint, by the same mighty power will be delivered from that captivity into which you are so often led by the corruptions of the flesh. Your Lord has for your comfort said to you, "Happy art thou, O Israel! who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord?" You will be saved as completely from that captivity as was Israel of old. But you will remember that salvation is by the Lord. Yea, you will return and come to Zion. When Israel returned from Babylon they found the walls of Jerusalem broken down; but they were brought back to rebuild them. So you, dear saints, will be saved with an everlasting salvation. But when you are brought back from captivity, from wandering after strange gods, and behold your spiritual Jerusalem with broken walls, you will readily say, "An enemy has been here." The enemies of Israel which broke down the walls of Jerusalem were an apt figure of those who have been laboring throughout the gospel dispensation to break down and destroy the glorious walls that surround our spiritual Jerusalem. Those walls are the unchanging attributes of our God. It is written, "For I, saith the Lord, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her." But of those who labored on the walls of Jerusalem in rebuilding them it is written, "They which builded on the wall, and they that bare burdens, with those that laded, every one with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon. For the builders, every one had his sword girded by his side, and so builded."—Neh. iv. 17, 18. So it is in this gospel dispensation. The enemies of the Zion of our God are as numerous and as vigilant in opposing her being built up as were the enemies of Jerusalem in the days of Artaxerxes. But in this day they are laboring to build a mock Jerusalem, and the materials they are using are hay, wood and stubble—all perishable, and of an earthly character. It will be remembered that builders never make the materials for the building. Man possesses no creative power. But in these degenerate days many are claiming that by the means they are using they are instrumental in creating the heirs of immortal glory. O what ignorance of sacred things! The Lord by the prophet says, "I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back; bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth, even every one that is called by my name; for I have created him for my glory, I have formed him, yea, I have made him." But the true builders, the ministers of the everlasting gospel, in their great work and by preaching that gospel are gathering into spiritual Jerusalem those sons and daughters which their glorious Lord hath created for his own glory. But they go forth armed. With one hand they hold a weapon; yea, they every one have his sword girded by his side. That sword is the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. To them the apostle said, "Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day." Surely this is the evil day spoken of by the apostle. Peter describes these days, saying, "But there were false prophets among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. And many shall follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of." Those who deny God's eternal, unchanging and electing love, and those who deny his infinite wisdom in predestinating all things after the counsel of his own immutable will, deny the Lord that bought them. The prayer of the dear saints is that God may reveal to them more and more of his great and wondrous character. When their prayers are answered they grow in grace and in a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. In him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and hence in him dwell all the infinitely glorious attributes of our God; and to deny any of them is to "deny the Lord that bought them." Then what fear seizes us when we are meditating upon this more than wonderful subject, lest we in our ignorance deny in some form and to some extent his omnipotence, his great and (to finite minds) his incomprehensible power, or deny his omniscience, that wisdom which comprehends all things, present, past and future, from the creation of the seventy millions of stars that bespangle night's sable arch, even to the falling of a sparrow; or deny his omnipresence, that attribute of our God which fills the hearts of his saints, sometimes with joy, and sometimes with fear. It affords them joy and rejoicing when they can truly hope, trust and believe that he is ever present with them, to protect, comfort and uphold them amidst all the sorrows and afflictions through which they are called to pass while in their earthly pilgrimage. But they greatly fear and tremble when meditating upon that attribute of their God, knowing that he is ever present, beholding their erring ways, the deep-seated corruption of their frail and sinful nature; or doubt his immutability, that attribute of our God by which, when the dear saints have passed through seasons of darkness and gloom, they are made to inquire with the psalmist, "Will the Lord cast off forever? and will he be favorable no more? Is his mercy clean gone forever? doth his promise fail forevermore?" Amidst that gloom and sorrow he comes to them in his immutability, and says, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." "I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed." It is then they are made to rejoice in God their Savior, knowing that if he could change, their sins and their iniquities are sufficient to cause him to turn from them and let them sink to rise no more; or doubt his holiness, and say with vain, sinful mortals, "If God saves some with an everlasting salvation, and does not give all a chance to be saved, he is not just, is not holy." But the saints rejoice in his holiness, in his righteousness, hoping and trusting that his righteousness has been imputed to them, and that ere long they will be clad in that robe of righteousness wrought out by him for them, and enter that blessed abode where they will sin no more, where this corruptible will put on incorruption; or doubt his justice, not remembering that it is written, "Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil, and canst not look on iniquity." Yea, and not remembering that inspiration hath declared, "Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne; mercy and truth shall go before thy face;" or doubt his love, of whom it is written, "God is love." But the dear saints greatly rejoice when they by the power of the Spirit are enabled to behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God. It was that love that caused our glorious Lord to lay aside the glory he had with the Father before the world was, and take upon himself a body, in which he was so poor, so far as this world's goods were concerned, that he said, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." Yea, it was that everlasting love that he had for his people which caused him to pass through the sorrows of Gethsemane, and the torture of Calvary, that he might bring in everlasting righteousness and redemption to his people. Beholding this most wondrous love, his saints in humble resignation can most sweetly sing,

"Grant me this one request,
And I'll be satisfied,
That love divine may rule my breast,
And all my actions guide."

These are the seven spirits that are before the throne, and are sent out into all the earth. Wherever God's dear people are, it matters not whether in a lonely prison, or wandering in a dreary desert, these glorious attributes of our God are there to sustain, uphold, comfort and protect them. When realizing their wondrous presence and saving power, surely they in ever-precious faith can with joy cry out, "Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency?"

May those who read these feeble and rambling thoughts be blessed with that sweet and precious faith that enables the dear saints to behold the ineffable glories that shine forth in that blessed name that is called Wonderful, is the prayer of this little one.

H. COX.

DEAR BROTHER:—I have been greatly comforted in reading some of the letters of the little ones in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, telling of what the Lord has done for them; and I feel impressed to tell you something of the goodness and mercy of our dear Lord, and of what I hope have been his dealings with a poor, vile sinner like me. Should you deem it worthy of a place in your paper, and for the comfort of those dear children of God whom I have been made to love, you may publish it.

When a boy I was taught that there was a God who sees all things, and that unless I was good and obeyed his commandments I would be lost, and at the end of the world I would be cast into an everlasting fire. To escape this awful punishment I was taught that I must obey him; and when I did anything wrong I must ask him to forgive me. When twelve years old I left my home to live with a family in Sterling, Wayne Co., Pa. This family were very strict Methodists, and were anxious that I should attend their meetings every Sunday, and go to Sunday School, which I did regularly for about two years. The first winter I was there I attended their revival or protracted meetings, and was influenced by the minister and others of the older members, and by seeing my young playmates go forward for prayers, to ask them to pray for me. We went on the so-called anxious seats for several nights, and after they had prayed for us we were asked if we felt any better, or if the Lord had forgiven our sins. I could not answer as some of my young friends did; and after praying for me a long time, I was taken on six months' probation, and was told if I was a good boy during this time I would be baptized and become a member of their church. I felt no different when the time came around; but as they thought I had been a good boy, being advised by a number of the older members, I consented to be sprinkled and become a member of the Methodist Church. They seemed anxious that I should be a good boy, and told me to keep on praying to the Lord to forgive my sins, attend their Sunday School, and read my Testament; and I tried for awhile to do as they told me to. When I was fourteen years old I left this place and came to Scranton to work. They gave me a letter to present to the minister at Scranton, so I might become a member of his church; but as I was among strangers, and did not care any more about going to meeting, I neglected to say anything about my letter to any one. The following summer I came up in the country, and for the first time in my life I heard an Old School Baptist minister preach. I did not understand what he said, but somehow it seemed very different from any sermon I had ever heard, and the people seemed to have a feeling for each other very different from the people of other churches. This was twenty years ago this summer; and I have always looked on these people as being so much better than others, that I have had a desire during this time to be like them. I have never attended Sunday Schools or other meetings since then. I remained in Scranton and Wilkesbarre until eight years ago, when I came up here, and have attended the Old School Baptist meetings when convenient, having no desire to attend other meetings, and have often felt as though I would like to be worthy of a home with them; but they seem as far above me as the heaven is above the earth. I had given up reading the Bible, as I had plenty of other reading I liked better. Last fall I began to see that I was a great sinner. This feeling seemed to grow stronger each day, and last winter I was reading the Bible most of the time; but instead of making me feel any better, I seemed to grow worse all the time, until I thought I should certainly die. For four months there was no rest for me day nor night. My burden was so great I could not sleep, and many times I wanted to die to get rid of this burden. This feeling was so strong at times that I had serious thoughts of taking my life; and now I can see that it was nothing but the power of God that kept me from it. For some time I would take something to make me sleep; but I had such horrible dreams that I determined to die rather than pass through such feelings. For many nights I did not sleep any, and became so weak that I felt as though I must die. I felt that hell was my portion, but I was perfectly reconciled to such a fate. I had not tried to pray for twenty years; and as it seemed as though I was not permitted to die, I cried to the Lord to have mercy on my soul; but my sins were so great that I could not pray as I had been taught, and all I could say was, "O Lord, have mercy on me." But I sank deeper and deeper, until it seemed that I must certainly die; and though I felt willing to die, I could not; and when it seemed there was no hope for such a vile wretch as I, the Lord in his great mercy took this awful burden from me. On the night of March 19th last, after sitting up until nearly morning, I went to bed, thinking I would die before morning; and as I was lying on my face, crying to the Lord for mercy, I heard these words, as if spoken to me, "Trust in the Lord! Trust in the Lord!" These words were so distinct that after hearing them repeated several times I thought I must ask my wife if she could not hear them; and just as I was going to speak to her the voice ceased speaking, and all at once my burden left me, so suddenly that I felt like a different being, and a feeling of peace and rest came over me, until I fell asleep. The next morning I awoke in a happy state of mind, which lasted for a day or two, when I began to think of going before the church here, which had seemed so pure to me for twenty years, and tell them my feelings. For several days I was in great trouble of mind, for I could not help thinking about it; and I seemed to be such a miserable, vile sinner, I could not tell these people about my feelings. But this desire grew stronger, and I could not help thinking about it. Then these people would seem so pure, and so much better than myself, I determined I would say nothing to any one on this subject. I tried to get my burden back, but could not. Then these words came to me one day, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." O what a love I felt for those people, and how unworthy I was to think of asking for a home with them! Elder Vail preached here in the little school-house the next Sunday, and it seemed the Lord led him to speak of the trials and afflictions of the saints of God, and he told of my doubts and fears in such a way that I thought he must know what I had passed through. For a short time I felt that the Lord in his great goodness had shown mercy to poor, wretched me, and I wanted to tell Elder Vail about it, but felt too unworthy. A few nights after this I had a beautiful dream, which left such an impression on my mind that it seemed I must tell some of those dear people about it. It seemed so pure to me that I felt it must come from the Lord. I dreamed I was with those people in the little school-house, Elder Vail being there with the others, and I heard a lady relate her experience before the church. Her words were very simple, but everything seemed so beautiful, and each one looked so pure, that I felt unworthy to be there. As soon as the lady took her seat she looked so beautiful that I hardly knew her. Then it seemed that if I would tell those people my experience I would look as they did. This feeling was in my mind in the morning when I awoke, and I felt very sad when I realized it was only a dream; still it seemed so beautiful to me that I thought I must tell them about it. But this feeling of unworthiness would come over me at times, and I asked the Lord to lead me to do what was right in his sight about asking a home with those people. I prayed for more evidence from the Lord to tell those people of his dealings with me. A few nights after this I dreamed I was with those same people, and Elder Vail and some of the members were seated in the centre of the room to pass on my experience. I had not told them about it, but it seemed they knew it; and when I realized their purpose I tried to leave the room, but could not, as the doors were locked. So I knelt down in a corner where they could not see me, until one of them spoke and said, "This is a true experience of a child of God." These words seemed very dear to me, and I arose; and though I felt unworthy to be with those people, I could not leave them. For a day or two I thought I would go before the church at the next meeting and tell them how good the Lord had been to me; but I felt so unworthy that I could not make up my mind to do so. I had felt better for some time, and had been given a little strength so that I could work a little; and while in the field one day, soon after this beautiful dream came to me, these words were spoken to me, "Made white in the blood of the Lamb." I looked around, but saw no person. They were spoken several times, and left such an impression on my mind that I felt I must know what they meant; and somehow it seemed they must be in the Bible. I looked for them that night and the next day, but did not find them. The next morning I thought I must go into the field to work, and just as I commenced my work those words were spoken to me again. At first I thought I would not listen; but they seemed to be spoken louder and more distinct, until I felt compelled to leave my work and go to the house; and as it seemed they must be in the Bible, I searched it until nearly night, without success. Then I looked in the concordance, and was referred to the seventh chapter of Revelation, fourteenth verse. When I opened the Bible to this chapter I was impressed to go into another room, where I could be alone. Then I was led to read from the first verse. I read from the first to the ninth verse, and it seemed very clear to my mind. From the ninth to the fourteenth verse inclusive it seemed like a great revelation, and everything described there seemed to pass before my eyes, and such a feeling came over me that I cannot describe it. I saw the great multitude arrayed in white robes, and before I fully realized my natural surroundings I looked to see if I was arrayed in one of those white robes which I saw. Then these precious words were spoken to me, "Trust in the Lord! Trust in the Lord!" These words seemed very dear to me, and I felt like praising the Lord. The first words that came to my mind were, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ, according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world." "Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." I cannot express my feelings at that time; but I had received a blessed hope, and I wanted to sing praises to the Lord for his great goodness and mercy, and to trust in him forever and ever. Elder Vail came here the next Saturday. I went to the covenant meeting in the little school-house; and what seems so strange and beautiful, I heard the same lady I had dreamed about relate her experience to the church, and it seemed exactly as I had dreamed it a month before. I had never said a word to her nor to any one on the subject before this dream, and did not know at the time of my dream that she intended to go before this church. But as I had said nothing in regard to my feelings, I did not expect to have the privilege of stating my mind at that meeting; and when she sat down, I felt sorry I could not tell those people what I hoped the Lord had done for me. When Elder Vail asked me if I had anything to say, I felt so unworthy to speak that I had to ask the Lord for strength before I could say a word. After telling them some of the things I have tried to write, I sat down, when Elder Vail was so kind as to ask me if I had a desire to be baptized. I do not know what my answer was; but I was baptized the next morning, and became a member of this church, which had looked so pure to me for twenty years.

May the Lord keep me from bringing reproach upon this church, is the prayer of a great sinner, who believes that salvation is of the Lord, and of the Lord only.

OZARK, Ala., July 2, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—In taking a retrospective view my mind is drawn out in love for the dear readers and contributors of the SIGNS. About ten years ago I saw some old copies of the SIGNS in West Virginia, where I then lived; and after reading them I was made to greatly rejoice, to think that God had a people in New York who were contending for what I had experienced. I wrote brother G. Beebe to send me some copies, and I read them, and O the joy of soul I felt! They bore sweet news from a far country to me. Eventually I found a sketch of dear Elder G. Beebe's trials of life, and of his firmness through the mission schemes. I read of his firmness, that he would fight the whole host of the enemy, having the Bible on his side. One could chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight. He became greatly endeared to me, and the SIGNS. I often thought of the severe trials of the SIGNS. After awhile brother Beebe was taken away, which was sad news to the saints throughout his acquaintance. But God had prepared others to wield "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon," who have and are yet earnestly contending for "the faith once delivered to the saints." I am made to thank God for such gifts as Elders Beebe, Durand, Chick, Purington, Vail, Francis, Lively, Jenkins, and others, who are so firm and steadfast, and will not yield one point of the blessed gospel to suit the carnal notions of men. Many times I had a desire to see the dear brethren, but on the account of extreme poverty (in which I was reared) I had no idea the brethren would condescend to speak to me. I was brought up in obscure poverty, and deprived of a home, till since I began to keep house, in the year 1885. But experience has shown me that grace humbles. I had the pleasure of meeting dear brother Durand, who is a precious brother. Bless the Lord, grace brings down the high, and exalts the low, and hence brings all upon an equality. The Lord is good, yea, he is gracious, and plenteous in mercy. O that I could speak so as to forcibly impress upon the minds of every saint the importance of living in love, and endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, that there be no root of bitterness among them; that they be of one mind one toward another; that they strive not about words to no profit; that they bear one another's burdens; that they speak no evil of each other; that each member walk so as to have a good report of them that are without; paying their just debts, telling the truth, wronging no man, living soberly, and staying away from the assembly of the wicked. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." I believe that we can say too much on points, and have certain hobbies, until we ride them to death, and the children of God not be comforted. There is a fullness in the gospel. We should not fall out with brethren, even if they preach in a different manner from what we do, just so as they are sound. I have heard brethren say, "I do not believe in the absolute predestination of all things." Yet they say, "God is the Sovereign of the whole universe, and controls all things in heaven, earth and hell, and makes everything subservient to his will." Now, what is the difference? Neither believes anything takes place by chance. Both believe that God works all things after the counsel of his own will. Neither believes that God by his Spirit influences the wicked acts of men. Both believe he is a Sovereign, and holds the keys of death and hell. Then, brethren, let us not cavil over this matter. I am confident the brethren are together on these points, if they could only understand each other's meaning; for those who hold the predestination of all things believe in good works as much as others. I am called an absolute predestinarian; yet I do not use the word "absolute" in speaking, for I do not consider that it makes it any stronger. I have ever tried to use scriptural expressions in speaking on these points, and the brethren all seem to indorse my views where I have spoken on the subject. I love the doctrine preached in its purity, giving all glory to God. I believe if God has chosen me to salvation, that my steps are ordered of him, my days are set, and I will live until God ordained in eternity that I should die. Demons, cyclones, nor anything else, can take my life until God calls me hence. O that I could write a word of encouragement to the little ones who feel bowed down in spirit! But God will never leave you nor forsake you.

May the Lord bind us all together in love, and give you grace to bear with the imperfections of my poor scribbling. Count it an error of the head, and not of the heart, when you find errors. Pray for poor me in my afflictions. Finally, brethren, farewell.

LOUVALE, Ga., June 25, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—The SIGNS has so often edified me that I now feel impressed, as much as in me is, in my feeble way to make an effort to write for the edification of the household of faith. To edify, I understand, means to build. Whether it means to build up or not, I do not know. The gifts to the church of God are for the edification of the body, the church; and the ability to write or speak things that comfort the saints and encourage them in every good word and work, is the way this edifying process (if we should so call it) goes on. When one writes his travail of soul, and his deliverance, that comforts another who is under similar trials. When one writes upon some deep doctrine, and uses the light God gave him, in speaking or writing thereon he edifies the church in that point of doctrine. There are diversities of gifts, but all are for edification. When a minister comes with a message of love, and delivers it in the spirit of love, he edifies the church, which is prepared, and does receive it. If I should write some encouraging news to the saints, it would edify them. I have been edified in reading a communication on a call to the ministry, or rather as the writer touches upon his call, and gives good evidence that he is called to the work. When a brother in a defensive way writes in defense of the glorious faith once delivered to the saints, that strengthens me, and builds me up in my faith, and causes me to rejoice in this, another witness to the same glorious truth that has comforted me by the way. Should one write about how vile he feels himself to be, I have another witness: I feel the same. When one says, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" I feel that also. Again, another has reached some summit of joy, and speaks of gladness of soul. So do I. Thus we see we are often edified not only by the testimony, but by the witness also. One more has appeared among the number of the redeemed host of God. One tells of a vision or appearance of the Lord to him in a sore ill that has befallen him, and how the appearance of the Lord drove away his care. We feel then that we are enriched in all things; that even our sorrows end in joy, and afford us evidence needed for our situation and surroundings; and we can truly say, The Lord is good: he is a stronghold in the day of trouble. We read articles from brethren, speaking or writing upon the character of our God; how sublime and glorious is our God, in praises; that he is the mighty God, the great "I Am that I Am;" that he is high and lifted up; that he rideth in his excellency on the sky; that his exceeding highness becomes dreadful; that he is infinitely holy; that he is covered with light as a garment; that he dwells in that light which no man can approach unto. Again, it is written, "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us; and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father." He was made of a woman, made under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law.

Have we indeed been with the Lord? Do we know him? If so, then the remembrance of these things gives us strength. Has he appeared unto us as the chief among ten thousand, the one altogether lovely? Is he not more to us than the sons? Is there any on earth or any in heaven to be compared to him? He is our all, our hope, our joy, our sanctification and redemption. We have a right to glory in him, and none can forbid, for he is worthy. David could say, "My soul shall make her boast in the Lord." Does he love us? He spake to Jeremiah of old, saying, "I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving-kindness have I drawn thee." Will that love ever grow less? Will it ever die? Love is compared to fire which dries up all water; and the waters cannot quench it. "And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins." "If when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." He loved us while we were dead in sin. He loves us, and says he will love us unto the end. What has he prepared? A soul-reviving feast, that we may eat and be full. God grant us the appetite to continually feast upon the glorious things of his kingdom, the fruit, the precious things from the ancient mountains of election, and the precious things from the lasting hills of predestination, and to know assuredly that our God is the God of heaven and earth, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the living God of Daniel and Elijah. He is God, and besides him there is none else. He reigns, and does his will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, nor say, What doest thou?

NEWARK, Del., July 7, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Inclosed please find a copy of a letter written by sister Sally Truitt, who was afterward married to E. J. Adkins. Her obituary notice appeared in the SIGNS some months ago. She had many warm, devoted friends, who will no doubt be glad to see something from her pen. Those who knew her best loved her most.

Yours, as ever, in hope,

MR. AND MRS. CRAVEN—DEAR BROTHER AND SISTER:—I feel that I cannot forbear writing a few lines to you this afternoon, for my thoughts have been with you ever since I parted with you at your pleasant home. I do not think I have ever met with strangers toward whom I was so drawn out in love as yourselves, and I do feel unworthy of ever being a visitor of yours. I can truly say that being at the meeting on Sunday, and being at your house, was the most pleasant part of my visit. I know that we had good preaching at the Delaware Association, but it was not for me to get hold of it. I enjoyed the meeting at Cow Marsh very much, also at brother Meredith's, and the last day in particular at Southampton. I can never describe my feelings on that day, though I had had the same feelings before. Language fails to express them. I suppose that you, dear brother, have had the same feelings but a short time since. As we came into the church at nearly the same time, there seems to me to be a nearness between us, though you seem to be so far superior to me that I do not feel worthy of your company. If you ever feel as I have described, just think of me, the least of my Father's flock, and say to yourself that you are not alone.

"Such simple soul I fain would be,
The scorn of man, the joy of thee,
The parlor guest and friend.
Do make me, Lord, a little child,
Bright, simple-hearted, meek and mild,
And loving to the end."

If I know my own feelings, I want to be just like these last three lines describe. If there is one place more than another that I love to be, it is at the feet of the brethren. When I started from home for the associations I thought, Surely I have no business going to these meetings. Why not stay at home, and let some one go that can feast upon them? My heart (if indeed I had any) seemed a hard stone. I felt that I had no love for myself nor for anybody else. Satan was surely with me, and it seems to me he stays with me nearly all the time; but when I am freed from him, if but for a short season, and can view the Savior's love, O how different it is with me! It is like Elder Chick's subject, or the passage of Scripture that he spoke from on the last day of the meeting. It reads thus, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" What

IT REPENTED THE LORD.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Please give your views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on Genesis i. 31, and vi. 6, 7, and oblige many others as well as your brother in Christ, I hope,
JOHN H. HITCHCOCK.

“AND God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day.”

“And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them.”—Gen. i. 31; vi. 6, 7.

In endeavoring to comply with the request of our esteemed brethren by giving our views upon the verses above quoted, we wish to be understood as distinctly disavowing any attempt either to explain to the natural mind the mysteries which God has hidden in this record, or to apologize for what God has clearly and explicitly declared concerning his own eternal will and the works which he has wrought. The pride of the carnal mind assumes the right to pass judgment upon what God may do, or what he must not do; and some who claim to believe the Scriptures, will deny what is plainly written therein; because they cannot understand how God can be just in the exercise of his sovereign will in his providential government. With those who take that position we have no occasion to argue. They can only be brought to a knowledge of the true God by the revelation which comes alone from the personal manifestation of the Spirit of truth. That mind which is enlightened by the indwelling of the Spirit of Christ will never presume to sit in judgment upon the works of God. When the dispensations of his providence are dark and mysterious, the Spirit always inspires the confession, “I was dumb, I opened not my mouth; because thou didst it.”—Psa. xxxix. 9. This is the Spirit which was in our Lord Jesus. He said, “Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight.”—Matt. xi. 26.

In the record given concerning the creation of the heaven and the earth, as it is written in the first chapter of this book of Genesis, nothing appears to the natural mind beyond the wonder of the beginning of the material universe. This is all that reason can grasp, or that the mind of man can comprehend. But it is when the Spirit of truth takes of these same things, and shows the testimony of Jesus in them, that own vine and fig tree, according to the dictates of their own consciences, where none dare to molest or make them afraid. Dear brethren, we do feel, if we know our own hearts, to bow at the feet of our blessed Lord and Master, in humble obedience to his holy commands, and strive to walk in the order of his house, blameless before him in love, with an eye single to the glory of God and the honor of his cause. The name of our little church is “The Regular Predestinarian Baptist Church of Christ called Salem,” and is situated in Lancaster Co., Nebraska, four miles southeast of Cheney, and two and one-half miles northwest of Bennett. Our meeting days are the third Sunday and Saturday before in each month—on Saturday at two o'clock, and on Sunday at eleven o'clock. And now, brethren and sisters, far and near, we cordially invite you to come and meet with us, and rejoice with us in the hope of our salvation through the atoning blood and righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is at the right hand of God, interceding for the redeemed, whose names were written in the Lamb's book of life from the foundation of the world. Brethren, pray for us, that the God of all grace may reign in our hearts, and lead and direct us in the way of all truth. May we be enabled to see eye to eye in his kingdom, and ever be found earnestly contending for the faith that was once delivered to the saints, inquiring after the old landmarks, and striving to walk therein. This little church has chosen Elder James H. Ring, one of her members, to serve her as pastor. He is a beloved brother for the truth's sake. He is not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. May we be enabled to realize the sweet promises of our blessed Savior, “These things I have spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world.”—John xvi. 33.

For the benefit of those who may desire to write to Elder J. H. Ring, his post-office address is Cheney, Lancaster Co., Nebraska.
Your unworthy brother in hope,
JOSEPH BRUCE.

ELMIRA, N. Y., July 1, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—I wish to ask a small space in your paper to let the many friends know of my whereabouts. I came from the Warwick Association to my home in Elmira a very sick woman, and am now at the Arnot Ogden Hospital. My disease is gastric malarial fever of a very severe type. I think I am slowly recovering. On account of the recent severe floods here, my home is not suitable to live in till repaired some. I shall go, when able to do so, for a time, and board in the country, where I can be nursed back to life again, if it is the Lord's will to spare me.

MRS. C. M. HERRICK.

David said to Saul, Let no man's heart fail because of him. Thy servant will go and fight with this Philistine. And Saul said to David, Thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him; for thou art but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth. And David said unto Saul, Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock. And I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered it out of his mouth: and when he arose against me, I caught him by his beard, and smote him, and slew him. Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear: and this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God.” It has always been a surprise to me that a slender youth would go forth to fight a giant in deadly combat; and in his own strength it would have been madness for him to have attempted it; but he went in the strength of the Lord. To my mind David was a type of our Savior, and Goliath was a type of the adversary, or Satan. Now we know the children of God are in great fear until God delivers them from the power of the evil one; but when our spiritual David slays the lion and the bear, and releases us from their power, then we can go forth singing and praising the Lord. When the Lord speaks to us, we know that we are the one spoken to, and never are left in doubt as to whether the word was meant for us, or for some one else. I have no fellowship with those who say that we are left to choose whether we will be saved or not. To my mind we have no choice about it; but it rests with him who commands, and it is done. He speaks, and it stands fast. For this God is our God forever and ever: he will be our guide even unto death.

The above is at your disposal, brethren; and if you think any of God's people can be comforted by its perusal, you are at liberty to publish it.

Yours in love,
HORACE BEAKES.

ROCA, Neb., June 19, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—By request, I will write a few lines in regard to the notice of this little church, which we feel to believe has been planted by that God who rules in heaven and earth, who is everywhere present at all times, and guides and directs his children in paths of righteousness. Yes, our God hath declared that he will keep them as the apple of his eye. He dwells in their hearts, and has declared that he will never leave nor forsake them. He has once more been pleased to remember Zion in her afflictions, and hath heard the crying of his poor little ones who have been separated far from the fold of God, and been deprived of the privilege of meeting with the saints of God to worship him under their

he said about that was good to me. I felt that I knew something about it. O how pleasant such seasons are to me! I am just a little, weak child, and can only take such assurances as are sent to me. I get sometimes to feel very tired of this world, and long to go and be with Jesus and the saints who have been called home, to endure no more pain and suffering forever. Forever! O what a vacancy there seems to be in that word! yet a fullness, to be forever with Jesus. I can only get a glimpse of eternal things once in a long while, and then language fails to express even the least of my thoughts.

I think I must bring my (perhaps) tiresome scribble to a close. I do feel too little to take my pen to address you. I feel, I hope, thankful for your kindness and attention to me while at your house, and also at the association. I feel very sure that whatever may come upon me I shall never forget you. I send love to Elder Durand, with whom I never had much acquaintance until we were together at your house, and whom I love dearly for the truth's sake; and that love everybody does not know about. Surely and truthfully we are a peculiar people. My mother and father join me in sending love to you both, and also to Mary and her husband. If you think this worthy an answer, I would dearly love to hear from you.

I remain your sister and friend,
SALLIE M. TRUITT.

“WHAT have I now done? Is there not a cause?”—1 Sam. xvii. 29.

I will write some of my meditations concerning these words of David, in answer to his brother Eliab. To me there is much comfort contained in this portion of Scripture, and in these words we can sometimes answer those who rebuke us. “What have I now done? Is there not a cause?” “And David spake to the men that stood by him, saying, What shall be done to the man that killeth this Philistine, and taketh away the reproach from Israel? for who is this uncircumcised Philistine, that he should defy the armies of the living God?” “And Eliab his eldest brother heard when he spake unto the men; and Eliab's anger was kindled against David, and he said, Why comest thou down hither? and with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness? I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thine heart; for thou art come down that thou mightest see the battle. And David said, What have I now done? Is there not a cause?” The occasion of which I write was the time Goliath defied Israel, and also Israel's God. In our case, when we are fulfilling what is manifestly the will of God concerning us, we can answer those that rebuke us, “What have I now done? Is there not a cause?” “And when the words were heard which David spake, they rehearsed them before Saul: and he sent for him. And their true meaning is made known. God has not given his inspired revelation merely to instruct the natural mind concerning temporal things. Our Lord says these Scriptures are they which testify of him. To him give all the prophets witness; and John wrote by revelation, saying, "The testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of prophecy." No interpretation of Scripture is correct which fails to bear witness to the doctrine of God as it is revealed in Jesus the exalted Savior of his people from their sins. This testimony is borne by the whole inspired word when seen in the light of the Spirit; and no portion of that word can bear witness to any other doctrine, for it is all one testimony. It is not given to satisfy the profane curiosity of the sinful mind of men; but "that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." This inspired definition of the use and object of the Scriptures forbids their being regarded as a mere scientific work, whose statements may be subjected to criticism and discussion. As the sun in the natural heaven can be seen only in his own light, so the truth of the inspired Scriptures is the unquestionable test of all other truth, while itself is above all investigation. Its evidence is in itself. As axiomatic truth it is not susceptible of demonstration by any process of reasoning, while there can be no stronger proof of any proposition than the evidence that it is sustained by the testimony of the Scriptures. All our theories must be tried by that perfect rule, while there is no standard given to finite reason whereby to test the truth of that rule. All finite systems and theories may be subjected to examination at the bar of intelligent reason; but the revelation which God has given in the inspired record is infinitely above the power of the most cultivated natural mind. There is no clearer display of the perfection of this testimony of Jesus than that which is manifested in its discriminating effect upon the believer and the unbeliever. "For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God."—1 Cor. i. 18. Nothing short of the omnipotent word of God is able to show divine truth to them that perish; therefore, it is not our design to attempt an argument by which to make the blind see, or to change the enmity of the carnal mind into the love of God. All the Scriptures are the preaching of the cross, for all testify of Jesus; that testimony can be received only by the subjects of salvation. They do not believe upon the evidence which is received through their natural reason; but by the indwelling witness of the Spirit they know the truth as it is experimentally written in their own hearts. They do not have to go even to the Scriptures for evidence of the truth, for "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself."—1 John v. 10.

In the first verse cited by our brother, the declaration is written that "God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good." There is vastly more significance in this record than what may be seen by the mere reading of the letter of the text. As referring to the simple work of creation, it is not wonderful that the power which brought the universe into existence was sufficient to secure the exact manifestation of what he had purposed; so that the elements of air, earth, water and fire were each developed in the proportion which was designed by the almighty Creator. That is a very mean estimate of the omnipotence of God which does not accord to him the ability to produce just such a material universe as he intended to create. Doubtless in this sense everything which God had made was "very good" for the express place to which it was assigned in the infinite wisdom of God; but when the testimony of Jesus is revealed in this wonderful work, the significance of this expression embraces more than thought can grasp; for it expands to the declaration of all the eternal counsel of the will of God. In this view of the text there is no room left for the most infinitesimal variance from that which God had made, without destroying the goodness which God recognized in the six days' work which he had completed. If reptiles had been men, or if man in his natural state had been possessed of ability to remain in his own strength sinless, the purpose of God would not have been fulfilled, and the work would therefore have been a disappointment, so that it could not have been pronounced "very good."

In order to see the full force of this decision of God in looking upon the work of creation, it is necessary to consider what is revealed concerning the object for which this work was done. John says, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. ALL THINGS WERE MADE BY HIM; AND WITHOUT HIM WAS NOT ANYTHING MADE THAT WAS MADE."—John i. 1-3. This was the same "In the beginning" of which the record is given in Genesis. In order that the things which were made should be "very good," they must be just such things as were suited to the purpose for which they were created. That purpose is plainly stated by Paul, "For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; ALL THINGS WERE CREATED BY HIM, AND FOR HIM. And he is before all things, and by him all things consist."—Col. i. 16, 17. "For it became him, FOR WHOM ARE ALL THINGS, AND BY WHOM ARE ALL

From these declarations of the design of "all things," it is evident that in the language of our text God pronounced the world which he had made, with all that was included in its creation, "very good" for the purpose to which he designed it. So it is said of the light, and of grass, and of the beast of the earth, and cattle, and even of everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, "God saw that it was good." It will not be claimed that in this approval of his work God pronounced the reptile a good bird, or the wolf a good lamb, or man a good angel. Each was good "after his kind." So all that God had made was "very good," because it was exactly adapted to the place for which he had designed it, in making all things for the manifestation of his eternal purpose of love and mercy through the exaltation of Jesus as the Savior of his people from their sins. As sin had not yet entered into the world, the expression "very good" could not imply a distinction between that which is righteous and that which is sinful. There was no other sense in which anything could be "very good" but in that it was just as the Creator designed that it should be. In this sense, the rapacious wolf is "very good" as well as the harmless lamb. The crooked and piercing serpent fills his station in the creation just as well as does the gentle dove. In the all embracing purpose of God all are good, each "after his kind." To claim that the will of God was defeated in the smallest jot, is a denial of his omnipotence; and without that perfection he is not God at all. Such a thought is too manifestly blasphemous to be for one moment entertained by one who hopes in the immutable promise of eternal truth.

"And the evening and the morning were the sixth day." Why is this inspired record so specific in the apportionment of each of these days of the work of creation? There is deep and important meaning in this, as in all the words of divine truth. In its literal application it shows the exact order established by the Creator, and the wisdom by which every item in the production of the material universe was fixed precisely as God designed. Man was not formed before the earth was fitted for his abode. The days are not to be understood as merely those divisions of time into twenty-four hours which are designated as days in our portion of the earth; for it must be observed that it was not until the fourth of these days that the sun and moon were made by the commandment of the Creator. Yet the first three days are defined by "the evening and the morning," just as are the days which followed the establishment of the "lights in the firmament of heaven." In the application of this record as the testimony of Jesus, these days fitly represent the successive manifestation of the "new heavens and new earth," in the experience of those who are taught of God. In this view of their significance it is very important to the comfort of the saints that they observe the fact that there is no limitation to the day of rest. Each of the first six days was defined by "the evening and the morning," but of the seventh day, which represents that rest into which believers enter, there is neither evening nor morning specified, nor yet is any limitation of that day of rest given in the record. So it is written, "There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God."—Heb. iv. 9. In the margin this rest is rendered "keeping of a sabbath." This is the true signification of the text. It is not a mere ceremonial observance of one literal day in seven, but an unending rest in the true sabbath of the perfect likeness of Jesus. This rest is not broken by slavish labor under the yoke of legal bondage. It is the perfection of peace in the righteousness of Jesus which satisfies the utmost demand of divine justice. As that righteousness is infinite and everlasting, so there is no limit to the rest and peace pronounced by it.

It will be seen by reference to the Scriptures that there was not anything done up to the time when God commended the works which he had made, but that which was done directly by the omnipotence of his own creating word. Hence, "It was very good." There could be no improvement upon what infinite wisdom had planned and omnipotence had accomplished according to the will of God.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Deacon L. T. Rose was born April 7th, 1834, and died at his home near Jefferson, Marengo Co., Ala., Oct. 12th, 1888.

Our dear departed brother professed a hope in Christ in 1853, and united with the Mt. Pleasant Primitive Baptist Church at Jefferson, Sept. 25th, 1880. He was chosen and ordained to the office of Deacon of said church April 3d, 1881. He was also Clerk of the church, which offices he filled faithfully and well, thereby "purchasing to himself a good degree and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus." His home and the hospitality there shown will be sweetly remembered by neighbors, friends and members of our church while life lasts. His uniform christian courtesy, kindness and love, as well as the continued encouragement in the discharge of his ministerial duties, extended to the unworthy writer of this notice, will also sweetly linger until memory and reason shall be dethroned.

We could extend this notice to an indefinite length, and yet fail to do the subject justice, as our language is inadequate.

ED. WILLIAMS.

DEPARTED this life, very suddenly, on the morning of July 8th, 1889, in Macomb township, McDonough Co., Ill., David Runkle, aged seventy-four years, lacking one month.

Brother Runkle was born in Champaign Co., Ohio, Aug. 8th, 1815, and was united in marriage with Miss Margaret Kiser, Sept. 8th, 1836, who was the mother of twelve children, nine of whom are yet living. She died in 1881. He professed a hope in Christ, and joined the Nettle Creek Church, in Ohio, in 1842 or 1843, and was baptized by Elder Samuel Williams. The deceased came to Morgan Co., Ill., in 1849, and in 1862 removed to McDonough Co. For many years before his death brother R. was a member of New Hope Church, which I have attended as pastor about thirty-two years, and for many years he and I have joined farms, and I have never known a better or more obliging neighbor, nor a more firm and uncompromising and well-established Baptist. He was very well read in the New Testament, and could detect a departure from the faith very readily, and had no sympathy for any form of Arminianism. He was a fine singer; and being the nearest male member to me, we often conversed about the things of the kingdom of God, and sang the songs of Zion together, and hence I miss him much. He had for some years been afflicted with spells of smothering at night, and some other ailments, but nothing serious was apprehended until he was found breathing his last breath early on the morning of the 8th. His disease was pronounced apoplexy.

His sudden demise was a melancholy shock to his family and friends. A large and solemn audience met at the residence on the 9th, and I used on the occasion the language found in First Peter i. 24, 25, which language the deceased often quoted. Elder S. L. Dark also took part in the services. His remains were buried in the Macomb cemetery to await the resurrection. He leaves children, brothers, sisters and friends to mourn their sad loss, to whom I tender my profound sympathy.

ALSO,

DIED—In Christian Co., Ill., Sept. 19th, 1888, Mr. Francis George, aged fifty-five years, eight months and nineteen days.

The deceased was born and raised near where he died. In 1854 he joined Fancy Point Church of Regular (Primitive) Baptists, and was baptized by the late Elder Wm. Crow, and up to his death he earnestly contended for the doctrine of God our Savior, and was a faithful and active member of the South Fork Church, where he belonged the latter part of his life. His death was caused by typhoid fever, from which he suffered seven weeks; and during his sufferings he talked much about eternal and heavenly things, and longed to depart and be with Christ. He left his heart-broken wife, sister Mary L. George, and three daughters, with other relatives, friends and the church, to feel the sad loss of him they loved.

For reasons that I need not name, the memorial services did not take place until the fifth Sunday in June, when I spoke to a large collection of people from Job xiv. 14, Elder E. T. Sanders taking part in the services, and Elder J. Montgomery also being present. May the widow's God support our dear sister under her sad bereavement, and be to the daughters more than an earthly father.

Your brother in hope,

I. N. VANMETER.

MACOMB, Ill., July 11, 1889.

Nancy Anna Covault was born in Washington Co., Ky., March 27th, 1820. Her mother dying when she was quite young, she lived with her grandparents until thirteen years of age, in that county. Her father then being again married, she went to him in Hardin Co., Ky., in 1833. In January, 1834, she saw herself a great sinner in the sight of God, and went to work to get religion; but for three weeks she seemed to be sinking down to hell. Instead of getting religion, as she had thought, she was brought to see that none but God could do anything for her; and finally saying, "Lord, take me as I am," gave herself to him, and, as she expressed it, "He calmed me; but I did not feel happy, but resigned to his will." In five days from that time she went before the church, told her experience, was received, and was afterward baptized (in 1834) by Charles Stuvill. After that there was a division in the church, but she stayed on the Old Baptist side, for she saw that her experience opposed the working plan; and she said, "When I had worked up all my works, and then felt that I was sinking down to hell, and could do no more, and God calmed me, and everything looked so pretty, how can I think that I did anything to save myself? If it were left for me to do, or if there were a God that had to be helped, I know that I would be lost; and O how glad I am that there is a God who rules all things after the counsel of his own will."

In 1840 she and the family moved to Mercer Co., Ohio, where they tried the United Baptists; but things proved unsatisfactory, by bringing in things which they could not believe. They then got some brethren of the Old School to come and recognize them as Old School (seventeen of them); but, as is sure to be the final result, they all finally passed away and dissolved, and sister Covault was left alone to bear the testimony of Jesus. She finally related her experience and the order of her baptism; and, it being before the close of the general division, she was received into the Refuge Old School Predestinarian Baptist Church in Spencer-ville, Ohio, where she maintained the order, doctrine and christian walk of a consistent and humble follower of Christ.

She was three times married, three times a widow, and childless; but the Lord provided her with kind friends, a niece and her husband, to care for her in her last sickness, which was cancer in the breast, and with which she endured the most intense suffering. But God was with her to the last, and she always was ready to converse on her hope in Christ. Her life was marked with peculiar firmness of conviction, soundness of faith, charitableness for the needy, humility of mind, and a faithfulness in religious obligations that always was graced with a cheerfulness of joy, rather than as a burdensome task. Her sufferings were received and endured in a sense of God's providential care and instruction, and purified and sweetened all the principles of her worship.

I tried to address a large gathering of relatives and friends at the Quaker meeting-house near her residence, July 1st, 1889 (the day following her death), from whence she was borne to the Hankins grave-yard, where she was laid between her last two husbands, according to her request.

Sister Martha P. Morris breathed her last in McGregor, Texas, in early morn, June 9th, 1889, aged sixty-one years, eight months and seven days.

Sister Morris, whose maiden name was Smith, was born in Madison Co., Tenn., removed to Arkansas in 1858, and thence to Texas in 1873. She was baptized in the fellowship of Bethesda Church of the Primitive Baptist faith, in Ouachita Co., Ark., by Elder J. M. C. Robertson. She was married to Riley C. Morris, Nov. 18th, 1857, who died March 11th, 1882, and by whom she had one son and three daughters, three of whom are married. Arka, the youngest but one, had been an invalid for many years, and a heavy charge on the hands of the deceased sister until last December, when God called her from earth. Mother Morris's health began declining some years ago. She went to Laredo, Texas, last winter, to live with her daughter Lilly, hoping to improve her condition; but God willed it otherwise. Hastening home with all possible speed, she arrived at her former home on Thursday evening before her demise on Sunday morning following. She appeared to realize her state, and that her mortal life was fast ebbing away, but rejoiced in the assurance of God's everlasting love and his faithfulness unto the end. She was firmly established in the doctrine of salvation by grace through the atoning sacrifice of Jesus, and was an exemplary christian, ever delighting to meet with the brethren and sisters for the worship of God. She did what she could. O that this great and grand obligation which each and every child rests under may be duly considered by all who have a well-established hope of deliverance from sin. We would say to the son and daughters of the deceased, You have the examples of your beloved parents, and, we trust, the evidences of your acceptance with God through Jesus' precious blood. Walk humbly before God in obedience, and may your last days be like theirs.

R. E. Hagans, daughter of Elder A. H. Hagans and Mary his wife, fell asleep on March 19th, 1889, at 6:30 a. m., in Garfield Co., Wash. Ter. She was a pleasant girl, always bright and lovely, a favorite of the writer of this notice, and fair to look upon; but she is gone, I believe, to a better world, where Christ is, the life of his people, in whom alone dwelleth immortality.

ALSO,

DIED—In the same county and place, June 24th, 1889, at 8:10 p. m., sister Mary Hagans, consort of Elder A. H. Hagans, aged forty-four years, four months and eight days.

Sister Hagans was a native of Louisiana, and emigrated with her parents to California in 1852. She was married to our brother, Elder A. H. Hagans, in 1865, and joined the Santa Rosa Church of Old School Baptists, of which Thomas H. Owens was pastor, at Green Valley, Sonoma Co., Cal., by whom she was baptized in the fall of 1869. She was a woman of an excellent spirit, kind, patient and enduring. The writer has been intimately acquainted with her since 1866, and can testify to her christian character from that time until her death, except a short interval of time. She was one of the constituent members of the Harmony

Church of Old School Baptists, five miles east of Dayton, Columbia Co., Wash. Ter., of which the writer has been the ministerial servant since its constitution, and our intercourse has been harmonious. There have been no jealousies nor bickerings between us. But our beloved sister is gone; and O how much of sorrow, sadness and desolation is signified by that word "gone." The afflicted husband, our brother, tried to give expression to the sentiments of his heart in the beautiful lines, "Thou art gone to the grave," &c.

The writer tried to comfort the bereaved friends from "the word of his testimony." The text on this last occasion was Revelation i. 18.

Benjamin Blackford died in Brooklyn, N. Y., May 14th, 1889.

Brother Blackford was born in Morris Co., N. J., July 15th, 1813. At the age of eighteen years he was received and baptized in fellowship with the Baptist Church. When the division took place, and error, delusion and apostasy abounded, Deacon Blackford stood firm in the way, to see and ask for the old paths, contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. When those who had gone in the way of Cain, and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, had obtained possession of the church property and brought in their idolatry, he was compelled to withdraw his membership from among them; thus manifesting, with David, that he had rather be a door-keeper in the house of his God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. Since then he has had no local membership, but has enjoyed a name and place in the general assembly and church of the First-born which are written in heaven. Elder A. B. Francis has visited him at his former home in New Jersey, and preached there. Elder Francis loved him as a brother. I visited him at his late home with his children, in Brooklyn, and found him fervent in spirit, serving the Lord, and, with Jonah, paying that he had vowed, "Salvation is of the Lord." He was enjoying the fellowship of the saints in reading their testimony in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. With the assistance of his son, he met with us occasionally at our meetings in New York City. His grandfather was a Baptist minister. His last words were, "Christ is all. Salvation is by —" The remainder of the sentence was inaudible; and with his eyes fixed upon some object, and lips moving, he fell asleep.

He was twice married, and twice a widower, and has left five children and three grandsons. His exemplary life, as husband and father, deserved and received the appreciation of his children, which was manifested by their devoted attention in his last days. With affectionate sorrow they took him home and laid him to rest with his father and grandfather in the Baptist cemetery at Mount Freedom, N. J. The Lord bless the bereaved ones.

W. W. MEREDITH.

DELMAR, Delaware.

DIED—On Wednesday, July 3d, at her late residence in Sussex Co., Del., Mrs. Sallie Hearn, lacking a few days of sixty-five years of age.

Sister Hearn has been a sincere and devoted member of Little Creek Church since before my acquaintance there. She prized the meetings, and was never absent unless providentially hindered. For many years that church has had to depend much on week-days for preaching appointments. If sister Hearn was not there, we might all understand that she was sick, or otherwise prevented. She always seemed to prize the visits and spiritual conversation of brethren. I understand from the family that she was sustained in the enjoyment of a comfortable hope throughout her sickness, which was long and distressing, and died in the triumphs of faith. The legacy of such a life and death is worthy of many heirs. I feel to hope, in behalf of that church of which she was so long a worthy member, that she has not lived in vain. May the Lord build again the waste places of Zion, and gather together the outcasts of Israel. The family have my sincere sympathy in their bereavement.

Our deceased sister selected the following to be used at her funeral, "And all wept, and bewailed her: but he said, Weep not; she is not dead, but sleepeth."

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

FAITH AND THE LAW.

"Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea, we establish the law."—Romans iii. 31.

DEAR BRETHREN:—The theme embraced in the words above written is in my mind this morning, and I feel like trying to suggest a few thoughts in connection with it for the readers of the SIGNS. I desire to say, first of all, that I am aware that there has been much written upon this theme before, and that there have been some differences of opinion among good brethren upon it, and that I do not wish to enter into controversy with any brother, but to simply present the matter as it has appeared to me. We are all short-sighted, and largely partial in our view of the truth. Indeed, it cannot but be so, for we are finite and limited; while truth, like its Author, is infinite and unlimited. Our mistake is that each of us supposes too often that what we see of the truth is all there is to see; and so we are too prone to ascribe ignorance and folly to the brother who may differ from us, forgetting that we, too, see but in part. I have long believed that most of the differences between brethren were only apparent, and not real differences. The very words which we use convey different ideas to different minds, and so we misunderstand each other often. Especially is this true in the heat of controversy, when our carnal passions are prone to be aroused, and we mistake our statement of the truth for the truth itself. I often accept the view which I know that my brother really holds, while at the same time I cannot accept his way of stating it.

In regard to this subject of the law and faith, much in past years has been said, and of late the theme seems to have occupied the minds of the brethren to some extent again. I think this is well; and the discussion is well, if only the brethren remember the substance of what I have written above. I believe that for our mutual profit God stirs up the minds of his people to the consideration of his word, to the end that their minds may be established in the truth more clearly; and so he causes them to glean in first one portion of the field and then in another. Only, brethren, let us remember in our discussions that "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life," and that "the servant of God must not strive."

Now let us first glance at the connection of the words of the text. The substance of the argument in these first three chapters of Romans is that men are altogether vile and lost. To this sweeping declaration Paul makes no exceptions. By his pen God says to us that every man is altogether depraved, and all are enemies to God by wicked works. All men are already condemned, and must perish forever without remedy if judged by the law. As man has sinned against the law of God, the law cuts him off; and the law knows no such name as mercy or forgiveness. Because all men are already transgressors of the law, therefore by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified. This will be at once apparent when we remember that the law demands all our service all the time of our lives; and if any gap is made in that service we can never afterward gain any spare moments in which to mend that gap. To the transgressor the law holds forth nothing but eternal death. It is all summed up in the nineteenth verse of the third chapter, "Now we know that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them who are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God." But now, in verse twenty, Paul changes the scene, and begins to hold forth the way of salvation through faith in the righteousness of another, even our Lord Jesus Christ; and even as he has before proved both Jews and Gentiles that they are all alike sinners and condemned to eternal death, so now he shows that this righteousness of Jesus is unto all that believe, both Jew and Gentile. Neither can in anything boast over the other by nature, for both are lost; and in salvation neither can boast, for both are justified alone by faith. In verse twenty-four he says that we are "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." In verse twenty-eight he says, "Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law." This does not mean that faith is a merit in us, because of which we deserve the blessing of salvation; but that by faith we come to see the righteousness of Christ imputed to us, by which we are justified and saved. In verse twenty he says, "By the law is the knowledge of sin." That is, the law, so far from justifying a man, shows him what a sinner he is. So it is evident that salvation and justification must come in some other way; and that way he has declared to be through Christ.

Now some one will say, "If this be so, the law is made void; that is, the law is rejected and thrown aside, as being of no account." To this objection, let it come from what source it may, Paul answers in the text, "It is not so. I do not reject the law, nor rob it of any of its power or glory. On the contrary, by this very way of salvation is the law magnified and more effectually established." He would say, "If salvation be by the deeds of the law, and anybody is saved, it must be by bringing the law down to the level of man's weakness and imperfectness." This indeed would be to make void the law; but salvation by faith in Christ says that the law is inflexible, and must be met; and has been met in Christ, and in him is made glorious. Therefore the law is established and settled forever. It is seen in the crucifixion of Christ that its penalty must be met; and in his life of perfect obedience it is seen that not one jot or tittle of its demands can be abated. Now faith receives this and rests upon it; and so in the experience of all who have this faith is the law established. They come to see that the law is not only holy, just and good, but also eternal and immutable, abiding or established forever. This seems to me to be the argument of the apostle in this chapter, and this the conclusion established in the text.

Out of this grow some reflections, of which I wish to speak. First, the law spoken of in this text and its connection is not the ritual law, or the law of forms and ceremonies of the old or Jewish covenant, for that was given to the Jews only, and no Gentile nation ever received it or was commanded to obey it in any way; while the apostle says of this law that both Jew and Gentile and all men were under it and condemned by it. This law is that which is applied by the Holy Spirit to every convicted sinner, and which gives that sinner the knowledge of sin. It is the same law that David felt the power of when he said, "I have sinned," and that aroused the hardened conscience of Saul of Tarsus, the very Paul who wrote these words. The law of types and forms and shadows has passed away. Of this law the apostle said, "He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second." Of this law also the prophet spoke when he said that yet once more the Lord would shake heaven and earth, that all that could be shaken might be removed, while what could not be shaken might remain. The forms and ceremonies, consisting of offerings of beasts, of tithes, of observances of new moons and feast days and sabbaths, could be and were shaken out; but the essential truth of God, the righteous law, the eternal purpose, the sure gospel, wrapped up there and dimly seen by its light, could not be removed. These things still stand, and they will stand forever. The law of God is not a failure. It was not given as a temporary expedient. Though Moses, the minister of the law, is dead, the law itself is not dead nor made void. The law of God is declared by our Lord to be summed up in these two commandments, which he quotes from Deuteronomy: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind," and "thy neighbor as thyself." Upon these, he says, hang all the law and the prophets. This certainly cannot be abrogated or modified or changed. These are eternal principles. It must forever and forever be true that God requires this at the hands of all his creatures. Rituals and forms and ceremonies may change, but this is a record of eternal truth. It is the revelation of an unchangeable will, and therefore must abide.

Obedience to the rituals of the old covenant never gave life nor imparted salvation to a soul. These things only reminded those who came to them of their need of a Savior, who by these things was shadowed forth; and so also no man by his warmest effort to love God and his neighbor ever could fulfill the law and save his soul. Whether we speak of the law of carnal ordinances, or of the law which judges all men, it is equally true that life and salvation come not by them. Under the old covenant or under the new, there never has been but one way of salvation. Then, as now, Jesus was preached; and now, as then, the law of God does nothing but condemn. The gospel was in the world then as well as now, and Abraham and many others saw the day of Christ and were glad; and so the law abides now as well as then. It is still true that every one who journeys to Mount Zion must take his way fast by the flaming mount, where the law still thunders forth its terrors.

Let us remember that the law of God is holy, just and good, and that it must ever remain, because nothing that is holy can perish. There is no evil in this law. It has no terror, except for transgressors, and against them it always speaks in thunder-tones; but the believer, who is justified and saved in Christ, can say, "O how love I thy law!" To him it is a delight, even while it shows him what a sinner he is. The law demands righteousness, his heart loves righteousness, and his joy is that in Christ he has righteousness, even that very righteousness which the law demands and which he loves. Of each believer it is true that "what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law [this very law which condemns the sinner, and which the believer loves] might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." So can each believer say, as did David, "Great peace have they which love thy law, and nothing shall offend them." The same law of which David sang is fulfilled in Christ, and in every one where Christ dwells, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us. This love is the fulfilling of the law. Thus Christ has not made the law void, but has fulfilled it for us, and now fulfills it in us.

Whatever was good and true and right under the old covenant, remains good and true and right now. The things that could not be shaken remain. The New Testament Scriptures have not done away with the Old; on the contrary, the New confirms and establishes the Old. There are in the New Testament about four hundred quotations from the Old. The same great principles of truth are embraced in both. As the golden cherubim in the holy of holies looked eye to eye over the mercy-seat, so do the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments look eye to eye, and bear united testimony to Christ, the one way of salvation; and Jesus told the disciples that he came not to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfill. The righteousness of God was revealed by the law and the prophets. As it was then revealed it was terrible to the convicted sinner, because it condemned and cut him off. Now under the gospel the same righteousness of God is revealed, but it is now revealed in Jesus Christ unto and upon all them that believe; and by the very righteousness which under the law condemned them, now under the gospel are they saved. Once they loved, but trembled at the righteousness of God; now they love and rejoice in it, for they through Jesus Christ are completely clothed in it. The righteousness of God thundered from Sinai once; now this same righteousness is seen on Mount Zion, breathing love and peace and mercy, and all is mild, and pardons are scattered down. But God's law and God's righteousness have not changed. All this wonderful difference is found in Jesus Christ.

The law of God is eternal. It is the transcript of the divine will, which never began to be. As Jehovah is eternal, so must his will be. As he is unchangeable, so must his will be. The revelation of his will, as of himself, may be made known at different times and in various ways, but the will itself can never change. The righteousness of God, the righteousness which he demands, must ever be the same. Forms and ceremonies may change, the very words by which that law is expressed may change; but the law does not change. What is right once before God is right always; what is wrong once is wrong always. So the very law against which we sinned is the law which Jesus kept for us, and which now Jesus fulfills in us. As the law says we must love God and our neighbor, so love to God and the neighbor is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost. Jesus has provided and bestows upon us just the very fullness of righteousness which our God in his law has demanded. As we now have love in our hearts, we love the law of love, and find in it our peace. Having now the law of love in our hearts, we are saved, and can never be condemned. This law now, so far from condemning us, itself is on our side, and forbids that we ever should be condemned. To love God is the fulfilling of the law—is righteousness, is salvation; and so, as the text says, the law by faith is established.

It is a most blessed truth that we are not justified by the deeds of the law; but it is also a blessed truth that the justified sinner is not under the law as a rule of life. In no sense can such an one ever come under the condemnation of the law. Sin cannot have dominion over such an one, because he is not under the law, but is under grace. He is not under the law as a rule of life, because the law is now written in his heart, as say Jeremiah and Paul. He is no longer in bondage, but free; no longer a slave, but a son. He is lifted up from fear to love. The law which he once feared he now loves. His service is the service of the heart, and not of outward constraint. How blessed is his condition! The Lord's free man! Yet the law is not abrogated, nor set aside, nor dishonored; it is magnified and fulfilled in him. It is not a rule of life, for it has become to him life itself, and he exclaims, "O how love I thy law!" From the fountain of love within spring up now all gracious affections and desires, all hatred of sin, all obedience in life. It has come to be with him as with his Master, who said, "It is my meat and my drink to do the will of my Father." He now lives not by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds from the mouth of God. The commandment is not now a yoke, but bread. The commandment is no longer unto death, but unto life. Faith is not the enemy of the law, but its friend. Faith is the opponent of that false form of righteousness in which men vainly trust, and cuts it down; but it rejoices in the righteousness of God, and reveals in Jesus just what the law demands, and shows us that in him "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other." So truth springs out of the earth, and righteousness looks down from heaven. There is then no antagonism between the law of God and faith. God forbid! Yea, faith establishes the law.

Brethren, I leave these thoughts with the readers of the SIGNS. They are but poorly expressed, I know. If any brother differs, it is his privilege, and I shall not find fault; only let us remember that the gospel does not tell us of a law abrogated, but of a law fulfilled in Christ and in his people.

I remain your brother in hope of life through Christ,

ARE THEY CHRISTIANS?

"AND the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch."—Acts xi. 26.

I have long doubted the propriety of calling every one, indiscriminately, who made a profession of religion, no matter what, a christian. I have also noticed a traditional habit among brethren of saying, "I think that this or that man is a christian," even when they are enemies to Baptist faith, which to me is synonymous with Bible faith—christian faith. I feel that it is a delicate matter to oppose prevalent notions, but I feel that it is right to examine them, and, if God so wills, correct them.

First. What is a christian? Webster says: "1. One who professes to believe, or is assumed to believe, in the religion of Christ. 2. One who is born in a christian country or of christian parents." This includes all that applies to personal distinctions in the definition. In applying this definition, every person will occupy his own standpoint. Is he a member of the "Evangelical Alliance," he will include all who bear the common appellation of christian in the popular sense; but to us it is too broad a road and too broad an idea. Jesus said, "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven [church militant]; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven."—Matt. vii. 21. This narrows down the idea to true disciples of Jesus; and he has himself defined his meaning of the word "disciple" in reference to those Jews who believed (at least in the common sense of belief). "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."—John viii. 31, 32. Again, "By this shall all (men) know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."—John xiii. 35. Therefore Jesus has defined the word "disciple" (a learner or follower of Jesus) as synonymous with Webster's word "christian," and therefore we may safely use the two words interchangeably, and do no violence to either of them; but in Christ's definition there is always more positiveness, and not the mere popular and careless application.

"Agrippa said unto Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a christian. And Paul said, I would to God, that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost and altogether as I am, except these bonds."—Acts xxvi. 28, 29. Here we see a notable difference between Agrippa's and Paul's understanding of how discipleship or christianity was to be obtained. Agrippa thought it to be by persuasion, but Paul had already related how that it was by God's revelation; and in obedience to that heavenly vision he had acquired the name of christian.—See the whole chapter. Peter also minutely corresponds with this thought in his use of the word "christian," and applies it to the followers of Christ in the unpopular sense and with the same positiveness and discrimination that Jesus used the word "disciple." While he admonishes the brethren to good works, he also speaks of the inevitable sufferings that follow the true saints through life, and carries the lesson home to their consolation that they are only given to prove the reality of their discipleship. "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy." "But let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil-doer, or as a busybody in other men's matters. Yet if any man suffer as a christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf. For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God? And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God commit the keeping of their souls to him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator."—1 Peter iv. 12-19; also iii. 17: "For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing, than for evil doing." I have drawn thus copiously from Peter's use and definition of "christian" to show that the word strictly and in spirit applies to the actual sons of God in obedience, and that they are not to be known to us in any other way; and that the will of God includes their sufferings as well as their joys—their suffering for well doing as well as for evil doing; and that the result will always work for good to them—is for the trial of their faith, and follows as evidence of God's acceptance of them as his disciples, and as marks of their christianity. I now wish to speak in reference to the various denominations of so-called christians.

2. Who are christians? "There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all" (the elect—see Eph. i. 3).—Eph. iv. 4-6. This does not admit of churches of every faith, of every baptism, of every god, of every father, that are only in part of his children, leaving the rest to go or come by chance, or perhaps not at all; neither has our Lord left his successor in the person of Peter or any Pope. Paul testifies that Christ is the "Head of the body, the church."—Col. i. 18. Again, "Hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all."—Eph. i. 22, 23. Peter also, instead of claiming himself to be the head of the church, joyfully acclaims that Jesus Christ, "the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is become the head of the corner."—1 Peter ii. 5-7. Popery therefore cannot be the head of that "one body," neither can any of her descendants, beginning with Arius, Manes, Luther, Calvin, nor any of their associate "Reformers" so-called; and if these cannot truly be called the body of Christ, the church, how can they with propriety be called christians or disciples of Christ? I can prove by Catholic history itself that the year 400 was the first that the Pope of Rome was universally received as the head of the Roman Catholic Church; and that about that time, and before, the Baptists repudiated his authority, and separated entirely from all affinity thereto, and have stood separated ever since. I now ask, If the mother cannot be the church, and is disowned, how can any of her daughters or successors in her line be received as such? Therefore we feel that all Protestants are only daughters of Romanism, and follow the condition of their mother. Protestantism includes Lutherans, Reformed Churches of the various branches of Lutheranism, Calvinists of various orders, the Church of England, and all her offshoots as Methodists, and many mingling types of United Brethren so-called. These all originated either directly or indirectly with the usurping power of Papacy, and all stand separate from the church of the true and living God, not only as to their succession, but also in their faiths, which are many. They all have neither one god, nor one father, nor one faith, nor one baptism. Can they then be christian? I answer emphatically, No, not in the scriptural sense. It may seem unfeeling, but I go further, and assert that all who cannot show a "Thus saith the Lord" for those essential doctrines of faith which characterize them as distinct organizations, such as the New School and Free Will Baptists, Campbellites, or so-called Disciples, and I come closer home and include the Means or Middle Ground Baptists, cannot be christians. Let me be understood. I follow the definition of Webster in relation to the definition of Christ as applied to "christian" and "disciple," and not the popular use. My reasons, as applied to the present time, are these. I believe there is too little discrimination in the preaching of the day, so that many of the dear saints who are in these various organizations are left to believe that almost any place is good enough for them if they are only christians; and they feel that it is hard if we cannot recognize them as such, and commune with them where they are. They forget that the Bible only uses the words "disciple" and "christian" as applicable to obedient saints. They may be born again, as Cornelius was, before baptism; but he was not recognized as a disciple or christian until after obedience. Paul was called "Brother" by Ananias before obedience to baptism, but he saw other evidences of obedience as a candidate on his way to the ordinance; and I know of no other example of calling an unbaptized person "Brother." I feel that certain Baptists have not been as particular in this as they ought, no doubt fearing that they might lose some feeble ones if they acted faithfully.

It is sometimes said, "I was baptized twenty-five years ago by the Baptists, and you should not unchristianize them. They did not have Sunday Schools, and so on." I wish to ask, Where did they get all their ministry, from the New School or the Old School? They confess it was all from the New School, "but they were not so unsound as now. I believe they were christians, and I cannot throw them away." I cannot help asking such, Why then did you leave them, if they are christians? I must say that I cannot recognize any man as a christian only as I see the fruits of christianity in his obedience. So it was also with Paul at Corinth (Acts xix. 1-6), where he found certain disciples (twelve men who had doubtless thought that they had obeyed, and were willing to obey when properly instructed in the order) who knew only the baptism of John; and no doubt Paul had information that they were disciples, or willing and obedient believers, but (as I have also found some in like circumstances) he was led to question their order, and found that it was not according to their faith. John preached a coming Savior, which in his day was gospel; but Paul preached a Savior already come, and so the baptism did not correspond with their faith. So it is with the New and Old School Baptists. The New Schools have a coming Savior still, and their baptism is no better than their faith. They do not preach the gospel of a finished salvation through Christ, and therefore are not entitled to the name of christian, nor to any of the holy ordinances. John's day of officiating passed away, but the New School Baptists never had a gospel right since they went out from us; so they are not as much entitled to baptize in a gospel sense as John the Baptist or Apollos.—See Article viii. of the New School Baptist Confession of Faith. I wish to call the attention of the churches to these sacred truths, for my heart is still praying for the peace of Jerusalem; and let me humbly ask every one whom God has quickened to a sense of pardoned sins through Jesus Christ, Can you not see that the true christian church is only that church which holds the authority of God in her own borders, and which has no right to surrender it for the favors or advantages of this world? That church is composed of sinners saved by grace, and given faith in their Savior, and to such the command is, "Arise, and be baptized;" but "Seek first the kingdom of God," &c. See that you find his kingdom before all else. In seeking first the kingdom of God it becomes us to adhere to all that Jesus commanded; the ordinances first in order, followed by every good word and work. Jesus said, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." I understand that "his righteousness" not only includes all that faith presents in the suffering of Christ for sin, but also all that that faith presents to quickened souls of obligations resting upon them in honor to that faith, and therefore includes acts of obedience or righteousness to be fulfilled in them, as Jesus said when baptized, "Suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness."—Matthew iii. 15. I have spoken of these twelve at Corinth to show why I do not receive all immersions as baptism, even though they had doubtless for a time been recognized as baptized believers, and to appeal to the holy desires of the truly humble, who are in their condition, to take the Corinthian twelve as an example of obedience.

It has been urged by one man at least that he would not mind to be baptized again (I use the word "again" as only a quotation, for I never use it in serious relation to the ordinance) if it were not for those whom he had baptized, and casting it all away. I wish to ask why we should prize our work so highly when we do anything that we were never authorized to do? If baptism were performed by an unbaptized man, or an illegally baptized man, and he should see that it was in order to be baptized (I do not say again), why not show a spirit of obedience worthy of their following, and set an example for them, and thus remove the bar that breaks the peace of God's people? It is indeed humiliating at this late day, after the division of 1833 to 1838, to realize the need of this subject now; but it seems from various papers (not the SIGNS), as well as from my own knowledge, that there is still cause for faithfulness to the order of God's house. It has in years gone by been said that we will receive no more illegal baptisms, and this saying of Paul was used, "Let him that stole steal no more;" as much as to acknowledge the crime, but holding to the stolen order or ordinances casting reproach upon the candidate. Again, it is only calculated to cast reflections back upon every one thus received whenever a like candidate comes to the church and is rejected for the same cause. I know of no true repentance only as the thief returns the stolen goods. So if we have any whose baptism is known to be illegal, we cannot rid ourselves of the crime until that ordinance is returned to its original owner, and the ordinance of Christ is fulfilled in gospel simplicity in the christian church (Old Predestinarian Baptist Church).

I now desire to appeal to every lover of Jesus in this final application of the subject. How does the title of christian apply to us, remembering that judgment must begin at the house of God? Are we following Jesus as true disciples, walking in all the ordinances of the Lord's house blameless? Do we walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called? I believe that every one will say, "I find that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwells no good thing; therefore if I am a christian, it is only as the Spirit of Christ, which dwelleth in me, worketh obedience, and subdues this old and carnal nature to the performance of all that can please my Master. Therefore I desire to praise his matchless grace, and render the more obedience for obedience given, and so return him grace for grace."

In humble hope,

SPENCERVILLE, Ohio, July 14, 1889.

SUTHERLAND'S CORNERS, Ontario, }
Feb. 22, 1889. }

DEAR SISTER IN CHRIST:—I read and re-read your letter; and its contents, declaring the grace of God to your soul, were precious to me. The Lord has been feasting and cherishing your heart with gracious revelations of his loving-kindness, and beneath the soul-reviving smiles of his face you have been favored to enter into the joy of our Lord Jesus Christ. "For the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."—Heb. xii. 2. After reading your epistle the first time, feeling a gladness in my heart in the thought that the dear Lord was in his tender love making the heart of one of his loved ones glad, I could envy you your sunshine and feasting, and wearing of royal apparel. It seemed to me that your lot, at the time when you penned your letter, was at least a taste, an earnest, of what is recorded in Psalm xlv. 13-15, "The King's daughter is all glorious within: her clothing is of wrought gold. She shall be brought unto the King in raiment of needlework: the virgins her companions that follow her shall be brought unto thee. With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought: they shall enter into the King's palace." While thinking over the contents of your letter, the following Scripture came into my mind, and afforded me, I trust, some profitable meditation, "In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider: God also hath set the one over against the other, to the end that man should find nothing after him."—Ecc. vii. 14. It has been a day of prosperity with you, dear sister, and it is meet that you should be joyful. The day of adversity, which the Lord has set, will roll round in the set time, and the one will be as much for your good as the other.

The world has its days of worldly prosperity, and also times of adversity. In this respect the Lord's people, in common with their fellow-creatures, have their ups and downs. But those who are the subjects of Jehovah's eternal love, and are his delight, and who are partakers of his tuition, in things in providence as well as in grace, are brought to see and acknowledge the hand of their God. When we give thanks to our God for his kindness in giving us our daily food, we thereby acknowledge our indebtedness and our dependence upon his bountiful hand, from whom all blessings flow. It is not every one of God's elect whom the Lord calls to experience vicissitudes in providence; but when God appoints for his children to fall into sore temporal trials, they in some measure can say with the apostle Paul, "Even unto this present hour we both hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling place." They will learn even in all these things to bless the name of the Lord for his gracious dealings with them in these trials. He will so hush their repinings, and they shall be led to see his tender, fatherly hand, and adore the Lord for the very crust of bread they eat, the clothing they wear, and for all the earthly mercies that surround them. Some, therefore, of God's chosen ones know what it is, even in temporal matters, to be joyful in the Lord in prosperity, and in the day of adversity to consider who they are, what they are, what are their dependencies, to whom they must look to supply their needs, to consider the faithfulness, the constancy, of the gracious Lord their God, and even in the midst of such difficulties to rejoice in the Lord.—Heb. iii. 17-19. "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience."—James i. 2, 3. It was the day of prosperity when the Lord made our wilderness like Eden, and our desert like the garden of the Lord: Then the wilderness rejoiced, and blossomed like the rose; streams of living water flowed to slake our thirst; our sighs and moans and tears gave place to songs of gladness; out of weakness we were made strong; and though our hearts had been filled with fearfulness, and our steps were limping and tottering, we now were strong, and feared no evil, and in joyfulness we journeyed on; for sorrow and sighing had fled away. What was the cause that effected all this? It was God's salvation; for the gospel of our God had proclaimed the welcome, glad tidings, "Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees. Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not: behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; he will come and save you."—Isa. xxxv. 3, 4. When it pleased God to call us by his grace, and he placed us under the law as our school-master, many and painful were our adversities. We were stripped of all our home-made garments; for they could not cover us.—Gen. iii. 7-11; Isa. lix. 5, 6. We discovered that they were filthy rags.—Isa. lxiv. 6. The arrows of the Almighty wounded us; they stuck fast, and no creature could remove them.—Job vi. 4; Psalm xxxviii. 2; xlv. 5. We hungered and thirsted after righteousness, but none of such food could we find in our flesh. We were deeply in debt, but had nothing to pay. We found to our bitter grief that we had sold ourselves into the most horrible and cruel slavery; and in our galling bondage to the reigning monster, sin, being unwilling to serve any longer such a monster, we cried out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Being bound in affliction and iron, shut up under the curse of God, our earthly prospects were blighted, our carnal hopes and schemes of salvation were withered, frustrated and brought to naught; our fancied native strength, and what we termed free will to get religion when we pleased, to perform what the lying self-styled ambassadors of Christ had told us were the conditions of salvation, all our labor and strength were utterly wasted; the fetters of sin held us fast; from sin's terrible grip we could not break away; we languished, and our soul fainted within us; our beauty was turned to corruption; we were brought to see, and owned we were vile, hell-deserving sinners. Over our sins we mourned before God, we longed for salvation, and cried for mercy. Yes, during the daytime and in the darkness of the night we prayed to God to deliver our souls from death, to rid us of our enemies, to save us from our sins. Though we daily confessed we were unworthy, vile transgressors, yet we panted after the living God; we wanted to find communion with the Holy One of Israel; we desired to know and to love God; we hungered and thirsted to partake of his compassion, his grace, his love, his tender mercy and his salvation, and to spend our days in adoring gratitude to the everlasting God. But O! we could not see how this could ever be so with us. I am such an ungodly sinner, how can I be just with God? Will the Lord have mercy upon me, the chief of sinners?

"Not the labor of my hands
Can fulfill the law's demands.
Could my zeal no respite know,
Could my tears forever flow,
All for sin could not atone;
Thou must save, and thou alone."

Though the servants of antichrist proclaim that God has made the way of salvation possible, and that in doing his part the sinner will save his never-dying soul; and though they and their proselytes may sing,

"A charge to keep I have,
A God to glorify,
A never-dying soul to save,
And fit it for the sky,"

we, poor, guilty sinners, could find no ease and comfort in such doctrine. The Lord brought us into such deeps, the sorrows of death compassed us, we were cut off from such blasphemous folly, and through divine teaching learned what Jesus saith to be true concerning salvation, "With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible."—Matt. xix. 25, 26. Yes, it was God who declared our salvation. We were weaned from saying "to the work of our hands, Ye are our god's" (Hosea xiv. 3), or to "co-operate, to be co-workers with God" in the salvation of our souls. There were no strange gods, but God himself alone was our salvation. Everything was prosperous then; for in our dear Redeemer all our needs were supplied, his precious atoning blood cleansed us from all our sins, redeemed us from the curse of the law, reconciled us unto God, and made everlasting peace for us. All our enemies fled, our iniquities were vanquished, and made an end of. Yes, in the cross of Christ we triumphed over sin and Satan, death and hell. His righteousness fed us, clothed us, and beautified us. O the unsearchable riches of Christ! In him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. It pleased our heavenly Father that of his fullness we should receive, and grace for grace. Then in our prosperity we said we should never be moved. "Lord, by thy favor thou hast made my mountain to stand strong."—Psa. xxx. 6. We were joyful then, and well we might be; for God had revealed his mercy, and shed it upon us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Savior, and we could say, Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing: thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness: thou hast raised me, a poor, vile sinner, out of the dust: thou hast lifted me, a poor beggar, from the dunghill, and set me among princes, in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, and I hope by the grace of God to inherit the throne of glory. "In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider: God also has set the one over against the other, to the end that man should find nothing after him." Then if God hath set it thus, it cannot be upset; for he saith, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Saith Job, "He performeth the thing that is appointed for me; and many such things are with him." Well, when the "set time" for the dawning of "the day of adversity" is come, we may try to evade it, to fortify ourselves against it; but all will be of no avail: it will overtake us, because God hath predestinated it as our portion. "God is the Lord; and the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." He is our Teacher, and we are to learn, dear sister; and all his teaching is for our profit, and his wisdom and love hath devised and appointed the way in which we shall grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ—summer and winter, day and night, times of sorrow and of joy. But this is our consolation, to know "My times are in thy hand."—Psalm xxxi. 15; 1 Chron. xxix. 30; Acts i. 7. We little thought in our first season of spiritual prosperity, when in the abundance of the good things of the kingdom we delighted ourselves, when to overflowing a profusion of spiritual blessings were strewn in our pathway, that we would ever come into such a land wherein we should cry out, "My leanness! My leanness! Woe unto me!"—Isaiah xxiv. 16. But though, like Job, we could say, "I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet; yet trouble came."—Job iii. 26. We thought we were removed from self-dependence; that we were looking alone unto the Lord; that we were watching unto prayer; "yet trouble came." I well remember a time like this, when I had been dandled on the knees, and suckled and delighted at the breasts of the consolations of Zion.—Isa. lxvi. 11, 12. Then I thought, How can any trouble reach me? If temptations, affliction and conflicts should come, I thought, I was well versed in the Scriptures; in all emergencies that might arise, I thought, I was well provisioned; the directions were plain; the mistakes and shortcomings of the saints of old times I could see; and I intended to profit by what is recorded concerning them. Thus I thought, in my knowledge of the contents of the Scripture, that my place of defense was the munitions of rocks. I thought I had everything ready, and would evade the errors that others have been ensnared into, or manfully fight my way through all difficulties; "yet trouble came." God had set the day of adversity as my portion, as well as the day of prosperity. I was so foolish at the time of which I am now writing (and more than once since then I have been just as big a fool), I was like one who said, "Saul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry." O! my dear sister in the Lord, the mere knowledge in the letter of what is in the Scriptures, to have the language of the Bible readily upon the tip of our tongue, is no bulwark against the wiles of the devil; and when we are brought into actual wrestlings, and bitter conflicts with sin and Satan, our natural knowledge of the contents of the Scriptures of truth will prove valueless. It is in adversity that we learn that God is our Rock and Fortress, our Refuge, our Strength, our All. Upon the occasion I have alluded to, I arose in the morning, and having dressed myself I fell upon my knees to pray to the Lord. I uttered words, but felt I had no access at the throne of grace. All the time I was eating my breakfast a gloom seemed to settle down upon me. As soon as I had eaten a few mouthfuls I returned to my room, fell upon my knees, and tried to unbosom my trouble to the Lord. But horror and darkness was my portion; no sweet communion with my God did I find that day, nor for many days after. I thought, What can this mean? Why am I excluded? Why am I shut out? Why does the Lord hide himself, and cast me away from his presence? I could not pray; and if I uttered words, they seemed meaningless and a mockery, for there was no God that was mine to hear my cry. I threw myself upon my bed, tossed about, wept and moaned in anguish of heart. Days passed by, but no relief could I find. I began to have hard thoughts of God. The adversary whispered in my ear that God was dealing very unkindly with me; that if he loved me he would not treat me in such a way. Would you treat any one that you loved, and had power to help, in such a manner? I said, "No; indeed, I would not." O what a rebellious state of mind I got into! and as it is written, "The rebellious dwell in a dry land" (Psa. lxxviii. 6), so I found it. Everything was parched up. All the graces of the Spirit, love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, all seemed to be so blighted that I feared they were clean gone forever, that they would never be restored, revived, and my soul cheered with these precious fruits again. My soul desired the first ripe fruit, but none could I find. The adversary, the devil, so besieged me with temptations, and doubts and fears harassed my soul.

"I ask'd the Lord that I might grow
In faith, and love, and every grace;
Might more of his salvation know,
And seek more earnestly his face.
'Twas he who taught me thus to pray,
And he, I trust, has answered prayer;
But it has been in such a way
As almost drove me to despair."

I trust I learned many things under the hidings of Jehovah's face. The beasts of the forest crept forth, and I was their prey. I felt most painfully the plague of my own heart.

When at length my God smiled upon me again, O how bitterly I reproached myself for my base and shameful behavior! But our God deals in a most sovereign way with his children. He saith, "I will have mercy upon whom I will have mercy." It is he who giveth to his flock to sing, "He restoreth my soul." The Lord grants us times when we are brought into his banqueting-house, and then there are times when we go about the city lamenting the withdrawal of our beloved Savior. We mourn over his absence, and cry out, "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon; for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?" When we are sailing in fair weather, our sails set, and the smiling heavens overhead, we make cheerful sailors, and can speak of the pleasantness of the voyage, and of our bright anticipations of entering the desired haven. But the Lord has ordained the day of adversity; then adverse winds begin to blow; we are tossed to and fro, and are soon brought at our wits' end.—Psa. cvii. 23-30. In the day of prosperity we triumph, through the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord, over all our foes; we see sin made an end of, the curse removed, because Jesus was made a curse for us; and in joyful, triumphant strains we can sing, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" But when the day of adversity is our lot, Satan rages, sin abounds, fiery darts assail, the mountains no longer drop new wine, neither can we see that the land we dwell in is a land that floweth with milk and honey, the glory of all lands. "Again, they are minished and brought low through oppression, affliction and sorrow."—Psa. cvii. 39.

"Few minutes in praise I enjoy,
And they are succeeded by pain;
If a moment in praising of God I employ,
I have hours again to complain."

My life, dear sister, is full of such "changes."—Psa. lv. 19. When we read the lives of God's people (recorded in the Scriptures for our comfort and learning), what abundant illustrations we have that God has set the day of adversity over against the day of prosperity. This is God's order, his divine and infallible rule, and those who love God and are the called according to his purpose will find it work for their good; for our God is he who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. "In the day of adversity consider." There is one most precious and comforting consideration, that is, that Christ Jesus is our Brother born for adversity; and I am sure we shall prove that he is the Friend that loveth at all times.—Prov. xvii. 17. Ah, it is while with us it is the day of adversity that the preciousness of his love, his undying friendship, is felt, and our dear Redeemer becomes more and more endeared to our souls. Though our God sees it needful that we be sorely chastened, though we smart under the rod, though darkness and night and no small tempest be upon us, Jesus is with us, and there will come the time when we shall be able to say, "Thou hast known my soul in adversities."—Psa. xxxi. 7. All our peculiar adversities are known to him; and though we cannot, it may be, confide them to any creature, yet our dear Lord will so draw us to his bosom that there we shall pour out our hearts before him.—Psalm lxii. 8; cxlii. 2. Jesus, our great High Priest, came into all our adversities.—Isa. lxiii. 9. "For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." "For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted."—Heb. ii. 18; iv. 15. We must have our seasons of tribulation as well as our times when by his marvelous loving-kindness we are favored "to go forth in the dances of them that make merry." Oft have I murmured over my lot; and then again, I trust, I have been brought into sweet acquiescence to the sovereign good pleasure of our heavenly Father, so that in reviewing my pathway I am led to see the goodness and mercy of God that has followed me.

"And can he have taught me to trust in his name,
And thus far have brought me to put me to shame?"

"His love in times past forbids me to think
He will leave me at last in trouble to sink:
Each sweet Ebenezer I have in review, Confirms his good pleasure to help me quite through."

It is God who is our Redeemer from all adversity.

"Cisterns are broken, and creatures all fail;
But the word he has spoken will surely prevail."

O that I might ever be kept in submission to the will of God, and favored by his grace to live to his praise.

With love to you in our Lord Jesus Christ, I am, I hope, your brother in the fellowship of the gospel,

FRED. W. KEENE.

FORT SCOTT, Kansas, July 11, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS:—I have begun to write several times, and thought I would have my paper discontinued. I have for some years past been so bowed down by an affliction of one of my dear children, who has for some time been in the Insane Asylum, that there has been very little enjoyment of anything for me. My mind has been so terribly disturbed that my hope in God's mercy and goodness has about gone (if ever I had any). No one who has never experienced such an ordeal can form anything like an idea of the mental agony of a parent thus afflicted. My mind has wandered to the circumstance referred to in Mark, and also by some other writers, where a father took his son, who was afflicted, to one he called Master (Jesus), to have him cured. Jesus said to the parent, "If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." The father then said, with tears, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief." I would be glad if Elder Wm. J. Purington would write on this circumstance, if he should feel inclined. Perhaps some others may need some light on this as well as myself. The father seemed only to have that concern which a parent would have under such circumstances. It was not on his own account, but that of his child. I feel very sensibly the need of my unbelief being helped. I conclude that I know nothing about the spiritual application of this; indeed, I fail to get a natural understanding. I wish I could be referred to the Scripture when miracles or healings of this sort should cease. The disciples inquired of Jesus why they could not cast out the dumb or foul spirit, and were told that it was on account of their unbelief. I hope if brother Purington should conclude to write, he will try to explain this subject in all its bearings.

I have found no one here disposed to take your paper. It surely cannot be on account of an insufficiency of good reading matter for those who can appreciate it.

Yours in sorrow and affliction,
M. B. WEEDON.

GAYLORD, Kan., March 29, 1889.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Having seen the question asked in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, if there were any Old Baptists in Kansas, I will say that there are a few scattered over the state. There is a small church located in Smith and Osborn Counties, meeting alternately, four and one-half miles northeast of Gaylord, Smith Co., and eight miles south of Gaylord, in Osborn Co., of thirteen members. Of late we have had no regular preacher. There are a few living near Beloit and Glen Elder; also at Roscoe, Graham Co., and Alexander, Rush Co. You will observe that they are much scattered; but I suppose that it is all right. But O how lonesome! We take great pleasure in reading the SIGNS. I took it during the year 1865, but since that time have seen but few copies, until the beginning of the present year, since which time I have been reading it regularly. There have been a great many changes in this time world. A great many of the standard-bearers of that time have passed from the stage of action, and new ones have been raised up to take their places. Still, by comparing the matter published then and now in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, it appears that publishers and contributors have all been taught by the same School-master. Our regular meeting day is the first Sunday of each month, the April meeting being in Osborn County.

Pray that the Master may send more laborers into this part of his vineyard.

Yours in hope,
J. P. AYDELOTT.

INFORMATION WANTED.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., July 19, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS:—Having seen in the Gospel Standard for February, 1889, that information respecting Strict Baptist Churches could be obtained from you, I shall be much obliged if you will inform me. We left the old country nearly seven years ago, and find that all the churches down here are Missionary Baptists, or what we call at home General Baptists, and the kind of food we get does not satisfy our spiritual hunger. The doctrine of God's electing love and sovereign grace is what we desire.

Yours truly,
A. G. MOORE.

IT REPENTED THE LORD.

(Concluded from last number.)

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Please give your views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on Genesis i. 31, and vi. 6, 7, and oblige many others as well as your brother in Christ, I hope,

JOHN H. HITCHCOCK.

REPLY.

"AND God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day."

"And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them."—Gen. i. 31; vi. 6, 7.

In the record intervening between the verse upon which we have been treating, and the next portion submitted by our brother, there is more really important history than in all the libraries which have been written by uninspired men since time began. Instead of finding the "very good" creation which had been commended by the approbation of God, in the text the judgment of God records the sentence of condemnation and destruction against "man, and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air." The cause of this dreadful change in the declaration of divine justice in relation to the creatures which God had made, will be found in the account given in the third chapter of this book of Genesis. Paul briefly expresses the whole terrible truth when he says, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."—Romans v. 12. Solomon, under the guidance of direct inspiration, carefully examined the subject in all its depth, and recorded the result of his investigation, saying, "Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions."—Ecc. vii. 29. While sin is thus clearly the expression of the rebellion of the creature against the law of his Creator, it is certainly included in the eternal purpose of God that such development should come to pass in the world. Neither in the first transgression in the garden, nor in any sinful action since that time, has the sinner sought to glorify God by his sin; yet God has declared the limitation of all wickedness to just that point which shall manifest his glory. In the enmity of the carnal mind against God, man seeks to defeat the purpose which God has set; but that very enmity is made to contribute to the fulfillment of the end which the wicked sought to overthrow. Thus the Scripture is fulfilled, "Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee; the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain."—Psa. lxxvi. 10. It is one of the favorite ways of opposing the truth of God, for the enemy to pursue the same course which he adopted in the temptation of our mother in the beginning of his work; he professed to accept the word of God as truth, but denied the very fact which God had declared. So, in tempting the saints, he still professes reverence for the Scriptures only that he may pervert them to the distress of the tried subject of his wiles. Whenever any saint is so vainly puffed up in his own strength as to feel competent to meet these assaults of the tempter in the field of natural reason, he is already a captive in the snare of the fowler. So it is written, "He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool; but whoso walketh wisely shall be delivered."—Prov. xxviii. 26. The truth on which the hope of salvation is founded, is not based in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.—1 Cor. ii. 4. This must be learned by repeated lessons in the experience of the saints. Such is the deceitfulness of sin that they have need of the continual presence of their great Teacher, whose Spirit alone will guide them into all truth. They can neither safely trust their reason nor their natural memory; they must have the ever present light of the countenance of their Redeemer. Their life is in him alone.

The sentence of destruction in our text includes with man and beast and the fowls of the air, also "the creeping thing," which seems definitely to signify the serpent by whose subtlety the woman was beguiled, who was doomed thenceforth to creep and eat dust.—Gen. iii. 14. All were created by the eternal Word of God, and all were subject to the decree of that Word by which they were consigned to destruction. While sin was the immediate cause of the curse by which death passed upon all men, that sentence was pronounced by the sovereign judgment of God. Moses says, "Thou turnest man to destruction, and sayest, Return, ye children of men."—Psa. xc. 3. As the good creature of his hand, God had blessed man with all the works which he had made, and had given him "dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." This was a temporal and earthly blessing, and secured to the sinless man every earthly favor of which he could have need. Under the protection of this divine blessing man could never want for any good thing. The garden of God was his abode. But when by his disobedience man became a sinner against God, he received the wages of sin in the death by which he lost all claim upon the goodness and mercy of his Creator. There was no change in the immutable God, but man was changed from the very good creature of God, and had now become dead in sin, and the embodiment of enmity against God. For his sake the earth was cursed; not as an expression of divine indignation, but that the sinner might abide upon the earth. A sinner could no more dwell upon an uncursed earth than fish can live in the air, or birds can enjoy being confined under the water. Thus it is written, as the first expression of the condemnation pronounced upon the sinner, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake." The sentence of condemnation was not an afterthought with God. When he took the man and put him into the garden of Eden, "The Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." There is no time intervening between the transgression of the commandment given to the man, and the certain death which was divinely decreed as the inseparable result of that transgression. Before sin entered into the world man was not under death; but his life was forfeited when he went into sin. Nothing which could be done by any created power could deliver the sinner from that death, or restore that innocence which he had lost. In fulfillment of the just sentence of God the man did die in the day that he did eat of the forbidden tree. By the omnipotent mercy of God the cursed ground was adapted to his abode as a sinner who could no longer dwell in the garden of Eden. Yet his existence is not recognized by inspiration as life. "In Adam all die." Life is only manifest in Christ Jesus. Scripturally all else is death.

Much caviling has been based upon the letter of the declaration of our text, that "It repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart." Avowed infidels alone could find advantage in perverting the evident meaning of this language, even if it were left by inspiration without explanation. If God is deficient in wisdom or power, he ceases to be the God revealed in the Scriptures and in the experience of the saints. Those who construe this text as signifying a change in the eternal purpose of God, not only directly dispute the plain testimony of the inspired Scriptures, but deny the essential perfection of Jehovah. Surely this is far from the design of every one who loves the truth of God. It is not necessary to read further than the last verse of our text to see in the very letter of the declaration that it repented the Lord. When God created man in his own image, he blessed them and commanded them to be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it.—Gen. i. 26-31. That blessing secured every requisite to the fulfillment of the command which God had given to his creature in this particular as well as in every other point. After sin had brought death upon the man, the goodness and mercy of God still sustained him with supplies for the demands of his earthly nature. The race did begin to multiply upon the face of the earth; and the result was the manifestation of the great wickedness of man, in that "Every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." Then the Lord pronounced the sentence of destruction against the man whom he had created. In taking the statement of this text in connection with the declaration of the Lord God when he gave the law to Adam, it is plainly evident that the sentence first declared with that law was shown to be just and righteous by the wickedness developed by man through the sinful abuse of the long forbearance of God. In the execution of the penalty of sin by destroying the whole family of man from the face of the earth, is the expression of the repentance ascribed in our text to the Lord. As it was the very result which was declared in the beginning as the inevitable consequence of sin, it cannot be regarded as signifying a change in the mind and purpose of God. Therefore it cannot be understood as contradicting the inspired testimony that immutability is an essential attribute of the self-existing Jehovah. The literal record shows what is meant by the language of our text. What the Lord did was the fulfillment and the unquestionable explanation of what he said he would do. The general destruction of the living creatures which were upon the earth by the flood, was the expression of the grief of the Lord that he had made them.

It is needful to observe in reading the Scriptures that they are not to be so construed as to make one expression conflict with another. Even in earthly courts a witness must be understood as meaning to say what his testimony expresses when taken all together. Much more must the inspired testimony which God has given be received as its own expositor. Detached phrases may be distorted not only to contradict the whole truth of revelation, but to deny the existence of God himself. It has been well said by an eminent writer concerning the letter of the Scriptures, that "Human feelings, actions and parts are ascribed to God, not that they are really in him, but because such effects proceed from him as are like those that flow from such things in men." In illustration of this remark our text is one of many passages cited. In the destruction of the guilty world the Lord practically said it repented him that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. Yet it is contrary to the whole revelation which God has given of himself to understand that he is subject to the passions, infirmities and changes which would be implied in the use of such language concerning created beings. It is only in the manifestation of his providential dispensations toward men that the Lord is said to be angry with the wicked every day.—Psa. vii. 11. Again, it is said, "Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine."—Psa. lxxviii. 65. No candid mind would construe this as conflicting with the declaration, "Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep."—Psa. cxxi. 4. So, it is not a fair construction of the language of our text to make it contradict the plainly declared word of God, who says, "I am the Lord, I CHANGE NOT; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed."—Mal. iii. 6. Whatever may be the conclusion of finite reason as to the signification of the words under consideration, it is clear to every one who is taught of God that all inspired Scripture is truth; and consequently when rightly understood every portion of the sacred word perfectly harmonizes with all other portions. Truth cannot contradict itself.

The language of our text is so evidently adapted to the finite comprehension of the afflicted and poor people to whom the Scriptures are given, that learned infidels do not pretend to urge this text as being at variance with the great truth which is the burden of all scriptural testimony. They will not confess themselves so stupid as to misunderstand the letter of the text, the meaning of which so fully appears from the immediate context. It is left for the advocates of a conditional system of salvation to stultify themselves by claiming to find in this text evidence that God is neither infinite in knowledge nor in power. Yet they profess to trust in his word as truth, and to hope in his grace for salvation; though they hold that he cannot save them without their own assistance. Such a weak and fallible refuge could afford no hope to those who know themselves as utterly lost sinners. They can trust alone in the immutability of that God who declares the end from the beginning; who is able to do his will in all things; and who does "work all things after the counsel of his own will."—Eph. i. 11. They know that it is not possible for God to lie, and that his love is everlasting. This is the solid basis on which their whole hope is founded. Those who feel their need of a Savior whose love is eternal and unchangeable, will find in their own experience the witness that God does not repent in the sense of changing his purpose. So Samuel said, "The Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent; for he is not a man, that he should repent."—1 Sam. xv. 29. There can be no stronger evidence than that witness of the truth of God which every believer has in himself. That witness always agrees with the written word of inspiration when that word is rightly understood. The things of God are hidden from the natural man even of those who are by faith led into the knowledge of all the deep mystery of godliness. Nothing less than the power of God can show them to any creature.

May the Spirit of truth lead every inquiring saint into the clear light of gospel liberty, and dispel all the mists of error and delusion which arise from carnal reasoning upon the truth which God has revealed.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—By request of Mr. Howard J. Herrick, I send you the obituary notice of his mother, Mrs. Caroline M. Herrick, who departed this life July 8th, in the fifty-third year of her age, at her home in Elmira, N. Y.

She became a member of the New School Baptist Church on New Year's Day, 1852. In August, 1879, I baptized her in the fellowship of the Old School Baptist Church at Burdett, N. Y., where she remained a member to the last. Her experience was published in the SIGNS, Vol. xlviii., No. 5, 1880. She had many peculiar trials, but she was strong in the faith, and in her trust that the Lord was working all things for her good. Her only son has been for some time attending the school of Elder Sylvester Hassell, at Williamston, N. C. She spent three weeks with him there this last spring, and on her return attended the Delaware, Delaware River and Warwick Associations, and spoke of having enjoyed the meetings with the brethren and the preaching unusually well.

She was the daughter of sister Eunice Shephard, well known to many brethren and sisters, who died a few years ago in Elmira. She leaves two sisters. To her son this bereavement is a very great affliction. He is a firm believer in the doctrine of salvation by grace, and says that the understanding of it came to him not by study, but at once by revelation; and yet he thinks it is a belief of the head, and not of the heart. May the Lord comfort him under this great trial, and also in his own time show him that the knowledge of the truth is never revealed to the head or natural mind, but to the faith of God's elect.

SILAS H. DURAND.

SOUTHAMPTON, Pa., July 17, 1889.

William P. Haviland was born in Schoharie County, N. Y., Feb. 28th, 1824, and departed this life at his residence in Rutherford, N. J., June 1st, 1889, in his sixty-sixth year.

The subject of this notice was a descendant of the Quaker stock of Havilands, who settled in Dutchess Co., N. Y., in the early days of America's colonization. He removed with his parents to Hunter, Greene Co., N. Y., where he lived till early manhood. His parents were members of the Lexington Old School Baptist Church. He was first married to Chloe Ingraham, of Hunter, N. Y., Dec. 23d, 1846. She died June 21st, 1850, leaving two children. On August 1st, 1852, he was united in marriage to Sophia Davis, of Ulster Co., N. Y., unto whom eight children were born, two having died in early childhood. His second wife died Dec. 29th, 1887. He is survived by eight children, also one sister, the oldest member of his father's family. He was a loving father, a friend to the poor, and a dear lover of the truth as it is in Jesus. He experienced a hope in the mercy of God when about twenty-one years of age; and in March, 1863, at a special church meeting, he related his experience to the Old School Baptist Church of Middletown & Wallkill, and was baptized in the afternoon of the same day by the late Elder Gilbert Beebe. He was possessed of more than ordinary natural ability, as well as spiritual; and the church gave him license to exercise his gift in a public way in the year 1868, which he did for several years, until he became so absorbed in the business of the world that he told the church he thought they ought to cut him off. The power of divine grace was wonderfully manifested in him in his latter days, and he passed away in the triumph of living faith in the God of salvation.

His funeral occurred on the evening of June 3d, from his late residence, Elder W. Housel and the writer officiating. On the following morning his remains were taken to Warwick, N. Y., and buried by the side of his last companion, who was at the time of her death a member of the Middletown & Wallkill Old School Baptist Church.

May the Lord comfort the sorely bereaved and mourning relatives.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SO GREAT A CLOUD OF WITNESSES.

(Hebrews xii. 1.)

MANY may be in attendance while a witness is giving his testimony, and may feel much interest in it. To the judge, the jurors, the advocate, his words may be of special importance, and may command for the time their closest attention; while others who have no part in the trial may be much interested as observers. But how different from any of these are the feelings of the one whose personal interests are involved. No one can listen as he does whose estate is in question, or whose life is at stake. The interest of others, however great at the time, is but temporary, ending with the trial, while his interest is vital. The words of the witness are to him important as his happiness, as his life.

The Scriptures are witnesses, and their real importance and vital power can be felt and understood only by those concerning whose eternal interests they testify. Many have an interest in them of varying kinds and degrees, as students, as theologians, as seekers for salvation from punishment, as workers for heavenly reward. The interest of some of these may be very deep and absorbing, so that other books and other work may be almost forsaken in this devotion to the study of the Scriptures. Yet the interests of all these are as different from that of him to whom the Scriptures are a witness, as are the interests of all others in a court-room from that of the one who is to lose or gain all he cares for by the testimony. However much of honors or rewards for any of them may depend upon the result of the trial, yet, after all, the words of the witness do not vitally concern them. Students of the Bible may have a great thirst for religious knowledge to gratify, and a character for acuteness and learning and zeal, as theologians, to get and maintain, and may feel great enthusiasm as workers, believing that they are advancing towards God and his rewards by the work they do. But these do not regard the Scriptures as a witness giving testimony. They look upon them as making propositions, containing offers, giving directions to all in the world, and that any one, by attending properly to them, may advance his interests in heavenly things, and secure his eternal happiness.

A witness in the proper line of his duty makes no proposition or offer, and gives no direction. His work is not to tell the one concerning whom he testifies what to do, nor to increase his store of knowledge. His proper work is simply to state facts, to make a report, to tell what he has seen and heard. It is not by instructing the one who is principally interested in his testimony that the witness benefits him, but by confirming him in the knowledge he already has, and making its value appear. The title to one's estate has been denied, and the trial is going on in court. A witness is called to state certain facts for the instruction of the court and jury which the one whose title is questioned already knew and asserted. By this testimony proof of the title is made, and the enjoyment of his rights secured; and the testimony is therefore very refreshing to him who was in danger of being deprived of his inheritance. One is charged with a crime. The witnesses one after another state what they saw and heard. Their testimony convinces judge and jury of the falseness of the charge, while it tells the one whose life is at stake only what he already knew. In proportion as the testimony answers to what he knows it comes as the refreshing rain upon his spirit.

In regard to the Scriptures, the court-room where the testimony of this witness is given is the soul of a poor sinner. All the parties connected with the trial are gathered there. Satan, "the accuser of the brethren," who accuses them day and night before God (Rev. xii. 10), is there. Whenever the sons of God come to present themselves before the Lord, Satan comes also among them, accusing them, and raising questions in their souls as to the validity of their hope. The Judge is there, before whom all appear, and from whom comes every just direction and command and all true knowledge. There the witnesses appear and give their testimony. Within this poor soul is the knowledge of all that is to be testified about, the wonderful things that have been seen and heard, the experiences of condemnation and of deliverance from guilt, the felt power of faith and love and thankfulness; and there also within the same soul is the ignorance concerning the meaning and power and value of all these things, and the doubts and fears concerning his interest in the heavenly inheritance. There are the fierce charges and "fiery darts of the enemy," and the faint efforts at defense. There is our Advocate, who in his own time appears and takes charge of the defense, and brings forward the witnesses, and causes their testimony to be presented in order, and makes it convincing, so that the ignorance is enlightened, and the accusations of the enemy successfully resisted, and the poor soul made to rejoice as he reads his title clear to mansions in the skies.

In this trial the witnesses which the enemy brings, compared with those who testify in behalf of the sinner's hopes, are as a thousand to one. Yet the one is believed whenever we are enabled to hear his testimony, and the others are rejected. To illustrate this, suppose you have once had a glimpse of a most remarkable and lovely landscape, a momentary view revealed by a light as strong and bright as a flash of lightning, which sharply and clearly defined every feature of the vast and varied scene, and vividly impressed it upon your mind so that you can never forget it. In this glorious vision, which memory keeps always in unfading clearness and beauty before you, there was a wonderful mountain of amazing height and grandeur, clothed with luxuriant verdure and all manner of fruits to the very summit. A river of the purest water, clear as crystal, flowed from the throne of infinite glory that radiated all the vast extent of the mountain, and its unnumbered branches ran among all the fields and groves, and carried the refreshing water to all the lovely dwellings and gorgeous palaces, making glad the vast throngs of beautiful and happy people who filled this new and heavenly world which was thus strangely revealed to your enraptured sight. For a long time your soul was lost to other things in the contemplation of this vision of surpassing loveliness. It filled you with joy and peace. It satisfied you. It was as though it were all yours, and yet you had no selfish or sordid thought of ownership. It was all your desire, and you felt that there amid those scenes of never-fading beauty and delight was to be your home, where every longing would be satisfied, every want supplied, and all your being brought into sweet and everlasting content. While you are thus filled with joy and thanksgiving and praise, one asks you the reason of your gladness and hope. You try to tell him what you have seen and felt, but he looks at you with amazement, incredulity and derision. He sees no reason in all you are saying, and as for your vision, he is sure it is all a mere delusion. He asks you to point out the wonderful things you say you have seen. You cannot, for they have all gone from your view. He declares that it was all in your imagination—no reality in it. He has been in a position to see all that you could have seen, and no such scene has ever appeared to him, and he knows it does not exist. He exhorts you to turn away from such false dreams, and give up such vain and foolish hopes, and set about some work which will bring you a good reward, and so provide for yourself in the future. You try to show him that you are poor and lame and sick unto death, and that in what you have seen was the only prospect of comfort and happiness that ever came to you, for one in your condition could not make any provision for himself; and that this prospect came so opportunely, and so unexpectedly, "as the lightning lighteneth out of the east and shineth even unto the west," and was so miraculous in its appearance to you, and so infinitely good, that you cannot give up that it was a blessed reality, and must still rejoice in it, notwithstanding his unbelief. But even as you thus speak the expression of his cold, unsympathizing face and the sound of his scornful laugh strikes a chill to your heart, as you feel the shadow of a rising doubt as to whether you may not after all have been deceived. Others come one after another, learned men and wise, who unite in firmly denying the existence of any such mountain or river as you say you have seen. There are hundreds of them. They all give unhesitating testimony against your belief, some kindly, and with grave and solemn manner, and others angrily and with contempt and ridicule, all insisting that you can have seen nothing which they have not seen, and that you are foolish and to be blamed for yielding to so absurd a fancy. You have about concluded that they are right, and that what you saw was only an hallucination. You cannot forget the scene. In all its parts and in all its beauty it stays with you; and you keep in remembrance also the joy which it brought to your soul, and the delight with which you received in some mysterious manner the conviction that it was your own rich inheritance and everlasting resting place. But the fear is now in your heart that it was all a dream, a thought of what you desired rather than a glad reality. While you are in this state of gloom and desolation on account of the bitter disappointment, a stranger to you begins to speak in the presence of those who have witnessed against you, describing a vision he has had. As he goes on you are filled with amazement and delight to hear him describing the very things that appeared in your own wonderful vision—the great and high mountain, the beautiful river, the glorious high throne, the pleasant plants and majestic trees, the palaces and the multitudes of people, all appear as he tells his vision. He does not describe it as you did, nor mention the particulars that you spoke of. Other features are presented which you had not mentioned, but which you will remember, and which make it doubly sure to you that he has looked upon the very things which were revealed to you. He does not declare that there is such a scene as you have spoken of. He does not appear to allude to you at all, nor even to know that you have spoken of a vision. He merely goes on in the speech of an unlearned man talking, very sweetly as it seems to you, about what he saw and heard and felt perhaps years before; and as he talks every word finds a glad response within you, for memory furnishes an exact counterpart of what he describes. You have seen and felt it all, and your heart leaps for joy, and with zeal and boldness you cry, "This is a true witness! His are words of truth." You can now stand before all the hundreds of men who have denounced your vision as a delusion, and say, "This man is right, and you are all wrong." You know he has spoken truth, and your soul is knit closely in love and fellowship with his.

Why do you believe one man, and he perhaps poor and ignorant, rather than a hundred of the wise and learned? Because his testimony corresponds with what you have seen. It is impossible that two should imagine things so exactly alike. "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established." He is a witness to you. He knows, and by his knowledge you are confirmed in what you also know; and no cloud filled with refreshing rain was ever more welcome and grateful to a thirsty field than this witness to your famishing soul. His testimony is indeed as the rain and the dew upon your drooping spirit.

You now remain quite firmly fixed in your pleasant belief and sweet hopes for many days, notwithstanding all the opposition of unbelieving men. But as the crowds surge around you with their oppositions of science and philosophy and worldly wisdom, steadily and persistently assailing your belief, and showing how impossible such a thing is, and for a long and weary time no witness in your favor appears, you begin to faint in your mind, and to give place again to doubts and fears. Now just as you are ready again to conclude that you have been the subject of a delusive fancy, a man of another nation, whom you have never before seen, begins to speak, and lo, in his speech again the glorious vision appears which has been the joy and rejoicing of your soul. How precious and comforting are his words to you. He does not mention the particular things which the other described, nor those of which you have spoken; but as soon as he opens his mouth in speech you know that he has seen the very mountain and river and fruits and palaces and people that appeared to you. All the special features and beauties of that wide scene could not be told by ten thousand men; yet all appear to you as he tells his story. As you hear his testimony you are built up in your faith, and strengthened, and made patient to wait. You have all joy and peace again in believing, and abound in hope.

All knowledge of spiritual things is by revelation. The Lord speaks in vision to all his people, as he did to his Holy One, in communicating the way of salvation and glory and blessedness of heavenly things.—Psa. lxxxix. 19. "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."—2 Cor. iv. 6. In that vision the mountain of God's holiness is shown us as the only hope and resting place for a poor sinner. That mountain appears indescribably glorious. There we see the "great, white throne," the infinite and holy power of God, which is revealed through Jesus Christ, who "is the power of God and the wisdom of God;" and from that throne, from that power, flows the pure river of the water of life, "whose streams make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High." There, upon this mountain of God's righteousness, we see the "trees of righteousness" which the Lord has planted for his glory. There is his garden, the place of his especial delight, where we see all his pleasant plants, where the loveliest of flowers bloom, and all fragrant things abound and give forth heavenly perfume. In this holy mountain, the righteousness of God, is the feast of fat things for the poor sinner—things that nourish and strengthen and comfort the soul. The truth of salvation by grace through the atoning sacrifice and justifying righteousness of our Lord Jesus Christ is the sweetest and richest of food. "Not of works, lest any man should boast." This is a precious morsel. "We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." "He hath wrought all our works in us." "I lay down my life for the sheep." "I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish." What a feast is this! It is spread nowhere but on this mountain of God's holiness. It is never found upon the hills of human merit or righteousness. Here is "bread that strengtheneth man's heart," "whereof if a man eat he shall never die," "and wine that maketh glad the heart of God and man," and meat to eat which the world knows not of.

Who that has ever seen this mountain, and tasted the riches of the heavenly fare, and felt the firmness of the foundation of God which standeth sure, would ever wish to return to the desolate and sandy hills of legal righteousness and try to build and live there? Yet the whole world is opposed to the very idea of such a mountain as the Lord's people now trust and rejoice in, and deny that there is any such in existence. When asked by the wise of this world for your evidences and proofs of title, what can you say, poor soul? The evidences that have satisfied you cannot be exhibited to any who have not themselves received them. Therefore your claim is held in contempt by the wisdom of the world. It is a stumbling-block to the Jew and foolishness to the Greek. But the Lord sends his witnesses to you just when he sees they are needed to confirm you, and keep you from being overcome and your faith overthrown by the world, the flesh and the devil, and how sure and timely and sweet their testimony appears to you. Each of these witnesses is as "one among a thousand," for Jesus, the Interpreter of his work, the "faithful and true Witness," is with each of them, enabling them "to show unto man his uprightness."—Job xxxiii. 23. Every witness speaks of the same vision in which the truth of God is revealed to all of his children, and therefore they are believed, though opposed by all the world. The Scriptures are full of this blessed testimony; and when our Advocate brings it forth to us we are strengthened, and are ready to stand boldly against all the oppositions of the world, and all the fiery darts of the enemy. But we cannot of ourselves call one witness in our behalf, nor receive one word of testimony in our favor. We must wait for our "Advocate with the Father," who alone can bring one of the great cloud of witnesses to our help.

The apostle in the eleventh chapter has named many prominent witnesses whose testimony is recorded in the Scriptures, and has alluded to many more, who being dead yet speak. They all testify of that same righteousness and salvation through Jesus Christ which every child of God has seen by faith, and has been made to hope for, but which the world does not understand nor love. What reason can you give to the natural man for the hope that is in you which will not appear as foolishness to him? You tell him your hope of righteousness is the gift of God, who has told you that he has loved you with an everlasting love, and therefore with loving-kindness has drawn you to himself, and has revealed to you this glorious mountain of his holiness as yours, and has assured you that upon that mountain you shall stand holy and unblamable before him in love, and shall inherit all its blessedness and glory, and dwell forever in his presence. To him this is only foolishness, and he denies that you have shown any real ground of hope. But here is a witness. "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts; and by it he being dead yet speaketh." Abel could not know that he was righteous until he obtained witness of it from God. His work then was not the cause of his righteousness, but the manifestation of it. He had faith before he offered the sacrifice. It was that faith which caused him to see the need of that particular kind of sacrifice. By that work of faith he obtained the witness that he was righteous. Did God testify to his faith of his works as that in which his righteousness consisted? No; but of his gifts. To the gifts which God had bestowed upon him the divine testimony unvaryingly pointed as constituting his righteousness. This witness exactly answers to our own experience. This is just our hope. There is nothing of value in us but what the dear Lord has given us of his own sovereign will, and we cannot know of the value of even that as a garment of righteousness and salvation for us until the same God who gave it testifies of it. Abel's faith beheld his righteousness all in Jesus, and his work is his testimony of this. So all of the great cloud of witnesses which the apostle names, and which compass us about, testify by word or act of the same righteousness which is of God by faith. This faith, which is in Jesus, and is by him, is presented as the righteousness and strength and wisdom of every one of them. Therefore their testimony is to our confirmation and comfort.

In comparison with the number of false witnesses that are in the world these witnesses of our dear Redeemer are very few; and yet they constitute so great a company, and come so compactly over and around us, that they are called a great cloud of witnesses. But not alone on account of the great multitude of them are they thus called, but on account of the power of their testimony to cheer and refresh the fainting soul. They are as clouds full of rain to the poor, harassed, doubting soul. In their testimony the Lord comes down upon his thirsty people "like rain upon the mown grass." Their doctrine drops like the rain, and their speech distills like the dew; as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as showers upon the grass, because they publish the name of the Lord (Deut. xxxii. 2); while all who publish the names of men as having any power are "clouds without rain."

LOUVALE, Ga., June 26, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—It is with fear and trembling I would again communicate with you and the household of faith, although I have written so much and my name appears so often that I feel perhaps I am occupying space that would be better filled by abler pens who write for the comfort of the household of faith; but as I have freely received, I feel willing to freely give the brethren the benefit of all the Lord in his mercy and grace has given to me. I saw in the Circular Letter (written by brother Purington) of the Delaware River Association, in the SIGNS of June 12th, the quotation, "And I said, My strength and my hope is perished from the Lord. Remembering mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and the gall, my soul hath them still in remembrance, and is humbled in me. This I recall to my mind, therefore have I hope."—Lam. iii. 18-21. These words are the expressions of Jeremiah; and experience with Christ, and the Spirit of Christ in him, enabled him to thus speak. They are words that are appropriate also to the saints in this our day who undergo the same conflict, being led in the same way in the house of our Master's brethren. Unless we were thus led, how could we possibly have any comfort therein? What a variety there is in the travel of the children of God in this vale of sorrow. I have thought this is one of the reasons why no man taketh this honor to himself. No man looking into this would choose naturally to pass through this, as is clearly evinced by the Savior's expression, "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." Paul was an apostle, not by the will of man, nor by his own will, but by the will of God. He was made an apostle, for he was separated from his mother's womb by the Lord, to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. A dispensation of the gospel was committed unto him. The mother of Zebedee's children asked that her two sons might sit one on the right hand and the other on the left of the Savior in the kingdom of Jesus. Some people, like Balaam, say, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." But they do not think of the sorrow that accompanies, and the sorrowful meat, and the tears, and the afflictions, that they are to endure. Paul would encourage Timothy, not with a picture of glory alone, and a crown of stars, and a diadem, but says, "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, nor of me his prisoner; but be thou a partaker of the afflictions of the gospel." There are afflictions connected with the gospel. Jesus, the great author of it, and the soul of it, and the substance thereof, was called a man of sorrow, and was acquainted with grief. He testified that his soul was exceedingly sorrowful, even unto death. As he was, so are we to be in this world. What was it that caused this sorrow, but sin, rebellion against the law of God? He was persecuted and hated, and told his followers it would be the same with them; that they hated him, and they would hate them also. When I see the called disciples of Jesus courting the favor and approbation of the world, I am obliged to think they are going astray from Christ, and are shrinking from the plain way which Jesus has shown us to walk in. It requires faith and grace to meet the world, who opposes the Son of God's delight. I would admonish the brethren to follow him in persecutions, and to endure hardness as good soldiers of Christ. If we seek our life, we shall lose it; but if we lose our life for his sake, we shall find it. He says, "Fear not." Follow him through evil as well as good report. Some may object to the doctrine, and the true doctrine of Christ is hated by the world. It is not in harmony with the reason of this world, nor the wisdom of this world; and I have known people to be set at naught for believing and preaching God's absolute will and predestination, and have heard that opposers say it is the doctrine of the devil, and that it is enough to make devils in hell blush to think it was true. It does make devils in hell tremble, for they well know it is true; and they have no power only what God has given them, and no device that they can devise can be done, only as the Lord of heaven and earth sees fit. This is my joy, and the tree thrown into the bitter water, that makes it palatable to the saints of God. "I will," and "you shall," applies as much to demons as it does to the subjects of grace, or I am wrongly taught, and am willing to be set right if I am wrong. The doctrine so ably set forth by Paul to the Romans, and by Isaiah, and by Jeremiah, and by Christ, and by the apostles, should close the mouths of those who seem to oppose God's sovereign will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth. He hath declared the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure. Truly it is while God's Joseph sits or stands in his watch-tower whole nights, and cries aloud, and spares not, that the archers sorely grieve him; but, like the burning bush, he is not consumed. If God be for him, who can be against him? How is it possible that any of the dear saints, who are truly taught of God, can be offended when afflictions arise for the word's sake? But such seems to be the case. Yet I must say that I feel so established in the doctrine that I have no fears about it ever being overthrown; but, stronger and deeper than the rock of Gibraltar, it will stand forever. Why the Lord does as he does is not mine to answer, nor do I feel called upon to do so; but the Lord gave the word, and great was the company of them that published it. I have passed through much affliction therefor; but God, who is rich in mercy, has thus far enabled me to be steadfast in this precious truth, which brings me comfort by day and by night. I do not believe it to be contrary, as some might think, but because I believe it to be the truth of God. My soul hath them in remembrance still. But God has given me patience to endure, amidst all my sorrows. I have hoped that the Lord would reconcile his children; and we see the great need of the word of reconciliation being preached among the saints. We would say, as did Paul, "Be ye reconciled to God," bearing in mind that he is not as man. "For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his ways higher than our ways, and his thoughts than our thoughts." The doctrine of the cross is herein exemplified, in that the doctrine of God in his highness is a cross to the human mind, and contrary to it. Why God created all things was because it was his pleasure; and if he did create all things, I do not see why he should not predestinate all things. His purpose is equal to his wisdom, and his wisdom to his power, and all the perfections of God are of equal length and size. If not, I cannot understand it. Who can oppose that idea, and yet preach the perfection of God? I wish to call attention to a few passages of Scripture, and connect them, and see what they teach. "All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made." "I have created the waster to destroy."—Isa. liv. 16. "In that day the Lord with his sore and great and strong sword shall punish leviathan the piercing serpent, even leviathan that crooked serpent; and he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea."—Isa. xxvii. 1. "By his Spirit he hath garnished the heavens; his hand hath formed the crooked serpent."—Job xxvi. 13. Again, in the forty-first chapter of Job, leviathan is referred to, and is called "a king over all the children of pride." "I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things."—Isa. xlv. 7. Again, I read in Revelation, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created."—Rev. iv. 11. Are we not made to say, like Jacob, "It is enough?" We believe the word of the Lord. Upon this we stand, in this we take comfort, and by this we hope to be established forever.

O how the Arminian wrangles with the truth that makes the saints rejoice. "Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel to honor, and another to dishonor?" The Arminian says, "No. He had no right to make me, and send me to hell without a chance. He had no right to love Jacob, and hate Esau, before they were born, when they were both children of the same mother and father. But he saved Jacob because he was a good boy, and Esau was a bad boy. He knew Jacob would accept the overtures of mercy, and be saved, and that Esau would not. Hence when Jacob repented, he had mercy on him." If I were allowed to judge, and if there were any difference in the boys, I think Esau was as good a boy as Jacob naturally, and it may be he was better. But God's purposes are not according to the actions of creatures, but according to his wisdom and glory. This Scripture shows that it is according to election, that hated doctrine which the Arminians cannot bear. It is also a notorious fact that those who are elected believe, and those who are not are the ones who object: like it is in our day when a man is elected, he says it is all right; but if not, he declares the whole thing was wrong. I am also aware that if Paul and the prophets and Christ do not stop men's mouths from the malicious prating against the doctrine most surely written and believed by the saints of God, I cannot do it. But it affords me much delight to be able to believe it, and to write it, and preach it when the Lord so impresses me. Who can resist it without fighting against God in his eternal counsel which he purposed in himself before the world began, and is manifesting continually to the saints in this world of woe and misery? While we have our most sorrowful meat, how much more affliction is to come upon us for the word's sake no one knows; but if we can ask the Father of spirits for grace to help in time of need, and he is with us in the furnace, and knows how to succor us, we can feel the Lord is ours, and he will heal our sorrows, and dry up our tears, and console our grief-stricken hearts. Each one has his peculiar trials and sorrows to endure for the elect's sake. How it drives us constantly to him. Even the opposition to this heart-consoling doctrine turns out comfort to us, as the Lord directs. Hence how appropriately the words of the Lord, "Be still, and know that I am God." "All things are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's." This is calculated to inspire us, and enable us, like our great Captain, to bear the cross, despise the shame, with the humble hope that "If we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him." If we deny him, he also will deny us. In all our afflictions he was afflicted. He loved us, and pitied us, and redeemed us from under the curse of the law, having been made a curse for us. Again, our light afflictions here, which are but for a moment, are working for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, as we look upon the things not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal. This is one of the unseen things, even the doctrine of his unlimited purpose and power and wisdom.

We cannot behold it with the eyes of natural reason; but the eye of faith beholds things afar off. It looks into the eternal covenant of God, his eternal counsel before earth or the world were. How sorrowful we become when we are made to lament our vileness, that we are but worms of the dust, and that by reason of sin we daily deplore our condition, and groan, being burdened. We are distressed and grieved, and are made to say, like Paul, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through Jesus Christ." I with my mind serve the law of Christ, but with my flesh the law of sin. In the world we shall have tribulation, but in Jesus we shall have peace—that blessed peace promised those whose mind is stayed on the Lord. This is perfect peace, a blessing indeed, riches which add no sorrow.

I have not written as I thought I would when I first started, but I hope it is the truth which I have written.

Yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

FEBRUARY 9, 1877.

IT IS with fear and trembling that I attempt to write a few lines of what I hope have been the Lord's dealings with me in bringing me out of nature's night into the marvelous light and liberty of his dear children.

I was born July 9th, 1846, but, according to nature, was blind to the plan of salvation by grace. As I grew up I was not much concerned about religion, for I thought I could get that at any time, as I thought that all I had to do was to leave off my wild or lively ways, be sober, read the Bible, say prayers, and God would then be under obligations to favor me with his blessing. I thought I did not have as much to do as a great many others, who attended dances and other places of amusement; for my parents did not believe in such things, nor even in Sunday Schools. This I thought was very strange, for I thought that this was one way to be good. I knew very many who went to Sunday School, and they would ask me why I did not go too. I would tell them that I was not ready to get religion yet. I was young, and thought I must enjoy more of the world's pleasure before settling down and being religious, for I thought it a very serious matter. I thought that when I should have reached thirty or forty years of age it would be time enough to get religion. I thought that about that age I would join some popular church, the Methodist, perhaps, as I wanted to be different from any of my folks, for some of them had joined the Campbellites. When in my sixteenth year my father told me and my sisters that he would take us to an association that fall, as it was only about thirty miles from us. According to promise, we went to the meeting. I never shall forget that meeting. Although I did not understand the preaching, I was made to stop and wonder at the brethren and sisters, as they called each other. I did not know at that time the love they had for each other, but I hope I have learned it since. They seemed to enjoy each other's company, and were so much like one family; and I do believe they are. During the fall of 1862 I began to have trouble. I was not satisfied with the way I was living, nor was I ready to get religion. I would make promises and break them. I now thought it not so easy to be good. I was so troubled that I would look back over my past life and try to think that I was not so bad as some people, for I did not go to dances, and always tried to keep good company; but all this did not help me, for I could see nothing good that I had done in all my life, but that I was a sink of sin. I could not think a good thought. I would go to some lonely place and try to pray, but could not utter a word. I then thought prayer a form of words, not knowing that it is the desire of the heart. All that I could think was, "God, be merciful to me, a sinner." I passed the time in this way until late in the winter. One night I went to a Methodist protracted meeting. Up to this time I do not remember of reading the Bible with any understanding. The minister took for his text Revelation xxii. 17: "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." He said a great deal about sinners coming to God and taking of the water of life freely, urging them to come to the mourners' bench. He told them that it was for them to choose; that if they did not come to Christ it was their fault, for he had done all he could for them. After the preaching he gave an invitation for mourners, and for all who wanted to be prayed for. I thought if there ever was a poor, helpless sinner that needed prayer, I was that one; so I went and knelt down with the rest, for I felt that I was condemned to die before a just and holy God. I could do nothing but sob and cry. Some wanted to know who I was and where I lived, and some wanted to know what made me cry. I thought if they knew the heavy load of sin and guilt that bore me down they would not wonder at my sobs; for it seemed to me that if God in his mercy did not raise me from there I would never be raised, for I could see that both my natural and spiritual life were in his hands. It seemed to me that I had done wrong in going there. I felt that I was no more than the leaves of the forest. All I could say seemed to fall to the ground. Though I had knelt at their bench, and they had said that this was the place to get religion, I could not agree with them, but felt certain that if ever I enjoyed religion it would be a free gift of the Lord, who had given his only Son for his people. I had seen my inability to do anything to merit eternal salvation; that if it depended upon anything good that I must do, I must be forever lost. I was staying at my brother's home at this time. I did not tell them I had gone to the mourners' bench, nor did I intend for them to know it, for I was a little ashamed for them to know it; but they found it out from others. One of my sisters was very much hurt at me for it, and asked if I did not know any better than that. I told her I felt so bad that I did not know what else to do, but that she need not be uneasy about my going there again; yet I had not given up the idea of joining the Methodist Church, but thought I would not join it unless I was immersed, for that was the way the Savior was baptized. Time passed until the first of March, the usual time of the Baptist meeting. There was to be a funeral preached at the meeting-house by the Baptist minister. He came to our house and stopped a short time. I never shall forget how I wanted to go to that meeting. It was so very muddy that it was almost impossible to go. The minister came back past our house on Sunday evening, and talked of the meeting, and said he had promised to come again on the first of April. It seemed to me as plain as though some one had spoken it, that I must go and be baptized. I was leaning against the mantel-piece, and looked around to see if any one was looking at me, for I began to tremble. I left the room to keep them from noticing me, and those words kept ringing in my ears for some time, it was such a shock to me, for I had not thought of joining the Old School Baptists. I was acquainted with several, but they were all old folks, and were good enough, but were too far from home; but the more I heard them talk, and the more I read their experiences, the more I began to think they were the people I loved. When the first of April came I had given up going to the meeting until about time to start; then I thought I would go, but resolved that none should know what I had been thinking about. I had not got seated until I would have given worlds, had they been mine, if I had not been there; but to go away without any excuse I could not, for I felt so guilty that I thought they could see it. I resolved to sit there and not let any one know my feelings. It seemed to me that every word the preacher spoke was right to me; and more than all, he had told all my faults so plainly that I thought the others who were there knew what a sinner I was. There I was, bowed down, and knew not what to do; for I felt too unworthy to occupy a seat in the house, let alone to offer myself to the church. They opened the door for the reception of members. I wanted to go, but felt too unworthy to raise my head. At last, while they were singing hymn 991 of Beebe's Collection, I thought they all knew how bad I was. I asked one of the sisters if I must go. She did not understand me, but took me by the hand and went with me. I was received, and baptized the next day. I often wonder yet why they did receive me, for I do not remember of relating any of my experience, nor did they ask me many questions. Previous to this I had thought I should regret to leave my associates and to join the church; but that was no cross for me now. When I went down into the water it looked so beautiful that I would not have cared had all the world been there. They could not see it in its beauty as it appeared to me. The preaching that evening was from these words, "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name." These words were so fully appreciated that my soul was overflowing with love, when I thought of the glorious plan of salvation by grace alone. Who could claim the glory and honor but Jesus Christ? Everything seemed so very pleasant for several days that I thought I should never have any more trouble; but I found this a sad mistake. One night I began to study over what I had done. I feared that I had done wrong, and had been in too much of a hurry. There were my old father and mother, who had not joined any church, and some of my brothers and sisters, who were much better than myself, and I the youngest of the family. It looked to me that I was trying to be a pattern for the older ones. I could not see it as I had a year before. I came to the conclusion that I had been deceived, and what was worse, I had deceived the church. I went into the bed-room, threw myself across the bed, and wept bitterly. It seemed to me that if I had not gone to the church I would not have felt so bad. It seemed too bad to bring a reproach upon the people I thought so much of; for I had often thought if I could be as good as I thought they were I would have no reason to doubt. While weeping and thinking over these things there was a light or white object appeared to me in the darkness, such as I had never beheld before. It seemed to be between heaven and earth. I gazed for a moment, my tears were dried, and immediately the hymn, "Am I a soldier of the cross?" &c., came to my mind so forcibly and clearly that I thought if I was a soldier of the cross, a follower of the Lamb, I need not expect to " * * * Be carried to the skies

On flowery beds of ease,
While others fought to win the prize,
And sail'd through bloody seas."

Since that time I have often found myself groping in the dark, but my beautiful light has not gone out. I do not realize its presence at all times as I did that night, but I hope it will be sufficient for me. There have been many changes since that time, but that is something I cannot forget. There have been times when I have had impressions to write what I hope have been the Lord's dealings with me, but when I attempt it I think it is of no use. If I could write to edification I would not mind it. Then I look at my inability to write, and stop, thinking it is not for me to do. I never attempted it but once before, about twelve years ago. I wrote it down, and upon looking it over I saw such a resemblance to myself, so full of faults and so imperfect, that I committed it to the flames, and thought I never would try it again; but for the last two or three years it seems that I cannot get clear of the impression to write. It has bothered me so that I could not sleep at night. Last January I made a promise that during the winter I would try again; and now the winter is almost gone. I have written to relieve my mind. To write to edification could not be expected of such a poor worm of the dust as myself; and yet I hope to be remembered at the throne of grace. My earnest desire is to be kept humble at the feet of Jesus, and there learn of him. There are many precious promises for the children of God; and now comes the great question, Am I one of that number? It sometimes seems to me that if I were one of them I would not be found so often in by and forbidden paths. I have confidence in you that you will pity me, rather than blame me. If this is not the leading and teaching of my heavenly Father, do not receive it, for I want to know nothing save Jesus Christ and him crucified.

ELLISVILLE, Miss., April 21, 1884.

DEAR SISTER:—It seems that I cannot be satisfied this morning without writing you a little more. It seems that I told so little before the church, if I cannot talk I must write. I remember that when I was quite a little child I had at times a great desire to do right; but it seemed that I could not do all that I ought to do. I thought that when I grew older I would then do exactly right; but as I grew older it seemed I was worse than ever before, and that it would have been better if I had died before I became old enough to give account for my sins. I feared to die, lest I should be lost. It seemed to me that I did my best to do right, but O how

I failed in this! When I was about twelve years old it seemed to me that all I could do would avail me nothing, and that it would be a still greater sin for me to be praying and asking God to forgive me, while I was going on and sinning more and more. It seemed to me that I was so bad there would never be any hope for me to be saved. I felt that I could not live long, and that I would die and go to that awful place of torment that I had heard of. I felt that all the enjoyment I ever would know would be here before I died. But while I would be trying to enjoy myself, I would be troubled, and could not help it. I came to be in very great trouble, could find no comfort, and could not help thinking what a sinner I was. There I was, feeling that I could not live as I ought, nor could I die, and what must I do? O what an awful condition I was in! It seemed to me that no one else was as I was. After awhile it seemed to me it was my duty to go and hear a preacher, and listen to what he said, and then if I thought it would be of any use I would try to pray. Well, I went to hear what was then called preaching, but it did not relieve or cure me. I tried to pray for forgiveness, but did not know whether it was of any use, so I could not help doubting. It seemed to me to be my duty to do the best I could, and then if I was lost I could not help it. But I felt that if I was lost I deserved it, as my sins were so great. I would read the Bible, and looked for relief, until as time passed it seemed that I grew very forgetful about trying to do right. After some time had passed, I remember that one Sunday you and I were reading in the New Testament, when it seemed to me that I had sinned or blasphemed against the Holy Ghost. O how I was again troubled! But I read on and came to the place where it is written that Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness, &c. It then seemed to me that I believed God's words were true, yet I was not exactly satisfied with myself. I had dreams that seemed comfortable to me, and were very precious to me. I got to thinking about the church. It seemed that the churches here did not suit me, but I did not know where I could find one that would suit me, and so I became a little contented. I now felt that I had some hope. At length I became dissatisfied to remain as I was, and began thinking that perhaps the wrong was in me instead of the church. I thought that God had a people on the earth, and also thought that the Missionary Baptists were the nearest right of any that I knew of. I became willing to join them, as it seemed to be my duty. I think it was in September, 1878, that I joined them. But on the 21st of September, 1881, I became willing to come out from them, and it seems to me that I never had seen the goodness and mercy of God as I saw it about the time I came out from among them, and as I have since that time.

MAPLE WORKS, Wis., June 30, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Inclosed you will find two dollars for my paper, the SIGNS. I know I am late in renewing, on account of sickness; but the good Lord has seen fit in his mercy to raise me from death, for his own good pleasure; for there is nothing in me to merit esteem, or give the Creator delight. I feel my sinfulness and short-comings more as I grow older, and feel more weaned from the world. Once I admired its trifles too, but I trust that grace has set me free. Were it not for that hope, I should be of all creatures most miserable. I often go back to my early experience, and remember how I felt after I believed the Lord pardoned my sins. How beautiful everything looked, and how sweetly the birds sang! I thought my troubles were all over, and never would return. But how mistaken! I feel that I have always been a stumbling-block in the way of others. I see so much in myself to abhor, I think, O is there any one like me? Then when I read of others that are led in the same way, I take courage. I hail the SIGNS as a precious bundle of letters from very dear friends every Saturday night, and as long as I can raise the money I shall patronize that paper in preference to any other. I believe we all ought to make an extra effort to keep it up. I would willingly pay five dollars yearly than see it go down.

With much love for my people, I remain yours in fellowship, SYBIL ALLEN.

ELLISVILLE, Miss., June, 1889.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—I must state to you how the Lord has blessed us, whereof we are glad. On Saturday before the third Sunday in May we received into the fellowship of Zoar Church four members. One of the brethren had been a preacher among the Missionaries fifteen or sixteen years. The other was, or had been, a Deacon among them for several years. The brother that was a preacher among the Missionaries, this church set apart for ordination at the same meeting she received him, having heard him preach before, and was satisfied of his call to the ministry. She called for a presbytery to assist in his ordination, which took place at our last meeting in June. The presbytery consisted of brethren J. D. Harrison, N. C. Peterson and myself. May God have all the glory.

Your brother in hope of eternal life,

GROW IN GRACE.

"Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness. But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. To him be glory both now and forever. Amen."—2 Peter iii. 17, 18.

With this earnest and affectionate admonition the apostle Peter closes the second epistle written by inspiration of God to "them that have obtained like precious faith with us [the apostles] through the righteousness of God and our Savior Jesus Christ." So far as we can know, this appears as the last recorded expression of the solicitude of this apostle for the welfare of those whose fellowship he claims in the gospel of Christ. The affectionate language here used is not to be limited to mere personal feeling such as is known among earthly friends. The love of created beings can no more compare with the heavenly principle here designated than artificial light can bear comparison with the radiance of the noonday sun. It is very important that this address be observed, as there is no other character but such as here described to whom the admonition can be correctly applied. The beloved ones addressed include all who have the knowledge specified. Therefore, it is necessary to consider what these things are, to which our text refers.

Throughout this whole epistle the things presented are such as are known only by that revelation which comes exclusively from the Spirit of God. Hence none but such as are taught of God can be addressed in the text. They have not learned the things by dint of study, nor yet by the instruction which could be imparted even by inspired apostles; for Peter could do no more than call the attention of the saints to the things which they had been taught of God. So he says that in writing to them his object was to "stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance." The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, and he has recorded the assurance to his chosen Zion, that "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord; and great shall be the peace of thy children."—Isa. liv. 13. This peculiarity marks all divine instruction, and it cannot be imitated by any of the false teachers who seek to deceive the saints. However new and wonderful may be the presentation of any subject in the testimony of Jesus, it will always be found that they have learned it in personal experience by the teaching of that Comforter, the Holy Ghost, who teaches his children all things. Jesus says that when the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth. "All things that the Father hath are mine; therefore said I, that he shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you."—John xvi. 15. Each individual saint has a peculiar form of expression for declaring the truth, but the truth itself is known to every saint by that divine teaching. So it is written, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things."—1 John ii. 20. While they painfully feel their ignorance and destitution of understanding in the things of the kingdom of God, it is still true that they have the witness in themselves which is the only safe test by which to try all the suggestions presented for their acceptance. This witness will always perfectly harmonize with the inspired record; so that it is certain that any sentiment or principle is not taught by that Spirit when it is found to be at variance with the infallible standard of revealed truth. It is a common device of the tempter to suggest that some favorite notion of the carnal mind is valuable truth, and the deception is so flattering to the weak vanity of his deluded victim that nothing but the light of the Spirit can deliver such deceived ones from their delusion. In vain may the letter of the Scriptures be presented to those who are thus captivated. They cannot be delivered by their most esteemed brethren. Darkness is light, and light is darkness, to their bewildered vision.

None of the subjects of divine instruction are so firmly established in the doctrine of God our Savior as to have no need of the serious warning here given. To every one of the beloved saints the caution is addressed. "Beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness." The particular error of the wicked here specified has peculiar power for leading away those who are unwary. When the saints are enraptured with the revelation of divine grace in their salvation, they are not likely to be willingly involved in those forms of wickedness which are manifestly revolting to their view; at such a time they would feel shocked at the mere suggestion that they ever could forget their allegiance to their dear Redeemer. They cannot then think there is danger of their being led away from their devotion to Jesus by any allurements which can be presented, much less can they apprehend danger of being deceived with so repulsive a thing as "the error of the wicked." Yet it is the experience of every one who has long walked in the way of truth, that this error of the wicked has been suggested to them, and few if any have failed to learn the bitterness of being led away with its deceitful attractions. The wily tempter does not suggest any immoral or gross iniquity when he would deceive the simple follower of Jesus. With the insinuating guile of the serpent he infuses the poison of his malicious falsehood through the pretense of anxiety for clearer knowledge of the salvation of God. Calling upon the carnal reason of the tempted one for proof of the truth of revelation, he leads his victim away from the stronghold of implicit faith in the word of the Lord into the treacherous quicksands of unbelieving doubt and self-reliance. It is against this error that the word of inspiration warns the beloved ones. The need of such warning is clearly manifest to all who have fallen from their own steadfastness through the "error of the wicked," as stated in our text. This "error of the wicked" is confined to the unbelieving subjects of divine grace. As none of the heathen world could transgress the law which God gave exclusively to the nation of Israel, so none but the redeemed people of God can be led away with this "error of the wicked." On the other hand, the belief of that which is abstractly true does not constitute any merit in those who are not taught of the Lord. Even devils believe there is one God, and tremble at that truth; yet they are not the less subjects of eternal condemnation. The faith which is the fruit of the Spirit is inseparable from that love by which it works.—Gal. v. 6. The wickedness of unbelief in the saints is in the transgression of the law of Christ their King. In their wickedness they are visited with the rod of his just chastisement, not for their destruction, but for their deliverance from that wickedness. So the psalmist says, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes."—Psa. cxix. 71. It is to the saints that it is written, "We know him that hath said, Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, The Lord shall judge his people. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."—Heb. x. 30, 31. The saints are not allowed to use their liberty for an occasion to the flesh. There is no clearer evidence that a man is destitute of the love of the truth than the fact that he can presume upon the infinite grace of God as giving license for him to continue in sin. Those who have been born of the Spirit must love righteousness; and that love includes the hatred of sin. Every one in whom dwells the love of God must feel the service of sin as a heavy bondage, from which he groans for deliverance. This truth marks the distinction between those who are truly led by the Spirit and such as are still in the love of sin. There is no desire to be delivered from the power of sin without the indwelling of the Spirit of holiness. Sin is the element of all who have not been delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of Jesus. They can no more desire to be freed from sin than the fish can long for deliverance from water, or the bird can wish to be freed from the air.

The apostle does not warn his brethren to beware lest they should be finally cast off from the enjoyment of eternal bliss in heaven; but lest ye "fall from your own steadfastness." To such as have no desire for holiness there is nothing distressing in such a fall as is here specified; but to those who hunger and thirst after righteousness such falling is indeed dreadful. Under its agony the groaning of David and Jeremiah is still heard, and the bitter tears of Peter bear witness to all ages of the distress which is felt by the true lover of Jesus when he has thus fallen. If any saint has been long following the Lord without personally experiencing this painful affliction, he has great reason for thanksgiving to the only wise God our Savior, who alone is able to keep his chosen ones from falling, and to present them faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy. No other power is sufficient to save the weak and tried pilgrims in their sojourn in the midst of sin and temptation. Left to their own strength and watchfulness they could not stand against these enemies one moment.

"But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." So different is the growth in grace from that which is in nature that the saints themselves can never understand that they are obeying the direction of the inspired word. They are constantly becoming more conscious of their destitution of evidence that the grace of God dwells in them. Under such realization of their bondage in subjection to vanity, they are compelled to cry for deliverance from its dreadful power; and this necessity is more deeply and more constantly felt as they pass on their journey of weariness in this world of sin. They cannot understand that this is growing in grace. Reason accepts the suggestion of the accuser, who says that every indication proves they are not led by the Spirit of God, and all their hope is a delusion. If it were possible, they would be deceived so effectually as to sink in despair, and their hope would be cut off. But they are still kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. This severe and dark trial appears to them as tending to destroy their hope in the grace of God; and they consider it an evidence that they are not regarded as subjects of the love of God. With Jacob, they are ready to say, "All these things are against me." Every step of their pilgrimage is contrary to the way which seems right to them. Thus the Lord brings the blind by a way that they knew not, and leads them in paths that they have not known; he makes darkness light before them, and crooked things straight.—Isa. xiii.

16. It is not by dispelling the darkness that the Lord gives light to his chosen people, as a lighted lamp might dispel the darkness of a room in nature. He makes the very darkness itself bear testimony by which they are assured of the fact that they are indeed the chosen vessels of his mercy. The afflictions which they endure witness that they are partakers of the fellowship of the sufferings of Christ. Thereby they are assured of their unity with him in his glorious victory over sin, and in his triumphant resurrection and exaltation in eternal glory. They are comforted not less by the rod of his chastisement than by the staff of his immutable word of promise. Their groaning in the pit of conscious vileness and pollution clearly manifests their earnest desire for holiness. Their mourning because of the hiding of their Redeemer's face is positive demonstration that they love his appearing. They often doubt the reality of their brief seasons of light and joy in his manifest presence; but they cannot deny the painful experience of darkness in which they are made to mourn his absence. While they must feel that chastening for the present is not joyous, but grievous, yet even such grievous experience afterward yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby. So every bitter trial which is given them to endure is made to contribute to the development of their strength in that trust in the Lord which is their only sure support in the depth of affliction. "They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever." It is surely genuine growth in grace when such stability in the truth is developed in one of the little children of God. The trial of their faith must be wrought through much tribulation, but it is afterward shown to them that the way in which the Lord led them was "the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation." This city is the perfect rest into which those who have believed do enter in their present experience. Instead of such growth being productive of a disposition to glory in their own strength, and to despise those who have not yet attained such growth, the more fully this grace is developed in any saint the more he is prepared to bear the infirmity of the weak, and the greater will be his willingness to endure patiently even the revilings of such as oppose themselves in withstanding the truth. The pity of affectionate sympathy will flow out toward such mistaken ones, and not the proud indifference of scorn. True humility is an invariable manifestation of real growth in grace. This excludes the possibility of that self-confidence which is a necessary principle in all hatred toward others. "He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now."—1 John ii. 9.

Growth in grace is inseparable from growth "in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." As the light of divine life reveals more clearly the depth of our own sinfulness, we are enabled more fully to know the infinite grace which is revealed in our Lord Jesus in giving himself for our sins, and thus redeeming us from their pollution and the death which was our just desert. This knowledge is too deep for finite intelligence ever to grasp its fullness; but it is given to his saints to grow in the apprehension of its wonderful mystery. This growth will never be fully attained until we awake with his likeness in the world of perfect glory. In this finite state we shall never get beyond the need of this exhortation. It is not an injunction which requires to be fulfilled by the efforts of the saints, but it is the expression of that desire which characterizes all who are animated by the Spirit of Christ. The law of Christ is perfect liberty to all who have his Spirit, not to authorize them to live after the flesh, but to warrant them in continual aspiration after conformity to the mind of Christ. This is the prayer which ascribes all glory to him both now and forever; and to this prayer every one who is led by his Spirit does more earnestly and from the heart respond, Amen.

SERIOUS ILLNESS OF ELDER WM. QUINT.

JUST as we are going to press we are in receipt of the sad news that our beloved brother, Elder William Quint, is dangerously sick with pneumonia and other bodily ailments. Few of our brethren in the ministry are more widely known than Elder Quint; and it is our prayer, if it is the Lord's will, that he may speedily be restored to health. He has fought a good fight and kept the faith; and if his work is finished, we feel assured that there is a crown laid up for him, and may God give us grace to bow in humble submission to his will.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

SISTER Euphemia E. Bloomfield was born July 9th, 1846, in the state of Illinois, and was the daughter of Jonathan and Polly Reed. She obtained a hope in Christ at the age of sixteen years, and was baptized in the fellowship of the Henderson Church of Old School Baptists, by Elder R. M. Simmons. She was married to brother Wm. Bloomfield, Oct. 12th, 1865, who was also a member of the same church. They continued faithful members until the fall of 1884, when they moved to Nodaway Co., Mo., where they united with the West Union Church of the same faith and order, where she continued a faithful and devoted member until her death, which occurred July 7th, 1889, after a protracted illness of five months, though she had been feeble for the last two years. Although her sufferings were intense, she bore them with patience and christian fortitude, often expressing a desire to bear patiently any affliction that her heavenly Father might send upon her. Salvation by grace was her theme; and truly the good Lord was gracious to give her sweet tokens of his love. She tried to sing his precious praise, and talk to those around her of his loving-kindness, and of her bright prospects beyond. The last hymn she tried to sing was,

"A few more days on earth to spend,
And all my toils and cares shall end,
And I shall see my God and Friend,
And praise his name on high;
No more to sigh or shed a tear,
No more to suffer pain or fear,
But God and Christ and heaven appear Unto my raptured eye."

Truly all that could be done to alleviate her sufferings was done for her; but her time had come. The Lord called for her and took her; blessed be the name of the Lord. She leaves two sisters, one brother, two sons, three daughters, and a dear and faithful husband, whose unceasing faithfulness to his wife through her long afflictions has never been excelled in my knowledge, to mourn their heavy loss. The dear family, as they stood looking upon the dying mother, while many fond recollections of the past, expressive of the undying devotion of a mother and companion, crowded upon their minds, shed bitter tears of sorrow. As I stood in their midst and beheld their grief, I felt like saying, "O husband, children, weep not! She is not lost, but gone before." May God in his mercy bless them.

In this dispensation of God's providence the neighborhood feels that it has sustained a heavy loss, and the church feels it more sharply, in that she has lost one of her best members. Sister Euphemia was faithful in the house of God, always at her post when able. As we contemplate her vacant seat we pray God to fill it with the faithful. Her house was a welcome home for the dear saints; and while dear brother Bloomfield and family have the sympathies of all in this sore affliction, we would commend them to the Lord and his precious promises, while we would sing,

"Dearest sister, thou hast left us,
And our loss we deeply feel;
But 'tis God that has bereft us—
He can all our sorrows heal."

Her funeral was attended by a large concourse of relatives and friends. The writer of this notice tried to preach a discourse to the memory of the deceased from Job xiv. 14; after which her remains were peacefully laid away to await the great resurrection day.

DIED—Suddenly, on the morning of June 26th, Mrs. Sarah Phillips, widow of John W. Phillips, aged seventy-eight years and three months.

Mrs. Phillips was the daughter of John and Margret Griffith, and was born in Welch Tract, New Castle Co., Del. At the age of eighteen years she removed to Philadelphia, where she resided until about twelve years ago, when she came back to Delaware, her native place. In many respects Mrs. P. was a remarkable woman, useful in her day and generation, never turning aside from what she considered to be her duty. With great patience and submission she met the various ills and dark vicissitudes of life. Death bore her gently away from life's loved friends and earth's dear scenes. We shall miss her from our home, and from the quiet fireside group. Her room is silent and her chair vacant.

"She hath passed away
From every sorrow and wearisome pain,
And her soul shall know no fetter again.
Care shall not darken her cloudless brow;
It gleameth in light with the angels now.
Nor time in its onward march e'er shed
A changing trace o'er that hoary head.
To the light and life of a cloudless day
She hath passed away—she hath passed away."

ONE WHO LOVED HER.

NEWARK, Del., July 25, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS:—It becomes my painful duty to send for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES the obituary notice of my father, John R. Miller, who departed this life at his residence in Spencer-ville, Ohio, June 25th, 1889, aged eighty-two years, two months and seventeen days.

The deceased was born in Warren Co., near Lebanon, Ohio, April 8th, 1807, and moved with his parents to Miami Co., Ohio, in 1808. He was united in marriage on Jan. 30th, 1829, to Mary Miller, by whom he had ten children. His wife died in August, 1852. On October 30th, 1853, he was married to Nancy Hammond, the widow of Andrew Hammond, to whom were born four children. He united with the Old School Baptists at Concord Church, in Miami Co., Ohio, in 1837, and was baptized by Elder Buckles. In 1860 he moved from Miami Co. to Allen Co., Ohio, where he united by letter with the Jennings Creek Church, Van Wert Co., Ohio, of which he was a faithful member until his death. His house was always open to the saints of God.

There was no funeral sermon preached, but Elder Seitz talked to his family and friends at his residence. He was then taken to the Spencer-ville cemetery for burial.

WILSON MILLER.

SPENCERVILLE, Ohio.

DIED—At her home in Perry Co., Miss., sister E. R. Shows.

She was taken sick Dec. 21st, 1888, and died on the 28th of the same month. Sister Emma was born in Jones Co., Miss., Jan. 22d, 1861, and was married to brother M. G. Shows on Jan. 5th, 1888. She gave birth to a daughter a few days prior to her death, which still lives. She was baptized in the fellowship of Zoar Church on April 20th, 1881, by the writer, and lived a worthy and consistent member until her death. Her seat was never vacant when she was able to get there. She leaves a husband, father, mother, three brothers and three sisters to mourn their loss, besides the brotherhood and a host of friends. To know her was to love her. Her maiden name was Geddle.

I will add that I have been personally acquainted with her for eleven years, and she always manifested a meek and quiet spirit, always ready to encourage and instruct the weak, and striving for peace. We mourn not as those who have no hope, for we believe that she is gone to her eternal rest. May God bless the dear husband and all her relatives, is my prayer, for Jesus' sake.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"FOR when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly. For scarcely for a righteous man will one die; yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."—Rom. v. 6-8.

The apostle, in dwelling upon this wonderful and glorious theme, the salvation and complete redemption of the sinner, being endued with wisdom from on high, has presented the subject so plainly, in an experimental way, it would seem that surely he that runneth might read. It is lettered, as it were, in characters of gold that cannot be erased. And how discriminating the preaching of the apostle is, as he rightly divides the word of truth, discriminating between the law service in the letter, the old covenant, and that of the new covenant, in the spirit; between the circumcision which was outward in the flesh, and that which is of the heart, in the Spirit. And as to the subject of this great and marvelous work, it needs no stronger argument than that presented by the apostles and our Lord himself. A comparison of every experience with the standard of truth, by which they are to be tried, will attest the same. By reference to Genesis you will find what man was as he came from the hand of his Creator. It is this man that we wish you to keep in view for the present. God gave this man a law, and the transgression was death. I simply state the facts in the case, that this man that was created upright, and could commune with God, and had free intercourse in all he surveyed as given him there in the paradise of Eden, violated the law, became a transgressor, a sinner, was driven out, and dead to all he there possessed.

It is not my purpose to theorize as to what man might have been if he had kept the law, nor to discuss what he lost in the fall, but in the light of holy writ to consider what man is now. God said unto Adam, "Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake: in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life: thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field."—Gen. iii. 17, 18. This is what God said should be. Now hear what Paul says of man as he is: "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." Read what Paul says in the third chapter of Romans. Here we find a minute description of man. "For we have before proved both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin; as it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one: there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God," &c. Read the long catalogue of crimes as the apostle continues his description. See man in his fallen and depraved state, without hope and without God in the world; aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise.

Now let us leave this man, this sinner, for a time, while we notice another man. The apostle has not only spoken of the two men in a figure, but as actual and real. The man that we now propose to notice is the man Christ Jesus, who was and is from everlasting to everlasting, or ever the earth was. God said, "Let us make man." Evidently the I AM was there, actual and real, not in flesh and bones. "A body hast thou prepared me." "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was. When there were no depths, I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water. Before the mountains were settled, before the hills was I brought forth: while as yet he had not made the earth, nor the fields, nor the highest part of the dust of the world. When he prepared the heavens, I was there: when he set a compass upon the face of the depth: when he established the clouds above: when he strengthened the fountains of the deep: when he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment: when he appointed the foundations of the earth: then I was by him, as one brought up with him: and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him; rejoicing in the habitable part of his earth; and my delights were with the sons of men."—Prov. viii. 22-31. Hence there was no period, from the first day's dawn in the creation of the world, or that man (sinful man) existed, but that there was a Mediator, a Savior. For what? He appeared unto Manoah, Abraham and Jacob. This is he who was in the church in the wilderness. And now hear an inspired prophet: "Behold, the Lord God will come with strong hand, and his arm shall rule for him; behold, his reward is with him, and his work before him." What work? The work of salvation, redemption. This man, Mediator, was clearly set forth in all the offerings and sacrifices, from that of Abel to the last that was made under and according to the law. In all those offerings something was had in view; yet they could not make the comers thereunto perfect. The blood taken and offered by the high priests yearly could not atone for sin, but was a remembrance of sin, and pointed to the man Christ Jesus. Therefore Jesus says, "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not, but a body hast thou prepared me: in burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast no pleasure. Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God." This is undoubtedly him of whom the angel spake when he said, "And she shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." The angel that announced his coming and birth to the shepherds who were attending their flocks during that night of legal darkness, said, "Fear not; for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord." Now let us follow this Jesus in his manhood; for he is the Son of God according to the Spirit, and the son of David according to the flesh. He said, "I am the offspring of David." Said this Redeemer, "For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." He enters upon the work that he came to do; for he said, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" Wise and learned rabbies are confounded at his wisdom, for he spake as never man spake. The Jewish rulers look upon him with jealous eye, and conspire against him. They bring him before men to be condemned, and accuse him falsely. They gather around him to take him; but not till he said to them, "Now is your hour and the power of darkness," could they lay hands on him to crucify him. See him in Gethsemane's garden, pressed down under the terrible weight of the sins of his people, to save sinners. Hear him agonizing: "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." See him led to Calvary. Darkness veils the skies, the rocks are rent, the earth is shaken, while Jesus, the man Christ Jesus, suffers there, yea, dies. "He dies, the friend of sinners dies." He cries, "It is finished." The debt is paid, justice is satisfied. The body is taken down, is laid in the tomb, and comes forth on the third and appointed morn. Now may we pause and inquire, Why all this?

"Was it for crimes that I have done He groaned upon the tree?"

Yes, he died for sinners. His people, his chosen, are sinners, transgressors, and must be redeemed. The man that we left a while is totally depraved, and cannot redeem himself. The stream cannot rise above the fountain. The wisdom of man says that he can; that he is not quite dead. God said that he should die. Paul says he is dead. How shall man be justified before God? Ah, let us look to him who said, "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." We see him who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man—every one of his chosen. "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." Said Jesus, "Thine they were, and thou gavest them me." But they are dead, and how shall they come? Jesus says, "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live." Here is the life-giving power. "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me. And I give unto them eternal life." "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him." "As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." We find this wonderful work first manifested among the Jews, in his calling them from darkness to light, and from the kingdom of Satan into the kingdom of God's dear Son. Gentile sinners as well as Jews receive of his grace. "Even us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles. As he saith also in Osee, I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, which was not my beloved. And it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people; there shall they be called the children of the living God."—Rom. ix. 24-26. Surely the apostle was speaking of Gentile sinners as embraced in the election of grace, as they are chosen out of every nation; for Peter says, "In every nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted with him." I must conclude that these are the elect children whom God hath given to Christ Jesus, and to whom he gives eternal life. "And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father."—Gal. iv. 6. "But ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." When therefore Gentile sinners, or Jews, are brought to a knowledge of this great and marvelous work, is it not with wonder that they cry out, "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God?"

"Sons we are through God's election,
Who in Jesus Christ believe;
By eternal destination,
Sovereign grace we here receive."

"Pause, my soul, adore and wonder!
Ask, O why such love to me?
Grace hath put me in the number Of the Savior's family."

Why should we be singled out? Why should I, who am chief of sinners, be embraced in the election of grace? It is because the Father, our God, hath so appointed. "As many as were ordained to eternal life believed." Here is the manifestation of that love which he hath bestowed on us, "in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." O what comfort there is in this to us, that it was sinners he died for. I want to be understood as saying that it is to that sinner who is conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity, the Lord appears in this wonderful and glorious revelation, and that it is alone by the Spirit, or this divine light, that the man is enabled to see and know that he is a poor sinner, and needs the atoning sacrifice of Jesus. By that divine light alone he can and does rejoice in this finished salvation, and in time is made a partaker of the divine nature. He receives the Spirit which is of God, whereby he knows the things that are freely given us of God.

Thirty years ago the unworthy writer was enabled to rejoice in the complete salvation and redemption through our Lord Jesus Christ. I had thought before this he would save the righteous; and to be such I labored. But I failed. I was a sinner, without strength. O the great and exceeding joy I felt when the dear Lord made known to me, a poor, weak, sinful boy of thirteen years, that more than eighteen hundred years before this he had borne all for me. His voice came to me with sweetness and assurance, "Thy sins are all forgiven thee." He that once did not believe, now believes and rejoices. Then I first rejoiced in the truth of our text. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him." This is the poor, way-worn pilgrim's hope as he travels onward in the journey of the life here below. He now desires to live to him that loved him and gave himself for him. But many things come in his way. The flesh lusteth against the Spirit. He finds it hard indeed to keep under his body. Surely, says the tried one, I will become a castaway. He finds he is subject to vanity, not willingly.

"O could I find some peaceful bower,
Where sin hath neither place nor power!" He hates and abhors sin, and chides himself because he cannot rid himself of it. The Pharisee would say, If I believed as you believe, I would go on and take my fill of sin. But he knows not the way this poor soul goes, nor how he mourns. There is no joy nor comfort in sin to this poor soul. He longs for and desires the Father to call him home. "How shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" May the Lord grant unto us that living faith to feel that he that hath delivered, and doth deliver, will yet deliver us from this bondage of corruption, into the fullness of his glory, where hope in fruition shall be swallowed up. Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made you free, and be not again entangled with the yoke of bondage. Go not back to the world, the law, or circumcision which is outward in the flesh. Christ hath redeemed you, being made a curse for you. If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed. Yes, ye are justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses. "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son, in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit."

In conclusion, let me say that it is this Spirit, this grace, that leads men and women to a higher and holier life here on earth, to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world. It teaches us that drunkenness, witchcraft, adultery, covetousness, and all their kindred evils, are sins, and leads us to abhor them, and to abstain from them, and to shun the very appearance of evil. It teaches us to love God, and to love his people, who are begotten of him, and thereby giving evidence that we have passed from death unto life.

"Now may the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ, to whom be glory forever. Amen."

Dear brethren Beebe, I submit the above to you, and if thought worthy a place in our paper, to the household of faith. As I look it over I find that it is much like my preaching—many words to tell a little. But I do love to dwell upon this wonderful and glorious theme, and upon the truth of it I rest my all.

As ever, yours in love and fellowship, a sinner saved by grace,

P. W. SAWIN.

DAYTON, Ohio, July 16, 1889.

FARMDALE, Ky., May, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—I hope we are spiritually minded enough not to attempt to instruct the Lord; "But we have the mind of Christ." We may apprehend a few things, keep his commandments, and abide in his love. "That ye love one another, as I have loved you," says Jesus. If we obey him, we are his friends, and know all things; for he said, "All things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." Many times we feel poor, helpless and undone, feeling like the axe and hammer have been used against the carved work; that the lilies of the garden have been trampled upon; that many lovely fruits of the valley are bruised and bitten, and the vine not flourishing. Yet we gather the myrrh with the spice, and eat the honeycomb with the honey. Like the psalmist, after complaint upon complaint, and many questions, we are made to say, "This is my infirmity: but I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High." I feel to hope that I love all God's work, and at times am glad to talk of his doings.

I had some very restful moments and pleasurable emotions at our meeting one month ago. Brother Durand was with us, and the Lord was with him, as I was made to feel in my poor heart. Also at our last meeting brother John G. Sawin was with us. He had been warmly and cordially invited by Elder Johnson, while living, to preach for him. But as he could not meet with him on earth, he felt a desire to visit the churches served by him, realizing him to have been a father to him in the ministry, and for whom he felt an unalterable love in the bond of the gospel. Brother Sawin's preaching was to me wonderful, and in great fullness. "Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary: who is so great a God as our God?" My feelings were much the same at each of these meetings. I felt cleansed, clothed upon, in my right mind, sitting at the feet of Jesus, forgetful of the whirling wheels that make the music of the busy, bustling world about me, and lost sight of the part I was playing in it. I was not thinking much about cause and effect. I was no longer mindful of the little I am claiming ownership over. Things were folded up. My note of the flight of time was lost. All was swallowed up in the eternal now. I thought, Is this the river of life? Is this the border-land of eternity? Is it thus to be shut up in immensity? Is this a haven of eternal rest? No, it cannot be. But Paul says it is a foretaste, a moment unspeakable and full of glory. We know this by following in the footsteps of the Master, learning more and more of his fullness, growing in grace and in the knowledge of the truth. It is forsaking all, father and mother, and having all things in common. To whom did they sell in the days of the apostles? How did they subsist? What was it that they had in common? Was it exchange for their effects sold? I think it must have been then, and must be so now, the kingdom of God and his righteousness, his goodness and his mercy. I think it must have been of the risen and ascended Lord; of the outpouring of the Holy Ghost; of the memories of the life of Jesus in the flesh; of his calling them out of the world; of his healing the sick, opening the eyes of the blind, healing the lepers, making the lame to walk, raising the dead, casting out devils, stilling the waves and walking upon the water; of his wonderful teaching by parables; of the driving of the money-changers from the temple; of his confounding the wise; of the glorious memories of Genesareth; of the sacred seclusion of the Bethany home; of the crowning loveliness of mount Olivet; of the watchless sufferings in the garden of Gethsemane, and of his superabounding triumph. These, and more than these, unfolded as they could bear them. Thus is the pentecostal feast crowned to fullness. What a cloud of witnesses! What priceless gems! What an odor of memories! What saint will not value them? Where, O where, can one be found willing to part with them? Who in the universe is rich enough to buy them? Where could he store them, and hide his own misery and insignificance? My Father's children, do we at all times behold these wondrous things in the light of his countenance? Clouds come between; yea, at times we are fleshly minded. At times we are like Thomas, not filling our places at the meetings of the church. The brethren begin to tell what they have witnessed and heard, but we cannot believe it. We must behold the nail prints; we must thrust our hand into his side. We muddy the little streams, and confuse the saints. At times, like Job, we find that snow water and alkali will not cleanse us, but even our very clothes abhor us. We draw some intricate and delicate lines, and boldly cross over little channels to a new land, having had no previous vision in the night, as did Paul. I thought, How far is that land away? Can it be farther than the ends of the earth? I thought, Can it be some land David had not known, had not dwelt in, beyond heaven? "Thou art there." Below the bed of hell? "Behold, thou art there." Beyond the sea? "If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me." Away from night? Away from day? "The darkness and the light are both alike to thee." I thought, Where now are we? Did any one go with us? Are any with us now? Will we, will they, return evermore? We grow oblivious at times of precious, good brethren, and in an obsequious way yield to the will or desire of such as have no right to control, lost for a time to the unity and sincerity of true brotherhood; yea, shut ourselves from the still more overpowering fact that Jesus is "the door." Have we not experienced it? Again, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life." Again, "And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder: so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open."

We have a brother who calmly falls asleep in Jesus, passing hence to the larger view of eternity, to know as he is known. Almost at the same moment we grasp the hand of a little, trembling sinner, manifesting a desire to be among the people of God, and to obey his commands, and to enjoy the privileges and blessings of his house. Now we behold no longer the face of the one trying the eternal verity; but we do behold the other, and sweetly our souls are filled as we hear him talk of the goodness and mercy of our God. I am persuaded that when we do sit down together in the kingdom of heaven with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, we do in the same sense sit down with our departed brother. These are marvelous things, "Yet he hath opened mine eyes." Thus are we brought to realize "that Jesus is come in the flesh;" and like the man born blind, we are told by him, "Thou hast both seen him, and it is he that talketh with thee." We cry out, "Lord, I believe." These are some of the "all things," and now I believe and accept them; but I cannot, you cannot, my brother, my sister, at all times do so. The paschal lamb had to be eaten with the bitter herbs. "Thy way is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known." John said, "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, kindred, tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters." "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief," is the priceless and melodious confession welling up in sweetest strains from the broken and contrite heart. Humbly we should bow our head as the rich incense rises to the God of heaven from the altar fires of these pent-up souls. May my hungering soul be filled with such bliss as the blessed know.

Yours in hope,

J. T. McCOWN.

SADIEVILLE, Ky., June 3, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Through the tender mercy of him who binds up the broken-hearted and wipes away the sorrowing tear, I am permitted to address you, and still thank you for your continued kindness in sending me our much loved paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, which is ever received with gladness of heart by one so unworthy of the least blessing. I inclose a letter from our dear venerable brother Cox. If it should meet your approbation, I would love to re-read it in the SIGNS, as all his writings are very comforting to me, and I presume they are to many others of the Lord's dear children.

May you all be kept by divine grace, and the sweet presence of Jesus daily be your supply, in publishing the many messages of love from the dear saints, is the prayer of the least of all,

E. THEOBALD.

GHEENT, Ky., May 22, 1889.

DEAR SISTER THEOBALD:—We were glad to receive your letter of the 15th inst., but sorry to learn that afflictions kept you from enjoying the pleasures of meeting and mingling with God's dear people at Little Flock. But to be reconciled to all the dispensations of God with us is one of the highest points to be obtained by the saints while clothed with mortality. How often do we murmur at the dispensations of providence, when the very things about which we are disposed to complain are working for our good. Surely, my sister, that which leads us down into the valley of humility should ever be regarded by the saints as a great blessing. Our Lord by the mouth of the prophet has said, "To this man will I look, even to him that is poor, and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word." The psalmist says, "The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are open to their cries." It is those who realize and know their poverty and their entire dependence upon the goodness and mercy of God, to whom he looks, and to whom he has said, "Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." The psalmist says, "Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now have I kept thy word." He trembled at the word of his Lord, because in that word was presented to his spiritual vision the goodness and mercy of God in afflicting him.

Hence he could say, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted, that I might learn thy statutes." "The law of thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold and silver." It is thus the afflicted of ancient days speak to us and tell us that "It is good for me that I have been afflicted." Ah, my sister, what are the pains, sorrows and afflictions that fall to the lot of the saints in this short life, when compared to the glory that will be revealed in them when disrobed of mortality? Here below they are strangers and pilgrims, and have no abiding place; but, like Abraham, they seek a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. While seeking that city, and traveling onward in that pilgrimage, O what joy it gives them to meet and talk about that great city, and the glories that shine forth resplendently in the character of its great Builder! It is then that they behold by faith and see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down. They behold that quiet habitation while here below; for they are in that great city, the New Jerusalem, and by faith they are made to rejoice when beholding its superlative beauties. Then they cry out, "Beautiful for situation is Mount Zion." While the saints are clad in mortality, their home is in that beautiful city, and it is a quiet habitation. While in that city, while sojourning here below, they are often surrounded with cares, sorrows and afflictions. When they hear the saints complaining of each other, and murmuring because some that belong to that household do not preach and talk just to suit those complaining ones, they are ready to cast them off. This is, and ever will be, a source of deep sorrow. The loving disciple John has said to them, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." Those murmurings and complainings are strong evidences of the absence of that love which is the bond that has ever bound in sweet and precious harmony the household of faith, and enabled all the members of that household to rejoice in Jerusalem as a quiet habitation. Those murmurings impair that quietude, and overshadow Mount Zion with clouds that obscure its beauty. But when the dear saints meet, and in sweet and heavenly converse talk of the preciousness of redeeming love and the beauties and glories which shine forth in the countenance of their dear Redeemer, they forget the sorrows and afflictions of earth. It is then they can say with the apostle, "But though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day. For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." But our bodily afflictions are light when compared with the deep sorrows and afflictions caused by persecutions which come from those with whom in days that are past the saints have taken sweet counsel. Those persecutions are a part of the inheritance of the saints while here below. The apostle says, "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." "But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." Then, dear sister, let us, like Moses, choose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. Let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. Ah, how precious is that faith of which Jesus is the author and finisher! When the dear saints are in the sweet exercise of that faith, they can turn to their persecutors, and from the depth of their hearts say, "Lord, forgive them; for they know not what they do." The apostle said to the Elders at Ephesus, "And now, behold, I go bound in the spirit unto Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there, save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying that bonds and afflictions abide me. But none of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus." That man of God, who in days then past had persecuted the saints, was now made by the power of God's regenerating grace the apostle to the Gentiles; and speaking of the afflictions and persecutions that awaited him, he said, in the full assurance of faith, "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy." In that ever precious faith he had said to Timothy, "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." Persecutions and afflictions did not move, did not disturb him; but he, in holy and ever abiding faith, when standing on the verge of the tomb, could in holy triumph say, "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand." The dear saints, having this pattern before them, should cease to murmur because of persecution and afflictions, and pray for them that persecute them, and so finish their course with joy; that joy which is a foretaste of the joys that await them when mortality shall be swallowed up of life. May you, my dear sister, when you are approaching the darkness of the tomb, be blessed with that triumphant faith, and in the ecstasy of joy sweetly sing,

"Farewell, vain world, I'm going home,
My Savior smiles, and bids me come;
Bright angels beckon me away,
To sing God's praise in endless day."

ODESSA, Ind., July 3, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Inasmuch as it is needful for me to write to you, I thought I would write a few lines for publication, for the relief of my mind, and for the sake of my brethren here who so often have expressed a wish to see something in the SIGNS from their near-by brethren; and this is the burden of my mind.

"Wherefore he saith, When he ascended up on high he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men." The gifts are what I desire to speak of; because the apostle says, concerning spiritual gifts, "I would not have you ignorant." Then he says, "Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed: and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." It is often asked, What is the Holy Ghost? I think it is the Spirit of God as bestowed on the saints in the gifts which prepare them for the service of God. I refer to Acts xix. 2. "He said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." These were baptized by Apollos (that eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures; that is, the letter of them), unto John's baptism. Now they were believers, yet were not set apart by the Lord in those gifts which the Holy Ghost would bestow upon them. "And when Paul had laid hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied." I refer to Acts viii. 5, 16. Here we find characters which were baptized by Philip, and were believers; and yet when Peter and John came down there, the Holy Ghost had fallen on none of them, only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. But when they did receive the Holy Ghost, I think they were ready for the work of the ministry, and for the edifying of the church. But a certain man called Simon wanted to buy this gift; and there seems to be a great many whose hearts are not right, judging from the number of theological seminaries in our day.

I will refer next to Acts vi. 6. Here we find seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom; hence the need of the laying on of hands of the presbytery. I want it understood that I am not arguing that laying on of hands gave the Holy Ghost, but the Lord gave it, as in the case of Cornelius; for the Holy Ghost was poured out on them even before they were baptized. Hence Peter said, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized?" for they already had the gifts, having seen visions, and prophesied, and magnified God. Again, in Acts i. 4, "And, being assembled together with them, commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me." Now Jesus had told them before that it was expedient for him to go away. "And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." Again, he said, "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you." Thus we see that the office of the Holy Ghost is to teach them in the Spirit, and bring to their minds afresh all that he had taught them. Though they had been with him for three years, I believe that they only knew his teaching in the letter of it; but just before he ascended to the Father, and after his passion, he said to them, "Peace be unto you: as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost."—John xx. 21, 22. Thus they were made able ministers of the New Testament, not of the letter, but of the spirit; for he had said unto them, "Ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth. And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight." "And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place;" for they had tarried in Jerusalem, as they were bidden. The number of names together were about an hundred and twenty. "And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." Peter preached to the people, manifesting the gift that he had before received when our Savior breathed on them, that is, the apostles, saying, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." Peter said, "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel: and it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my Spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams: and on my servants and on my handmaidens I will pour out in those days of my Spirit, and they shall prophesy." Now it appears to me the whole church there present received their gifts, as filled with the Holy Ghost; for we learn that they did speak with tongues, and did prophesy. "Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of administrations, but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God which worketh all in all. But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues: but all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will. For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit. For the body is not one member, but many."—1 Cor. xii. 4-14. "In my Father's house are many mansions [or gifts]: if it were not so, I would have told you." "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular. And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers, after that miracles, then gifts of healings, helps, governments," &c.—1 Cor. xii. 27, 28. The apostle Paul argues that they all have their places in the body, or church, and ought to be there, and not covet other gifts, but have charity toward each other; for this is more excellent than to covet even the best gifts. I think that none need be afraid their gift will not be seen, for Solomon says that every gift shall make room for itself; and it will be made manifest, as in the case of Aaron. Korah and two hundred princes stood up against him: but when their rods were laid up, it was found that Aaron's rod had budded, blossomed and brought forth (fruit) almonds; but the others did not even so much as bud. Again, some mothers may be ambitious to see their sons "big preachers," as in the case of the mother of Zebedee's children, saying to our Lord, "Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on thy right hand, and the other on the left, in thy kingdom." But what was the answer unto her? "But Jesus answered and said, Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? They say unto him, We are able. And he saith unto them, Ye shall drink indeed of my cup, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with: but to sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father."—Matt. xx. 22, 23. Likewise the apostles disputed about who should be the greatest in the kingdom of heaven. But Jesus rebuked them, saying, "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." O that all may be found of him in peace, and that each gift may be in its own place. "There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all. But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Wherefore he saith, When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men."—Eph. iv. 4-8.

The burden of my mind is gone; yet there is a great temptation never to send this to you. Do with it as you think best, and all will be right with me.

Yours in hope of a glorious resurrection,

WM. E. BLUE.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have just received the late number of the SIGNS, and while reading it my mind is carried back to when I first became interested in it. I was then a child of seventeen summers. About that time the imperfections of my depraved nature became apparent to myself. Often I had heard the doctrine of man's inability to save himself from sin and death, but now, like a thunderbolt, the demands of justice awakened me to know that I was lost. In the SIGNS I read the feelings of those who had been like troubled. During this time of deep heartfelt conviction I heard a number of ministers preach the glorious plan of redemption. I was nearly nineteen years old when the loving Master came so kindly to me and whispered peace. That is almost ten years ago; but O how sweet the memory of that blissful evening when I thought my troubles were all over! Tongue cannot express the joy of my enraptured soul at that time. Very soon I was led to the church, to tell of the goodness of my God, and to ask the dear ones for a place among them, that I might journey on with them through this time state to the city above. They received me. Then I knew but little of the doctrinal points of the "doctrine of God our Savior." I soon learned, however, that I knew very little, and that even those that were older did not know it all. They differed in their views on certain things. I have beheld some of these things with sadness, and I feel sure that many of the differences among brethren are for want of proper understanding of each other. Since

I have been trying to preach the wonders of God's grace, I have found brethren living in the same section that hold each other "at arm's length;" and if they were to come together and compare notes, they would be ashamed to think of their childish actions. Sometimes we hear the cry of heresy, Arminian, antinomian, when there is no ground for anything of the kind. I do think that our brethren should be careful how they handle the truths of God. In my own feeble efforts I have always desired to tell what I trust I know, in such a way as to bring doctrinal points and the experience of God's dear ones together. When any doctrinal point does not harmonize with the Bible, it is not in harmony with christian experience; for what God reveals to his people now, is the same as recorded in the Bible. Gospel preaching is for the comforting of the dear ones of the household of faith. When a man preaches something that none of God's people can understand, it is good evidence that he is not preaching the truth. I knew of a talented man among the Baptists at one time. He never lacked for words, and presented a good appearance in the pulpit, but brethren could never understand him. It was not long until he was cast out among those whose language is confounded. The best evidence that the church can have of a man's call to the gospel ministry is that he preaches Christ, the way, the truth and the life. When he preaches that way, his ministry will be blessed to the comfort and consolation of the flock.

I will close. I have written just as my mind ran. May God's grace still keep our beloved Zion.

Yours in hope of life beyond,
GEO. A. BRETZ.

RIDGEWOOD, N. J., July 1, 1889.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—With my remittance I would send a few thoughts. I trust I have, for the past few days, enjoyed somewhat of a thankful spirit for having been shown that there is yet a church upon earth in gospel order, and preachers who have been taught the difference between a calling and a profession. I lately attended a funeral in the neighborhood. The text was, "For he was a good man."—Acts xi. 24. Not another word was mentioned from the Scriptures, but that he who had left this world was a good man, who believed the Creator intended all to live to old age. (He was eighty-one years old.) He was careful and systematic, a strong man physically and mentally. He was not lost, as the speaker had formerly felt when his friends died. No, all were only gone before. I had not heard fashionable preaching in some time. I wonder if it is getting customary to ignore the Word altogether. It is true that he began by reading scattered verses. But again I would say, I trust I am thankful that I can believe there are those whom I can hear declare the whole counsel of God; those who are not puffed up by the wisdom of this world; those who love the old landmarks, and desire to follow in the footsteps of their Leader; those who would not plaster with untempered mortar, nor hew for themselves cisterns holding no water.

May those who have been taught the truth love and obey its precepts. May we delight in the law of the Lord.

Will not some one give their views on the passage, "In my Father's house are many mansions?" These words have been sadly burlesqued by one who has been styled a "great preacher." The SIGNS is very acceptable to me. Please excuse my delay in sending the money.

With love to the household of faith, and a desire for Zion's prosperity, I am, I trust, yours in fellowship,

M. HELLINGS.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Inclosed find the amount due you for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I prize it far above all other papers that I have read. It sets forth the doctrine of God our Savior. It always comes as a welcome messenger, to the comfort of a poor, unworthy mortal. I feel to praise the Giver of all good that he puts it into the hearts of his children to write for the comfort of his chosen ones while traveling here on these low grounds of sorrow.

Write on, brethren and sisters. I love to read your experiences. May our God sustain you, brethren Beebe, in your arduous task of publishing the SIGNS. May the Lord bless all the dear saints, is the desire of one who feels to be less than the least of all saints.

I subscribe myself, unworthily your sister in hope of eternal life,

THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

"FOR our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself."—Phil. iii. 20, 21.

In compliance with several requests, we submit the following brief expressions upon this important and deeply mysterious subject. It must be distinctly understood, however, that we neither claim infallibility for our manner of expression, nor yet do we profess to know anything of this glorious and crowning mystery of the gospel of Christ beyond what is revealed in the inspired Scriptures, which we regard as the perfect standard of divine truth.

Even before the apostles had fallen asleep there where those among the disciples who sought to comprehend the manner of the resurrection, and to understand "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" Although favored with the gift of direct inspiration as one of the chosen apostles of our Lord Jesus, Paul does not attempt to explain the subject involved in these questions, but characterizes them as the manifestation of the folly of those with whom they originate. In the eleventh verse of the chapter of which our text is the close, he confesses that he had not yet attained unto the understanding of this mystery, which he desired to apprehend. According to the best chronology of the inspired record it was twenty-six years after Paul wrote this epistle when John recorded that it was still hidden from him, saying, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."—1 John iii. 2. It is clearly revealed that the subjects of divine grace are now "the sons of God;" and this truth includes the certainty of their ultimate perfect conformity to the likeness of our glorified Redeemer; beyond this we are incapable of being informed while clothed in the veil of the body of this death. Natural reason has devised speculative theories on the subject, by which men claim to have reduced this mystery to the understanding of finite minds; but all such theories are without the support of inspired testimony. The popularly received notion of the resurrection represents that there is to be a day when all mankind shall be restored to the same state of existence in which they are in this world, and that then there shall be a court of investigation held, in which the final destiny of each individual will be determined according to their conduct in this life. This is the basis of all natural religion. The joys of everlasting felicity are presented as the reward of good deeds in time; and the terror of everlasting misery is invoked to frighten those who do evil. In the effort to sustain this doctrine, some scriptural expressions are wrested to make them seem to teach that the present existence of all men is a probationary period, in which they have the opportunity to fix their own eternal state in the infinite joy of heaven, or in the inconceivable misery of endless death. In order to complete this theory it is necessary to hold the idea of the restoration of each individual in his own person, just as he was when he fell in the dissolution of this natural existence, so that he may be judged in his earthly body. This seems so consistent to reason that many even of the believing children of God are captivated by its delusive semblance of truth. On this ground some have concluded that they have solved the mystery of the resurrection, so that they can teach it even to the comprehension of natural children, in the same manner as they may be educated in worldly sciences. This is not the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, as it is testified in the gospel of the grace of God as revealed in Christ Jesus. By this theory the whole mystery of the doctrine is explained, and the hope of the resurrection is simply a matter for the study of scientific minds.

"For our conversation is in heaven." This conversation is not merely that interchange of thought which is ordinarily regarded as conversation among men. The apostle in the seventeenth verse exhorts the saints to be followers together of him, and presents himself with the other apostles as the example by which the saints were to be guided. In this expression he assigns the reason for this exhortation. Not that as a man he would claim any superiority over his brethren; but that by the will of God the apostles are set for a pattern for the guidance of the saints, and in following them the disciples in all ages have a reliable example in all things. It is not to be understood that the apostles as men confined all their words to spiritual discourse. In their official character, as the princes whom God has appointed to rule in judgment in his kingdom, their words are spoken by the authority of Jesus Christ, whose Spirit endues them with the ability to speak in righteousness. By the will of God alone, even the apostles were made sufficient for the responsibility of their official station in the church. In presenting the injunctions of the gospel for the guidance of the saints in all ages, all their conversation, whether in words or in examples, is directed by the Spirit of truth; so that it is the perfect rule which is ever to be held over the disciples of Christ to the end of time. This is the only conversation which is in heaven, in the sense of the text. Even the apostles could claim no right in themselves to rule over the church of Christ. They confessed that their sufficiency was of God, who made them able ministers of the new testament, not of the letter, but of the spirit. All the conversation which was dictated by that Spirit was certainly "in heaven." It was according to the will of God, and could not be condemned. It is not necessary to say that we do not understand this expression to signify that the apostle claimed to be so exalted above his brethren that he never spoke of earthly things. If that had been true, he could have been of no comfort to those who are burdened with the vanity of the body of this death. It is only in his inspired action and words that his "conversation is in heaven."

"From whence also we look for the Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ." The saints always look for the Savior in their continual tribulations and distresses, not as carnal reason pictures his coming, through the rending of the natural firmament, but from his own infinite glory which makes his presence to them the "fullness of joy." This may be revealed experimentally to them in the gloom of a dungeon at midnight, as it came to Paul and Silas in the prison at Philippi, as easily as when in the assembly of the saints, as on the day of Pentecost. It is a peculiar mark of the children of God that they are never satisfied without the manifest presence of their Lord. Hence, they are ever looking for his appearing; and it is always with the assurance that his coming is from heaven. He is the Savior, not alone as he is our only hope for final deliverance from the condemnation due to our sins, but in all our affliction and trials he alone saves us. Therefore we look for him as our present Savior at all times. He is unto all those who thus look for him, in a peculiar and exclusive sense, "the Lord Jesus Christ." No other power but his can deliver us, and there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved, even in our daily conflicts and distresses. It is an abiding witness that he is to us "the Savior," when we thus look for him, and feel our need of his appearing.

"Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." Here is the revealed truth of this unsearchable mystery. Our Lord Jesus Christ shall change our vile body. To finite minds this involves an impossibility. The power of reason cannot comprehend such a change. Not even the most favored apostles could understand how this change is wrought, much less could they explain the mystery. Yet the revelation is clearly manifested in the Scriptures of truth that all those who are now "the sons of God," shall be the subjects of this inconceivably glorious change. It is not some other character or being who shall be fashioned like unto the glorious body of our risen Lord, but it is "our vile body" which shall be thus changed. Not only is reason incapable of comprehending this consummation of the hope of the saints in Christ Jesus, but it is beyond the power of created intelligence even to investigate it. The "unsearchable riches of Christ" are all included in this "mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ."—Eph. iii. 8, 9. No power less than the omnipotence of God is capable of accomplishing this wonderful change; and in the estimation of men it is impossible even that God should do a thing so far beyond the conception of the mind of man. The great and learned teachers of worldly religion have devised what they consider the doctrine of the resurrection, and it has received the sanction of earthly popes and kings, as well as the indorsement of religious councils; but it is not consistent with the revelation which God has given in the Scriptures, nor with the experience of the saints. It is understood by the mind of the natural man, and is flattering to carnal pride. This is not the mystery of the resurrection which is made manifest in the revelation of Jesus Christ. Every one who has been taught of God to hope in his salvation must know that all he has learned is by revelation, without the aid of the natural mind; and that it is vain to attempt to teach the most intelligent natural mind even that salvation is by grace. Is it not evident that the truth which we have already experienced might be communicated to another as easily as the fathomless mystery of the final resurrection, which we have as yet received only by the revelation of the Spirit through faith? So far as it has been declared by inspiration in the Scriptures, the faith of the saints is able to apprehend this glorious truth; in this revelation is the assurance of the inconceivable glory of the hope of our calling of God in Christ Jesus. Without that hope we are of all men most miserable, while in its sweet assurance is joy beyond all that earth and time can give. The greatest distress of the saints now is found in the bondage of corruption under which they are compelled to war continually against the law of sin which is in their members. They can never expect to be satisfied until they awake with the likeness of their beloved Redeemer. That blessed hope will be fulfilled only when our Savior "shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." This is the consummation of the hope of life in the resurrection. Without this ultimate fulfillment of all the holy aspirations of the saints there could be no comfort to them in believing in Jesus. They have the testimony of the Lord himself that "In the world ye shall have tribulation." Their only peace is in him. Then how can the believer live without the support of assured faith in the resurrection, when we shall be perfectly conformed unto the likeness of his glorious body? This is the vitality of all the consolation of the gospel of the grace of God in Christ Jesus. We cannot comprehend how any one who believes in that gospel at all can doubt the personal and individual resurrection of all his redeemed people. While they can never comprehend the manner of that resurrection so long as they remain in this land of death, yet by faith every one must know that it is the very essential truth upon which rests all hope in Christ; "For if the dead rise not, then is Christ not raised: and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins."—1 Cor. xv. 16, 17. Christians cannot afford to parley with the adversary over such questions as, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" The very fact that it is hidden from our comprehension by the wisdom of God is a reproof to our carnal curiosity, which would seek to penetrate the mystery which God has not given to us ability to comprehend.

"According to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." No further explanation of this wonderful doctrine is given by the Spirit of truth. Indeed, nothing more is needful for the instruction of the subjects of the salvation which is in Christ Jesus. They have experienced the working of that mighty power in their deliverance from the power of sin and condemnation. They cannot doubt the sufficiency of that power to subdue all things unto himself. Reason has never understood how they were delivered from wrath in their first being led to hope in Christ; much less can they expect to comprehend the manner in which that same infinite power of God shall effect their final change into the perfect likeness of their exalted Savior. It becomes us to be satisfied with what God has been pleased to reveal of this divine mystery. Since it is "according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself," it is not according to any of the systems or devices of natural men, nor the theories which have been agreed upon by antichristian teachers and councils. Let the saints be satisfied with the word of the Lord, and avoid the doctrines and commandments of men.

MARRIAGES.

AUGUST 4th, 1889, at the residence of the bride's parents, by Elder G. N. Tusing, Elder George Waddle, of Fayette Co., Ohio, and Miss Jennie Blue, of Fairfield Co., Ohio.

At the same time and place, by the same, Mr. Charles E. Blue, of Fairfield Co., Ohio, and Miss Mary E. Waddle, of Fayette Co., Ohio.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

It becomes my sad duty to record the death of my sister, Mary Catharine Money, who died June 7th, 1889, in the thirty-seventh year of her age.

She was the daughter of James A. and Sallie E. Money. She was born and reared in Shelby Co., Ky., and died at her father's home near Finchville, Shelby County. She had been an invalid for about two years with some chronic trouble, which never yielded to medical treatment. She grew gradually worse, yet at times was apparently better. She never despaired, however, even to the last, and went into a state of unconsciousness about thirty-six hours before death, without ever expressing a thought that she was near the end. Such patient bearing is rarely displayed in mortals as was in her case, which was due, we hope, to the same spirit which was manifested in our Lord and Master when he was led like a lamb to the slaughter, and opened not his mouth. She never connected herself with the church, and, as far as I know, never expressed a hope in Christ to any one, verbally, but was very reticent and modest. Her conduct and actions, which speak louder than words, make me believe that she had experienced a hope in her Savior many years ago. No religious excitement which prevails at protracted meetings among the churches of the world ever affected her a particle, but rather provoked her to scorn their foolish devices to bring unthinking people into their organizations. Her home was always the home and stopping place of Old Baptist people, and she took great pride in seeing the brethren well cared for. Her delight was to be with them and visit among them; and, like Ruth, she demonstrated that their people were her people, and their God her God. She certainly kissed the rod that smote her; and if she was a disobedient child she was surely "beaten with many stripes." So her father and mother, one sister and seven brothers, who survive her, will not mourn and weep as those who have no hope. It was her disposition to weep with those who weep, and rejoice with those who rejoice; and when there was sickness, either in the family or in the neighborhood, she was always found at the bedside. Very few could excel her in nursing, and she never seemed to tire. She had a wonderful tact for keeping her own counsel, and never made an enemy save for the truth's sake.

Elder Hardesty, of Missouri, was present at her funeral, and spoke from the following, "I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us" (which was a very appropriate subject), in a feeling and comforting discourse, to a large audience of neighbors, relatives and friends at the family residence. Her remains were interred in the family burying-ground, where her infant sister has been sleeping for about twenty-six years, and her grandmother (who was ninety-three when she died) for about eleven years, which represent youth, middle age and old age in one family.

J. R. MONEY.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., July 28, 1889.

DIED—In Sanford, Maine, July 4th, 1889, Levi W. Chadbourn, aged twenty-nine years and some months.

He was the only son of sister Ruth M. and the late James Chadbourn. His disease was of the stomach, from which he had suffered some two years; but death came suddenly and unexpectedly, and opened the way for him to endless rest beyond the grave. About one year ago the husband and father was removed by death, leaving mother and son to toil and bear the burdens of life together; but she now feels that all earthly help and support is gone. She is left alone, with blighted hopes and a sad, aching heart. It seems that her son was all that she wished him to be in every respect; and in speaking of him she would often call him her darling boy. There was sympathy for her, but no surprise to me, when she said, "O sister, how can I ever be reconciled to this?" Her son had ever borne an unblemished character, and was truthful and kind to all. He had never professed a hope in Christ, but the mother is fully satisfied that he had experienced a heavenly birth some time since. He was reconciled and conscious to the last, and said, "Mother, I must soon leave you, and that is the only thought that grieves me now. You will have to do the best you can; but try not to mourn for me. I know you would not, could you know how beautiful it all looks and seems to me now; so different from what I once thought it could be if death were near. There is a good home prepared for me, and I am not afraid to die." She asked if her weeping then distressed him. He replied, "No, mother; I know you cannot help it." He then sang the first verse of the hymn, "Why do we mourn departing friends?" and gently passed away. He has left an only sister, who is married, and resides a few miles away. She too will miss her kind brother and childhood mate; but we know that he who has smitten again at this time is able to soothe each sorrowing heart. May he reconcile the broken-hearted mother, and lead her more gently, if his will, as she goes down the steep of age, and enable her to say, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted."

A FRIEND.

NORTH BERWICK, Maine, Aug. 1, 1889.

Ardalas Carter was born in Loudoun Co., Va., March 22d, 1805, and died June 30th, 1889, aged eighty-four years, three months and eight days. He moved with his parents to Licking Co., Ohio, and was married to Hannah Gulick in 1833. There were born to them fourteen children, six sons and eight daughters. One daughter died in infancy; the rest were all present at his death except two daughters who live in Arkansas. He leaves an aged companion, sixty-three grandchildren, fourteen great-grandchildren, a great many friends and relatives, together with the church, to mourn their loss; but we are confident that our loss is his eternal gain.

The subject of this notice received a hope and was baptized by Elder Anthony Wayne Taylor in 1843. He moved from Ohio to Adams Co., Ind., in 1845. Some time after that he united with the Bluffton Church of Predestinarian Baptists, of which he remained a consistent member until his death. He loved to converse on the subject of the christian's hope, the absolute sovereignty and predestination of God, and the glorious hope of the resurrection. The writer of this notice tried to preach on the occasion from Job xiv. 1 and 1 John iii. 9, to a large and attentive audience. He was then laid away to await the final resurrection.

J. G. FORD.

RUSHMORE, Ohio, Aug. 1, 1889.

DIED—July 3d, 1889, at the residence of her son-in-law, George Sanford, on Hubbell Hill, after a little over a week's illness by a stroke of paralysis, from which she never rallied to be able to speak, Mrs. James Streeter, of Griffin's Corners, Delaware Co., N. Y., in her seventieth year.

Sister Streeter made a public profession of religion and united with the Old School Baptists many years ago, and remained strong in the faith of her Lord and Master, of whom I heard her speak on the Sunday but one before she died, as she was at our meeting. She had lived a widow for a number of years. Her health had been gradually failing, and waiting for the summons to call her from earth to her heavenly home, though not always reconciled to the dealings of the Lord with her, as so much darkness had to be passed through, and so much weakness of the flesh realized, in contrast with the willingness of the spirit.

Her burial service was held where she died, and she was laid to rest by the side of her husband, leaving a number of children and other relatives to mourn. May the Lord sustain and comfort them, in my prayer, for Jesus' sake.

J. D. HUBBELL.

Charlotte McPherson was born April 18th, 1835, and departed this life April 11th, 1889. Her maiden name was Spenix. She was married first to W. B. Johnson, with whom she lived many years. He died in 1874, leaving her lonely indeed, as they had no children. She was next married to Dr. S. R. McPherson, Dec. 3d, 1878. In the summer of 1883 she was baptized by Elder B. L. Throneberry, in the fellowship of Friendship Church, near Acton, Texas. She was a highly esteemed member of the church up to the time of her death. Our dear sister enjoyed her church meetings as well as any one; but her health was never good, and therefore she was deprived of attending her meetings as she desired. She came to us from the New School Baptists, and expressed herself to the writer as being very happy in the exchange. She was as near without faults as any mortal could be. She is gone to her glorious Redeemer, where she will never see any more trouble.

May comfort and consolation from God cheer our dear, bereaved brother.

W. L. ROGERS.

ACTON, Texas, July 20, 1889.

DIED—At her home in Mercer Co., Ky., July 10th, 1889, Mrs. Jane Bickers, aged seventy-two years, four months and twenty days.

The subject of this notice was born in Jessamine Co., Ky., and was married to S. Burrus in 1844. She was left a widow in 1872, and some years afterward was married to W. H. Bickers, who still survives her. Our dear sister has been a member in good standing in the church at Goshen for about forty years, during which time she has been a reader of the SIGNS, which she prized very highly for the doctrine it promulgates. I have known her about fifty years, and have had many conversations with her on the subject of religion, and her only hope was in the dear and blessed Savior.

She leaves a kind companion, one brother, many friends and the church to mourn; but we sorrow not as those who have no hope, believing that our loss is her eternal gain. May God comfort the bereaved.

A. J. BICKERS.

McBRAYER, Ky., July 27, 1889.

ORDINATIONS.

On Saturday before the third Sunday in July, eleven miles southeast of Selma, in Dallas Co., Ala., a District Meeting was held, in the Ebenezer Association. At that meeting Elders W. W. Lewis and W. R. Smith, with the writer, were called as a presbytery to ordain brother A. B. KING, of Selma, a member of Antioch Church, at which the meeting was held.

Brother Lasseter was appointed by the church to answer for the church in reference to brother King.

The writer was chosen Moderator of the presbytery.

The Moderator examined or questioned the church and examined the subject.

The presbytery being satisfied as to his experience, call to the ministry, and soundness in the faith, Elder W. R. Smith offered the ordination prayer.

Charge by Elder W. W. Lewis.

The writer made a few remarks to the church, and the right hand of fellowship was extended.

He was thus ordained to the full functions of the gospel ministry, and his credentials were written out and given him.

Brother King, we hope, may be useful, and able to edify and comfort the saints of God.

W. LIVELY.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD.

"Who is the Savior of all men, specially of those that believe."—1 Timothy iv. 10.

DEAR BRETHREN:—In compliance with the request of brother W. C. Cornell, of Lytle, Ohio, made to me by private letter, I will endeavor to present a few thoughts through the SIGNS upon the words quoted above, taking in also some thoughts upon the connection.

In the beginning of this fourth chapter Paul tells Timothy that the Spirit (by which he wrote) had expressly declared that in latter times there should be a departure from the faith by some, who should give heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, &c. We have a plain description here of the Romish hierarchy, and also of the Church of England, or, as it is called in this country, the Protestant Episcopal Church. But Paul has expressly taught that marriage is honorable in all, and that God has created meats which we are to receive with thanksgiving; for he says that every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving, for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer. He then exhorts Timothy to put the brethren in mind of these things, as a good minister of Jesus Christ, who has been nourished in the words of faith and good doctrine, whereunto he had attained. He then tells Timothy to refuse profane and old wives' fables, and to exercise himself rather to godliness; for bodily exercise profits little, but godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of this life, and also of that to come. Now he adds that this is a faithful saying; that is, it is sure and true, and the faith of God's people receives and rests upon it, that godliness is profitable in both lives, this, and that which is to come. Now Paul adds that because the faith of disciples rested in and embraced this faithful saying, they both labor and suffer reproach, because they trust in the living God, "who is the Savior of all men, specially of those that believe."

It seems to me very manifest that Paul is not talking about the final glory of the redeemed in all this chapter, but about the present conflicts and temptations that should beset the people of God while in their militant state. It is here and now that these trials and difficulties arise; and it is here and now that they need salvation from these manifold trials. It must also be remembered that the word "salvation" in the Scriptures does not always refer to the redemption from sin and hell which the people of God have in the Lord Jesus Christ through his atoning sacrifice wrought out on Calvary, but sometimes, and indeed often, to the daily care with which they are kept and guarded and sustained while they are on pilgrimage here below. So also the word "Savior" in the Old Testament often, and sometimes in the New, means not his character as the sin-bearer of his people, but that he is their Savior from death or destruction or sorrow, which daily threatens or oppresses them here. Let it also be noticed that the apostle does not speak especially of the Son of God, Jesus Christ, in this connection, but uses the term, "the living God," which expression, I think, is generally used in the Scriptures with reference to the self-existence of God, and to the truth that he is the author and source of all life, and the creator of all things, and the providential guide and guard of all creatures.

From these reflections I will say that it seems to me that the text our brother alludes to, which declares that our God is the Savior of all men, specially of those that believe, means that in his daily providence he cares for all men, and keeps and saves them from manifold troubles, sorrows and dangers; but that his children, who believe in him, are the special objects of his pity, love and care. His providence is over all his works, and he opens his hand and satisfies the desire of every living thing. How much more sure of his care, then, are they whom he has set his love upon, and chosen to salvation! If he has provided for them the riches of the heavenly land, it is most sure that he will see that they want no good thing while journeying thitherward. A kind and merciful ruler will take care to provide for his subjects or his servants, and if possible secure to them the blessings of peace and safety and plenty; but specially will he have an eye to the interests of his own dear children. So does our God bend all things and subordinate them to the good of his children. Jesus said that his Father cared for even the sparrows, so that not one could fall to the ground without him; and then added, "Ye are of more value than many sparrows." Again, he said that the watchful care of God to them was such that he had numbered the very hairs of their head; and calling them to behold the lilies clothed in their wondrous beauty, he said, "If God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" Again, he said of temporal blessings, "Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." Thus the brother will see that I understand the apostle to be presenting for the comfort of Timothy and all saints the truth that their God has a special care over them, and that no matter what fiery trials may await them, they need not fear, because God, who cares for all men, specially will care for them. In this text the apostle does not at all allude to the work of the atonement, by which his people are saved from their sins.

Some reflections arise in my mind growing out of the truth stated in this text; and among them is this, that the purposes of God in his providence and grace are so interwoven as to be one and inseparable forever. The purposes of God in his providence are made to subserve his purposes of grace. "His kingdom ruleth over all." Like the vision of the wheels which God gave Ezekiel, there are wheels of grace and wheels of providence intermingled, and both are lifted up and move forward together at the bidding of the God of Israel. My own experience has been such that I can say that if my steps in life have not been ordered and appointed of God, then has he not led me in the path of righteousness, and I am in the church and in the ministry without his call. If he has not ruled and performed his will with me in the one, then has he not in the other. If the one has been left to my own will or wisdom or to chance, so also has the other; but if God chose me in Christ before the world was, and purposed that I should preach his gospel, then also every providential step that I have taken was ordered of him. I say this not as a matter of reasoning or by way of logical inference, but as a matter of experience. So also the personal life of Paul himself bears out this truth, that the providence and grace of God go hand in hand. If it be admitted that Paul was chosen of God before the world was as a disciple and an apostle, and especially to be the apostle to the Gentiles, then we can see how all his life as a natural man was just fitted for the place he was to fill and the work he was to do, in showing the power of grace, and the weakness and unprofitableness of every Jewish rite and ceremony. So the first forty years of the life of Moses were as much a preparation for his work as the leader of the people, as were the second forty years, after the Lord had called him out of Egypt. Upon no other ground than this, that our God rules in providence, and makes it subserve his purposes of grace, could this same apostle say that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." Again, after enumerating persecutions and afflictions of all kinds, he says, "Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us." These very furnace fires of affliction were made to develop in the people of God the gracious fruits of the Spirit, and so wrought good in them and for them, rather than harm; and thus they became more than conquerors. Surely these considerations show conclusively that the purpose of God is one; whether in providence or in grace, it makes itself manifest.

Another reflection that occurs to my mind in connection with all this is the truth embraced in the words of the following couplet,

"With thee, great God, there's nothing great,

With thee there's nothing small."

Creatures with their short and partial view of providential things may imagine that this or that event is great or important, while others are of no consequence; but our God does not judge in that way. Who would have imagined that a dream of the night, a mere vision, passing through the brain of a sleeping boy, would have been fraught with such monstrous results, not only to the young man, but to all his kindred, to a whole nation, and, in centuries to come, to all nations, kindreds, tongues and people under heaven? Yet the dream of Joseph was the opening event in a long course of providences, to not only himself, but all his family, the whole nation of Egypt, and to all the people of God in all lands and ages since. Surely this dream (a little thing in itself) was not small in the view of the Almighty; neither can it appear a little thing in the view of any who believe in the providence of God at all. us beware, then, how we judthing to be small or unimportant. The reason why I feel to insist upon this is that it is sometimes imagined that great things are under the charge of the Almighty, while it is not to be supposed that he concerns himself with every passing event; but surely if our God is the Creator of all, he must be Lord of all. If it were not an act beneath him to create a grain of sand, it cannot be beneath him to hold that grain of sand in his hand every moment of its existence. If our God be omnipresent, then is he as wholly and entirely present in the mote that floats in the sunbeam as he is in the sun itself; and in its place that mote fulfills its Maker's will as entirely as does the sun itself. As in these things that pertain to the physical world, so is it true in the world of providence. Nothing is beneath the Almighty. To say that this event or that does not occur in the settled course of God's appointment in providence, is to say that nothing is fixed, and that Jehovah himself is subject to being surprised by the happening of that which he could not foresee or expect, and against which he therefore had made no provision. The smallest wheels of a watch are as essential as the largest to the fulfillment of its maker's purpose. So the smallest wheels of God's providence are as essential as those which appear larger to us. God made the gnat as well as the camel.

Another reflection is that in harmony with all this, the Scriptures ascribe all things to God. We stop short of God, and say this or that thing is the cause of other things. We look at what we call second causes, and are almost ready to crowd the God of the whole earth out of his own creation, and ignore his rule entirely; but the word of divine inspiration sees him everywhere. In the view of the Scriptures, there is nothing without God. Job said, in the very midst of his sorest trials, "He performeth the thing which he hath appointed for me." Again, he said, "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" (at the hand of the Lord). Again, he said, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." He did not see the Chaldeans nor the Sabeans nor the storm nor Satan in his calamities, but God only; and so he bowed submissively to him. Likewise David said, when sorely oppressed, "I was silent, because thou didst it." Had he looked only at the hand of his enemies he could not have been silent; but he saw the hand of God, and knew that he was too wise to err, and too good to be unkind. The Scriptures speak of God's hail, hoar-frost, rain, ice and snow. His voice is heard in the thunder, and his lightnings enlightened the world. Is there health? It is of the Lord. Is there pestilence? The Lord hath sent it. Do men die? The Lord has gathered back their health. Do men live?

It is in God that they live. Does war rage? It is the sword of the Lord that is made bare in the land. What is there, in short, that is not ascribed to our God in his word?

Believing this, the child of God can rejoice in what to him seems the darkest hour. This God of providence, viewed in the light of these things, becomes his refuge and stronghold. Here can he trust and find rest.

I trust these reflections may prove of interest to our brother, and to all who may read them. I remain your brother in the hope of Christ,

F. A. CHICK.

REISTERSTOWN, Md., Aug. 2, 1889.

"IN those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea, and saying, Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." "Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, confessing their sins." "Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him." "And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him: and lo a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."—Matt. iii.

From the foregoing Scripture we conclude that the kingdom of heaven was fully at hand; but, like the church in the wilderness of Sinai, it must have a law, officers and doctrine. Also, its order of worship and its ordinances must be made full. John was sent "To make ready a people prepared for the Lord." This ordinance of baptism (only by immersion) was revealed to John from high heaven; and when he had baptized such among the multitudes as "were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God," they were then made ready for the Lord, and he received them, and began to execute his authority as Leader and Governor and Law-giver. As the antitype of Moses in the wilderness, he began to frame all things after the pattern shown him in the mount of the eternal heavens. After the days of his temptations were ended, he went forth preaching his own everlasting gospel, and also called his twelve disciples. "And seeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain: and when he was set, his disciples came unto him: and he opened his mouth and taught them." It would make this writing long and tedious to record all that he taught upon that occasion. All who feel interested can read it from the beginning of the fifth to the end of the eighth chapter of Matthew. Let it be remembered that he was instructing these disciples as members and special officers of his kingdom. And what was "written aforetime was written for our learning," even in this age of the world. Would the saints all heed the inspired instructions recorded in those chapters, what a balm it would produce for the bleeding wounds that now affect Zion in many places in the United States. "When he was come down from the mountain, great multitudes followed him." He continued to preach and teach, and also made manifest "his eternal power and Godhead," by casting out devils, cleansing lepers, healing the sick, and raising the dead. "And when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out." "These twelve Jesus sent forth, and commanded them, saying, Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand." I infer that Christ was still increasing and executing his authority, and the kingdom or church was still organized. In the eighteenth chapter of Matthew he gives the complete and most binding and profitable discipline for the church to be governed by during its existence in its militant stay upon earth. No member can be legally excluded from fellowship, and none can be reclaimed from error, without due and proper labor; and a blunder made in the execution of this law is hard to rectify, and often results disastrously to the cause.

The Savior all the way intimates to his disciples that he was to be delivered into the hands of wicked men, and be crucified, and rise from the dead the third day. Accordingly the time drew near, and he instituted what is called his last supper, with the emblems of his broken body and shed blood. We see that he is particular to repair to an upper room, with only the twelve disciples, as officers, to sit upon twelve thrones, judging and completing the giving of the law to the Gentiles after his ascension back to the Father. He also washed the disciples' feet, and said, "I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you." He also enjoined upon them the sacred duty of loving each other as he had loved them. The time arrived, and he was betrayed by Judas Iscariot; was tried, condemned, crucified, buried, and arose from the dead the third day, and appeared to the disciples again, saying, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." They had been told also to tarry in the city of Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high. "And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." Thus we infer that the first gospel church was fully set up according to the predictions of the prophet Daniel. "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."—Dan. ii. 44.

Jesus was verily the God of heaven, with all power to fit and prepare all the material for his spiritual temple, and to order its doctrine, officers, laws and ordinances. The work was completed by him, and the church was now endued with power from on high, and went forward to transact business as he had prescribed. "And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved." This church with all its order must have been a model or pattern; and wherever we find an organization claiming to be the church, it should be measured with the rod and square of God's word; and if it is found to deviate too far from the pattern, it should immediately be turned over to the Gentiles, for the outer court, and henceforth be left out. Let us inquire, Did this pattern church have any theological schools, universities, or Sunday Schools? No. Did it have any fairs, festivals, or picnics? No. Did it have any list of societies, such as Masonry, Temperance, Dorcas, Magdalene, bed-quilt, boxes, hen's-nest, &c.? No. Did it practice the use of fiddles, pianos, organs, and such like, in public worship? No. Did they have any preachers called from among men to preach with the titles of "Rev.," "D. D.," "L. L. D.," "A. M.?" No. "They continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers." "And all that believed were together, and had all things common."—Acts ii. 42, 44.

I have thought these "D. Ds." we have in these days compare very well with the "M. Ds." They have to read medical books awhile, then go to college and get their diploma, and then return, ready to peddle out pills, powders, drops, plasters, &c. They can also dissect a man, but cannot find his soul. All the medicines they use in their practice are compounded by other doctors. He must learn its quality, and study its application, and prescribe accordingly. If the disease is healed, all well; if not, that does not matter, but the pay must come. The "D. D." also reads some, then puts off to college, there studies theology by science, then graduates, and returns, ready to prescribe for the different maladies that attack the sinner, such as drunkenness, profanity, gambling, &c. He deals out his do pills, work powders, faith drops, and adhesive plasters, to draw as many into the pales of his so-called church as he can, and draw all the money from their pockets they can spare. Nobody gets cured, but the money must come. All his religious drugs are compounded by the most skilled of the profession, and he feels no responsibility for the effects.

Among the medical profession there are specialists, who treat certain diseases and deformities, such as cross-eyes, crooked arms, feet, legs, &c. They sometimes advertise, and go from town to town, and get up as many such cases as will come for treatment; and they make money by it. There are also specialists among the religious profession, who go from town to town with a large tent, to accommodate patients. Sankey and Moody of one order, and Sam. Jones of another, seem to be of these kinds. Sam. Jones' special work seems to be to heal those who are in the habit of walking zig-zag, and crossing their legs very often, and sometimes vomiting, and wallowing in the mire. These kind often have crooked elbows before the staggering. He administers large doses of do pills, work powders, and faith drops, made strong with the penalty of hell fire if not taken in just such doses as he prescribes. I saw one patient that he worked on in Birmingham, and he seemed to be well cured; but the disease returned, and he is as badly deformed as ever. But Sam. got the money. Sam. knows the way from a saloon door to a Methodist pulpit, but cannot tell the way "from death unto life." John the Baptist came "preaching in the wilderness, saying, Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Sam. comes preaching, "Repent: for Satan and torment are at hand." That shows up the difference.

We have quoted that the Jerusalem church continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine, and we are not left to guess at what their doctrine was. The pages of the New Testament reveal it too clearly to be denied by those who have eyes to see. They set forth the doctrine of election, predestination, eternal redemption, effectual calling, sanctification, justification, baptism and the resurrection of the dead; and the true church will ever continue in that doctrine. But I will desist.

Brethren Beebe, I send this to you, and trust to your judgment what to do with it. I know that there are much abler speakers and writers than I am.

HURRICANE BRANCH, Tenn.,

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I seat myself to drop you and our dear correspondents a few lines, which you will please publish in our dear family paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

According to record, I was born August 19th, 1850. I received (as I trust) the pardon of my sins in my fifteenth year. I believed then, and do yet believe, that my delivery from my sins was alone by the grace of God. But prior to the time I believe the good Lord quickened me, I believed a man could work himself into favor with God. In fact, I did not believe that I was as bad as God's servants, according to the Scriptures, would point man out to be. Indeed I thought if there were any men as bad as God's ministers pointed out (such as totally depraved, no good in man), that surely they were away off yonder; for I did not think that I ever knew one that bad. I now see that I was in the same belief that all the Arminians are to-day; and I know where we got that doctrine. It was from that old serpent, called the devil. He said to our parents, "Ye shall not surely die."—Gen. iii. 4. With his deception he deceived our mother, and the penalty of God's righteous law was inflicted, which was death.—Gen. ii. 17. Then God told the truth when he said to Adam, "In the day [not after the day] thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Every christian's experience will testify to the truthfulness of God's word. Then, dear brethren and sisters in Christ, it appears like we ought to distinguish God's ministers from those of the wicked one; for while wolves in sheep's clothing will bawl here and there that the sinner is not so dead but what he can hear and receive the gospel, God's minister will still proclaim that the unquickened sinner is dead in trespasses and sins, and in death he must remain till God the Holy Ghost comes down, and he is born again. My experience, as well as the word of God, teaches me that it was not by works of righteousness which I have done, but according to God's mercy he saved me. I have been a professor of grace in the pardon of my sins (and I hope a possessor) now about twenty-three years, and have (in my weak way) been trying to preach that doctrine nine years last March. I was ordained to the full work of the gospel ministry on May 19th, 1883. I first joined the Primitive Baptist Church of Hind's Creek, Anderson County, Tennessee, and was baptized in the fellowship of that church by Elder James Long, who, I believe, is now enjoying the full fruition of his faith in immortality.

Dear brethren and sisters, while I have had some seasons of rejoicing, I have had sore trials to meet and encounter while passing along the pathway of time. But, blessed be the name of the Lord, he has let us know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose. Then bless the Lord, O my soul. The almighty and all-wise God is a God of purpose. He purposed in eternity, before time began, to save poor, lost sinners. O how thankful we should feel, dear kindred in Christ, to that God who is so wise, and inhabiteth eternity, that he could look through time and behold our deplorable condition, and purposed to send his beloved Son to die for us. According to divine appointment, Jesus bore our sins in his own body on the tree, and put them away by the sacrifice of himself. That was all that was necessary for the satisfaction of the divine law of God; and the third and appointed morning Jesus rises from the dead for our justification. God, by the apostle, said, "He [Jesus] was delivered for our offenses, and rose again for our justification." Glory to God that he sends the Holy Ghost to quicken us from the dead and make manifest to us what Jesus did for us. Perhaps the Arminian is ready to ask, How many was Jesus delivered for, and arose from the dead for the justification of? I will answer them in this way: Every one that God the Father gave to the Son in the covenant of redemption before the world began. These are the elect of God, or the sheep that Jesus laid down his life for; and the apostle said, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" Since Jesus has fulfilled the law in their behalf, I ask the same question, Who shall lay anything to their charge? The everlasting salvation of the bride, the Lamb's wife, is sure, because she has a loving Bridegroom that died for her, and arose from the dead, and declared that all power both in heaven and in earth is given to him. Then he will suffer nothing to come upon his elect people but what will work for their good and his glory; for he will cause the wrath of man to praise him, and the remainder of wrath he will restrain. Wrath and the remainder, brethren and sisters, is all there is, and God controls it all. We learn that "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water: he turneth it whithersoever he will."—Prov. xxi. 1. I prize the doctrine of election and predestination according to the foreknowledge of God. But the Arminian raises a great hue and cry about predestination. Now what is predestination? I have been told that Webster defines it to be "The purpose of God in eternity respecting all events." Then if that is true, things are not flying around at random, as some suppose. But they tell me that if God predestinated all the wicked acts of men, that men could not help it, and are justified, because God has predestinated it. They say that to hold God's predestination of all things makes God the author of sin. But I reckon they have not learned what sin is, much as they have transgressed God's law. It may be that God has given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, ears that they should not hear, and a heart that they should not understand. But I have learned that sin is the transgression of the law; and man is all the being I know of that has sinned. But I do not believe that man sinning thwarted any purpose of the great and all-wise God, or makes his grace of none effect. The great God says he works all things after the counsel of his own will. Then if wicked acts of men are any part of all things, God works them after the counsel of his own will.—Eph. i. 11. I do not believe there ever was a more wicked act committed by men than the betrayal and crucifixion of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ; and yet the Jews and Gentiles in gathering themselves together against the Lord and against his Christ, did no more than what God's hand and counsel determined before to be done.—Acts iv. 27, 28; also, read Acts ii. 23. Now were those wicked people justified in their wicked acts? I say, No. Neither are men to-day justified in wickedness. Neither do I believe that God is the perpetrator of any wicked act; but he is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and higher than the heavens. So, brethren, after the manner which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all that is written in the law and in the prophets. God said he knew from the beginning who they were that believed not, and who should betray him. But some tell me that God's foreknowledge does not bring anything to pass. But I say that what he foresaw must come to pass, or the foreknowledge of God is at once destroyed. I say that to hold that what God foresaw would come to pass in time, men or devils could prevent, and thus destroy the foreknowledge of God, would be as God-dishonoring as to hold that God was the author of sin. I hold that God is almighty, all-wise, "declaring the end from the beginning, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure."—Isa. xli. 10. Brethren, if I am covering more ground than the apostles, prophets and Baptists in past ages held, tell me of it. I do not want to contend for anything but the old landmarks. It does appear that our forefathers believed in the absolute sovereignty of God over all things; and we sometimes sing,

"We are traveling home to God,
In the way the fathers trod."

My heart's desire and prayer to God is that he will give us all grace sufficient to enable us to earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints.

I heard of one man, that claims to be an Old Baptist, advising the brethren to have nothing to do with the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. Dear brethren, a man that wants to sap the foundation of the Old, Primitive, Predestinarian Baptists, and build up Arminianism on its ruins, I do not wonder at his giving such advice. I see some pieces in the SIGNS from the pen of Elder Wm. J. Purington. Now who is Purington? Perhaps the Arminian is ready to say, An old heretic. But I say, He is an Old Baptist, and has the care of the second oldest Baptist Church in America, or did have in the year 1885, and I suppose has the care of that church yet. Brother Durand is a recognized Baptist, and the editors of the SIGNS are recognized as Baptists. Indeed the correspondents of the SIGNS are Baptists; or if any of them have been condemned and cast out of the Baptist Church as heretics, it has never been proven to me, neither do I believe it can be proven. So I say, Write on, dear brethren, and continue to use "The Sword of the Lord and of Gideon." I love to read brother Lively's pieces, and I would love to read something from the pen of brother Wagner again. I am much pleased with the editorials. In fact I love all the brethren and sisters that write in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I love to hear sister Georgia Lynn tell the dealings of the Lord with her. Brother Candell, who baptized her, is gone to that rest that remains to the people of God. I heard him preach his last sermon on earth. Truly a father in Israel is gone.

I will close my scribbling for this time by saying, I am your unworthy brother in hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began,

JAMES C. WALTON.

CAPP'S FORD, TENN., June 30, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—Having a desire to speak to the household of faith on the subject of the predestination of all things, I thought by your permission I would speak through our family paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I do believe that glorious, God-honoring, soul-cheering doctrine, without which I could have no hope of entering into that rest that remaineth to the people of God.—Heb. iv. 9. First, it is said, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."—2 Tim. iii. 16, 17. "Knowing this first, that no prophecy of Scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."—2 Peter i. 20, 21. "Now these be the last words of David. David the son of Jesse said, and the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet psalmist of Israel, said, The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue."—2 Sam. xxiii. 1, 2. Now, brethren, these are some of the reasons why I believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be the written word of God, who spake as never man spake, and who hath said, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure."—Isa. xlvi. 10. "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began."—Titus i. 2. "Wherein God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath: that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us."—Heb. vi. 17, 18. Jesus said, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled."—Matt. v. 17, 18. Brethren, will you please to notice what Jesus said again? "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels? But how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be? In that same hour said Jesus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as against a thief with swords and staves for to take me? I sat daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye laid no hold on me. But all this was done, that the Scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples forsook him, and fled."—Matt. xxvi. 53-56. "But those things which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled." The above Scriptures have been cited to show the immutability of God's word and the certainty of its fulfillment. Then in order to know what shall come to pass, or what is bound to come to pass, it is only necessary to examine the Scriptures and see what God says shall and shall not come to pass; for it is written, "God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?"—Num. xxiii. 19. "Yea, I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass; I have purposed it, I will also do it."—Isa. xli. 11. "The Lord of hosts hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass; and as I have purposed, so shall it stand." So I look upon the written word of God as being infallible as God himself. I feel myself under obligation to believe it, though all men turn a cold shoulder to me. If I did not believe all of it, I would not know how much to believe of it. I notice that Jesus was very careful to fulfill all that was written about him. Also, it is said by our Lord, "Therefore they could not believe, because that Esaias said again, He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them."—John xii. 39, 40. It seems that the Lord was very careful to bring all the sayings of the Scripture to pass. Now, brethren, one and all, let us strive, as much as within us is, to believe the Scriptures, take God at what he says, and believe it to be the truth, no matter how much it may cross our natural, carnal belief. For "The carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be."—Rom. viii. 7. It is said again, "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."—1 Cor. ii. 14. Now, in view of these things, let us not set up our carnal judgment as a standard for our God to conform to, nor say, If he does not do thus and so he is unjust, and is the author of sin. But let us say, like one of old, He is holy, the holy One, that "doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" He worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. Now, brethren, I wish to say right here, If "all things" do not mean all things, both good and evil, I do not know what all things do mean.—Eph. i. 11. Paul says, "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose."—Romans viii. 28. Paul does not say all things are good, but all things work together for good to them that love God. He also says, "And not only so, but we glory in tribulation also; knowing that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope: and hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us."—Rom. v. 3-5. Paul says again, "Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." It seems that persecution must come. Then does it not necessarily follow that there must be a persecutor? Do we not find this fulfilled in our own experience? Paul says again, to Timothy, "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom. Preach the word, be instant in season, out of season, reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine: for the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine [such as, God having all power in heaven and in earth, and working all things after the counsel of his own will; but saying that such would make him the author of sin]; but after their own lust [carnal reason] shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables;" such as, almighty men; teaching for doctrine the commandments of men. Now, brethren, do we not see all these things fulfilled among us? Then who could doubt the fulfilling of the Scriptures? It is also said in Scripture, "The wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand." Now, when we turn our attention to our civil authorities, we find it has been their business all the time to try to stop crime. Our judicials have used all the means in their power, and yet the flood of crime seems to flow unceasingly; which, we believe, can be accounted for by God withholding the restraint from over the human family, who are corrupt by nature. I believe that the restraint will only be withheld so far as to work to the praise of God and the good of his redeemed people; for it is said, "Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee; the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain." I will say in conclusion that I believe God works all things, both good and bad, together for good to his redeemed people, and that nothing happens to them by chance; but all things that come to pass were appointed of God, and in eternity. I cannot help but believe this, from the teaching of God's word, though not wishing to set up my belief as a standard for others to conform to. The strong should bear with the weak, while the weak should not condemn the strong. But if all men were to declare non-fellowship for me, I could not help believing in the predestination of all things whatsoever come to pass. If I am not deceived, my experience teaches it to me more or less every day I live. The Bible teaches it as clearly as anything else, and nature seems to say that God rules all things. "It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps;" but man's goings are of the Lord. Now, brethren Beebe, if you should publish this, please correct mistakes, as I am no scholar. If in your judgment it would injure the cause, please throw it aside, and all will be right with me. I think too much of our paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, to want to injure its circulation. It comes to me like cool water to the thirsty, like food to the hungry, and like a lamp to those in darkness. O how I would like to see some of the able writers that correspond with it, such as F. A. Chick, S. H. Durand, Wm. J. Purington, H. Cox, Fred. W. Keene, Lee Hancks, W. Lively, James Wagner, and others I cannot mention here.

I would say to them, Write on, brethren; earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. I will close this imperfect scribble by saying, Remember me at the throne of grace.

Yours to serve,

P. N. MOYERS.

PANOLA, GA., July 21, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I have just received a very interesting letter from our dear sister Emma Smith, which I forward to you for publication. I hope you will publish it at your earliest convenience, as there are no doubt many of the dear ones who have not heard from sister Mary since she has not been able to write. For nearly seven years I have been reading with interest her communications in the SIGNS, and for three years have enjoyed many of her private letters, which have been a source of great comfort and strength to me. None but those who have passed through the furnace of affliction can really know how to sympathize with her. It seems that she has to drink the cup of sorrow to the very dregs. But how often in the floods of tribulation has Jesus whispered consolation, and supported her fainting soul. She seems to be so patient and submissive, and has many wonderful manifestations of his love. That she may ever be able to rest in his love, and at last land on the shores of immortal glory, is the sincere wish of my heart.

Brethren Beebe, will you allow me space to say to my correspondents, whose letters are being unanswered, that my long silence has not been caused by indifference or neglect? For the past four months I have had two severe attacks of rheumatism, which caused my right arm and shoulder to become lame; and although it is much better, writing increases the pain, and I can only write a few lines at a time. I hope, dear ones, that you will continue to send me your messages of love and christian fellowship, to cheer me on my lonely way. Many changes and cares have come into my dreary life, which have caused much worldly sorrow, which has worked death to my spiritual enjoyment. Tempest-tossed I long have been, and the flood seems to be increasing. Much of the time I go with my head bowed down, feeling cast down, forsaken, heavy burdened with afflictions and earthly troubles. When I am made to see the corruption of my sinful heart, I am sin-sick. I sometimes feel that life's burdens are too hard to bear; yet I would not murmur or repine at my God, for he directs the chastening, but would stoop and kiss the rod. My days are dark and dreary with affliction and grief. I am lonely, sad and weary. But how sweet to know that the Lord hears my supplications and listens to my cries. Earthly friends may forsake, and the purest joys may fade and die, and leave us with an aching heart; but we know that there is a divine hand that still holds us. No matter how deep the waters, his everlasting arms are underneath. How disconsolate we feel when we are left alone in the dark. But when we can again feel his shining presence, we can rest surely in his love, and can bear all things. What a blessing when we can carry our troubles to Jesus in prayer. He says, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." What a rich mercy when we are enabled to trust in his promises. But I am often filled with doubts and unbelief.

"How can I be a child of God,
While my affections are so cold?
How could my heart remain so base,
If I belong to Jesus' fold?"

The blessed Savior has said that in the world we shall have tribulation; but in him we shall have peace. So, when the poor, tempest-tossed children of God have to meet with sore conflicts of this life, being tempted, persecuted and afflicted, they can only trust in the grace of God. His promises are to the poor and afflicted. Every one must be a partaker of chastisement. What are the few fleeting moments of suffering, sorrow, loneliness and desolation, compared with eternity, where the beloved of the Lord shall forever rest? A few more toils and cares, and we shall weep no more, but all our griefs will be turned into gladness. What a sweet blessing when we can have a foretaste of those heavenly joys.

Brethren Beebe, I submit this letter to your better judgment. I feel that it is unfit to publish, as my thoughts are very scattering, writing at intervals. Love to all the household of faith.

Your unworthy sister in affliction and tribulation,

ARMINDA L. DULIN.

NEWARK, Ohio, July 7, 1889.

ARMINDA L. DULIN—VERY DEAR SISTER:—At the request of our dear, afflicted sister, Mary Parker, I write you. I was permitted, two weeks ago, to visit her sick room, and to look into her dear face, and to see and behold with my natural eyes the patient endurance of the tried saint. O, my dear sister, I am such a child, and I could do nothing but weep while I stayed with her; yet it did not seem to move her. She would look so brightly and pleasantly into my tear-stained face, and talk of her humble trust, that her sufferings would soon be over, and that she should soon change this vile body for one that is incorruptible; and then O the great bliss, which this present suffering was not to be compared with. I arrived at her home about eleven o'clock on Thursday, and remained until the next day afternoon. I wish I could find language to express my feelings while there, but I cannot. It was a sweet, sad time. With the solemn awe of the scene there seemed mingled a sort of heavenly rapture. My whole nature seemed sorrowful to see one I loved so much in such an awful condition. O the dreadful suffering, which is past description, and which can never be described. Somehow within there seemed a rejoicing that Jesus could give peace and trust in the midst of such despair; for the dear sister told me that while I was there she was very happy. She spoke again of the case of Lazarus being such a comfort to her. O how very unworthy I felt of the many blessings that the dear Lord had bestowed upon me. I even feared lest I be given my good things in this world; for I have been greatly favored this summer, in meeting often with the dear saints, and of hearing the comforting gospel proclaimed by strangers in the flesh, who came with the same good news and glad tidings that had cheered me in my native land. I left my home on the last day of May, and came immediately to the home of Mattie Derr, at Tiffin. I spent more than a week in her dear presence, and in the meantime we attended the regular meeting at her home church (Honey Creek), where Elder Sherwood, a father in Israel, spoke so sweetly of the things of the kingdom. The next Wednesday we attended the funeral of Elder Lewis Seitz, Jr., and amid the great sadness of the stricken family we seemed to realize that it was more blessed to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting. We then attended the Sandusky Association, and felt that it was a time and place to raise an Ebenezer. We were wonderfully blessed with consistent truths, and a deep and solemn interest, as well as perfect peace, and were made to feel the truth of the Scripture, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" After the association I came on to Newark, in Licking County, Ohio, this county being the home of my parents and grandparents, and also my birthplace. On the fourth Sunday in June I attended meeting at Poplar Fork, the church home of my great-grandparents and grandparents, where Elder John Parker (father of Mary) had been the pastor for many years. The following Sunday we attended meeting about fourteen miles further on, at the Falls of Licking Church. Now I am almost ready to start for Indiana, and expect to be with the dear ones at home in another week.

Dear Mary enjoys your letters very much, but is not able to write, and that is why she gave me your address and asked me to write you for her. I hope you will write to her often, and not neglect her, since she is not able to answer. With christian love I will close. I would love to hear from you, but fear it would be asking too much of you.

Lovingly yours,

EMMA D. SMITH.

P. S.—If you think anything in this would be of any interest to the brethren, especially the account of dear Mary, you may have it published in the SIGNS.

"THY DEAD MEN SHALL LIVE."

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Will you please give your views through the SIGNS on the text, Isaiah xxvi. 19, and oblige an old sinner?

Yours, sometimes in hope of eternal life,

I. N. BAILEY.

LAMAR Co., Texas, July 2, 1889.

REPLY.

"Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead."—Isa. xxvi. 19.

Although fully aware of our own great need to be instructed in the doctrine of the gospel, it is always our desire to comply with the requests of those who ask in love for such views as we hold in reference to the truth which God has revealed in the Scriptures. In speaking or in writing, however, it should always be remembered that there is nothing of divine truth which originates either with the ignorance or the intelligence of men. All that the most gifted minister of Christ can claim as original with himself is the errors and mistakes which he may advance. Whatever of truth he is enabled to present is the truth of God, and owes none of its value to the man by whom it is expressed. The whole gospel system declares the glory of God alone, while it abases the pride of man. "Therefore let no man glory in men." By the revelation of the Spirit of truth the deep mystery of godliness is made known to babes; while God has hidden these things from the most diligent investigation of the wise and prudent of this world.

In the consideration of the subject submitted by our esteemed brother in our text, it is evidently necessary to observe the connection in which this language is recorded. The chapter begins with the declaration that in the day foretold this song shall be sung in the land of Judah; and then the song occupies the whole chapter, until it closes with the promise and command in our text. There can be no question but that the day specified is the same of which all the prophets and inspired writers of the old Scriptures testified, which was certainly the gospel dispensation, as it was ushered in by the rising of the Sun of righteousness with healing in his wings, when our Lord Jesus in his resurrection brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. "This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it."—Psa. cxviii. 24. This day is the true substance of all the typical sabbath days and years under the legal ordinances of God as given to his chosen nation of Israel. Every promise of comfort and rest in this glorious day is addressed to the spiritual election of grace, and is applied by the divine Comforter individually to the saints in their personal experience.

"Thy dead men shall live." Only the omnipotence of the Creator can truthfully speak such a promise as this. No voice but his can be regarded by the dead; for he alone can speak words which are spirit and life. Indeed, it is only as his voice is heard that the dead can ever be conscious of their helpless and deplorable state of condemnation. Every one, therefore, who mourns his condition as being in a state of death, is already blessed in Christ Jesus with the manifestation of life. Until Jesus has given life to them, the dead know not anything.—Ecc. ix. 5. In the thirty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel the whole house of Israel is represented in the vision of the valley of dry bones, yet at the command of the Lord God the breath came into them, and they lived. In this type is expressed the same gracious truth which is declared in our text. "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." This gracious display of divine love is not merely an addition to the merit of such sinners as have done a part of the work toward making themselves worthy of life. The possession of any claim upon the favor of God on the part of the sinner forbids that his life should be in any sense a gift. If he receives it in consideration of compliance with any terms it is his just due; and it would not be just that his reward should be withheld after he had earned it by conforming to the required condition. But this positive promise of the Lord is not suspended upon any condition whatever. It recognizes the fact that the people concerned are already dead, and consequently incapable of even so much as desiring to comply with any terms. In addition to their being destitute of life and without strength, divine justice holds them under condemnation as guilty sinners. Yet the word of truth declares that they shall live. In this appears the inconceivable mystery of godliness. Justice must be satisfied, and the life of the sinner alone can meet its demand; yet it is true that God is able to fulfill this amazing promise of his love. The highest idea which finite intelligence can grasp concerning the salvation of sinners is that divine love and mercy have interposed to release the guilty from the sentence of strict justice; so that the penalty of sin is remitted, while the guilt is not removed. Although this would be satisfactory to the carnal selfishness of man, it is not the fulfillment of the longing desire of such as hunger and thirst after righteousness. In Jesus as the life of his redeemed people God has revealed that provision of grace whereby his people are saved from their sins, and thus are they made holy and without blame before him in love. Divine truth and infinite justice are not less gloriously displayed in this wonderful way of life, than are the love and mercy of God.

While the final deliverance of the saints is included in this promise, as being inseparable from the truth of the gospel of Christ, it is not our understanding of this text that it is confined to the declaration of the doctrine of the resurrection of the saints in ultimate glory. The true meaning of the promise is rather obscured by the words which are supplied in the translation from the original language into our own tongue. Without those supplied words, which are printed in our version in Italics, the text would read, "Thy dead shall live; my dead body shall they arise." This expresses the indissoluble unity of Christ and his people, of whom it is written, "Now ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular." "For we are members of his body, of his flesh and of his bones."—1 Cor. xii. 27; Eph. v. 30. This constitutes that unity of life by which our Lord Jesus could justly lay down his life for all his members. So Paul rendered the judgment of truth when he wrote, "For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again."—2 Cor. v. 14, 15. If Jesus had not been identified with his people as their very life when they were involved in sin, there was no provision in the law by which justice could have accepted even his voluntary offering of himself as a substitute for the transgressors who were justly doomed to death. On the contrary, such a substitution would have involved two crimes which God has expressly denounced. "He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the just, even they both are abomination to the Lord."—Prov. xvii. 15. Under the darkness of the night of legal terror there was no revelation of this divine provision for the salvation of those who were in themselves "by nature the children of wrath, even as others." Thus the chosen people of God were rightfully designated under that law as "dead men." It is not only true that the life of the saints is identical with Christ from everlasting, but it is expressly recorded of them that they were blessed in him before they had any natural existence in time. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places [or things] in Christ; according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love."

—Eph. i. 3, 4. Natural reason cannot receive this as true, because it suggests that we had no conscious existence before time began. God has revealed the answer to this caviling. Speaking by David our Lord confesses to God, "Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them."—Psa. cxxxix. 16. The fact that we cannot understand how this can be, does not affect its truth. God has purposely hidden every principle of gospel truth from the wise and prudent, and revealed his unsearchable judgments unto the chosen subjects of his love. Every step in the experience of divine grace displays the boundless sovereignty of God in the salvation of his people from their sins. He has given no other motive for his discriminating grace but that which is declared by our Lord Jesus, "Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight." In this eternal election of divine grace is all the hope of every saint. The convicted sinner can rest in nothing less than the immutable purpose of God for deliverance from that death in which he is involved. He can trust in no conditional system, for he has no power to render obedience to the least requirement.

The infinite fullness of the promise in the text exceeds all that is possible in the estimation of finite intelligence. Reason can see no hope for those who are already dead; but this word of our God gives assurance of life to those who are included in its gracious promise, even while it recognizes them as dead. "With men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible."—Matt. xix. 26. He gives life to the dead. This is that immortality which is brought to light through the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. Those who are made alive by the quickening power of the word of God, are raised to newness of life, and can never again be condemned. They are passed from death unto life. So our Lord himself has said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."—John v. 24. This is the gracious promise of our text. When Isaiah was moved by the Spirit to record this prophetic song the night of legal condemnation held all the children of Zion under the same death which passed upon all men when sin entered into the world. The law revealed no salvation from that death. The same truth is taught in the experience of the saints even now. When the commandment comes sin revives and they die. All hope is cut off. But this word of salvation brings life to the dead. The miracle of grace is revealed in that word of the Lord which proclaims that "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief."—1 Tim. i. 15. This word never comes to any sinner without bringing the consciousness that it is only through infinite grace that salvation from sin could be revealed in his case. He feels himself the chief of sinners. To such dead sinners Jesus gives eternal life, as he said to Martha, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die."—John xi. 25, 26. This life-giving grace of our God is the only hope of salvation for the guilty sinner. These are the "dead men" unto whom the promise in our text applies, and it can rightfully be applied to no others. All such shall live. There is no question of this truth in the heart of the believer when he meets with one who gives evidence of being conscious that he is justly condemned, even though such a sinner has yet received no manifestation of the pardon of his sins through the grace which is in Christ Jesus. Often in such cases believers feel more assurance for those who mourn without hope, than they can claim for themselves at the time. They are sure that such mourners shall be comforted. The truth of God is pledged for the salvation of all those who feel their sins as a burden from which they long to be delivered. Such mourners already bear the seal of the Spirit, by which they are identified as children of the Zion to whom these gracious words are addressed; and to all such the assurance is applicable, as spoken by Peter, "The promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call."—Acts ii. 39.

MARRIAGES.

In the city of St. Joseph, Mo., at the residence of A. W. Bloomfield, 622 North Twelfth St., July 14th, 1889, by Elder R. M. Thomas, Mr. Jerome C. Scott, of Lincoln, Lancaster Co., Neb., and Miss Yarra E. Skaggs, of St. Joseph, Mo., daughter of Elder J. W. Skaggs, of Holyoke, Phillips Co., Colo.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

OUR loved and much-esteemed sister in Christ, Elizabeth Creighton, widow of Isaac Creighton, died May 16th, 1889, after being sick one week, at the residence of her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Mores, in Waverly, Iowa, with whom she had lived eleven years. Her husband died Oct. 17th, 1867, leaving her a lonely widow without a home; but the Lord blessed her with kind children, with plenty of this world's goods, so that she had a good home and was kindly cared for as long as she lived. She was called to go through deep affliction, having buried her husband, three sons and three daughters. She leaves five very intelligent and highly respected children (one son and four daughters) to mourn their loss of a dear mother, but not as those who have no hope, for their loss is her eternal gain; also grandchildren, and a large circle of friends, relatives and acquaintances, mourn the loss of one they loved and respected. The deceased was eighty-one years old on the 7th of last January.

Our dear sister obtained a good hope through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, I think, over fifty years ago, and was baptized and received into the fellowship of the Friendship Primitive Baptist Church at Reynoldsburgh, Ohio, where she remained a worthy member, I think, over fifty years, steadfast in the faith once delivered to the saints, and looking to Jesus, the author and finisher of the same. She was faithful in filling her seat in the church as long as she lived within its bounds. She was a fervent and true friend of the SIGNS, and a subscriber for many years.

Her funeral services were held at the residence of her daughter, where she died, after which her mortal remains were laid in the beautiful cemetery at Waverly, Iowa, to await the voice of the Archangel and the trump of God, when she will awake to behold her King in his beauty, and be clad with immortality; for the truth of God is that those who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

"Our mother dear is called away,
And we are left to mourn;
On earth she could no longer stay—
Her Father called, Come home."

L. B. HANOVER.

CENTER VILLAGE, Ohio, Aug. 3, 1889.

Mrs. Elizabeth Flinn, relict of Z. W. Flinn, was a daughter of Francis and Rebecca Hill, and was born in Monroe Co., Ky., Jan. 26th, 1805, and departed this life Aug. 2d, 1889, in the eighty-fifth year of her age.

The deceased was united in marriage with Mr. Flinn, in Ky., Aug. 23d, 1821, she being then only in her seventeenth year. In the fall of the same year they came to Illinois and settled where she died, near the site of the present village of Prentice, in Morgan Co. The country was almost an unsettled wilderness, and many roving bands of Indians not far away. They commenced in poverty in this frontier country, and struggled with the hardships and trials incident thereto, and finally accumulated a large property. The subject of this notice became the mother of fourteen children, four sons and ten daughters, two of the sons and six of the daughters having passed away before their mother. Sister Flinn professed a hope in Christ and joined the Union Church of Regular (Primitive) Baptists in 1842, and was baptized by the late Elder Wm. Crow. In that faith she lived through all her trials and troubles, and in the same faith and trust she met death, saying to her friends just before she expired, "All is clear and bright." She had been quite weak and feeble for several years, but her last illness lasted only eight days, when her spirit took its flight to that clime where there shall be no more death.

"Aunt Betsy" was among the noble and worthy christian ladies and mothers in Israel, and her friends and acquaintances were numerous, and scattered over a wide territory, so that her funeral services were attended by over one thousand people. The church to which she belonged is about eighty miles from me, and which I have attended once a month for about twenty-two years. The hour she died, just after 3 o'clock p. m. on Friday, Aug. 2d, I arrived in the vicinity by train; and on Sunday, at 10 a. m., I addressed the solemn and immense audience at the homestead from Eccl. vii. 1. Her remains were afterward laid beside her departed husband in the family graveyard on the premises. May the Lord cause all her friends and relatives to say, "Thy will be done."

I am, I hope, your brother in Christ,
I. N. VANMETER.

MACOMB, Ill., Aug. 7, 1889.

Mrs. Jane Stringer died July 5th, 1889, at her home near Red Creek, Custer Co., Colo.

The deceased was sixty-three years old at the time of her death. She was married to John Stringer Jan. 11th, 1848. To this union were born twelve children, five of whom are still living. She is supposed to have been born in Illinois, where she lived until a few years ago, when with her family she moved to Kansas, and a year ago moved to Colorado. She never attached herself to the church, although she had a living hope in Christ, and had of late been much concerned about the discharge of duty; but her small hope, as she expressed it, and her felt unworthiness, kept her from doing so. She was conscious of her condition, and made her request, which was carried out. She was a firm believer in the doctrine of salvation by grace, and had the confidence of the church, as her walk and conversation showed that she had been with Jesus.

"Aunt Jane," as all called her, was beloved by all who knew her. She leaves a dear husband, who has lost what he will never regain, and five children, three married, and two daughters single, one afflicted. The writer delivered a discourse in memory of the deceased to a large and sorrowing congregation of relatives and friends; but we sorrow not as those without hope. May God comfort all in their loss.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—It is my painful duty to send you the obituary of my brother's son, who was killed by the bursting of a steam boiler in the state of Illinois, but his home was in Columbus, Ohio. He was brought back here, and his funeral was attended at the Clinton Church by Elder G. N. Tusing, who was blessed on that occasion with God's Spirit to comfort the mourning hearts.

Francis M. Peters, son of M. A. and M. A. Peters, was born Oct. 20th, 1871, and died July 30th, 1889, aged seventeen years, nine months and ten days. Frankie was a kind and affectionate son, and none knew him but to love him; but God saw fit to take him from our embrace, and we feel to say, "God's will be done."

Yours to serve.

DIED—At St. Louis, Mo., July 16th, 1889, of typhoid pneumonia, in the thirty-seventh year of her age, Henrietta G. Winthrop, widow of C. B. Winthrop, of Dallas, Texas, and daughter of Herman and Helena H. Wolf, of Albany, N. Y.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"AND Ruth said, Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."—Ruth i. 16, 17.

An inspired writer informs the saints that those things which were written aforetime were written for their learning, that they through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope. This book of Ruth has been a source of much comfort to the people of God, who have found their own experience therein recorded. While the natural mind may be interested at times in the perusal of the historical account of the family of Elimelech, the spiritual mind alone will see in it the revelation of the purpose of God and his grace. The account opens with a famine. When God begins the work of his grace in a sinner there will be a famine. He will call for a famine upon the land, and break the whole staff of bread. He will make waste mountains and hills, dry up all their herbs, make the rivers islands, and dry up all the pools.

The reason assigned by the inspired writer for the family of Elimelech leaving the land of Canaan was because of a famine there. By the Spirit's teaching we shall see in this account the unfolding of God's purpose of love and grace in the salvation of his elect people among all nations.

Ruth, to whom much of the book refers, and who uttered the words at the head of this article, was a native of Moab, and the widow of one of the sons of Elimelech and Naomi. God had ordained that a Moabite should not enter into the congregation of his people Israel, even unto the tenth generation.—Deut. xxiii. 3. It was of the daughters of this people that the sons of Elimelech took to themselves wives. But this thing was of the Lord, although contrary to the law which he had given Israel. Let those who declare that nothing is of the Lord that is contrary to his law seriously consider the case of Samson, who was an eminent type of our Lord Jesus Christ. "And Samson went down to Timnath, and saw a woman in Timnath, of the daughters of the Philistines. And he came up and told his father and his mother, and said, I have seen a woman in Timnath, of the daughters of the Philistines:

now therefore get her for me to wife. Then his father and his mother said unto him, Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among all thy people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines? And Samson said unto his father, Get her for me; for she pleaseth me well. But his father and his mother knew not that it was of the Lord," &c. Here is a case plainly stated wherein there was a violation of the law of God to Israel, which was of the Lord, being embraced in his predestination. It was right that the parents should call the attention of their son to the law which God had given them, and Samson was a transgressor of the law in doing that very thing that was of the Lord. While God has predestinated all things that come to pass, and has a purpose worthy of himself in all, yet he is certainly righteous in taking vengeance upon transgressors, whether men can see the justice of it or not. Carnal reason, the god of this world, will ever fail to behold the righteousness and justice of God in his government of the world. God does not do things because they are right, but what he does is right because he does it; and none can say unto him, What doest thou?

According to the record, Elimelech and his family left the land of Israel; and it appears evident that they left it with the view of evading an afflictive providence with which God was then chastening his chosen people who were then dwelling in the land of Canaan. Yet it is possible that Elimelech and his family did not look upon it as a chastening rod in the hand of the Lord God. But they found that they could not escape affliction, for God did visit it upon them after they arrived in the land of Moab, in the midst of idolaters. "And Elimelech, Naomi's husband, died; and she was left, and her two sons." Notwithstanding God had a wise purpose in their going from Israel to Moab, yet all this was unknown to them at the time, and their conduct savored more of selfishness than of submission to the will of God and acknowledgment of his righteous judgments, which was reprehensible in them. It is probable that their departure was at the time when the Midianites oppressed Israel, and carried off the fruits of their land. But it was their duty, instead of fleeing to a land of idolaters, to have faced the enemy, stood firmly to their post, and endured affliction with the people of God. Although Elimelech and his sons died in the land of Moab, where God had purposed that they should die, and thus bring about the union of Boaz and Ruth, and thereby further the manifestation of God's glory, yet it did not justify Elimelech in his disobedience. God left him to act out the selfish feelings of his heart, and there is no evidence that he was prompted by any other feeling. Consequently his course was as reprehensible as though God had had no purpose in the transaction or occurrence.

An inheritance was involved in the affair, as matters were overruled by the governing hand of God, in which Ruth was manifested with the chosen people of God, and became the wife of Boaz, through the lineage of whom came Jesus, the Savior of Jew and Gentile. "And Boaz begat Obed, and Obed begat Jesse, and Jesse begat David." Of Jesus it is written that he was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, and sprang out of Judah. Thus the circumstances attending Ruth, the Moabitish woman, and her removal to the land of Canaan, together with the events as a whole, are fraught with lessons of instruction, setting forth the infinite wisdom, almighty power and sovereign will of God in the certain accomplishment of his eternal purpose, which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord. All the dealings of God with his children, all that occurs in the earth, all that occurs with us, all we see from day to day, is but the accomplishment of the eternal will and purpose of God, who doeth according to his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou? He hath declared the end from the beginning, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure. Even the wrath of man shall praise him, and the remainder of wrath he will restrain.

After the death of her husband and two sons, Naomi hears how that the Lord had visited his people in giving them bread. So she arose with her daughters-in-law, that she might return from the country of Moab. O how deeply must she have felt her lonely condition, bereft of her husband and sons, a stranger in a strange land. Her return is attended with different exercises from those under which she left. She had left the goodly land, the land of promise, and had found that there was no place for her except the very land from which she had gone out. Her daughters-in-law, Orpah and Ruth, manifested a desire to accompany her, but she entreated them to go back to their mother, saying, "The Lord deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with the dead, and with me. The Lord grant you that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband." Then Naomi kissed them, and they lifted up their voice and wept. While both Orpah and Ruth said, "Surely we will return with thee to thy people," yet there was a difference in them, as the sequel proved. Orpah kissed her mother-in-law again, and returned to her own mother and to her gods. But how different with Ruth, who could not be dissuaded from accompanying this Israelite. She would cling to Naomi. It must be that she had some knowledge of the God of Israel, and that her heart had turned from the gods of the Moabites. She was not simply willing to forsake her native land, her earthly friends and their idol gods, but earnestly pressed her very touching supplication, that she might go to the land of Canaan, and with the house of Jacob worship the true God, the God of Israel. "And Ruth said, Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me." When Naomi saw that she was steadfastly minded to go with her, she left off speaking unto her.

But how different was the case with Orpah, who returned to her mother's house and to her idol gods. One may manifest much love for the people of God, and much zeal for the cause of truth; but when some discouragement is placed before them, the truth is made manifest that their flaming zeal and pretended love were without any real foundation in the heart. "But he that receiveth the seed into stony places, the same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it; yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for awhile: for when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the word, by and by he is offended." But Ruth gave incontestible evidence that her desires were deeply rooted in the heart, and that she could not be turned from her purpose to leave idolaters, and to live and die and be buried with the people of the true and living God.

Naomi and Ruth, companions in tribulation, widows indeed, start on their journey together to the land of Israel and the house of bread. "And it came to pass, when they were come to Bethlehem, that all the city was moved about them, and they said, Is this Naomi? And she said unto them, Call me not Naomi [that is, Pleasant], call me Mara [that is, Bitter]: for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me. I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me home again empty: why then call ye me Naomi, seeing the Lord hath testified against me, and the Almighty hath afflicted me?" She had been humbled under the mighty hand of her God. She realized that the Lord had testified against her. She was brought back emptied, stripped, humbled, submissive, acknowledging the chastening hand of the righteous God. O how wonderful and precious is that grace which makes the saints submissive to the will of the Father of mercies and God of all grace.

But the inheritance of the family of Elimelech was not destroyed, although it must be redeemed, and that by a kinsman. "And Naomi had a kinsman of her husband's, a mighty man of wealth, of the family of Elimelech, and his name was Boaz. And Ruth, the Moabitess, said unto Naomi, Let me now go to the field, and glean ears of corn after him, in whose sight I shall find grace. And she said unto her, Go, my daughter." She did find grace in his sight, and eventually became his wife.

In the going out of Ruth from the land of Moab we see an exhibition of that same faith which was in Abraham, who went out of his native land and from his kindred, at the command of God, not knowing whither he went. The bride of Isaac also followed the servant of Abraham to the land of his master. God overruled the whole matter, controlled every circumstance, and the whole was the result of his purpose, and shows the handiwork of God, who is "wonderful in counsel and excellent in working." Ruth gave evidence while in the land of Moab of the operation of living faith in her heart, which led her to the worship of the true and living God. "Thy God shall be my God." "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee. My flesh and my heart faileth: but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion forever." In this frame of mind Ruth reaches the land of Israel, there to dwell, no more as a stranger and foreigner, but as the bride of Boaz, and a member of the family of Israel. But before she is put into possession of this gracious privilege, she is left to glean for a time in the field of this nobleman of Israel. But it did not fill her heart and mind with vain resolutions as to what she would do in consideration of this distinguishing favor; but the grace or favor of Boaz produced meekness, humility and wonder. It led her to exclaim, with her face in the dust, "Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldst take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger?" She was not left to glean from the ordinary droppings, but the master of the harvest commanded the reapers to drop now and then handfuls specially for her. She being a stranger, and also a Moabite, might well call the favor an act of grace; and it was well calculated to awaken within her profound wonder, heartfelt thanks and true gratitude to the giver. But we see her no more a mourning widow gleaning in the field of a stranger, but dwelling with and one of the commonwealth of Israel, and the rejoicing bride of Boaz, enjoying with him the blessings of that inheritance which is hers by virtue of her union to him. The message to the believing Gentiles is, "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God." When we consider our wretched condition in sin, our alienation from God, our condemnation under his holy law, and our deliverance therefrom by the great Redeemer, like Ruth, we can but wonder and rejoice that the Lord should take knowledge of us, and manifest his grace unto us. Let us remember our fallen and alienated state, and adore the wisdom, power and love which have delivered us. All the saints "were by nature the children of wrath, even as others." While in their unregenerate state they were ignorant of the fact that they neither knew God nor themselves. Though they may have heard of Jesus with the hearing of the natural ear, yet they knew nothing of him in his real character as the Mediator, nor of God in his divine perfections and in the holiness of his law. But the communication of spiritual life unto them enabled them to see and feel and know him, and that all their righteousnesses were as filthy rags; that the holy law of God condemned them. They can have no knowledge of their interest in Christ until the Spirit of adoption is sent forth into their hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Upon their receiving the comfortable evidence that they have passed from death unto life, they desire to dwell among the people of God. The church of God, the doctrine and ordinances of the gospel, have charms for them. Unworthy as they feel themselves to be, they desire a place among the saints, and the sweet words of Ruth are in their heart, "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee," &c. The God of Jacob is the God in whom they desire to trust. In him they see all perfection. In him, shining through Christ Jesus, they behold awful majesty, justice and power, blended with love, mercy and pardon to the vilest of the vile. Here they see that mercy and truth have met together, and righteousness and peace have kissed each other. The God who can have compassion on the weak, the ignorant, the tempted, and those who are out of the way, is the God to whom they are drawn. To him they look, in him they trust, and have nowhere else to go, for he has the words of eternal life. His ways are ways of truth and righteousness, and they long to sit down under his shadow, and eat of the fruit of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God.

These are considerations which occupy the mind of those who are translated from the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of grace. These behold a wonderful beauty in the ordinances of the gospel kingdom, and in the assemblies of the saints, and with them they wish to live and to die. "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after, that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple." These ties and affections are spiritual. They are deeply written in the heart by the finger of God, and nothing can erase them. In all their ups and downs in this time state, with all their doubts and fears, the work of God's grace remains, and all those who are exercised by it in time shall rejoice in it in eternity.

ELDER S. H. DURAND—DEAR BROTHER:—Inclosed you will find a letter written some weeks ago for publication in the SIGNS. After reviewing it, it seemed so imperfect, and in some places liable to be understood to mean what I did not intend, that I did not send it. Since receiving the last number of the SIGNS, I have concluded to send it to you. If you knew my opportunities for writing, having to labor daily to support my family, with the many cares involved in providing for them, together with many other harassing surroundings, you would make much allowance for my imperfect scribbling. I hope it will not weary your patience.

A dark cloud seems to be hovering over Zion; but I have so often learned in my experience that Jesus often comes to us upon the storm-tossed wave with the glorious assurance, "It is I; be not afraid," that I try to wait and hope and trust in him, believing that all shall work for good. I have seen in this country a large majority of the Baptists go into the error of Arminianism, and leave but a remnant, and O how dark and trying seemed that hour. But when it was discovered that a large portion of that remnant held to the two-seed and non-resurrection heresy, and must be cut off, it seemed dark indeed. Here it was plain that to contend for the faith was to cause another division, and probably cut off many of the dear children of God who had been carried away with this heresy, which eats as doth a canker; and the enemy of all righteousness suggested, "You are wrong. You will annihilate the cause of God. You will rend in pieces and destroy the people you profess to love." How dark was that hour! Human strength failed; but the Lord, whose fan is in his hand, purged his floor, and gathered his wheat into his garner. The sun broke forth upon that little handful which had been twice purged, and the Lord added to them, until now that little band is a large association, after dismissing churches to form another, and could form yet another. But where are those who went out from among us? Gone into the utmost extremes of worldly religion. How plainly now the hand of God can be seen in the separation. The recent controversies on predestination on the one hand, and the new birth on the other, have reminded me of late of these trying times. Let us stand in the old way, and inquire for the old paths, and walk therein, let whoever may depart.

I received your letter, and should have answered it, but have neglected to do so.

Yours in love,

C. W. ANDERSON.

DUTTON, Ark.

I HAVE often been impressed to write upon different subjects for the SIGNS, but as often feared that I was prompted by selfish ambition rather than the good of my Master's cause. A servant of Jesus should seek not to serve self, but his Lord, being bought with a price; but a fear that he might be prompted by selfish motives would not be a valid excuse for neglecting or refusing to obey the injunction, "As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God."—1 Peter iv. 10. Neither is a fear of causing controversy a lawful excuse for not contending earnestly for the faith. Some seem to think that nothing of a controversial character should be admitted into papers published for christian correspondence, nor arise between ministers, churches or brethren; but this would seem to be contrary to the purpose of God, that "There must be also heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest."—1 Cor. xi. 19. How made manifest, if it is not by contending for the truth against error? But while we contend, and that earnestly, too, it is not necessary to use harsh and insulting words, for the people of God differ sometimes.—Gal. ii. 11-14. In all cases where brethren differ, one or the other is wrong. Fearful thought, "Lord, is it I?" Nevertheless, as dear old brother Mitchell once said, "The strongest rebuke that should be given to a brother should be in the meekness and gentleness of Christ."—2 Cor. x. 1.

Several years ago the question of the new birth became a matter of serious inquiry with me. The question was not agitated among the brethren here at the time, but I became much concerned about the meaning of the words of our Lord, "Ye must be born again." There seemed to me to be something unsatisfactory in the long-accepted notion among the brethren here that the soul or some part of the natural or Adamic man is born over and changed from natural to spiritual in the second birth. While I was unable to say what was truth in regard to this matter, my experience seemed to force me to reject this conclusion, or relinquish the little hope that had been as an anchor to my soul in many a dark and stormy day—the only stay and prop that had held me above the awful abyss of despair; for "whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin."—1 John iii. 9. Yet I found myself at times wholly engaged in sinful thoughts and actions; and though my heart would afterward smite me, yet at the time, if there was anything about me that did not participate, I could not discern it. When Peter cursed and swore, and denied his Master, and even pretended that he could not understand what they were talking about (Luke xxii. 60), where was the new man, the one born of God? "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit."—John iii. 8. Not that the Spirit of which he is born is like the wind, according to the common interpretation of these words, but the one born of the Spirit; "so is every one."

But to return. My mind became so much impressed, and I was so much concerned, that I read everything I could get hold of upon the subject. I found in my old volumes of the SIGNS that brethren Dudley, Beebe and others held a different view of the subject, but I could not then for my life understand them. In my dire confusion, sad distress, and intense desire to know the truth relative to this matter, when all the different sources of information seemed to fail, the thought occurred (why not sooner?), "Ask of God, that giveth to all liberally, and upbraideth not."—James i. 5. I hardly need add that if I ever besought the Lord earnestly for knowledge of the truth relative to any subject, that subject was the new birth; and the thought occurred, Why not consult the word of the Lord? In reading the third chapter of John the subject was presented to my mind in a different shape from what I had ever viewed it before. I had never thought before that more than a very few verses of this chapter pertained to the new birth. In my former view the eighth verse, in reference to the blowing of the wind, might possibly pertain to the subject, but I could not understand how; while the thirteenth verse, which declares that "no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven," must certainly pertain to some other subject. But as it now presented itself to my view, these two verses, in connection with the sixth verse, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit," instead of being seemingly unimportant to a correct understanding of the subject, became the key to unlock the whole mystery. These three verses, when considered in their proper connection, pointed my mind to a knowledge of the two different and distinct headships, a natural and a spiritual, to each of which the Christian sustains a birth relationship. Without considering the second birth in connection with these distinct relationships, no man can arrive at a correct understanding of this great mystery. It is also highly essential to remember that while the Christian sustains a relationship to two federal heads, a first and second Adam, and derives a nature from each, yet he is essentially one being. The order of his manifestation in these two natures is also of the utmost importance. He is first a natural being. He bears first the image of the earthly, and shall also bear the image of the heavenly. "That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual."—1 Cor. xv. 46. He being manifested first in his earthly nature, and endowed with the natural sense of understanding, is addressed in this nature, and informed that he must be born again. He has been born once, of corruptible seed; he must be born again, of incorruptible seed. Nothing is clearer to my view than that the whole tenor of the Scriptures teaches that God from eternity purposed to manifest his people, whose names were written in the book of life, first of a corruptible seed; that they by their own disobedience should forfeit their right to existence in this corruptible state and return to the dust; that by their own act they should lose their natural, corruptible life, their earthly inheritance; and that by the gift of God they should be brought into possession of eternal life, an incorruptible inheritance. The worm passes through different states from the egg to the butterfly; but its identity is the same in its different forms of egg, larva, chrysalis and butterfly. It is difficult for us to understand how that disgusting and filthy-looking worm in its caterpillar state could be the same as yon beautiful butterfly; but it is nevertheless. All nature illustrates this wonder-change in form, yet strict preservation of identity. That tall oak, which has stood seemingly in defiance of the storms of centuries, was once an insignificant acorn, which a little child might eat; and even man himself in his natural state passes through changes seemingly incredible, if we did not know it were so. Behold that little infant. Now turn your eyes away for a half-century. Look again. Tell me, is that tall figure, bending with age, his hair all gray, the same? Seemingly impossible! Yet we know that it is true. Thus "the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made."—Rom. i. 20. Let us then remember that while by the predestination of God his people must first be born of the flesh and bear the image of the earthly, they shall also be born of the Spirit and bear the image of the heavenly; that God has predestinated them to be conformed to the image of his Son.—Rom. viii. 29. "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. 11. "Therefore, brethren," the apostle reasons, "we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh. For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." See how the apostle uses the pronoun "ye," as referring to the individual who might live after his fleshly nature, and die to his enjoyment of spiritual life in this world, or by his spiritual nature mortify the deeds of his fleshly nature and live. Thus the warfare. But while the outer man perisheth, the inner man is renewed day by day, until finally "it is sown a natural body," and "it is raised a spiritual body;" then is mortality swallowed up of life. "I give unto them eternal life." They sing, "Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us." Eternal, spiritual life needed no redemption. It is created, fallen, redeemed beings, with eternal life given to them; not eternal spirits with a creature appendage. As they are manifested first by a natural birth, how can it be said that "the starting point is from the spiritual, not from the natural?" Does not this flatly contradict the declaration of the apostle, "Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural?"—1 Cor. xv. 46. Hence it is said unto them, "Ye must be born again;" "Repent ye;" "Ye shall live," &c. The erroneous notion that the Adamic nature or some part of it is changed and made spiritual in the new birth, should not drive us to an opposite extreme. Because the Adamic nature is not changed immediately into spiritual, we should not therefore be led to deny that the being who now possesses only a natural existence by a natural birth shall also possess a spiritual existence or life by a spiritual birth. Here is the great mystery. This is seemingly the hardest thing in the world for men to understand. It seems to be precisely what Nicodemus stumbled at. When Jesus said, "Ye must be born again," he seems to infer that his corporeal substance must re-enter his mother's womb and be born over, if it is he. He asks, "How can a man be born when he is old?" Jesus informs him that he must be born of the Spirit, and that "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." It were as if he had said, "Nicodemus, you must be born again. Not this earthy nature or flesh of yours, which you speak of waxing old; that is not you. When God created man he made him in his own image, and he is invisible; but when he formed man he formed him of the dust of the ground, breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul. Became? Yes; man, in taking a material form, became a living soul. Your fleshly nature, your natural form, is not all there is of you. You must be born again." As I have, before shown, a being may have one form now, and pass into another form without losing its identity—its individual selfhood. Why is it not proper, then, to say that a being, a creature that has been born of the flesh, shall be born again, be born of the Spirit, and that his spiritual nature developed in his spiritual birth should as the leaven change the whole ultimately to spiritual—yes, change our vile body, and fashion it like unto his glorious body, by the working of his mighty power, where-with he is able to subdue all things unto himself?

Some object to the expression contemplated for by Elder Durand in the SIGNS for January, 1888, that "the sinner must be born again," upon the ground that this involves the idea that the Adamic nature is changed and made spiritual in the spiritual birth. Yet those who make this objection speak of the children of God in their spiritual and in their earthly standing, the same beings, of course, in either standing. The Scriptures teach that "that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual." It is proper, as all agree, to speak of them in either nature. As they are developed first in their earthly standing, in which they are sinners, we speak of them (the sinners) in this standing, and say they must be born again. The method of reasoning which would deny the correctness of brother Durand's position, that it is proper to say that sinners are born again, would, if carried to its legitimate ends, force us to the conclusion that it is also improper to say that sinners are saved, are redeemed, or that any promise in the Scriptures is made to sinners. When our Master said, "Ye must be born again," he spoke to a sinner, and to all sinners that have been or will be the subjects of that birth. It is a species of rationalism and abstruse metaphysical reasoning that would fright us away from the legitimate meaning of the words of our Lord. To take it in its legitimate meaning, that sinners like Nicodemus must be born again, does not involve the idea, as brother Durand has abundantly shown, that the Adamic nature is changed and made spiritual in the spiritual birth.

After the doctrine of the new birth was opened to my view, though a great mystery, it has seemed to me the most glorious theme ever presented to the vision of fallen man. It is the appointed means through which fallen, ruined, corruptible and corrupted beings, who have borne the image of the earthly, shall also bear the image of the heavenly, and be conformed to and bear the image of Jesus to all eternity. But it is a great mystery, the hidden wisdom of God in a mystery, which God ordained before the world unto our glory, and one in regard to which brethren ought to exercise forbearance with brethren. At the time above referred to, when I could not understand brethren Beebe and others, I was not in the least offended at them, though I regarded their views, as an old brother used to say, as "a mystification mystified." After my understanding was opened to understand the Scriptures upon this subject, I saw plainly that these brethren were in accord with the teaching of inspiration and christian experience, and I was glad that I had been kept from opposing (as brethren often do) a view simply because I could not understand it. Take heed, brethren, lest we by prejudice be found fighting against the truth.

C. W. ANDERSON.

SCALESVILLE, Ind., June 3, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Having finished the business part of my letter, I feel a desire to write something to God's people, those dear little lambs that hardly dare claim an interest in the blood of him who bled and died that we, his children, might live.

Dear little ones, how stands the account with you this morning? Can you say, All is well; I know that I am on my way to the better land; I have done all that is required of me; I have done so much good by keeping my body under subjection and living up to the commandments God has given, that he is under obligation to me; therefore I have nothing to fear; only I must watch myself, and see that I keep the account square, and not fall from grace? Can you say, I know there is laid up for me a starry crown, to which I expect to still add more stars by my good works? O no, says the poor child of God; I have not got along that way; that is not the road I travel in. I have tried all my good works, and they seemed to avail me nothing. The more I worked, the deeper in debt I seemed to get, until I seemed to be ten thousand talents in debt, and had not one cent to pay. O! I felt so terribly poor, so very weak, so blind, so lame, so sinful, so undeserving of the least or smallest favors of even natural men and women, let alone the notice of him who has made all things for his own glory. O yes, says the poor child, the time was once with me when I verily believed that I could turn to God, repent of my sins, of my own free will and choice; and I verily believed that by so doing God would be under obligation to pardon my sins and give me a receipt for the same, which would be my passport to heaven. But when God's time came to show me that I was a sinner, I tried all my good works, and to my surprise I found that "To him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt." "By grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast." When I was made to see "that in me, that is, in my flesh, there dwelleth no good thing," I began to feel that to will was present with me, but how to perform that which is good I found not. The good I would, I did not; but the evil that I would not, that I did. Yes, says the dear little lamb, I have been all along this road; and just at the end of my own strength, when Sinai's law was poured on my guilty soul, and exacted payment, which I could now see was just, the Red Sea was before me (my sins), and Pharaoh's hosts (the world) behind me. I was made to stand still, and see the salvation of God. O that critical moment! Will you ever forget that eventful time? You stood, as it were, trembling in every joint, listening to hear that awful sentence (you being judge yourself would pronounce), Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. But Jesus of Nazareth passed that way, and stilled the tempest, saying, "Peace, be still." "Be not afraid; it is I." Dear child of God, he paid the debt for you, and for me, and for all that shall ever believe on his name. This being the case, what is our duty to him and to one another? All we have and are belongs to him. Then should we not try to glorify him in our bodies and spirits, which are the Lord's? Well, says some poor, trembling child of God, I have been thinking I would like to honor my Savior; but I am so weak and unworthy that I do greatly fear that, should I make the attempt, I would bring reproach on the cause, and dishonor him thereby. Leave that matter in the hands of the Lord, and for your brethren to judge. Go home to your friends and tell them what the Lord has done for you. Take up your cross and be baptized.

Dear brethren, I had no thought of writing on the subject of christian experience when I commenced, but only thought of speaking of some of my own short-comings, and what a poor, sinful, rebellious creature I am. Twenty-five years ago day after tomorrow I went before the church and told them some of the dealings of the Lord with me. I was received, and was baptized in July following, and have had a name with them ever since. At that time

"I thought my trials over,
And all my troubles gone;
That joy and peace and pleasure
Would be my lot alone."

But O how different has been my lot. Darkness, bewilderment, and almost despair, hunger, thirst, blindness, deafness, lameness, nakedness and shame have been the fruits of my rebellion. That is what I have got for it. The subject of preaching the word has been much on my mind from my earliest experience, and I have been (shall I say it?) foolish enough to try it a few times, and have made such blunders and failures that I think the brethren have a right to be ashamed of me, for I am ashamed of myself. Last Saturday was our meeting day. At the invitation of our preaching brethren I made the attempt to say something, and made such a miserable failure that I was satisfied for awhile that there was nothing in it; that is, that it was not the Lord's work; for I am fully satisfied that he can make a preacher out of the most ignorant man, if it is his pleasure. Therefore on Sunday I refused, and ever since then, till I began to write, I have been in a miserable fix in my mind, wishing at times that the Lord might kill me, so that I would not have any more trouble about the matter, nor bring reproach on his cause; for I do not feel able or sufficient for these things, and yet I cannot get rid of the impressions of my mind. O, my brethren, I have prayed for the will of the Lord to be done, and that he would make my duty plain to me, and give me grace and courage to discharge the same. Sometimes I have thought that he has said to me, "My grace is sufficient." At other times I have prayed for my will to be done; that the Lord would let me be at ease, and not require any more from me or at my hand than he did of other members, so that I could go to meeting and sit and listen to preaching, and go home with a clear conscience. O what wicked thoughts I have had since Saturday! At times it has been suggested to my mind that there is no God; or if there is, he is more unjust than mortal man; for why would he require at the hands of one of his creatures something that he knew it was not able to perform? The powers of hell have seemed to take hold on me, so much so that I cannot give any one a pleasant answer or word.

"Can one who is a christian
Have such a heart as mine?
I fear I never witnessed
The effects of love divine."

Now, brethren, these are some of the exercises of my mind. I feel as though I ought to be willing to leave my case in the hands of God and his people; and at times I am willing, but I fear that I cannot make the brethren understand my case, and thereby cause them to place too high an estimate on the way I have been exercised, and thus cause them to err in their judgment. I know it is impossible to deceive God, or for him to err in his judgment. He is too good to be unkind, and too wise to err. Worse and worse myself I see; and yet (can I say it?) the Lord remembers me. This I can say of a truth, He remembers all his children, and in disobedience chastises them. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." "If ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons." Brethren, there is no chastisement for the present that seemeth joyous, but rather grievous; but afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness.

Should this be published, I hope you, brethren Beebe, will correct mistakes. Should any dear, little child of God be encouraged or benefited in any way, give all the praise to God; for I am nothing but a poor, old sinner, saved by grace, if saved at all. I feel to be the least of all saints, if a saint at all. Should any one wish to correspond with me by private letter, I will gladly give them any information concerning my christian experience, or South Fork Church, which shall lay in my power. I want to know if there is any one like me.

Your brother in great tribulation, if a brother at all,

C. C. HEATH.

MR. F. W. KEENE—DEAR SIR:—

It would be impossible to tell you with what varied emotions I have read and re-read your precious letter. It was my duty, and I think I would have felt it a privilege, to answer it immediately, if I had not so fully realized my inability and ignorance in attempting a reply, for I feel as though I know nothing as I ought.

In your letter you address me as your "sister in Jesus." Would that I dared claim that beautiful and holy relationship! But how can I? If you knew me as I know myself, you surely would never have called me "sister."

"Can one who is a christian
Have such a heart as mine?
Surely I never witnessed
The effects of love divine."

You ask me to tell you of some of the Lord's dealings with me, and how I am prospering in the things of the Lord Jesus Christ. How shall I answer such questions? Did I give you reason to think that I am indeed among those who are taught of the Lord? I surely did not mean to do so, and greatly fear that I said something wrong—something that I did not intend, and have deceived you, a man of God. Let me try to tell you a little about myself.

Like all persons who have heard and know the meaning of the words sin, death, heaven and hell, I have had from my earliest recollection awful and serious thoughts of death and eternity, and what my portion would be in the future state; but I always tried to banish such thoughts as quickly as possible by promising that after I had enjoyed the pleasures of sin for only a little while longer I would become a christian. True to the carnal nature, I thought that I could work out just such a righteousness as my soul needed, and could begin the good work at any time I pleased. I never tried, however, until some six or seven years ago. At that time I was at school, and a great religious excitement broke out among the students, especially among those who attended the New School Baptist meetings. Thinking of all my past resolutions, and fearing that I might put off repentance until it should be eternally too late, I determined to make a start in the christian life. I think at that time I had a desire to be a christian, but had no realization of being the awful sinner in the sight of the just and holy God that I now know I am. It is true, certain sins of thought and deed that I had committed in times past would rise up before me and mock me, but still I did not realize that every imagination of the thoughts of my heart was and is only evil continually; and I thought that I could rebuild waste places, and wash myself in snow water. It is needless to tell of all my struggles at that time; how I tried to exercise living faith, lay hold on the promises, &c. Suffice it to say that through them all I trusted in my own strength. About this time the subject of baptism began to be discussed by my class-mates. Several of them had expressed a hope in Jesus, and they wished to go before the church, but this they were unwilling to do unless I would accompany them. The minister who served that church, and many friends, urged this upon me as my duty, telling me that the reason I did not experience the happiness of which others spoke was because I was unwilling to obey the command of the Savior. At last I yielded to their entreaties, went before the church, told—I know not what, and was received and immersed. Then what a Pharisaical life I began to lead, praying much and often, reading set portions of Scripture daily, &c., hoping that I would be heard for my much speaking, and rewarded for my many good deeds. I do not know when I first began to see myself as I really am. During the first year after I joined the church I was often in trouble, because I felt that in spite of all my good resolutions I was growing worse instead of better, as I fondly expected. Then, as time passed on, I began to see such corruptions in my nature as I never dreamed of. How deeply and continually I sinned, often struggling, it is true, but only sinking deeper into sin, until I was compelled to exclaim again and again, "Unclean!" Surely I have been brought to see that all my righteousness is as filthy rags, and that in myself dwelleth no good thing.

"There was ne'er a heart so base,
So false as mine has been,
So faithless to its promises,
So prone to every sin."

I know and feel that

"If my soul is sent to hell,
God's righteous law approves it well."
But though I am a castaway, yet I can and do rejoice that there is a people loved with an everlasting love, and saved with an everlasting salvation; a people kept by the power of God, who shall not come into condemnation, but have passed from death unto life. "Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord?" Like you, I shall never forget our first meeting at Elder Purington's. What a wonderful story you told that evening, and how marvelous in my eyes! I have thought of it a hundred times since, and every time it seems more wonderful. Those words that Elder Beebe said to you when you went before the church are ringing in my ears yet. "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord; wherefore standest thou without?" What a new and delightful meaning you gave to those words. How good it seemed to me to listen to that preaching at Hopewell. Although I have always lived in this part of the country, where Old School Baptists are probably as numerous as anywhere, yet that was almost the first gospel preaching I ever heard. How comforting it would have been if I could only have partaken of some of the crumbs which fell from the Master's table; but I felt that there was no part nor lot for me. I have been wondering a little just now why people will say that if they believed as Old School Baptists do they would certainly go on in all kinds of sin. It seems to me that the sweet hope that eternal happiness is already secured is the one thing above all others that inspires the heart with love toward the Giver of such untold good. Can one love the world, or the things of the world, when he is made to see that he is an heir of God, and a joint heir with Jesus Christ? I think not.

I have not written as I intended when I started this letter. I have covered a good many pages, and yet have told you very little of what I wanted to. I am admonished, however, both by the lateness of the hour and the length of this letter, to bring it to a close. I certainly feel unworthy of such kindness, but if you will write to me again I will try to answer sooner than I have this time.

Yours sincerely and gratefully,
ELLA MCCONNELL.

GRANBURY, TEXAS, May 21, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I am seated to write a few lines to the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, which I receive regularly once a week. I am well pleased with it, and it does me good to read the communications from the dear brethren and sisters in different parts of the United States and Canada. I read sister Coddington's letter in the SIGNS, and it did me much good. What a wonderful God is ours, who "Plants his footsteps in the sea,

And rides upon the storm."

I feel at times a desire to write to the dear people of God; but I know that I am ignorant of much of God's goodness, and fear that my writings would crowd out better matter. As I am but a babe in Christ, I feel that I need to be instructed, and not to instruct. I know I desire the sincere milk of the word, and that I understand to be the truth as it is in Jesus, and not the husks which the swine do eat. At times I get very low, and feel that I am not worthy to eat the crumbs that fall from my Master's table. But God's everlasting arms are underneath, and he is sure and steadfast. When I would do good, evil is present with me. I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, there dwells no good thing. To will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good I find not. O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God that I am not my own keeper, for I could not keep myself one hour. Surely God's goodness and mercy have followed me all my life, or I should have been cut off from the earth long ago. I have rolled sin as a sweet morsel under my tongue, and have trampled God's holy law under my feet, for nearly twenty-seven years. But thanks be to God, Jesus died to save sinners, of whom I am chief, as said Paul. I sometimes hope that my name was written in the Lamb's book of life before the world began; but my pathway seems very dim at times, and I almost lose sight of it. Last November I was made to trust in the Lord for salvation, and sing praise to his holy name. A new song was put into my mouth, even praise to God and the Lamb that was slain. I wish I could write what I feel to-day. The Lord has visited me again, and given me the oil of gladness and joy for mourning. O how thankful I feel to him, who giveth all things to his people, who are the called according to his purpose, that they may show forth his praise. We know that every good and perfect gift comes down from above, from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness nor shadow of turning. I went to hear various denominations preach, for I wanted to know the truth; but I could find none but the "old Hard Shells," as they are called, that preached the truth. I knew that if all the lo heres and lo theres were right, I had the wrong Bible, or else I was blind and yet in my sins. The Bible seemed like a new and different book to what it formerly had. I understand the church to be but one; for she is the only one of her mother. She is undefiled. Her robe is spotless. This is the church that Christ redeemed. All except this one teach that salvation is by works, or by the obedience of the creature.

I have written more than I had any idea of writing when I began. I will just say in conclusion that I went before the church at Acton, on Saturday before the first Sunday in April, and told them what I hoped the Lord had done for me, as best I could. I hardly know what I told them, but they received me, and I was baptized on the first Sunday in May, in the fellowship of the Regular Old School Baptist Church at that place, by Elder W. L. Rogers, whom I firmly believe to be a true servant of the living God.

Brethren, I ask for your prayers, for I feel the need of them. I am afflicted with neuralgia and liver disease, but hope I may recover. I have been in bad health for over a year; but I know the Lord will not put upon me more than I can bear. I know the Lord's people are an afflicted and poor people. I would like to hear from any of the brethren or sisters who may feel like writing to me.

Your brother, in hope of the resurrection,

W. J. RAY.

TYRONE, Ky., July 4, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I was highly pleased with brother Benjamin White's letter in the SIGNS of June 19th, 1889, to a friend. If I know anything about the truth, I know what brother White has written is the truth; and I think he has produced Scripture enough to prove that there is no condition in the work of salvation. It seems to me that brother White has produced proof enough to satisfy the mind of any man of a rational mind. But the apostle Paul says, "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Again, "The carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." If that friend that brother White has written to has not been born of the Spirit of God, he will never believe what he wrote to him. We may just as well try to stop the wind from blowing, as to try to convince one that has never had these things revealed unto them. God says, by the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel (xi. 19), "And I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you; and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them a heart of flesh." Now is there any condition in this? I for one will answer, No. But their so-called preachers will tell unregenerate sinners to come and give their hearts to God, when God says he will give them one heart. God does not have to consult the sinner, to see whether he is willing or not; for he says that all his people shall be willing in the day of his power. He has only to speak, and it is done; to command, and it stands fast. He will never give spiritual life to any but his own; and it makes no difference where they are, or what their color is, be they as black as the tents of Kedar. He will know them. They do not have to be trained up in the Sunday School to love him, for he says, "I have

"THY DEAD MEN SHALL LIVE."

(Concluded from last number.)

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Will you please give your views through the SIGNS on the text, Isaiah xxvi. 19, and oblige an old sinner?

Yours, sometimes in hope of eternal life,

I. N. BAILEY.

LAMAR CO., Texas, July 2, 1889.

REPLY.

"Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead."—Isa. xxvi. 19.

"Together with my dead body shall they arise." A literal application of this declaration to the resurrection of the crucified body of Jesus from the sepulchre in which it was laid, would lead to the heresy of Hymeneus and Philetus, by which the faith of some was overthrown, in "saying that the resurrection is past already."—2 Tim. ii. 17, 18. This would also destroy the hope of every saint who has lived on earth since the ascension of our Lord. In the fact that God hath raised Jesus from the dead, Paul says "he hath given assurance unto all men" that "he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained."—Acts xvii. 31. It is unquestionably true that Jesus has died and has risen from the dead to die no more. Certainly those saints have not yet experienced that resurrection, who even now groan under the burden of sin which still works in their members. Therefore it cannot be in that sense that they are "risen with Christ." There is a sense, however, in which all the ransomed people of God are indeed risen with him, and they arose only as his dead body. When Jesus as the life of his body, which includes every subject of electing love, laid down his life for them, "then were all dead." Abel and all the chosen vessels of mercy who had gone from mortality before that time, and all the saints who shall be brought into manifestation to the end of time, each and all were included in that one deliverance from condemnation, and in the resurrection of Jesus Christ they were forever raised above all the demands of the law of sin and death. This is our understanding of the fulfillment of the word of the Lord in our text. Until "Jesus died and rose again," there was no manifestation of the way in which sinners could be justified and made "holy and without blame" before God in love. It is not merely the restoration of natural life to those who were literally dead, as in the case of Lazarus; for in that life they would have been still subject to death under the law. In their Redeemer they are risen to walk in newness of life. In this life they are no more under the law, because they "are become dead to the law by the body of Christ." So Paul says, "For sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace."—Rom. vi. 14. Of this miraculous work of God in translating his people from death and darkness into the life and light of the kingdom of Christ, it is impossible that the natural man should receive any knowledge. Even those in whom this wonderful grace is displayed can have no knowledge of it except as it is revealed through the spiritual power of faith. In their earthly nature they find nothing to justify the claim that they have the mind of Christ dwelling in them. Hence they are continually beset with doubts and questions as to the reality of the work which has produced their hope in the justifying righteousness of Jesus. Like two contending armies within them, they feel the opposing forces of unbelieving reason and the knowledge which is by faith. It is this warfare which causes them to groan, being burdened with a sense of indwelling sin, while they hunger and thirst after righteousness. They feel indeed that they are subject to vanity in the body of this death. By faith they know that they can have no hope but that in which they thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. When the Spirit brings assurance of their interest in that grace they do arise from the depth of their distress, and walk in the strength of that victory which is given them alone by the faith of the Son of God. All their life is in him.

"Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust." When oppressed under the power of unbelieving doubts and fears, the captive saints are like those who sleep in being unconscious of their true condition of complete victory as it is revealed in their triumphant Redeemer. The word of the Lord calls them to awake from that sleep to the realization of the fact that they are already "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." In that sleep they are troubled with dreams of righteousness to be found in their own works; and under the delusion of those dreams they struggle hard to array themselves in such a garment as will make them fit to appear in the presence of that God who is of purer eyes than to behold evil, and who cannot look on iniquity. From the horrid nightmare of this struggle the voice of their Lord calls them to awake. When aroused by his command it is always to sing the praises of that love which has delivered them. In obedience to the voice which has awakened them, they always sing in the spirit of the song recorded in this chapter, to which our text is the answer of the Lord. Since impregnable walls and bulwarks of salvation protect the city of our habitation, we may well sing joyfully the triumphant grace of our God, instead of dwelling in the dust of self-reliance, and looking to our own works for justification before God. Under the stupor and blindness of sleep, the saints forget that all their strength is in the God of their salvation. When awake to the knowledge of their safety under the protecting shadow of the Almighty, they know that all their own righteousnesses are but filthy rags. It is only when they sleep in the dust of self-dependence that they can be distressed with apprehension of the condemnation due to their own unrighteousness. The wily serpent feeds upon this dust, for God has given it as his meat (Isa. lxv. 25); and when the sleepy saints dwell in dust they must expect to find their adversary there, with his cruel accusations, like the serpent's fangs, ever ready to poison their peace with the envenomed suggestions of unbelief. Sleeping in this dust, it is not strange that they are overcome with doubts of their interest in the salvation which is in the Lord. Here they must sink in hopeless despair if not delivered by the omnipotence of that word of their Redeemer which calls them to awake. The song which they sing when thus awakened is full of rejoicing in the victory which the Lord has given them, and contains not one note of praise to their own valor or watchfulness. Like the song of Moses and Miriam when delivered at the Red Sea, it ascribes all praise to the arm of the Lord. Our God does not divide his glory with creature merit even in the temporal deliverance of his people from their distresses. He shows them their utter helplessness before he reveals his omnipotent grace in saving them out of their afflictions. His saints are not like the worshipers of idols, who must ascribe praises to their gods for what their own hands have done. Not only does our God bring salvation to them whose trust is in him, without any assistance on their part, but he has wrought all their works in them by his Spirit; so that all the praise is due to his grace in all things. Well has Paul declared that boasting is excluded by the law of faith. Our Lord says that even "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent."—John vi. 29. By his almighty word eternal life is given (not offered) to the dead; and they that hear his word shall live. There is no uncertainty in the declaration of this gracious truth as it is recorded in the Scriptures. It is exclusively dependent upon the sovereign will of God; and in every promise which he has given, as in our text, God has recorded the word of his grace loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving-kindness have I drawn thee." Then he loved them before there was ever a Sunday School invented; for the Sunday School is the invention of man. If those Sunday School teachers are what they profess to be (the disciples of Jesus), they are doing what he says they shall not do; for he says, "They shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for all shall know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them." But it is an evident fact that they are not his disciples, or they would not be doing as they do. I am not writing this to hurt the feelings of any one, for I have some very warm friends engaged in the Sunday School business. But if they will give me a "Thus saith the Lord" for it, I will say amen to it.

I know what I have written is very scattering, but I have to write just as it comes to my mind. I do hope and trust I have been taught in the school of Christ to know truth from error. Brethren, if you see anything in this worthy of space in your paper, you can publish it; if not, cast it to the flames, and all will be right.

Yours in hope of eternal life, and a sinner saved by grace, if saved at all,

J. J. WATERFILL.

SANFORD, Maine, Aug. 17, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I will say to you that we as a church feel more hopeful of the recovery of our pastor, Elder Wm. Quint, from his illness, and that the good Lord will raise him up, that he may once more go in and out before us all, and break to us the bread of life. We feel that he is in the Lord's hands, who will do all things well, and that all things are possible with God.

We would say to you that our family paper comes to us laden with rich truth by the grace of God, both through the editorials and correspondence; and may it please Almighty God to sustain you in your arduous duties in the future as in the past.

LEWIS BUTLER.

SOUTHAMPTON, Pa., Aug. 20, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have a book of four hundred pages now in press, entitled "Meditations on Portions of the Word," which will be ready by or before October 10th. It contains selected articles which I have published in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES and other periodicals since 1864, and which brethren have from time to time suggested that I should publish in book form. Price one dollar, on receipt of which the book will be sent to any address.

Your brother in the hope of the gospel,

without any condition to be fulfilled by those to whom it is given. The joyful assurance contained in this gospel of the merciful kindness of God toward the subjects of his grace, may well produce songs of adoration and rejoicing when they are awakened to realize their interest in the great blessing it proclaims. In prophetic language singing is always expressive of joy and thanksgiving. Their deliverance from dwelling in dust, and their establishment upon the solid rock of that salvation which is revealed in Jesus Christ, may well be celebrated with the new song of everlasting praise to our God. While we sojourn in Mesekh, and must still know experimentally what it is to "dwell in dust," "Let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear."

"For thy dew is as the dew of herbs." It is indeed wonderful to observe how the pen of inspiration brings from nature illustrations to represent to the saints the unspeakable riches of divine grace in the manifestation of the love of God to his chosen people. We may not be able to understand how the dew is made to minister to the development of the herbs in nature; but the fact that the herbs are revived by the cooling moisture of the dew is known to those who are familiar with the growth of natural vegetation. In this we can see a clear similitude of what every subject of grace has learned by experience. As the natural herbs need not understand the principle on which the dew is distilled in order to receive its nourishment, so the children of Zion are nourished by the dew of divine grace, even though they are not able clearly to understand the heavenly principle on which the doctrine of our God shall drop as the rain, and his speech shall distill as the dew. Its reviving power comes upon them without their effort, and is not governed by their own will. It is not in the power of mortals to produce the refreshing dew in nature, and so it is not by any works of their own that the saints receive this blessing of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. "So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy."—Rom. ix. 16. As the dew is given in the night season, it is a significant fact that while the illustration is frequently used in the prophetic and legal dispensation, it is not mentioned in the Scriptures which were written after the gospel day was ushered in by the rising of the Sun of righteousness in the glory of his kingdom. So, in the experience of the saints, it is only when they dwell in darkness that they receive the sweet comfort of the word of the Lord coming upon them as the gentle dew upon the tender herb. The Lord himself will be as the dew unto Israel, and he shall grow as the lily, and spread forth his roots as Lebanon.—Hosea xiv. 5. This is the way in which the Lord will heal their backsliding in loving them freely. If there were no night in nature there would be no time for vegetation to be revived by the dew; so the darkness is needful in the experience of the saints, that they may know the power of this heavenly dew of divine grace, by which they are made to grow in the strength of the Lord.

"And the earth shall cast out the dead." Under the typical dispensation, when this prophecy was written, the legal requirements of God are often presented as the heaven which was over that peculiar people to whom the Mosaic covenant was given, and that nation is in that sense called the earth. It appeared to finite intelligence impossible that the promise of God could be fulfilled, since the very "dead" who were embraced in that promise were buried in that earth of national Israel, and were under the same curse which rested upon all who heard the terrible voice of words thundered forth from blazing Sinai. The subjects of divine grace among the nation of Israel were justly condemned by the law, as well as all others to whom it spoke. From that hopeless state of death there was no created power which could deliver them. "For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse; for it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them."—Gal. iii. 10. As every revelation of the grace of God in the salvation of his people is contrary to all that can be seen by reason, so this wonderful promise is verified in a way which could not be devised by finite intelligence. In the rejection of our Redeemer by the nation of Israel that earth did cast out with him all the members of his body, who are the same dead of whom our text declares that they shall live. This will be the more evident if the text is read without the italicized word men, which is inserted in the first clause by the translators. In this last clause it is not said that all who are dead shall be cast out; but "the earth" (signifying the carnal nation of Israel) shall cast out "the dead," the same to whom the promise of life is given. The Captain of our salvation was and is despised and rejected of men, and so must all who "follow him," even to the end of time, be "cast out." Even their own heart condemns these "dead," and they confess that in themselves dwells no good thing. Yet the quickening word of God gives life to them, as was plainly declared by our Lord at the grave of Lazarus, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." As we understand the death in our text to signify the just condemnation of those specified, so they "shall live" in the justifying grace of their Redeemer, who has ransomed them from the power of the grave, and redeemed them from death. If they had not been dead, they could not have been redeemed from death.

While we have thus briefly given our understanding of the text, as requested by our esteemed brother Bailey, we wish to say distinctly that we have no question of the truth of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, as it is revealed in the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Of that crowning mystery of truth we do not claim to understand anything further than what is plainly recorded by inspiration. Yet without full confidence in its blessed assurance we are of all men most miserable. The very fact that God has revealed this truth as a mystery forbids the presumption of such as would investigate it and reduce it to a theory which may be taught to the natural mind of man, as the knowledge of earthly things is taught. May the Spirit of Christ lead all the saints into all truth, and to him be glory evermore. Amen.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GHENT, Ky., July 6, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I am in receipt of a letter from a dear sister who lives in the state of New York, and desires to be known as an "Earnest Inquirer," rather than by her name. In that letter she requests me to offer to her, and others who are seeking to know the truth, some thoughts through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on the third and fourth verses of the fourth chapter of Second Corinthians. If that dear sister had called to her aid an abler pen than mine, she evidently would have had given to her much greater light upon that subject than she had a right to expect from one who, like I am, is continually groping in the dark, and trying to pray for more of that light which is shed by the great Sun of Righteousness upon his people, which comes upon them with healing in its wings.

The apostle says, in the text referred to, "But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost: in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." Let us remember that the apostle commences this epistle by saying, "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in Achaia." This epistle was then addressed to the church of God at Corinth, and to all the saints which were in Achaia. Evidently at that early period in the gospel dispensation there were those who had gone into the church who had not on the wedding garment, who were not clad in the righteousness of the glorious Son of God. To them the gospel was hid. It is written, "And to the angel of the church in Pergamos write, These things saith he which hath the sharp sword with two edges; I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is: and thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith, even in those days wherein Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth. But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication. So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which thing I hate."

—Rev. ii. 12-15. He that had the sharp sword with two edges described the church at Pergamos, saying to her, "Thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith;" but still he says, "I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols." Balak was the king of Moab, and was an idolater. Seeing the children of Israel on the mountains, he greatly feared them, and sought the aid of Balaam to curse Israel. He could not curse them; but for the great reward that Balak was willing to give him, he was willing to throw a stumbling-block in the way of Israel. Surely that was the idolatry of Balak, and Balaam partook of that idolatry when he offered the seven bullocks and the seven rams in conjunction with Balak, an idolater. The Lord had not commanded him to make those offerings; therefore it was idolatry, and that was the doctrine of Balaam. The church at Pergamos had also them that held the doctrine of the Nicolaitans. Nicholas of Antioch, a Gentile, had espoused christianity, but taught that it was not wrong to have a community of wives, nor to eat things offered to idols. That was his doctrine, which the Lord hated. If there existed such corruptions in the church at Pergamos, it is but fair to conclude that there were similar characters in the church at Corinth. It was to them the gospel was hid. He that had the two-edged sword said to the church at Pergamos, "Repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of my mouth." If that church did not turn from those idolaters, he would come to it and fight them (the idolaters) with the sword of his mouth, which is the word of God. He would fight them by the power of the everlasting gospel, and drive them out from among his saints. That gospel is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." But it is hid to them that are lost. While Saul of Tarsus was a very religious man, yet he was lost to all the beauties that shone in unfading glory in the gospel of God our Savior. He did not know him in whom that gospel was revealed. When that revelation was made to him his cry was, "Who art thou, Lord?" That revelation was then made to him. His Lord had said, "All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him." This great truth was manifested in the conversion of Saul, and his conversion was without the agency of man. But to him was then revealed the wondrous power of regenerating grace. Before that time that power was hid from him. Afterwards he could appropriately say, "If our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost."

"In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them." Perhaps my inquiring sister will ask, What idea is conveyed by the words, "god of this world?" The word god conveys the idea of one clothed with great power. Idol worshipers have ever looked to their idol gods for aid and for protection. The priests of Baal manifested their confidence in their god when they besought him from morning till noon to send down upon their altar and sacrifice fire to consume it. But their god, like all other idol gods, failed them in that hour of their greatest need. Not so with the great God whom Elijah worshiped. His power was made manifest at the hour of offering the evening sacrifice. He sent that fire upon that prophet's offering and sacrifice that burned them up and licked up the water. Will our inquiring sister pardon me for offering to her some reflections based upon that wondrous manifestation of the power of Elijah's God? It will be remembered that that offering was prepared by the prophet, and was offered at the hour of the offering of the evening sacrifice in the temple service. That sacrifice was offered at the hour when our glorious Lord said, "It is finished," and gave up the ghost. The great offering made by him was in the evening of that dark and shadowy dispensation. It was when superstition and idolatry pervaded the Gentile world, and had taken deep and strong hold on the minds and hearts of the children of Israel. Hence they virtually denied the revelation that God had given them by his prophets, and the types and shadows of the law, all of which pointed away to the coming of the Messenger of the covenant to his temple, and the great offering he would make in the evening of that dispensation. All the wonderful things that then were occurring before them and seen by their natural vision were hid from their understanding, although they had been foretold by the prophets and prefigured in their temple service; and although they saw the offerings made day by day in that service, and heard in the temple Sabbath after Sabbath the law and the prophets read to them, yet they did not believe nor understand those things, and labored by the use of earthly means to defeat the unchanging purposes of God. Then surely their minds were blinded by the god of this world. Of them the apostle says, "God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear." They had eyes to see natural things, but the god of this world blinded their eyes, because they were carnal, sold under sin. The carnal mind is enmity against God, not subject to his law, neither indeed can be. They were natural, and the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit. Being blinded, they were led captive by the devil at his will. In that captivity they were in love with the world, and the things thereof were their idols. Then they did not believe on the glorious Son of God, who is the light of that glorious gospel spoken of in the text. That light did not shine unto them, and could not, without the revelation of Jesus Christ in them. That revelation is the work of the Spirit, and it shines in the dear saints, to give them the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. The god of this world leads men into darkness, and all these love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil. Thus is presented the contrast between the darkness that surrounds the god of this world and all his votaries, and the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who came a light to lighten the Gentiles, and was the glory of his people Israel.

But the text declares that Christ is the image of God. The apostle says, "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ. For in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily." Mark the word "bodily." It means unity, or oneness. John says, "For there are three that bear record in heaven: the Father, the Word and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one." That language of the apostle enables the dear saints to form a satisfactory idea of what was declared by the prophet, who said, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace." Then it is made clear to the minds of the saints that in Christ dwells all the fullness of the Godhead, all the divine perfections of Jehovah. Then surely he was the image of God, for he was God. He was The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. When the saints are enabled to behold some of the ineffable glories that shine forth in him, they, like the four and twenty Elders, fall down before him that sits upon the throne, and worship him that liveth forever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." Yes, they fall down from any trust or confidence in man, or in anything that belongs to this world; and they rejoice in the power, wisdom, goodness, mercy and love of that God whom they adore. The twelve sons of Jacob, who represent the twelve tribes of Israel, and the twelve apostles of the Lamb, were the twenty-four Elders that cast their crowns before the throne. They were all witnesses, all bear record of his great and wonderful character. Israel had been in bondage under hard task-masters, but was delivered from that bondage and placed in a land that flowed with milk and honey. So you, dear saint, have been in bondage under sin, but have been delivered, and now have the sweets, the precious truth, of the glorious gospel of Christ. The twelve apostles of the Lamb had been called from earthly votaries, and made witnesses of the wonderful work of God their Savior. The testimony of the twelve patriarchs and the testimony of the twelve apostles is, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power." This is in strict accord with your feelings and desires, dear saints; and those things are declared in the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God. You have these two witnesses, the testimony left on record by the four and twenty Elders, and the witness in your hearts, written by the Spirit, that ye are the children of God. That testimony is declared to you wherever the glorious gospel of Christ is preached. But that preaching would be of little value to you if you only had the testimony of the four and twenty Elders. While their testimony is spiritual, you are natural. In your earthly relationship you are natural, and hence do not receive that spiritual testimony. It is hid from you. But when by the quickening power of the Spirit you are made alive, made spiritual, you with joy receive the testimony of those witnesses, and that testimony is the glorious gospel of Christ. It comes to you in power and in demonstration of the Spirit. It is given to you that you may grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth as it is in the Lord Jesus Christ. That truth all centers in him, and hence it is called by the apostle, "The glorious gospel of Christ." O how wonderfully glorious it is to the saints! It presents Jesus, who is the image of God. It presents him in all his great and wonderful fullness as their Redeemer from the direful curses of a violated law, from the power and sting of death, and the victory of the grave.

May you, my dear inquiring sister, and all the dear saints who read these rambling thoughts, have ever before you the glories of that gospel while in these low grounds of sin, sorrow, pain, disease and death, is the sincere prayer of this feeble writer, who daily realizes that the vanities of a sin-cursed world will soon, perhaps very soon, be known by him no more.

H. COX.

STATE ROAD, Del., Aug. 14, 1889.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have been urgently requested to write a letter for the SIGNS on the question commonly designated open and close communion. It seems that there are those who think they are Baptists, and profess to be agreed with the Baptists on about everything else except communion. To the faith and practice that has always distinguished the Baptists on this subject they object. The objection may not always be the same, but whatever it is, or may be, will necessarily call for some little inquiry. I think it is largely confined to those who have mingled much with Methodists, and have been accustomed from childhood to hear their complaints and become familiar with their prejudices against the Baptists on this account. They would then quite naturally be drawn fully into sympathy with them. The question occurs to me, Why, if one is a Baptist, believing in the doctrine and church government maintained among Baptists, should he or she want to commune with others? or why want others to commune with us? If we can commune together, why not everything else together? Why not mingle with them in their efforts to convert sinners? Why not participate in their festivals and sociables? If we can commune with unbaptized people, why not receive without baptism ourselves? If we can commune with unconverted people, why require repentance and faith ourselves? Why not admit any and all comers? Is the church book more sacred than the sacrament table? But instead of thus rambling I will now try to give you such light as I have on the ordinance as we have received it of the Lord.

The institution of this ordinance is the result of the spiritual communion of believers with Christ, and consequently with each other, and is designed to express it. A profession of it, where it does not exist, is but a mockery, and that of one of the most sacred things that has ever been entrusted to the keeping of the church. It is emblematic in its character, and if what it represents is not true of those who partake, it can be of no possible profit to them. No Egyptian could be present when Joseph made himself known to his brethren, and no one else could sit at the table when they were called to dine with him. "Where is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples?"—Luke xxii. 11. Israelites alone ate the passover. Spiritual Israel alone partake of Christ their Passover. The doors were not thrown open even to Israelites. No invitation was sent out to a single Jew. Even Judas is hastened in his contemplated treachery, the Master saying to him, "That thou doest do quickly." "And he having received the sop went immediately out." Nobody claiming the name of Baptist will dispute that it is "he that believeth and is baptized," that is entitled to the privileges of the church. Baptism is the gateway into the visible organization of the kingdom, and except a man be born of water as well as of the Spirit he cannot enter therein. The apostle addressing the church says, "We are one body, and one bread." The food that is taken nourishes every member of the one body, but cannot be extended beyond. The communion is close and limited.

The apostle becomes very earnest and warm in his presentation and defense of this sacred ordinance. "Behold Israel after the flesh." "They did all eat the same spiritual meat, and did all drink the same spiritual drink," "and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea." "Are not they which eat of the sacrifices partakers with the altar?" They are first called to officiate and minister at the altar, and their right to eat of the sacrifices depends upon and results from not only their being priests, but occupying that official station. They not only all partake of the same bread as members of one body, but they are themselves one bread—a more perfect blending of many into one than even the several members of a living body. The members of a body might possibly be dis severed so as to appear in their individuality; but bread will never suffer the destruction of its unity. The multitude of wheat grains are so perfectly blended that it will ever remain one bread. The apostle is very clear in speaking of this ordinance as the manifestation and expression of fellowship. It is not that idols are anything, or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is anything, but the recognition of those things. "I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils." I do not understand him as calling any of the people devils, but showing that in opening the doors of communion to them we become responsible for, and indorsers of, all their idolatrous practices. If we fellowship them, we fellowship and sanction all their doings. I once heard a professed Baptist minister say that if a good Methodist should take a seat with them at their communion, he would not be the one to object. Shall we then select and cull out some good ones from the different sects to commune with us, while they are themselves all in accord, and all communing together? We know the faith of men by their works. So we recognize believers of the truth by their walking in the truth. It avails little for people to say they have faith, if their lives all the time show to the contrary. I suppose all this will read very much like "A spring shut up, a fountain sealed," for the use of the family. But is not this right? Christian fellowship is too precious a boon to be wasted upon those who cannot appreciate it, and to whom it presents but an outward show. If there are those in various inclosures who love Christ and have tasted that he is gracious, who love his people and have fellowship for them, the gates of his sanctuary are always open for them to enter. He says, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." What is open communion? Does anybody believe in open communion? Do not they all, even those who have so much complaint to make, fix a limit to their communion? Will they commune with the nonprofessing world? Will Methodists and Presbyterians invite to their communion the Unitarians or the Universalists or Campbellites? Does anybody propose to commune with Mormons? It is really close communion with every form of profession, only some have a longer limit; but when that limit is reached they all close their doors. Besides, giving invitations to those that they know will not accept amounts to nothing. Those who entered into the sanctuary of old must not only be Israelites, but they must be clean and clothed with unmingled garments. The material must be fine linen, clean and white. In thus limiting the expression of christian fellowship to the bounds of the existence of that fellowship, no others are disturbed, nor any stumbling-block thrown in anybody's way. They can all use the emblems at such times in such manner as seemeth them good. There are now probably in the world more than six hundred different claimants to the christian name. Do those who worry about the closeness of our communion think that Christ has that many different brides, or that the peace and good order of the church would be promoted by extending invitations to more or less of them to come to our communion? The apostle said he spake as unto wise men, and appealed to them to judge what he said. I will submit the above.

Yours devotedly,

E. RITTENHOUSE.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—I desire to speak a few words of comfort and admonition to the readers of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, if the Lord will permit. I have received a great deal of comfort from reading the communications of the dear brethren and sisters who write for its columns. I feel impressed to write, and whether it be of the flesh or Spirit I know not. If of the Spirit, it will perhaps be of comfort to some little child of God. If of the flesh, it will not do any good, and I hope will not harm any one, nor the cause which I have espoused. God knows my heart. I desire above all things to know the truth and follow it, and would not offend the least of God's little ones; and if any one that sees this should differ from what I say, I commend them to God, praying him to give us all understanding to the acknowledging of the truth. I do not want contention, but unity and peace.

I understand that by the transgression of our father Adam, all his posterity were made sinners; and that by the obedience of Christ all his people were made righteous, without any works of the creature in the matter at all. Did not God make Adam, and give him all the will, desire, affections or lusts that he had? He made him just such a being as he was; and he fulfilled, as everything else does, the very purpose for which he was created. Adam could not have done anything but just what he did do. He was not in possession of any divine life, and consequently did not have any power to resist the devil. He was simply guided by the spirit that led him. He had but the one spirit. But when you tell these things to some people, they are sure to cry out that you make God the author of sin; and some of the brethren in our country are in this very channel. I do not understand that sin is a creature, but the act of the creature. But if Adam could have done different from what he did do, he might have done so; and in case he had, God's purpose would have been upset. I believe that the transgression of our father Adam was as much according to God's purpose and predestination, as was the obedience of our Savior, and that both were according to God's determinate counsel and foreknowledge. Our father Adam having become a transgressor, entailed sin upon his posterity, and they are born into the world sinners by nature; and if they were never to transgress or commit a single sin after they are born into the world, they would nevertheless be sinners by nature, under the condemnatory sentence of the law of sin and death, wholly incapacitated to extricate themselves from under that law, lost, ruined, and all unholy, all unclean, dead in trespasses and in sin. "But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ. (By grace are ye saved.)"—Eph. ii. 4, 5. Neither do I understand that in regeneration the child of God gets clear of this fleshly or Adam man; or in other words, I do not believe that the whole man is born of the Spirit. If he were he would be a spiritual man; for that which is born of the Spirit is spirit; and that which is born of the flesh is flesh. But in regeneration we receive the Spirit of God; yes, the Spirit of God dwells in the regenerated child of God, as taught in the eighth chapter of Romans, and in various other places in the Scriptures. If the whole man is changed, I am frank to confess that I am an unregenerate man, which may be the case; but I feel to hope it is different; for I find that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing. But the old Adam man is sinful yet. I do things that are wrong. I am all unholy, all unclean, not worthy (self-considered) to have a name among God's people, much less to try to speak a word in defense of my Master's cause, or to try to comfort any of his dear children. But when we are enabled by the Spirit of God (which dwells in us, if we be his) to view Christ as our worthiness, righteousness and holiness, yes, see him as our all in all, then it is that we are enabled by the Spirit to ascribe unto him all the praise, honor and glory, and to realize that he is God, and beside him there is none other.

I ask you, dear kindred in Christ, if it is thus with you; or do you go on while tabernacling here in this sin-smitten world, not having any crosses, troubles and trials, but living a perfect life? O! if you can live without sin, why do you not do it? And if you cannot, it is an evidence that there is something about the man that is not of the Spirit. Now let me admonish you, dear brethren, and exhort, as much as in you is, to live a perfect life, knowing that any good acts, desires or thoughts that you may do or have are the fruit of the Spirit, and not of the flesh; for the flesh, or Adamic man, is sinful yet, and is in direct opposition to the Spirit. Hence the warfare. And may our ministering brethren be strengthened and enabled by the Spirit to shun not to declare the whole counsel of God; and when we are cast down, and in darkness, having doubts and fears, let us rest assured that if the Lord is our Shepherd we shall not want; that the God we profess to worship is an all-wise and all-powerful God; that he declared the end from the beginning, saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure;" that he works all things after the counsel of his own will; that all things (whether in heaven above or on earth beneath) work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose.

If this should find its way into your columns, I may perhaps write more on this subject in future. May the Lord pardon error, and add a blessing consistent with his will.

Yours in gospel bonds,

A. H. WILLIAMSON.

JULY 26, 1889.

DEAR ELDER BEEBE:—I would like to write a few lines to you this evening, though possessing no ability to say anything that may comfort or cheer you in your arduous ministering labors. We all know that you discontinued through the SIGNS discussions which seemed in your judgment unprofitable, as to the points of doctrine upon which all could not agree; yet I have not been able to see sufficient change in the paper to cause any to discontinue it who sustained your father in his teachings. Though he has ceased from his earthly labors, his testimony still speaks, and is in full agreement, I think, with the doctrine you hold. The SIGNS is still a great comfort to many who have little opportunity to hear the gospel preached. Doubtless there is often a word in season to some weary one, which the stronger may not see; a cup of cold water for some stranger-pilgrim to whom the world is a desert drear, seeking evermore for some message of a better country, a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. We know that none but the sick have need of a physician; none but the sorrowing need comfort. The promises are all to the poor, the blind, the lame, the weak, sinful, suffering, hungering, unworthy ones; the poor in spirit, upon whom the blessing of the heavenly kingdom rests. Not many times have any here been favored with a sermon from you, save through the SIGNS. Many able sermons have we listened to, however, in the past; and if we have profited very little thereby, it must be that the light was not given from above, the source of every good gift. More than ten years have passed since last I was permitted to hear you from the pulpit, and I am not likely soon to forget the interest manifested by all in that well filled house that morning. Once while you spoke there was an audible sob all over the meeting-house. What a heavenly place was that to some there assembled! What solemn peace filled hearts that seemed to know the joyful sound! The swiftly moving years have borne us far away from that time and place, and have with their lessons of severity taught us that changes many and sad are what we must expect evermore until this veil of mortality is removed. As we listened to you and your revered father that morning, we had no warning that there would come among those there convened in blessed harmony and union (a union so perfect that they could most appropriately sing, "How sweet, how heavenly, is the sight," &c.) a discord so fierce and bitter as to scatter and divide churches, families, lifetime friendships, everything. Mindful of the apostle's admonition, that "the time is short," knowing that the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, it was but natural to infer that this peace and love would continue on to the end, firm and true. For surely the christian's hope, the anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast, is not a myth, a very lovely song, a pleasant voice, and nothing more. And can the tie of fellowship be so easily broken, so lightly withdrawn? Was it not with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ? "From whence come wars and fightings among you?" one inquires. Amid these bewildering changes, when all earthly supports in which we trusted are falling away, there is only one refuge, one star of hope that shines through the darkness, bright and unchanging as eternal love.

Away down in the valley of suffering and despair, the poor creature almost forgets the day of prosperity, when he thought he should never be moved; when the candle of the Lord shined upon his head; when by his light he walked through darkness. The Savior said, "Ye shall weep and lament; but the world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful; but your sorrow shall be turned into joy." And this joy no man taketh from them. He was despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief. So they who follow him shall in the world have tribulation; but they are told to be of good cheer. And though hedged about, and in sorest straits, bewildered and afraid oftentimes, faith sometimes shows them the fadeless glory of that other world, the blissful mansion prepared by eternal love; and the sorrowing pilgrim thinks that surely he can run with patience the race set before him. But faith grows weak and dim again and again, and the wanderer searches the world around, and cannot find it. From out the depths the poor heart cries, Lord, help! O help me! realizing that there is no help save in him. And the answer comes, after long waiting, perhaps, full of pitying tenderness, from one who knows our feeble frame, and remembers we are but dust, "I, the Lord thy God, will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not: I will help thee." And we know his promises can never fail, and with him is no variableness or shadow of turning. Still the mourning and unrest will come. The prisoner sits down by the waters of Babylon, ever and anon, and sighs for home.

"O for a closer walk with God,
A calm and heavenly frame,
A light to shine upon the road
That leads me to the Lamb."

Our great High Priest was in all points tempted like as we are, was storm-tossed, forsaken, weary, yet without sin, and is now entered into enduring rest. A few more troubled days and nights of waiting and watching, a few more lonely travels as we commune with each other and are sad, and the haven will appear. "There they that oft have sown in tears, Shall reap again in joy."

Pardon this long and (it may be) tiresome letter. I will not ask you to write to me, as I have access to the SIGNS. May the Lord comfort and sustain you through all the way.

A FRIEND.

WAVERLY, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1889.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Inclosed you will find a letter from Elder Jenkins to me. Myself, with several other brethren, would like to have it published, believing it would be of comfort to many others who have felt likewise. You need not allow Elder Jenkins to criticise it.

Your brother in hope,
D. M. VAIL.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., March 1, 1889.

DEAR BROTHER VAIL:—Your letter has just come to hand. I have been thinking for several weeks that I would drop you a few lines, at least to acknowledge the receipt of your and your wife's photographs, which we appreciate. I would gratify your request to write you a long letter, but I hardly have the time; and even if I had the time, I could not believe I would write to your edification or comfort, unless it would be a comfort to you to read of long seasons of gloom and trial. I travel about all the time in sorrow, because I am not what I desire to be, nor can I be. The remembrance of past sins seems enough to crush me, to say nothing about present corruptions. Occasionally while preaching I can forget these things; yet they are often in my mind while trying to preach. It is not only an almost continual question with me as to my right to try to preach, but I am very seldom able to feel that I have ever passed from death unto life. I am ashamed of myself and of my efforts, and often wonder if the churches are not equally ashamed of me. I would run away if I dared, but that I have never been able to do, though I have thought much about it. If I really do preach the gospel, it is nothing to my credit, for necessity is laid upon me. I have not been able to understand how it is that some brethren are very ambitious to occupy the position of a preacher of the gospel, unless it is a temptation of the devil. If I could do so consistently, I would immediately cease to stand in the position of a pastor to the churches, and devote my time to traveling among the churches that are somewhat destitute. As I think of the providence of God that has attended me, how wonderful and mysterious it all has been. While his works of providence and grace have often seemed to be crosswise and contrary, like the wheels in Ezekiel's vision, yet I have found them going on their four sides, and going straight forward, and working in perfect and beautiful harmony.

"Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan God's works in vain."

How wonderful it is that I have not entirely destroyed myself, and lost the fellowship of the saints, which I would rather die than be deprived of. I do believe that I can say truthfully, "I would rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." * * *

With assurance of continued love and fellowship, I am, I hope, your brother and companion in tribulation and hope,

BENTON JENKINS.

RIMER, Ohio, May 19, 1889.

ELDER BEEBE—DEAR BROTHER IN CHRIST:—If the Lord wills, I will try and write you a few lines, trusting I may be enabled to say nothing but the truth; for the truth is all that will do the saints of God any good. While reading the many communications that are sent all over the land through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, I often feel that I would like to write something to the dear children of God. But when I try, then I feel my inability to do so; for to will is present, but how to perform that which is good I find not. But the Lord has promised never to leave nor forsake his people. Well, God has made this promise, and it shall not return to him void. But am I one of those people? This is a question that often passes through my mind. In another place it is written, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." Well, sometimes truly I can say, I know I love the brethren; for they seem to be my only friends. They can tell my ups and downs better than I can. We have a people claiming to be Old School Baptists, but they differ with me in doctrine and order. They claim that God only predestinated the good things, and left the bad things out; but I want the God that is the God of the whole universe; who knew all things before time began; who predestinated both good and evil. Dear brethren, I am so ignorant that I cannot see how God could be God and have it otherwise. He has created the wicked for the day of evil. He declared all things from the beginning, saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Dear brethren, I am but a mere boy, and why should I try to write anything for the comfort of the dear children of God? Well, if God speaks to one of the children of this world, is he not able to write his law in their heart, and imprint it in their mind, and cause them to speak the truth as it is in Jesus? I know he is; but the question is, Has he spoken peace to my troubled heart? I fear sometimes that it may be I am mistaken, and that I have only learned it from the brethren, as my parents were Old School Baptists. They took me with them, when a child, to their meetings; but as I grew older, and large enough to go out in company, I did not go to their meetings so much, but drifted off in another course, where the meetings were more lively. But I would go occasionally to hear the Old School. Finally I was working some distance from home, and would go home once every month, and it was always on meeting days. I hardly knew why, but I would always go to the meeting-house as I would be going home. The meeting was held in a little town that I had to go through. I remember once a young man spoke to me and said, "You come to meeting oftener than you did when you were closer." It struck me right way, What are you coming here for? "Well," I said, "I don't know why I come here every time I come home, and it seems there is meeting every time I come." I never thought of there being meeting when I would start for home, but always when I would come to this little town I would go past the meeting-house. All the reason I can give is, God directed my steps then, and always did. "It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." This I have learned in my short experience. There was a time when I could not believe this; but God is able to change these stony hearts; or rather, not to change, but to implant his Spirit; for I do not see that my heart is changed, as I have the same old hankering after things of this world that I always had. "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." Sometimes I hear the brethren say, "If my heart deceives me not," &c. Well, I think they are all right, but they use wrong words to express their feelings. I cannot find words to express my feelings either; but God has implanted something in the mind, and written it in the heart. Does he mean these fleshly hearts? Well, the natural mind knows not God. But know ye not that your bodies are the temple of the Holy Ghost? These bodies are temples for the Holy Ghost to dwell in. It is Christ's Spirit that directs the people of God to do as he wills. I would like to do the will of God. I hope and trust he will keep me humble, for I know it is not in man to keep himself; for with me, the things that I would, I do not; and the things that I would not, that I do; so I cannot do anything of myself. In the year 1884 I went to the church and told them what the Lord had done for poor me. I scarcely said anything, but they received me, and I was baptized on the same day. I have felt sometimes that I did not tell them anything like an experience, and it has been my desire ever since, if I did wrong, that the Lord would show it to me. But I feel that the brethren have been patient with me, to bear with my weakness. There is no place else for me to go but to God for all blessings. I have been blessed with the privilege of hearing the gospel of God in its purity preached every month since I united with the church at Sugar Creek. Well, brother Beebe, I did not intend to write so much; but I could not seem to find any place to stop. I am afraid this will worry your patience.

All I want is for the saints of God to know how weak and worthless I am. I love to talk with those people that believe in an all-wise God, who predestinated all things, and the vital unity of Christ and his people.

Do with this as you please, and I will be satisfied.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The members composing the Covenanted or Particular Baptist Church of Christ in Ontario, to the associations with whom we correspond, send christian love.

DEARLY BELOVED:—Once more we have enjoyed the privilege of meeting at Ekfrid, as appointed, on the Friday before the fourth Sunday in June, 1889, where we met many of our dear brethren and sisters from the several branches of the church, and the messengers from the eastern associations, Elders Wm. L. Beebe and Benton Jenkins, and John G. Eubanks, of Georgia, from whom we heard the gospel of the grace of God. It is cheering to the pilgrims to Zion, on their way to the kingdom of their Father through this dreary desert, to hear the pure truth in doctrine, in experience, and in the practical part, from those sent forth by the Holy Ghost to this great work; for it is true now, as well as in the days of the prophet, that many run un-sent; therefore they will not profit the people of God. May it be our daily prayer, as directed by the dear Redeemer, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest. In conclusion we would say that we desire a continuance of your correspondence and fellowship.

Our next meeting will be at Poplar Hill, in Middlesex County, twelve miles west of London.

II. CORINTHIANS IV. 3, 4.

"BUT if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost: in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God, should shine unto them."—2 Cor. iv. 3, 4.

The pronoun "our" includes Paul and Timothy; and the gospel which was preached by them is called "our gospel," because they were entrusted with it, and preached it. "We were allowed of God to be put in trust of the gospel." "But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." He speaks of "another gospel which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ." The gospel is "glad tidings," "good news," to those who "know the joyful sound." It is a proclamation of salvation from God to sinners. It declares what God has done for his people, and also what he is doing for them, and will yet do for them. "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned: for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins." The gospel as preached by Paul and Timothy was designed to comfort and cheer the saints, and to build them up in their most holy faith. While here in the house of their pilgrimage they are subjected to trials and afflictions of various kinds. James speaks of them as "divers temptations." When they are favored to see the purpose of God in their sufferings, they can "count it all joy." The gospel as preached by the apostles and other gospel ministers declares the eternal purpose of God, and his sovereign rule and control over all beings and all events; that our trials and troubles do not come upon us by chance, nor spring out of the earth, but are dealt out by the hand of our God in infinite wisdom and loving-kindness; that God has a purpose worthy of himself in all our sufferings. And "As the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ." "And our hope of you is steadfast, knowing that as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation." This gospel declares that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." "For all things are for your sakes, that the abundant grace might, through the thanksgiving of many, redound to the glory of God. For which cause we faint not," &c. This is gospel truth, and this alone can comfort the saints under their persecutions, trials and afflictions. As all things come to pass according to the purpose of God, and cannot exceed his will, the saints are exhorted in everything to give thanks; for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning them. But how can the saints in all things give thanks to God, unless they believe "our gospel," which declares the predestination of God in all things that come to pass? This is the apostle's theme in this epistle to the church at Corinth. If anything is preached or believed that is not in harmony with this, it is not "our gospel," and therefore will not comfort the saints in the hour of trial, when, like Paul and Timothy, they are persecuted by wicked men, and "pressed out of measure above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life." But are there not many of the saints to-day who "believe not" this precious truth, which is set forth in "our gospel?" Do we not hear some of them saying that they do not believe that God has predestinated all things that come to pass? If they do not believe it, is it not because "our gospel" is hid to them? Can we assign any other reason for their not believing it? God has taught this truth to all his children in their experience; and when they oppose this truth they oppose their own experience, and so "oppose themselves." But the ministry are in meekness to instruct those that oppose themselves, if peradventure God will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth, and that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will. Perhaps some will object to such application, and say that "our gospel" is "hid to them that are lost." But are not such saints lost? A lost sheep is not a dead sheep. A lost man is not a dead man. A sheep or a man may wander away, become confused, lose their bearings, and thus be unable to find the way back to the place from which they have wandered. We may properly speak of such as being lost. David prayed, "I have gone astray like a lost sheep; seek thy servant; for I do not forget thy commandments." Jesus commanded his disciples to go and preach to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel." "The Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." How often do the saints listen to the proclamation of "our gospel," when it is no gospel to them. There is no comfort in it at that time to them. The gospel is then hid to them. Their mind is confused, or darkness has closed in upon them. John speaks of a darkness that comes upon the saints when hating their brethren, and says that "that darkness hath blinded their eyes." God's people at times are not only thus lost, but they are also liable to perish. Of course there is a sense in which, as Jesus says, "they shall never perish," as well as a sense in which they cannot be lost. Paul warns the saints against walking in such a manner as to cause their weak brethren to stumble. "And through thy knowledge shall thy weak brother perish, for whom Christ died."

If our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are thus lost, and are in a perishing, famishing condition. "In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not." Not that they are not born again, but that they are not believing "our gospel," as their minds are blinded by the god of this world. One who was born blind cannot properly be said to be blinded. Only those with sight can be blinded. But what is the god of this world, which blinds the minds of some of the saints, so that they at times do not believe "our gospel?" It is carnal reason, which is opposed to the truth of God, and which often appears so specious or plausible to the saints that it leads them to dispute and deny what God has declared by his servants. God declares, through his servant Paul, that the carnal mind, where the god of this world sits, and from whence all this carnal reason emanates, is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. Carnal reason will always confuse the minds of the children of God, when they are led by it. Carnal reason says, All good things are embraced in the purpose of God, and work together for good to them that love God; but the evil that is in the world God has not predestinated, for that would be inconsistent with his character, and would make him the author of sin; that if we are pressed out of measure above strength, by reason of the wicked actions of men, certainly God has not predestinated that. That is what carnal reason, the god of this world, says; and that is what carnal religionists say, who worship carnal reason, which is their god. The god of this world would blind the minds of God's children, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ should shine unto them. How many of God's dear children are now in Babylon under false teachers, confused by their teachers. "Evil communications corrupt good manners," says the apostle Paul. Carnal reason said, The doctrine of the resurrection of the dead is not true; and the god of this world blinded the minds of some of the saints at Corinth, so that they denied the truth of what the apostle had taught on the subject of the resurrection; and thus they believed not. The doctrine of God our Savior is opposed to carnal reason. Carnal reason cannot comprehend or understand it. It is purely a matter of revelation from the God of heaven. There are said to be lords many and gods many in this evil world; but the apostle speaks of the god of this world. While there are many things in the world that are worshiped by the world, and thus are their gods, yet carnal, fleshly, depraved reason is that which is emphatically the god of this world. To this god every natural man bows and worships. The things of the Spirit are hid from the wise and prudent, and cannot be searched out even by the carnal reasoning powers of the people of God; but God reveals them unto his people by his Spirit. Paul reasoned, but it was not carnal reason. He declared what God the Lord had spoken, which should be an end of all controversy with the people of God.

May God deliver his people everywhere from the corruptions that are in this world, and lead them into all truth, that the light of the glorious gospel of Christ may shine unto them.

IMPORTANT INDICATIONS.

"BUT in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in clouds with great power and glory. And then shall he send his angels, and shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of the earth to the uttermost part of heaven."—Mark xiii. 24-27.

By request of our esteemed brother, Elder J. M. True, we submit the following thoughts in connection with the subject embraced in the words of our Lord as recorded in this text. While by no means presuming to follow the example of such as would attempt by mortal and finite intelligence to discover the hidden mystery of the determined times which God has appointed in his own secret counsel, with humble reverence we would consider what is plainly declared by our Lord Jesus in the words here quoted. In so doing let us lay aside all theories of our own, and endeavor as God may enable us to hear what God the Lord will say.

This solemn declaration of our Lord is recorded in substantially the same words by Matthew and Luke; and in each of their statements the Lord was instructing the disciples in regard to the signs which should precede the end of the world. Doubtlessly the same discourse is reported by the three evangelists. —See Matt. xxiv; Luke xxi. In their application to the close of the legal dispensation and the destruction of the nationality of the Jews, the dreadful prophecy preceding our text was fulfilled with terrible precision in the desolation which was soon visited upon that devoted people. As declared by our Lord, their ruin was attended with sufferings unparalleled in the records of desolation. Then the sun of divine holiness, as revealed in the law which God gave by Moses, was darkened, not by a passing cloud which merely obscured its dazzling brilliance, but by that darkness which forever abides upon it; as the Jewish heaven and earth, of which it was the light, have been rolled together as a scroll and passed away. It will not be claimed by those who trust in the blood of Jesus for salvation, that it was merely by permission that the vials of divine wrath were poured out upon that nation, nor yet that it was contrary to the eternal purpose of God that the holy Redeemer was taken and by wicked hands was crucified and slain.—Acts ii. 23. The tribulation was as certainly determined before of God as was the revelation of the glory of our Lord which should follow that tribulation. When God established that sun in the legal heaven, he expressly limited it to that nation to be observed throughout their generations. In the blessing of Judah their generations as a nation were appointed to continue to the coming of our Lord. As it is written, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be."—Gen. xlix. 10. In its application to the closing of that dispensation and the removal of that legal heaven and earth, this assertion of Jesus was fulfilled when all that was written of him in the law and the prophets was accomplished. But in this case, as in many other inspired declarations, there is a deeper and more wonderful significance than that which is manifest to the natural understanding. In the experience of those who are led by the Spirit each of them is qualified to bear witness to the truth by personal knowledge of the things which are written by inspiration of God. The law shines with its full power in the conviction and condemnation of the sinner, displaying the strict justice of God as forbidding all hope of deliverance from its dreadful curse: then the revelation of the way of life in Christ Jesus answers every demand of justice, and that sun is darkened by the satisfying of its utmost requirement in the blood of the atoning Lamb of God which takes away the sin of the world for whom he gave himself as their life. Without this personal experience of the darkening of the sun of legal condemnation no conscious sinner could have any hope of life in Christ.

There is another application of these wonderful words of Jesus, in which the saints in all times and places are deeply interested. As the end of the typical world of legality and Judaism was signified by the literal display of the signs announced in the preceding connection of our text, so the antitypical consummation of all the mystery of the manifestation of God in the salvation of his people from their sins is signified by the appearance of those events of which the literal signs here stated were but the shadow. In following the path trodden by the Captain of our salvation every saint must pass through the dark valley of the shadow of death, in which the sunlight of faith and hope is lost to sight; but that momentary darkness is the portal through which they enter the infinite glory of eternal day in the unveiled presence of their glorified Redeemer. So far as our temporal experience is concerned, this inconceivably happy deliverance awaits every saint "at that day" when the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give to each that crown of righteousness which is henceforth laid up "unto all them also which love his appearing."—2 Tim. iv. 8. In vain would our carnal reason seek to know of that day and hour, which is not revealed even to the angels of heaven. It has pleased the Father to reserve this awful secret unto himself exclusively. He has revealed the fact for our comfort that all temporal things shall pass away, and that we are called to endure but a momentary fight of affliction here, while our unseen heritage of divine glory is eternal. Natural reason can know something of the temporal sufferings of the saints, but their infinite comfort and joy are only known by that revelation which is received alone through faith.

As the law in its holiness, justice and goodness was the sun of the heaven of Judaism, so the typical ordinances enjoined by it are the moon, whose light is only reflected from that sun. When the sun should be darkened, necessarily the light of the moon must fail; so that she should cease to give light. In the removal of that heaven those prophets and patriarchs who were the recognized stars of that dispensation must also fall from their lofty position as lights and guides to them for whom they were established. So in nature the light of the sun so far transcends the brightness of the moon and stars that they are lost in the superior radiance of the day.

It is only when those "powers that are in heaven shall be shaken," that "they should see the Son of man coming in the clouds with great power and glory." Evidently they who shall see this wonderful manifestation are not those from whom Jesus gave thanks that these things were hid by the Father; clearly they are those babes to whom it seemed good in the sight of God to reveal the mystery of his grace. They do not see the Son of man by that natural mind which receives not the things of the kingdom of God, but by the same revelation by which Peter was qualified to recognize Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God. When he is thus revealed he is seen coming in the clouds with great power and glory. That glory makes the clouds in which he comes bright with the majesty of his appearing; and those clouds are full of the rain of the doctrine of God our Savior. The witness borne by all the prophets is included in these clouds. His coming is in exact accordance with that cloud of witnesses whose earliest manifestation shines in the testimony of faith by which Abel offered a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain. Not one of all the innumerable host of the subjects of his grace is absent from that blood-washed company who constitute the clouds in which he comes. In their tribulations they cannot see through the darkness of those clouds until he is pleased to make known his presence, and thereby cause the darkness to shine with his own inconceivable glory. Then they are enabled to glory in the very tribulation which before seemed to be more than they could endure. When he is seen coming in the clouds their sorrow is turned into joy, and they are made thankful for the very sufferings in which they have received the revelation of his gracious presence. In every dark cloud which obscures their vision, the faith of the Son of God can read the assurance of the coming of the Redeemer to deliver those who long for his appearing. Thus,

"He whose power supplies their food, Makes every sorrow yield them good."

Since the apostles were endued with power from on high, when the Holy Ghost sat upon each of them, and there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, on the day of Pentecost, the angels of our Lord have been sent forth by his authority, and they have gathered together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of the earth to the uttermost part of heaven. These angels include not only the inspired apostles and the servants whom he has called to proclaim his truth in the ministry of the gospel, but every word of his truth and every dispensation of his providence. Even the wrath of man and the malice of the most bitter enemies of the truth are made subservient to this purpose of his grace. He makes his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire.—Heb. i. 7. Often the saints are terrified by the appearance of these ministers of divine grace, which appear to them as messengers of wrath for their destruction; but they are enabled in the end to see that the fire was needful to consume the fetters which bound them down to the vanity of earth, in order that they might rise to the enjoyment of their heavenly heritage in Christ Jesus. They are thus gathered together in the heavenly presence of their Lord, where they find the fullness of eternal joy. It is a very limited view of the sovereignty of God which would confine his government to those events which appear to finite reason as favorable to the subjects of salvation. The faith of the Son of God sees even the wicked as the sword of the Lord, and men of the world as his hand. So when he stood at Pilate's bar Jesus said to the proud tyrant, "Thou couldst have no power against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me unto thee hath the greater sin."—John xix. 11. This assertion rebukes the suggestion of carnal reason, which arises in the mind even of the saints, that the sovereignty of God absolves the sinner from guilt in the wickedness which was thus absolutely decreed in the eternal counsel of God. The murderers of our Redeemer were not less guilty in the sight of infinite justice because it was eternally determined that they should do just what was given them from above to do, in the fulfillment of the purpose of God in the salvation of his people from their sins through the shedding of the blood of their Redeemer. The same principle applies to every exhibition of the wicked nature of men and devils. The fires of persecution must perform their appointed part in the work of gathering together his elect, just as certainly as the proclamation of his truth everywhere by those saints who were scattered by that persecution. Finite minds cannot comprehend the mystery of this truth; but it is included in the revelation which God has given for the comfort of his afflicted and poor people. Without the malice of Cain, and the envy of the brethren of Joseph, there could have been no record of the testimony of Jesus in the faith of Abel and in the living type of the exalted Joseph. Certainly no more revolting instances of crime are recorded among men than those which are thus expressly declared to have been by the purpose of God positively determined in the purpose of God. As all his works are known unto God from the beginning of the world, under every trial there is comfort and assurance to the believer in the confidence that his suffering is given by the infinite love of the same God who has given him eternal life in Christ Jesus. When applied by the Spirit of truth, the most bitter suffering becomes manifestly an angel sent by the Lord for the purpose of gathering the sufferer unto himself. Those who have been brought low by the resistless floods of adversity and affliction, can bear witness that in their distress they called upon God for deliverance, and that he heard their cry and brought salvation unto them. In this wonderful way he made their deepest sorrows the messengers of consolation unto them. So the Lord is glorified in all the afflictions of his saints.

CONTEMPLATED VISIT TO KENTUCKY.

ELDER Benton Jenkins, associate editor of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, contemplates visiting the Licking Association, to be held with the Mt. Carmel Church, on September 13th, 14th and 15th, 1889. Any one wishing to transact business connected with this paper will have an opportunity to do so with him, as he will have the subscription list with him, and is fully acquainted with the business.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Irvin Hix, beloved son of brother Eber and sister Elizabeth Hix, died at the home of his parents in Jefferson, Schoharie Co., N. Y., after an illness lasting from July 28th to August 10th, 1889, aged fourteen years and two days.

He was a promising boy, loved by his school-mates, and one on whom his parents could ever depend. His parents, though feeling the heavy stroke, bow in submission to the will of God.

You are gone, yes, forever
Your sweet voice is still;
The Savior has called you,
So we bow to his will.

You are gone, but our God
Ever knows what is best;
So we bow to the rod,
For we know he is just.

KATE E. THOMPSON.
CIRCLEVILLE, N. Y.

DIED—In Hopewell, N. J., June 28th, 1889, Mr. Woolsey P. Blackwell, aged seventy-three years.

The subject of this notice had not visibly united with the church, but he was always present at our meetings on Sunday, unless providentially hindered, and manifested deep interest in the truth, and would detect anything that savored of legality as quickly as any member of the church. He was immovably fixed in the glorious doctrine of the eternal, unconditional, personal election of the church in Christ Jesus before time began; also, he was well read in the Scriptures, and rejoiced that wherever the Scriptures spoke of the sufficiency of redemption they always placed it in the certain efficacy of redemption, and that the Scriptures said nothing about an atonement in which persons were not concerned, and that salvation in God's appointed time would be carried to every redeemed vessel of mercy. For some purpose, too dark for our finite minds to grasp, he did not openly unite with the church. He had been a reader of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES for a number of years, and did not give any countenance to "Ashdod" language, let it come from whom it might.

He has left a widow, two daughters and (I think) three brothers, as well as a large number of more distant relatives, and very many friends, all of whom feel the loss of him very much. His sickness was of short duration, being paralysis of the bowels. I visited him three times, but the last visit was one mingled with joy and sorrow, as he was then dying, but calm in his mind, waiting the summons, trusting only in the finished work of the Lord Jesus Christ, sinking down like a little infant on its mother's bosom, passing into sweet slumber. His funeral was July 1st, and very numerous attended. Text, John xvii. 1-5.

ALSO,

DIED—In Hopewell, N. J., Aug. 21st, 1889, Mrs. Permela L. Hill, aged fifty-one years, eight months and eleven days, wife of brother Charles B. Hill.

Sister Hill was confined to the house nearly four months, and at times suffered very much, having that painful disease, dropsy in the chest, and the last two or three days before she died there were times when her agony was excruciating; but during her extreme illness there was a clear manifestation, not only to her dear family, but to her brethren, sisters and friends, of the power of reigning grace, for she bore her sufferings calmly and submissively. She had been a member of the First Baptist Church of Hopewell nearly eleven years, during which time, by the grace of God, she had lived in accordance with the profession she had made, for she was an ornament in the church, always filling her place in the meetings of the church; and in all the relations of life, as wife, mother and friend, no one excelled her. But she has passed away from the scenes of earth to her eternal home, and the dear family, as well as the church, feel the loss of the loved one very much indeed. She has left a husband, three children (daughters), and how many brothers and sisters I do not know, but some nine or ten, I think, and a very large circle of more distant relatives, and very many friends. Her funeral was August 23d, and an unusually large congregation was present. Text, 1 Thess. iv. 13-18.

WM. J. PURINGTON.

HOPWELL, N. J., Aug. 24, 1889.

Sister Isabella Thurber, while visiting at my house several years ago, requested that I should write her obituary for publication in the SIGNS, and the time has now come for me to comply with that request; for she peacefully and gently closed her eyes in death on Tuesday, July 9th, surrounded by her relatives and children, of whom she has one son and five daughters, the son and one daughter having lived with her in the old home where she had lived fifty-three years.

She was born in Lenoxshire, Scotland. Her age was seventy-four years and six months. On July 4th she was suddenly stricken down with paralysis, and after five days of intense suffering death mercifully came to her relief. But O how desolate the home she has left! and how that son and daughter with whom she has lived so long will miss her, her vacant seat at the table and at the fireside. Let them look where they will, it will seem written on everything, Gone—gone forever. Many times she has spoken to me of her pleasant home, and in a voice trembling with emotion has said, "Surely the Lord has blessed me indeed, for which I feel thankful. I have such dear children, who do everything for me that heart can wish." She was ever ready to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, which shall stand when the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and the earth shall melt with fervent heat. She was a faithful member of the Old School Baptist Church at Fairfield, and her seat was never vacant when she was able to fill it. The church deeply mourns her loss. When we go to the old meeting-house we sadly miss the pleasant face of "Aunt Belle," as she was wont to be called.

Her funeral took place at her old home on Thursday, July 11th, where assembled a vast concourse of friends to pay the last sad tribute of respect. The sermon was preached by Elder T. J. Wyman. The bearers were her four sons-in-law and two grandsons. It was indeed a beautiful and affecting scene to look upon. With loving hands they laid her away in her last resting place, to await that glorious morn when the Lord shall descend with a shout. Then shall she be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and the saying that is written come to pass, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

H. TUTTLE.

MADISON, Michigan.

Diana Heistand, youngest daughter of David and Lydia Seitz, was born Sept. 21st, 1857, and died Aug. 14th, 1889, aged thirty-one years, ten months and twenty-three days.

She was married to Samuel Heistand Oct. 4th, 1883. She leaves a loving husband, three motherless children, a kind and indulgent father, an afflicted mother, two brothers, two sisters, and a large circle of relatives and friends, to mourn her untimely and unlooked-for departure from this vale of sorrow and care. Her home was on her father's farm until last March. She moved with her husband and three small children to Darke Co., Ohio, from whence, without any previous warning of her illness, came the sad message, "Diana died this morning of heart trouble." She was sick and confined to her bed about a week, but no one thought her sickness serious until a few hours before she died.

Her body was laid away to rest in the grave-yard in Darke County, near where she died. We mourn not as those without hope, believing that our loss is her eternal gain.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MAGNOLIA SPRINGS, Tex., Aug. 20, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Inclosed I forward you a letter written by our highly esteemed and venerable father in Israel, Elder W. M. Perkins, of Louisiana, which I would love to see in the SIGNS, at least all the part bearing on the subject of the beast, &c. I still love to read the SIGNS, and wish it success in the way of patronage, and also to still continue to publish the old, plain Bible truth as formerly.

I am your brother in hope,

DURHAM RICHARDSON.

PINE FOREST, La., May 30, 1889.

ELDER D. RICHARDSON—DEAR BROTHER:—I received a letter some time ago from you, but do not remember answering it. I should have written sooner, but for some time I have been thinking I would be able to be at your June meeting at old Antioch; but I am now satisfied that I shall not be able to enjoy the blessed privilege at that time, on account of bad health. The old spinal affection with which I have been afflicted for years is much worse on me this spring than for several years past. I have been confined to the house most of this week, but think I am improving some to-day. Up to this time I have traveled constantly among the brethren and outside congregations. I scarcely have failed to try to preach every Sunday, and often Saturday included. I was very much refreshed from the Lord in mingling with the brethren at Bethlehem a short time ago. Brother Meadours doubtless has informed you of the particulars. We had brother Ritchie with us in April, and also brother Poole, of Orange. The brethren seemed to be much in the Spirit. Brother Poole is a beginner. I shall not entirely abandon the idea of visiting your county some time between this and winter. It may be that the Lord has a use for me a little while longer on his footstool. If ever indeed I have been honored as his servant, I feel to say that I am one of the least of all, and have fallen far short of living the life I greatly desire. The things that I would do, those do I not; and the things that I would not do, those do I. I am often led to say, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" I sometimes however feel that I can say with David that it is good to wait upon the Lord; and with Job, "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come." There are two paramount desires constantly abiding with me: one is that I may live free from sin; the other is that I may be constantly employed in preaching Jesus. I feel, my dear brother, as the shadows of the evening are increasing and growing denser along the rugged pathway of life, the greater need of the supporting presence and daily grace and mercy of my dear Redeemer, who has poured ten thousand blessings down upon me hitherto. Shall I not trust him the balance of the way? But even to be able to do that, our little faith must be strengthened and revived by his Spirit, or else we go mourning all the day. There are a few things, brother Durham, that I am certain I do of a truth know, and they are facts in my mind which I never learned from mortal man. First, I know I am a poor sinner, and that Jesus alone is the Savior of sinners. Now if he is not my Savior, independently of all creatures or beings in heaven or earth, then I am forever lost; for I am quite sure that if I have faith or trust at all, it rests upon Jesus and his finished work for its object. If I know my heart, I would not attempt to put one more jewel in the glorious crown of my dear Savior, nor would I pluck one from it. I sometimes am made to look with sorrow upon my earthly friends, when I see their zeal manifested in building up the various effort societies, religious though they seem to be, yet uniting with the world that shall perish. To me it is a plain evidence that they have not the faith of God's elect. To my mind, millions of infatuated mortals are laboring under the strong delusion that God has declared he would send them. I verily believe that we are living in the day described by John in Revelation xiii. 11-18.

The image which the second beast is making to the first cannot well be hid much longer from the eye of God's servants. You know, my brother, the lamb's horn is never dreaded when first appearing, with all its efforts at piercing. You would look upon it with indifference. But when grown the danger greatly increases. We have but to look abroad to-day in our once happy country to see the rapid strides which error, falsehood and delusion are making among the human family, under the modern evangelization schemes; and along with the strength and growth of this earthly beast is being plainly manifested the spirit and power of the dragon. Your own beloved state, the "Lone Star," witnessed this a year or two since, in the election on the "Temperance" question. Not but what every true christian admires temperance; but he hates the idea of manufacturing consciences by law for others.

It is the boast of the religionists of to-day that there will be a petition presented to the next Congress, signed by ten million persons. The real design, I think, is to establish Sunday as the Sabbath, and compel all men to rest by law. All these things accomplished might not work any hardship to God's people, or to any one else; but it shows us the thirst of the religious world after law power. In this way the first beast got his growth, attained unto manhood, and continued to drench the earth with the blood of the saints and the martyrs of Jesus, "until the words of God shall be fulfilled."—Rev. xvii. 17; read the 16th verse also. Now let us look a little at some of the characteristic marks of the second beast and his image, and see the striking resemblance. The first beast exercised great authority. So will the second beast exercise all the power of the first beast. Power was given the first beast over all kindreds and tongues and nations. "And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." So we see that under the authority and power exercised by the second beast, he caused the earth and them that dwell therein to worship the first beast, that they should make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword, and did live. Now take notice, my brother, that all things seem to work along pretty well, both to the saints and to them called the earth, and them that dwell therein, which I understand to refer to the world in a state of nature only. I understand that this triumphal march of the second beast, and the great victory won over the earth and the inhabitants that dwell therein, will not be by sword, fire and persecution, but by the great wonders in a religious way, such as making fire come down from heaven in the sight of men, not the saints. This fire, I think, will be something like the strange fire offered upon the altar of the Lord by two unbidden characters in olden times, and for which they lost their lives; also, by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast. To my mind the tolerance of the two great leading nations of the earth, the United States and Great Britain, with their vast wealth, intelligence and liberality, offers the richest field, as the theater upon which this seemingly harmless lamb-like beast can use his religious fire, his wonders and his miracles. Now during all the successful operations of this religious beast, and all the time it takes to complete the image, nothing worthy of note has befallen the saints. They are not seriously molested, but left to worship God according to the dictates of enlightened conscience.

"And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast."—Verse 15. Here we have a living embodiment in the image speaking, acting, exercising all the power of a full grown man, the same as referred to in the eighteenth verse. "For it is the number of a man." A man is one who is set at liberty to act for himself. He is one who has attained the most perfect state here on earth. So it is with the beast and his image. Having grown up to manhood, he begins to put his authority forth by killing all who will not worship the image of the beast. This beast I understand to represent a government under the name and head of religion; and all who refuse to bow to its mandates, or worship according to the laws regulating the same, will be killed. These trying times, I believe, for the saints are yet future; but all the elements and mighty forces under God that will contribute to bring about this grand event are now plainly visible on the religious sky, like so many dark clouds, rolling one after another, in advance of a great storm. In my opinion the combined Protestant forces of the world, together with the world, all uniting will about make up the second beast and his image; that the old mother will still be living, and doubtless will sanction this work of her daughters in slaying the faithful followers of Jesus, we have no doubt. We can but conclude that throughout all this grand struggle friendship is not likely to be seriously interrupted, since we see that the second beast has honored the first beast with an image. In the face of that image I think I can behold many of the outlines and traits of character so prominent during the reign of the first beast.

It is well for us to take notice of the symbols and emblematical language used in the introduction of those two beasts. The first was like the leopard, the bear and the lion, the most ferocious and destructive animals in all the animal kingdom. Then, from the description given, we must believe that the first would begin his reign with great power and authority; not so much by guile, but with sword, fire and persecution. In his disposition and character we must expect to find a striking resemblance to those destructive beasts referred to. Now we only have to look back through the pages of impartial history for twelve or fifteen hundred years, to view the dying struggles of the faithful martyrs of Jesus, to see the complete fulfillment of the prophecy concerning the reign of the first beast. Now coming back to the second beast and his image, remember he makes his appearance as a lamb, gentle, harmless and innocent; not the slightest danger to be feared. Now we must expect the methods by which the second beast will rise to his great power and authority to differ as much from those of the first, as the lamb does from the lion.

Take notice that the word "deceiveth" occurs in the operations of the second beast, but not in the first. Now, my brother, can we conceive, could it possibly enter into the mind of man, any system better calculated to deceive the human family than that adopted by most of the popular religious orders of the day? We will mention some of the elements entering largely into the composition of those systems, professing love for human souls; great zeal; man's free agency; all that is necessary to the evangelization of the world is more tears, more prayers and more money, the indispensable necessity of training the head and heart of the children in Sabbath Schools, as a means of bringing them early into the bosom of the church; intercommunity; community of worship among the various orders of the day; the union of church and state.

I must come to a close. Remember me to the brethren and sisters. We would all be much pleased to have you pay us a visit and preach amongst us.

Your brother in hope of eternal life,

W. M. PERKINS.

PRATT MINES, Ala., Aug. 27, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN EDITORS:—It is in weakness and fear and much trembling that I take my pen in hand to write a few more lines for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, which comes to hand every week laden with the good news and glad tidings of salvation by grace through the redemption of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is a precious doctrine to those who have become dead to the law by the body of Christ; and they love it, oral or written. It agrees with the written word of God and with the experience of every saint. Christ performed and completed the eternal redemption of his people, and the Holy Ghost applies it in the experience of each one of them; and they are made to rejoice in hope of the glory of God, and henceforth to love the gospel that declares such salvation. We appreciate the SIGNS as a medium by which this word of the gospel can be transported by mail to many that are destitute of hearing the preached word; and also it is comforting, edifying and strengthening to those who try to preach it, and hear it preached often.

I joined the church here in June, 1883; but I have read the SIGNS since 1876, and have often felt impressed to acknowledge my appreciation of its rich editorials and communications upon doctrine and experience. I need not personate, but include brethren and sisters; for I have been well fed by both. I will say to all, Write on. You feed the hungry, strengthen the weak, and confirm the strong. Shun not to declare all the counsel of God, and still contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. I believe this faith embraces the whole doctrine of predestination, and I am glad to see it set forth in so many communications and editorials. Paul informed Timothy "that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith;" and he was not referring to Mormons or Methodists, but speaking of Primitive Baptists of these "latter times," and his words are being fulfilled in these ends of the earth. Some who once set forth predestination so full that the Arminian scorned them and accused them of preaching infant-damning doctrine, have now departed from the faith, and are bitter enemies to the doctrine, and declare nonfellowship for it. Since this doctrine is hated so much by some, I have thought it was encouched in Jesus Christ. The Jews never had anything among them they hated worse than they did him. Pilate gave them choice between Christ and a murderer and robber to release, and they chose the murderer and robber. The little objections to Christ among the Gentiles would never have imprisoned him; but when his brethren brought in so many accusations against him, it had its effect, and nothing would satisfy them but his life. "Pilate therefore, willing to release Jesus, spake again to them. But they cried, Crucify him, crucify him." They expected to be finally rid of him when they crucified him, and sealed his grave, and put a guard over it. But he arose from the dead, and all power in heaven and earth is given to him. His disciples continued to annoy them by preaching and performing miracles among them in his name; and they became so jealous of Peter and John that they decided to threaten them, and commanded them not to speak at all or teach in the name of Jesus. "But Peter and John said unto them, Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye."

The whims of the Gentiles (Arminians) against predestination would never have imprisoned one in the church and caused them to be condemned and crucified (cut off from fellowship), had not brethren rose up and cried, "Away with such a doctrine. It is God-dishonoring, and a disgrace to Primitive Baptists. It is heresy. It is a licentious doctrine. It is two seed. It is a horrible doctrine, advocated by a horrible set. Crucify (exclude) them, and seal their graves with a regular nonfellowship resolution, and command that it must not be mentioned in the stand or out of it." The crucifixion of Christ and his resurrection from the dead broke down the middle wall of partition between the Jew and Gentile, and the disciples went everywhere preaching the word. Opposition and persecution were God's ordained way of spreading the gospel among the people. The more opposition and persecution the advocates of predestination receive, the more they travel, and preach and write it. The Scripture is verified which says, "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose."

The foregoing does not apply to any who say they do not see this doctrine so plainly, and have no war to make about it, and agree to disagree. With such there is no ground for contention, and ere long the Lord may reveal it to them. I believe all the doctrine of Jesus Christ is known only by revelation, and I believe that he reveals more to some than he does to others. The prophets Ezekiel, Daniel, Jeremiah, and John, who wrote the book called Revelation, had revelations, and they penned them down. I do not understand all they have written, but I do not feel like declaring nonfellowship for them because I have not received the same measure of revelation.

There is great complaint made about the words "absolute predestination." The word absolute has a long definition given it by our lexicographers; perhaps more than is necessary when prefixed to predestination. I am not an accomplished scholar, but I have thought if God's predestination was not absolute, it must be precarious, uncertain and hinged upon contingencies. I believe that is about the way the world believes in election and predestination.

I am not able to distinguish between the mind and thoughts of God and his purpose. It is written that he knows all things. If he knows all things, his thoughts embrace all things, and his oath is pledged that all things shall come to pass. Isaiah says, "The Lord hath sworn, saying, Surely as I have thought, so shall it come to pass: as I have purposed, so shall it stand." His oath to a thing makes it absolute and sure. When it shall be plainly shown by Bible authority that all things are not just as God ordained they should be, then I am willing to come over. From the best I can see at present, everything is going on to consummate the end designed and declared by God from the beginning.

Now, brethren, I have penned down thoughts as they came into my mind while writing, and have written hastily. I hope you will criticise closely, and do what you think best with this, and I shall be satisfied.

I am, I hope, one of the least of all saints,

P. J. POWELL.

GREENWOOD, Col., June 25, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Find inclosed two dollars, as my remittance for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I feel to return my thanks to you for your long forbearance with me. I have concluded to write what I sometimes hope have been the Lord's dealings with me.

I was born at Spring Garden, Jefferson Co., Ill., 1865, and went west with my parents when an infant. When a mere boy I began to have serious thoughts about death. I thought if I should meet with sudden death that I would be lost. But I would put these thoughts away, by promising myself that when I was older I would get religion and join some church. I traveled on in this way for some time. Finally I attended a protracted meeting that was being carried on by the New School Baptists, when the fear of death and everlasting punishment seized my poor soul; and as a great many of my associates had professed religion and united with the church, I concluded to go forward and have the preachers pray for me. It was the custom, if any wanted to be saved, to manifest a desire to that effect, and the preachers would pray for them. After they had concluded their praying they extended an invitation for all who had a desire to unite with the church to come forward. I did not seem to be benefited any by their prayers, but I thought I would go and unite with the church, and it might be I would be relieved. But just as I was about to start, it seemed as if something told me that I was not fit to join the church. I accordingly refrained from going forward. I went home, feeling very sad. But my trouble soon wore off, and I concluded that I had not had as much of this world's pleasures as I desired; so I thought to put off joining the church till I was older and had all the pleasures that I wanted. My mind was at ease for some time. Finally I concluded to read the Bible and live a better life. I accordingly did so, and attended Sunday School regularly, and took an active part in all, and concluded that I was getting along very well. I thought I would soon be good enough to join any church. In the course of time there came a Campbellite preacher into my neighborhood, and I went one night to hear him preach. After preaching he said if there were any present who wanted to accept Christ as their Savior, they could come to him at any time and tell him so, and he would baptize them. The thought occurred to my mind that I would go. After the meeting I started for home. It seemed to be the darkest night that I had ever seen. As I was riding along, thinking how good I was, and contemplating joining the church, all of a sudden I was made to see myself a terrible sinner. It seemed like I could see my sins rise like mountains above me. It was so sudden and sensible that I stopped my horse and hesitated whether to proceed further or not. My sins seemed to be so great that I expected to be crushed under them. At length I reached home, and spent the remaining portion of the night in wakefulness. My burden continued to get worse. I did not try to pray at first. My sins seemed to be so great that I felt to be justly condemned. I did not think that God could be just and save such a sinner as I felt to be. Strange to say, I felt my condemnation just, and yet I would implore God to have mercy on me. My prayer was, "God, be merciful to me, a sinner." I was made to feel that all my righteousness was as filthy rags. Just how long I remained in this condition I do not know; but on the second day of July, 1885, I felt that my unprofitable life would not be spared to view the setting of another sun. I retired to my room early that night. I wanted to bid my folks adieu, but was afraid to do so, for fear that they would want to know why I did so, and I did not want my parents to know that their only son was going down to an irretrievable woe. I did not light the lamp in my room. I concluded that before I went to bed I would once more ask God to have mercy on me. Just as I was in the attempt of pleading for mercy, my burden left me, and instead of pleading for mercy I arose praising God. Next morning (July 3d) everything seemed to be praising God. It seemed as if I never had seen nature so beautiful. I felt that I would spend the rest of my days praising God. I thought that my troubles were over, and that I would never sin any more. But O how mistaken I was! The tempter came and told me that I was deceived, that it was only a delusion of the mind, and if I told anybody of it I would deceive them. How I did wish for my burden again, that I might watch it more closely when it left me. I went on in this way for nearly four years, sometimes doubting, sometimes hoping. Finally my mind was impressed that I was neglecting a duty that I felt to be enjoined upon me; so on March 2d, 1889, I went before the church and told them some of what I have written, and that I wanted a home among them. To my surprise they received me without a question. I was baptized the next day by Elder J. R. Bolinger, pastor of the Old, Regular Predestinarian Baptist Church called Antioch. After uniting with the church I had peace of mind for a few days, and then it seemed to me that I had deceived the church. I think that if they could see me as I see myself, they would have no fellowship for me. When I would do good, evil is present with me.

I will conclude by saying that if I am saved, it is by the grace of God; for if there is something for me to do to obtain eternal life, my case is a hopeless one. This much I am satisfied of, and that is, Christ will save all his people with an everlasting salvation, whether I am one or not. The apostle says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." I know that I love the people that I recognize as the people of God.

I have written this to get relief of mind, and I submit it to your judgment to do with as you deem proper.

Yours in hope of a blessed immortality beyond the grave,

JOHN T. SANDERS.

FINDLAY, Ohio, July 27, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS:—Eighteen years ago last May I wrote my experience for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, but a feeling of unworthiness has kept me from sending it. When I read the experience of brother A. A. Edwards, published in the SIGNS of July 17th, 1889, I felt that if the relation of my experience would comfort some poor soul as I have been comforted by reading the experience of others, it would be my duty to forward it to you to dispose of as you think best.

One evening, about the last of October, 1857, while seated on my father's porch, I was seized with a strange impression of my condition as a sinner in the sight of God. For a time I was very much perplexed and in a terrible state of mind. I said nothing, and after a few moments became easy. That was the first and last of such feelings until I entered the army. While in the siege of Vicksburg, and lying under an army wagon, I beheld myself as one of the most wicked wretches in the sight of God that ever lived. I thought if the Lord would spare my life to return home, I would give my heart to him. After tossing on my bunk and passing a very restless night, I went on duty with great heaviness of heart, thinking there never was such a miserable wretch in the world as I was, and that I was different from any one else. I thought I would feel much better if I could only pour out my soul in prayer. But when I thought how sinful I was, I could not raise my eyes to God to ask him to have mercy on such a wretch as I was. After a time I was partially relieved, and would often wonder what such feelings could mean, and whether any person ever had such feelings. The next serious impression I had was while on Bush Mountain, in the state of Georgia, about the middle of June, 1864, while seated around the camp fire. I thought that I must go out by myself and try to pray. I left my companions seated by the fire, enjoying their army talk, characteristic of camp life. I knelt down by a stump on that mountain, and there tried to pray, but could utter nothing but the name God. After I had said that, I wished I had it back, for I felt guilty, to think that I should take the name of the infinite God on my polluted lips. It seemed to me that if the people could see me there, they would point the finger of scorn at me, and exclaim, "That hypocrite!" I felt as though I were trying to deceive the God of heaven. O how wretched I felt, to think I was guilty of such a crime. I returned to my comrades in great heaviness of heart, wishing I could be relieved. I thought, Pray I cannot, and if I remain as I am I can look for nothing but eternal banishment from God. Is there any hope for such a wicked wretch as I am? I thought I had sinned away the day of grace, as the free agency preachers say, and therefore banishment was my just due. At other times I felt great heaviness of heart.

Space will not permit me to give a detailed account of my troubles, but I will refer to some things that are most vivid in my memory. I returned to my home, fully resolved to give my heart to God. I attended protracted meetings, and while volunteers were being called for I thought if I were to go forward I would commit an unpardonable sin in the sight of God, and if I remained away it would be sin. Sin seemed on all sides, and what should I do? I thought that death was my just portion, and that there was no help for me. I felt that I stood alone, no one being like me. Sometimes I felt so bad that I would sweat under my load of guilt and shame. In the fall of the year 1868 I started for the state of Missouri, and remained there the following winter. In the spring of 1869 I went back to Illinois and hired out to a farmer in Morgan County. While there, one evening the family went to a neighbor's house, and I took a book and sat down to read, but could not get interested in its contents. I arose from my chair to put the book away, when the thought struck me with great force, My God, I am lost! My dear brethren, that was the darkest time I have ever experienced. I could sleep nor eat but very little for several days. I went to the city to see if the sights of the city would relieve my mind, but all to no purpose. While there I saw a preacher that used to preach in the little town where I stayed. I thought I would go and lay my case before him, and see if he could do me any good. But as soon as that thought was presented, another followed after this manner, He cannot do you any good; you must bear your trouble alone. I returned home, thinking there was not a more miserable wretch than myself in this world. I wished that I was a beast, or anything that had no soul. My love for this world was all gone. The world seemed but a vain show. I attended religious meetings, Sunday Schools, and places of popular worship, but it seemed to me that I was playing the part of a hypocrite in all that. In that state of mind I returned to my home in Ohio. My journey from Illinois to Ohio was one that I enjoyed but very little. I had to wait in Fort Wayne for a train, and while there I thought there was not a more miserable wretch in all that city than myself. I thought I would have to go through life feeling just that bad, be it long or short; but I felt that I could not endure it long with those feelings. I finally reached my home, but was not relieved. Finally I thought I would plunge into sin, and engage in all kinds of amusement, and spend the balance of my life in as jolly a manner as I could. I attended dances and mite societies, and to all appearances was the most jolly person in the company. While at one of the dancing parties, as the call was made for all to promenade, I feared I would fall to the floor. I feared that some of the party would detect my feelings by my looks; so I tried to conceal them, and to appear as merry as the others. But all the time I was not happy, and my mind was not there. I thought, What shall I do? I continued in this way for about a year and a half after I left Illinois and came to Ohio. One day I was taking supper with brother Delano, and in the course of conversation he related some of his exercise of mind. I turned to him and said, "Did you feel gloomy and bad?" He replied, "Yes." Then I thought that some one had been telling him how I had felt, and that he was trying to haul me into the old "Hard Shell" Church. I thought, There is no church that I despise more than the old "Hard Shell." I got away from him as soon as I could do so with decency, and went to my work, intending to find out if he really did feel as I did. But I intended to keep my thoughts to myself. Afterwards I went to his house to work, and one evening when we were seated by the fire he referred to his experience, and told how bad he had felt, and how he tried to pray, &c. Now, my dear brethren, I will leave you to judge, from the nature of this letter, whether or not I was interested in his conversation. I thought, Is there any hope for me? Dare I hope? Is there any hope for such a wicked, rebellious wretch as I am? On or about the twenty-fifth day of October, I hope and trust that I experienced a hope. I felt happy, and wanted to read the Scriptures, and everything seemed so plain to me that I wanted to talk to everybody. I thought I would always remain in that frame of mind. O how glad I was to think there was a people who could tell my feelings and my travel of mind much better than I could express them myself!

Now, brethren, you have the relation of my little experience, and the hope of the least of all saints, if one at all. I must bring my too lengthy letter to a close. I was buried in baptism by Elder John Biggs on the 30th day of April. I will say in conclusion that you may dispose of this as you think best.

Your unworthy brother, if one at all,

FRANK HUTCHINSON.

"RETURN to thine own house, and shew how great things God hath done unto thee."—Luke viii. 39.

What manner of man was Jesus! In the midst of foaming billows, with the sick, those possessed with devils, or by the bedside of death, he had but to speak and his voice was obeyed. O how I once roamed over the earth, a stranger to grace, and in total ignorance of the fact that I "must be born again" in order to see the King in his beauty. I was destitute of true righteousness, and knew nothing of the soul-cheering doctrine of grace. My feet, that now lead me to the house of praise and worship with the dear saints of God, led me in the paths of sin and uncleanness. I was impressed to tell of the goodness of Jesus the very moment that I received a comfortable hope in his dear, sweet name; but thinking it was only an impression, I tarried. But how great things the Lord had done for me followed me day and night, and is the burden of my heart to-day. I desired then to proclaim the gospel, so rich, so sweet, so free; and doubting these feelings being a call to the gospel ministry, kept me in a state of constant unhappiness. I never, no, never, can forget the first time I took a text and talked in public. I feared and trembled like a child; yet I had some liberty in speaking.

In the words of the text we see a flood of gospel truth, and what one must be endued with in order to the Master's service. The poor Gadarene was a witness of the same mighty power of Jesus in his cleansing that every gospel preacher is to-day. Paul, with all his high human attainments, spent his life in witnessing the greatness of his sovereign Lord. The "great things" are what Paul to the Corinthians calls the "hidden wisdom." To the Galatians he speaks of it as the "unsearchable riches of Christ." To the Romans he declares that God's ways are past finding out. The imputation of divine life and the revealing power of our great Head strike at the root of the tree. How easily the feeblest lamb of the flock can distinguish between the heartless formalism that the world calls religion, and the warm, soul-kindling gospel of God. As I go, speaking to the people the words of this life, how differently those words are received. To some they are foolishness and a stumbling-block; to others the power of God. Telling how great things the Lord has done, discriminates between those who are and those who are not of God. O how my heart is made to overflow with thankfulness to see the tears coursing down the cheeks of some whom I never have seen before, perhaps; while many sit untouched by the truth I so much love. God makes his children differ from the sinful world, and preaching the word hunts and fishes them out. I can look back to the time when Philip first preached to me, although I had been a conscious sinner for almost two years. Sometimes now some poor, crying and troubled one comes to me, and tells me that they never had their feelings told before by any one. I often think that preaching the gospel consists, in part at least, of telling Zion's little ones what God has already done for them. There is a mutual edification of the body of Christ when his gospel is proclaimed. I am a poor sinner still. When I first believed I wanted to remain with Jesus; but he bid me go tell what a Savior I had found. I desire to be kept humbly at the feet of Jesus, and talk of what he has done, and has promised to do, until he calls me hence. I know that a few more storms will land me in eternity, and sometimes I feel that that eternity will be joy forevermore.

DUTTON, Ark., Aug. 23, 1888.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I wish to say to brother A. G. Moore, of Little Rock, Ark., that if he will come up on the L. R. & Ft. S. R. R. to Coal Hill, and thence five miles north to Pleasant Grove Church, on Friday before the fourth Sunday in September (see notice of New Hope Association), he will hear, if the Lord will, "the doctrine of God's electing love and sovereign grace" preached as the only hope for perishing sinners. I presume that brother Moore is from England. There seem to be three classes of Strict Baptists in England. Each of these has a periodical devoted to the defense of its doctrine, though there is no great difference between them. The three periodicals referred to are the Gospel Herald, Earthen Vessel and Gospel Standard. As brother Moore refers to the Standard, I presume that he is of the class represented by it. Hassell says, "The Gospel Standard Strict Baptists most nearly, of all the people in England, resemble the Old School or Primitive Baptists in the United States."—Church History, p. 616.

I would also say to brother J. S. Burns, of Booneville, Miss., that if he will write to Elder L. F. Griffin, Clarksville, Ark., he can probably get a copy of the "History of the Primitive Baptists of Mississippi," by Elder Benjamin Griffin. Elder L. F. Griffin is a son of the author, and probably has a few copies yet on hand. A few years ago he had about sixty copies; and as there has been only a local demand, it is probable that they are not all disposed of. Griffin's history ought to be republished. As to the points at issue between the Missionary and Primitive Baptists, the ground occupied by the Primitives was probably never more ably and scripturally defended. He was a valiant man in Israel. It was my happy privilege to enjoy his ministry in his last days. He was the most uncompromising advocate of Bible truth that I have ever known. He would not swerve one hair's breadth to the right nor left for friend nor foe. Speaking after the manner of men, nothing could have been more opportune for the Baptist cause here than his removal from Mississippi to this state at the time he came here. Of this and other events connected with it I have long thought of writing for the SIGNS, and may yet, if the Lord will.

LOUVALE, Ga., July 29, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—As I was sending you for publication an ordination, I felt like I wanted to write a line or two more. This is the time of the year in our section that we hold our three days meeting, called by some a union meeting, and by some an annual meeting, and by some a three days meeting, and by some the communion meeting. It is really an annual three days union and communion meeting; and they are often glorious meetings to us. We generally have good congregations, especially on Sunday, the last day of the meeting, as they begin on Friday. We generally have visiting brethren in the ministry, and sometimes carry our dinner, and have three or four sermons during the day on Saturday. It was (and in some places is) the custom to read on Saturday the Articles of Faith and the Decorum. On Sunday we have preaching, and sometimes baptism, and always the supper and feet-washing; and the brethren seem to have a joy and rejoicing not witnessed nor seen elsewhere. Among the best and most edifying meetings I ever attended were such meetings as these, where we are made to rejoice in the glorious knowledge of our condescending Lord, who took upon him the form of a servant, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Some of the best preaching I ever heard was at such meetings as these. It seemed the Spirit of the Lord was manifested among his people, and liberty and utterance were given the ministry, that they might boldly make known the riches of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is there indeed we are made to rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh. The good news of the kingdom is made known, brethren seem in honor to prefer one another, and the graces of the Spirit are manifested. The internal beauty of Zion excels all the so-called beauties of this vain world; and truly may we all be able to say, "I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness."

IMPORTANT INDICATIONS.

(Concluded from last number.)

"But in those days, after that tribulation, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars of heaven shall fall, and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken. And then shall they see the Son of man coming in clouds with great power and glory. And then shall he send his angels, and shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost part of the earth to the uttermost part of heaven."—Mark xiii. 24-27.

In its antitypical application to the church in her organization under the order of the gospel kingdom, the instruction given by our Lord in the connection of our text is worthy of solemn consideration. All that is written concerning the chosen nation of Israel is valuable for the example therein contained as the shadow or pattern of things in the gospel heavens. The wonders attending the calling of that nation out of Egypt, their journey through the wilderness, and all their history after they were brought into the land of Canaan, very clearly typify the experience of the church in her sojourn in this valley of the shadow of death. As the nation of Israel was surrounded by hostile nations, with whom the law of God forbade that they should affiliate, so the church is forbidden to form a confederation with any of the religious nations surrounding her. While the immediate application of the warnings here given was clearly to signify the removal of those legal heavens by the destruction of that nation, there is ground for believing that the antitype of those signs may signify the approaching close of the existing state of the church. Certainly it is not to be understood that the subjects of electing love shall ever be cast off, as that natural Israel have ceased to be the peculiarly favored people of God in a temporal sense; but there is clearly an application in which the visible organization of the church in its manifestation in time is removed. This has been done in the case of those churches which were located at Jerusalem, in Galatia, at Corinth, and other places, in the apostolic age. The indications which preceded the blotting out of those local churches are all embraced in "the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not." This place is said to be the "holy place."—Matt. xxiv. 15. We know of no "holy place" which can be thus polluted but the visible organization of the church. The context clearly indicates the absence of brotherly love as the abomination spoken of. Where this blight has fallen upon any branch of the church its desolating effect is always painfully evident. Selfishness is the first indication of this abomination. This may appear in the form of that greed of worldly wealth which is ordinarily called covetousness; or it may be that self seeks the pre-eminence in the estimation of the church, as it is recorded of Diotrephes, who is condemned by the inspired apostle.—3 John 9. In any case it is idolatry, which is denounced by the Lord as a deadly sin, "For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience."—Col. iii. 6. The existence of this carnal principle in those who are numbered among the professed members of the church of Christ, is one of the signs of impending desolation. Can we see anything of this awful abomination among the churches now? Well may each professed follower of Jesus tremblingly ask, "Lord, is it I?" "Is this awful spirit of desolation found lurking in the dark recesses of my deceitful heart?" If we have not found its deadly poison in our own carnal mind it is because our eyes are darkened by the deceitfulness of indwelling sin. There is no evil which is too vile for the sinful heart to harbor in its corrupt depths. But Paul was by divine grace enabled to keep under his body and bring it into subjection; and in this he presents to every saint an example.

Can we claim that we are endeavoring to follow that pattern? The prevalence of discord and strife among those who trust in that salvation which is revealed in Jesus, gives evidence that there are some who live after the flesh, and yield their members servants to the corruption of their carnal minds, instead of walking in the Spirit of Christ. When this principle governs the professed followers of Jesus they manifest one of the indications which are recorded by inspiration; of which Paul says that they shall appear in the last days, when perilous times shall come. "For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away."—2 Tim. iii. 2-5. Almost with his latest breath our Lord enjoined upon his disciples the necessity of continual watchfulness. Experience teaches his followers that they have more need to give constant heed to this injunction by carefully watching themselves than by noticing the conduct of others. From those who pursue a disorderly course in disregarding the holy commandment of our Lord the saints are directed to turn away; but it never can cease to be needful for them to heed the direction, "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves."—2 Cor. xiii. 5. Strict obedience to this divine requirement will afford ample employment for those who know the deceitfulness of their own hearts, without allowing time to critically watch our brethren. It is a common error into which many of the saints are betrayed by the tempter, to think it their duty to "watch over their brethren in love;" but there is no such duty required of them by the inspired rule. The shepherd of Israel himself watches over all his flock; and he neither slumbers nor forgets his charge. He has not made any of his followers the guardians of their brethren. "We shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ." So Paul says, "Let us not therefore judge one another any more; but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling-block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way."—Rom. xiv. 13. This manner of judgment will require of us continually to be engaged in watching ourselves. When the saints assume to watch over one another even for their good, they must neglect the self-examination which is enjoined upon each of them. This is one of the deceitful devices whereby the adversary seeks to entangle the unwary, and lead them away from the path of obedience. The prevalence of a disposition to engage in judging one another is an indication of the removal of that peace and joy in the Holy Ghost which characterize the kingdom of God.—Rom. xiv. 17. Does this sign of the end appear among any of the churches at this time? If it does, there can be no question as to the fulfillment of the desolation which it portends, unless the Lord is pleased to bestow grace to heal such backsliding. May he deliver any of his saints who are thus captivated by their own carnal minds, and restore unto all his erring children that spirit of humility and meekness by which they may be enabled to "recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will."—2 Tim. ii. 26. As the literal translation of this expression is given in the margin, it is "taken alive," which shows conclusively that those who are thus captivated are living children of God. "Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."—1 Cor. x. 12. The indulgence of carnal selfishness will always result in destruction of the peace and fellowship which make the church a heavenly home to those who are led by the Spirit of Christ. It is of the utmost importance, therefore, that those who love the church should ever be watchful to detect the first indication of this evil principle in their own hearts.

In many places there are at the present time evidences of discord and strife among those who have in the past manifested the fellowship and love of brethren. This fact may well be regarded as an indication that the lusts of the flesh have usurped the place of the love of Christ, in leading those who are engaged in such wars and fightings. Those who are thus misled may be very sincere in thinking that they are governed by earnest zeal for the truth; but they may well consider the result of their conduct when they see that it tends to distress and alienate the saints, instead of developing mutual love and that humility which esteems others better than self. It is not strange that the saints now are liable to mistake the manner of spirit they are of, since even the disciples supposed they were prompted by zeal for their Lord when desiring to avenge the unkindness which was shown him by the Samaritans.—Luke ix. 51-55. It is still needful for each saint to cry unto the Lord, "Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faults."—Psa. xix. 12. The spirit of falsehood never comes in the form of an enemy when attempting to deceive the saints. He always assumes the appearance of an angel of light for the purpose of accomplishing his cruel design. It is still needful that we remember the test given by our great Teacher, "By their fruits ye shall know them."—Matt. vii. 20. The Spirit of truth does not produce the evil works of the flesh.

In the providence of God we are now witnessing peculiarly significant events in the natural world. In the political affairs of the nations there are important indications to which the saints may well give attention. For the past century the church has been favored with immunity from legal proscription and persecution, as she has never before been since the apostolic day. The strife among the various divisions of antichristian orders has been made to shield the saints from the wrath of their enemies. The hand of the Lord manifestly interposed in defense of his people in giving the protection of constitutional liberty in the establishment of the American republic. The religious world has hitherto been so divided that no party among them could control the arm of secular power. This fact has secured the church of Christ the immunity from persecution which they have enjoyed. There are now indications that the end of this liberty is at hand. Already the power of false religion is to some extent controlling legislation, and the same aspiring principle is surely seeking further recognition in the control of the law-making branches of both State and Federal governments. These are important indications which should attract the attention of the saints. The spirit of persecution is not less bloody now than when Cain murdered his brother. The mercy of God has restrained its manifestation hitherto; but there are serious reasons to apprehend that the time is near when the church will again be called to encounter such persecutions as have in past ages stained the earth with the blood of those whose only crime was that they could not deny their allegiance to their gracious Redeemer. When that time of severe trial shall come upon the saints, we are assured that they shall still be under the protecting care of their great Shepherd; and that he is able to deliver them out of all their distresses even at the sacrifice of the nations of the earth and of the material universe; but while their salvation is certain they may be called to suffer the loss of all earthly treasures, including possessions, friends and reputation. Nothing less than omnipotent grace can enable any saint to stand against such a storm of opposition; but God is faithful, who has said, "My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness."—2 Cor. xii. 9. This is the everlasting arm which is underneath his saints in their deepest affliction; and with such support they are assured of final victory over all opposing powers.

According to our understanding of the important indications which are now manifest, the saints have not to apprehend that the subversion of their liberty is to come from any one party either religious or political, but from the gathering together of all contending parties, as Herod and Pilate were made friends together the same day when our Lord was to be crucified.—Luke xxiii. 12. Even now the most hostile sects and parties can agree in most of their unauthorized religious inventions. They are separated by merely trivial barriers, which could all be removed in a very short time when they are ready to join in the open persecution of the church of Christ. The control of the education of all the children of the country is already under the power of the popular clergy, and the sentiment is very general throughout the community that the law should dictate religious instruction to all the schools. With this power the people can soon be educated to legislate proscription of all who refuse to worship the image of the beast which is exalted by the command of the modern antichristian power.

In giving this brief expression of our understanding of the portion of our Lord's discourse to which brother True refers we have no design to claim superior light upon it; nor do we for a moment presume that we have presented anything new to him. But with such ability as the Lord has given we desire at all times to comply with the wishes of all lovers of the truth who may call upon us. May every follower of Jesus ever be enabled by the grace of God to heed his command as given to all in the close of the chapter in which our text is recorded, "And what I say unto you I say unto all, Watch!"

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Corresponding Meeting of Virginia, convened with the church at Quantico, Prince William Co., Va., August 14th, 15th and 16th, 1889, to sister associations and meetings with which she corresponds, sends greeting.

DEAR BRETHREN:—In addressing you this our annual letter we are led to consider some of the fundamental truths upon which our hope of eternal life is based, and which are also the basis of our fellowship in the Spirit. The fellowship of the saints does not rest upon the mere fact that they subscribe to certain creeds or articles of faith, no matter how carefully they are framed or worded. The history of the church is rife with creeds framed by uninspired men, which have to be modified by succeeding generations, only to be again altered as the burning light of truth reveals their defects. Words are at best but signs, and often are misleading signs in the mouths of uninspired men; for who can express, save he who is divinely inspired, what the Spirit reveals in his experience? Who of the Lord's people has not felt the barrenness of words to convey a truthful picture of what is seen in the mind and felt in the heart of one who has seen Jesus and felt the power of his word? Doubtless misapprehensions, misunderstandings and divisions arise among the saints from this cause. "The form of sound words," which the apostle enjoins, is the vehicle of those things which the Spirit reveals, and not the things themselves; for the gospel is not in word only. Doubtless the apostle Paul was speaking of his own experience when he mentioned one who was caught up into paradise, and saw things which it was unlawful to utter. The doctrine of God our Savior is not a formula of words, not a theory to be taught by word and learned as a theory, though this is the view the world takes of it; but God's people do not so learn it. Nor is that doctrine like a proposition in natural science, which can be exactly demonstrated to finite intelligence. It is a mystery. Says the apostle, "We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery." A fundamental truth of that doctrine is that it is a personal, individual matter between the conscious sinner and his God. We may form theories of high-sounding words, and appeal to the Scriptures to sustain them; we may boast of their soundness, and proclaim them with great eloquence and zeal; multitudes may indorse them, and churches be organized upon them; yet notwithstanding all this, we must be brought down to the simple question, What do you know in your own personal experience of these things? Above that knowledge we cannot soar, beneath that knowledge we cannot descend, beyond it we cannot reach; hence the intercession of the Spirit in the heart of the saint, "Search me, O God, and know my heart," &c. "Search me," pleads the psalmist. This personal supplication, as though the individual were alone with his God, is characteristic of the saints, as is shown throughout the whole Scriptures. The electing love, the sovereign choice, of our God, is manifest in this petition. There is no generalizing here. Every conscious sinner is a particular sinner, and needs a particular atonement. This truth permeates every exercise of his mind, every desire of his heart. "I am undone," is the truth that he is learning, and his teacher is Truth itself. He is led about in the wilderness and instructed. The perfections of God are revealed to him as he can bear them, especially his justice and holiness, as something which specially and vitally concerns himself; and in spite of the awful condition in which he is placed regarding them, he loves them—indeed, they are all glorious to him. An indescribable longing springs up in his heart to be like him, holy as he is holy, pure as he is pure; but can a vile sinner presume to hope for blessings so divine? Does not that very justice which he loves require his death? Is he not already condemned, and under the sentence of God's holy law? So he is a witness to the justice of his own condemnation, and to the righteousness of that law which condemns him. He casts the blame upon no one else. He does not seek refuge under the predestination of God to excuse him and apologize for his sins. He confesses, "I am the man, and I alone am responsible." The light of truth has shined in this man, revealing to him the hidden evils of his heart, the wretched depravity of his very nature, until he is made to cry out in bitterness of spirit, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" But straight is the path for his feet. His heaven draws near, and Jesus is revealed as the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. But he is just as much that person's Savior as the sins he is saved from are his own personal sins. He is still alone with his God, though he sees his glory now shining in the face of Jesus Christ. His night of mourning is past, and his morning of joy is come; for his light is come, and the glory of the Lord has risen upon him. So at rest does he feel, so assured of the removal of his sins far from him, that in his childish simplicity he imagines that he is made over new, soul and body, and that sin is at an end so far as he is concerned; but he is soon undeceived, for he finds that law of which the apostle speaks, that when he would do good, evil is present with him. In a word, he finds that whatever the change may be in his case, his vile nature remains the same; and instead of having experienced the redemption from sin which he fondly hoped, he has received a good hope through grace of that redemption. He has received the earnest, and not the consummation. In his flesh there dwells no good thing; but he has a hope that though this earthly house of his tabernacle were dissolved, he has a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

We trust, dear brethren, that we have given an outline of the story of redemption, as known in the experience of the Lord's dear people. In substance it is the same in every one of them, though there may be much variety in detail; for all have the same Teacher, and are all taught the same thing, and are commanded to speak the same thing, which they certainly could not do had they not learned the same thing. Here we find a people whom God has put together. Hear his word, "I will surely assemble, O Jacob, all of thee; I will surely gather the remnant of Israel; I will put them together as the sheep of Bozrah, as the flock in the midst of their fold." Again, we read, "What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." They are put together because Christ is in them all. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." They are one in him, one body, baptized into one Spirit. All this is manifest in the saints by their being drawn together by cords stronger than those of a man, by the operation and power of that love shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, that love of which they are born; for "every one that loveth is born of God," for "God is love," says the inspired John, in substance. When the apostle speaks of endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, he is stating a truth deeply engraven upon the heart of every true child of our God. Now, brethren, whence come divisions among the saints? They certainly cannot come from the teachings of Christ in them, for in and through him they are put together, and Christ cannot be divided. Herein also is the basis of fellowship, that term by which we express union one with another. There certainly can be no diversity here. But there is an enemy in the camp—a watchful, cunning, malicious enemy, to worry and annoy, and, if it were possible, to destroy. That enemy is the flesh; that heart which is "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it?" that carnal mind, which is "enmity against God; it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." This enemy we worship by nature, and exalt above everything else in earth or heaven; and even now, as self, he intrudes into those things which he ought not, striving in every cunning, deceitful way to exalt himself in the place of God, and so far prevails sometimes as to make us think that we manifest great zeal for the truth and the cause of God, when in reality we are blindly following this false and lying god. But thanks be to God, he has an effectual remedy for this evil. A fire is kindled in Zion and a furnace in Jerusalem; and down into the fiery furnace must we go. It is a fearful remedy. "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God," "for our God is a consuming fire." Then and there only are the works of the flesh burned up. That mountain of conceit and pride and vain-glory is consumed in a moment, and we sit amongst the ashes of our own folly, and drink the bitter cup of sorrow and humiliation to the dregs. What an experience of anguish and self-abasement! The very worms of the dust are more worthy of consideration than we. But what heavenly fruit does such personal experience bear! Christ and his beauty shine out, giving light and joy to all around. Self is laid low, Christ is exalted, confidence in our wisdom and knowledge is destroyed, and, like "little children," we receive and enter into the kingdom of God. It is only through such an experience that we can feel real compassion for those who are out of the way; for right here in this humiliation is felt the power of the intercession, "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts: and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." The nearer we live to God, the more firmly we are established in the truth, the more fully the doctrine of God our Savior is revealed unto us, the less confidence we have in ourselves, and the more we have in our brethren. When the apostle says, "Let each esteem others better than himself," he gives utterance to a truth fixed deeply in the feelings of every true and tried child of God; for he feels that he knows that every one is better, wiser and more worthy than himself. This humility is not voluntary, and it brings him near to Jesus. What an accursed spirit that is which seeks to exalt its possessor above his brethren! Your hearts, dear brethren, revolt against it, and you grieve for its possessor.

What we have written hitherto refers only to those who are subjects of God's grace; but the apostle speaks of evil men coming into the visible church for some selfish reason, and sooner or later they cause trouble. Having a show of godliness, and with a form of words, they deceive the church. As the individual saint is tried, that every false and lying spirit may be manifest; so the church is tried, that those which are approved may be manifest, and those which are not approved may be brought to the light. As a foreign substance in our natural bodies may lie dormant for awhile, but sooner or later its presence is betrayed by the operations of life going on about it, and trouble and unrest, pain and disease, are the consequence of its presence in the body; so those self-seeking "wolves in sheep's clothing" may for awhile cause no great trouble, but when the fires of persecution and tribulation come upon the church for the trial of faith, the true character of those is brought to the light. Their methods are as various as the cunning of the master whom they serve. But from whatever source divisions and dissensions may come, the apostle commands us to mark and avoid those who cause them. The spirit of Christ gathers, and those who are led by it are found "endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Divisions come from the lusts of the flesh, pride, conceit, vainglory, and a host of accursed spirits from the bottomless pit of our own vile natures. Unity and peace come from above, like the dew of Hermon descending upon the mountains of Zion; and if we seek those things which are above, we certainly will seek those things which make for peace.

We have outlined a few simple but fundamental truths upon which our fellowship is based, and which are the ground of our hope. We believe that we hold the same doctrine and contend for the same faith in all its glorious fullness which we have held since our organization, and which the old faithful servants of God have contended for in the years that are past. Our sentiments and views of truth have undergone no change. What we have published hitherto in our letters and Minutes we still adhere to; nor do we desire any change, only that we may grow more and more in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ; that we may be more fruitful in the word, having our understandings enlightened and our hearts enlarged with the love of God and of our brethren; that we may have patience and forbearance with each other, not making a brother an offender for a word, not striving about words to no profit, but exercising charity, while we realize our own ignorance and need of charity and forbearance. May the God of heaven put us, with all who fear his name, together as the flock of Bozrah, or tribulation, for it seems there is no other way; and like the good shepherd, may he feed and keep us, and preserve us unto his everlasting kingdom.

We desire to be ever grateful to the Giver of all good for the many blessings that are ever bestowed upon us, feeling that we are in his hands as the clay in the hands of the potter; and let us rejoice that he who keeps Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps, as we are brought more and more to realize the truth of the language of the psalmist, "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

Our next annual meeting is appointed to be held, by divine permission, with the Frying Pan Church, Fairfax Co., Va., to begin on Wednesday before the third Sunday in August, 1890, at which time and place we hope to greet your messengers and receive your messages of love and expressions of fellowship.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

My wife, Emma C. Rittenhouse, died July 22d, 1889, of consumption, aged thirty-two years.

She was the daughter of Deacon Alex. Frazier, of Bryn Zion Church, Kent Co., Del. Her mother died when she was quite young; her father is still living. We were married Dec. 19th, 1881. She was baptized on the first Sunday in February, 1883, I following her one month afterward. We were baptized by Elder J. L. Staton, uniting with the church at Welch Tract. She joined the Presbyterians in her early experience, but was never at home there. A sermon by Elder Chick at Bryn Zion finally decided the matter for her. Afterward, Elder Vanmeter's sermon at the same place, on the great and strong cedars, and the tender little plants that needed to be watered and cared for, gave her renewed strength. She followed him to the Delaware River Association, expecting to be thus fed all the time, but had to go many days on the strength of the food (1 Kings xix. 8) she had received. So it seems throughout her religious life that she had very bright times, followed by weeks of gloom. As her strength failed, earthly relationships grew dim, the love of the brethren and sisters in Christ grew stronger, and she said she could talk to them of her life, her death and her hope, and they could understand her. What a blessed assurance our Father has given us that we are all taught by the same Spirit!

Elder J. L. Staton preached at her funeral at Bryn Zion, testifying to that same mutual understanding that she had spoken of, although he had not known of her words to me.

STATE ROAD, Del., Aug. 26, 1889.

BROTHER John H. Sawin, whose death occurred on the 17th of July in a very distressing manner, was about thirty-six years of age. He was also a member of Little Bethel Church, near Loxa, having been baptized in the fellowship of the Bethel Church, Johnson Co., Ind., about the year 1875. Obtaining a letter of dismission from that church, he with his wife united with the above mentioned church several years since, where he lived a blameless life until his earthly career ended, which was so sudden and unexpected. He only survived about the space of three hours after receiving the injuries that took him off. He was fully conscious until the last expiring breath. No word of complaint or murmur came from his lips. The faith and confidence he had in the blood and righteousness of the Redeemer in life gave him a joyous escort through the valley of the shadow of death. The following clipping is from the Charleston (Ill.) Herald:

"On Saturday evening last we were painfully shocked by the news of Mr. John Sawin's sudden death, caused by the giving way of a bridge south of the Burgner residence, and which precipitated himself, the engine, separator and horses to the bottom of the stream. The funeral took place Sunday afternoon at three o'clock. Before starting to the cemetery at Bethel Church, some three miles distant, Elder J. G. Sawin made as well-timed and appropriate remarks as we have ever listened to on an occasion of the kind, and also read from one of Paul's epistles words most suitable and consoling to the friends of the deceased. Elder Eli Ashbrook followed with an earnest and touching prayer."

May God bless the widow and the orphaned daughter with a full share of grace to help in time of need, and sanctify their affliction to their good.

Your brother in hope,

J. G. SAWIN.

LOXA, Ill., Aug. 15, 1889.

Mrs. D. W. Parsons was born June 14th, 1819, in the town of Broome, Schoharie Co., N. Y., and was the daughter of the late Avery Cole. She, like all of Adam's race, was born a sinner; but God, who quickeneth the dead and raiseth up whom he will, sent arrows of conviction to her heart, and she sought mortal help in vain. But the God of all grace at length gave her peace in believing in Jesus as her atoning Savior. At the age of nineteen years she offered herself to the Primitive Baptists in Broome, and continued with that people during her stay on earth. She was married to D. W. Parsons Sept. 15th, 1847, living with her husband forty-one years. She was the mother of five children, of whom three are living, two sons and one daughter. She was an affectionate mother, a dutiful and kind wife, loved and esteemed by her family, friends and brethren. She died in hope on the 28th of April, 1889. A discourse was preached at the house by Elder James Miller, concerning the saints' inheritance. She was interred in the Stamford Cemetery, to await the call of the Son of God to arise to immortality.

"When ghastly death appears in view,
Christ's presence shall our fears subdue;
He comes to set thy spirit free,
And as thy days thy strength shall be."

D. W. PARSONS.

SOUTH GILBOA, N. Y.

OUR beloved brother, F. M. Cole, departed this life August 11th, 1889, aged fifty-five years, eleven months and twenty-nine days.

His disease was so complicated that it is hard to tell what it was that took him away. He had been frail for several years, and was confined to the house ten months, and most of the time to his bed. He leaves a dear wife and five dutiful children, with the church, to mourn their loss, but not as those who have no hope, for we believe that our loss is his eternal gain. May his dear family be reconciled to the dealings of the good Lord with them. May he be a husband to the widow and a father to the children, and may they say in their hearts, "Thy will be done in all things," realizing that God is too wise to err, and too good to be unkind.

"A precious one from us has gone,
A voice we loved is stilled,
A place is vacant in our home
Which never can be fill'd.

"God in his wisdom has recalled
The boon his love had given;
And though the body molders here,
The soul is safe in heaven."

JAMES A. COX.

MOUNTSVILLE, Va.

S. Timmerman, Sr., was born in South Carolina in 1825, and moved with his mother to Georgia when quite young, living there the remainder of his life, which ended May 26th, 1889. His age was sixty-four years and six months. He was married when about twenty-one years of age, and raised ten children, all of whom are living and highly respected. He professed religion and joined the Primitive Baptist Church, and lived a consistent and worthy member for about twenty years. He was industrious and economical, yet immensely liberal. When the poor came to him in need of anything they were supplied. He rose steadily from comparative obscurity to considerable notoriety, but he was remarkably reticent. His home was a home for the preachers, and they were always welcomed there and made happy. He was taken sick on Sunday morning, and lived until the next Sunday, suffering severely. His affection was inflammation of the bladder. He leaves a mother, wife, ten children, and many relatives and friends, with the churches, to mourn their loss.

His life was truly noble, sublime and pure.

HIS SON.

Mrs. Evaline C. Griffis died August 1st, 1889, of pneumonia, at the residence of her son, N. C. Griffis, at Ludington, Mason Co., Mich., aged seventy-four years, five months and eighteen days.

She had been failing slowly since her first attack, four years ago, having had the third attack last spring. She passed away so quietly that we scarcely knew when her spirit left her. Her only request, made some time before her death, was that she be buried in our cemetery here, as plainly as possible; which request was complied with. Her casket was covered with flowers, contributed by loving neighbors, it being impossible for any of our friends to reach here in time for the funeral. She lived a life devoted to her God, family and friends, and has gone to her reward. Not being able to attend any meetings of her church, she prized her paper (the SIGNS OF THE TIMES) very highly, and found much comfort in its reading.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LOUVALE, Ga., Aug. 21, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—I am in receipt of a letter from a friend and reader of the SIGNS in Canada, who requests my views on a certain part of the Scriptures, asking about the expression in the last written article by me in the SIGNS, the mother of Zebedee's children asking that her two sons might sit one on the right and the other on the left hand in his kingdom.—Matt. xx. 20, 21. I suppose the mother had the common idea of a king, and those whom the king chose to sit with him about his throne; and she thought she would speak for the position of her two sons to occupy in the kingdom of Jesus. Of course we do not know what the woman thought, but we know that even the apostles, who were better instructed, did not understand the nature of the kingdom of Christ; and when Jesus spoke of the deicide he would accomplish at Jerusalem Peter said, "Far be it from thee." The Lord rebuked Peter, and said, "Get thee behind me, Satan: thou art an offense unto me: for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those things that be of men."—Matt. xvi. 23.

Although the same rebuke was not given the mother of Zebedee's children, one equally important was measured to her. "It shall be given to them for whom it is prepared." This question had been settled in the past ages before, and had been prophesied of, that a king should reign in righteousness, and princes should rule in judgment; and her two sons had already been elected of God to fill the position that God had appointed them to in time. John, the beloved disciple, leaned upon the bosom of the Master, and James was to live with the Master, and be an eye witness of his majesty, and to be with him in the holy mount, and then to write such an epistle as he did, which so clearly illustrates the spirit and doctrine of the grand sermon on the mount. It is true that the Lord does better by us, and more for us, than we ask, or that we are in any sense worthy to receive. So he did by the sons of Zebedee. Whether it referred to the temporal kingdom or the kingdom in glory, I think it was the temporal kingdom, and that she only looked to this as the Jews generally did, thinking he would reign as Cæsar. It teaches us an important lesson, and I am of the belief that we may all profit thereby.

"The kingdom of heaven," "the kingdom of God," "the kingdom" and "my kingdom," are frequent expressions used in the Scriptures. There is a mystery in the kingdom that is known only to the heirs of the kingdom. "To you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom;" but to them that were without Jesus speaks in parables; that seeing they may see and not perceive, and in hearing they may hear and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and he should heal them.—Matt. xiii. 10-15. "The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." I often think of the kingdom in its mystical nature. It is not embraced in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. It is also called the wisdom of God. Paul said, "Howbeit we speak wisdom among them that are perfect: yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to naught: but we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory; which none of the princes of this world knew: for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory."—1 Cor. ii. 6-8. The disciples on one occasion asked the Lord if they should not command fire to come down and destroy his enemies, as Elijah did. But he rebuked them, saying, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." There was also a strife among them which one should be the greatest; and he said, "The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them." "But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve."—Luke xxii. 25, 26. The ability to enjoy and realize the nature and glory of this kingdom is from above. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."—John iii. 3. The grand mystery of this life principle, enabling us to see and appreciate the kingdom of Christ, is hidden in the wisdom of God, and can only be understood on the principle of faith and revelation. It is true that the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God."—1 Cor. ii. 9, 10. Then if we know in part concerning this grand mystery, we know it only by faith and the revelation of the Spirit of God. Jesus said, "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight."—Matt. xi. 25, 26. This glorious life principle is the precious substance of the kingdom of Christ Jesus. This is one of the peculiar marks of God's people, which distinguishes them from all other people who dwell on the earth—two lives; one by transmission from Adam, and one by regeneration from Christ. Paul could truly say, "I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me."

I take pleasure in calling attention to the work of brother J. H. Oliphant on regeneration; and those who would wish to read a very instructive treatise on the subject would do well to obtain it and read it, as it tends to satisfy the mind on many points; and those brethren who have a weak mind as to what the written word and preaching is for, would do well to read it and note carefully the handling of the word of God, not deceitfully, but by manifestation of the truth commending himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God. I wish it had a wide circulation among the saints of God. I am satisfied, however, that all the study from without will not let us into the merits of this glorious kingdom; but that anointing which teacheth you all things is the only true principle by which we shall arrive at a true knowledge of the glorious kingdom of God. It is the gift of God, eternal life, through or by which we understand the things that are freely given us of God. I have found that when brethren who have been instructed in the things of the kingdom testify, their testimony confirms those who have the witness in them that these things are so. They knew it before, but they did not know they knew it, until they heard it by the authority of God spoken in the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing spiritual things with spiritual. Jesus is the subject, and he is the object. He is the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end, the hidden wisdom of God, which he ordained before the world unto our glory. We know that he is the Christ of God. He is the promise of God. He is all in all, and over all, God blessed forever. Amen. He is the Morning Star, the Tree of Life, the Ancient of Days, the Vine, the Redeemer, the Messiah, Immanuel, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Zechariah says he shall be a Priest upon his throne. These things are all true, and more besides. Even all these figures fail to express the fullness and grace which was in him. John testifies that "the law was given by Moses; but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." "And of his fullness have all we received, and grace for grace." It takes grace to sustain and feed grace; and it never tells us that we have received grace for works, for they do not mix at all; but "grace for grace." For we are saved by grace, through faith, and that not of ourselves, it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast. We believe all such boasting is vain delusion, put upon the market by those workmongers who glory in their shame, who mind earthly things, sensual, not having the Spirit. This doctrine of the kingdom is the true doctrine, which Jesus said his heirs, who shall come to him, should know of. "Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me." "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord; and great shall be the peace of thy children." "They shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest." Jesus said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest [not put you to work]. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."—Matt. xi. 28-30.

We might ask, How could Moses write out the account of the creation of God as he did? We answer, By revelation. For God can as easily unfold the past as he can the future; and there is no more mystery in God showing him what had taken place, than there was in his showing the prophets what would take place in the future. Daniel certainly wrote beforehand what would come to pass, as accurately as Moses did what had transpired years before. How did Peter, James and John know what Jesus was praying about when they were asleep? How did Luke know what Agrippa and others said in the ante-room? We answer, By revelation. For this is the only principle by which we are assured of the deep and mystical things of the kingdom of God; and upon this principle can we say, as did Peter, "We believe and are sure that thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." The great Teacher said to Peter, "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father." So we see we can only understand spiritual things by the mind of the Spirit, and not by the faculties of the carnal mind, which is enmity against God, not subject to his law, neither indeed can be. So then those that are in the flesh cannot please God; but in the Spirit only can we worship God in spirit and in truth; for he seeketh such only to worship him. When we come into this kingdom we are assured that it is alone the work of God that we believe on him that sent Christ; for there is no possible work of the creature that can produce such amazing results as came to us by the new birth. People often imagine that the new birth is something that they bring about, and are like the Irishman who was asked if he was born in Dublin. He answered that he was not born immediately in the city, but was born just outside the city, but could have been born in the city if he had preferred it. So do vain Arminians profess to control the new birth. It is often the case with them as with the colored man who said, when he saw the new converts go back into the world again, "Ah, boss, you all born them too soon; born'd them too soon, boss." When they "born them" it is always too soon. It is the height of presumption, and folly wrought in Babylon, and mockery against the work of God; and, Sarah-like, it can only produce Ishmaelites to mock Isaac, the son of promise, the heaven-born child of God. The birth of Isaac truly represents the birth of the children of God. When nature was exhausted, and too old and weak to bring forth, Isaac was born. So it is when all the experiments and efforts of men fail, and they become exhausted, then the child is born an heir of heaven, and born from above, by the promise of him who sware by himself, saying, "Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee."

I submit the above for the consideration of the friend and reader of the SIGNS in Canada, and hope it may be of some benefit to him. I have written as the thoughts occurred to me, and know that it has been in a scattering way. My thoughts have not been as connected as at some other times, but I trust the heirs of the kingdom will understand me; and to those who are not heirs it will be of little interest in any way. The brethren will make due allowance for all my weaknesses, and throw the mantle of charity over my imperfections. Grace, mercy and peace be with you all, and the love of God dwell richly in your hearts, is my humble desire, for the dear Redeemer's sake.

Yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

LONOKE, Ark., Aug. 27, 1889.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—About two weeks since my brother and myself withdrew from the Missionary Baptist Church here, and united with the Primitive or Old School Baptists at Wattensaw, about seven miles from this place. Ever since then I have felt that I ought to write you a few lines, which you can publish if you think them worthy. I pray God that they may be instrumental in his hand to the comforting of some of his little ones now tabernacling in clay.

In the fall of 1887 I was by the power of God's Spirit made to see myself as a sinner condemned to everlasting death by the righteous Judge of all the earth; and then, glory be to his name, I was by the same power pointed to "the Rock that is higher than I." I was made to feel that my sins were all obliterated by the blood of the Lamb slain for the sins of his people, all that the Father had given him. I did not "get religion," but, thank God, religion got me, and I can feelingly say with the poet,

"Jesus sought me when a stranger,
Wandering from the fold of God," &c.

After my conversion, thinking it was my duty to unite with some body of christians, I joined the Missionary Baptist Church at Lonoke. I did not then trouble myself much about doctrinal subjects, being like a babe, satisfied with the milk of the gospel. But after some time God in his mercy created in me a spiritual hungering for the "strong meat" of the word. I found I was in the wrong place, and that the doctrine generally preached among that denomination could not be reconciled with the Bible. In May last I attended divine services at Wattensaw for the first time; and after hearing Elder William Garner proclaim the omnipotence of God and the "unsearchable riches of Christ," I felt that I had truly been to the banqueting-house of the Lord, that his banner over me was love, and that I had partaken of a feast of fat things full of marrow, wines on the lees well refined.—Isa. xxv. 6. The sweet recollection of that day, methinks, will be always fresh in my memory. While thinking of it, I felt like crying out with brother Paul of old, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" Also with the prophet Micah, "Who is a God like unto thee?"—Micah vii. 18. I have been attending services at Wattensaw every month since that blessed occasion. About two weeks ago the church extended an arm to Lonoke, for the purpose of receiving members, when my brother and myself joined, as I have already stated. If in time God shall see fit to make us strong enough, we want to organize a Primitive Baptist Church at Lonoke. I ask the prayers of Zion's sons and daughters in the matter, that if it be his will, the little one may become a thousand, and the small one a great nation.—Isa. lx. 22. May we at all times be fully resigned to the will of God in this and in everything else. May our heavenly Father

"Give grace to say, from sun to sun, Whate'er betide, Thy will be done."

May we realize what our Lord hath said, "Not by might, nor by power; but by my spirit."—Zech. iv. 6. If at any time we are despondent in regard to Zion's cause, may the Holy Spirit bring the Savior's words to our minds, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

We are taking the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and consider it a great blessing to Israel's weary pilgrims, and very beneficial as a medium through which they can tell each other what great things the Lord hath done for them.

In thinking of Jesus, our Surety and Friend,
Our anthems of praise let us, pilgrims,
now blend;

In meek adoration our voices shall swell
To him who hath loved us and saved us from hell.

Gave us joy for our sadness, changed night into day;

Drew our wandering feet from the deep miry clay;

On the Rock of salvation we now firmly stand,

Placed there by his righteous, omnipotent hand.

When a poor soul is placed by the Lord
on that Rock,

He can never be moved by the mightiest shock;

Though devils may rage, he will still hold his place,

Sustained by God's changeless and almighty grace.

The hosts of the evil one all may conspire
In their deadliest hatred and venomous ire;

Though their councils they hold in the low depths of hell,

Preserved in Christ Jesus the saints safely dwell.

Then ye who are filled with God's heavenly love,

Who feel you are born of the Spirit above,

To him who hath saved you meek praises
now bring,

And crown him triumphant, your Lord and your King.

"His love, how wonderful!
How matchless, full and free!

Beyond all comprehension is That love which rescued me."

But I must close, lest I infringe too much on your valuable space. I pray that God may long use you as instruments in his hand for the promulgation of the Bible doctrine of his predestinating, electing and justifying love. I ask the prayers of the Israel of God, that my faith waver not, but that I may endure steadfast until the end, holding fast the form of sound doctrine. May we always realize with the poet that "There is a place where spirits blend,

Where friend holds fellowship with friend;
Though sundered far, by faith we meet
Around one common mercy-seat."

After a few more years shall roll we shall be called to the blessed abode of the saints, where pain and sorrow enter not, but where all is peace and happiness. There faith shall be swallowed up in glorious sight, and we shall join the hosts that have gone before in singing "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father: to whom be glory and dominion forever. Amen."

May the grace of God the Father, Son and Holy Ghost abide with you and all the Israel of God, both now and forevermore, is the prayer of
yours in gospel bonds,

BENJAMIN COX.

SIX MILE, Ill., Feb. 24, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:
—If one so unworthy may claim such a relationship with those we look upon as being so much our superiors.
How often in my weakness I am made to fear I have never known anything, in a spiritual sense. The Missionary Baptists are holding a protracted meeting in our town at this time, and I doubt if all the prophets of Baal could excel them. But there is one thing I do know, that if this is the way religion is obtained, I know I know nothing about it. It seems to me oftentimes that if I have any hope at all, it is so small that I can hardly call it a hope. But when the good old SIGNS comes laden with such blessed, consoling and cheering communications, and tells my feelings so much better than I can tell them myself, it encourages me so that I cannot throw the little morsel away.

Dear brethren, I thought when I began this scribble that I would try in my awkward way to tell the dear brethren and sisters some of my travels, and let them tell me if there is any christian experience in it; for I think they are better judges than I am. If I were to go back to the commencement of my troubles it would make a volume. I will say right here that I expect I am one of the worst cripples you ever saw. I have not been able to do one hour's work for over twelve years, and about five years of that time I have not been able to feed myself. It would not be worth my while to try to tell the suffering
I have endured; but God has enabled me to live through it all. I think my case is a very strong proof of human weakness and total depravity.
I am physically as helpless as a dead man, and feel that I am just as dependent upon God for everything, as I am on my precious companion for every mouthful I eat. How can a poor worm boast that it is in human power to obtain religion at any time?

And yet men will get up in the pulpit and call upon men and women to do that which is as impossible for them to do as it would be to make a world.

I have no recollection of the time of my first thought in regard to my lost, helpless, wretched and undone situation; but as long as memory serves me I never will forget the time and place where I trust I was relieved of my burden of guilt and condemnation. I hoped my trials and conflicts were over; but alas! how sadly mistaken I was. This was in the spring of 1857. I was plowing corn, and it did seem to me that I was the most wretched and most miserable being on earth. It seemed to me I was so heart-sick that I could bear no more. It seemed that my burden was too intolerable for me to bear. I thought I surely would sink to rise no more. But praise to the Almighty God, at a moment quite unexpected to me it was gone; and, strange as it may appear, I never have been able to get it back, that I might know when and how it went. I have been hobbling along in doubts and fears ever since. But there is one thing that I have not even a shadow of doubt about, and that is that God will save every one of his people with an everlasting salvation. But the great question is, Am I one? It does seem to me that a christian would not have such wicked and despicable thoughts as I sometimes have; and, dearly beloved ones, if it were not for the glorious promises I would despair. Before I joined the church I often went to meeting praying that if it was right for me to join that I might in some way be certain of it. What anguish of soul I have endured! I fear I will make this scribble too long, but I want to tell you what I prayed before I joined the church. I did not want to bring a reproach upon the cause, and I wanted a stronger evidence than I ever had had, if it took everything I possessed on earth but my life. I had seen so much trouble that I wanted to live long enough to discharge that duty.

In the spring of 1868 I lost everything, my wife and two children, and every dollar's worth of property I possessed, and I was worth at that time about four thousand dollars. But it seemed like I wanted still something else. However, with all my doubts, I went to the church, and it seemed I had nothing much to tell. I thought they were so anxious for a member that they took me. I was not satisfied with what I told the church, although I enjoyed myself much better than I had for fifteen years, that being the time from which I received a hope until I joined the church. But my troubles were not at an end yet. The brethren thought I must preach, and it seemed to me impossible that such an ignorant being as I was, and one that had been so desperately wicked, should stand up to be mouth for God. Notwithstanding, at times I had a desire to talk, yet a sense of my unworthiness, my ignorance and my nothingness always drowned me. The very name of preacher always seemed unbecoming to me. If I ever did try to pray, it was to know if it was my duty to preach; and if it was, and I did not try, that he might convince me, even if he struck me down on a bed of affliction.

Beloved brethren and sisters, please tell me what you think of my case. I am in reasonable health, but helpless as a man can be, as to getting up, turning over, or helping myself, any more than a babe an hour old. If the dear editors should think this poor scribble worth printing, and it will not crowd out something better, it is my sincere desire that some brother or sister would tell me whether they believe God would answer such a prayer; and if I have said anything unbecoming a child of God I want you to say so, and I will thank you for it. John says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." Now I know I love the Baptists better than any other people on earth. But the trouble with me is, do I love them as one christian should love another? O, brethren, I am poor and weak, and oftentimes fear I am so blind that I have caught at the shadow and missed the substance. I am several miles away from the church where my membership is, and it is seldom I ever hear any preaching. I am completely surrounded with Methodists, Campbellites and Adventists. They treat me friendly, but say, "O that horrible doctrine of predestination and election."

Dear brethren editors, since I have been reading the SIGNS I find that our beloved brethren Hassell have written a very large Church History, and by so doing it has involved a considerable debt; and I see there are contributions sent in from all quarters, and some buy books to help pay the debt. Although I am entirely unable to work, yet I want to cast in my mite; and if I never read the book myself, I want to leave it to my children. I do hope the brethren will lift the burden. You will find inclosed two dollars to pay for one copy of the Church History. I wish I could send more.

Do just as you please with this; but I want the brethren and sisters everywhere to pray for me in my great affliction, that God may raise me up.

I remain your poor, unworthy brother,

JAMES CRASK.

RUSHMORE, Ohio, Aug. 20, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—It has been impressed upon my mind for some time to write to the readers of the SIGNS, and to the household of faith; but realizing my own weakness and inability to comfort the dear saints of God, and for fear of occupying space that otherwise would be filled with communications from Elders Purington, Durand, Chick, Lively, and a host of others, I have deferred till now; and I may never send this.

Dear brethren, I think I see a disposition on the part of some to compromise with error. While it is impossible for the children of grace to see eye to eye in all things pertaining to the kingdom, yet it seems to me strange that there should such a difference of opinion exist on the fundamental principles of the doctrine. How God can be the absolute Sovereign of the universe without first having predestinated all the acts of the wicked, as well as of the righteous, I cannot conceive. I will not quote Scripture, for there has been abundance referred to by the brethren, sufficient to satisfy any unprejudiced mind, on the subject of the absolute predestination of all things. If that doctrine is not true, then I am deceived in my experience and in my understanding of the word, and the SIGNS OF THE TIMES has been advocating a false theory from the first. We are told by some that we used to take sweet counsel together, and walked to the house of God in company (Psalm l. v. 14); that a large majority of the Baptists do not believe the doctrine of predestination of all things. I think I have seen the apostle's language verified, "For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them."—Acts xx. 29, 30. Now, brethren, does it become the true soldiers of the cross to turn their backs to the opposition, when they know that the enemy is concentrated against any particular point of the fortification? Is it not rather their duty to contend earnestly for the faith that was once delivered to the saints? I know of a number who used to contend as earnestly for the doctrine as they could, who are now opposing it. What means the advertising of two Licking and Lebanon Associations? Have the Baptists got to biting and devouring one another? Did the Lord remove Johnson, Dudley, Beebe, Byrnside, Peters, Morris, Delano, Brown, Trumbo, and others, to make room for a purging and purifying of the church? It appears that about every half-century the church needs purging; and if the Lord is doing it, it will be done right, whether we like it or not.

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

Paul says, "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." Let us be sure that we love God and keep his commandments. To will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good I find not. I know that if I walk in his statutes and keep his commandments, it is because he leads me; for I realize that it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. My desire is that I may always be found contending for "Thus saith the Lord," whether I am one against two, or one against a dozen. I hope I do not trust in myself; for "Cursed is man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm."

Brethren Beebe, I have read a number of Baptist papers, but none suits me as well as the SIGNS. The able editorials, rich communications and lovely experiences endear the SIGNS to me.

Do with this as you think best, and it will be right with me. Yours in hope,

J. G. FORD.

HINESTON, La., Aug. 10, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I will forward you for publication a letter that I received from Elder Perkins, if you think it would be profitable to the household of faith. I esteem him as one of the excellent of the earth, and an able defender of the truth.

Yours in hope of life everlasting,
DAVID RICHEY.

EDGERLY, La., Dec. 5, 1888.

ELDER D. RICHEY—MY DEAR BROTHER:—Your letter of November 28th came to hand a day or two since. From that I was pleased to learn that the good Lord was still sparing you to the church, to the brethren and sisters, to your dear family and neighbors, and that he is still showing you some tokens of his goodness and mercy by adding to the church such as shall be saved. We had a large congregation on Sunday, and all felt much disappointed in not having you with us. To me, perhaps, the disappointment was greater than to many others, as I had looked forward to the meeting with increasing delight, expecting to be blessed with the exalted privilege of sitting down and resting on that day in my Father's house with my Father's family, and hear you proclaim the good news of glad tidings which alone can be found in Jesus; but we see now, brother Richey, that the Lord willed otherwise. I was alone again, so far as ministerial assistance is concerned, so I had to do on that occasion what I have been trying to do for the last thirty years, go forth in the strength of the Lord, and make mention of his righteousness, and of his only. I tried to preach in connection with the language of Job xix. 25: "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth," reading in connection the two verses following. I soon found, brother Richey, that there were gleanings enough in the gospel field for me that day to talk about the living Redeemer. You speak of passing through deep waters of tribulation, fiery trials and oppressions. Let us consider these things a little. Are we not informed that it is through much tribulation that we shall enter the kingdom of heaven, and have fellowship with the

dear Redeemer in his sufferings, and be made conformable to his death? Let us consider that the Captain of our salvation has gone before, passing through sorrows, trials and persecutions. Truly, many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord will deliver him out of them all. The apostle James illustrates the advantages of patience by referring to Job as an example. Job had an abiding faith in the special providence of God. He was an absolute predestinarian. In Job's afflictions and calamities it is clearly shown that the Lord made use of Satan as an agent, and gave him the power to destroy all that Job possessed; but his life he could not touch. That must be saved. In the midst of his great afflictions Job still worshiped God, declaring that "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." "In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly." We do not even find that he brings a solitary charge against the Sabeans nor the Chaldeans, nor any other agent concerned in his losses. He acknowledges God as a Sovereign, as the author of his calamities, and as having a perfect right to dispose of him and all that he had given him as seemed good unto him. Yet sorer trials and afflictions are in store for Job. In his own language he can better describe them than I can. He said that God had overthrown him, compassed him with his net, fenced his way, set darkness in his paths, stripped him of his glory, taken the crown from his head, destroyed him on every side, kindled his wrath against him, and counted him as one of his enemies. Here we have a child of God who feels forsaken by his God (who only can do helpless sinners good), deserted by all his earthly friends, his servants, his children, and his wife, the companion of his bosom, who advises him at last to curse God and die. He says, "Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" In Job we have an illustration of the power and workings of that faith which is the fruit of the Spirit, the gift of God, and works by love, purifying the heart. It is that which gave Job the victory in the hour of his deepest distress, enabling him to triumph over all his enemies, and to leave upon record for us the glorious language, "For I know that my Redeemer liveth." We are informed that the Scriptures were written aforetime for our instruction, that through patience and comfort of them we might have hope.

Now, brother Richey, may the Lord enable us by his grace to truly realize that our light afflictions, which are but for a moment, work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. It is my daily desire that I may be more and more weaned from the things of this world, the perishing things of time and sense; for we do know that in order to be a disciple of Jesus we must forsake father and mother, brothers and sisters, houses and lands, wife and children, yes, life itself.

"How sweet the name of Jesus sounds
In a believer's ears."

I must stop right here. If the Lord should enable you to derive any comfort from this hastily written letter, I shall feel more than compensated. We shall still look for you at our next meeting. My christian love to you, wife and family.

Your brother in gospel bonds,

TAYLORS, Miss., Sept. 1, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—There is a region of country extending from Duck Hill, Miss., in a southwesterly direction, where there is not an Old Baptist Church nor preacher for perhaps two or three hundred miles. I have recently taken a little preaching tour in that country, and feel that perhaps a brief account of the trip would be interesting to the readers of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

The first place I preached at was at the house of brother T. J. McDonald, twelve miles from Duck Hill, on the third Sunday in August. I did not get to brother McDonald's till Saturday night at dusk, and that, too, unexpectedly; but word of my coming was sent out Sunday morning, and at eleven o'clock a. m. there was a good congregation present to hear me. I used for a text the last five verses of the ninth chapter of Hebrews; and I do think that if the Lord ever was with me in trying to preach the gospel of the grace of God, it was on that occasion. I felt to be freed from all my troubles and sorrows, and an inexpressible stream of glory seemed to fill my soul, and the Spirit of God seemed to pervade the entire congregation. Then I thought that surely I should never doubt again; but alas! I have already got into the most distressing doubts and fears, and am almost ready to sink in hopeless despair. There are several brethren and sisters in the above neighborhood, but no church. There is one very old gentleman in this neighborhood that had not attended preaching of any kind for nearly twenty years, till Elder Neal began to preach there; but he is a regular attendant when Old Baptists preach. I never saw people more eager to hear the word of the Lord than at this place.

From this place I went to Carrollton, Miss., and visited and preached for an aged sister Jackson. Sister Jackson is an aged widow lady, and has an afflicted daughter who has been confined to the bed for about four months with goiter (swelled neck), or something of the kind. She is in a pitiful condition, and at once excites the sympathy of those who see her. They live in the rear of a little store immediately on the sidewalk, and from the surrounding circumstances I never did so dread an appointment in my life. I read the fifth chapter of John, which gives an account of the healing of the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda. I thought I would simply comment a little in a very low tone of voice, so that no one outside the room could hear me. But I soon found that I had no control of my tongue, mind or voice, and before I knew it I had forgotten myself. My mind was led out into the glorious gospel field, and I was talking at the top of my voice. Joy and gladness seemed to light up the countenances of some, especially the poor, afflicted woman, while wonder and amazement seemed to have possession of others, and my own soul was again filled with joy. Workmen were working on a building adjoining the one in which I preached; but when I ceased to speak, not the sound of a hammer could be heard. I turned my eyes toward the front door, and it was crowded with curious spectators. Sister Jackson and her daughter seemed overjoyed, and I can say of a truth that I never saw a more cheerful sufferer than this afflicted woman, Mrs. Ogletree; and I felt like Jacob of old, "Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not. This is none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven." I spent one night with brother Alfred Jones, and tried to preach on Tuesday at Old Poplar Springs, where there was once an Old Baptist Church. I found several persons that are strong believers in the "doctrine of God our Savior," who told me they had not heard an Old Baptist preach before in fifteen years. My feelings and sympathies always go out for such characters; for they are the destitute and outcasts. When they do have the pleasure of hearing the "gospel of the grace of God" proclaimed they appreciate it and rejoice in it. For thus is fulfilled the language of the prophet, "In that day shall the great trumpet be blown, and they shall come which were ready to perish in the land of Assyria, and the outcasts in the land of Egypt, and shall worship the Lord in the holy mount at Jerusalem." Some churches that are blessed with a regular pastor and many visiting preachers (for here are the places they all visit, or nearly so, at least) become like the Laodicean church, mentioned in Revelation iii. 17-19, "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked: I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see. As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten: be zealous therefore, and repent." This language is addressed not to an individual, but to a church, and shows how churches may become puffed up with an increase of membership, which may be gold, but not "gold tried in the fire." Job said, "When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold." At the present day it seems to me that there is considerable dross in our churches that needs to be consumed. This consuming process, which can only be accomplished by trials, tribulations and persecutions, may cause the church or individual to decrease in bulk (as an eminent writer has said) but not in bullion. So far as I am individually concerned, I am glad that the Lord "knoweth the way that I take;" and while others may slander and persecute me, and misrepresent and misunderstand me, God knows my heart and my motives. Though I may not know my own way, the Lord is perfectly familiar with it all. He knows my "downsittings and my uprisings;" and "When he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold." "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him."

In great tribulation,

DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—I have been taking your paper for some time. It is meat and drink to me. I cannot believe there is more than one true church on earth; and that church is the Primitive Baptists. No other order accords with my experience and is sustained by the Bible. I wish to ask you one or two questions. Does faith come before or after thought? Does the knowledge of God come before or after faith? This subject and Election are about to divide the Missionary society here. They have preferred charges against one of their preachers for heresy in preaching God's electing grace. Will you or some other brother be so kind as to give your views on these questions?

Yours in love,

J. L. MONROE.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Tygart's Valley River Association of Regular Old School Baptists, in session with the Little Bethel Church, Barbour Co., W. Va., August 23d, 24th and 25th, 1889, to the churches of which she is composed, and to the associations with whom we correspond.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Through the kind, protecting care and unchanging goodness of our heavenly Father we are again permitted to meet together in an associate capacity, and to send you this our annual epistle of correspondence, in which we desire to notice the standing and order of the church. The Scriptures reveal to us the church of the living God in all her impregnable power and heavenly beauty, built on the Rock of eternal ages, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail. No earthly eye can look upon her beauty, nor can the natural mind comprehend in the least her glory. It is a kingdom not of this world. Christ is her King, who reigns in and over her in glory and righteousness. God is in the midst of her, and keeps her by his power. This is the reason why, amid all of the changing scenes, and the wiles of the adversary, and the persecutions to which she has been and ever will be subject, she continues steadfast and unmovable. Not one of her stakes are moved, nor any of her cords broken. The church is God's inestimable treasure, "which he hath purchased with his own blood." She is the object of Christ's love, which he gave himself for, "that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish."—Eph. v. 26, 27.

The Jews as a nation were a type of the church. They were called out from the nations of the earth, to dwell alone, and were not reckoned among the nations. So the church is an assembly of God's people, called out by him to dwell alone. The characteristics of the apostolic church should be the characteristics of the church now. The laws and order of the church are faithfully laid down in the Scriptures of the New Testament, from which there should be no deviation.

The first and chief mark of the apostolic church was a regenerated membership, who had been born of the Spirit of God; who had vital, revealed, experimental religion; who worshiped God in spirit and in truth. They were a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people, that they should show forth the praises of him who had called them out of darkness into his marvelous light.

Those who were added to the apostolic church were baptized on a profession of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. "And they continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers."—Acts ii. 42. "They continued steadfastly." This does not look like conceding some things, and compromising some others, and thus opening the way for the introduction of disorder and confusion. There can be no compromise between truth and falsehood, or order and disorder, without sacrificing truth or order. "They continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine." The apostles' doctrine was the doctrine the apostles were divinely authorized to teach. Notice the word "doctrine," not doctrines. There are "doctrines of devils," but there is but one "doctrine of God our Savior." We may speak of different points of doctrine, but it is all in perfect harmony and unity. The apostles made a faithful declaration of doctrine. They preached the doctrine of election. "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God."—1 Peter i. 2. "The election hath obtained it."—Rom. xi. 7. "Chosen us in him [Christ Jesus] before the foundation of the world."—Eph. i. 4. Many other passages teach the same doctrine.

They preached the doctrine of predestination. "Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called."—Rom. viii. 30. "Being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."—Eph. i. 11; and other passages. The whole Bible confirms the doctrine of predestination.

The apostles preached salvation by grace. "For by grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast."—Eph. ii. 8, 9. Many other passages corroborate the same doctrine.

We cannot notice all the teaching of the apostles in the short limits of a Circular Letter. In an unbroken succession from the apostolic age, the church of the living God has continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine. Though divisions have marked the Baptist name, it only verifies the truth of the apostolic assertion, "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would have continued with us: but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us."—1 John ii. 19.

Now, dear brethren, we believe sound doctrine is the foundation of good order in the church; for where unsound doctrine is introduced, disorder and confusion follow. You need only look around you and notice the preaching and order of other denominations to see this assertion verified. Therefore we think it not good order to hold in fellowship those who declare they believe a doctrine that is unsound; for the apostolic church continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship. It was the order of the church that the doctrine and the fellowship should go together. The inspired apostle admonishes the church, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? and what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? and what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."—2 Cor. vi. 14-18.

It was the order of the apostolic church to choose and set apart for their ministering servants those whom God had called and qualified for the work of the ministry. Those ministers did not go to any theological school to prepare themselves for the ministry. Many of them were poor and illiterate; but they spoke as the oracles of God, and ministered with the ability which God giveth. They preached Jesus Christ as the only way of salvation. They went everywhere preaching the word: and this they did of a ready mind, and not for filthy lucre's sake; for necessity was laid upon them, and woe was upon them if they preached not the gospel. They often labored with their own hands to administer to their necessities. On the other hand, the apostle instructed the church at Corinth that the Lord had ordained that they that preached the gospel should live of the gospel; and that they who sow unto the church spiritual things should reap of the carnal things of the church. But the inspired apostle who gave these injunctions as to the temporal support of the preachers of the gospel, testifies that he used none of these things, neither did he write these things that it should be so done unto him. What a great blessing it is to the church to have a good, sound and orderly gospel ministry. The inspired apostle warned his brethren in the ministry to "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them."—Acts xx. 28-30.

Now, dear brethren, we have given you some things in reference to gospel order, and some of the warnings and admonitions of the apostles. We have noticed some of the characteristics of the apostolic church. How near do we come to the standard of truth? We do not claim perfection; but with these considerations before us, we are bound to identify the Primitive Baptists as the only true gospel church. Christ only promised to build one church on the Rock, and he said, "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it." There was only one kingdom that Daniel the prophet prophesied that the God of heaven would set up "in the days of those kings." "It shall never be destroyed." There was only one kingdom which John the Baptist said was at hand. So the many professed churches, holding different creeds and confessions, cannot be the one church or kingdom spoken of; neither can any of the popular denominations be called the church of Christ, for Christ was not popular, neither were his apostles. They were hated of all men for Christ's sake. Moreover, the popular denominations have made alliances with worldly institutions, by going into secret societies, and have men-made societies under their own control, for auxiliaries to their so-called church, for which there is no "Thus saith the Lord." The most of their ministers preach salvation as depending on the efforts of the creatures, instead of being "of the Lord." Some of those ministers receive large salaries, and will not preach without them. So they are weighed in the balance, and are found wanting. But again the question occurs to our mind, How near do we come up to the standard of truth? It is a question of more interest than any other. Is there that union and harmony among us that should be? Do we love one another, and bear one another's burdens, as we should? Do we meet together for worship as often and as regularly as we might? Do the churches encourage their pastors as they should, and look after them, and see that they do not suffer for the necessities of life while they minister unto them in spiritual things? Do those who minister in word and doctrine study to show themselves approved unto God, workmen that need not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth? Do we give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine, without neglecting the gift that is in us? Do we meditate upon these things, and give ourselves wholly to them, that our profiting may appear to all? Do we endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ, and not entangle ourselves with the affairs of this life, and by so doing please him who hath chosen us to be soldiers? Do we strive for the mastery, and strive unlawfully? The Lord knoweth how far short of our duty we come in all these things. May the Lord lead us and guide us in the way of all truth.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN:—Another year has passed and gone with all its events, both great and small, and we are enabled to send you this our second annual epistle of love and fellowship, in which we desire to stir up the pure mind by way of remembrance of the things which the Lord hath done for us, whereof we are made glad. He has kept us, as it were, in the hollow of his hand, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ, so that we can adopt the language of the apostle, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ: according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love."—Eph. i. 3, 4. This language was addressed to those that were called to be saints; who in times past walked according to the course of this world; among whom also we all had our conversation in times past, in the lusts of the flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others. This we understand to be the condition of the whole family of God by nature, dead in trespasses and in sins. "But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ." "For by grace are ye saved, through faith: and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." Thus the work of salvation and redemption is complete through our Lord Jesus Christ, who is given to be head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all. Then we can adopt the language of the poet,

"How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord,
Is laid for your faith in his excellent word."

"For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." Thus being builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit, we can truly rejoice in him who has blessed us with all spiritual blessings in Christ.

Then, brethren, let us endeavor to make straight paths for our feet, that the lame be not turned aside. Let us earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, love as brethren, be pitiful, courteous, kind, bearing each other's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. For if these things be in you and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful.

"Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen."

THOUGHT, FAITH, KNOWLEDGE.

IN compliance with the request of brother J. L. Monroe, in another column, we submit the following remarks; still uniting with him in asking other brethren to write on the subject embraced in his inquiry.

So far as the action of the Missionary society is concerned, to which our brother refers, it is not our business to criticise their proceedings at all. It is very certain that the preaching of any portion of the truth of God is as much out of place among them as was the ark of the covenant when it was placed in the temple of Dagon. Their system can no more endure its presence than could the idol of the Philistines stand before the symbol of the presence of God. It would be inconsistent for them to tolerate any gospel truth from those who profess to stand with them in opposition to the revelation which God has given. But that is not a matter over which we have any right to pass judgment. Since they do not acknowledge the authority of the inspired law of our Lord, they may choose their own false doctrines, and they cannot be expected to approve of any of their preachers who hold the truth as revealed in the Scriptures.

In answer to the first question of our brother, "Does faith come before or after thought?" we would say that it is both before and after. The living principle of faith is not a matter of time at all. It belongs to the spiritual kingdom of God. As such it ever exists in its eternal source. As the fruit of the Spirit it is the gift of God, and does not depend upon thought, which is the exercise of the natural mind; and as all that pertains to nature is of the earth it is temporal. Until the gift of that eternal principle is bestowed upon the subject of divine grace every imagination (literally, every purpose and desire) of the thoughts of the heart of man is evil and only evil continually.—Gen. vi. 5. Certainly the faith of the Son of God cannot be dependent upon the evil thoughts of the natural heart, for faith is the fruit of the Spirit, and consequently it must be holy. It can no more be measured or compared with reason than eternity can be measured by time. Since faith is the fruit of the Spirit it cannot be comprehended or seen by the thought of the natural mind. Therefore it is in no wise dependent upon thought or reason.

In the experience of the subjects of salvation by grace there is no better illustration of the manifestation of the principle of faith than that which is recorded in the inspired account of the creation. While the heaven and the earth were in the beginning created by the will of God, including all that is embraced in the material universe, darkness was upon the face of the deep, and the earth was without form and void, until God said, "Let there be light." The development of those things which were created was completed only when the six days work was done. So in the experience of every saint, the gift of eternal life is instantaneously complete, but it is continuously manifested in the experience of the saint until the fullness of it is revealed in the perfection of the glory of heaven, when we shall see our exalted and glorified Lord in the light of eternal day, without the veil of flesh. Even the inspired apostle had to confess that here in time "We know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away."—1 Cor. xiii. 9, 10. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is."—1 John iii. 2. Then will the perfect knowledge of all that faith has testified be clearly manifested in every subject of that grace which is revealed in Jesus Christ.

"Does the knowledge of God come before or after faith?" Our Lord says in his prayer to the Father, "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." Both this knowledge and the faith by which it is received must be the gift of God; and neither that life nor the faith which is inseparable from it can be limited by the measurement of time. At the immediate command of God the sinner who was dead is alive; it is not possible for finite intelligence to comprehend any distinction of time between the gift of eternal life and the existence of that faith by which alone all spiritual gifts are received. As the manifestation of natural life is inseparable from the possession of the faculties of that life, so the gift of eternal life is the gift of every attribute of that life; of which faith is one living principle. There can be no spiritual life in any man who has not the faith of Jesus Christ; neither can there be any such thing as the existence of that faith in one who has not the Spirit of Christ, of which it is the fruit. "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."—Rom. viii. 9, 14. In these two inspired declarations the line is clearly drawn between those who are natural and those who are spiritual. It is expressly recorded that "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."—1 Cor. ii. 14. The spiritual power of discernment, by which alone any gift of the Spirit can be received, is that faith which is the fruit of the Spirit. So it is written, "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life."—1 John v. 12. There is no room for questioning whether the possession of the Son comes before or after the possession of life. The gift of eternal life is the unspeakable gift of the Son in whom that life ever exists. Eternal life is the knowledge of God, which can be received only by the revelation of the Son of God. That revelation is made alone by the Holy Spirit to those who are the favored subjects of the electing love of God in Christ Jesus. "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life; and this life is in his Son."

It is not strange that those who reject the clear teaching of the Scriptures in their declaration of God's electing grace, should fail to understand other principles of the doctrine of salvation by that grace, as it is revealed in Jesus Christ our Lord. There is no possibility of reconciling the truth of God with the doctrines and commandments which men have devised. The admission of God's sovereign election in saving his people from their sins leaves no room for any of the false theories which men have invented for the gratification of their own pride. Every system of error is at once subverted and exposed by this principle of the doctrine of God, as dross is consumed by the refining fire. Even those Israelites who were engaged in the worship of Baal were enraged by the truth which was proclaimed by Elijah. So, even the subjects of grace may now be so bewildered by false doctrine as to oppose the very truth which they have been taught in their own experience, though it may be presented in the exact words of the inspired Scriptures. Since the revelation of God is not received by the natural mind, reason must always fail to comprehend that which is thus revealed. Every principle of the carnal nature of the subjects of divine instruction is opposed to confession that it is by grace alone they are saved. Therefore false doctrine seems consistent when presented to their natural mind. Electing love and salvation exclusively by grace can afford no room for glorying in self-righteousness, hence the pride of the carnal mind revolts at that doctrine. The deceitfulness of the carnal heart in the saints exults in the imagination that their own merit in some degree contributes to their salvation. Thus they are naturally inclined to accept the false theory of salvation dependent upon creature works, and to oppose the revelation which God has given, that the grace of God alone has brought salvation to them. To their natural thought this is the way which seemeth right to them; but the end thereof are the ways of death.—Prov. xiv. 12.

Paul says, "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things."—1 Cor. xiii. 11. This is the experience of every child of grace. To the believer, in his first enjoyment of life in the Lord Jesus, every thought seems heavenly and right; but experience teaches him more and more to distrust his own thoughts, until at length he learns that "He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool; but whoso walketh wisely shall be delivered."—Prov. xxviii. 26. Although conscious that it is exclusively by that revelation of the Spirit which is received through faith alone that he has been taught every truth to which he has attained, the child of grace is constantly inclined to seek by his own research to learn more of the mystery of godliness. The tempter is ever ready to encourage this deceitful inclination; and when inevitable failure results from his mistaken efforts, the suggestion is presented to the disappointed one that his hope in Christ is altogether a delusion. The device is so plausible that the natural mind of the saint is captivated by it, and his thoughts are arrayed with the adversary in opposition to his hope in the salvation which is in Christ Jesus. In this experience he must repeatedly learn this lesson of the deceitfulness of his own thoughts. "As it is written, The just shall live by faith."—Rom. i. 17. Reason can never grasp this fact; and it is for this cause that there is a constant endeavor to find some support for the hope of justification in evidences tangible to thought and reason. All such efforts result from the childish simplicity of the tried one. In all the way in which the Lord leads his people they are taught that every blessing bestowed upon them is according to the infinite grace of God, without reference to works or merit in themselves. The natural mind cannot learn this even though it be enforced by repeated experience. It is not to be received by the power of thought. The natural mind comprehends earthly things by that natural power; but those heavenly things which are revealed in the experience of the saints are received exclusively by the faith which is the fruit of the Spirit.

Faith can receive instruction alone by the revelation of the Spirit. The truth so manifested in the experience of the saints is no more susceptible of rational demonstration for the comprehension of their natural minds than is the light of the noonday sun capable of being painted upon the darkness of midnight. For this cause it is inconsistent for those who are enlightened by faith to attempt to teach the knowledge of divine things either to the reason of others or to their own natural minds.

Hence, those who propose such teaching, thereby deny the essential principle of the revelation of God in giving eternal life to as many as are led by the Spirit into all truth. Without faith it is impossible to please God; and the saints can no more give that fruit of the Spirit to their fellow-mortals than they can give life to the dead bodies of those who have been called from this temporal state of existence. The power of God alone can raise the dead; and that power must give eternal life before any sinner can receive spiritual light. The faith of the saints is the faith of the Son of God. Without his Spirit dwelling in them none can have that faith which is the fruit of that Spirit. Intelligent minds can understand that no fruit can be produced in nature unless the tree exists upon which such fruit is borne. Just so, no spiritual fruit can be produced unless the Spirit is in the man by which that fruit is produced. Hence, none can have faith except they have the Spirit of which faith is the fruit. All who have that Spirit are the sons of God, and have eternal life.

Even the saints, who are taught of God, have no knowledge except what is received by revelation. That revelation is given to them here in time only in such measure as it pleases God to bestow upon each one. The apostle Paul, with the abundance of the revelations given to him, still confessed that he knew in part only; and for that partial knowledge he was dependent upon the revelation which was received through faith wrought in him by the Spirit of Christ. The knowledge of all things is given by revelation to the saints through faith, but they can comprehend only what is shown to them individually by the Spirit of truth. They grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ by continued experience, but all they learn is found in the first revelation of Christ as their only life. The perfection of this knowledge is comprehended when they awake with his likeness in eternal glory.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Roxbury Old School or Predestinarian Baptist Association, in session with the church of Andes, Delaware Co., N. Y., September 4th and 5th, 1889, to the associations and meetings of our faith and order with whom she does or may correspond, sends christian love and fellowship.

BELOVED BRETHREN:—Our annual or second session has come in the course of human events, and will soon be past. It has been characterized by an unusually large attendance from the several churches and congregations, and also of those from a distance. It has been a solemn assemblage, and a solemn and sincere interest has been manifest throughout in the preached word. A goodly number of ministers from abroad have been with us, and the utmost harmony has prevailed in the preaching, and in all the correspondence, and in the business of the session. The word has come down upon thirsty plants as the rain, and like the distilling of the dew, to the refreshing of the weary and the comforting of the hearts of mourners in and about Zion. Not a jarring note or word of discord has been heard. Many hearts have been ready to say, "Good is the word of the Lord that thou hast spoken;" and, "Happy is the people whose God is the Lord." We have all felt it was good for us to be here.

Our next session is appointed to be held with the Second Church of Roxbury, Delaware Co., N. Y., on the first Wednesday and Thursday of September, 1890, where we hope to meet your messengers in the love, peace and fellowship which are in the Spirit and in the Truth.

MARRIAGES.

SEPT. 10th, 1889, at the residence of the bride's mother, in Warwick, Orange Co., N. Y., by Elder Wm. L. Beebe, Mr. Geo. Lamb, of Alleghany Co., Pa., and Miss Lizzie, daughter of the late Elder Wm L. Benedict.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—April 5th, 1889, sister Jane Christian, in the eighty-sixth year of her age.

Sister Christian united with the Baptist Church (then called Olive) in March, 1845, and was baptized by Elder P. C. Broom. While she was not blessed with much of this world's goods, yet she was strong in the faith of God's elect, esteeming it her greatest privilege to meet with her brethren, often walking two miles or more when past eighty-four years of age.

A discourse was preached on the occasion by Elder J. D. Hubbell, at the house of her niece, with whom she lived.

ALSO,

SISTER Martha Robins departed this life Aug. 10th, 1889, aged seventy-six years.

Sister Robins united with the Olive & Hurley Church in September, 1877, and was baptized by the late Elder L. P. Cole. She died as she had lived, firm in the doctrine of salvation by grace, ever filling her place in the house of worship when not providentially hindered.

A discourse was preached on the occasion by Elder J. D. Hubbell, from First Corinthians xv. 26, at the Methodist house in Shokan.

J. V. WINCHEL.

OLIVE, N. Y., Sept. 1, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—By request I ask you to publish something more of the life, character and death of Deacon Wm. M. Campbell.

According to dates given, he was born Sept. 5th, 1830, and was baptized by Elder Thomas Barton, in the fellowship of the church at Welsh Tract, Sept. 1st, 1867, and was a faithful and devoted member of that church as long as he lived, serving her as Deacon for many years. I became acquainted with him about ten years ago, and found him, without a single exception, always ready to administer to the necessities of the saints in any and every way that he could. He spoke many words of comfort and consolation to the poor, weak, trembling child of God, always manifesting child-like simplicity in the gospel. Some of the last years of his life were spent in terrible affliction, both mentally and physically. On March 26th, 1888, he was stricken with paralysis, after which he was more or less confined to the house by repeated strokes; yet he visited some, and generally went to meeting, until a few weeks before his death, which was on June 13th, 1889. He leaves a widow, sister Campbell, five children, several brothers and sisters, with the church and friends, to mourn their loss of a good father, brother and citizen. May the God of all comfort sustain us, and reconcile us to this affliction, is the prayer of one who feels it.

JOSEPH L. STATON.

NEWARK, Del., Sept. 3, 1889.

DIED—In Hancock, Delaware Co., N. Y., our dear little grandson, M. Wesley Bundy, aged one year and six months.

He was away with his little sister and mother visiting, and fell sick while at his uncle's, S. B. Drake, who is a practicing physician. His disease was of the bowels; and though everything was done to stay its progress, on the 14th of August, 1889, the spirit took its flight. While we keenly feel our loss, and realize the wonderful vacancy in our household, still we are forbidden (if we could) to break the peaceful slumber into which our little pet has entered. May the all-sustaining grace of God be given us in this trying hour. He was a bright little star among us, and being the only grandson, we had hoped he might grow to manhood; but the Lord had ordered differently, and we would be still.

"A precious one from us is gone,

A voice we loved is stilled,

A place is vacant in our home

Which never can be filled."

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

KIBBIE, Ill., May, 1889.

MR. BEEBE—DEAR SIR:—While passing under a cloud this winter I listlessly picked up an old SIGNS OF THE TIMES and read a communication from Elder Chick, which brought so much comfort and delight that I thought I would send it to you for reinsertion. I recollect reading it once before. I read it then as a story or a song, but this time as a cup of cold water to a thirsty soul. Is it necessary to have a cloud in order to see the bow?

HUGH CALDWELL.

"AND, behold, a woman of Canaan came out of the same coasts, and cried unto him, saying, Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David; my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil. But he answered her not a word. And his disciples came and besought him, saying, Send her away; for she crieth after us. But he answered and said, I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Then came she and worshiped him, saying, Lord, help me. But he answered and said, It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs. And she said, Truth, Lord: yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters' table. Then Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt. And her daughter was made whole from that very hour."—Matt. xv. 22-28.

This portion of Scripture has been of great comfort to me at times, and I have often felt like saying something about it through the SIGNS; still I do not think that I should have made the attempt at this time had not sister Francis, when I was at the Delaware River Association, requested me to do so. Hoping that what I may now say will be of satisfaction to her, and to all who may read, I will endeavor to present a few thoughts upon the subject. I believe that this, in common with every other portion of the word of the Lord, contains great spiritual truths, and that some portions of christian experience are illustrated here. I think I have realized some of these truths as presented in the text in my own experience at different times; and as I have felt and realized them, I will write about them.

Those miracles that attested the Savior's power, and that proved him to be the incarnate God, have during the past year or two, more than ever before, attracted my attention. It has seemed to me that in performing the literal miracles he designed to give just so many proofs of his power to save sinners from death, hell and sin. I can see no beauty nor comfort in those miracles more than in the daily providence of God, only as I can discern in them the shadow of better things to come. The circumstances attending those miracles were always such as proved that he only could heal. All who came to him came as a last resort. He did what no man, no power below the heavens, could do. Are we not taught in all these instances the one great truth that makes up the sum of the whole Bible, and of all christian experience, that salvation is of the Lord? But while this one general truth may be viewed as being taught in all these wonderful miracles, yet some of them seem to present peculiar circumstances, and to teach lessons and give comforts that are peculiar to themselves. It is so in this instance. There are answers in this to some peculiar temptations that are wont to attack the child of grace that are not presented, it seems to me at least, so forcibly in any other miracle. There are some questioning doubts which assail the child of grace in nearly every step of his pilgrimage, that are completely and distinctly answered in this miracle.

It is important that in the beginning we should notice who this woman was. Mark, in describing this same circumstance, says she was a Syrophenician woman. Matthew says she was a Canaanite. It is important that we should keep this in mind, for some of the language of the Savior to her will be seen to acquire a double force from it. She was in distress. An affliction that was very grievous and hard to be borne had come upon her. A daughter, around whom clustered all the wealth of her mother's love, was grievously tormented. She was wounded in the tenderest place—her heart was touched. Her affliction was more grievous than any physical suffering that she might endure. It is not needful to decide what the particular disease was, but only to present this one truth, that this woman was in deep trouble. She could not rest. She must find relief. Doubtless she had applied to the physicians of her own country, but if so, it had been in vain. Now she heard of the wonderful power of this Savior, Jesus of Nazareth, and as a last hope she came to him.

This is the condition of every convicted sinner. They are wretched and undone; they cannot rest; they have fled here and there seeking for help, but they have sought in vain. I believe that all who can remember the time of their first conviction can tell of this turning here and there, fondly hoping for help. All men, in their first conviction, flee to the deeds of the law for justification. If I see one really feeling his wretched condition as a sinner, I expect to see him strive for awhile to keep the law. As long as he is careless and indifferent he shows that he has no sense of his danger. When he is awakened he will strive in every way to escape the danger. The difference between this convicted sinner and the self-righteous legalist is that the latter supposes he has satisfied the law, thus proving that he does not know its fullness and spirituality; while the former learns that he is all the time falling more and more deeply into sin, and thus feels the curse of the law more sensibly. But it is a truth that none come to Christ so long as they fancy that there is a single straw to grasp at. The sinner must learn the futility of all his fancied goodness ere he is prepared to receive Christ and know his power to save. This woman had come to that place; every other hope had failed her; her case was desperate; all her joy and comfort seemed ready to perish; and she was ready to say, "To whom shall I go, but unto thee?" Now, like her, in his need the sinner comes and "cries." It is not simply an asking, as for something in a great measure indifferent. Her joy, her life, her all, was staked upon this. It was such crying as the psalmist describes when he says, "From the ends of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed. Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I." It was the cry that pain produced. Such crying, so far as any volition of our will is concerned, is involuntary; and such crying as need and pain produce possesses such a tone of energy as cannot be counterfeited. This crying unto God in distress is the purest worship that the saint ever renders to his name. It is the very highest acknowledgment of his power to save that can be made. It is not will-worship; it is such worship as puts down the will out of sight, and keeps it there. No believer ever yet looked back to that strong crying of his soul in time of distress, and could remember that his will had anything to do with it. He could not choose but cry. Is the writhing of the crushed worm an act of his will? Is the strong crying of the drowning man, growing weaker, yet more earnest, as he battles against his doom, an act of his will?

Rather it is the voice of stern necessity. He hardly knows that he is crying. So the truest prayer of the perishing sinner is the voice of his need wrung from him by his dire trouble. The pain is so great that he has no time to think and decide how or what he shall pray. That desire that gives time for this is not so very great nor so very pressing; and this crying that goes up to the Lord, mingled with the sweet incense of the altar, the world cannot see, and if they saw it, they could not comprehend it. It may and will find expression, sooner or later, but the Lord sees it in the heart.

Her cry was that which constitutes the burden of every spiritual breath of the soul, "Have mercy upon me." That word "mercy" sums up all that the christian ever receives. It is his daily plea all through life, especially is it so in his first coming to the Lord for pardon and salvation. What does that cry for mercy mean? It is an acknowledgment that we have no claim upon God for what we ask, and, more than this, a confession that we merit curses instead of blessings. The convicted sinner can never ask or expect anything from the hand of the Lord upon any other ground. This woman did not say, "I demand this; I have a right to what I ask." The very language of her cry put the matter upon the proper ground. It was mercy, sovereign mercy, that she wanted. How different this language from the proud, self-exalting words of men who say, "We have done so much for the Lord; therefore we claim the hire of our labor." The description given by a Romish priest of the sixth century of a good man is precisely what the self-righteous Pharisee thinks of himself to-day, though perhaps he might have a sufficiently decent regard for the letter of the word to prevent his saying so in just such terms. The language of this priest was, "A good man is he who can say, looking boldly up to heaven, 'Give, Lord, for I have given.'"

I believe that this will be recognized by every one who has once been a convicted sinner. How often, how long does the weary sinner come to the feet of Jesus with strong crying of soul, and it receive no answer. O! who can tell the weary wretchedness of such a waiting? How the heart grows sick with hope deferred! How fast such an one travels the road down to despair! I believe that this, for a longer or shorter time, is the experience of every such troubled soul. They cry and cry again, but realize no access. Perhaps there are some who attend the assemblies of the saints. Time after time passes by, still they find nothing cheering. They go where saints go, hoping that this may be the time of love; but they return as empty as they came. O! I think many can tell what this sentence means. If any read this who are in this place, let it comfort you that you are not alone.

His disciples were also moved with compassion for her, and they also came and joined their petition to hers. They said, "Send her away; for she crieth after us." I believe I have felt as these disciples did, when I have seen the deep, heartfelt sorrows of the weary sinner. I think I have also felt to join my petition to theirs. Their trouble has been made my trouble, and thus I have longed for their comfort, even as for my own. It seems to me that every true minister of the word must feel this. He must be touched with the cry of those who are in the worm-wood and the gall. It is no task for me to go to those who see no hope for themselves, and present to them the evidences which the gospel presents in their behalf, and tell them I have been over the same road, that I know their needs and the strong desires of their heart. I do not see how christians can stay away from such ones, and certainly christians must, when led by the Spirit of Christ, feel like compassion with him for such sorrowing souls; and besides, we have confidence to implore the mercy of God upon such as these. The disciples had never seen him turn one really needy soul away. He healed all who were sick. Did not this give them confidence to entreat for her? May not our prayer in behalf of the troubled sinner also be truly the prayer of faith? In this one thing we know we ask according to his will.

"But he answered and said, I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." It seems to me that this expresses an inward temptation by which Satan would drive away every one who has come to Christ. He takes advantage of even the glorious doctrine of election, and turns it against the elect. This woman was not an Israelite, and she knew it. But she was in sore trouble. She had not come to the Savior because she was an Israelite, but because she was distressed. That is the way every convicted sinner comes: he makes no claim, but he cries for mercy. The temptation arises in his soul, I am not a child; Jesus came to save his people, but I am not one of them. Thus the tempted soul is made to reason, and to reject all the promises. I think the Savior designed to show up this temptation, at this time, that his disciples ever after might have an answer to the like temptation, through seeing the blessed result in this instance.

But even this rebuff did not drive this woman away, nor cause her to give over her strong crying; and if we look for the reason, we shall find it in the strong necessity that was upon her. If her crying to the Lord had been "will-worship" merely, or if she had come because she claimed to be a child of Israel, this would have been sufficient to completely discourage her. But instead of driving her away, it only furnished occasion to show the strength of her desire. This shows how false is the conclusion of those who say that to preach the doctrine of election will discourage and drive away the convicted seeking sinner. Nothing can drive such a sinner away. His need propels him to the Savior with a stronger power than any temptation can possess to oppose. His coming is a drawing near to the Savior in spirit, and his petition is the cry of hunger and pain. The more obstacles he sees in his way, the greater will be his hunger, and the stronger his pain, and the more ardent therefore will be his crying. The sinner does not ask these blessings, saying, "I have a right to them, because I am a child." His crying has stronger and deeper ground than this. Satan may make him believe he is not a child, but he cannot make him believe he is not in distress and need. To tell the quickened sinner that he is not a child, and that the blessings are not for him, only makes his distress deeper, and produces stronger cryings still; and it was so with this woman.

"Then came she and worshiped him, saying, Lord, help me." Under the power of her trouble she came still nearer, as though she would make him feel her own distress. Is not this a commentary upon that text, "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force?" Again she repeated the cry, "Lord, help me." Her words were few, but they told the Lord all her desire. May not each tried sinner find himself in this? You have found no answer; you have been told these blessings are for Israel, and not for such as you; and yet are you not crying still, "Lord, help me?"

But still another doubt stood in her way. Again she heard, as it would seem, words of rebuff, and they must have seemed very humiliating to her; yet there was humility in her heart ready to answer it all. "It is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it to dogs." She was a Gentile, and this was the common title that the Jews were wont to apply to them. How cutting must the word have seemed to her. How the proud Pharisee would have hurled it back in scorn, and sought to avenge the insult. Yet she did not throw back the word; she admitted it was so. She felt that she had no better claim for what she asked than a dog. See what wonders grace will do! How it brings down our pride, till we are ready to confess that the meanest name belongs to us. Now says the temptation, You know you are not a child. You know it is not fitting to take the bounties spread for the children, and give it to such as you. Jesus never does that which is not meet (or fitting) to be done. What presumption then is it for you to even ask these favors! Thus God's eternal truth, designed for the comfort of the needy, is perverted and turned against them. It is truth that it is not meet to give the children's bread to dogs, and it is equally true that Jesus will not do what is not meet to be done. But even this did not drive her away. Though Satan thus assails the child of God daily, yet he is never driven away by such attacks. Rather it gives occasion to show the power of faith that can conquer such temptations.

She said, "Truth, Lord: yet the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their masters' table." Still her need urged her to intercede with him, and, as it were, to reason with him with that kind of reasoning which faith uses. Perhaps there is comfort for some tempted soul right here. Have you ever eaten a crumb from the Master's table? Have you ever got a little comfort in listening to his word, in reading the Scriptures, or in the conversation of saints? Then you have full evidence that you are a child. The Lord has spread his table for his children. He has no crumbs to waste. He never gives his children's bread to dogs. If then you have ever eaten from that table, it is because you are a child. Is the word of the Lord precious to you? Do you esteem the word of the Lord more than your necessary meat? O! why should you enjoy it so if you are not a child? But to put the matter beyond a doubt, let us see the answer of the Savior.

"O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt." Truly that must have been great faith that was sufficient to overcome all these fiery darts, and still claim the blessing. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." Just read for a moment what had stood in her way. Temptation after temptation, each of itself sufficient to have crushed her down to despair, had assailed her. Yet in all and through all her faith had gained the victory. It seems to me that in these three temptations we have summed up all that can assail the child, or at least that have much power to trouble him. First, it seemed that the Savior would not hear her; then, that she was not one of the elect; and last, that the blessings she needed were not for her. Yet at last her faith had triumphed; and surely we must conclude that the words "great faith" are appropriate. If then any of you have ever eaten one crumb from the Lord's table, the faith that has enabled you to do so has brought you through fiery billows of temptation, and is in your case also great faith. Now then to you the promise belongs.

"Be it unto thee even as thou wilt." And what would the trembling sinner have? The things that the trembling sinner asks are great things. Yet such an one need not fear he is asking too much. Would you be cleansed from sin and guilt? Would you enjoy the assurance of pardon and the Savior's love? Would you have Jesus and heaven to be your portion forever? Jesus says, "Be it unto thee even as thou wilt." O how rich and precious are the words; how sweet when applied by the Spirit to the troubled soul. "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled." Every desire begotten in the heart of the believer by the Spirit shall be satisfied. Blessed estate indeed. To hunger spiritually is infinitely more blessed than to be full of the good things of earth; for one shall end in eternal pleasures, while the other is as the apples of Sodom. When Jesus speaks the word, fulfilling the spiritual desires, the work is done; for "Her daughter was made whole from that very hour."

Thus I have run over the subject. I have experienced some degree of comfort, and some enlargement of mind, while writing. If some hungry soul shall be fed, it is enough. I trust sister Francis may be led into this subject more deeply than I have been able to tell it. That all the saints may find this portion of God's word from which I have written in sweet unison with their experience, is my prayer, for Jesus' sake.

As ever, your brother in hope and love,

F. A. CHICK.

JEHOVAH-JIREH.

WONDERFUL expression! "God will provide." How many can in truth exclaim, "Jehovah-jireh?" Unregenerate men and women do at times, when the providence of God overtakes them, and brings destruction and death upon them, cry out, "Lord, stay thy hand," and thus through fear acknowledge God's power; but to believe in God, and in his power and purpose to provide, is impossible with even the most devout christian, without faith. Then how or when do the children of God realize that "God will provide?" The child of God does say, "I am willing to trust God for all things;" and the next moment he may distrust him, and even deny him. The patriarch Abraham was led through deep experience, and only by that experience could he say, "Jehovah-jireh." The faith that God gave him led him to do just what he did. Had he known how this was to end, when God commanded him to take his only son and offer him for a burnt offering, would there or could there have been any faith manifested? I have no idea, when Isaac asked his father where the offering was, that Abraham had any other thought than that his son was the offering. He had full confidence that God had an offering, or he would not have commanded him to offer one; and he believed that offering to be his son, his only son. His answer to his son was an evasive one, having faith that God was able to raise him up again. He did not realize the power of God to provide until he saw the ram caught in the thicket, there by the provision of God. So with every child of God: he cannot believe or say from his heart that the Lord will provide, until he has experienced it all in himself. When the sinner is quickened he cannot see any provision in God's purpose for his salvation, but rather condemnation. Before this he thought he had as good a chance as any one to be saved, or that God had already provided for his salvation, subject to his rejection or acceptance. But when he realizes what a sinner he is he sinks in despair, and loses sight of choice or chance, and cannot even see his own offering which he so much before depended on. He is led along in experience until he sees the altar (by faith) a great way off, on a high mountain; but he cannot see the offering until Jesus appears. Then he calls the name of that place "Jehovah-jireh." He will never forget the place. Is it not the mount of the Lord to him forever? When we realize the sentence of death in us we feel the need of some kind of offering, and think we must find the offering in ourselves, and cannot see it in any other way, until Jesus appears as the Altar and the Sacrifice. We now see it exactly the opposite to what we expected. Instead of offering ourselves, we find that God has provided an offering, and in that offering we die, are buried and raised, and in his living we live. This is God's provision, not ours; and we can say in truth, "Jehovah-jireh." This expression carries with it not only the life and experience of the child of God, but of the church of Jesus Christ, and in fact the whole creation of God. Has not God made provision for all his creatures? Could one, from the smallest insect to the greatest giant on earth, exist on the earth without the provision that God has made? If the elements were left to themselves, what would be the result? There can nothing exist or subsist without the governing hand of God. He has provided, and will provide, for all the needs of his creatures. Even in this we cannot see the provision of God except by faith. With God there is neither beginning nor ending. He saw the end from the beginning, and that includes all the way. But with his creatures there is a beginning and ending. But God has declared the end from the beginning, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure. Has he provided for this? Faith says he has. Reason says he has not. Faith says, This is predestination. Reason says it is chance, or at least choice. The child of God may get angry, and say and do something for which he is sorry. Is this chance or predestination? Does he learn or experience anything in this? He repents, and that is a great deal. He is reminded of his own weakness, and learns a lesson in faith, and that is just what God intended he should. While ever we think we might have escaped such and such evils, or refrained from some sin which we have committed, we do not see that "the Lord will provide," and are without faith. If we sin, we have an Advocate with the Father. How can a child of God know he has an Advocate with the Father unless he experiences it? It is intended by the Father that he shall know it, or why provide? Here is predestination again. My dear brother or sister, you once thought you might as well take your fill of sin, when you did not know that you were a sinner, or that you were manifesting just what you were filled with. But when the time came for you to realize that you really are a sinner, and you saw Jesus as your Savior, did not you see that even your sins were provided for you? For without them you could never have known what a Savior God had provided for you. Is not this so? If you have ever suffered bodily affliction, did you not realize that it was the Lord's doing, and thus give glory to God? If you got angry, and injured an individual in any way in your anger, did you not at once repent, and abhor yourself? This also is God's provision and predestination, that you might or should glorify God. If we could possibly get along without sin, we could never know anything of the rich provision of God's grace, or have need of the Comforter. I have sometimes thought, although I hate sin when I feel its effects, that without sin and a knowledge of it I could not have enjoyed some, if any, of the most precious seasons of my life, when I have repented, and felt the forgiveness of God, and that I had "an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." The little child can only tell of the joy that comes with forgiveness, and feel that we have an Intercessor in whom we can trust. This confidence, this joy, is above the price of rubies, and cannot be purchased, but is provided for those that God has anointed. There is nothing that softens the child of God as repentance and forgiveness, both of which are provided by God, and which we could not experience without transgression. There is no joy above the joy of God's salvation, by which we are able to glorify God.

While we realize that God has provided and predestinated all things, even the wicked for the day of evil, may we rejoice in the name, "Jehovah-jireh."

Yours in this joy,

MILTON DANCE.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Sept. 12, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—When ever I sit down to attempt to write to the dear family of the saints through the SIGNS, it is with a foreboding amounting to a dread and fear that I may unintentionally say things that will mislead the dear children of God; for I feel my ignorance and unworthiness to such an extent that even in conversation with my brethren I have that dread almost continually with me, lest I may fall under the same condemnation which Job did when the Lord said to him, "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?" And so, many times having a desire to write, I refrain. And at other times I feel it to be a pleasurable duty and a precious privilege. I cannot feel that it is right for me, or any of the readers of the SIGNS, while enjoying the communications of each other, and knowing the need of the editors for many contributions, to refuse each one to do his or her share (however small) in keeping up the paper we all love so much. If the dear brethren and sisters would write out their travels in this wilderness journey and send the same to the SIGNS (particularly those who have never written), then there would be so many choice gems from which to select, that my poor, little mites would not be needed, and the paper would be made richer and more interesting thereby. Certainly the object of the SIGNS is the welfare of Zion; and I do feel that the varied experiences of the children of God are that which is needed for the comfort and upbuilding of the little ones. Do we not almost constantly hear the cry coming up from the hearts of many a poor, tried and weary pilgrim, O! is there any one like me? Am I one alone? Can any one be so poor in spirit? I am fully persuaded of that wail in my own heart. Then I receive the SIGNS, and search for a crumb of comfort (not a controversy); and when I find the breathings of a precious soul that tell my own experience, what a thrill of pleasure and joy do I experience! My soul goes out to that one in love, and my oft repeated question is answered, There is another one just as I am. My hope revives, and I am enabled to feast, perhaps, for days. Now, dear brother or sister, you who have been brought out of nature's darkness into God's marvelous light, is it not worth writing about? And if we freely receive, ought we not as freely give? I can remember that my first efforts in contributing to the SIGNS were mixed with a certain amount of pride, that they might appear finely worded and up to the highest standard. But now I am enabled to hope that the dear Lord with his all-sufficient grace has taken that all away; and now when I write it is with a sense of duty or desire, feeling that the best I have that I give, with the hope that it will be accepted as a token of my earnest love and devotion to the cause of my dear Redeemer. When at one time the disciples came to Jesus, saying, "Who is greatest in the kingdom of heaven? Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them, and said, Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven." When we have become deprived of earthly vanity, having the broken heart and contrite spirit, realizing that we are as helpless as a little child, desiring to follow him who is our glorious example, we are not far then from the everlasting arms, and not likely to go far astray in what we may say or write.

It is a precious sight to me to behold an assemblage of the saints, gathered in the name of Jesus, having one mind and one purpose, all meek and lowly in heart, standing upon the same great level, each esteeming the other better than himself, as little children coming to their Father and their Friend for light, for succor, for guidance, and for all things needful. Isometimes have the precious privilege of being present at such heavenly gatherings, where the stream of God's pure love unceasingly flows from breast to breast, filling all hearts with praise and thanksgiving so sublime that language is inadequate to express its height or depth. I think the psalmist must have had some such feelings when he exclaimed, "Praise waiteth [is silent] for thee, O God, in Zion." The children of Israel sang a song of deliverance (after they had crossed dry shod over the Red Sea) with timbrels and with dances. But to my mind the greater praise went out to God in the silence which followed the command of Moses (on the other side), "Fear ye not. Stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord." In the silent watches of the night, when stillness reigns, and silence is supreme, we look upon the whole universe as praising God in mute and awful grandeur. At such times I have been frightened and awestricken, that I ever had a passing thought in opposition to such a wonder-working and omnipotent Being, or that I ever dared make a comparison of him to mortal man, or that the least event that ever has or can transpire should come by chance; and I tremble to think I have ever dared denounce him as an unjust God. But such is the tendency of carnal reasoning and the depravity of the natural mind, that ere we are aware (like Jonah of old) we get to the very bottom of the mountains, and have fainted before we remember the Lord. So, dear brethren, let us watch and pray, putting on the whole armor of God, that we may defend ourselves and each other at every point from the onslaught of the enemy. The husbandman soweth his seed in the day, but in the night the enemy cometh and soweth the tares, and they grow up and choke out the good grain.

I perceive that I have wandered far away from all I intended to say when I began this poor epistle. But such as you have has been the leading of my mind; and if I have said aught to darken counsel by words without knowledge, I have this assurance, that the established truth of God cannot be altered, even if I should write on and on to the end of time. As saith the apostle to his son Timothy, "Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his." We may become lost in the thick darkness of carnal lusts, and fall among thieves, but never can the Lord's chosen little ones get beyond the length and strength of his mighty arm.

Yours in hope of life eternal,
B. F. COULTER.

ROCKVILLE, Md., Sept. 9, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I inclose a sermon of brother E. V. White's, on a portion of Scripture, which he preached to me on paper at my request. In reading the sermon I was edified and instructed, and feel sure that the readers of our dear family paper, the SIGNS, will also be instructed and edified by the same. I met brother White one week since, at Broad Run, Md., and made the request of him to have it published, leaving all to your better judgment. Brother White did not remember the good sermon that he had preached to me.

I was very sorry that it was not my privilege to meet you and other dear brethren the past summer, which has been my highly esteemed privilege since recovering my health and strength. Hoping that you will be spared to us for many years to come, I remain your sister in love and fellowship of the truth as it is in Christ our living Lord,

RUTH ADAMSON.

LEESBURGH, Va., July 2, 1889.

MY DEAR SISTER:—I feel this morning that I should not any longer put off telling you that I am afraid I do not fully understand what is meant by the words you are pleased to call my attention to. It would give me much pleasure to explain to you their meaning if I myself understood them. There is a great solemnity about all the words the Lord our God has spoken, but there seems to be a greater solemnity about some than others, and about none greater than these, "Now these be the last words of David. David, the son of Jesse, said, and the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet psalmist of Israel, said, The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue. The God of Israel said, the Rock of Israel spake to me, He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God.

And he shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain. Although my house be not so with God, yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure: for this is all my salvation and all my desire, although he make it not to grow."—2 Samuel xxiii. 1-5.

If ever a man speaks free from selfishness, free from worldly influence or worldly care, it is when he comes to die. Men may, and often do, speak insidiously when looking forward to many days yet to come. But when the last day has come, and there is time only to speak a few more words, they are apt to be about the most important and most solemn to them. These considerations clothe these words, concerning which you ask my views, with so much importance that it seems the most prudent thing I could say would be to acknowledge my insufficiency. I remember having tried to preach from these words once; but what I said or understood them to mean seems to be pretty much all gone from me. Trusting to the Lord that he will open the eyes of my understanding, I will write just such things as come to me now.

David says, "The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue." As I said, at such a time (the last words) men speak of the things most important to them. This being the case, the Spirit which was in David must have spoken of Jesus, who above all is the most important. For the Lord swore by himself, as he could swear by no greater. It is altogether likely, then, that the Spirit which was in David spoke of Jesus, the Lord; but it is also evident that David spoke of himself. "Although my house be not so with God." This is the way the Lord's people talk now, and have ever thus talked. They cannot speak of themselves except as in Christ, nor of Christ except as in them. I would refer you to John xvii. 21.

Now consider that David spoke of himself, of Jesus, and of that most important of all things, the grand mission of our dear Redeemer into this world, which was to conquer and destroy all powers in opposition to the accomplishment of his eternal purpose, and to set up a kingdom, government and dominion of his own, of which he should be the acknowledged head. We conclude, then, that this is what the Spirit in David was talking about. In regard to his government, he says it is necessary that it must be just. For "the God of Israel said," "He that ruleth over men must be just." This cuts off from the minds of believers all caviling with reference to the formation of the kingdom, or the disposition of the affairs thereof. This leaves the whole matter, formation and disposition, in the hands of the Lord. Hence the belief that all things that be are right, because (not that we comprehend) he that creates and disposes is just. This seems to be the very foundation upon which the kingdom is built and managed. Now with reference to the control or management of this kingdom, the Spirit's comparison is to the "light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds." Then again, as the tender grass springing up after rain, by the clear shining of the sun. This is a description of the rule or government of this kingdom or house, under which it thrives, prospers and brings forth. Then the power that rules this kingdom or government is simply the power to send its light where it please, to cause to warm up, to invigorate, and to bring forth that life which is. The sun does not cause the grass to spring forth from dead seed, but from living seed; but without the rain and the warm shining of the sun the living seed would remain fruitless. Is not this a clear representation of the kingdom of Christ as we understand it? There is no sun in all the day so invigorating, so resuscitating, as the morning sun, especially when there are no clouds to hinder its virtue. But such was not David's house. David's house was not built up this way. "For every battle of the warrior is with confused noise."—Isa. ix. 5. But this is to be without noise, like the building of Solomon's temple. These two ideas of the building of the kingdom or church are prevalent to-day. Some think it is by confused noise, and a few believe it is by the clear shining of the Sun of righteousness. Though this was not the way David's house was built up literally, yet the things contained in the covenant were made so plain to David's faith that the other way (that is, by the clear shining of the sun) became David's salvation and desire. He preferred this way. He delighted in this way. He was persuaded that though all increase by power, by might, by bloodshed and noise, was cut off, yet this was the best way; and he received what the Spirit taught him as his salvation and his desire.

As David understood this house, there was to be no growth—only a development. There was nothing to be added to this covenant, nor anything to be taken from it. The provisions in the first place were abundant. The arrangement was perfect. Therefore it is true, as you say, that God, who holds temporal blessings, or spiritual ones, is all righteousness, holiness and grace. He that ruleth over this house is just, ruling in the fear of God. Nor is there any growth as to the size of this house. But we are to go round about her, tell her towers, mark her bulwarks and consider her palaces. This shall be our employ, and not an attempt to make her grow.

My dear sister, what I have written is for your consideration.

Your brother,

E. V. WHITE.

LEGAL PROHIBITION.

ONE of the most common accusations laid to the charge of the Old School Baptists by the advocates of false christianity is that we oppose temperance in the use of intoxicating liquors. This accusation is not based upon the prevalence of drunkenness among us; for the law of Christ clearly forbids the recognition of drunkards as members of his church. Religious fanatics denounce us because we do not unite with them in their efforts to prohibit the use of liquor as it is authorized by the law given in the Scriptures. For adhering strictly to the rule which God has given, we are denounced as opposing morality and temperance. In bearing this reproach while it is falsely cast upon us, the blessing of our Lord is our support; for he says, "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake."—Matt. v. 11. So long as their reproaches are false accusations, they fall not upon us, but upon our immaculate Lord. Let no professed follower of Jesus either shrink from bearing his reproach, or give currency to such reproach by abusing the liberty which God has given them for an occasion to gratify their carnal appetite in reveling and drunkenness. Surely, to a lover of Jesus, no motive for careful moderation can be stronger than the obligation to obey his commandment. If the love of Christ will not restrain the appetite of a christian it can be controlled by no higher motive.

Since the organization of the crusade for a better system of temperance than God has given, drunkenness has greatly increased in the country generally. Hence the power of the law has been invoked to enforce the mistaken notions of religious fanatics. It is charged that the refusal of Old School Baptists to approve this fanaticism is the result of their ignorance. This charge is fully and effectually refuted by the fact that some of the most eminent and thoroughly educated men of the world are found holding the same sentiments with us on this subject. In an article recently contributed to Macmillan's Magazine, the learned Professor Goldwin Smith opposes the principle of enforcing total abstinence by legal enactment. He will hardly be charged with ignorance in using the same arguments which have been ascribed to stupidity when advanced by Old School Baptists. The following extract shows his view of the subject.

"Nothing is more odious or poisons

the heart of the community more than the employment of spies and informers, to which it has been necessary and will always be necessary for Prohibitionism to resort. Dickens holds up the mirror to nature in his description of the Claypoles and their trade. Men who have been imprisoned and ruined for plying a trade which, as only the other day they were holding licenses for it from the state, they can hardly feel to be criminal, are naturally not grateful for such treatment. Their vindictiveness and hatred of the spies have led to several outrages, and once or twice the use of dynamite.

To force the sentiment of the people into accordance with the law is the more difficult since all the time their church is holding up for their imitation a mode of character which is not temperate in the prohibitionist sense of that term. In commenting on the miracle at Cana, Archdeacon Farrar contrasts the genial innocence of Christ's system with the crushing asceticism of rival systems. By way of reconciling this discrepancy desperate efforts are made to uphold the astonishing theory that the oinos of the gospel was not fermented wine, but syrup. The ruler of the feast at Cana, it seems, expressed his surprise that the best syrup had not been produced till the guests had well drunk; the accusers of Christ in calling him a winebibber meant only that he was a syrup drinker; it was on syrup that the Corinthians got drunk at the celebration of the Lord's Supper; Paul advised his friend to take a little syrup for his stomach's sake; and the same apostle enjoined the church in electing Deacons not to choose those who were given to excess in syrup.

To such paltering with what every one educated enough to be a clergyman must know to be the truth we rather prefer the preacher who said boldly, that if Christ were again to come on earth and persisted in celebrating the Eucharist with wine, he would have to be excluded from his own church. To drag the gospel into this discussion on the prohibitionists' side is hopeless. There is no more of fanaticism than there is of formalism in that volume. When St. Paul bids us not drink wine if thereby our brother is made to stumble, he couples eating meat with drinking wine, showing that in his opinion both in themselves are innocent. The gospel bids us have regard to the weakness of our brother, but it does not bid our brother be weak, or us to countenance his weakness by unjust and unwise legislation."

RELIGION IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

SINCE the incorporation of the principle of religious freedom in the Constitution of the United States, the spirit of oppression has never ceased to devise measures by which to subvert that bulwark of personal liberty. The framers of the system of popular government were denounced as infidels, and accused of aiming to destroy the sacred institutions of christianity. In the providence of God the diversity of religious sentiment among the people has hitherto prevented any one denomination from asserting supremacy in our country, so that the church of Christ has found here a refuge from persecution and proscription for devotion to the truth as revealed in the individual experience of each one who is led by the Spirit of God. The will of God in shielding his saints has been accomplished through the discord and jealousy of the different orders of opposers of the truth. Thus he has caused the wrath of man to subserve his own purpose in affording a rest for his chosen people from the enmity of the world, while their enemies have been engaged in warring among themselves. The bloody spirit of persecution has not lost its venom in the past century, however; this is manifest in the continual efforts which have been made from time to time, through various pretexts, to usurp the power of coercing the people by law to worship the idols which priestcraft has chosen and set up. It was first insisted that there should be an established church recognized by law, as had been the case in the monarchies of the old world. Failing to secure this, under various pretexts, sectarian dogmas have been presented for legal enactment, which have generally failed to secure sufficient popular favor to be clothed with the authority of law. Hitherto the principal infringements upon the constitutional prohibition of religious legislation have been in the appropriation of money from the public treasury to pay chaplains. In a few cases conscientious legislators have protested against this robbery of the people; but their objections availed nothing, as the amount of money involved was considered trivial by the majority of their associates. The principle of injustice in making unauthorized appropriations seems to have been entirely ignored by those who enacted such laws.

The designs of religious tyranny require more than this clandestine robbery of the public treasury. Priestcraft can be satisfied with nothing short of the control of the consciences of the people by which to be able to enforce by the civil power universal conformity to its prescribed religious observances. Strenuous efforts have been made repeatedly to engraft sectarian requirements upon the legislation of our government; of which a prominent instance was the demand for stopping the transportation of the United States mails on Sunday. The refusal of Congress to grant this demand brought upon them and Andrew Jackson, then President, the most bitter denunciation. In many other cases the aspiring clergy have attempted to dictate legislation, as in the case of the demand for a law to forbid the making and sale of spirituous liquors. Other interference with the secular power has been attempted; but these are among the most prominent exhibitions of the meddlesome and restless character of this intolerant spirit of religious tyranny.

Having found the popular mind too much imbued with the love of individual liberty for submission to dictation in matters pertaining to religion, a deeper scheme has been devised for the subversion of the rights of conscience. It is now designed to obtain control of the education of all the children, and thus raise up a generation trained to regard the demands of the popular clergy as superior to all constitutional restraint. While claiming to avoid sectarian instruction in the education of children, the principle is inculcated that religion should be taught in a general way, such as will be acceptable to most of the popular denominations professing to be orthodox christians. The principal difficulty in the way of securing the approval of the masses to this specious proposal arises from the jealousy of the Roman Catholics and professed Protestants, each fearing that the other will gain ascendancy by this movement. So long as this strife between themselves shall continue the scheme cannot be effectually carried out. There are indications at present, however, that they are very nearly ready to unite upon a compromise by which they may work together for the overthrow of religious liberty, and leave the question of ultimate supremacy to be settled after they are freed from the restraint which now prevents all of them from usurping control of the consciences of the whole people. The same tyrannous spirit actuates both parties in this strife; and it will matter little to the subjects of their oppression whether they are persecuted by the one party or the other. Murder and robbery are the same whether the oppressors are called orthodox christians or infidels. That is not the true spirit of the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ which seeks to compel others to adopt our own religious sentiments. The principle of the gospel of Christ can never justify an appeal to the civil power for its enforcement.

In schools supported by private patronage, and such as are sustained by particular orders or sects, there is no impropriety in those who patronize them directing what shall be their course of instruction. It is certainly the right of every patron to decide whether in such schools religion, politics or music shall be taught. But in the public schools, which are supported by taxation of all the people alike, there is manifest injustice in taking money from Protestants to support the teaching of Catholic doctrines; and equally clear injustice in compelling Catholics to pay for the teaching of the religious sentiments of Protestants. The same principle shows the injustice of compelling christians to pay for the education of children in either of those false doctrines. Such injustice becomes religious oppression when the attendance of children at public schools is enforced by law. No parent can consent that the direction of the religious education of his child shall be controlled by those whose sentiments are opposed to his own. Yet this must necessarily be the case when the law gives authority for religious instruction in the schools where all children are required to attend. The law must define what is to be considered correct religious instruction. When it is so determined by law, whether it be in favor of one creed or another, there is an establishment of religion just as effectually as if all dissenters were directly outlawed. Of course such legislation would be contrary to the constitutional provision which prohibits discrimination in regard to religion, and guarantees the rights of conscience; but the same power which could thus pervert legislation would also control the courts which must judge the validity of the laws.

In Public Voice, the eclectic journal of Washington, D. C., in July last, several papers were published upon the question, "Is Religious Instruction in Public Schools Expedient?" Cardinal Gibbons expresses the sentiment of Roman Catholicism in saying that "An education that improves the mind and memory to the neglect of moral and religious training is at best but an imperfect and defective system. The religious and secular education of our children cannot be divorced from each other without inflicting a fatal wound upon the soul: they must go hand in hand, otherwise their education is shallow and fragmentary—a curse instead of a blessing."

Rev. Dr. Thomas Hill, ex-President of Harvard University, says that "Public schools with compulsory attendance are an essential adjunct of a republican government, and that the republic is bound to superintend with care the education of the children. He concludes that religious instruction is more than expedient; it is demanded as a political necessity." In this view it will be observed that both the highest Papal authority in America and this eminent Protestant Doctor take the same position, which is the plain assertion that the government should enforce upon all the people its own system of religious education.

Rev. Dr. Minot J. Savage, of Boston, takes a different position on the subject, and says, "The public school, supported by the equal taxation of people of all beliefs, exists and has a right to exist simply and solely for the sake of such education as fits for citizenship, and so is for the public good. The church and the home give ample scope for all individual peculiarities of belief or theory. The public school is for the people and for all the people. Let it be kept true to its own high and sacred mission."

Prof. W. T. Harris, Editor of the Journal of Speculative Philosophy, says, "It seems to me that religious instruction in the public schools is inexpedient, on the ground that they are for all citizens, whatever their religious belief, or no belief. It is the conviction of the average American citizen that rights of private conscience must be respected, and that Church and State must be entirely separated."

From these expressions it is evident that there is no attempt at concealment of the design of the popular clergy to use the public educational system of the government for the inculcation of such religion as they may dictate. This design is the more alarming because that not even the animosity between Catholics and Protestants forbids their uniting in this scheme for the overthrow of that liberty of conscience which has been the brightest glory of the American republic. Without the interposition of divine protection this device of religious tyranny may soon succeed in securing the power to light the fires of persecution in this country; and again the saints may be compelled to choose between worshipping the antichristian image of the beast and the loss of all civil rights and earthly possessions. In the hour of trial may the grace of God enable all his saints to stand firmly in the faith and truth of the gospel of Christ; and let brotherly love continue and abound so much the more as we see the day approaching. These perilous times indicate that the end is near.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Licking Association of Particular Baptists, now in session with the church at Mount Carmel, Clark Co., Ky., to the several churches of which she is composed, sendeth christian love and salutation.

VERY DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS:—The infinitely glorious subject of the religion of our dear Redeemer must ever fill the minds of the saints with joy and rejoicing when they are enabled to meditate upon it, when they by the Spirit's power are enabled to look into some of the great and wonderful things embraced in the character of him of whom the prophet speaks, saying, "His name shall be called Wonderful." In that name rests all the hope of the redeemed, because "in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily," and "ye [the saints] are complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power." In that wonderful name the saints, when enlightened by the Spirit, are enabled to behold all things needful for them, both in time and eternity, for he of God is made unto them wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption. Let it be remembered that the apostle has said, "But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that, according as it is written, He that glorifieth, let him glory in the Lord." They can glory in none other, for they are complete in him, and are blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ, according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love. They who were chosen in him before the foundation of the world were then and have ever been one with him, and hence he is and has been from all eternity made unto them wisdom. The wise King of Israel hath said, "Wisdom hath builded her house; she hath hewn out her seven pillars." She in her inseparable oneness with her Lord can say, "Riches and honor are with me; yea, durable riches and righteousness." For he of God the everlasting Father is made unto her righteousness. How durable is that riches and how unfading is that righteousness, all existing in the Lord Jesus Christ from the very ancients of eternity, and secured to all who were chosen in him before the foundation of the world by reason of their oneness with him; and by reason of their unity with him, he of God is made unto them sanctification and redemption. They are set apart in him, and redeemed by him from the direful consequence of sin, which is death. He also is their resurrection and their life; that life which is hid with Christ in God, and that resurrection which was secured to all the saints by reason of their unity with him. When he came from the tomb a triumphant conqueror over death and over the grave he fulfilled the prophecy that had been written long years before that glorious morning, "Thy dead men shall live, with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust: for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." After his resurrection he said to John, "I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive forevermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death." When he unlocks the dark caverns of the tomb, and his saints hear his voice and come forth to the resurrection of life, then that life will be given their bodies which is hid with Christ in God. Then they will be like him, and see him as he is; be like him, because they will be alive forevermore. Then surely he is their resurrection and their life. While clothed with mortality the saints are journeying toward the tomb amidst scenes of sorrow, pain, disease and death, and often their spiritual vision is so obscured by the corruptions of earth that they have but a faint view of the way of holiness; but for their comfort he says, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." When they by a precious faith behold him as their way, their truth, and their life, they in gladness press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. Trusting and believing that they are in the way of holiness, which is for those, the way-faring men, though fools, they shall not err therein. To them how sweet and precious the thought that he who is made unto them wisdom is their way; and though all are regarded by a sin-corrupted world as fools, yet that wisdom which is from on high is made theirs, and leads them in that way of holiness, in which they shall not err. Their glorious Lord being the way, in him they cannot err. He in his ever-glorious character as "The everlasting Father" is the highway, and as the "Son given" is the way; but it is a mystery to the saints while they are tabernacled in this vain world. The apostle, who was inspired from on high, could say, "Great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." Surely to the saints in these days of spiritual darkness and confusion this great and wonderful mystery must remain with them; but their most earnest desires are to know more and more of his great and wonderful character. Beholding in that character that (to the saints) most precious attribute called love, they are made to rest in him, and in a sweet and precious faith to sing,

"O love divine! how sweet thou art!
When shall I find my willing heart
All taken up by thee?
I thirst and faint, and die to prove
The greatness of redeeming love—
The love of Christ to me."

When filled with that love they meet in sweet harmony, and join in songs of praise and adoration to him who has loved them and given himself for them. In those ever-precious assemblies of the saints contention and strife are not known, for they are led by the Spirit, and from the depths of their hearts adopt this language of David, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that went down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard: that went down to the skirts of his garments; as the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion: for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life forevermore." When that love prevails among God's dear people they are upon the mountains of Zion, where their Lord hath commanded the blessing, even life forevermore. They then remember that their Lord has said to them, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another." Amidst the cares of earth, that love for one another cheers the saints, and strengthens their hope of a blessed and glorious union in their future and eternal home, where sorrows and separations are feared and felt no more. They sweetly and joyfully remember that it is written, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." "He that loveth not his brother abideth in death." In that love they rejoice in the power, goodness and mercy of their God, knowing that he has freely bestowed it upon them. Then they rise as much above the vain babblings of ambitious and wicked men as are the heavens above the earth. Of that class the apostle has said, "He that loveth not his brother abideth in death." When any of God's people cease to love the brethren, and engage in persecuting the saints, they enter that gloomy vale of death, where there are no spiritual joys, no rays of heavenly light to heal the wounds that sin has made. There they are led captive by the devil at his will, until our glorious Lord delivers them from that fearful captivity. Then their cry is, "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; and uphold me with thy free Spirit. Then will I teach transgressors thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto thee."

Now, dear brethren and sisters, our prayer is that we all may be kept from persecuting any of the dear saints, and from offending one of the little ones who believe in our dear Redeemer; and may we daily be enabled to give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name. Amen.

The Maine Old School Baptist Association, in session with the Bowdoinham Church, at Bowdoinham, Maine, Sept. 6th, 7th and 8th, 1889, to the churches composing the same, sends greetings of love and fellowship in the Lord Jesus Christ.

AS IT is our custom to write a Circular Letter, we call your attention to the words written in First Corinthians ii. 14, which read as follows, "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

Now it seems to us that this Scripture teaches very plainly what the natural man does not receive, and why he does not receive it. Then if it be true that natural men do not receive the things of the Spirit of God, what are they receiving? for they must receive something, to have so many so-called churches; and that something must be nothing more than natural, as that is all they can receive. Then, their preachers must be natural, and natural teachers can please the natural mind. They are so blind that they think they are helping the great I AM, "working for Jesus," and "bound to hold out to the end." End of what? Why, their natural life. They put darkness for light, and light for darkness. But, brethren, how is it with us? Have we not in our life seen the time that we have served the god of our own mind, and did what seemed right in our own eyes? We had plenty of natural religion, feeling much better than those that did not profess to be religious, and really thought we could teach our neighbors to know the Lord. But we hope we have been taught better things by him that teaches as never man taught, having all power in heaven and on earth. With this power he brings his children from a natural view of God to a spiritual view, and by this power puts his laws in their hearts and in their minds. "I will be their God, and they shall be my people." Then it is that our faith stands not in the natural wisdom of man, but in the power of God. We see that the flesh profiteth nothing. It is the Spirit that quickeneth. In our natural state we could boast of our goodness to God and man. But now we have to cry, like one of old, "My leanness! my leanness!" All our supposed good works are gone. We cannot boast of them any more. Now we can say, "We are the circumcision which worship God in the Spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." We know that we are kept by the power of God, and that there is no salvation in any of our own works, which are works of the flesh, are perishable, and must pass away. "So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God." "They that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit." The salvation of the people of God was accomplished by Jesus, who was delivered for their offenses, and was raised from the dead for their justification. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." That glorious resurrection has secured the safety of all his children, and has brought life and immortality to light through the gospel. If Jesus has forgiven us so much, sinners that we are, ought we not also to forgive one another, if our brethren have trespassed against us? Do we say, My brother has done wrong, and he must acknowledge it before I will forgive him? Do we take him by the throat and say, Pay me that thou owest? If we go to a brother in the Spirit of Christ, we go without malice, with forgiveness in our heart and on our lips. Even if our brother will not hear us, we will forgive all the wrong that he has done, and will feel to pity and pray for the erring one. As Christ has forgiven us, so ought we to forgive one another. To be Christ-like, we must have the Spirit of Christ, the fruit of which is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, meekness, temperance. Against such there is no law. They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit, remembering that if we give a cup of cold water to one of the least or weakest of the saints, we do it unto Christ. If we have hard feelings and say hard words against a brother, are we not doing the same to Christ, and transgressing his holy law? It seems to us that the carnal mind or the old man is at work here. We cannot heap coals of fire on their heads in that way. Remember, brethren, that the tongue is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison. It defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature.

When this gets to working it is apt to destroy the peace of the saints and create confusion among them. Brethren, should we not take warning, and treat every one by word and deed as in the presence of Christ? Let us remember that we are all weak, and liable to err, and all get out of the way. All that keeps any of us is the restraining grace of God. Let us seek for peace, and things whereby one may edify another. How good and how pleasant it is to dwell together in love and harmony. If we do not manifest any love to the saints, what evidence have we that we belong to Christ? The word says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." If any of us have a child that falls and gets hurt, the whole family sympathize with it, and do all in their power to restore the child to peace and happiness again. So it should be with us. When a brother or sister steps out of the way (which we are all liable to do), should we not try to restore such an one, not using harsh words, or calling them hard names, but in the spirit of love, which is the Spirit of Christ? When one comes and acknowledges that he has done wrong, how our heart goes out to him, and he seems nearer to us than ever before. We are then ready to say, Bring forth the best robe and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet; and bring hither the fatted calf and kill it, and let us eat and be merry.

We would say in conclusion, Brethren, contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints. May God guide us while we sojourn here, and finally receive us, for Christ's sake.

Once more your messengers have come to us richly laden with the glorious gospel of our Savior. They have known nothing among us but Jesus Christ as the Savior of his people. Our meeting has been one of joy and profit. We earnestly desire a continuance of your correspondence.

Our next meeting is appointed to be held with the church at Whitefield, Maine, to begin on Friday before the second Monday in September, 1890.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Licking Association of Particular Baptists, in session with the church at Mount Carmel, Clark Co., Ky., to the associations with which we correspond, sends christian greeting.

DEARLY BELOVED:—Our God, whose mercies never fail, has granted us another opportunity of meeting in love and fellowship, and we have felt to say, "How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." We have been favored with the presence of a goodly number of ministering brethren from abroad, who have faithfully proclaimed the gospel of the grace of God, to the comfort of our souls. We earnestly desire a continuance of your correspondence, which has been so pleasant and encouraging to us.

We have appointed our next annual session with the church called Salt River, in Anderson Co., Ky., to begin on Friday before the second Saturday in September, 1890, when and where we hope to meet and greet your messengers in the fellowship of the Spirit.

The Maine Old School Baptist Conference, convened with the church at North Berwick, Maine, August 30th, 31st and September 1st, 1889, to the associations and meetings with whom she corresponds, sends greeting in the Lord.

DEAR BRETHREN:—For many years it has been our custom to send you a letter from our annual meeting, to inform you of our affairs, and to speak of the things which, as poor sinners whose hope is in Jesus, are precious to us. We have found these yearly gatherings both pleasant and profitable; and our correspondence with you we have felt to prize as a help and comfort. We do not recall how long we have enjoyed these privileges. We feel no desire to discontinue them, but on the contrary we still hope to be favored with your correspondence. We have usually in these letters taken up and briefly presented some special principle of the doctrine of God our Savior; but this year painful circumstances prevent our doing so. Last year at our annual meeting we appointed our beloved pastor, Elder Wm. Quint, to prepare our letter for this year; but nearly two months ago it pleased our God to sorely afflict him with sickness. For weeks, to all human appearance, he hung between life and death. Because of this illness he was unable to prepare a letter. The church over which he had been pastor for forty years felt greatly troubled, and as though we were left desolate. But we know that the Lord reigns in heaven and in earth, and that all must be according to his sovereign will, and we desire to be reconciled and submissive to his will. We are glad to have it to say that our pastor is now much improved, and we hope that it is in the unchangeable purpose of God to raise him up again and spare him to us yet for a little time. If it should be so, we desire to be thankful to God, the Giver of all.

We desire to say that our meeting has been pleasant. The preaching has been Christ and him crucified, and we have been refreshed in spirit. Our next session has been appointed to be held with the church at North Berwick, to begin on Friday before the first Sunday in September, 1890, when we hope to meet and greet you again.

MARRIAGES.

SEPT. 18th, 1889, at the residence of Mr. John L. Hait, Middletown, N. Y., by Elder Benton Jenkins, Mr. E. Giles Pierpoint, of Liberty, Sullivan Co., N. Y., and Miss Emma J. Warring, of the former place.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—June 8th, 1889, at the residence of his mother, in Arlington, Baltimore Co., Md., Thomas B. Hanna, in his twenty-eighth year.

"There fell upon the house a sudden gloom,
A shadow on those features, fair and thin."

Endowed by God with more than ordinary powers of mind, we thought that a brilliant future was before him; but, like his brother who had gone before, he was stricken with that fatal disease, consumption. He left his school and went south, hoping to regain his health; but it was not to be. Weary and sick, he returned to his mother, who nursed him with all a mother's loving tenderness.

"E'en love, long tried, and cherished long,
Became more tender and more strong
At thought of that insatiate grave
From which its yearnings could not save."

The disease was also in his stomach, and he suffered intensely, yet without repining, ever patient and gentle. Near the end, when his mother asked him to take nourishment, he looked at her lovingly and said, "Dear, sweet mother, do not ask me; you know it will hurt me so much." These were the last words that passed his lips, and the gentle spirit took its flight to God, who gave it.

Four sons, all grown to upright manhood, yet remain, but our dear aunt is sorely stricken. Her husband, an only daughter, and now two sons, are all taken. She writes, "The world seems all so gloomy to me."

"Be still, sad heart, and cease repining;
Behind the clouds is the sun still shining.
Thy fate is the common fate of all:
Into each life some rain must fall.

Some days must be dark and dreary."
May the Lord bind up the broken spirit and comfort the sorrowing hearts.

ISLAND CITY, Oregon.

THE death of Aaron Bradley Dickerman occurred at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. H. W. Bentley, in Boonville, N. Y., Sept. 9th, 1889.

Mr. Dickerman was born in Hamden, Conn., Jan. 20th, 1807. In 1830 he married Catharine Allen, in New Haven, and in 1833 settled in Trumansburgh, Tompkins Co., N. Y., where he resided until the death of his wife, which occurred in January, 1886. Shortly afterward he took up his abode with his daughter in Boonville.

For more than sixty years he had been identified with the Old School or Primitive Baptists, and was a faithful christian man, whose sense of dependence upon God was deep-felt and abiding. Religion was not a matter of form with him; it was his daily life. He passed away from earth as peacefully as the lifting dew, and the world is better for his having lived in it. His funeral service was conducted by Elder D. D. Barnes, and his remains were taken to Trumansburgh for interment.

ORDINATIONS.

By request of the Primitive Baptist Church at Montgomery, Elder M. V. Gibson was present last Saturday, August 17th; and by request of the same, myself (the pastor) and Elder Gibson formed a presbytery.

Brethren W. P. Burks and H. B. Estes were presented as chosen by the church to act as Deacons when ordained.

After the presbytery was formed we proceeded with the necessary examination and the laying on of hands, and the brethren were ordained to the office of Deacons in the church.

We had just finished the house of worship, and held our first meeting on Friday before. It was a meeting, we trust, long to be remembered. It was to us a feast of fat things, of wine on the lees, well refined. Elder Gibson preached for us three times, and we felt edified and comforted thereby. We hope we have two Deacons now who will be active. Brother Cook, who was old, and felt too infirm, requested it. He has been a good and faithful one in the kingdom. He is now among us, and we hope the Lord will bless him in his declining age, and fit him for bliss beyond this vale of tears, and also sister Cook, who is a sister in Israel indeed.

YEARLY MEETINGS.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

TRUE HAPPINESS.

TELL me the happiest mortal found
In all the human race.
Why, 'tis the God-wrought miracle,
A sinner saved by grace.
Saved by the grace of God alone,
Through Jesus Christ his Son,
Who in him carries on the work
The Father has begun.
Strong in th' almighty strength of God,
His armor girded on,
When Satan tempts him with his wiles,
Bids the base fiend begone.
Man's feeble threats he feareth not,
Though snares be round him thrown;
He fears but one, that mighty power,
His God, and him alone.
His hope is not in earthly things,
The world gives not his joy;
Its transient pleasures empty are,
And in a moment die.
But on to heaven, his home, he looks
With all believing eyes,
To where, when death doth set him free,
His soul will surely rise.
His heavenly home! O glorious thought!
A house not made with hands;
But built by workmanship divine,
Eternally it stands.
The dwelling place of all the saints,
Where, when this life is o'er,
With Father, Son and Holy Ghost
We'll rest forevermore.

THE SHORTNESS OF LIFE.

LIKE as the damask rose you see,
Or like the blossom on the tree,
Or like the dainty flower of May,
Or like the morning to the day,
Or like the sun, or like the shade,
Or like the gourd which Jonah had:
E'en such is man, whose thread is spun,
Drawn out and cut, and so is done.
Withers the rose, the blossom blasts,
The flower fades, the morning hastes,
The sun doth set, the shadows fly,
The gourd consumes, and mortals die.
Like the grass that's newly sprung,
Or like a tale that's new begun,
Or like a bird that's here to-day,
Or like the pearly dew of May,
Or like an hour, or like a span,
Or like the singing of a swan:
E'en such is man, who lives by breath—
Is here, now there, in life and death.
The grass decays, the tale doth end,
The bird is flown, the dews ascend,
The hour is short, the span not long,
The swan's near death, man's life is done.
Like to the bubble in the brook,
Or in a glass much like a look,
Or like the shuttle in weaver's hand,
Or like the writing in the sand,
Or like a thought, or like a dream,
Or like the gliding of the stream:
E'en such is man, who lives by breath—
Is here, now there, in life and death.
The bubbles burst, the look's forgot,
The shuttles flung, the writings blot,
The thought is past, the dream is gone,
The water glides, man's life is done.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CANAANITE IN THE LAND.

WHEN the Lord delivered the children of Israel from Egyptian bondage, and led them forty years through the wilderness to the land flowing with milk and honey, whereof he had promised their fathers and themselves that they should possess it, he commanded that they should drive out from that land all the Canaanites, throwing down their altars, and making no league with them. After entering the land of promise, just so long as they walked in obedience to that command the Lord their God was a present help to them in every time of need, watching over them, destroying their enemies from before them, and showing them not only his mighty power, but also his loving-kindness and tender mercy; for he had chosen them from among the nations, making them his peculiar people, as he said to them through Moses (their leader), "Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations: ask thy father, and he will show thee; thy elders, and they will tell thee. When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. For the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance. He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness; he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye. As the eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings: so the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him."—Deut. xxxii. But by reason of their tendency to disobedience, and their proneness to follow after other gods, they fulfilled not the commands laid upon them, allowing some of the Canaanites to remain in the land, making league with them, and worshipping their gods. So the Lord sent an angel unto them, saying, "I made you to go up out of Egypt, and have brought you unto the land which I swore unto your fathers; and I said, I will never break my covenant with you. And ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land; ye shall throw down their altars: but ye have not obeyed my voice; why have ye done this? Wherefore I also said, I will not drive them out from before you; but they shall be as thorns in your sides, and their gods shall be a snare unto you." While all the travel of the children of national Israel is a type of the travel of the children of spiritual Israel, we can readily see how the evils that beset us in our wilderness journey, even after our entrance into the antitypical Canaan (the visible church), are those which have not been driven out, and are now thorns in our sides and snares to our feet. The works of the flesh and the temptations of Satan are so many and so varied that sometimes, all unconscious, we cherish one or more of them to our exceeding sorrow and distress of mind, when our eyes are opened to the knowledge of how far we have been led astray. Then by strength given us in the grace of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ we are enabled to destroy the enemy, or drive the Canaanite from our land; but, like the children in the type, we no sooner get rid of one, and in blissful ignorance think we are worshipping the true God in spirit and in truth, than we find another, more startling and monstrous than the last, eating as a canker-worm into our very life blood. So it is a continual warfare, the flesh striving against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh. When in our first experience of God's love being shed abroad in our hearts we do truly feel that our evil heart of unbelief has gone from us forever, we are apt to look with pity upon one who will tell us that doubts will arise, or that darkness will enshroud our habitation. We can hardly realize in that ecstatic time that we still inhabit this tenement of clay, in which swarm the locusts having over them the prince of the power of the air, awaiting the first opportunity to lead us among the Canaanites, that we may worship their gods; and when we have become so bewildered that in our confusion we are carried away captive into Babylon, then we remember Zion, the city of our solemnities, and we hang our harps upon the willows, for we cannot sing the songs of Zion in a strange land. Yet through it all we never entirely lose sight of that precious hope which was given us at the first. It is an anchor to our souls, both sure and steadfast, entering into that within the veil. We cry, and it may be many days before there is a manifest answer to that cry. We thirst, and our tongue may cleave to the roof of our mouth ere we receive the precious draught. We groan, being burdened, and fear we have sunk too low for succor. But to them that ask he has said it shall be given. To them that thirst he has said, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." To the poor, burdened one he says, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Trembling and faint, we go to the Rock, and in the cleft thereof we rest our weary, aching heads, having the assurance that what he has promised he will perform, that his mercies endure forever, and that he will never leave nor forsake us. What a glorious Leader to follow! for he supplieth all our needs, watcheth over us every moment of our lives, sticketh closer than a brother, and is the Fountain whence cometh the streams which make glad the city of God. Our all in all is he. The worlds were made by him and for him, and all creatures shall show forth praises unto his glorious name. The apostle prayed earnestly that the thorn in his flesh might be removed; and well might he say, as he did, "Whence come wars and fightings?" for the Canaanite is still in the land, and will remain so long as our earthly house of this tabernacle be not dissolved. Whether we have hatred, jealousy, malice, envy or covetousness in our hearts, well may we pray that they be removed, for as thorns they do pierce and torment us all the days of our natural lives. As mountains they rise up before us, making our pathway rugged and steep. As raging waters they encompass us about, until with agony we cry out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" It is said that the broad road to destruction is paved with good intentions; but what of the narrow way, and where does it lead? Paved with the groans of the tried, weary and foot-sore pilgrim, watered with his tears, every adverse wind bringing doubts and tremblings. Sometimes a cold blast from the frozen north; again a chilling, searching east wind, bringing with it all the plagues of Egypt. So also comes the south wind, with healing in its gentle zephyrs, whereof we are glad; and the west wind, bringing assurance and hope. In all this well-worn pathway, at every turn are manifestations of Jesus' love to the traveler therein, and the testimony of all that he has done for poor, fallen, lost sinners. He came not to save the righteous, but such as are of a broken heart and a contrite spirit, to open the prison doors to them that are bound, and to destroy every Canaanite that is left in the land, the last enemy being death; and the hosannas of the redeemed will be, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" The church of the First-born is being brought up through great tribulation, and now the ends to be accomplished by that troublous pilgrimage; and where does it lead? First we are brought to the very feet of our dear Redeemer, with the weight and burden and knowledge of our own vile and sinful nature. He leads us to the cruel cross, and there we realize that in his awful suffering, and by the shedding of his precious blood, our burdens are removed, and with joy and gladness we praise his holy name, acknowledging him as the author and finisher of our faith. Now we have received the earnest of the Spirit, being yet in the body of this death; and so we are led on by his gracious hand through much darkness and occasional light, walking by faith, through grace, desiring not the things of this world, but looking forward in hope to joys unseen. Finally, when to our mortal bodies time ceases to exist, we enter into the joys of our Lord, into the realities of life eternal, to which we have looked with many longings—a land of halloved peace, a bright and boundless realm of God's eternal love, there to live forever and ever, where

"No chilling winds nor poisonous breath
Can reach that healthful shore;
Sickness and sorrow, pain and death,
Are felt and feared no more."

May we be enabled to realize that as our days, so shall our strength be, giving God all the praise and all the glory.

Your unworthy brother,
B. F. COULTER.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

WESTCLIFFE, Colo., Sept. 8, 1889.

BELOVED BRETHREN BEEBE:—

Once more I am permitted, through the mercy of our God, to take up my pen to address a few lines to you and the faithful in Christ Jesus. I have long remained silent, but not because I have not felt a desire to write. Since my name appeared in our dear medium of correspondence I have felt frequent promptings to write; but comes this prompting of the flesh or of the Spirit, I am at a loss to know. Since I last wrote to the SIGNS I have passed through sore trials and vexation of spirit. Then, above all, my leanness and barrenness of mind have been so great that I have not only quenched the spirit or prompting to write to the SIGNS, but a number of letters from precious brethren in the Lord remain unanswered.

My mind is and has been much troubled over my earthly affairs. I have become involved in debt, so that if pressed to make immediate payment it would take my little home and all my earthly possessions to pay my debts. Let me say to you here, dear brethren editors, that if I do not remit to you the amount due on my subscription within a month, I shall have to ask you to stop sending me the SIGNS until I can pay for the year now more than half gone.

But this will be of little or no interest to but few, if any, of your readers, so I will ask pardon for letting my pen follow the drift of my mind concerning my earthly affairs. I have been requested by some of my correspondents to give an account of our yearly meeting, which was held the first of last month.

Dear brethren and sisters, our meeting was not so pleasant as was anticipated. We had no visiting brethren with us. We were under the painful necessity of excluding two of our members. The church, for the first time since its organization in 1873, held communion, after which those of the members who felt it a duty proceeded to wash one another's feet. We had preaching in the grove on Saturday and Sunday by our brethren, Elders I. A. Moore and J. R. Bolinger. Save the exclusion referred to, the meeting passed off pleasantly enough.

In the SIGNS of August 7th, 1889, I notice this expression in brother W. Lively's letter, in speaking of the predestination of God, "His purpose is equal to his wisdom, and his wisdom to his power, and all the perfections of God are of equal length and size." How true, my dear brother. A precious brother, in writing to me upon this subject a few years ago, said, "God had to know a thing before he could predestinate it." As then, so it is with me now, impossible to place one of the divine attributes of Jehovah before another; but, as brother Lively has so plainly and simply expressed it, "All the perfections of God are of equal length and size." That the world should hate the doctrine of God's predestination is no marvel; but to me it does seem strange that brethren who cannot reconcile the eternal predestination of God to suit some pet theory of their own will try to patch up a kind of predestination for our God, so as to clear him from being the author of sin. Our God is a mysterious, wonder-working God. Well might the apostle Paul, in contemplating his perfections, exclaim, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" I have no fears but that God is able to and will defend his holy character from being the author of sin. I believe that God is a God of purpose. He had a purpose in creating this earth, a purpose in making man, a purpose in giving him a law, yea, a purpose for everything under the sun; and everything fulfills the purpose which he decreed for it. I am well aware that many (to me) precious brethren do not like the idea that God decreed the fall of man, and argue that they do not believe it, but will admit that he had a wise purpose in it. What is his purpose but his decree? I have heard some make remarks like this: "What a paradise this world would have been—no toils, cares, sorrows nor sin—if Adam had kept the law which God gave him in the garden." Even some among the Baptists have the notion that "God made Adam able to stand [keep the law], but liable to fall; so [if he had made use of his ability] he could have stood if he would." If Adam had the ability to stand, there would be a liability that he would not fall. This would certainly place Jehovah in a dilemma indeed; for God had, long before laying the foundations of this earth, long ere man was fashioned of the dust of earth, provided a Savior, a Redeemer, for poor, fallen man. If then Adam had used his ability to "stand," and had not violated the law, he would need no Savior nor Redeemer. I cannot believe for one moment that God ever made or created anything or being, and gave it power or ability to thwart any of his holy, just, and all-wise purposes. As to the fall of Adam, God either decreed it, or he did not; there is no middle ground. Which will you have? I prefer to risk all I have and am in the hands of a just and holy God who decrees all things according to his own good pleasure, knowing full well that what he does is right, for "Justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne." He is under no law, and therefore cannot sin, nor be the author of sin, for sin is the transgression of law. There are in the Scriptures of divine truth many deep and hidden mysteries (to me). I have no desire to say they are not so because I cannot comprehend them; but I do try to remember that hidden things belong unto God, while things which God has been pleased to reveal unto us belong unto us. Could we always bear this truth in mind there would not be so much contention among the saints about things of no profit.

Brethren Beebe, I wrote the foregoing several nights ago and laid it aside. My mind seems to be shut up, so I will write no more. I cannot risk my own judgment as to whether I was prompted to write it by the flesh or the Spirit. I will leave it to your better judgment. If you think it will be of any interest to the readers of the SIGNS you are at liberty to give it a place therein; but, on the other hand, if it will be of no interest, or would be likely to stir up contention among the saints, cast it aside, and all will be well.

I am your very unworthy brother
(if a brother at all) in hope,

J. H. YEOMAN.

KELLY'S CORNERS, N. Y., Sept. 18, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—This morning a copious shower of rain is falling on the already moistened earth, which can neither bring the rain nor cause it to cease coming. But the hand of him who created the earth, with all created things, has his pleasure done by the drought and floods, and none can stay his hand, nor say to him, What doest thou? Yet in the busy marts of this world, and in the minds of God's afflicted and poor people, when they are "at home in the body," there is much of the time a lack of reconciliation to the will of the Lord, so that their peace is greatly disturbed. The record of truth tells them plainly that "the just shall live by faith;" and they also have proved that they do walk by faith when they go forward in the path that Jesus has marked out for them, which is in himself, where they are saved, and in whom alone they have any joy or glory of a spiritual nature.

These things being in my mind, as a contrast between the flesh and the Spirit, I am led to drop a few thoughts from the words in Galatians v. 26, "Let us not be desirous of vainglory, provoking one another, envying one another."

The first verse of this chapter shows a needs be for the children of God to continue steadfast, or stand fast in the liberty or freedom which they have, and not turn back to bondage or again wear the yoke as an entanglement. In the twenty-fifth verse the apostle says, "If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit." That is, if Christ is our righteousness, let us trust in what he hath done for us, and show forth by our walk and conversation that we have been taught of him, and know by a living faith, which works by love, and purifies the heart, that Christ filled all the joints and tittles of the law in our behalf; yea, in the behalf of all that the Father gave him in the well-ordered and sure covenant. And as the new covenant people, we have the holy law of our God written on the fleshly tables of our heart, which must be shown forth in God's elect people, to show who are the sons of God; and those who glory in this respect, glory only in the Lord. Therefore the command of Paul by the Spirit is in accord with the holy calling of the children of grace, "Let us not be desirous of vainglory;" because this will result in provocation and envying. This will cause some of the little ones of the fold to suffer by our hands. If we want vainglory it must be at the expense of the peace of others, and will cause a general conflict. It will not be the humbling of ourselves and coming to the feet of our brethren, as the Spirit teaches; but on the contrary it will make us heady and high-minded, and in the very nature of things will provoke some one of the family to provoke us, and cause us to envy some one, all of which is contrary to the Spirit of the Master. If ye are reviled, revile not.

"Now the Spirit speaketh expressly" against these things.

Where there is a desire for vain-glory, there the Spirit detects "seducing spirits and doctrines of devils." Mark, they are in the plural; and when tried by the word they fail to agree with the line and plummet, showing a lack of righteousness in accordance with the Spirit's teaching. The word of truth is fulfilled, that many false prophets are gone out into the world. The child of grace who is rooted and grounded in the truth, and endures temptation, has learned in his experience that in his flesh dwells no good thing, and that all his earthly desires are but vanity, though he is born of God and is saved with an everlasting salvation. In their natural life they are only worms, with no soundness in themselves, either in doctrine or practice. The language of the apostle comes to those led and exercised by the Spirit, as an imperative command, "Let us [each and every one] not be desirous of vainglory, provoking one another, envying one another."

Then we notice the first verse of the sixth chapter, "Brethren, if a man [for ye are all men, only men, he would say, as born of the flesh] be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual," &c. Now mark, he does not say, You who have attained to vainglory, and have provoked and envied one another; but "ye which are spiritual;" ye who love the one whom ye have found to be faulty. Though a brother beloved, he is but a man, subject to like passions as yourselves, and whom ye are to consider as your own body, and as fallible and faulty as yourselves, and no more so. And in this is the only wonder with me, if one of my brethren should ever have any faults to be seen by me, when I have a view of myself. And it is certain that if I go as the Scriptures demand, and tell my brother his fault, between him and myself, then my own sense of shame and guilt before my glorified Redeemer (and against his flesh and bones, of which I claim to be a member with my brother) must always bring me down in that way of humility that would fit me to deal mercifully with my brother as a member of the body of Christ; for in the third verse of this sixth chapter of Galatians the inspired apostle says to the Galatians and to us, "If a man think himself to be something when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself." In this I believe him to mean that if I should estimate myself above my brother, and not as fallible as he, then my glorying would be vain, and my attempt to recover my erring brother would be futile. But if on the contrary I am free from a desire for vainglory, all that is done will be to the edifying of the body in love, and the law of the Master fulfilled, "As I have loved you, that ye also love one another."

Cast not away your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. I feel now to ask, Where is the confidence of the saints of God placed? In whom do they confide? It certainly cannot be in one another. It cannot be in themselves. No; but in him who has called them to be saints; called them with a holy calling, not according to their works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given them in Christ Jesus before the world began. And the choice of them was such that they should be holy and without blame before him in love. It can then be said of the holy apostles, and of all who were given our risen Savior, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you." Hence the mighty God of Jacob has been the dwelling place of his people Israel in all generations; and as they have an experimental knowledge of their dwelling place, which is in love as it is in God, they cannot confide in any but the eternal God; for the fullness of the sweet fellowship which they have one with and for another here in this vale of tears, as pilgrims and sojourners, is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ. And as they love him who begets, they also love them that are begotten of him. This makes them pity those who look to any other source for strength or comfort save the Lord, from whom comes all their help. While the saints are forbidden to desire vainglory, they are commanded to trust in the Lord, to look alone to the Lord, and glory only in the Lord, who is their refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble, and who knows them that trust in him.

LOUVALE, Ga., Aug. 20, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—By request of Elder J. A. Mills, of Olustee Creek, Ala., I will write such views as are requested and that I have. First, he asks me to write my views on the predestination of all things, which I have before written, and have been published in the SIGNS. But as it is a glorious subject, and so much loved and appreciated by the readers of the SIGNS, and most surely believed among us, I feel willing to write and give that which has been given me for the benefit of the heirs of the kingdom. Upon this glorious doctrine do we feast, because we always find it to be a feast of fat things, and wine on the lees, well refined. It takes time to refine some things; and the older wine is, the better. This wine is old enough to have all the refined taste about it. It makes glad the heart, and does not make the heirs drunk. It materially differs from the wine of Babylon, which makes people who tarry long at it err in vision and stumble in judgment on this stumbling-stone and rock of offense, called "the rock of fatality." Yet it is identically the same rock, but a new, modern name for it. It is the same rock of offense at which some stumbled, who were disobedient, whereunto they were appointed. One will sneer and talk contemptibly of the rock of fatality, and then pretend to sing that glorious song,

"Keep silence, all created things,
And wait your Maker's nod;
My soul stands trembling while she sings
The honors of her God.

"Life, death, and hell, and worlds unknown,
Hang on his firm decree;
He sits on no precarious throne,
Nor borrows leave to be.

"Chain'd to his throne a volume lies,
With all the fates of men,
With every angel's form and size,
Drawn by th' eternal pen."

They deny the glorious sentiment contained therein. I am inclined to think the reason why men do not accept and glory in this doctrine is because they have never really heard the voice of the prophet when he cried, by divine authority from the everlasting throne, "All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away: but the word of the Lord endureth forever." If they well understood this, they could see that God was all in all, and over all forever and ever. No man can call Jesus Christ the Lord but by the Holy Ghost. No man can appreciate this doctrine of the eternal, irrevocable decrees of God but by the principle of eternal life abiding in him, which is the life from above, that deals with eternal things. I have often seen this opposition to the glorious doctrine come from the rebellious nature of the fallen sons of Adam; and wherever I see it, I am able to trace it back to the old source from whence it first came. It is revolt and rebellion against God, and is among his people, too; for they were anciently reprov'd for it. They limited the holy One of Israel. Now, when they limit him, the sin is the same as it anciently was. "But we are persuaded better things of you," said Paul to the Hebrews, "though we thus speak."

If things are not as God willed them, then who can better them? Whoever can must be superior to God, who rules in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, nor say, What doest thou? Who will object to God's bidding Shimei to curse David? Who will forbid his sending the lying spirit in the mouth of Ahab's prophets? Who will stop him from creating evil? Who will hinder Samson from taking a wife of the Philistines when God bids him? Who will interfere when he makes a vessel unto dishonor? Who will stop him from creating evil in the city? Who will condemn him who formed the crooked serpent, leviathan? Who will forbid him making the king over all the children of pride? These are parts of his ways; but the thunder of his power who can understand? In conclusion, I would ask, in the language of Paul, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?"

Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor and another unto dishonor?" I answer from my heart, and I trust by revelation, Yes, my God, yes. Even so. Amen and Amen. Glory to God in the highest, for he dwelleth in the light which no man hath seen nor can see. He inhabiteth eternity. Clouds and darkness are round about him, but judgment and righteousness are the habitation of his throne. The words of my Master are an answer sufficient for all his subjects. "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in thy sight." I am also persuaded that if they will not believe Moses and the prophets, they will not be persuaded though one should rise from the dead. It seems to me that all God's dear children should heed his word and believe that, and not be found revolting against the truth with malicious prating; for I do regard the opposition to God's eternal truth as prating with malicious words. I can humbly hope that those who fear him as they should will not be found among that number, but will flee apace. Better dwell in the corner of a housetop, than in a wide house with a brawling woman. This doctrine begets quietness. When God says, "Be still, and know that I am God," they who are really taught of him know what that means. They can afford to do so. I would also like to ask some of the so-called wise how and why it was needful for Paul to have a thorn in the flesh, and who put it there; and if the one who put it there did not say, "My grace is sufficient for thee," and refused to remove it. If that were true in Paul's case, was it not on the same principle that Adam transgressed? Was Adam's transgression a hap-hazard and a happen so, as men call it? Was it not as needful in God's divine arrangement of things as was the thorn in the flesh in the apostle Paul? Would it not be best for us, like Paul, to say, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God?" His ways are past finding out. While the seven thunders have uttered their voices, is it not better to acknowledge the voices, and say that we have heard, than to say there is no such a thing, and that it was never sounded, and thus be found to fight against God? But let us joyfully exclaim of what we have heard and seen, and say, with gratitude to God, "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound," and by our course prove that we are the circumcision who worship God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh (doctrine of carnal reason).

Some of the opposition to this doctrine stinks with carnal reason, and I for one cannot stand that old, dead, carnal reason in a spiritual feast of fat things; for it is not the savory meat, such as Isaac loves. The meat of predestination, and the marrow out of the bone of it, is delicious and delicate, too. There is marrow in this bone of predestination that we are after, and the book says it is full of marrow and fatness. So let us look for the marrow, and eat thereof, that we may be glad and rejoice in our God, who keepeth the hidden things for his children.

I hope this will satisfy brother Mills for the present. I try to express my views in the form of argument upon the question under consideration. May the Lord God, who doeth all things well, lead all his children in the way of truth, is my prayer, for his name's sake.

Yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

WILLIAM PENN, Tex., Jan. 13, 1889.

DEAR ELDER W. L. BEEBE:—Although you may have no recollection of this poor wanderer, and may have no time to read this scribble, yet I feel an impression to write you a short letter, to let you know that I still hold you in grateful remembrance, and often wish I could see you and hear you preach. The first time I heard you was at Shoal Creek. It was the first Primitive Baptist sermon I ever heard. It was at a time when I was in great trouble, and I have some reason to hope that the Lord led me there; for it was there that I was enabled to behold the beauty of his worship, and to realize that in his worship I had no part or lot; and that although I had professed to worship him, I was a stranger to his law and a foreigner from his grace and mercy. I looked on the people and upon you engaged in the solemn service, and felt that they were a happy people; that God in love had gathered them together, and that they were at his banqueting-house, and his banner was over them in love. But O the thought that all his mercies were for his chosen ones, and that there was no mercy for me! It caused tears of sorrow and regret, that I was unfit to be there. But the remembrance of that day is still with me, and I faintly hope that it was the beginning of a better life, as it was not long after that I trust the Lord God led me by his Spirit to another place in the wilderness, where he was pleased in mercy to reveal his love in the full and free pardon of all my sins, and where he caused me to realize that salvation was all of free grace, and led me to feel a little hope in his love.

This was about sixteen years ago, in 1872. For about four years he blessed me with the privilege of hearing you proclaim his everlasting gospel, at intervals, till you were called to another field. I felt that when you left Holly Springs I was left to perish in the wilderness. But blessed be his name, I found Elder Eubanks to be laden with the same heavenly fruit, and I was allowed to sit under the same vine and fig tree, and enjoy the crumbs that fell from the Master's table, feeling and realizing that I was receiving more than I was worthy of, and fearing that I was in their way, there seeming to be a bar between me and them that would always keep me from their fellowship; and yet I felt that I must be where they were, for I knew if I had any people it was the Old Baptist people. In the year 1883 I was induced from some cause to emigrate to this state, and have had no gospel privileges here. There is no Primitive Baptist Church in forty or fifty miles of this place. Elder J. C. Denton passed through here a year ago, and preached three or four sermons in this county, and it is all the gospel preaching I have heard since I left Georgia. The SIGNS OF THE TIMES you sent was a feast to my poor soul. There are a few of the old members of Holly Springs and of Shoal Creek Churches in this county; and while they seem to mourn their destitution, they are making no efforts to organize a church, and have no meetings at all. Still they long for these things, and sadly miss their lost privileges. This is a hard country to live in, and we are all poor and needy.

Dear Elder, I feel that I have written enough for one time, so I will close by asking an interest in your petitions at the throne of grace, that we may all have the spirit of submission to the divine will.

Yours in love, and in hope of eternal life,

N. R. SMITH.

MONDAY, Jan. 14, 1889.

DEAR ELDER BEEBE:—As it is raining to-day, and as this space is left open, I thought I would try to write a few lines more as supplementary to the scattered letter of yesterday. The last time I heard you preach was at Harris Springs Church. This was when your venerable father visited Georgia with you for his last time. I never will forget that feast, for it was indeed a "feast of fat things" to me, "of wine on the lees well refined." We read of the prophet Elijah being fed by the ravens at the brook Cherrath, and again at the juniper tree, where he found a cruise of oil and a cake, and of his going in the strength of that meat forty days and forty nights unto Horeb, the mount of God. I feel to realize that the meat, or the strength of the meat, I received on that day is not yet exhausted; neither do I believe it will be until I arrive at the "mount of God." I feel to join the saints of God everywhere in ascriptions of humble praise to the name of God and of Jesus Christ, that the food he gives his people is inexhaustible, and that the water he gives them is in them a well of water springing up into everlasting life. Yea, the remembrance of his blessings in the times of refreshing that come from his holy presence is a continual feast; and a confiding trust in the unfailing love and providence of God is the only safeguard of his people; and the hope which he gives of a blessed immortality is the sure anchor of the soul. I know that God our heavenly Father hath done all things well, and that his word will not return unto him void, but will accomplish the thing whereunto he has sent it. But in this vale of tears, in this wilderness of woe, there is no perfection in the flesh. The Spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak.

Now may the love of God the Father, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen.

N. R. SMITH.

"AND he arose, and did eat and drink, and went in the strength of that meat forty days and nights unto Horeb the mount of God."—1 Kings xix. 8.

Elijah the prophet, of whom this is recorded, seems to have been entirely discouraged at this time; and furthermore, he seems to have been well on in life, and (as he testifies of himself) to have spent his life jealously in the cause of truth. But now in his old age he sees the cause of the Lord trodden down by enemies. He himself is the last one left to witness to the truth of God's direct revelation to man, and they seek his life to take it away. Even if his enemies fail in their efforts to take his life, he feels that he can no longer sustain the cause against so great odds; therefore he asks of the Lord that he might die. One of our aged ministers in conversation said that the preachers all seemed to be getting old, that no young men seemed to be aspiring to the ministry, and he sometimes wondered if we could have preaching much longer. I wanted to ask him if he could bear witness to such a call as that. But Elijah's spirit was lower than that, for he wished to give up the fight and be released from his weariness. But he slept, and there was food brought him. He did not search for this food. Where should he go? The desert was before him, and his enemies behind him. How often the spirit is as in a desert and wearied, and the Lord sends us food we looked not for. We are not told that the food was other than earthly food, only in the great life-sustaining properties it contained, but the contrary. It was bread and water, the simplest and plainest of food. But there was a message from heaven in it. The food was as a body having a soul concealed in it, hidden from all mortal eyes. Had there been a thousand there to witness his simple meal of bread and water, they could not have known of his secret prayer, nor heard the answer to it, in seeing him receive the natural food. Elijah knew that the Lord himself had sent the food, and that it was for him, and for no other. It was a direct message to him from heaven, that the Lord still cared for him, and that he should be sustained. How our souls thrill with joy sometimes when we are in the dark, and asking in secret prayer for the way; and when we least expect it, perhaps in listening to a sermon, the preacher diverges suddenly to give some little sideway explanation, and we get a message. We know it is for us, for it comes right to us. Yet the preacher did not know that such a message was in the words he used. They are only words with simple meaning, but to us they are burning words from God. The messenger carried only the body (the bread and water), but the recipient received the spirit also, being prepared beforehand of God. I think messengers are ignorant many times of the deep, heart-searching truth they have uttered; or perhaps they may be told of it in after years, long after they have forgotten the occasion. The messenger brought Elijah food for the sustaining of his body, but methinks the recognition again from heaven was as reviving to his spirit as the food that was brought. Neither does a message from the Lord always come through preaching; but he sends by whom he will send. One day I picked up the SIGNS and read a little way, and a quotation from the Bible, used as an explanation of the subject under consideration, came to me with peculiar force in answer to a question that had been on my mind for some months. So clear was it that all doubt was gone on that point. I turned to the name of the writer. He was unknown to me, and perhaps had no idea of the spirit that lay concealed in the body of his words; but surely the Lord gave me strength and encouragement, and also the assurance that he heard the prayer that was not with words. When I was perhaps fourteen or fifteen years old I listened with attention to a discourse preached by Elder Durand at Welsh Tract, from Isaiah liii. 1, "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" I thought it must be very good to those who were inquiring the way, and I thought I knew of some there that were; but before he sat down he said, "You who are giving it all to some one else, take it to yourselves; for to you it belongs." These words were not only to me and for me, but they gave me the whole sermon, and left the text fastened in my mind. Again, some passage of Scripture will come to the mind with sweet assurance, or with admonition, or perhaps it is only a word or sentence.

"Sometimes it was only a verse at morn,
That lifted me up from care,
Like the springing wings of a sweet-voiced lark,
Cleaving the golden air.

"And sometimes on Sunday afternoons,
'Twas a chapter rich and long,
That came to my heart in its weary hour,
With a lift of a triumph song."

These words, or messages from heaven, not only assure us for and of ourselves, but also assure us that God does exist, that the Bible is by inspiration, and that there is a soul or spirit in it, more than the letter of the word, that is beyond the searching of men, and only reached by direct revelation. Elijah had had great and repeated assurances in the past, and now he has an unmistakable evidence that he is remembered; yet he must go forty days and nights before he again receives food. He is now faint and discouraged, and again says he has been jealous for the Lord, but the children of Israel themselves have forsaken the truth. Now the Lord not only gives him encouragement, but assures him the cause is safe as well, and in a still, small voice gives him great work to do in his old age, to anoint kings, and a prophet to minister to his comfort while he remains on earth, and take his place afterwards; and the enemy of the cause that escapes the sword of one of these shall another slay, thus assuring Elijah of the triumph of the cause of the Lord. Surely he was never discouraged again. The whole chapter seems full, but it was only of the soul-sustaining power contained in the food sent from heaven, yet was not the food itself, that I wished to write of.

A. E. RITTENHOUSE.

STATE ROAD, Del.

"LORD, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."
—Luke ii. 29, 30.

These words have been on my mind a good deal lately, and I will try to write some thoughts concerning God's dealings with his chosen people.

"The Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance." The ways of the Lord are very mysterious to us, and past our comprehension. The deep things belong to God, and we can only understand the deep mysteries of his kingdom as he reveals them to us. It is only when our minds are raised above the deceitful and fading splendors of this world that we can view the gates of the celestial city in the distance, and with the eye of faith see our heavenly home.

"When my heart grows faint and weary,
And my spirit cannot rest,
And this world seems dark and dreary,
Something seems my soul to cheer."

My drooping spirit is then raised up, for it is God's hand that is leading me; and what he appoints must be surely best for me. Yet I very often feel to murmur at it. Sometimes I cannot see the Lord's hand in directing my pathway through storms of tribulation. But we are told that "all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." When we see all our earthly hopes destroyed, it is hard to say, "Not my will, but thine be done."

We rather feel to say, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." But we are made willing in the day of his power, and are ready, if need be, to go to prison and to death, knowing that death will be a welcome release from all our trials by the way. When we can say with Job, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," we can go on our way rejoicing, knowing that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. "For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." For the Spirit beareth witness with our spirit that we are the sons of God. And it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. We are to believe not every spirit; but try the spirits, whether they be of God; for the enemy has the power to appear as an angel of light. "Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them." Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good. For the time draws near when some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils. Remember that here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come. God's power is made manifest in the salvation of his people. He does all things after the counsel of his own will, and none can stay his hand, nor say unto him, What doest thou? In these days the love of many appears to grow cold, and they no longer regard the prosperity of Zion, being more concerned about the affairs of this life, forgetting the admonition to lay up their treasures in heaven; for where the treasure is, there will the heart be also.

Brethren, let us run with patience the race set before us. "And be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."
—Eph. iv. 32.

I know not where the Lord in his providence will direct my footsteps; but this I know, it will be according to his will. It often seems strange to us that he chooses some poor, trembling one to comfort his people; but when the command, "Comfort ye my people," is spoken to a Jonah, he cannot by fleeing to Tarsus avoid obeying the command, but will be brought back, willing and obedient, and will do the will of his Lord and Master. "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God, that sheweth mercy."

Yours in love,

HORACE BEAKES.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., Sept. 12, 1889.

ALBION, Ind., Sept. 4, 1889.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—This evening is one of the happiest of my life. Such a feeling of love to God for his unspeakable gift, and to his dear saints scattered over the world! I feel to say, "I am sure thou art the Christ." O! can it be that such a poor, erring child should be so divinely blessed? David says, in the one hundred and thirty-ninth Psalm, "Thou knowest my downsitting and mine uprising," "and art acquainted with all my ways." None but God can know all about the children. Nothing can be hidden from him. Darkness and light are alike to him. For days my mind has been so cold, so dark, so barren. But now the dear Master has again revealed his smiling face, and "my cup runneth over." Yesterday I tried to preach, and my efforts seemed like such utter failures. So many beauties were just in sight, but I could not approach near enough to call them mine. Most of to-day has been a continuation of the same perplexity; but "What a change his word can make!

Changing darkness into day!"

For a still, small voice has whispered, the curtain has lifted, the clouds have dispersed, and the dear One has kindly poured out his blessings upon me. If ever I have felt like saying, I know that Jesus is mine, it is now. Though he is not far distant from me, he now draws me close to himself. I can lay my head upon his dear breast, and drink so deeply of his love; yes, upon the Jesus that died for me, and rose again. Here in his pierced side I can find peace and pardon freely flowing, and his righteousness makes me like himself.

Dear readers, you will rejoice with me, I know. This glorious light, following so many days of darkness, so fills me with thanksgiving and praise that I want to pen a few of my thoughts. The preaching of my brethren, with their communications, and reading my Bible, have failed to bring the desired rest. Just now the third chapter of the Song of Solomon comes to me with comfort. "By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not." Yes, how often have I sought him in the darkness, and in my distress have cried unto him. But I could only groan, and ask with Job, "Why is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in?" If I am a child, why such distressing sadness that is almost despair? Then I search and wrestle again, go about the city, in the streets, and in the broad ways, to seek Jesus. Then I return, saying, I found him not. I inquire of the watchmen, but still have the same indescribable uneasiness. And in this mourning I am reminded that "the steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord. Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down." Where will he order my feet next? "It was but a little that I passed from them, but I found him whom my soul loveth." O, dear Savior, it is enough. Thou hast given to me double. One day here is better than a thousand in the hateful ways of sin. Though unworthy, I fain would wash thy dear feet with my tears, and wipe them with my hair. Like the poor Gadarene, I gladly would remain with thee. But I tremble, and am filled with such unworthiness, when I gaze upon his countenance, so perfectly lovely, and his form so majestic. But by past experience I know that this is not heaven, only a sweet foretaste of that incorruptible inheritance. Only one thing more can I ask. When the shades of death hover over me, when the portals are opening for me, when loved ones stand helpless around me, O Lord, sweeten my passage from earth to glory. Daily I think of my departure from time, and of what shall be hereafter. Sometimes I fancy I can see beyond the foaming billows, to the land of deliverance. Blow on, ye winds; and, foes, vent all your rage. My rest shall be sweeter for my many trials here. A city of foundations is builded for the chosen of God. We have not seen what it is with our natural eyes, but God hath revealed it unto us by his Spirit. Our faith is our victory, and our hope our anchor. "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

GEO. A. BRETZ.

SOUTH PERRY, Hocking Co., Ohio.

BY REQUEST I will try to write a few outlines of my travels from nature to grace. And I will say first that I was born and raised a Methodist, and taught to observe all the ordinances and rules of that people. When in my sixteenth year, in company with one of my cousins, I attended one of their meetings, and he told me that he intended joining the church that day, and desired me to go with him. I did so, and joined as a seeker of religion, without fear or any very serious thought. But not long after this I was brought into trouble about my sins, and thought I could get religion whenever I pleased. I thought I would now begin, and did so.

"When to the law I trembling fled,
It poured its curses on my head—
I no relief could find."

I went to the altar to be prayed for, which made me feel worse, and so I quit going. I would go to some secret place to try to pray, when my sins would rise up like mountains before me, and I could see no way of escape. Condemnation stared me in the face, and my prayers seemed to fall to the ground. I saw it just that the sentence should take place. Then I would try to pray the poor publican's prayer, "God, be merciful to me, a sinner."

I traveled on in this way for about six months, when I thought I was going to die and sink down to hell forever and ever. One day I had to go about a half-mile to work on the farm. As I looked back at the old home I thought, "Good by; I will never see you again." I thought I would go to the woods once more and pray for God's mercy, and while there my burden was gone. I rose up, and everything seemed to be praising God, and I could give him all the glory. I then thought my troubles were all over, and that I would never have any more; but it was not long until I thought I was deceived, and that I had deceived all who saw me.

Shortly after this the subject of baptism came to my mind, and I wanted to be baptized by being immersed. But the preacher said I had been baptized, and he would not do it. I went on in this way for sixteen years. At this time I had not heard Primitive Baptist preaching. At last I got to attending the Laurel Church, where Elder George N. Tussing preached every month. I believed the doctrine he preached was the Bible truth. He went home with me one Sunday and remained over night. We talked half the night. He said he could not see how I could remain where I was, believing the doctrine I did. Monday morning came, and the subject of baptism was on my mind stronger than ever. I thought, Elder Tussing is here, and why not be baptized? At last I said to him, "Can't you baptize me and leave me where I am?" He replied, "I don't mark other people's sheep; but if you want me to baptize you I will call a meeting to-day; and if you will tell the church what you have told me, and they receive you, I will baptize you." I went and told them that I was a sinner, and if I was saved it was by grace, and by grace alone; that it was nothing I had done or could do of myself. I was received, and brother Tussing baptized me. I have a home among the Old Baptists yet, and have never regretted what I did that day. I love the brethren. If I did not, I would not stand in the position I do to-day. My prayer is, May the Lord keep me the few day I have to stay here, that I may not bring a reproach upon the cause of Christ or his church.

MARTIN GASS.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., Sept. 23, 1889.

GILBERT BEEBE'S SONS:—I have been thinking about my early experience, and will try to write some of it. I wrote a little of it years ago, before the SIGNS was printed in Middletown. I had been in great trouble of mind for a long time, for I could not find any comfort. One Sunday I went out of the house to try to get rid of my sorrows; but I returned to the house, praying, "O that I could find rest!" I took up the Bible and it opened to the book of Jeremiah. I read until I came to these wonderful words, "Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee." I looked up and my burden was gone. Then I knew that God knew every event. That Scripture taught me God's foreknowledge, and election was made plain to me, and I have believed that doctrine from that day to the present. God's providence is over us and all around us, and he blesses us with his goodness. He makes the clouds his chariot, and whispers to us in the wind. He speaks in thunder-tones as the clouds roll by. He provides shelter for our defenseless heads from the wind and from the storm, and we receive our food from day to day. O let us praise him for all his goodness and mercy. O that men would praise the Lord. The prophet says, "In those days, and at that time, saith the Lord, the children of Israel shall come, they and the children of Judah together, going and weeping: they shall go and seek the Lord their God. They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward." Have we not seen them coming from the east, west, north and south, one of a city and two of a family, with fear and trembling, telling what the Lord has done for them? "In that day it shall be said to Jerusalem, Fear not; and to Zion, The Lord thy God in the midst of thee is mighty; he will save; he will rejoice over thee with joy."

As I am rambling, I will close this letter. Perhaps I would not have written at this time if brother Hecker, of Albany, N. Y., had not desired to hear from some of us. What I have written is so poor, please have pity on me.

I will now say a few words to the brethren and sisters living in Albany. I hope, dear brethren, you are all walking in "That good old way that leads to God,

Which saints in every age have trod.
Still onward press, the day is yours;
The good old way the crown secures."

Pray for your weak sister, who, when she looks ahead, can see the strait and narrow way; but when she looks back, her steps seem very crooked.

MARY CAREY.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Pocatalico Primitive Baptist Association, to the several churches of which she is composed.

DEAR BRETHREN:—According to previous appointment you will expect to hear from us in the way of a Circular Letter, and as a foundation we wish to call your attention to the thirteenth chapter and thirty-fifth verse of the gospel as recorded by John, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."

This is the language of the blessed Savior; and how careful we should be to manifest this love, that all may know that we are his disciples. Jesus says, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." "This is my commandment, that ye love one another, as I have loved you." John says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." Love is one of the sweet graces that come from God. In 1 John ii. 10, 11 we find these words, "He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him. But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes."

Dear brethren, we see what a delightful thing it is to love our brother, and what a deplorable thing it is to hate our brother. We are told by the apostle Paul, "If ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another." We have seen the effects of this among us; and what a deplorable thing it is to see the church of Christ divided and brethren differing, when there is no real difference. Dear brethren, let us exhort you all to pray for the peace of God's people, and that love may abound, that we may see eye to eye, and all speak the same thing. O that it were with us as in days gone by, when all was love, joy and peace, and there was not a discordant note among us.

Brethren, let us walk in the Savior's commandments, and love one another with a pure heart fervently. May we be weaned from the things of this world, and have our minds on heavenly things. May all malice and envy and every evil thought be put away from us, and may our coming together be for the welfare of each other. We have learned in the word, and also in our experience, that if we as churches or as individuals live after the flesh, we shall die. Let us live after the Spirit, and show that love for each other which becomes the followers of Christ. May the great Shepherd, who never slumbers nor sleeps, guide us in his own right way, for his most holy name, and may brotherly love continue among us, is our prayer.

JOY OVER A REPENTING SINNER.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have for some time wanted your views on the text, Luke xv. 7. Please let me hear from you soon through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, as it contains nearly all the preaching I hear; and O how sweet the truth is to me!

Your sister, I hope, in Christ Jesus,
MRS. SUSAN HICKLEY.

REPLY.

"I SAY unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance."—Luke xv. 7.

The above text to which our sister refers is the declaration of our Lord immediately following the illustration of the recovery of the lost sheep. The same illustration is recorded by Matthew, in connection with the instruction given to the disciples for the reclaiming of an erring brother. —See Matt. xviii. 12. As recorded by Luke, Jesus by this parable rebuked the caviling of the Pharisees, who murmured because he received sinners, and ate with them. It is worthy of observation that the truth expressed in a parable is often applicable to different circumstances, and to cases which may vary from each other. So there may be particulars in which the same parable will apply to one subject, while in other particulars it will illustrate other points in the doctrine of the gospel. There should be therefore great forbearance among brethren when different applications of the same parable are presented. So far as the truth of the gospel is concerned, the various applications do not necessarily involve a difference of views.

In our text the primary reference of our Lord was to the manifestation of his grace to those who were regarded by the Pharisees as being so guilty as to be unworthy of the notice of our Savior. It was inconsistent with the traditions in which the Jews had been educated for a teacher of righteousness to associate with those social outcasts whom they denominated publicans and sinners. They claimed to have attained justification by the observance of the external requirements of the Sinai law, and felt themselves superior to others on that account. When they saw Jesus receive and eat with publicans and sinners they thought they had conclusive evidence that he was not the Messiah of whom they had read in their Scriptures. By the use of the parable of the lost sheep he met and rebuked them upon their own theory. Even though the publicans and sinners were worse than those who despised them, they were still of the seed of Abraham, which was the foundation of all the claim the Pharisees could boast. Granting that they had wandered from the inclosure of the legal covenant, they were like sheep, which could not cease to be sheep because of their wandering in forbidden paths. The coming of the Redeemer was to call such sinners to repentance. In that application of the parable it is clear that there should be joy in the heaven of that legal dispensation over the restoration of one of those lost ones more than over ninety and nine legally just persons, which need no repentance. Although they felt themselves condemned by this truth, it was impossible that they should gainsay its evident force, as illustrated by this parable. Hence, they could not find an answer to the words of Jesus.

To the saints in all ages there is another application of this text and of the parable in the context; and in this we are now more directly interested. Let each of us consider the words so solemnly spoken as addressed individually to ourselves. Then the instruction recorded by Matthew in connection with the parable must come with impressive weight as enforcing the direction given by our Lord to his disciples. Every conscious sinner who trusts in the salvation which is revealed in Christ Jesus feels that he is only privileged to hope in the salvation of God as a lost sheep who has been brought back to the fold by the tender care of the watchful Shepherd of Israel. The organized church of Christ is the heaven of the gospel dispensation. Every one who enters this heaven must know that it is by the abounding grace of God he has been favored with a place among the saints. From this consideration he realizes his own continual need of the forbearance and preserving care of the Lord to keep him in the fellowship of the church. This consciousness will lead him ever to esteem others better than himself. When thus led by the Spirit of God he cannot rely upon his own strength and wisdom to direct his words and actions. His prayer to God is expressed by David, "Lead me, O Lord, in thy righteousness because of mine enemies; make thy way straight before my face."—Psa. v. 8. The sense of his own weakness and dependence produces earnest sympathy for the weakness of such as are overcome by the devices of the adversary. In proportion to his grief at the fall of a brother, his joy abounds when the erring one is restored by the gift of repentance unto life. This joy is in the heaven of the gospel kingdom, where the perfect law of liberty rules in the heart of every one who is born of the Spirit. Governed by that law, every inhabitant of the kingdom of heaven rejoices over the manifestation of the grace of our Lord Jesus in leading a wandering brother to that repentance which Christ is exalted to give unto Israel; for all the children of this kingdom know that God does not give repentance without the forgiveness of sins. This gift is never bestowed upon any sinner but such as are included in the chosen Israel whose transgression is forgiven and whose sin is covered by the atoning sacrifice of the blood of Jesus Christ. Washed in that precious blood, every heir of salvation is cleansed from all sin. None but the chosen vessels of divine mercy and grace are so cleansed. They are the only inhabitants of the gospel heaven wherein there is joy over the sinner that repenteth.

All those sinners who were chosen in Christ unto salvation are redeemed from under the law of sin and death by the perfect sacrifice of Jesus. So Paul says, "Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace."—Rom. vi. 14. It is very important that this fact should be carefully observed when reading or speaking of the law in reference to the saints. Much confusion arises in the minds of many from their failure to observe that the same word "law" is used in the Scriptures in speaking of entirely different and distinct ordinances and dispensations. The commandment given to Adam in the garden was the law by whose transgression sin entered into the world, and death by sin. Under that law the subjects of divine grace, in common with all of the children of Adam, are dead in trespasses and sins; and in that relation they are "by nature the children of wrath, even as others."—Eph. ii. 3. From that state of condemnation and death there is no deliverance by any other way except through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. All who are included in that salvation are forever redeemed from the dominion as well as from the curse of that law, and are dead to it by the body of Christ. The law which was given from Sinai was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; but that law could not give life to sinners already dead. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has made free from the law of sin and death all who are saved from their sins by the death of the Redeemer. They cannot sin against that law from which they have been delivered, and consequently they can never come under the condemnation of that law. Yet they are not without law to God, but under the law to Christ.—1 Cor. ix. 21. The Spirit of life which is given unto them is the "perfect law of liberty," by which God works in them both to will and to do of his good pleasure. They are thereby made willing in the day of the power of the King of saints. He puts his law in their hearts, giving them the will to obey his holy commandments. This is not a modification of the law of Moses, nor yet a revision of the law of sin and death. It is perfect in itself as it comes from the throne of our Lord Jesus; and its fulfillment in spirit is manifest in every one in whose heart it is shed abroad by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto his saints.—Rom. v. 5. Every subject of saving grace bears this unmistakable seal. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." Where the Spirit of Christ dwells in any man it manifests its living presence by producing that hunger and thirst after righteousness which attests that he is already blessed of God. Without this seal of the love of holiness not even the belief of the truth avails to prove the claim of being a partaker of divine life. So James says, "Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe and tremble. But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?" It is vain to imagine that we have the love of God dwelling in our hearts, if we have no love to those in whom his grace is manifest. Where that heavenly charity is in the heart its presence will be seen in bearing the fruit of love and forbearance toward all who love his name. The disposition to seek for occasion to condemn the brethren arises from the love of self, and is of the flesh. When the saints are governed by that principle they sin against the law of Christ, which always prompts those who are governed by it to obey his commandment, "That he who loveth God love his brother also." Under the guidance of this holy principle the saints are grieved when a brother is overtaken in a fault, and their desire is to restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, each considering himself, lest he also be tempted. Thus they bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. Such grief is the strongest expression of brotherly love. This feeling is known in no other place but in the heaven where the Spirit of Christ reigns in the new heart of those who are born of God. Its experience not only attests conformity to the law of Christ in those who feel its power, but also it bears witness that the erring one and the aggrieved brother are both included in the unity of the body of Christ. The joy which is felt over the repentance of the erring one is also a peculiar characteristic of those in whom the Spirit of Christ reigns. It is heavenly joy. It is known only in the heaven of the spiritual kingdom of God. As the grief produced by the sin of a brother is not merely the performance of a legal duty, so the rejoicing over his repentance is not simply compliance with an obligation which is enjoined upon the followers of our Lord. In both cases the feeling is the fruit of the Spirit of Christ which dwells in his saints. Love is the motive prompting both the grief and the joy.

Let it be remembered that the sin of the erring one is the transgression of the law of Christ; it is not against the law of sin and death. Christ is the end of that law for righteousness to every one that believes.—Rom. x. 4. If one of his redeemed could again come under the condemnation of that law it would prove that the blood of Jesus was not holy in cleansing him from all sin. But this sin is the transgression of the law of our Lord in his kingdom; and for that transgression he gives repentance, and with that repentance he gives the forgiveness of sins. In the gospel kingdom of heaven there is grace by which Jesus has power to forgive sins; but there is no such provision anywhere else. No repentance could satisfy the holy law of infinite justice without the atoning blood of Jesus. It can accept only the life of the sinner.

The imagination of carnal religionists, which represents different degrees of joy in the heaven of eternal glory, is not authorized by any inspired teaching. Where the glorified saints are made like Jesus in his infinite perfection there can be no measurement of joy or love. It is merely a natural idea which would institute comparisons where all is swallowed up in the perfect life of God. It is only in the heaven of the gospel kingdom that repentance of the sinner can occasion joy; and it is only in this heaven that there can be any degrees in that joy. Those who walk in all the ordinances of the Lord blamelessly are the "just persons, which need no repentance." With this application of the text the experience of the saints will bear witness to the truth of the declaration and of the illustration in the preceding parable. May the Lord enable our sister and all who love his name to hear and understand his words in this text and in all the record which he has given; and unto his holy name be glory evermore. Amen.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Deacon John Sagur departed this life on Saturday, Aug. 17th, in the ninetyeth year of his age, at the house of his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. John Krewson, in Newtown, Pa., with whom he had lived for some years.

He and his wife, whose obituary notice appeared in the Signs for Nov. 15th, 1888, were baptized by Elder James Bowen, in the fellowship of the Old School Baptist Church at Southampton, June 12th, 1834. He was faithful as a member of the church, and was highly esteemed and loved by his brethren and by all who knew him. He was naturally of a cheerful disposition, and was always ready to speak an encouraging word or lend a helping hand. For two or three years before his wife's death they were unable to attend the meetings of the church, which they felt to be a great deprivation. The brethren also greatly missed them. The visits of their brethren and friends, and the occasional meetings which were held at their house, were greatly enjoyed by them. Since the death of his wife he has mourned a good deal on account of his lonely condition, and often expressed the wish that he might soon be taken home. Some time ago he had a paralytic affection of the throat and vocal organs, but subsequently so far recovered the use of his voice as to be understood. On the day of his departure he had been apparently as well as for some time. He undertook to rise from his chair, when his limbs failed to support him. He was helped to the foot of the stairs, when he lost all power. As he sank down he said, "Now if I could die." He was laid upon the bed, and soon quietly fell asleep. "Asleep in Jesus."

The funeral exercises were at the meeting-house of the Southampton Church on Wednesday, Aug. 21st.

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. THE EVERLASTING TASK
FOR ARMINIANS.

By Elder William Gadsby, late of Manchester, England. We have republished a large edition of the above named very interesting and instructing pamphlet. ## CORRESPONDENCE.

GHEENT, Ky., Sept. 24, 1889.

DEAR BROTHER A. L. McDONALD:—Your letter asking my views on what is taught in the parable of the ten virgins came duly to hand. That parable is recorded in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew's gospel. In the preceding chapter we find that our Lord sat on the mount of Olives and taught his disciples, telling them of the wonderful things that would be accomplished before the end of the legal dispensation. In the closing words of that chapter he speaks of the evil servant, and says, "But and if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My lord delayeth his coming; and shall begin to smite his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken; the lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Our Lord clearly presents in that language the closing of the legal dispensation, when that heaven should be rolled up as a vesture. The Jews had been looking for the coming of the great Deliverer of Israel, but manifested their blindness and unbelief as to the character of him who was to come, and of whose coming all along in that dispensation the prophets had foretold. It was he of whom the apostle spoke, saying, "And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: for this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins."—Rom. xi. 26, 27. The Jews did not look for one who would take away their sins, but for one who would conquer Rome, deliver them from the power of that Pagan monster, and establish them above all other nations of the earth. Earthly pride and vanity then pervaded the minds and hearts of the descendants of Abraham; but they had grown tired in waiting, and the priests, scribes and Pharisees were eating and drinking with the drunken, that is, they were partaking much of the idolatry of those Pagans. Those priests, scribes and Pharisees represented that evil servant of whom our Lord said, "The lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of, and shall cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." When our Lord came they were cut asunder from their trust in that law dispensation, and from their hopes of great earthly honor and power. Their temple was overthrown, their great city (Jerusalem) devastated, and they led captive into a strange land, and made to do service for those who hated them and loathed their religion. Surely there was weeping and gnashing of teeth, for their portion was appointed to them among hypocrites, those Pagan idolaters. Deep sorrow and mourning then seized them because of the overthrow of their great city and the destruction of their temple, to which they had looked with the same confidence that those Pagans looked to their idol gods. The Jews did not see in the offerings made in the temple service that they were but types and shadows which pointed to the great and glorious things that would be accomplished when the Messenger of the covenant should suddenly come to his temple. Then was the end of that legal dispensation foretold in his teaching on the mount of Olives. Then he introduced by the parable of the ten virgins the setting up of the gospel kingdom, and the things that would be peculiar to it. This teaching was not merely for the benefit of his twelve disciples, but was for his people in all coming time, that they might know his kingdom, of which the prophet speaks, saying, "Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities. Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down." This tabernacle is the church of the Lord Jesus Christ; and not one of its cords shall be broken, nor one of its stakes removed. It was set up by the God of heaven, and shall endure till time shall be no more. In the dispensation of his grace our Lord set up that kingdom; and in it is the home of his saints, and to it belong the oracles of God, and it is walled in by the unchangeable and eternal attributes of our God. In a sweet and ever-precious faith the saints with delight adopt the language of the psalmist, "Walk about Zion, and go round about her: tell the towers thereof. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces; that ye may tell it to the generation following."

But our Lord said, "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom." He had spoken of the end of the legal dispensation, and now he speaks of the setting up of the gospel kingdom, and in doing so he spoke that parable. It will be remembered that the word "then" is an adverb of time; and when he used the words, "Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins," he spoke of the particular time when it should be so likened, which was immediately after the close of the law dispensation. In that parable he gave the peculiar characteristics of that kingdom. It was likened unto ten virgins, five of whom were wise and five foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, but took no oil with them; but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. It will be observed that the foolish virgins had no vessels, but they had lamps. The setting up of the kingdom of heaven, the gospel kingdom, is that of which the prophet speaks, saying, "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom." This parable presents the peculiar character of that kingdom. There were five wise and five foolish virgins that went out to meet the bridegroom; and they all had lamps, which represented their professions. None can enter that kingdom in its organized form without professing faith in the glorious Son of God (the bridegroom). But, alas! how many there have been and how many there are now in that organized kingdom who have a name to live, while they are dead, and have nothing on which their hope for a blessed and glorious immortality beyond the gloomy scenes of time rests but their professions, their empty lamps. They have no vessels. They are not vessels of mercy. In darkness is their home. They love darkness rather than light. But there is another class in that kingdom who are wise, who know their glorious Lord, whom to know is life eternal. That class is represented in this parable by the wise virgins, who had their lamps and oil in their vessels. These two classes are presented by the apostle in these words, "What if God, willing to show his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: and that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory?"—Romans ix. 22, 23. Those vessels of mercy which he had afore prepared unto glory were not broken cisterns, that could hold no water, but they had the oil of divine and saving grace given to them; and whithersoever they went they had the light of the knowledge of the glory of God shining in them, but they could not part with any of that light. They had none to spare to others; but they to all inquirers could say, "Go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves." Their Lord had said by his servant the prophet, "Come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." All the vessels that the foolish virgins had were broken cisterns, that would hold no water, and therefore they could not be said to have their vessels; but they had their lamps, and they said, "Our lamps are gone out." They had then reached a period where their mere professions, represented by their lamps, could profit them nothing. They could not procure for them the joys of the redeemed sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, who had been blessed with the oil of divine, regenerating grace. But they slumbered and slept. It will be remembered that when our Lord appeared on earth the Romans were steeped in idolatry, and the Jews were divided, and many of them had gone into idolatry; and even the tribe of Judah, from which our Lord descended, had partaken greatly of the superstition of the times. At that time the world of mankind, religiously speaking, was but a caldron of seething superstition and infidelity. In the midst of that religious chaos that floated over the world of mankind the announcement came, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh." It came to the shepherds who watched their flocks by night. That wondrous event is recorded by Luke in these words, "And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them: and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord." "And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." Old Simeon, in the temple, confirmed the glad tidings which had been declared to the shepherds by a messenger from on high, saying, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel." It was thus declared, "Lo, he cometh." The word "cometh" is a verb in the present tense. Then his personal advent to earth was taking place. But the feet of him who was holy, heavenly and divine must travel the plains of this sin-cursed world. It is written, "The child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom: and the grace of God was upon him." It was thus he came upon his great mission, prepared to redeem his people from all iniquity. His coming was not hailed by martial music, and with the pomp and show of a vain world; but he was the lowly babe of Bethlehem. To accomplish the great work for which he laid aside the glory he had with the Father before the world began, he must become poor, yea, so poor, so far as this world's goods were concerned, that he said, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." Yea, he who created the vast universe, when in this sin-polluted world became a man of sorrow and acquainted with grief, and must pass through the sorrows of Gethsemane and the tortures of Calvary—all because of the love for his people which dwelt in him from the very ancients of eternity. Then surely the bridegroom cometh; and when he thus came his reward was with him and his work before him. To set up the kingdom of heaven upon the earth, to redeem and purify all the subjects of that kingdom, who are represented by the wise virgins in that parable, was the work that was before him. In that redemption was included the resurrection of the bodies of all his saints, when they shall be changed from mortal to immortal, from corruptible to incorruptible, and fashioned like unto his own glorious body. Then shall they, amidst the glories of the fairer world on high, be alive forevermore. But the word "cometh" is as full of meaning to-day as it was when it fell from his sacred lips. He has been coming to his beloved from the day of Pentecost to the present time, and bringing them into his banqueting house, that glorious kingdom of heaven, and there feeding them upon the rich dainties of the gospel of the glorious Son of God. His work was before him when he came to earth in that body which was prepared him. That work will not be complete till all the redeemed are born of God, and thus prepared by the power of regenerating grace to give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name, and bring an offering into his courts. Behold, he cometh! To you, my brother, and to all his redeemed, he comes, to call them from nature's night to the glorious light and liberty of the gospel. He comes to his saints to protect, uphold and comfort them amidst the sorrows of earth. He comes to them when in darkness, storms and gloom, and says to them, "Be not afraid; it is I."

But perhaps you will inquire, How is it that there are those in that kingdom to whom he has never come in the power of regenerating grace—those who are represented by the foolish virgins? Please remember that Abraham was called the father of the faithful; and there were those in his household that were not his children. He armed his trained servants, three hundred and eighteen, and pursued the captors of his brother Lot. Abraham was the father of the faithful, and in his household there were many who bore no blood relation to him; yet he used them to smite the captors of his brother. So there are many in this kingdom who bear no spiritual relation to the saints, yet they often contribute to the temporal comforts of God's people, as the servants of Abraham did to Lot by restoring to him his goods and his liberty. But to come more closely to this subject, let us turn to the language of him who hath the sharp sword with two edges. He said to the church at Pergamos, "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is: and thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith, even in these days wherein Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth. But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balac to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication. So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, which thing I hate." At that early period in the history of the church there were those in that church at Pergamos who held false and idolatrous doctrines and followed corrupt practices. They surely were represented by the foolish virgins. Paul, in speaking of the same characters, uses this language, "Because of false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage."—Gal. ii. 4. Evidently those at Pergamos and those at Galatia had made profession of faith in the Lord Jesus; but the description given by him who had the two-edged sword, and by the apostle, shows clearly that theirs were empty professions, which were well prefigured by the empty lamps of the foolish virgins. Very many highly-valued and able brethren differ with the views in regard to the foolish virgins offered in these feeble and rambling thoughts. Their views are that the foolish virgins represent that large class of God's people who have been captivated by the vanities and allurements of this vain world, and led into false doctrines and corrupt practices, and thus lost to the sweets of christian love and fellowship; but those brethren will please remember that our Lord said to the foolish virgins, "Verily I say unto you, I know you not." If they had been his children, surely that language would have been inappropriate. He had said, "I am the good Shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine." If the class which is represented by the foolish virgins had been the children of God, born of an incorruptible seed, though wandering in by and forbidden paths, he could not cease to know them. The Lord, speaking by his servant the psalmist, says, "If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments; if they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments; then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes. Nevertheless my loving-kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail."—Psa. lxxxix. 30-33. But our Lord never knew, in the great work of regeneration, those who are represented by the foolish virgins; and although they had a name to live, yet they were ignorant of the joys of the redeemed and regenerated sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty in that kingdom. When the foolish virgins returned, saying, "Lord, Lord, open to us," he did not open to them the glories of that kingdom; he did not give to them the sweet and precious promises of the gospel, which are secured alone to them who have been called to the light and liberty of the children of God. O no; he only said, "I know you not." He left them outside of the beauties and glories of that kingdom, there to forever remain, unless brought into that class represented by the wise virgins by free, sovereign and unfrustrable grace.

But, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh." Yea, and he will continue to come to his redeemed by the power of the Spirit till the last one has been brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. Then will he come a second time, without sin unto salvation. Then will he come in fulfillment of the promise made by the two heavenly messengers at his ascension, who said, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Then he will call his redeemed from the pale nations of the dead, clothe them with immortality and eternal life, and take them home to dwell with him throughout a never-ending eternity.

MUSCOTAH, Kan., Jan. 1, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I have received the last number of the SIGNS for the year 1888, which reminds me that it is time for me to remit to you; and it also reminds me that another year is numbered with the past, and that I am yet a spared monument of mercy. When I look back through the past year and view the path over which I have passed, I can see nothing good that I have done, but can see much that I ought not to have done. The past year has been one of many trials to me. My pathway has been, it seems, through floods and flames, and to the very depths of despair, and I have been made to cry out with Paul, "O wretched man that I am! Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Thus I have been made to know that it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. And I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, there dwells no good thing. "For to will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good I find not." When I look back over all my many wanderings, the question arises, Is it I that have guarded my path, and protected me from all harm, and provided the necessities of life? O no! It is not I that have done all these things. But the Lord, according to his promise, has been with me through all my trials and troubles, and has protected me from all evil, and from the snares of the wicked one, not allowing me to be tempted above that which I was able to bear, and has blessed me with the necessary things of this life. And while he has been pleased to visit many happy families with the strong arm of death, and taken from them some of their loved ones, I and mine have been spared, and blessed with a good degree of health. When I try to enumerate the many blessings of my God even during the past year, I find that they are more than I can tell, much less when I look back through all my past life. O how far short I come of realizing his untold favors toward me, a poor, rebellious sinner! I fail to describe my feelings, or to enumerate God's many blessings toward me; yet I feel that he has been mindful of me through all my pilgrimage here; that he has guarded my path against all evil, and from the powers of the wicked one. But why is it? O why is it that he has been mindful of me? Why has he taken my feet from the mire and clay, and placed them on the Rock of Ages? Why has he put a new song in my mouth, even praise to his holy name? Is it because I am better than any one else, or that I have walked more uprightly in his sight? O no! I cannot say that. There is no good thing dwells in my flesh. But "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ, according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love; having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will." Not that we are better than others by nature, but he hath made us accepted in the Beloved. "In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace." Then it is "not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ." "Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began."

Here, dear brethren, are some of the reasons why I hope he has been mindful of poor me, and has taken me from the pit of sin, and set my feet upon the Rock, Christ Jesus, and put a new song in my mouth, even praise to his holy name. If my salvation depends on anything I must do, I am forever lost. I cannot do the things that I would. The good that I would, I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do. So then I must look beyond this mortal, unto him who has all power in heaven and earth; who hath power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father hath given him. Here is my hope, that I am one of that number given in the covenant of grace; that I am one of the vessels of mercy afore prepared unto glory. And if I ever obtain eternal life, it must be alone through the sovereign will and free gift of God. So it is not of works, but of grace. My hope is not the hope of those whose faith and hope are in their obedience to the law; but it is predicated on the eternal will and purpose of God, who hath made all things after the counsel of his own will; who commands, and it stands fast; who doth all his pleasure in the armies of heaven and among men; who is in one mind, and none can turn him. And because he changes not, Israel is not consumed. He hath loved us with an everlasting love, and therefore with loving-kindness draws us. He sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law; and that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. This is the ground of my hope. I have no righteousness of my own to plead, for sin is mixed with all I do. Christ Jesus is our righteousness, sanctification and redemption. I have nothing else to glory in. And since he has done more for me than I can write or think, I desire to be submissive to him in all things, and to be found walking in obedience to his will in all things. Unto him be honor, power and glory forever. Amen.

B. S. PATE.

ATTICA, Iowa, Jan. 12, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I desire to write a few lines for your much esteemed paper. Much has been said of late in regard to the support of the ministering brethren, and in almost all cases the condemnation is laid at the door of the churches. I cannot find it in my heart to condemn any of the brethren in regard to their duty to me. I have been a Baptist six years, and they have at all times administered to my necessities, and watched over me for good, and not for evil.

Dear brethren, does not the fault lie in us instead of the flock? Are we taking the oversight of the flock, not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind? Having food and raiment, are we therewith content? I am inclined to think that it is possible that some would be eased and others burdened.

Dear brethren, I desire to say to you all with whom I am acquainted that your hearts and hands have been opened to me; yes, and you shall be praised. For I was hungry, and ye gave me meat; I was naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me. Dear children of God, when I was naked and destitute of daily food you did not say to me, Be warm, and be filled; but your bowels of compassion were opened to me, and ye gave me that which was needful for my comfort.

If we feed the flock, we ought to drink the milk of the flock. If we plant a vineyard, we ought to eat of the fruit thereof. Surely I cannot say that the church of Christ is an unfruitful tree. I hear the Savior say that he has ordained us, that we should bring forth fruit, and that it should remain.

Now, dear brethren, if the tree is good the fruit is good; and if the fruit is corrupt the tree is also corrupt. A good tree cannot bear corrupt fruit. Jesus says, "I am the Vine, ye are the branches." I have always thought the branches were of the nature of the vine they belonged to. If we were wild by nature, and are grafted into the tame vine, the graft is made to partake of the vine it is grafted into. If the branch does not bear good fruit, it is because it is yet wild. "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." If this be in you, ye will not be barren nor unfruitful. "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." Love worketh no ill to his brother.

Brethren, do not let us be afraid to labor with our own hands, that we may have to give to them that need. Should not the shepherd feed the flock? Paul heard that there were some among the saints that were busybodies, not working at all; and his command to such is, that they work and eat their own bread. Paul condemned idleness.

If we wish to adopt a new system of supporting the preacher, different from what Paul taught, we will have to leave the Primitive Baptists and wed one of the daughters of the Mother of Harlots, and then we could live at ease; for she has her bed perfumed and her house decked, and her husband is not at home. She will meet you in the dark and kiss you. Her words drop as honeycomb, her mouth is smoother than oil, and her steps take hold on hell, and go down to the chambers of death. Her inmates are dead, and her guests are in the depths of hell. May the Lord deliver us from the strange woman, from her that flattereth with her lips. Dear saints, entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee. Thy people are my people, and thy God my God. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried.

We are at peace one with another, and the good Lord is adding to our little church as seemeth good to him. I had the pleasure of leading a sister into the water on the second Sunday in December. We had to cut the ice, which was about four inches thick. The beautiful hymn was sung,

"Christians, if your hearts be warm,
Ice and snow can do no harm," &c.

My home is with North Cedar Church, and it is a home indeed. May our home never be broken up.

JOHN F. BIXLER.

ELMWOOD, Saline Co., Mo.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I am well pleased with the doctrine set forth in the SIGNS. The writers are all strangers to me in the flesh, but I hope we are kindred in the Spirit. I hope I have been taught in the same school that they have. Yet I sometimes fear I am wrong, and fear I have deceived the people I love so well. But I can say that I know the things I once loved I now hate, and the things I once hated I now love. I once hated the people of God and the doctrine of free and electing grace, which are the people and doctrine I now love. I was exalted in my own nature, and was very righteous in my evil nature. But blessed be God's holy name, when it pleased him to let the true light shine in my heart, to show me what I was by nature, I saw myself as described by the prophet, "All flesh is as grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of grass." When the sun rises upon the grass it fades and withers; and when the Sun of Righteousness arises in our dark and benighted hearts, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, then our righteousness vanishes, and we are then in a state of mind we were never in before. We then see that we are nothing, yea, less than nothing. Then our riches are turned to nothing, and we find ourselves at the footstool of sovereign mercy, there begging for mercy. At the same time we cannot see how God can be just and the justifier of such an ungodly sinner. While standing there and trembling, we are made to feel,

"And if my soul were sent to hell,
Thy righteous law approves it well."

While in this condition we see the fulfillment of the prophecy, "Awake, O sword, against my Shepherd, against the man that is my fellow, saith the Lord of hosts. Smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered, and I will turn my hand upon the little ones." We see the sword of divine justice raised against Christ, who knew no sin, but was made sin for us. We see him pouring out his soul unto death for us. Then we see ourselves as Jacob's sons saw themselves. We see that we have sold our blessed Savior into the hands of wicked men, who by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God have taken and slain him. Now we are poor, starving beggars; but God has said that he will never turn one of his away empty. I have found it so. He fills them with praise to his great name. Then was the first time I could sing,

"Amazing grace! how sweet the sound!
That saved a wretch like me!"

This is the reason why I believe the doctrine of grace. I was ten thousand talents in debt, and had not a cent to pay. But Jesus paid it all—all the debt I owed. What else can one say who has been thus led? Praise him who has called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began.

With love to all the household of faith, your unworthy brother,

J. T. BARNES.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I have just returned from the Licking Association, held with the church at Mount Carmel, in Clark Co., Ky., where many of the saints met together in peace and harmony. Many of the under-shepherds proclaimed the glorious gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. They came from many different states, but all told the same old story of Jesus and his love to Adam's fallen race. The introductory sermon was preached by our dear brother Jenkins, of Middletown, N. Y. He failed not to declare the whole counsel of God. After the introductory sermon the messengers met together and appointed our aged brother, H. Cox, Moderator. They proceeded to business, and were soon through, without a discordant word. All seemed to be of one mind. Love and fellowship reigned throughout the whole meeting, which was something I had despaired of for some time past. The Lord reigns, and has given us beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning. When through business, dinner was announced, which was a bountiful spread, with many fragments left. After all were satisfied with natural food we again assembled in the house. After singing some of the sweet songs of Zion, our beloved brother Thompson, of Indiana, preached for us an able discourse, such as we had been used to hearing in former days at our dear old church, Mount Carmel, the unity of Christ and his people, predestination, election, brotherly love, and forbearance with one another. He reminded me of his dear old grandfather, who has gone to his reward. We were sadly disappointed at not meeting you, brother Beebe, but feel thankful for brother Jenkins and Mr. Manning and their wives.

Our old brother Bainbridge, who was taken sick at brother Thomson's on Friday night, is much better. I called to see him at his home yesterday, and found him cheerful and rejoicing in the proclamation of the gospel he had heard on Friday. I feel hopeful that he will soon be himself again.

Now, brethren Beebe, I ask a corner in your paper for these few lines, feeling almost sure that it will be the last from me, as I am in my eightieth year.

We had a goodly number of preachers with us. All spoke the same language—no Ashdods with us. Though last, not least, our beloved brother Francis, of Virginia, gave us a glorious sermon, and one long to be remembered.

Your sister in hope of eternal life,
CAROLINE ASHBURN.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN:—Inclosed you will find two dollars for our dear family paper. I wish I could send you some new names, but that seems impossible. I am among a people that seem to hate the doctrine that the SIGNS contains, and for that cause I dare not ask them to subscribe for such a paper. But as for myself it is a very welcome messenger in my lonely situation. I am, in one sense of the word, far from my dear kindred in Christ, which I feel to say are my best friends. I often wonder why it is that my lot must be cast so far from the church of God, and I be surrounded by so much idolatry, the "do and live" system. They seem to think, and in fact say, that I ought to go and hear their preachers. But their words are no food for me, and I believe it is far better for me to keep away from their places of worship. They call me selfish, and say I have no love for the Lord's good work. These people are professedly working for the Lord. They say they have the power within themselves to get religion, and that they are the church of Christ. But there is one who speaks to his disciples, saying, "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Dear kindred in Christ, there is comfort in these precious words of our dear Savior. He has all power in his hands. He has built his church on a rock, and says, "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it." What blessed words to me! I feel to be all sinful, and have no hope but in the blood of Jesus. But

"Tis a point I long to know,
Oft it causes anxious thought,
Do I love the Lord or no?
Am I his, or am I not?"

The Lord knoweth all things. He knows them that are his.

My dear brethren, editors of the SIGNS, I thank the Lord for raising you up to fill your places, and he will give you strength to wield "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon" for his own glory. I have taken the SIGNS the last thirty years, and have found great comfort in reading its columns.

I feel to say to my brethren and sisters all over the land, I hope the Lord will strengthen you to write on as you have heretofore. It has been a great solace to me. I feel to be less than the least of all saints, if one at all.

Your little sister in hope of life eternal,

ELIZABETH C. HULSIZER.

AT HOME, Sept. 24, 1889.

I WONDER if the friends assembled in church relation to-day think of me in the same light that I do of myself. In regard to my writing more frequently, alas! in this, as in everything attempted by me, how false and weak the human power and will. I mean and wish to do the things I should; but I allow this and that petty care to interfere. I am here reminded in my experience of seeing something at one time from the pen of a sister Lucy Heckard, in regard to prayer; she so often found herself yielding to her tired nature, after the duties and cares of the day, that, on retiring, what would have been a pleasure and duty in rendering thanks and praise to her heavenly Father for the mercies and blessings of the day, were oftentimes forgotten and, as it were, lost sight of. When a child thus realizes defect in duty (as to seeming form), how good to know that we have to do with one who knows the heart and is acquainted with our inmost thoughts.

"Prayer is the burden of a sigh,
The falling of a tear,
The upward glancing of an eye,
When none but God is near."

My physical condition is not at all improved since last I wrote. I am very, very lame, and do not ever step that I am not sadly hurt. My general health is, most of the time, pretty good, and I have so much to be thankful for in this respect, that I am not called upon to suffer such untold anguish as we read of so many enduring, who suffer week after week, and yet tell us of the sustaining grace and loving care vouchsafed to them. The flesh is weak, but the spirit is strengthened, purified and made strong. I have the need and desire to be brought with them, a willing subject of God's will; not through fear, but with love, desiring above all things to be made more meek, more mild, and more like a child. As I write, the thought will intrude, How dare you ask or hope for such things, knowing yourself, your own wicked heart, your own ways, that any such mercy can be in store for you? There could not be, were I not enabled to go back to the morn when I awoke after a season of such unrest, disquiet and darkness, repeating to myself, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." My burden was gone, and I was so happy, so relieved. But how short the time before I was so anxious for its return, that I might know how and when it left. What can compare with the happiness to know that it was borne and carried away for us, never more to appear against us?

"O for such love let rocks and hills
Their lasting silence break."

With not very many of you have I a personal acquaintance, but I would be glad at any time to hear from any of you who may feel disposed to write. I belong to and desire relation only with the despised company of whom we read, those who need to say and do feel, "What I am 'tis hard to know."

With love for one and all, your sister,

H. M. E.

SNOW HILL, Md., Sept. 11, 1889.

ELDER B. JENKINS—DEAR BROTHER:—I have been reading your letter to brother Vail, which was published in the SIGNS of September 4th, in which you spoke of your dark seasons. It comes so near expressing my own feelings at the present time, it makes me feel to hope that we are companions in tribulation. I have read and re-read your letter, and cannot keep it off my mind. I thought over twenty years ago that times would be brighter with me than they are at present; but my seasons seem to grow darker and darker. When I was a small boy I had a desire to do better and to be a christian, which I thought I could accomplish by what I could do. I believed I could do something that would bring God under obligations to bless me. I also thought that by my prayers I could accomplish a great deal. But in the year 1862, while I was on the road one day near sunset, meditating upon what I had passed through, somehow it was revealed to my understanding that I had been trusting in myself all the time, and something seemed to say, Trust in the Lord, and no longer in yourself. If I know anything of a work of grace, it was then. It seemed as though I could have told everybody, if they had been under the sound of my voice, just how I experienced the change. There was a change with me undoubtedly. I know that. I thought I could tell any one how I felt. But before I reached home something seemed to say to me, Say but little about it. After I got home I told my mother some of my feelings. She told me to trust in the Lord. Shortly after this time I became interested in the subject of baptism, and in the year 1864 I was baptized by Elder Gray and received into the church at Indiantown. I have been hobbling along with them ever since, with a hope which we sometimes call a small hope; yet it is the greatest in all. Comparing ourselves with that hope, we feel small.

I have felt since I commenced writing this that I ought not to write. Something has seemed to say, You want to make those christians think you are something when you are nothing.

Now I will leave this to your better judgment. If you think it worthy of a place in the SIGNS, publish it; if not, cast it into the waste-basket, and all will be well.

Yours in christian fellowship,
LITTLETON BAILY.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Having to write to you an obituary, I wish to say to you and your readers a few words as an explanation of my silence of late through the SIGNS and other papers, and of my want of more extensive private correspondence. I was seventy-four years of age on the 14th of last June, and am much afflicted with rheumatism in my lowers limbs, and with a painful abdominal hernia; and my right shoulder having been fractured by the upsetting of a sleigh some years ago, it is quite painful for me to write, so that I dread to sit down at the table to write even a private letter. Yet, notwithstanding my pains and aches, my age and infirmities, I am able to attend four churches monthly, located in four counties. I am a wonder unto many, and to myself. I wonder that such a worthless and sinful worm should be spared so long; and I wonder at the forbearance of the saints so long with my weakness and imperfections. I wish and pray for the success and prosperity of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES and other sound papers, and for the peace and prosperity of Zion. Let those who can to edification write on.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Mount Pleasant Association of Regular Baptists, now in session with the church at Elk Hill, Spencer Co., Ky., Sept. 6th, 7th and 8th, 1889, to the churches composing the same, Greeting.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—Once more, through grace abounding, it is our privilege to address you this our annual epistle; and we feel to call your attention to some general remarks on the first chapter of Paul's letter to the church at Rome, more especially the sixteenth and seventeenth verses of that chapter, which read as follows: "For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith: as it is written, The just shall live by faith."

First, we notice that Paul begins this epistle by proclaiming himself a servant, and not a rabbi. "Called to be an apostle;" on which call (Acts ix. 15) he establishes his authority. "Separated unto the gospel of God." The Pharisees had their name of separation, because they separated themselves to the study of the law. Such an one had Paul been; but now he studies to show himself a workman approved unto God, being separated by the counsel of God (Gal. i. 15) from his birth, by an immediate direction of the Spirit, and a regular ordination according to that direction.—Acts xiii. 23.

Second, we notice the antiquity of this doctrine. It was of ancient standing, in the promises and prophecies of the Old Testament, all of which point to and are fulfilled in the gospel.

Third, we have the subject matter. Notice how he keeps up his names and titles, "his Son Jesus Christ our Lord;" as one that took great pleasure in speaking of him; and having mentioned him, he could not go on with his discourse without some expression of love and honor. In one person two distinct natures; first, his human nature, made of the seed of David according to the flesh; that is, born of the virgin Mary, who was of the house of David (Luke i. 27), as was also Joseph, his supposed father (Luke ii. 14); and second, his divine nature, declared to be the Son of God with power (verse 4); Son of God by eternal generation; or, as it is here explained, according to the spirit of holiness; as he is said to be quickened by the Spirit.—1 Peter iii. 18.

Fourth, we notice the characters addressed. "To all that be in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints." Jew and Gentile, bond or free, high or low, rich or poor, all meet together in the Lord Jesus Christ.

We come now to notice more particularly the sixteenth and seventeenth verses. "For I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ," &c. In the first place, there is a great deal in the gospel that such a man as Paul, who was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, might be tempted to be ashamed of; especially so that its author was hanged on a tree; its doctrine nothing to recommend it among scholars, and its professors were mean and despised, and everywhere spoken against. But these things are rather a glory to the child of God, who realizes that Christ is all and in all. Paul is not ashamed of the gospel, because it is the power of God. Remove that power, and there is, there can be, no gospel. Paul says to the church at Corinth, "But we preach Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness; but to them that are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God." Christ crucified is the power; and the revelation of Christ crucified, the revelation of the arm of the Lord (Isa. liii. 1), is the revelation of the gospel; not to make him an heir of grace, but it only makes manifest that he is already one. "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts," &c. "For therein [that is, in this gospel, which is the power of God, or Christ in you the hope of glory, which Paul so much glories in] is the righteousness of God revealed." The gospel comes to the poor, weak and trembling one when he is almost ready to give up all for lost, not being able to see any way of escape from the punishment due to his transgressions, and makes known this righteousness. While God is just and holy, and we are guilty, it is necessary that we have a righteousness wherein to appear before him; and blessed be his adorable name, there is such a righteousness brought in by Messiah the Prince (Dan. ix. 24), and revealed in the gospel, called here the righteousness of God, being wrought out by him when he expired upon the cross, crying, "It is finished;" and a knowledge of this righteousness revealed to us cuts off all pretensions to a righteousness resulting from merits of our own works. "From faith to faith;" from the faith of Christ the Savior to the faith of the child of grace. "Saved." "As it is written, The just shall live by faith." Then, realizing a hope that he is the Lord our righteousness, let us rejoice, dear brethren, that the eye of the Lord is upon the righteous, and his ear is open to their cries. They are born of the flesh, and know that in the flesh dwells no good thing. They inherit by that birth a nature that is enmity against God; but in the new birth is manifested that nature by which they realize in their experience that they are the heirs of God and joint heirs with the Lord Jesus Christ. To them old things are passed away, and all things are become new. The old covenant of works, under which they once sought justification, has passed away, and they by faith are enabled to see that the law has been fulfilled by their elder Brother in all its jots and tittles, and that they are no more under the law, but under grace. They are made to fully realize that it is not by works of righteousness which they have done, but by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost. They love him, because he first loved them, and gave himself for them, that he might redeem them from all iniquity. Then he has redeemed them, is in them the hope of glory, has given them the spirit of adoption, and they are assured that though they pass through the valley of the shadow of death he will be with them. His rod and his staff shall comfort them, and their cry is, "Not unto us, not unto us, but unto thy name be all the glory."

Brethren, the grace of God be with you. Amen.

The Redstone Old School Baptist Association, convened with Redstone Church, Fayette Co., Pa., Aug. 30th, 31st and Sept. 1st, 1889, to the churches composing her body, sendeth this as her annual Circular Letter for the one hundred and fourteenth meeting, including the first at her organization in the year 1776.

VERY DEAR BRETHREN:—Only a few of the many churches which once composed our body remain, and they apparently as remnants of once prosperous churches. We might recount some of the causes of this change in the numerical strength of our body, such as death of many aged brethren, removal of some to other localities, departure of some from the faith, and but few accessions to our churches by baptism and by letter. These seem to us self-evident reasons of our decline in members; and we might conclude, as our enemies do, that by this course of natural causes we soon will be extinct. But we dare not look at these things in natural light, but in that true light that makes manifest all the corruption of nature, and teaches the all-prevailing power of Jehovah to preserve his people through all the changing scenes of this world. If we have the Spirit of Christ we are his children, and have the faith of God's elect; and because of that faith given we are not of them who turn back and who look to men for support. Our trust is in God, from whence cometh our salvation. Why should we mourn? It is our Father, by his wise providence, who hath blessed us by trying our faith in ways which we are naturally adverse to, but which are for our good, and teach us very important things, which we never could learn in any other way. And though we think of the decline in our numerical strength as deplorable, may we be led to investigate our doctrine and order, comparing them with the perfect standard; and if they are in accordance with the gospel, "Happy art thou, O Israel," saved by the Lord. For it is far more important to us, who claim to be the genuine church, to know that we are contending steadfastly for the true faith, and walking in order, than to have the approval of the worldly religionists, who hold out inducements to influence the weak saints to sacrifice a little of the doctrine, or a little of the order, to make it more palatable to the opposers of the truth as it is in Jesus. We think that there never was a time in the history of this association when the preaching of the gospel in its purity was of more moment than at present, because of imitations of the gospel which are so near the genuine, and yet so far away. The apostle well said that the time would come when they would not endure sound doctrine, but would heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears, and that they shall turn away their ears from the truth. These things must be, that the Scriptures may be fulfilled, and that God's people be tried as by fire, the dross consumed, the gold purified, and God glorified in his wonderful work unto the children of men. You who have been quickened together with Christ, and have a hope of eternal life, salvation to you is by grace, and no other way; and you cannot say, as some do, that although salvation is by grace, and the Lord saves his people, yet you must not let the Lord do the work. Can the creatures prevent the Lord from extending salvation to the heirs of heaven? According to man's theory they can. But you know that all power in heaven and in earth is in his hand, and not one faileth, because his God is for him. If God be for him, who shall be against him? We desire that your pure minds may be stirred up to a feeling sense of the great importance of spiritual things, as above natural things. Ye do not look at the things that are seen, but at the things that are not seen; for the things that are seen are temporal, but the things that are not seen are eternal. Hope reaches out to the unseen. Faith is the substance. You have faith, hence the evidence of unseen things. How rich are you, O man of God! Yes, rich. He who was rich became poor for our sakes, that we through his poverty might be rich. You are heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ. Although you are humble, you may be bold and fearless in facing your enemies, in the fear of God, but not in the fear of man.

Finally, brethren, be of good heart, be of one mind, love one another; and may our Father grant you blessings more than we can ask or you are worthy to receive. Amen.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Mount Pleasant Association of Regular Baptists, now in session with the Elk Hill Church, in Spencer Co., Ky., Sept. 6th, 7th and 8th, 1889, to the associations with whom she corresponds, sendeth love in the Lord.

God in his providence has again permitted us to assemble in an associate capacity. The messages of love from the churches composing this, the Mount Pleasant Association of Regular Baptists, show peace, harmony and christian fellowship. The preaching has been proclaimed with power from on high, Jesus alone the salvation of sinners, and was accomplished by sufferings of his own on the tree of the cross. Jesus was then God manifest in the flesh, uniting in one person two natures, human and divine—man, that he might suffer; and God, that he might redeem us, poor sinners of Adam's fallen race.

Jesus' mission on earth among men
Was to save those of the flesh, "born again,"
Who are vile sinners cast down,
Not by good deeds expecting a crown.

We are glad the Baltimore, Delaware, Delaware River, Warwick and Chemung Associations have accepted correspondence with us, and we pray that it may be to the honor and glory of God, and a comfort to us all. We hope for a continuation of your christian correspondence by Minutes and messengers. May the ties of God's love still bind us closer together as we journey down the steeps of time.

Our next session is appointed to be held with our sister church, Mount Pleasant, at Pleasureville, Henry Co., Ky., commencing on Friday before the first Saturday in September, 1890, where we again hope to meet your messengers and messages of love. May the Lord of glory graciously dispose of us all, and we ever be found sitting at his feet, crying, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, honor and glory. Amen.

THE APOSTOLIC COMMISSION.

DEAR BROTHER BEEBE:—Will you be so kind as to give your views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on Matthew xxviii. 19, 20? I hope an editorial on that subject would be very useful to a good many in this section who are inquiring after the right way.

Our dear aged brother, James Armstrong, is still living, though very feeble. His mind is at times almost gone; he cannot live much longer. A great man in Israel will soon be taken away.

Yours in the best of bonds,

W. T. ROGERS.

REPLY.

"GO YE therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen."—Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.

At the request of our esteemed brother, Elder W. T. Rogers, we present such views as we have upon the important subject contained in the text above quoted. Although much has been preached and written in consideration of this wonderful command, there is still abundant room for instruction in its contemplation.

The first point to be observed is the authority by which this command is given. Upon this depends the whole weight of the direction. The inspired apostle Matthew closes the record of the gospel of Jesus Christ with the testimony of his appearance to his chosen disciples after his resurrection from the dead; and our text contains the last of the words of Jesus which the Holy Ghost moved Matthew to write, for the instruction of his saints in all succeeding times. It would seem that nothing could be added to the impressive solemnity of these directions. Everything which was spoken by our Lord must be vitally important to those who hope for salvation through his blood; but from the fact that this commandment was given to his chosen apostles after he had died and risen from the dead, it would appear peculiarly important. Especially does its solemn weight appear from the declaration of Jesus in the preceding verse, to which the word "therefore" refers. It is because Jesus declares that "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth," that he issues this commandment to his chosen apostles. Less power than that specified would not have been sufficient to secure the execution of his will in this momentous matter. A just appreciation of this truth exposes the error of those who imagine that they are called upon to assist the Lord in securing the accomplishment of his will in the proclamation of his gospel to all the nations included in the commission as stated in the text. His direction reveals his will that the work shall be done; he claims "all power," and certainly is able to secure the accomplishment of his will. It necessarily follows that the truth of the declaration of Jesus is denied by all those who claim that he needs the help of creatures to attain the fulfillment of his will in the work here enjoined. Such infidelity is revolting to every believer in our Lord Jesus Christ. Not only was this command given exclusively to his apostles, but it is recorded by inspiration that they fulfilled it. In the sense in which the Lord spoke the Holy Spirit moved the apostles to obey the command. Paul, referring to "the word of the truth of the gospel," says, "Which is come unto you, as it is IN ALL THE WORLD." Again, "If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and WHICH WAS PREACHED TO EVERY CREATURE WHICH IS UNDER HEAVEN; whereof I Paul am made a minister."—Col. i. 6, 23. "But I say, Have they not heard? Yes verily, THEIR SOUND WENT INTO ALL THE EARTH, AND THEIR WORDS UNTO THE ENDS OF THE WORLD."—Rom. x. 18. This testimony is conclusive to those who believe the inspired truth of the Scriptures. We have no inclination to argue with infidels on the subject. Those who love God are not disposed to cavil with his word, however it may seem inconsistent with finite reason. The Scriptures cited clearly show that this divine command was given exclusively to his apostles, and that it was fulfilled by them as directed. The fact that they all fell asleep eighteen centuries ago does not prevent their testimony and teaching being still heard in all the earth by every one who is led by the Spirit of God. The Holy Ghost, that Comforter whom the world cannot receive, neither knoweth him, is not dependent on the aid of creatures now, as he was not when "The Scripture [that is, the eternal Word of God], foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel to Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed."—Gal. iii. 8. Reason might cavil at this declaration, since the first book of our Bible was not written until after Abraham had been taken from time. But the faith of the Son of God enables the believer to receive with implicit confidence the revealed truth as it is written. If the saints must be able to understand and fully comprehend all that they believe, they will never be able to believe that God is "just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." The whole experience of the subjects of salvation is an incomprehensible mystery which they can never understand except by the manifestation of the Spirit through faith.

The commandment given to the apostles did not authorize them to send others to do that which they were directed to do. The Lord says to them explicitly, "Go ye!" Whether we can comprehend it or not, the truth remains that they did obey the word of the Lord exactly as the Spirit of Christ designed that they should do. Their persecutors evidently supposed that when they were slain their teaching would cease; but the vital power of their testimony appears in the fact that they still continue to teach all nations even now, although they sealed their testimony with their blood only a few years after they had received this direction from the Lord. The omnipotence of our Lord Jesus would not have been more completely disproved by the success of those who sought to defeat his will by killing his apostles, than by proof that the assistance of mortals is now required to fulfill his commandment. If he has not the "all power" which he claims, there is no evidence that he has any power at all.

"Teach all nations." Under the Mosaic dispensation the messages which were sent by the prophets were addressed to the nation of Israel, who were the chosen people of God in the type. So, when our Lord sent forth his apostles before his crucifixion he limited their mission to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel."—Matt. x. 6. The seventy were restricted to "every city and place, whither he himself would come."—Luke x. 1. Until that legal covenant should be fulfilled in his death, the Gentile world could not receive the testimony of Jesus in the gospel of salvation. Even when this commission was given to the eleven apostles, they must yet tarry in Jerusalem until they should be endued with power from on high.—Luke xxiv. 49. Then they were qualified for the work appointed them; it was not left for them to be trained by natural instruction even in the letter of the Scriptures. Every preparation was furnished them by that anointing of the Holy Ghost which was poured upon them from heaven. The illiterate fishermen of Galilee had no occasion to repair to the schools of men to be prepared for the work assigned them. On the day of Pentecost Peter, standing up with the eleven, was able to declare the fulfillment of the prophecy of Joel in the wonderful display of divine power there manifested in the outpouring of the Holy Ghost. The multitude assembled from various nations heard each in his native language the preaching of those uneducated Galileans. In this very fact they did "teach all nations" effectually the divine power and truth of Jesus. That instruction was not confined to that time and place; it is still the source of instruction to the saints in every place, showing how our Lord accomplishes in his own way the fulfillment of his word.

In the death of our Redeemer upon the cross of Calvary he blotted out the handwriting of ordinances which constituted the middle wall of partition between the chosen nation of Israel and the Gentile nations. Now, in his exalted majesty, Jesus no longer restricts his messengers to the favored people to whom he had formerly confined them. They were now to go to all nations everywhere, and teach the same truth, without discriminating between Jews and Gentiles. But it will not be claimed that this command required of the apostles that they should qualify everybody to receive their teaching. There are those among the nations who have not the necessary capacity to learn even naturally. Certainly the apostles were not commanded to teach those who have no mental power to receive instruction. Then, since it is impossible for the natural man to know the things of the Spirit of God, therefore the apostles are not commanded to teach the things of the kingdom of God to such; for to them those things are foolishness. The nations included in this command of Jesus must be the same nations for whose healing the leaves of the tree of life are provided, and who walk in the light of the glory of God and of the Lamb. These are the nations of them that are saved, who alone do his commandments.—Rev. xxi. 24; xxii. 14. That this is the proper understanding is evident from the next clause in the instruction given by our Lord in the text.

"Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." None who have any reverence for the profession of faith in Christ will hold it proper to baptize the nations of the world indiscriminately. Yet there is no disputing that the command to baptize embraces the same nations who are to be taught. This is in harmony with all the revelation of the inspired word on the subject. Only such as believe in the God who is revealed in the Scriptures can be baptized in the name given in the text. The immersion of any others, even with the repetition of the name of God, is merely a mockery of the divinely authorized ordinance of baptism. There is no divine direction to baptize any one who does not give evidence of faith in the Lord Jesus as the only Savior of his people from their sins. That evidence cannot be manifested by the mere repetition of any creed which may be learned by study. Every individual saint must be taught of God by personal experience, which qualifies each of them to testify that "Salvation is of the Lord." This truth necessarily must restrict the application of the direction given in this text to those who are called of God and taught of him. All who bring forth such "fruits meet for repentance" are prepared of God to be baptized in obedience to the command of our Lord. No literal conformity to the apostolic mode of administering the ordinance can give validity to the act when this faith is absent; "for whatsoever is not of faith is sin."—Rom. xiv. 23.

It is worthy of special notice that the Lord does not speak of the names "of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," as if they were separate from each other in the Godhead. The unity of God is presented in the use of the one name as applied by our Lord to "the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost." Baptizing in that name is the confession of the divine authority by which the ordinance is administered. The mention of the name of the Lord in baptizing believers is but the declaration of the fact that it is done in obedience to the commandment of our Lord. There can be no such thing as baptizing in his name when acting in disobedience to his directions. Neither is it possible to baptize in the name of the Father, or of the Son, or of the Holy Ghost, unless the faith of the Son of God in the subject of baptism confesses to the truth of the one God at whose command the obedience of faith is rendered. That confession recognizes the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, as embraced in the one name of God, by whom the ordinance of baptism is established. This is the "one baptism" of believers in our Lord Jesus which is enjoined by the authority of the King in Zion, and established by the judgment of his inspired apostles. To no created men or angels has God given the power to change or annul any of the requirements of the commandment which he sanctified by his own example, and which he moved his apostles to bind upon his church for perpetual observance to the end of time. Just as it became him in giving the pattern for the instruction of his saints to fulfill all righteousness by being baptized in Jordan, so it becomes all who love him to follow his example in the way enjoined by his inspired apostles.

Price, fifty cents. We hope it may be favorably received by the brethren, and liberally patronized.

MARRIAGES.

SEPT. 26th, 1889, at the residence of the bride's father, by Elder Wm. Grafton, Elder F. A. Chick and Miss Delilah Ensor, both of Baltimore Co., Md.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

B. H. Walker was born in Adair Co., Ky., July 15th, 1810, and departed this life in the town of Ashland, Cass Co., Ill., Sept. 4th, 1889, in the eightieth year of his age.

The deceased came to Illinois in 1827, and settled in Cass Co., it then being a part of Morgan. June 16th, 1840, he was united in marriage with Miss Anna R. Sage, who became the mother of seven children, six of whom are living.

Father Walker's life, conduct, hope and exercises present one of those peculiar and incomprehensible cases that are occasionally witnessed among the children of men. He lived forty or fifty years within the bounds of a church of our faith, and attended her meetings quite frequently, and often was so seriously exercised about offering to join that his eyes were blinded with tears; yet he never joined, although he was well read, and well established in the doctrine held by us. A sense of his own unworthiness kept him back, and outside of the visible fold.

I was called, and attended at the house of mourning on the day after his death, meeting a large audience, and speaking to them from 1 Cor. xv. 22. He was then laid away to rest until God shall raise the dead.

I. N. VANMETER.

MACOMB, Ill., Sept. 26, 1889.

Duncan Campbell died Aug. 29th, 1889, in the sixty-first year of his age.

It pleased the Lord to call our brother by his grace, and to reveal his Son in him. We have often heard him tell what great things the Lord had done for his soul. The narration of these things from his own lips was very precious, and a feast to those of "like precious faith." Some thirty-five years ago the Lord quickened him, and showed him his condition as a guilty transgressor. After laboring under the burden of his sins for some time, the Holy Spirit gave him a hope in Jesus, and his soul found relief in the pardoning love of God. In the comfort of the sweet mercy of God he walked but a little while, for he was carried away with the delusive thought that he ought to and could live without committing sin. This he aimed at, but, to his dismay, found he could not. In his occupations in life he mixed with wicked company, but could not plunge into wicked practices as others. "It was the Lord who kept me," he would exclaim. He was then for a long time sorely distressed in the thought that he had committed the "unpardonable sin." During this time also the adversary, the devil, assaulted his soul with temptations to go into sin and drown his troubles; but amid all the perplexing pathway there were some moments of comfort, a little hope would lighten the gloom, and earnest longings and, at times, anticipations would spring up that the Lord would satisfy his soul with some clear and sure token of his acceptance in the Beloved. Some to whom he related the exercises of his soul told him that he would not have any more evidence given him than he had already received, and that he ought to do his duty, and then he would find relief from his troubles. He answered them that he knew the Lord would in his own time give him some brighter evidences. Afterward he felt surprised at the confidence in which he had expressed himself. For some fifteen years he plodded along in trouble of soul, with here and there a heavenly ray, until the set time of favor was come. While sitting by his own fireside, brooding over his disconsolate estate, the Holy Spirit put these words into his heart, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." He was enabled to rejoice, and was exceeding glad in Jehovah, his salvation. Those who knew our brother prized his companionship in the things of Jesus Christ. We feel that we have lost a precious companion and a dear brother in Jesus. During his sickness he would in conversation review past seasons of the Lord's manifestations of his loving-kindness, and would exclaim, "O that I might have just such another visit!" In prospect of soon departing from this world he would say, "It is all right: Jesus is precious. What a happy change it will be!" Hymn 700 (Beebe's Collection), beginning with the words, "Resistless Sov'reign of the skies!

Immensely great! Immensely wise!
My times are all within thy hand,
And all events at thy command," was made very precious to his soul some two years ago, when in much distress of soul; and since then he often spoke of this hymn, and called it his hymn. He was a noble-minded man.

His funeral was largely attended, and the writer preached from the words, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

FRED. W. KEENE.

Elder E. A. Meaders was born in Spartanburgh, S. C., Feb. 9th, 1806, and died at his residence in Water Valley, Miss., Sept. 15th, 1889.

He died, perhaps, from general debility, though he received a hurt nine days previous to his death from which he never recovered. His father died when he was quite small, and his mother emigrated to Giles Co., Tenn. He was married to Miss Juane McCollum, Nov. 19th, 1824. They had eleven children born unto them. In 1867 his wife died, and in 1868 he was married to Mrs. Mattie C. Greer. They had four children born unto them.

To use his own language, in 1824 the Lord arrested him, and for three months he was in great trouble, at about which time his troubles were removed. He struggled along, not willing to accept his experience as a sufficient evidence of his deliverance, until about 1828, at which time he felt that the Lord had pardoned his sins. His impressions to preach came up with this last evidence, and on the second Sunday in May, 1828, he made his first effort to speak in public. On the second Sunday in May, 1889, he finished his last appointment and his sixty-first anniversary. He and his first wife united with the church in June, 1828, and were baptized by Elder Elias Deaton, in Hickman Co., Tenn. He was ordained in 1830 at Liberty Church, by Elders E. Deaton, P. Whitwell and Isaac Pace. In the winter of 1831 he moved to Dickson Co., Tenn., and remained there until 1836 or 1837, and then moved to Mississippi. In one of these years he and Elder Lane organized a church in Oxford, Miss. He was in the organization of the Tallahatchie Association in 1838. He was in the division of the Baptists about that time, and remained with the Primitive Baptists and in the same association until 1872, when he moved to Yalobusha Co., Miss., in the bounds of the Hopewell Association, where he remained until his death.

Brother Meaders has surely been one of the faithful soldiers in Israel. To speak of him as we feel might cause some to think that we were exaggerating. The Lord did a great deal for brother Meaders mentally, and bestowed his grace upon him abundantly, for which we feel sure that he gave honor to the Lord all the way through. He has preached in the following-named states: South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Georgia, Texas, Alabama, Kentucky, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Ohio, New York, New Jersey, Indiana, Mississippi, and in Canada. While in the city of Washington

James Buchanan, who was then President, offered him the Governorship of Utah Territory; but brother Meaders respectfully declined, thanking Mr. Buchanan, and saying that he had a higher calling. He regarded a call to the ministry as being a higher call than could be bestowed by man. Brother Meaders has manifested a great interest for the well-being of Zion, and has perhaps been as self-sacrificing as any other minister that we have had in the south. His life and character have illustrated the beauty of holiness and the excellence of the higher way, looking through the long shadow of the past in the decline of an eminently pure and good life. No one saw a single stain on the fair picture of his purity. His standard of christian virtue and integrity was lofty, and his life was pictured with the high ordeal.

His funeral was conducted by Wm. Guess, using 1 Cor. xv. 49: "And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." He leaves his loving wife, three of his last family of girls, and a step-son, to mourn their loss. May the Lord's Spirit rest and abide with us all, that we may feel reconciled to the dispensations of his mighty power and goodness.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FAIR OAKS, N. Y., Oct. 2, 1889.

DEAR PASTOR:—Inclosed with this you will find my experience, as I wrote it out last March; but feeling it was so imperfect, I delayed sending it. Since reading a communication in the last SIGNS from B. F. Coulter, I have decided to send it. Do with it as you see fit, and all will be right with me.

Your sister, I hope, in Christ,
J. E. NICHOLS.

MARCH, 1889.

DEAR PASTOR:—It is so long since I have had the privilege of meeting my kindred in Christ, or even seeing them, that I feel I must give vent to my feelings in writing, although I know my inability to say or write anything worth your time in reading it. I have felt a desire so long to assure you that I have not forgotten my heavenly Father's family, for I feel that my love waxes stronger day by day; and I hope I have not been forgotten by them, nor become alienated, for my seeming coldness. I have seldom closed my eyes in sleep without thinking of you all; and although I could not meet with you, it seemed good to think of you all. I do not know that I can better express my feelings during the past winter than in the following words,

"Last winter, when the cold had come,
And frost had killed the flowers,
I thought the days would longer seem,
And lonely all the hours.

"For I must still remain shut in—
How long no one could tell;
But he who shut me in, I know,
Doeth ever all things well.

"It may be that he shut me in
To keep me free from harm;
If so, I'm glad to feel so safe
Within his sheltering arms.

"Perhaps it was that I might learn
To say, 'Thy will, not mine';
So how would I but gladly take
The task he did assign?

"Now months have passed, I still am here,
Weary and hoping still;
But O! so glad I've learned to say,
My Father, do thy will."

I feel that my heavenly Father did not leave me comfortless. The Bible and the SIGNS have been my company and comfort. The editorial on the "Lord's Prayer" was a great comfort to me. Two years ago the past winter it seemed as though no other prayer was given me; and as that contained all, I felt it was enough. "The Judgment of the Saints" was another editorial that comforted me much.

During the past winter, in my lonely hours, my mind went back to the time that I trust the Lord commenced the work of grace in my heart, and I traveled over all the way in which I trust he led me, and I felt a desire to give in my testimony to his electing love, his goodness and mercy to one so unworthy of his notice.

I was born in Dutchess Co., N. Y., and reared by Presbyterian parents, who, I must with gratitude acknowledge, endeavored to bring us up in the fear of the Lord, offering us up at the "baptismal altar," teaching us the commandments; and often, when gathered around the family altar, urged upon us the necessity of a preparation for death. As far back as my memory leads me, I remember, after retiring, of praying God to spare my life till I arrived to womanhood, and then I would try to be a christian. Many times was this promise renewed. When I was sixteen years of age a revival commenced in the Methodist Church in our neighborhood, and then my promise came to my mind; and at the meetings the horrors of hell were constantly portrayed to the mind of the sinner. Although I was reluctant to turn my back on the pleasures of this world, yet when I remembered my promise I felt that ere I had another opportunity I would realize the torments of that dreadful place; and I thought that in order to escape it I must set about the work. Then came the words, "Except ye repent." I felt that I knew nothing of repentance, for what had I to repent of? I had always done as nearly right as I knew how. When I heard them tell of sorrow for sin I wondered what it was to be sorry for sin. I thought I was a sinner, because I had been told it, and had read it; but I felt it was something I could not help, and therefore why be sorry for it? In answer to these inquiries I was told that this was repentance, to feel a desire to be a christian; that all I had to do was to kneel at the altar, go forward and take up the cross, exercise faith, take God at his promise, and that would bring the blessing. But thought I, How can I exercise faith unless it is given me? How can I take God at his word? This was dead language to me, for I understood not its meaning. All these forms I passed through, and was admitted into the church on probation. Yet I knew no more what a change of heart meant, nor an experimental knowledge of Jesus Christ, than one who had never heard of him. I now thought I had arrived at my highest attainment, and that all was well with me. I established a righteousness of my own, which I supposed was sufficient to justify me before God. I prayed morning and evening, read my Bible, and outwardly appeared very religious, and for a time I seemed to run well. But after the excitement passed off, and these impressions wore off, I concluded I had never experienced the new birth, nor knew a change of heart. All that kept me from joining in the merry dance, or engaging in the other vanities of time and sense, was because I knew it was not consistent with my profession. Thus I passed six or seven years. In the fall of 1852 I was teaching in the village of Hillsdale, Columbia Co., N. Y. The Methodist Church was but a step from my boarding place; and as the old lady and gentleman with whom I boarded were members, I went with them. During that winter a revival was going on in the church. I attended the meetings, but took no part in them; for I had lost all confidence in forms. But then, I trust, the Lord commenced the work of grace in my heart. I now saw my wicked state by nature, and knew what it was to sorrow for sin, by feeling its terrible smart. I felt I had sinned against a just and holy God, and was unable to offer restitution. This filled my heart with sorrow, and my eyes with tears; but I could not be persuaded to kneel at the altar till just before the meetings closed, and never can I forget the feeling which took possession of my heart the moment I started to the altar. My heart became as hard as a stone. I felt it was mockery. I thought it might be right for others, but it was sin for me, and I resolved I would never do the like again. If God could not save me from my sins in any other way, then I thought I must perish eternally. I now listened no more to their persuasions. But at night, when I retired to my room, I knelt at my bedside, and with prayers and tears begged for mercy. Thus days and weeks passed by, but I found no comfort. My gloom and heaviness increased, and my heart was filled with despair. At length, one Sunday afternoon I retired to my room, sank down upon the floor with a chair in front of me, and my Bible in the chair; but I could not open it, for all was condemnation to me. I endeavored to look into the state of my heart, but could see nothing but sin and pollution there. I had always led a moral life, yet the most profligate character I had ever known seemed spotless when compared with myself. I thought, Surely there cannot be mercy for such a vile and guilty creature as I am. O! who can describe the misery of that soul when all hope has fled, and the wrath of a just and holy God is upon them? I said, O that I had never been born, or that I might this moment sink into nonentity! Then came the thought into my mind that God had created all things for his own glory, some unto honor, and others unto dishonor; and if I am a vessel created unto dishonor, and my destruction will add to his glory, to that, even to that, I will pray to be resigned. One thing I desired, that I might perish praying. Just then, I cannot tell why, I sprang upon my feet, and commenced singing, "I would not live always," &c., while the tears flowed, and such a flow of love and praise to God filled my heart! In a moment my sorrow was turned into joy. My first thought was to go and tell the lady with whom I boarded that I believed God had forgiven my sins; but when I remembered that they looked upon me as stubborn, in not complying with their forms, I felt they would have no confidence in me. Then I said nothing about it. The next morning, when I walked forth to the duties of the day, I felt that the presence of God was all around me, and my heart overflowed with love and praise to him; and well do I remember the question, Shall I ever know sorrow again? And with the poet, "I could not believe that I ever should grieve." Thus for a few days I enjoyed the smiles of his countenance, and supposed it would always be thus, if indeed God had forgiven my sins. But, contrary to my expectations, doubts and fears began to fill my mind, and I found myself back in the flesh, prone to sin, which grieved me sorely. I greatly desired that I might be separated from all sin. At one time, when I was wondering how I might rid myself of this inclination to sin, something said to me, "Nothing but death can separate us from this body of sin."

The winter passed away, and my next sojourn was at Northeast Center, Dutchess Co. There I attended the Presbyterian Church every Sunday, listening to written discourses, in which the pastor made a fine display of talent and education, but afforded no milk for the new-born babe in Christ. I now felt like one alone. I felt no drawing toward this people, nor any other; yet I greatly desired to find the true church of the living God. As I knew no other denominations but the Presbyterians, Methodists and New School Baptists, I supposed I should find it there among them, but said in my heart, I will pray earnestly to God to lead me to his people; and I seldom closed my eyes in sleep till I had made this request.

That fall I was married, and came to Orange Co., N. Y., to live. Now I truly feel that God was leading me in a way I knew not, and in paths I had not known. Yet I knew not his purpose then, and, like the children of Israel, I did greatly rebel. I felt that I was in a strange land, and all seemed very distant and cold; and some, as I learned afterward, looked upon me with a suspicious eye, which cut me to the heart; for I had always enjoyed the respect and good will of my acquaintances in my native land, and wherever my business called me I seemed to get the respect and good will of my employers and pupils. In one place, where I tarried four years, the Presbyterian minister said to me, "Miss Eggleston, you seem to have stolen the heart of this people." I do not say this to boast, but to give an idea of the great change; for in those days everything seemed to pass smoothly along. I seemed to have no crosses, never knew what it was to be evil spoken of, nor knew an enemy, nor felt angry at any one. But now the change was so great, my surroundings and way of living so different, I became homesick, and wept most of the time. I said I could never forgive myself for leaving my father and mother, brothers and sisters, and youthful acquaintances. Now I must tell the wicked thought that came into my mind while grieving. I thought if I could have had the overruling of providence, I could have caused things to work together for my good; for I felt there was nothing for me now but tears and regret. Truly I can say, The mercy of the Lord endureth forever.

The Old School Baptist meeting was the place of my husband's attendance, and I went with him there. They were a people I had never heard of before. I remember of listening with great satisfaction to Elder G. Beebe, and felt that he said much that was comforting and encouraging to the christian; but was I one? How could I lay claim, when I saw such an evil heart, and so prone to sin? Yet at times my heart would be so filled with gratitude and thanksgiving to God that I often was led to wonder what I was, and as often said in my heart, Whether I am a christian or not, I feel that I love my God. The doctrine of election was something I had never heard preached before. I thought much about it. I read my Bible more attentively, and found it was Bible truth; and for a time, I must confess, it seemed like I could not be reconciled to it; for I felt that God was just, and I could see no justice in that. I can never forget the feeling that came over me one Sunday morning at Walkkill. They sang the 218th hymn, Beebe's Collection. It was a sweet time, but the words were so hard, it brought tears to my eyes; for I desired to love all God's laws and decrees. I then and there prayed that I might see aright; and when they sang the words,

"But, O my soul, if truth so bright
Should dazzle and confound thy sight,
Yet still his written will obey,
And wait the great decisive day."

On these words my mind seemed to rest. I now began to read the SIGNS with more interest; and as I read the experimental part, it seemed so much like the way in which my mind had been led that my little hope began to brighten up, and gave me much encouragement. I began to feel that perhaps this was the people to which God in his providence was leading me. As yet I had never spoken to any one of my exercises, except to my husband. I did not want any one to know how I felt, for fear of persuasion. I desired to be guided only by the Spirit. I had already become so much of an Old School Baptist that I felt if it were indeed a work of the Spirit, he would carry it on. A Presbyterian lady said to me that she believed if I had certain privileges I would be brought out. I said to her that if the Lord had commenced the work in my heart, I believed he would carry it on. She asked me why I did not unite with some church. I told her I was waiting for the command, and when that was given I could no longer resist. For a time I seemed to stumble at Missionary Societies and Sabbath Schools, wondering why the Old School Baptists did not approve of them; and once I asked an Old School Baptist lady, but she could not seem to satisfy my mind. Not long after this I visited a sister on Staten Island, and went with her to Sabbath School. While listening to the superintendent, who would commend some for prompt attendance and perfect lessons, while the others looked down and seemed disappointed, these words came to my mind, This is the beginning of strife. Thus were all my idols removed, and my mind was directed to the Old School Baptists as God's dear people; and the more I read my Bible, the better confirmed I became; and as I read it, I felt there was no other denomination preached so like Paul, and O how my heart went out in love to them. It seemed to fill me with joy to be in their company and hear them speak of salvation by grace. I felt now that my mind was established, and that I could no longer doubt that they were the chosen, the elect, the meek and lowly followers of Christ. Now came the commandment, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." For a time I endeavored to drive such thoughts from my mind, feeling I was too unworthy to make a public profession, and wondering why I could not just as well be a christian out of the church. One Sunday morning at New Vernon I heard Elder Beebe preach on the taking of the cup of salvation. I sat eating and drinking of the food that I felt our heavenly Father had prepared for us, till he had nearly concluded his sermon, when my mind saw back over the past, and I thought of what words of comfort, encouragement and instruction I had received from his lips; and my heart was filled with gratitude at this thought. But suddenly a feeling of condemnation passed over me. The question arose in my mind, Is it not my duty to take of the cup of salvation? Was I not eating and drinking unworthily? This caused the tears to start, and I said in my heart, O Lord, be thou my guide, open thou the way, and I will do all thy pleasure concerning me. I now felt I could not leave the church without telling them of God's goodness and mercy to me, in leading me to them. But I saw no opportunity, so I went away, and lived in disobedience two years, while the still, small voice kept saying to me, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." It is not the washing away of sins, but the answering of a good conscience toward God. In the fall of 1867 we visited with Elder Beebe. He asked me some questions concerning the state of my mind, and ere I was aware I was telling him of my travels. He advised me to come before the church, which I did, with my husband, the next day, and was received. Although I felt too unworthy of their love and confidence, which they manifested to me, and still feel so, yet I ask you to bear with me, for I could feel at home with no other people. I feel that the Lord brought me up out of the land of Egypt, into my Father's house, and among my kindred in Christ; and that he that hath guarded and guided me in the past will keep me to the end.

I submit this to your better judgment. If you see fit to give it a place in our family paper, all will be right. If not, then it will be all right. I have thought of you all so much the past winter, and felt a desire to speak to you all, if I could not hear you speak.

From your unworthy sister, if one at all,

J. E. NICHOLS.

FIFTY-SIX YEARS A BAPTIST.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—To-day, September 30th, I wish to write a little for the SIGNS, if you will allow me space, and take a brief retrospective view of my poor, imperfect life as a Baptist.

Yesterday, the fifth Sunday in September, was the fifty-sixth anniversary of my baptism. Concord Church, Grayson Co., Ky., held her meetings on the fourth Saturday of each month; and September, 1833, came in on Sunday, so that the fourth Saturday and fifth Sunday came together. On Sunday, after a sermon by the venerable Martin Utterback, I tried to tell the church the reason of my hope; and although I was illiterate and very bashful, and could cry better than I could talk, yet I was received without a question being asked. We went directly to the little creek near by, and the old father in Israel baptized me; after which we returned to the old meeting-house and partook of the Lord's supper, followed by a mutual feet-washing, a practice with that church in those days about once each year, but communion oftener.

Two days of my life are especially memorable to me, viz., August 31st of that year, and September 29th. On the 31st of August, about 7 o'clock a. m., I date the revelation of the pardon of my sins, and neither my pen nor tongue can ever express the ecstatic joy of that hour and day; and the 29th of September, when I was allowed to meet with the saints, and was enabled to tell them in weakness what great things the Lord had done for me, and to be baptized, and to eat and drink at the Lord's table, and to join with the brethren in washing each other's feet—altogether, made this one of the most memorable days of my life. The day was clear and calm, my mind was at perfect rest, and sweet peace seemed to pervade my whole being, and I felt to say with the poet,

"What a mercy is this,
What a heaven of bliss,
How unspeakably favored am I!
Gathered into the fold,
With believers enrolled,
With believers to live and to die!"

Perhaps I shall never be any more happy this side of heaven than I was that calm, bright afternoon. All nature seemed to speak forth the wisdom, goodness and mercy of God, and my heart responded in praise to his holy name.

I honestly felt that evening that

"I could not believe
That I ever should grieve,
That I ever should suffer again."

But how little does the new-born babe know of human life, and how little did I then know of the pilgrimage through this world of sin and sorrow! If I have been led at all, it has been leading the blind in a way he knew not. I shall not attempt to describe in this brief review of my life as a Baptist, my many and diversified ups and downs, but shall give a brief account of my ministry only, with a few other items.

Soon after I was baptized, being then but turned into my nineteenth year, quite illiterate and bashful, I began to feel impressions to speak among the brethren, my main concern at that time being for the peace, order and prosperity of Zion, as new things were beginning to be propagated by men from the east. I spoke a little only occasionally among the people of God, having no idea of ever trying to preach, as that seemed to be out of the question for one so short-sighted and so illiterate as I was. I soon began to teach school in a kind of back-woods way, and followed it up for several years during the winter, working on the farm in the summer. January 22d, 1839, I was married to Miss Lucinda Lawson, who was a Baptist, and I now had new cares to burden my mind, as we had little to begin a living with.

My impressions to speak increased and troubled me much; and though I occasionally took some part in public worship, yet it was with much fear and trembling that I attempted it. A few months after my marriage the church where I was then connected seriously considered the propriety of withdrawing entirely from the United Baptists, on account of the religious schemes and inventions springing up among them; and when the vote of the church was called for I unhesitatingly voted to withdraw from that disorderly body, and we prefixed the word "Regular" to our name as Baptists. Families, churches and associations were divided, and many hearts were made to ache and grieve on account of those modern religious societies that caused the division; and the awful responsibility for these offenses rests not upon us who were forced to withdraw. I have not only never repented my withdrawal from the schemes of men in my early religious life, but I feel to thank the Lord that he led me to do so, and has kept me until now from being enticed and entangled by their traps. The war between the two classes of Baptists was kept up hotly for years, and I, feeling to be too little and weak to enter publicly into the conflict, tried to hide in some corner, so that I was not liberated by the church to exercise until February, 1844. I did not make any appointment for myself for two or three years after that, but would follow others around, and take some part frequently, much of my time feeling almost deranged in mind with trouble; and, in fact, if I could have been easy and quit, there were times I would have given all my little worldly property to have been rid of those impressions. I began finally to appoint meetings of my own, but was not ordained until May, 1853.

In 1855 I came to McDonough County, Ill., where I remain, seven miles northeast of Macomb. Since I became acquainted with the churches in central Illinois I have generally attended four churches monthly; one of them about thirty-two years, another thirty-one, another twenty-five, and another twenty-one, &c. After being a professor of religion for fifty-six years, I am, of choice and of necessity, a Baptist of the Regular or Primitive order; not because they are popular, numerous or wealthy, but because I believe them to be the people of God and the church of Christ, in contradistinction from all other organizations. Their doctrine and practice can be abundantly established by the standard of divine truth. I hope to live and die with them. If I am not awfully deceived, it has been for her sake and the glory of God that I have given the best part of my days and have sacrificed nearly all my worldly interests; yet I have nothing to boast of but the goodness of God. I am surprised at many things I have witnessed, and among them is the upholding and sustaining power of God in my behalf; and another is the remarkable forbearance with my weakness and imperfections which I have witnessed among my brethren and sisters in Christ. I have seen some things among our people that have caused me to mourn. I have seen, and yet see, both in the pulpit and through the press, that there is in some of our able brethren a spirit of restlessness and disposition to lead, and to establish a test of fellowship which the Bible does not authorize; a want, it seems to me, of christian forbearance toward them that are weak in the faith, who cannot comprehend the deep things of God. The little lambs are often alarmed, and made to wonder what the old and strong sheep are contending about.

The longer I live the more thoroughly am I convinced of some things. One is that I know but little of the mysteries of God. Another is that salvation is of the Lord; and if I am not saved by grace, I am lost forever. Another is, that my time here is short.

I. N. VANMETER.

MACOMB, Ill.

LEESBURGH, Va., Sept. 25, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN:—I take the liberty, without consulting with brother Broders, of sending you the within letter. If you think it worthy a place in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, publish it. Brother Broders wrote it only for my benefit, but I concluded that others should see it.

My dear brethren, I do beg that the Lord may be a shadow to you from the heat of the day, and a refuge from the storms of the night. I wish that I could write worth something, and I would do it. I love the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and I think I appreciate your labors, and sympathize more than ever with you in your noble effort to obey the Spirit's teaching, regardless of profit or loss.

Your brother, I hope,

E. V. WHITE.

ALEXANDRIA, Va., Sept. 18, 1889.

DEAR BROTHER WHITE:—Your letter of the 14th inst. was duly received, and read with interest and considerable thought. Your mention of prophetic editorials only confirms what has for several years been resting upon my mind and led me to believe that we are on the eve of an awful and thrilling evolution of time. There are many indications that mark the approaching event. Let us take a look at the spiritual and political world, and we will see indications that before many days or years will witness a drama that will make many hearts tremble and quake with fear. Take, for instance, the religious world in a body, and see if the prophecy of the apostle Paul is not evidently fast fulfilling to the very letter of the word; for in 1 Timothy iv. 1, 2, he says, "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron." The apostle here speaks as a prophet. He declares what shall be and come to pass, and says that the Spirit speaketh expressly. These last days are, as I understand, the Gentile days of salvation, which are rapidly drawing to a close. It has been about nineteen hundred years since the Roman empire was at its full growth and in its zenith of power and glory—we might say, on a full tide of earthly aggrandizement; for she then by her power ruled the world. It was in that time that Jesus, the Savior of sinners, made his advent into the world, took down the middle wall of partition, and made a highway for the Gentile Church, whereby they could claim the promises made unto the fathers in Israel. About three hundred years after that event, the saints, or followers of Jesus, being persecuted from post to pillar, a change took place in national power, and a new era set in. The Roman government in the days of Constantine, the emperor, by imperial edict protected the followers of Jesus by law; thereby, as I understand, he set up what is called in the Scriptures the leopard-colored beast, which looked very pretty and lamb-like in appearance. One might have thought he was a saint, and no harm in him; for he spake in kind words; and if it were possible he would have deceived the very elect.

The word beast, as used in the Scriptures, I understand is figurative, and means a spirit or controlling power which seeks its own aggrandizement and glory, both religiously and nationally, and is willing to make peace with God on its own terms, and also settle the accounts with the devil on satisfactory terms. We who know our own hearts and carnal nature have no trouble to describe him; for Paul says, "We all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh," &c.

Now this spirit, as I understand, is about in his full glory. He controls thrones, dominions and power on the earth. His heart is set for his own aggrandizement and glory. His great enemies on the earth are the followers of Jesus. They fail not to tell him the truth, and are witnesses against him, and stand in his way of carrying and accomplishing his purpose, which purpose is to seduce and deceive all the inhabitants of the earth. His inventions are as numerous as his spots, and his number is six hundred and sixty-six, which is the number of a man. His desire is that all the world shall have his number written on their vesture, else they will be counted out of society, out of religion and out of trade. It does seem that we can venture the assertion that the time is short. I think you will see his workings and the showing of his hand very soon in the halls of Congress and all our legislative bodies. You will, if I am not deceived, see laws introduced to carry out his designs. The "Blair Bill" is a precursor. It looks lamb-like, but is very deceitful. It strikes at the very foundation of state rights, and seeks centralization, or one-man power. It tells you what you shall do, and what you shall not do. It wants the political power, backed by the strong arm of the government, and then it will dictate its religious power, and say what kind of religion you shall worship. It seems to me that all the spots on this beast or spirit represent the different religious denominations on the earth; for he wears them as a covering.

Dear brother, I have rambled along with some of my thoughts upon this awfully sublime and momentous subject. Indications are plainly visible on every hand. The nations of the earth are preparing for battle. The armies of Gog and Magog are ready at a moment's notice to do the bidding of the spirit, and to make that peace which the world giveth. Not the peace of Jesus, but the peace of Cain. Cain's peace was to kill his brother and take his blood. That kind of peace has been going on ever since, from Abel down to the present time.

We see indications all through the country of religious meetings, advocating fire-arms to carry out political faith, under the name of religion; doing, as they say, God's service.

We will now leave the spirit of the world, and turn our eyes to the church of Jesus Christ. Paul says, "In the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils; having their conscience seared with a hot iron." It seems to me that we can see this prophecy fulfilled in our own household. The Old Baptist Church is not exempt from this seducing spirit, and are as liable to err as other people. The apostle says, "Some shall depart from the faith." O how often we find ourselves possessed of the spirit of Cain, and are jealous of our brethren, and say hard things about them. This alone is departing from the faith, and giving heed to seducing spirits. The Spirit of Christ is love, joy, peace, forbearance, and to do good to our enemies. But alas! I find within me a mind that when I would do good evil is present, and the good which I would I do not.

I fear I will weary you with reading my rambling, so I will close this part of the subject.

JOSEPH BRODERS.

STRONGHURST, Ill., Jan. 21, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I am now in possession of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES from the time your dear old father first commenced printing the paper to the present time. My old grandmother, Mrs. M. H. Cox, commenced taking the paper when it was first started, and my father and mother were never without the paper as long as they lived. As they lived a long way from any church they seldom heard any preaching; only what they got in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. Although they never made a profession of religion, they were firm believers of the Primitive Baptist doctrine. O that the unworthy writer were as fit a subject to leave these shores of trials and tribulations as my dear old father and mother were, whom I have followed to their last resting place.

Over fifteen years have passed away since I was buried in baptism with my Lord and Savior, and was raised to walk in newness of life.

O how crooked has been my walk! I have followed my Redeemer afar off, as he told his disciples when here on earth; so far, many times, that I could scarcely see them in the far distance. But blessed be his name, he has not forsaken me, though I have slumbered and followed him afar off, though darkness has gathered around my pathway, until the darkness was as black as the tents of Kedar. Out of all my sorrows and tribulations he has brought me, and I trust alone in Jesus, my blessed Lord, to carry me through.

My path is but a path of thorns, and my burden O how heavy! but that blessed little hope I received many years ago while at work in the field, on this very farm, still gives me strength. But pardon me, for my mind has carried me away, and I am encroaching upon your valuable time.

THE APOSTOLIC COMMISSION.

(Concluded from last number.)

DEAR BROTHER BEEBE:—Will you be so kind as to give your views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on Matthew xxviii. 19, 20? I hope an editorial on that subject would be very useful to a good many in this section who are inquiring after the right way.

Our dear aged brother, James Armstrong, is still living, though very feeble. His mind is at times almost gone; he cannot live much longer. A great man in Israel will soon be taken away.

Yours in the best of bonds,

REPLY.

"Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen."—Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.

"Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." The inspired apostles were not authorized to use their own discretion in the selection of what they should teach all nations to observe. Nothing less than the infinite wisdom of our Lord can originate that doctrine which is profitable to the saints whom he has purchased with his own blood. All that he has commanded his apostles they must teach the nations to observe; nothing must be added to that doctrine of God our Savior. "The law [or doctrine] of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple. The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes. The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring forever: the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether."—Psa. xix. 7-9. Any deviation from this perfect doctrine of God must detract from its perfection. Therefore the apostles are confined by the command of the Lord to teaching nothing but what they are commanded to teach. All doctrine which they have not taught is forbidden by our Lord. All that they have taught is established by the supreme authority of the Lord Jesus Christ. For this reason the saints are not at liberty to receive the decisions of religious councils or the schools of men, however highly esteemed for their wisdom, as authority in regard to the doctrine and order of the church of Christ. Nothing can be acknowledged as authority in this matter without the seal of the word of the Lord. He is our King. It is treason against him to confess allegiance to any other teacher. His dominion includes every one who loves him. They are not at liberty to be guided by their own reason in reference to what he has commanded, nor are they allowed to consult their own thoughts upon the propriety of rendering obedience to his directions. There is no exception to his law, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." In disregarding what Jesus has enjoined upon his disciples those who love him do as effectually deny him as did Peter when he was sifted as wheat. Every requirement of his law is fulfilled in following him. Not even the apostles could depend upon their own reason to direct them in the service of their Lord. They were dependent upon the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, whom Jesus promised them that the Father would send in his name, saying, "He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."—John xiv. 26. Thus they were by inspiration fully qualified to teach all nations to observe just what they were commanded to teach. In the instruction which is left on record by them, the saints have the complete rule by which they are to be guided under every circumstance which can possibly arise, even to the end of this temporal world. Nothing can ever be added to their perfect work in obedience to the commission given in our text; neither can anything be abrogated which is included in the law of Christ as they have bound it upon the nations for whose benefit it was given. It needs no argument to convince those who are led by the Spirit of God that his law is perfect, since it is written in their hearts by the Lord, in whom alone they have hope for deliverance from the bondage of sin, and for the inheritance of life and immortality.

It is of the utmost importance, therefore, to them who are taught of God, that they should find apostolic authority for every sentiment which they hold, and for every practice which they maintain. Without such evidence of its divine origin nothing can be accepted as in conformity with the doctrine of Christ. All that is included in the teaching of the apostles must be essential for "all nations" of those who love God "to observe." One prominent point in the doctrine which the apostles do teach is that every one of those should be baptized who believe with all their heart in the Lord Jesus as their only hope of salvation. However consistent with carnal reason may be the excuses for their disregard of the law of Christ in this matter, all who fail to confess him by this act of obedience in their action declare that they do not love him. In such rebellion it is not strange that they "dwell in a dry land."—Psa. lxxviii. 6. The Lord says to his people, "If ye be willing and obedient, ye shall eat the good of the land; but if ye refuse and rebel, ye shall be devoured with the sword; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."—Isa. i. 19, 20. The rebels among these nations, who are thus devoured, fall under that sharp, two-edged sword which goeth out of the mouth of him whose name is called The Word of God. Obedience to the law of Christ does not end with the confession of faith in him by following him in baptism. In every act and thought the law of Christ demands the whole heart of such as are called to be his disciples. This is their reasonable service, in view of the fact that they are bought with the precious blood of Christ. Love to the perfect righteousness of the Redeemer is manifested by walking in all his commandments. It is vain to profess that we are his disciples when in works we deny him. Obedience to him is not a matter of mere convenience. "This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works."—Titus iii. 8. No minister of Christ can be faithful to his calling unless he complies with this direction. The works which are required are clearly defined in the apostolic instructions given in the New Testament. Every one who names the name of Christ is to depart from iniquity.—2 Tim. ii. 19. This is included in the seal by which the foundation of God is identified. Not even the belief that "The Lord knoweth them that are his" constitutes this seal, if it does not produce the desire to be free from sin. Without the hatred of sin the belief of the truth is only that belief which produces trembling in devils.—James ii. 19. In those children who are obedient to the holy commandment of the Lord, it is God who works in them both to will and to do of his good pleasure. Such obedience cannot be mere servile compliance with legal demands. Unless the love of righteousness is the motive prompting their action, no service can prove that those by whom it is rendered are children of God. The judgment of God takes cognizance of the thoughts and intents of the heart, and not merely of the outward conduct of the professed followers of Jesus. Men cannot judge as the saints are judged of God. The heart of man is known only to infinite wisdom. What is highly esteemed among men in the action of others may be condemned in the just judgment of God because of the evil motive by which it is prompted; while that which is condemned even by the heart of the saint himself may be approved of God, who is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.—1 John iii. 20. Those who seek an excuse for continuing in sin thereby manifest that they do not hunger and thirst after righteousness. Only such as are led by the Spirit of God can hate their own life because they feel the law of sin in their members warring against the law of their mind, and bringing them into captivity to the law of sin which is in their members. All who know the plague of sin in their own hearts are certainly led by the Spirit of God; because sin cannot be oppressive to those who love it. Nothing but enmity against God can originate in the carnal mind, which is all the mind the natural man ever has. That mind is born of the flesh and is polluted with sin; the mind of the Spirit is holy, and all holy desires are inspired by that mind. The carnal mind cannot desire to love holiness, because it is enmity itself against God.

All desire for conformity to the law of Christ is produced by the Spirit of Christ which dwells in those who feel such desire. This is the doctrine which the apostles were commanded to teach. Every one who has that desire is included among the "all nations" to whom their commission extends. It is only carnal reason which suggests that a sense of personal unworthiness excuses from obedience any sinner who really desires to follow the Lord Jesus in the ordinances which he has appointed. There is no middle ground between the love of Christ and enmity against God. Jesus says, "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad."—Matt. xii. 30. "For he that is not against us is on our part."—Mark ix. 40. The command of Jesus is, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."—Matt. xvi. 24. This is the teaching of the apostles; all contrary teaching is in defiance of the law of our King. Doubtless many subjects of divine grace are held in bondage under the false doctrines of those who teach that none can observe the commandments of our Lord until they can feel themselves worthy to be numbered among the professed followers of the Redeemer. Such suggestions are in opposition to the commandment of our King. When God has wrought in any sinner the will to abhor himself in view of his own unworthiness and guilt, and to long for the perfect righteousness which is in Christ, he has already set his seal upon such a sinner as one whom he has chosen unto that salvation from sin which is revealed in Christ Jesus. Every spirit which opposes the testimony of this seal of the Holy Spirit is not of God; it denies the efficacy of the blood of Jesus in cleansing his people from all sin, since it requires the sinner to find in himself evidence of justification. Only that life in Christ which is the light of men makes manifest the vileness and pollution which is in the heart of the sinner. Consequently, it is unmistakable evidence of the presence of that life when consciousness of sin produces mourning under a realizing sense of the just condemnation of the holy law of God. Those who bear this mark are the mourners whom Jesus has blessed with the assurance that they shall be comforted. That blessing even now abides upon them. Such mourners constitute the nations to be taught by the apostles. When the inspired instruction is applied by the Spirit to them, they are taught to observe all things whatsoever the Lord has commanded his apostles to bind upon his church.

"And, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." In this confirmation of the teaching of his apostles our Lord forever prohibits the assumption of any who claim to be successors to their official authority. The presence of Jesus by his Spirit qualifies them to record his law in its application to every circumstance and condition which shall ever arise in his church while sojourning in this temporal state. The claim that any additional laws or decisions are needed is a denial of the perfection of the provision which is made by infinite wisdom for the guidance of his church, and is a denial of the infallibility of the law of Christ. From such infidelity all who love the Lord must shrink with horror. When any case arises in the church for which there seems to be no provision in the apostolic decisions, the fault is in our ignorance and blindness, and not in the perfect record by which the man of God is thoroughly furnished unto all good works. The presumption of carnal reason often leads the saints to attempt some improvement upon the perfect rule under the pretense of avoiding anticipated trouble. Such efforts always result disastrously, and the peace of the church is disturbed in consequence of the appeal from the decision which God has given, and the resort to the witchcraft of natural devices. It is always safe for the saints to stand still when they can find no direction in the Scriptures for their action. The Spirit of Christ is with the rule given by his apostles as much now as when they were personally present with the church. Under no circumstances can the church be safe in resorting to any course which is not authorized by the revealed record of their directions.

"Amen." This word is used in the discourse of our Lord and by his inspired servants only to express the solemn importance and immutability of that which is declared in connection with it. No word in the Scriptures is more impressive than this, by which our Lord emphasizes his indorsement of the action of his apostles to the end of the world. When the saints are led by the Spirit of truth they will always respond with a solemn Amen in approval of all that the judges in the Israel of our God have bound in the heaven of the law of Christ.

ISAIAH XLIV. 1-4.

"YET now hear, O Jacob my servant; and Israel, whom I have chosen: Thus saith the Lord that made thee, and formed thee from the womb, which will help thee; Fear not, O Jacob, my servant; and thou, Jeshurun, whom I have chosen. For I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground: I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring: and they shall spring up as among the grass, as willows by the water-courses."

At the request of our dear sister, Mrs. Lydia Mullock, of Middletown, N. Y., who is now in her ninety-sixth year, we will offer some thoughts upon the above Scripture.

An inspired apostle informs us that those things which were written aforetime were written for the learning of the people of God, that they through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope. The angel said to John (Rev. xix. 10), "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." The prophets testified of Jesus. "To him give all the prophets witness."—Acts x. 43. This Jesus is the anointed Savior of his people, his church, his body; and wherever he appears his church or body appears with him. They are never separated. Nothing can separate them.

When Jacob and Israel are spoken of in the prophecy the spirit of it is Jesus Christ and his seed. The name Jacob not only belonged to him as an individual, but also covered all his seed or posterity. Hence long after the death of Jacob as an individual, the Lord speaks to his descendants, and calls them all Jacob. The whole family in heaven and earth inherit the new name, the name of their God. "For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named."—Eph. iii. 14, 15. "And I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him my new name."—Rev. iii. 12. "One shall say, I am the Lord's; and another shall call himself by the name of Jacob; and another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord, and surname himself by the name of Israel."—Isa. xlv. 5.

Jacob and Israel are not two distinct individual persons, but are one and the same. Jacob simply received the new name, Israel; but Jacob was not changed, as a man. He had been brought into a new experience, and appeared in a new character, and therefore had a new name given him, which truthfully expressed his new situation and character; for names were given among the Hebrews and by the God of the Hebrews with respect to their peculiar signification. Thus names expressed the character of or circumstances connected with the individual bearing the names. "And Jacob was left alone; and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day. And when he saw that he prevailed not against him, he touched the hollow of his thigh; and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint, as he wrestled with him. And he said, Let me go, for the day breaketh. And he said, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me. And he said unto him, What is thy name? And he said, Jacob. And he said, Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel: for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed. And Jacob asked him, and said, Tell me, I pray thee, thy name. And he said, Wherefore is it that thou dost ask after my name? And he blessed him there. And Jacob called the name of the place Peniel: for I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved. And as he passed over Peniel the sun rose upon him, and he halted upon his thigh. Therefore the children of Israel eat not of the sinew which shrank, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day; because he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew that shrank."—Gen. xxxii. 24-32.

Jacob, the servant of God, is a type of Jesus, as a servant under the law. "Behold my servant, whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my Spirit upon him; he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles," &c.—Isa. xlii. 1; Matt. xii. 18. Jesus is called a "servant" and "elect," because he was chosen of God to fill the office of Mediator, &c., and accomplish the work the Father gave him to do, which work was under the law, for the redemption and salvation of his people, both Jew and Gentile. It is generally understood among men that when one is elected by the people, he is chosen to fill some particular office, and hence is called a "member elect." Jesus, the spiritual Jacob, was with his people under the law, and that was his name and their name as long as they were under the law together. "Now I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; but is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father. Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world: but when the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ."—Gal. iv. 1-7.

Behold our spiritual Jacob, God's servant, enduring the wrath of his brethren according to the flesh; as Jacob in the type fled before the wrath of his own brother Esau, because he had the blessing of his father Isaac, which Esau had despised and sold. Hear our spiritual Jacob upon the cross of Calvary, crying, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" ("And Jacob was left alone.") Jesus wrestles with the angel of God in the law, and prevails; for the Father, faithful to his promise, upholds and supports him. Hear David, as he personates him, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? why art thou so far from helping me, and from the words of my roaring? O my God, I cry in the daytime, but thou hearest not; and in the night season, and am not silent. But thou art holy, O thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel. Our fathers trusted in thee: they trusted, and thou didst deliver them. They cried unto thee, and were delivered: they trusted in thee, and were not confounded. But I am a worm, and no man: a reproach of men, and despised of the people. All they that see me laugh me to scorn: they shoot out the lip, they shake the head, saying, He trusted on the Lord that he would deliver him: let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him. But thou art he that took me out of the womb: thou didst make me hope when I was upon my mother's breasts. I was cast upon thee from the womb: thou art my God from my mother's belly. Be not far from me: for trouble is near; for there is none to help. Many bulls have compassed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round. They gaped upon me with their mouths, as a ravening and a roaring lion. I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint: my heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels. My strength is dried up like a potsherd; and my tongue cleaveth to my jaws; and thou hast brought me into the dust of death. For dogs have compassed me: the assembly of the wicked have inclosed me: they pierced my hands and my feet."—Psa. xxii. 1-16. Hear the testimony of an inspired writer to the Hebrews, "Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death, and was heard in that he feared; though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered; and being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him."—Heb. v. 7-9.

As a Prince he has power with God and with men, and has prevailed. His name is no more Jacob, but Israel; that is (see marginal reading), "a Prince of God." This is the "new name," which is not only the name of our dear Redeemer, but is also the name which belongs to and covers all the members of his body, all his seed, all his posterity, all his brethren, the seed that shall serve him, and be accounted to the Lord for a generation. "Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief: when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand. He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied: by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities. Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death: and he was numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors."—Isa. liii. 10-12.

How sweet and precious is the doctrine of the unity of Christ and his people, as there can be no salvation without it. They were one with him under the law, one with him in death, one with him in his resurrection and eternal glory.

"Twixt Jesus and the chosen race
Subsists a bond of sovereign grace,
That hell, with its infernal train,
Shall ne'er dissolve, or rend in twain.

"This sacred bond shall never break,
Though earth should to her centre shake;
Rest, doubting saint, assured of this,
For God has pledged his holiness.

"He swore but once, the deed was done,
'Twas settled by the great Three One;
Christ was appointed to redeem
All that the Father loved in him.

"Hail, sacred union, firm and strong!
How great the grace, how sweet the song!

That worms on earth should ever be
One with incarnate Deity!

"One in the tomb, one when he rose,
One when he triumph'd o'er his foes,
One when in heaven he took his seat,
While seraphs sang all hell's defeat.

"This sacred tie forbids their fears,
For all he is, or has, is theirs;
With him, their Head, they stand or fall,
Their life, their surety, and their all."

By the power of God, who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, all his seed, for whom he died, and whom he redeemed, shall be manifested by being born of the flesh and also of the Spirit, and be made experimentally acquainted with the work of Jesus in redemption. Their redemption is one thing, and their knowledge of that redemption is quite another thing. They are his by creation and formation. "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus," &c. "This people have I formed for myself: they shall shew forth my praise," says God. No circumstance can prevent their being formed in the womb and from the womb. Nothing can prevent their birth of the Spirit in the Lord's appointed time. Though scattered among all the nations of the earth, the Lord their God, the Holy One of Israel, will sift them out; for he says, "For, lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth."—Amos ix. 9. "I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west: I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back: bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth; even every one that is called by my name: for I have created him for my glory, I have formed him; yea, I have made him."—Isa. xliii. 5-7. As God reveals his salvation to them, they are made witnesses of God. "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, and my servant whom I have chosen; that ye may know and believe me, and understand that I am he: before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me. I, even I, am the Lord; and beside me there is no Savior. I have declared, and have saved, and I have shewed, when there was no strange god among you: therefore ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, that I am God. Yea, before the day was I am he; and there is none that can deliver out of my hands: I will work, and who shall let it?"—Isa. xliii. 10-13.

When God says to them, "Hear," then they hear, being quickened into life by his Spirit. "I said not unto the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain."—Isa. xlv. 19. "When thou saidst, Seek ye my face, my heart said unto thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek."—Psa. xxxvii. 8. As God finds them in the desert land, and waste howling wilderness, in a state of nature, he leads them about, and instructs them, and they are made to feel that their earthly nature is indeed a wilderness. Like Jacob, they must feel that they are alone. They must feel that they are lost, before they can know or appreciate God's salvation. They must feel that they are in a thirsty land, where no water is, and are ready to perish. They must know the wrath of God in his holy law, which Jesus endured when under the law, before they can know and rejoice in the truth that that wrath was turned away by the work of Jesus, who satisfied the law, magnified the law, and made it honorable. While wrestling with that law in their experience, hoping to obtain salvation by it, to be blessed by it, to be saved by it, but instead thereof feeling its curses pronounced upon transgressors, they are yet Jacob, and will confess that that is their real name or character, a miserable supplanter, a vile sinner, a wretch undone, without merit, without strength to satisfy the law; yea, like Jesus, they must die under that law—die to all hope of salvation by the deeds of the law. As Paul says, "I was alive once without the law; but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died." When touched by the finger of God as he appears in his holy law, the struggle ends with that poor Jacob; for he is too lame to wrestle longer, and will remain lame during the remainder of his pilgrimage. Like Jacob of old, all things appear to be against him, for God appears to be his enemy, and he cannot see how salvation can ever be his. He cannot see the hand or work of God in all his past painful experience with his sins and iniquities. He cannot believe that God will ever save such a weak, lame, miserable sinner as he is. If he appears so vile in his own eyes, how much more so must he appear in the eyes of that God who is all holiness. He cannot believe that the holy God could really love such a vile wretch, much as he now loves God and holiness. He says, "All these things are against me." But God has promised to pour water, to pour out of his Spirit, upon such thirsty souls; yea, floods of water, so that they shall not only drink, but bathe and swim in it. They shall not remember the former things, neither consider the things of old, when God's wonderful work shall be revealed to their joy. "Behold, I will do a new thing; now it shall spring forth; shall ye not know it? I will even make a way in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert. The beast of the field shall honour me, the dragons and the owls: because I give waters in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert, to give drink to my people, my chosen. This people have I formed for myself; they shall shew forth my praise."—Isa. xliii. 19-21. The salvation of God is revealed. Jesus is revealed as the end of the law for righteousness; and it is now seen how God can be just, and the justifier of an ungodly sinner. While Jacob has prevailed, it has been in Jesus, who as a Prince of God has power with God and with men, and has prevailed. Israel now says, as Israel in the type did, when he saw the purpose of God, "It is enough." God has provided salvation. "It is enough." "Let the inhabitants of the rock sing, let them shout from the top of the mountains. Let them give glory unto the Lord, and declare his praise in the islands."—Isa. xlii. 11, 12.

Jesus has prevailed, and has power with God and with men. He has power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father has given him. His is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever and ever. Amen.

How sweet and precious are the promises of God to his chosen Israel. "And they shall spring up as among the grass, as willows by the water-courses." They "shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season: his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper." "They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing; to shew that the Lord is upright. He is my rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him."

"Enough, my gracious God,
Let faith triumphant cry;
My heart can on the promise live,
Can on the promise die."

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Lexington Old School Baptist Association, to the several churches of which it is composed, sends greeting.

DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—Through the abounding goodness of our covenant-keeping God we have the privilege once more to meet in an associated capacity, and (as has been the custom of this association for about seventy years) to address you by way of a Circular Letter. We find in the writings of the apostle that their letters were directed to the brethren or churches, and to them only. Therefore at this time we will call your attention to Paul's letter to the Ephesian brethren, the sixth chapter and tenth verse; and we may also write upon some of the verses that follow in the same chapter. The tenth verse reads thus, "Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." We see how the apostle commences this letter, saying, "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God: to the saints which are at Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus." Here are brethren brought to view in this chapter who knew that what Paul told them was true, when he said to them, "The eyes of your understanding being enlightened, that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints, and what is the exceeding greatness of his power to usward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power."—Verse 18. And in this epistle he writes many things for their comfort and consolation, saying to them, in the second chapter, "For through him we both [Paul himself and the brethren] have access by one Spirit unto the Father." So, brethren, it is by this one Spirit that we, or the children of God, are to know the Spirit of truth or the spirit of error. It was by this one Spirit that Paul said to the brethren, "Ye are no more strangers." Why? Because the middle wall of partition that had been between them had been taken away. They became as one fold, or fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. It was the household that Paul was addressing when he said, "Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good." "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice. And be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted," &c.—Eph. iv. He also says to the same brethren, "Be ye therefore followers of God [not of men] as dear children, and walk in love." "But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not once be named among you, as becometh saints; neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting," &c. "Let no man deceive you with vain words [not truth]; for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. Be not ye therefore partakers with them." "Walk as children of light. For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness, and righteousness, and truth."

Now, dear brethren, how is it? Could we all receive the exhortation if Paul himself were present to-day, telling us the same? Would we endure chastening? If so, God dealeth with us as with sons. But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all the children are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons.—Heb. xii.

Now, brethren, these admonitions are as binding on the church now as they were on the church at Ephesus. And Paul says to the brethren (O may we receive the admonition), "And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them."—Eph. v. 11.

The sixth chapter commences by saying, "Children, obey." That is, comply with what Paul has been saying to you, to yield, and be in submission, and perform. "Obey them that have the rule over you." Peter says, "As obedient children." Paul says to them, "But ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you."—Rom. vi. 17. "Not with eye service, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart."—Eph. vi. 6.

Now Paul says, "Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord." In his letter to the saints at Philippi he says, "Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe. Beware of dogs, beware of evil workers, beware of the concision. For we are the circumcision which worship God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh."—Phil. iii. 1-3. And in speaking to the same brethren he says, "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." In his second letter to the Thessalonians he says, "Finally, brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified, even as it is with you: and that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men: for all men have not faith." "But ye, brethren, be not weary in well doing. And if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed."—2 Thess. iii. 1, 2, 13, 14.

Now, brethren, be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might. The Lord, speaking by the mouth of the prophet, says to them that are of a fearful heart, "Be strong, fear not: behold, your God will come." "He will come and save you."—Isa. xxxv. 4. The apostle says to the church at Corinth, "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, quit you like men, be strong."—1 Cor. xvi. 13. To Timothy he says, "Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus."—2 Tim. ii. 1. David said, "Sing unto the Lord, O ye saints of his." "Lord, by thy favor thou hast made my mountain to stand strong."—Psa. xxx. 4, 7. The Savior told his disciples to say, "For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever." We hear Paul saying, "Whereof I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by the effectual working of his power."—Eph. iii. 7. "That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God."—1 Cor. ii. 5. Hear what Pilate said to the Savior: "I have power to crucify thee, and I have power to release thee." Jesus answered him, saying, "Thou couldst have no power at all against me except it were given thee from above."—John xix. 10, 11.

Then Paul says to the brethren, "Put on the whole armor of God." The armor spoken of here is very useful for those whom the Lord has chosen to be his soldiers. Paul says that by it "ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil."

Brethren, may we rejoice in this, that the armor, the sword and shield, are not received from the governments of this world, but from him of whom we read, that of the increase of his government there shall be no end.

In conclusion, brethren, may we ever march under the banner of our King, having our loins girt about with truth; and above all, taking the shield of faith; and taking the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.

"Fear not, brethren, joyful stand
On the borders of your land;
Christ, your Father's elder Son,
Bids you undismayed go on.

"Lord, submissive make us go,
Gladly leaving all below;
Only thou our Leader be,
And we still will follow thee."

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Lexington Old School Baptist Association, in session with the Gilboa Old School Baptist Church, Schoharie Co., N. Y., Sept. 18th and 19th, 1889, to the associations and meetings with which we correspond, sends love and fellowship.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Through the mercy of our covenant-keeping God we have the privilege of assembling again in an associate capacity. The churches composing the Lexington Association have mostly or all been represented by letters and messengers. Not many have united by baptism or letter during the past year. You will see by our Minutes that some of the churches have reported exclusion, as they did last year, in consequence of a departure from the gospel rule and order as given in the New Testament. But we are glad to know that although we be reduced down, like Gideon's army, those who remain are satisfied with the Articles of Faith and doctrine that we have tried to maintain for over sixty years, and to keep in view the old landmarks, and to keep the unity of the faith in the bond of peace. Our association has been very harmonious, and the presence of the Lord has been manifest, we think. Your Minutes notify us of your continuance of correspondence, which have been gladly received. We most earnestly desire a continuance of your correspondence, hoping at our next session to have a greater number of your messengers with us, which will be held, if the Lord will, with the Clovesville Church, near Griffin's Corners, on the Ulster and Delaware Rail Road, in Delaware Co., N. Y., on the third Wednesday and Thursday in September, 1890

The Redstone Old School Baptist Association, in session with Redstone Church, Fayette Co., Pa., Aug. 30th, 31st and Sept. 1st, 1889, to the associations with whom she corresponds, sends greeting in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Your messengers came to us in the fullness of the gospel of Christ, testifying of the power, of the wisdom, of the love, and of the grace, of our God, as they are manifested through the Holy One of Israel, making us to rejoice in the name of our God. Our meeting has been harmonious, for which we desire to thank God, who in mercy hath blessed us with his spiritual presence. We earnestly desire a continuance of your brotherly correspondence, and may God bless us together in our annual meetings, so that love, peace and joy will prevail throughout our borders.

Our next association will be held, if the Lord will, with the Indian Creek Church, Monongalia Co., W. Va., on Friday before the first Sunday in September, 1890, at eleven o'clock a. m.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

BROTHER MOSES G. JOHNSON was born in Kentucky, April 16th, 1804, and died Aug. 1st 1889. He resided in Hamilton Co., Ill., for sixty-four years, and was married to Miss Martha A. Brown about Sept. 2d, 1828, who experienced a hope early in life, and died October 11th, 1875. Sister Johnson was a member of the Regular Baptists in good standing for more than forty years. Brother Johnson received a hope in 1870, and joined the Regular Baptist Church at Little Spring in October of the same year. Many times has the dear old saint gladdened our hearts, his theme being redeeming grace. Often have we seen tears of joy coursing down his cheek, from his almost sightless eyes, as he dwelt upon the theme of God's love to poor, unworthy mortals. But our dear old brother, we believe, has gone to that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. May the God of all grace comfort his dear children and grandchildren, with the church of which he was a member, is the prayer of an afflicted old brother in hope of a better life.

W. W. GAYLE.

BROUGHTON, Ill.

DIED—Bertie James Wissimer, son of Malcomb and Rhoda Wissimer, of Jersey Shore, Pa., aged four years and one month.

His disease was erysipelas and blood poisoning. He was a remarkably bright and very affectionate little boy. He was visiting his grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. James Lamison, of Cammal, Pa., when he was taken sick and died. His parents, grandparents and friends generally feel deeply the loss of the dear one; but God saw fit in mercy to remove him from a world of sickness, pain, sin and sorrow to a world of glory and peace. May the same hand that has taken the child deal out grace to the afflicted, enabling them from their hearts to say, "Thy will, not mine, be done."

"Little Bertie, thou hast left us,
And our loss we deeply feel;
But 'tis God who hath bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal."

The writer tried to speak a few words of comfort to the living on the occasion of the funeral.

D. M. VAIL.

WAVERLY, N. Y.

By the request of Mount Zion Church, I send you for publication a brief obituary notice of our dearly beloved sister in the Lord, Sephia Cooper, who was born in the state of Pennsylvania in 1810, and moved to this state and county about the year 1859 or 1860. On the second Sunday in October, 1867, she came before the above-named church, giving a bright evidence of having received a new heart, and was unanimously received for baptism. She was baptized by Elder R. M. Simmons in the fellowship of the church, where she lived a faithful and dutiful member until her death.

As a shock of corn fully ripe, being in her seventy-eighth year, she was called away from her earthly home February 11th, 1889, to enter that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. The deceased leaves a daughter-in-law (sister Angeline Cooper) and two grandsons, as well as the church, to mourn their loss; but, blessed be the name of the Lord, they mourn not as those who have no hope.

The poor, feeble writer, by request, endeavored to speak on the subject of death and the resurrection, at the April meeting of the church, to a large and solemn audience. May the good Lord enable the bereaved relatives, brethren and sisters to live and walk as did our dear mother in Israel.

ASSOCIATIONAL.

THE Salisbury Old School or Predestinarian Baptist Association will be held this year, providence permitting, with the church at Messongo, Accomack Co., Va., commencing on Wednesday after the third Sunday in October.

Brethren, sisters and friends, we extend to you a cordial and unlimited invitation to come and mingle with us. Although this is the extreme southern point of the association, still at this time it is quite convenient to the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk R. R., about two miles from the station. We will endeavor to demonstrate to you the warmth of southern hearts naturally, and we trust a still deeper warmth spiritually. We do not wish to personate nor to show partiality, but we want that man known as Elder Wm. Grafton to give us the pleasure of his presence, which will be a treat to our people. Brethren in the ministry in general, try to think how we will appreciate your visit, and come.

Those coming by rail will get tickets for Hallwood station, arriving at that place from the north on Tuesday before the meeting, between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon and about 6 o'clock Wednesday morning. Those coming will please drop me a card, so that the friends will know how many teams to have. My address is New Church, Accomack Co., Va. I want Elders Beebe and Jenkins to get tickets for New Church, and spend the first night with me at my house. Please drop me a card.

T. M. POULSON.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

LINES

ON THE BROOKFIELD MEETING-HOUSE,
ORANGE CO., N. Y., ERECTED 1792.

Air—"Bonny Doon."

ALONE upon the hill it stands,
Where it was reared so long ago
By pioneers who tilled the lands,
Those sons of toil of ninety-two.
Though winds have blown these many years,
And storms have beat and shook its frame,
The old house stands with towering spire,
A monument of olden time.
The people came from miles around
To worship in this ancient place,
Where Lathrop did the word expound,
Inspired by faith in sov'reign grace.
And here bold Caton did proclaim
God's everlasting truth and love;
And wonder Sweet, Ball sang the same,
This old-time meeting-house and ground,
Could they but speak, might volumes tell;
Those time-stained walls did oft resound
With songs of praise or funeral knell.
But they who sang or mourned their dead
In days gone by are heard no more;
While others worship in their stead,
From time to time, as they of yore.
Though many years have come and gone,
That pulpit stands with Bible crowned;
The flight of time keeps rolling on,
Those by-gone days will ne'er return.
Blow, blow, ye winds, bend low, ye trees,
Ye poplars tall of Lombardy,
Bear the sweet vesper on the breeze,
Praise God, the all-wise Deity!

JERUSALEM.

JERUSALEM! I love the sound!
It comes to me so dear!
When shall we all her beauties see,
When freed from sin and care?
O tune our hearts, thou heavenly Dove,
To sing in joyful lays
The love of God to Israel's race
From everlasting days.
Once by the law condemned I stood,
But grace my soul set free;
While here I ne'er can fully know
What God has done for me!
Oft since that happy period, Lord,
Dark clouds thy face have hid,
And naught but love and power divine
Fresh light and joy can give.
When gloomy doubts and fears arise,
And eyes with tears o'erflow,
A broken heart thou'lt not despise,
When pain'd by sin and woe.
O may I be submissive, Lord,
Beneath thy chastening rod,
As all things together working are
For me and for my good.
Thy mercies great from day to day,
Their number who can count?
When low down in the valley dark,
Or high upon the mount.
And may a sinner vile as I
Dare hope in heaven to appear?
Yes; thou hast made me hope that I Shall meet in glory there.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PLYMOUTH, Ill., Sept. 25, 1889.

DEAR BROTHER BEEBE:—As I have been requested to write a little for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, I now make the attempt. In the first place, I must tell you of the blessed privilege we have had in receiving a visit from our much esteemed Elder Pollard, from St. Joseph, Mo., with whom I had never met before, but had so often heard old brother Jacob Castlebury speak of in years gone by, as being a noble workman in the cause of Christ. He said he prayed the Lord to bless him and his labors all the days of his life. I have ever since wanted to see and hear him, and am thankful it has pleased the Lord to send him here among us, at our dear little church called Providence, and to hear him proclaim the gospel in its purity, rightly dividing the word of truth. I hope we may meet him again in the near future, and also any of the ministers who may favor us with a call whenever an opportunity offers. We are always ready and willing to wait upon them.

Now I must tell you that I had the privilege of attending the Bear Creek Association, and I feel constrained to tell you how I was built up while listening to the voices of God's dear ministers, proclaiming the gospel in its purity. It was all of Christ and him crucified. I felt it was good to be there. I felt to say, "I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste." One brother asked me if I got it all. I asked him what made him think I got it all, and he said that I looked like I was about to take my flight upward, and leave the shores of time. I do not know how I looked, but I felt like my cup of joy was full; and I hope it will be my happy privilege to meet with them often while tabernacled here below; and nothing would give me more pleasure than to welcome each one at my own house. Never can I forget the kindness and hospitality of those by whom I was entertained while there, nor the many dear brethren, sisters and friends I met with from all parts of the country, and many of whom I had seen before. But those I met for the first time did not seem as strangers, for every one felt near and dear to me. It seemed to me they were all of one mind. I shall never forget the many happy hours spent at this association. The tears and sweet songs, conversation and much joy, that were witnessed there will remain with me while it is mine to live. I had the pleasure of hearing several of the "poor of the flock" tell how much they enjoyed the meeting, and said they would love to come into the fold, but are waiting for brighter evidences. But while poor in their own resources, being unable to find anything in themselves whereon to predicate a claim to the favor of God, and so utterly robbed of consolation by their conferring with carnal reason that they scarcely dare claim a hope in Christ, yet they are still the cherished objects of their heavenly Father's love, and the Scriptures are full of encouragements and comfort peculiarly adapted to their helpless condition. They feel very poor and needy, and that is the very condition requisite to constitute them rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom which God has promised them that love him. He says, "If ye love me, keep my commandments."

I would rejoice to know that they have done the duty they owe to their God, in taking his yoke upon them; for he says, "My yoke is easy, and my burden is light." The first blessing mentioned in the sermon on the mountain applies to such as they feel themselves to be. "Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." This highly favored and peculiarly blessed people alone can claim the exceeding great and precious promises which are left on record for the saints. They will apply to none others. So that while in themselves they are not only poor, but entirely destitute and helpless, in Christ they have all riches of imperishable treasures in heaven. If by referring to their own experience, or to the inspired Scriptures, I shall be able to minister comfort to any of these poor ones, even as only a cup of cold water in this desert land through which we journey, this writing will not have been in vain. But why should I attempt it, who cannot comfort myself when cast down by trials and troubles, of which I have had almost more than I could bear? If it had not been for a higher power than man, I would have sunk beneath my load; for I have been bereaved of all my family except one dear and only son. My husband dear, who was my support, was taken away, and I was left alone to battle as best I could in this unfriendly world, with no one to help me but one little boy. I felt like I could not do it; and if I ever prayed in my life, I prayed then for the Lord to graciously support me in that trying hour. I think he answered it, for he has prospered me in all my undertakings ever since, both in basket and in store. But I have just as little faith in myself as I ever had. Perhaps it would be as well for me to write to the poor of the flock something of my own poverty, which is so extreme that there is not one good thing I can claim credit for in all my deeds and thoughts. Although eleven years have passed away since my name was recorded as a member of the visible church of Christ, all that time I have been a poor, halting, doubting, unworthy sinner; for it seems to me there is none so vile as I. When I was younger, and at my father's house, we would get the work done up on Sunday morning, and my father and mother would sit down to read, one with the Bible, and one with the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, which my father always took, since my earliest recollection. He has grown old, and his eyesight is dim, and he does not read much any more. There is one thing that makes me feel my unworthiness; for when I would come into the room and see them reading their blessed Bible, I would wish it were destroyed. I did not want to read it, nor did I want them to read it. There was no comfort in it for me. He has been a member of the church for over fifty years, and he delighted in nothing better than to read his Bible. So did my mother also; but she has gone to her reward some fourteen years ago, while father is here yet, waiting his summons to come. His name is David Grove. Many of the readers of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES know him well.

In thinking over the past I am often led to exclaim, O wretched one that I am! When a ray of hope and light has gleamed upon my path, it has been when my own merits were entirely forgotten in the contemplation of the sovereign mercy of God. The whole history of my life as a professed disciple of Christ may be comprised in the single word poverty, being too poor in the very outset to claim any merit as a palliation of the sinfulness and rebellion which clearly proved the justice of my condemnation. All my hope and all my salvation then was in the sure mercies of David. Then I hoped to live as a saved sinner should live, in obedience to the commands of my Lord and Master, in whose blood alone I trusted for salvation. But my poor soul has had to mourn, from that day till this, its vileness and continual proneness to wander from God. In vain might I endeavor to express the depth of my own depravity, even though I should write the remainder of my days on the subject. Therefore, from what is already stated, my companions in poverty must estimate the deplorable nature of my destitution. The prophet Zechariah was moved by the Holy Ghost to speak a very comforting assurance to the poor of the flock, which is on record for our learning. After denouncing fearful judgments determined against those nominally connected with those poor ones, the promise is given by the Lord God himself, saying, "And I will feed the flock of slaughter, even you, O poor of the flock." How mindful is our loving Lord of these chosen poor! While he reproves kings for their sakes, saying, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm," these poor ones are protected by the angel of his presence. And as they do not depend upon human protection for preservation, but are kept by the power of God, it is certain beyond a doubt that they shall all come into the full enjoyment of this glorious inheritance at the very instant appointed by the Father. But they are troubled, and tossed with doubts and fears, while they remain in this dark wilderness; because their Father has ordained that the just shall live by faith. Carnal reason demands to see the way; but God says, "I will bring the blind by a way they knew not." Therefore, all efforts to reduce spiritual things to the natural comprehension, even of the saints themselves, must ever be unavailing. This carnal caviling is not a new thing with the saints. Philip seemed to be troubled with it when he would see the Father; and Thomas was very firmly determined to satisfy his natural reason, when he would have the evidence both of his eyes and feeling, before he would believe that his Lord still lived. But in both these cases, as in yours, dear, doubting child of God, it was only needful that Jesus should speak to them, and faith triumphed over their unbelief, causing them to forget their reasoning, and at once to claim Jesus, not only as the Lord of life, but as personally their Lord and their God. O what a glorious and wonder-working voice is that of Jesus!

"It breaks the power of reigning sin;
It gives us day for night;
Makes drops of sacred sorrow rise
To rivers of delight."

Remember, it is written, "My God shall supply all your needs, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus." Look to him for the supply promised, and cease to seek in yourself that holiness which never was found anywhere else but in Christ. Cast all your care upon the God of your salvation, for he cares for you. I fear that many of the poor of the flock are living out of gospel privilege because they feel too poor within themselves to claim a place in the church of Christ. Has not God called that very description of characters to the gospel feast? Why will you deny yourselves the delightful privilege of enjoying the sweets of obedience? It is at once the duty of all the poor of the flock to go their way forth by the footsteps of the flock; or, to speak without a figure, all who feel that they have no righteousness of their own, have a right to claim an interest in the righteousness of Jesus; and the only requisite to qualify a sinner for a place in the church of Christ is to desire that place rather than all the allurements of the world. This desire can only spring from love; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God.—1 John iv. 7.

With kindest regards for every one of the poor of the flock, I remain, as ever, less than the least of all,
MRS. BELLE IRWIN.

SCALESVILLE, Ind., Sept. 8, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Bear with me, a poor old sinner saved by grace (if I have any right to claim salvation at all), while I attempt to write a few things to the dear little ones which compose the family or church of the living God. My mind is drawn to the words of our Savior to his twelve disciples, recorded John vi. 66, 67, "From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him. Then said Jesus unto the twelve, Will ye also go away?"

It appears from the Scriptures that at the time when Jesus was here on earth, clothed in flesh, he had many followers, some for one object, and some for another. Some, it appears, followed him on account of the miracles which they saw him do, and some followed him for the loaves and fishes, that they might satisfy their appetites, no doubt. Some, no doubt, verily thought they believed his doctrine, and that he was the Messiah, and would save the world from the plagues of famine, sickness, distress, &c. See how they brought their sick, lame, blind, &c., to him, that he might heal them. But he began to say unto them, "Moses gave you not that bread from heaven; but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. Then said they unto him, Lord, evermore give us this bread." And he said unto them, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." "Many therefore of his disciples, when they had heard this, said, This is a hard saying; who can hear it?" Jesus, knowing all things, knew their murmurings, and said to them, "Doth this offend you? What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where he was before? It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing." The bread that they craved or wanted was not the bread which Jesus was speaking of (the bread of eternal life), but was natural bread, to sustain natural life. "Evermore give us this bread," so that we may not have to toil in the field and earn our bread by the sweat of our faces; that we may spend our time in play and idleness, and enjoy the pleasures of this world. Jesus answered and said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves and were filled." This people knew not the mission of the Son of man into the world; neither did they know him in the Spirit. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

We think we can see plainly the cause of their going back and walking no more with Jesus. It was because the Father, which had sent him, had not drawn them. They had not been born from above, and did not hunger for that bread of life which Jesus was speaking of. They knew nothing of hungering and thirsting after righteousness, but only knew to hunger and thirst after natural food and drink. "How can this man give us his flesh to eat?" "These are hard sayings; who can hear them?" The natural mind cannot. "For the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." There are people to-day professing to be followers of the Savior, and for the same purpose—the loaves and fishes. Tell them that man is totally depraved, and has neither will nor power to extricate himself from his fallen and depraved condition, in which Adam placed all his posterity by his disobedience ("By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned"), and they will tell you that they do not worship such a God as that; that the god they worship makes man a free moral agent, so that man can turn to God at any time; and the Adamic sinner that you speak of, they say they know nothing about. Who ever knew of a man repenting for Adam's sin? Stop and think for one moment. How did you come into existence? Where did you come from? Are you anything more or less than Adam in a multiplied form or state? He is the father and progenitor of all the human family. Therefore you sinned in him. That is, sin is imputed to the last one of his posterity. Therefore you do not repent for Adam's sin, but for your own; you having your standing in him, and receiving your life from him, or in him. And just so with the spiritual generation; they all have their life in the Lord Jesus Christ, their spiritual head and progenitor, their Lord and their God, their Redeemer, who gives them while here in this time state the spirit of adoption, which makes them at times rejoice in hope of the adoption, to wit, the redemption of their body.

I will try to show the contrast between the two families spoken of in the Bible, each family separate and distinct, from the first chapter of Genesis to the last chapter of Revelation; but I can only speak of a few of the more prominent, distinguishing marks, and let it suffice.

The Pharisees in the days of the Savior made the loudest pretensions of any people. They loved to pray standing on the corners of the streets, that they might be seen of men. I will here say that there is no difference in the natural or human family, from the time that Adam sinned until now, nor will there be till the end of time. The Pharisees of to-day do the same as those of old. They love to be seen of men, and to have the praise of men of this world.

But see what a striking difference there is between them and the spiritually minded man when he prays. He seeks the most secluded spot available, the grove, the closet, &c., and prays to God in secret, with groanings which cannot be uttered. The Pharisee chooses the uppermost seat in the synagogue, where he may be conspicuous. The child of God says, Let me have the most humble place among you, if you judge me worthy of a name and place among you. Let me be at your feet, like Mary in the days of Jesus, who washed his feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head.

The Pharisees of to-day love to say long and loud prayers, using vain repetitions, which they have learned out of what they call prayer books, or by hearing others repeat them. But how is it with the child of God? O, says the poor child, I feel too unworthy to let my voice be heard in public prayer. And should I attempt it, I know that any memorized repetition of words that I might repeat would only be mockery, and I would be hypocritical, which I do not wish to be. For certain I am that if God does not indite the prayer he will not answer it.

The Savior, speaking of the sheep and the goats, says, "And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world: for I was a hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee a hungered, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me. Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels: for I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me not in: naked, and ye clothed me not: sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. Then shall they also answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee a hungry, or athirst, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and did not minister unto thee? Then shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal."—Matt. xxv. 33-46. Those on his right hand feel so weak, so little, so unworthy, they can hardly be persuaded that they are capable of doing one good act, as they see so much corruption within; while those on the left hand boast of the good works they have done, and are still doing, and are determined to do.

I might speak of many more things, to show the distinction between the two characters, but will let this suffice for the present.

"Will ye also go away?" "The time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables."—2 Tim. iv. 3, 4. Has it not already come among us? Brethren with whom we once stood, and who seemed to be of one mind, and were ready to contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints, have strangely gone back, and walk no more with us, saying that the doctrine of the predestination of God in all things and all events is a hard saying, and who can hear it? They seem to think that God has two wills—one a positive will, and the other a permissive will.

Now, brethren, have you thought for a moment what a strange God this would be, having two wills? By his positive will some things are made unalterable, fixed, sure, and cannot be moved, altered or amended; while by his permissive will all things that are not made sure, fixed and unalterable by his positive will are left to run on in a hap-hazard or chance way; so that they may happen to work or turn out as will please God, or they may happen to work or turn out so that they will please Satan; or they may so turn out that they will partly please one, and partly please the other; or those things that are not decreed as to the station they are to fill may possibly take the helm into their own hands, and so steer their course as to overthrow the powers that be, and overthrow all decrees, and establish laws, and set up the chance system. O, my brethren and friends, can you have any consolation in worshipping such a God as that? Do you not see how uncertain your salvation would be? Would you not rather have the God of the Bible, who says, "I am God, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed?" He speaks, and it is done; he commands, and it stands fast. "I am the Lord, and there is none else; there is no God besides me." "I form the light, and create darkness: I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things." "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker." "Let God be true, and every man a liar."

Yes, says some dear little one, I know that God is a Sovereign, and works all things after the counsel of his own will, and none can stay his hand, nor say unto him, What doest thou, Jehovah? but the doctrine of God's predestination of all things seems to be a hard doctrine to reconcile with the natural understanding; and men will contend that it makes God the author of sin, and I am puzzled to give them an answer. Tell them to read the Bible, and search it diligently; and if they can find any power that is superior to the power of God, or find any creature that was or is created that the Lord did not create, let them show it to you. "For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him and for him."—Col. i. 16.

"Will ye also go away?" Cannot every heaven-born soul answer, with Peter, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God." Let the world have their gods, which have no fixed and permanent laws, no foreknowledge, and are never certain of anything, but are dependent upon poor, fallen and depraved man for the number of souls they will have to praise them, and they in return praise their votaries for their partnership work. Jesus said of some, "Ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any (man) pluck them out of my hand. My Father, which gave them me, is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are one."—John x. 26-31.

"Will ye also go away?" Will ye turn again to the weak and beggarly elements of the world, and say that the field is not large enough, or the grass grows higher in other pastures? Will ye, for the sake of filthy lucre, deny the only true and living God, turn in with antichrist, and fight against the Lord's people, a remnant according to election, a people saved by grace, which is the only salvation spoken of in the Bible?

From one of the least of all saints, if a saint at all.

"Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"—Acts xxvi. 8.

God was God in eternity, before time, a perfect and holy Deity, knowing all things so accurately that nothing new nor old could ever appear to him. He created all things out of nothing, and spread out the north over the empty place. He measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, meted out heaven with the span, comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in the balance. Behold, he taketh up the isles as a very little thing. He sent forth springs in the valleys, and cutteth out rivers among the rocks. He made a decree for the rain, and a way for the lightning of thunder. By watering, he wearied the thick cloud, and scattereth the bright cloud. He turns them about by his counsel, that they may do whatsoever he commandeth them upon the face of the world in the earth. He holds the wind in his fist. He sends lightning, that they go and say, Here we are. He said, "Let there be light, and there was light." He commands, and it is done; he speaks, and it stands fast.

He made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind; the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea, and every creeping thing that moveth upon the earth. He garnished the heavens by his Spirit, and his hand hath formed the crooked serpent. He is of one mind, and who can turn him? And whatsoever his soul desireth, that he doeth. He created the earth to be inhabited, and hath of one blood made all nations of men, to dwell upon the face of all the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation. He declared the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." He doeth whatsoever seemeth him good, in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, nor say to him, What doest thou? He made all things, he knows all things, he upholds all things, and works all things after the counsel of his own will. He is before all things, and by him all things consist. "For of him, and to him, and through him, are all things." He is God of gods, Lord of lords, and King of kings. He is Alpha and Omega, the first and the last, and there is nothing too hard for the Lord. "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"

"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. For verily he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham. Wherefore in all things it behooved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people." He was made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. He was made of the seed of David according to the flesh. He was born of the virgin Mary, and wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger. From thence he was taken down into Egypt, and from thence to Nazareth of Galilee, where he grew to manhood; and at the age of about thirty years he was baptized of John in Jordan. "Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil;" after which he went forward to do the works of God. He preached the gospel to the poor, healed the sick, cleansed lepers, cast out devils, and raised the dead, for the space of about three years. He was then betrayed into the hands of the wicked, was tried and condemned to death. He was scourged, mocked and spit upon. He was nailed to the cross, and gave up the ghost in death. He was taken down, and laid in Joseph's new tomb. His enemies sealed his grave, and put a guard over it. "But God raised him from the dead;" after which he was seen of witnesses chosen before of God, who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead; and he was seen many days of them which came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem. After that he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once. After that he was seen of James, then of all the apostles. He was then received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. "Without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." Then "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"

"And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first." "But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" Inspiration says, "It is raised a spiritual body." "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." This death and resurrection is the gate or door through which we enter completely into the inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away; reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time. "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"

All who are familiar with the Scriptures know that the text quoted at the head of this writing is the language of Paul to Agrippa, who must have been related in some way to that sect of the Jews who were skeptical concerning the resurrection of the dead. Paul knew that the resurrection was one of the essential principles of the doctrine of God our Savior, and he defended it with great zeal, among both Jews and Gentiles. A denial of the resurrection is an unpardonable sin in the church, as it overthrows the faith and saps the foundation of the hope of the saints. They are all waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of their bodies, and have this hope as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and that entereth into that within the vail, whither the forerunner hath for us entered, even Jesus, made a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec. "For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren."

The resurrection is an inexhaustible subject, and I cannot reach it in all its fullness. I have had some pleasant meditations upon this subject, and felt impressed to write some; but I cannot portray what I have felt of the joy in such hope. I wish I could. Some kind of tear steals down my cheek while I write. I cannot express it; but those who have had such, know of it.

Brethren editors, I have to depend upon the judgment of the brethren when I speak to decide whether I speak according to the word or not; and I have to depend upon your judgment as to whether I write according to the word or not. I hope you will look over this carefully; and if you print this, I hope the readers of the SIGNS who are strong are taught to bear the infirmities of the weak. I often have to wonder if I am a sheep at all. If I am, I am one of the least of all.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—In the editorial of the SIGNS for Sept. 18th you request others to write on the questions propounded by brother Monroe, of Texas; and to-day I feel like presenting some thoughts in connection with faith, belief, &c., that have occurred to my mind from time to time. My understanding has been that faith is one thing, and belief another, although I know they are very closely connected. But I think it possible that faith may exist where belief does not. In Acts xiv. 8, 9, it is stated that "At Lystra there sat a man impotent in his feet, being a cripple from his mother's womb, who never had walked. The same heard Paul speak; who steadfastly beholding him, and perceiving that he had faith to be healed," &c. There are other places in the New Testament of similar import; and it seems to me that "being healed" here is equal to belief, as much as to say, He had faith to believe. My idea is that faith is a necessary prerequisite to belief. The apostle defines faith to be "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." "For by it [faith] the elders obtained a good report," &c. I believe that the faith that enables a sinner to believe in Jesus Christ comes by revelation only; and that not the mere letter of the word, but a revelation of the power and Spirit of God. "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." This revelation produces faith, and this faith produces belief in Christ Jesus, as "the way, the truth, and the life," and as the only name "under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." But it seems to me that there are different kinds of faith mentioned in the Scriptures. We know that the Scriptures teach that there are degrees in faith. For instance, we have "great faith," "little faith," "strong faith," and "weak faith." However, I cannot believe that there is any difference in the strength or the magnitude of that faith which comes by revelation in our first experience, when Christ is revealed to us and in us, the "hope of glory." That faith is of sufficient strength and magnitude to enable each one of the happy recipients of God's grace to believe in Jesus. Hence the terms "great faith," "little faith," "strong faith," and "weak faith," must have reference to the amount of confidence we have in the promises of God after our deliverance from the power of darkness, and translation into the kingdom of God's dear Son. The apostle says in one place that "All men have not faith." From this I infer that there are subjects of God's grace in the world whose faith or confidence in the promises of God are so weak that they are said not to have faith at all. Of Abraham it is said, "He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God." Then again Paul says, "Him that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations." In this quotation I infer that the apostle has reference to the doctrine; as much as if he had said, Him that is weak in the doctrine, &c. It is probable that this is the apostle's meaning when he says, "For all men have not faith." Of Stephen it is said, that he was "full of faith;" and a great many of the priests were "obedient unto the faith;" that is, they were obedient unto the doctrine and commandments of Christ.

Now I want to say a little about belief. Arminians say that belief, as well as faith, is a voluntary act of the creature. They believe that they can teach the intellect of man to comprehend the plan of salvation, and judgmentally convince them of sin; and that man, with the power of the intellect, can accept Christ, believe on him, and be saved. This is Arminian theology, and is partly true. They can teach the intellect, but not to know God, whom to know is life eternal. The work of God is a heart and mind work, and a soul work; not an intellectual work. God says, "I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts; and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people."—Heb. viii. 10. Paul says in another place, "For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Now I am willing to admit that belief is an act; yes, an act of the man, or an act of the heart; for "with the heart man believeth unto righteousness." Hence belief is an involuntary act of the heart, produced by the force of testimony. When God does his work in the heart there is undeniable and undoubted testimony (the witness of the Holy Spirit), and hence belief follows as a consequence; and this divine testimony, which comes by revelation, is a necessary prerequisite to belief; and this belief, which is an involuntary act of the heart, produces "confession unto salvation," which is made "with the mouth." Hence, "Let the inhabitants of the rock sing, let them shout from the top of the mountains." This divine revelation unto Peter could and did enable him to say with confidence, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." The same revelation on the day of Pentecost produced the inquiry from the "pricked in the heart" people, "Men and brethren, What shall we do?" Such characters as these are prepared to hear the word of the gospel, and believe it; for Paul said, "So we preached, and so ye believed." Again, "After that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation," or deliverance.

But now I want to say a little more about faith. The apostle says, "So then, faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God," &c. This of course has reference to the "faith of the gospel;" and it is the "faith of God's elect." It includes what Christ has done for us, and what he will still do for us. It includes all the promises of God in Christ; and they are not yea and nay, but yea and Amen. It includes God's protecting care over his poor and afflicted people in the past ages, thus causing us to be "compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses." It includes being "kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." It includes the doctrine of election, predestination, salvation by grace, without works, effectual calling, the resurrection of the dead, eternal judgment, and implicit obedience to the commandments of Christ in time. Faith in all these things "comes by hearing;" that is, by hearing the gospel. "And hearing by the Word of God." That Word is that which was in the beginning with God, and was God, and which Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. So that Word said, "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live." Thus the hearing comes by the Word of God.

Now a little about the achievements of faith. Faith has achieved great things in the past. It is by faith that we understand the worlds were framed. It was by faith that Moses was hid three months by his parents. By faith he forsook Egypt. By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. Gideon and Barak, and David and Samuel, and all the prophets, through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens, &c.

May God give us all strong faith in his infallible promises, so that in all our trials, tribulations and persecutions we may "boldly say, The Lord is my helper; I will not fear what man shall do unto me." "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." May God Almighty bless you, and all his afflicted saints.

As ever, in fellowship,

H. J. REDD.

[THE following letter was addressed to sister Larue E. Beebe, whose experience was published in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES of May 15, 1889. The writer has consented to its publication.—ED.]

SUTHERLAND'S CORNERS, Ontario, }
May 17, 1889.

DEAR SISTER IN THE LORD JESUS CHRIST:—To-day I received the last number of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and read with some feeling of sacred pleasure what is published therein of the Lord's gracious dealings with your soul. The things which you have been taught of God are far more precious "than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb." They are a seal and earnest of the Holy Spirit, declaring you to be one of the elect, "a child of Jehovah, a subject of grace." Since the time when it pleased God to give me a hope in his mercy, my soul has rejoiced in witnessing the like precious grace bestowed by our gracious God upon others; and though I have continually to sigh over my own sinfulness and unprofitableness, yet I do feel that my heart flows forth in affection to the dear children of God. They are, I hope, my kindred in Christ Jesus, and I do feel them more dear to me than all others.

I was much exercised in my mind by what you wrote with regard to tribulation. Our dear Redeemer was the one who for our sakes was thrashed. (Tribulo, to thrash.) The strokes which fell from the hand of divine justice upon him would have smitten us down into the lowest hell; but our blessed Jesus bore our sins. "For the transgression of my people was he stricken." What a deep and sacred record of the sufferings of Christ is that fifty-third chapter of Isaiah. There is portrayed the tribulation of our beloved Redeemer. When I have been brought under the rod, and have felt to sorely smart under the stroke, I have many times been given to find sweet balm in the remembrance of the tribulation of our Redeemer, as declared in this chapter. Though tribulations arise in many forms and from many things, yet all is for our profit; it is our portion as appointed by our heavenly Father. Yes, this is the predestined way to "enter the kingdom." None of the redeemed of the Lord can escape it or go around it. "We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God."—Acts xiv. 22. All the varied trials and sufferings of the elect are in number and weight and duration as pleaseth our God. His chastenings are for our profit. They are tokens of his love, and evidences that he deals with us as with sons.—Heb. xii. 1-11; Rev. iii. 19. It is as with Israel of old; so with all the true circumcision (Phil. iii. 3; Col. ii. 11), those who are Jews inwardly.—Rom. ii. 28; Rev. ii. 9. All the journey under the divine guidance, all the teaching, is to humble and prove us, that we may know what is in our hearts.—Deut. viii. For all the Israel of God "shall know every man the plague of his own heart."—1 Kings viii. 38. And if in all outward circumstances our way may be strewn with flowers, this plague will prove to be tribulation indeed—the tribulation of the child of God. "All the day long have I been plagued, and chastened every morning."—Psa. lxxiii. 14.

Sometimes, dear sister, I have murmured at my lot; I have fretted under this or that stroke; I have judged it to be unkind and cruel; I have winced under the strokes, and bitterly complained. But at such times I have seen only the rod, and not the hand that held the rod and directed every stroke. I have not while in this murmuring state remembered the love of him who dealeth with me as with a son. Though I have cried and wept, and said it was hard and unkind, the strokes were not diminished. In Prov. xix. 18 it reads, "Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying." Thus I feel the Lord has dealt with me; and when he has thus said to my soul, "Hear ye the rod, and who hath appointed it" (Micah vi. 9), I have found it had indeed a voice. It told me of my naughtiness, the pride of my heart, and that I am a poor, vile sinner still. It also spoke of the tender love and faithfulness of my Father, God. I then felt that all was needed to humble me. O how I need, it seems to me, to be chastened all the time, for I am so continually going astray. The Lord our God is the one who appoints the rod. Then, whether it be men or devils, whatsoever thing causes grief to my soul, whatsoever the affliction, God appoints it. Not one stroke can any creature, any thing, any power, inflict upon me more than God, even our own God, has ordained. His word declares, "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." He "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."—Rom. viii. 28; Eph. i. 11.

When the glorious doctrine of our God has been my soul's meditation, I have felt a rest and quietness therein, and have felt to say, "My times are in thy hand."—Psa. xxxi. 15. Our times are not at our own disposal. All would be sunshine if we could so arrange it. Our times are not in the hands of men; they can do no more than what our God appoints. They can afflict us only to the measure that God metes out to us.—Isa. liv. 16, 17. The devil has not the disposal of our times; all his power to afflict us is subject to the will of our God.—Job i. 12; ii. 6. Therefore it will ever be true with us, that "Our times of sorrow and of joy,

Great God, are in thy hand;
Our choicest comforts come from thee,
And go at thy command."

"When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and when he hideth his face, who then can behold him? whether it be done against a nation, or against a man only."—Job xxxiv. 29. You, dear sister, like all who have experienced divine teaching, can say, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted."—Psa. cxix. 71, 75. By and by we shall have come through all the tribulation that our God has appointed us. Well may we then, even now, by faith's sweet anticipation, "Be of good cheer."—John xvi. 33. We shall be more than conquerors through him that loved us.

May our dear Lord be with you, and bless you, for his own name's sake, is the heart's desire of your brother in our precious Lord Jesus Christ,

FRED. W. KEENE.

BLACK LICK, Ohio, Dec. 26, 1888.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—I feel inclined to write a few lines to you, knowing it is the last; for I am now in my eightieth year, and feel that my days are fast drawing to a close. The time is not far distant when I shall lay the pen down for the last time, and, as I hope and trust in Jesus, who died to save his people from their sins, that my spirit will be with all the redeemed of the Lord, which he has purchased with his precious blood. But doubts and fears will arise in my mind, and darkness seems to hide all light, and I am forced to cry, "Lord, save, or I perish." But the cheering words come to my mind, "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory." What a glorious thought that we shall see the head that wore the crown of thorns, his hands and feet, torn with nails, and his side pierced with the spear; and for what? To save them that were "chosen in him before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love: having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will." He wounds, and he heals; he kills, and he makes alive; he works, and none can hinder; for he is God. He created all things, and for his pleasure they are and were created. He is our only refuge in time of trouble. All my trust, all my hope, all my peace, is from him. O that I could love and praise him more. I want to live nearer to my God. But as it is written, "The good that I would, I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do." If my good works are to save me, I shall come short. But it is "by grace ye are saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." May the Lord lead me in the right way, and keep me by his power; for of myself I can do nothing. My works are as filthy rags in his sight. Sin is mixed with all I do. In this flesh dwells no good thing; and I feel that I am wholly dependent on the independent

God. To him I look for all things, both earthly and heavenly, for they all come from his bountiful hand. O what a precious Savior! He has brought me through danger seen and unseen. When sunk very low in sickness, so that my life was despaired of, he raised me to health again, and has led me on to old age, and, as I trust, has opened my eyes to see what a poor, helpless creature I am, always looking to the Lord to lead me by his own right hand. May the Lord be with his people wherever they be, comfort them and uphold them through every trial that they are called to pass through here below; and when our days are accomplished here below may we all meet in that bright world of glory, to praise God in a world without end, is the prayer of a poor, unworthy sister. Dear brethren, remember me in your prayers.

Dear editors, may the Lord spare you for many years to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. The editorials are so good that I read them over and over again. They throw light on the subjects for which you are contending.

Well, I will close. Do with this as your better judgment may dictate. It is very imperfect, hardly fit to appear in print. Do with it as you see proper, and all will be well with me.

As ever, your sister in hope,
LUCINDA ROCHELLE.

SOUTHAMPTON, Pa., Oct. 5, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I send you, with the consent of sister Bertha Wells, a letter and some verses received from her mother.

Your brother in the hope of the gospel,

SILAS H. DURAND.

BRANTFORD, Ont., Sept. 22, 1889.

MY DEAR BERTHA:—Your welcome letters have come safe to hand, and I am very glad you are feeling a little better in your mind, as you say it has been very dark. Well, we must expect some dark seasons as well as bright. Yea, more; there seems to be but one day of rest, as it were, in seven for the people of God; and it is through much tribulation they must enter the kingdom. Our dear Lord said on one occasion, "Fear not, little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." O what a kind, loving and indulgent Father we have! O to think that when we have passed through all the troubles, trials and afflictions allotted to us here on earth, there is a kingdom prepared for us where we shall live and reign with our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ throughout the countless ages of eternity.

Dear Bertha, you are now far away, and I am not able to write to you very often; but I am glad you have a people around you and in your home that you love. May you as you travel on through this wilderness world be enabled through grace to look to Jesus, and put your trust in him, and cast all your care upon him; for there is none but Jesus can do poor and helpless sinners good. If I am not altogether deceived, I can truly say,

"Although the unworthiest of the flock,
Yet Jesus deigns to feed
My hungering soul, and has been my help
In every time of need."

Dear Bertha, the inclosed lines came to my mind a short time before I received your letter in which you said you were feeling very bad in your mind at times, the Lord having, as it were, hidden his face from you. They are very poor and imperfect, like myself, but as you are a companion in tribulation, I thought you would like to read them; and should there be a word of comfort in them for you, give all the praise to the Giver of all good, as I know I can do nothing of myself. I have thought at times, O that I had put my trust in the Lord in years gone by. How much trouble I might have saved myself. But I am such a poor, blind creature. Well, the Lord says, "I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not, and will lead them in paths that they have not known. I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them." So you see it is the Lord who will do all these things. Then can we not say with the poet at times, "Then why, my soul, art thou cast down?" Now I think I must draw this to a close, asking you to excuse the many blunders I have made. I hope you and Elder D. and family are all well. Please remember me in christian love to them all, and to all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth. Although strangers after the flesh, I hope not after the Spirit. I am glad you enjoy the meetings; and may you be kept in the truth, and may you feel that underneath are the everlasting arms of love and mercy. When we meet no more on earth may we meet around the throne of God in heaven, where parting is no more, is the wish of your loving mother,

REBECCA WELLS.

GRACE.

LET me ask, dear reader, what is your conception of the blessed, aye, thrice blessed, word "grace?" Do your ears receive it with listless indifference? Does it sound to you as any ordinary word? Or can you feelingly say with the poet,

"Grace! 'tis a charming sound, Harmonious to the ear?"

Reader, whoever you are, wherever you are, and whatever your station in life, if you can quote the above lines from the depth of your heart, it is a sure sign that you are an heir of the heavenly kingdom. No doubt these few lines will fall under the gaze of many of Zion's children who feel the truth of the above quotation, and realize that they have passed from death unto life, and that "Their hope is built on nothing less Than Jesus' love and righteousness."

I know that all such will join with me in singing the sweet and charming sound of sovereign grace. Yes, brother, sister, we can, with hearts united by the blessed tie of christian love, sing,

"Amazing grace! how sweet the sound,
That saved a wretch like me;
I once was lost, but now am found,
Was blind, but now I see."

We know that we would still have been in the same lost and ruined state, had it not been for the amazing grace of God, reaching down into the depths of sin and degradation, whence we had fallen, to lift our feet out of the miry clay, and set them firmly upon the Rock of our salvation. Therefore in unison of spirit we say,

"'Twas grace that taught my heart to fear,
And grace my fears relieved;
How precious did that grace appear
The hour I first believed."

Yes, dear child, it is pleasant to look back to the time when we first felt that "amazing grace" sounded sweetly to us, when, after having gone to the end of our own strength, we were led by our heavenly Father to put our trust in his omnipotent power. We see ourselves as we came up from the wilderness, leaning upon our Beloved, and feeling really and truly that our robes had been washed and made clean in the blood of the Lamb. O wondrous condescension! that he, the King of life and glory, should suffer in the stead of such unworthy mortals as we.

"Well might the sun in darkness hide,
And shut his glories in,
When Christ, the mighty Savior, died
For man, the creature's sin."

Perchance some one may read this who feels with a deep sense of unworthiness that they are lost and undone by sin, who realize that if they are sent to everlasting torment their condemnation is just, and think they are much too vile and sinful for the almighty God to notice. To such a mourner in Zion (for such you are, if this be your experience) I would say,

Ho, sin-sick soul, with saddened brow,
O'erpressed with care and grief,
Come to the arms of Jesus' love,
There you will find relief.

Flee to the Fount, O thirsty soul,
This Fountain op'd for sin;
For every one that drinketh there Shall feel its power within.

Though Satan in his craft may come,
And seek you to beguile
By saying, God will never hear
The voice of one so vile;

Heed not his voice; with Jesus plead;
Your prayer he'll not reject;
He waits to answer (full of love)
The cries of his elect.

And feeling sinful, weak and vile,
Is but a blessed sign
That you an heir of heaven are,
Born of the will divine.

It shows that God has in your heart
A work of grace begun;
That you were chosen ere all time
In Jesus Christ his Son.

So press thee onward, weary one;
Your Savior bids, draw near;

He'll give you joy for all your grief,
And banish every fear.

And when this earthly race is run,
The ransomed ones shall rest
Forever in that blissful land,
The home of all the blest.

Yes, weary one, press forward to the feet of Jesus, "casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you," and his grace shall be sufficient for you. He is cognizant of your every trouble. Each deep-drawn sigh of thine is heard by him. He who suffered excruciating agony and death, to redeem thy soul from hell, will not cast thee off. O may our almighty Father speedily cause you to realize that you are of the happy number who were chosen in him before the foundation of the world; that you are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works; that you are no longer a stranger and foreigner, but a fellow-citizen with the saints and of the household of God. Brethren and sisters, I pray that we may, by the grace of God, at all times live as becometh followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene, and let our light so shine that others, seeing our good works, may be constrained to glorify our Father which is in heaven. For what is our life? It is even a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away.—James iii. 14. "Wherefore, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."—Heb. xii. 1, 2. May we often bring to mind the words of Peter, "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness?"—2 Peter iii. 11.

Brethren and sisters, when you are presenting your humble petitions before the mercy-seat, do not forget to remember me. I pray that God may build up Zion, and bless us with all spiritual blessings in Christ. May he keep us firm and steadfast in the faith, until the set time shall come for him to call us from this world of trouble to the land that is "brighter than day," where we shall sing of his matchless grace throughout the "endless cycles of eternity."

"Yes, when this heart and tongue shall fail,
And mortal life shall cease,
We shall possess within the veil
A life of joy and peace."

"To the only wise God our Savior be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen."

—Jude i. 25.

Yours in christian love,

CHURCH ORDER.

MANY inquiries are addressed to us from various sections, asking information upon points of order and discipline in organizations claiming to be the Old School or Primitive Baptist Church. While it is flattering to the pride of our natural heart to be esteemed as capable of instructing others upon such an important subject, it would be a very clear exhibition of ignorance on our part if we should attempt to answer the numerous questions proposed. The first requisite for understanding the administration of the law of Christ is the light of divine revelation. No more positive evidence of the lack of that light could be given than is shown by a readiness to express judgment in any case upon a partial understanding of the facts involved. The most candid brother is guided in presenting the matter he would submit, by the view which seems to him to be right. No finite mind can divest itself of this infirmity. Hence it must be that the case submitted will always be that which the mind of the inquiring one apprehends, and on which his own judgment is formed. This accounts for the difference so often noticed between the reports of honest brethren in relating the same case. Overlooking this infirmity of all the children of Adam, brethren are sometimes too ready to charge wrong motives upon those who differ from their own views. The adversary is ever ready to sustain such a charge by appealing to the carnal pride of those concerned, and suggesting their duty to expose the wickedness of those whom they regard as contending against the truth and order of the church of Christ. One frequent cause of divisions among the saints in such cases is found in the weakness which caused David to ask, "Who can understand his errors?"—Psa. xix. 12. The wisest and most gifted of the saints in this age are not less liable to mistake the motive by which they are actuated than was the psalmist. When once the error has taken possession of their mind, the very honesty of the saints prompts them to be firm, and that firmness in error unconsciously to themselves becomes stubbornness. Thus dissension and strife prevail until all is confusion, where peace and quietness should be found in "the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth." The origin of this distressing condition is clearly declared by the inspired apostle. "From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?" "Do ye think that the Scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy? But he giveth more grace. Wherefore he saith, God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble."—James iv. 1, 5, 6. Surely if the saints could understand their errors they would not be found in need of this severe rebuke.

All professed followers of Christ acknowledge the inspiration of the Scriptures, and hold that the Lord has given in the recorded judgment of his ordained apostles the only rule of faith and practice for the government of his believing disciples for all time. It is only as authorized by this rule, therefore, that any action of the church, or of an individual member, can be consistent with the order which is divinely appointed in the kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. The assumption that any case can ever arise for which this rule has made no provision, involves the denial of the perfection of the rule. It is to our own ignorance of the application of the commandment of Jesus that we must ascribe all the apparent insufficiency of his law for our guidance under every circumstance which can be presented in the disciplinary conduct of his church. When the Spirit of truth takes of the word of our Lord and shows it unto us, its exact fitness is so manifest that the faith of the Son of God in our hearts requires no more argument to explain its adaptation to the case involved, than does the clear sunshine have need of proof that it is light. Without such revelation, reason may labor in vain to devise a way to bring peace in the day of trouble. All the established rules and usages which have been devised by men for the prevention or settlement of discord in the church, ever have and ever will but produce more serious confusion. As the typical Israel erred in desiring a king, so the saints in appealing to reason reject the law of their Lord.—See 1 Sam. viii. 7. However plausible any course of proceeding may appear, it is not consistent with gospel order unless it is directed by the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus. Obedience to that law is always conformity to the order of the gospel. So it is written to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, "If ye fulfill the royal law according to the Scripture, ye do well; but if ye have respect of persons, ye commit sin, and are convicted of the law as transgressors."—James ii. 8, 9. This royal law is the only divinely appointed guide for the saints, who are called to be kings and priests unto God. They have not to look to Moses for directions or commandments. The Spirit of Christ which dwells in them is the royal law of liberty, by which they have been made free from the law of sin and death.—Rom. viii. 2. It is of this law Paul speaks when he says, "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law."—Rom. xiii. 10. Being written in the heart of those who are led by the Spirit of God, they delight to do that which it requires. In this way they are manifested as the willing children of the King of saints.—Psa. cx. 3.

The order of the kingdom of Christ does not consist in the observance of any form or outward ceremony. The love of God must be the living principle of that kingdom within each individual saint from which must flow every action which is approved by the perfect law of liberty. All compliance with formal observances without the indwelling love of God, can never come nearer to the obedience of faith than did the mocking of Ishmael come to the real feeling of the weaned Isaac. Even the sacrifice of all worldly goods, or the endurance of consuming fire in devotion to the profession of christianity, in the absence of this living principle can be no more than sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. The first and indispensable requisite to gospel order in the church of Christ must therefore be, that the members shall examine themselves in the light of the inspired command which is addressed exclusively to believers whose faith and hope is in God. "Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently."—1 Peter i. 22. The most zealous saint is not in the order of the gospel when this law is not ruling in his heart. It is evident that he is not qualified to restore an erring brother when he is not himself spiritual. Any attempt on his part to do so at such a time could result only in adding to the disorder already existing. The importance of self-examination in this particular cannot be too carefully considered by the disciple of Christ when he is inclined to deal with one in whom he has discovered disorder. Paul is very particular to specify this qualification. "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted."—Gal. vi. 1. It is not if you feel yourself free from faults, as natural reasoning would suggest, "Ye which are spiritual." The more sensible you are of your own unworthiness and weakness, the more clear is the indication that you are truly "spiritual" in the sense in which this word is used by the apostle. Considering your own liability to fall under temptation, you can feel for the infirmity of the erring one, and in real charity you are qualified to labor for his restoration. There is no hope of promoting the peace and order of the church by mere observance of the letter of the directions given in the eighteenth chapter of Matthew. By such action the laboring brother becomes a transgressor of the "royal law," and is therefore himself in disorder. On the other hand, when the love of Christ rules in the heart of the brother, making him "spiritual" in that case, the effect will be the single desire for the peace of the church and the good of the man who is "overtaken in a fault." It must be remembered that the "royal law" applies to no other government but the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. His precepts are the gates of pearl through which his saints enter into joy. When these pearls are cast before the unclean swine of earthly kingdoms, they will be only trodden under their feet, and the swine will turn again and rend those who thus misapply the precious things of the heavenly kingdom. In the administration of the divine law, as well as in the application of the consolation of the gospel, the saints are dependent upon the Holy Spirit to take of the things of Jesus and show them unto their faith. The love of God shed abroad in the heart of the saints is the principle which actuates them in all proceedings which are according to the order which is enjoined by the law of Christ. Neither selfishness, pride, envy nor jealousy can find shelter in the kingdom of God. When these carnal powers control the mind of the saint they produce death to all spiritual comfort and joy. Those saints who are governed by such carnality are thereby debarred from entering into that joy in the Holy Ghost which constitutes the "kingdom of heaven" to such as are led by the Spirit of God. In like manner, when carnality reigns in an organized church, even though maintaining sound doctrine in theory, the love and fellowship which constitute the life of the church are effectually banished from among the members who thus "live after the flesh." It is in this manner that the carnally minded saints suffer death in their disregard of the order which our Lord has established in his church.

Even while the apostles were yet in the flesh there were cases in which the order of the gospel was so far neglected as to call for severe reproof from the pen of inspiration; and those reproofs are left upon record for our instruction. Notably the immorality of the Corinthian church and the heresy among those of Galatia, are admonitions to warn the saints in after times of the readiness with which they are liable to be drawn away from the narrow path of obedience to the truth. It is not conclusive evidence that a church is not a member of the body of Christ, even when gross disorders prevail among her members. If such were the case it would be impossible to trace the true church beyond the apostolic age. If there were no possibility of the church falling into disorder there would have been no need of the exhortations and admonitions which constitute the greater part of the epistles written by inspired apostles for our learning. While the proper manifestation of that order is clearly defined in the law of Christ as written by the apostles, the principle of obedience to that divine rule is implanted in every believer by the Spirit of holiness, which dwelleth in them who are born of God. That principle is the love of God and of his righteousness. Where this seal of the Holy Spirit is set upon any subject of salvation it cannot fail to produce the desire to be conformed to the perfection which is revealed in Jesus as the great Example in whom all righteousness is fulfilled. Looking unto him, they find the only infallible pattern for their guidance. He sums up all his commandments in the brief direction, "Follow me." Not even an inspired apostle could safely present himself as a perfect pattern. He says, "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ."—1 Cor. xi. 1. It is not safe for the saints to follow any man further than this, however highly he may be esteemed. The best of brethren are not free from the infirmities of the flesh, and may lead us astray; but in Jesus we have the unerring embodiment of all holy perfection.

The order of the church consists not in any observance of forms, however right in themselves. A natural man might be immersed in accordance with the pattern given in Jordan; yet the correctness of the form would not constitute valid baptism without the spirit of obedience to the law of Christ. So, one might observe the letter of the scriptural rule in dealing with an offending brother, while the motive might be to destroy instead of to save the one with whom such dealing was conducted. Clearly this would be but mockery of the divine law. The order of the church requires that every step in the administration of discipline be dictated by love. Where this heavenly principle rules in the action of the members the church will never get out of the true order of the gospel of Christ. In the absence of love, no conformity to the letter of the law of Christ is in the order which he has established. When the church is walking in the order of the gospel, the Lord makes her officers peace, and her exactors righteousness. Then the promise is to "the Zion of the Holy One of Israel," that "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise."—Isa. lx. 18.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Juniata Primitive Baptist Association, in session with the Providence Church, in Bedford Co., Pa., October 4th, 5th and 6th, 1889, to the churches and brethren composing the same, sendeth greeting in the Lord.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Through the abounding mercy of God we are again met together in an association, as we trust, for the purpose of worshipping the true and living God; and as it is our custom to call your attention to some subject, we will name that contained in 1 John iii. 1-3, "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God: therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not. Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." The manner of this love differs from that of natural love, as far as heaven is above earth; for this love existed in the bosom of the Father from all eternity, and reaches throughout all the ceaseless ages of a never-ending eternity; for these sons of God were chosen in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love. Having their earthly standing in Adam, they fell under the condemnation of God's holy law, and became dead to all that is spiritual and good, and utterly incapable of extricating themselves from under the just condemnation of that holy law; and they would forever have perished if it had not been for that unchangeable love of God to poor, perishing sinners. This eternal love was not the least abated in the bosom of the Son of God toward his chosen people, though they were alienated from him by wicked works. But there was a period known to God from all eternity when each one should be brought to see and feel and realize their lost condition by reason of sin and transgression, and made to experience this heavenly love in the pardon of their sins. Then the poor sinner is made to realize the manner of this love, and how far it differs from that of natural love; for we love natural things for some worth or merit, or some attraction that we may see in the object we love. This natural love is changeable. It may be strong as death one day, and the next day may be perfect hatred. Not so with this heavenly love, for it forever remains the same. It knows no change. Though we do not always feel and realize it the same, the change is in us, and not in the love of God.

Now, dear brethren, being in this love, what manner of persons ought we to be? "He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked."—1 John ii. 6. "But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."—1 John i. 7. "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death."—1 John iii. 14. Now, dear brethren, here is the test: do we truly and sincerely love the brethren, those who bear the image of Jesus, those who have been born of that incorruptible seed, by the Word of God, which liveth and abideth forever? But while we are in the flesh we will have crosses and trials to endure, for perfection does not belong to the flesh. The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other, so that we cannot do the good that we would. But, dear brethren, the time is short. We shall soon be free from these bodies of sin, and shall bask in that sweet and heavenly love, in the bright mansions of eternal glory.

"It doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him." This ought to forever settle the question as to our likeness in the world of eternal glory. Some claim that we will recognize each other there as we recognize each other in this present world. But we do not so understand the Scriptures of truth; for flesh and blood cannot enter the kingdom of God. Death dissolves all our earthly relationship, so that our fathers and mothers, wives and children, are no more to us in that heavenly relationship than the saints that lived a thousand years ago, or those that may live hundreds of years after this. We will know each other as the redeemed children of God. This is enough for us to know.

"And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." If Christ dwells in us, then that life is pure as Christ is pure. How are we to make it manifest that we are the children of God? Only by the fruit we bear; and love is the crowning cluster of this heavenly fruit of the Spirit of Christ. So, dear brethren, let brotherly love continue, and abound more and more unto the perfect day.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

I AM requested to write a notice of the death of brother James T. Moore, of New Castle, Ind., who died at his home in that city, Feb. 14th, 1889.

The deceased was born in Monongalia County, W. Va., July 29th, 1816. He was baptized in the fellowship of the Lebanon Church, Henry Co., Ind., in May, 1839; and amid all the changing scenes, commotions and divisions through which that church has passed during the half-century of his membership, he remained a consistent and faithful member to his death. The deceased leaves his widow and four children, with the church of his membership, and other brethren of his acquaintance, and friends, to mourn their loss in his death. We rejoice, however, in the gracious testimony that our loss is his eternal gain. We shall miss him in the solemn feasts of Zion, together with the many others who have gone before, and have entered forever the eternal home of the blessed.

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HOW ARE SINNERS SAVED?

WE need not take time to argue the importance of this subject, but suffice it to say that it excels all other subjects.

There are two grand divisions of sentiment relative to the subject of salvation, which are comprehended in the following propositions: That the salvation of sinners is conditional on their part, depending more or less on conditions of obedience to the commands of God. That the salvation of sinners is unconditional on their part, and does not depend upon conditions of obedience to the commands of God.

It will be observed that these propositions contradict each other, and that both cannot be true.

We will now proceed to prove that salvation is unconditional. "Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying, Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered: blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin."—Rom. iv. 6, 7. From the above we see that the imputation of righteousness and the forgiveness of sins are without works. "For by grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast."—Eph. ii. 8, 9. "Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began."—2 Tim. i. 9. "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us."—Titus iii. 5.

We have now presented the testimony of an inspired witness that salvation is by grace, and not by works. Works, we have seen, mean that which we do. Then salvation is not by works. It is not by acts of obedience done by us, but is by the grace of God, and, of course, is unconditional on our part.

Some tell us that God has done all he can or will do, and that it now remains for us to do our part; that we must turn away from sin, and turn to God, exercise faith in him, keep his commandments, and that by thus doing God will save us; and that if we do not do these things God will not save us. Another tells us that salvation is wholly by grace, and that nothing we can do can recommend us to the favor of God. Thus these contradict each other, each professing to prove his proposition by the Bible. No wonder that the skeptic says, "Christianity is a fraud. It contradicts itself, therefore I cannot believe it."

Paul saith to Timothy, "Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."—2 Tim. ii. 15. A right division then of the word of truth will enable us to reconcile all the seeming contradictions in the Bible. But it is our object only at this time to reconcile the seeming contradictions upon the subject of salvation.

The first thing we wish to notice is the condition of the sinner while in a state of nature, since we must first know what condition he is in before we can know what plan or system of salvation would be adapted to his case.

A physician, in order to be successful, must first know the nature and extent of the disease before he can know what remedy to apply. For instance, a man has small-pox, and a physician is sent for, who thinks the man has only taken cold. Accordingly he prescribes some simple remedy, which is good when given to one who has simply a cold, but is worth nothing for small-pox. So a conditional plan of salvation would reach the sinner's case if he were able to comply with the conditions. Then we will introduce God as the great Physician of souls, and Adamic sinners as his patients. When we call in the family physician we expect him to tell us what the matter is with us. And what would we think of a physician who would propose to cure us, and at the same time tell us that we cannot take his medicine?

Let us now ask God what is the matter with the sinner, and let us believe what he says, "You hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins."—Eph. ii. 1. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live."—John v. 25. We see from this that sinners in a state of nature are dead, destitute of spiritual life. But God gives unto his people eternal life. Hence Jesus said in his prayer to the Father, "As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him."—John xvii. 2. "So then they that are in the flesh cannot please God."—Rom. viii. 8. Let me ask, Can "they that are in the flesh" obey God's commandments? No; for that would please him. And he says that they that are in the flesh cannot please him. How absurd then it would be for us to say that we must obey him, please him, in order to get out of the flesh. Hence the salvation of the dead sinner from the state of death in trespasses and sins, to that of eternal life and eternal happiness, is unconditional on their part, depending wholly upon the grace of God. They are bad trees, and must be made good before they can bear good fruit. They are dead, and must have life before they can act. They are blind to spiritual things, and must have eyes before they can see. "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works."—Eph. ii. 10. But if we were able to perform the good works before being made new creatures, there would be no need of this new creation; and it is unreasonable to suppose that the material used is competent before creation to perform the work it was created to do. Hence in this new creation old things have passed away, and all things have become new. The sinner was dead, but now is alive; was a child of wrath, but is now a child of God. He now has a new heart; that is, new affections. He now loves God and the children of God. He now bears good fruit, which is evidence that he has been made a good tree.

We will now turn our attention to another witness, and see whether the two testify alike. God has taught us some things by his Spirit in our experience, as well as by his word. First, in his word he teaches that we are great sinners. He teaches us the same by his Spirit. He teaches in his word that we are unable to extricate ourselves from the terrible pit of sin we are in. He teaches us the same by his Spirit in our experience. I appeal to every christian to know if you cannot remember the time when you first became alarmed about your condition, and felt there was something you must do; and after doing all you could, it failed to relieve your troubled heart, and you were made to feel that if you were saved at all it must be for some other consideration, and not your good works. It is true you repented of your sins, but it was godly sorrow that produced that repentance. The Scriptures tell us that in Christ is life, and that the life is the light of men. Hence whenever the life is imparted, the understanding is illuminated, which causes the sinner to see the guilty distance he stands from God. He is made to mourn over his sins; and when brought to an end of his own strength, Jesus is revealed to him as his Savior. He feels now that God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven his sins. He now desires to live the remainder of his days without sinning; but alas! he soon finds himself to be a dual being, or in possession of two natures, the one contrary to the other, so that he cannot do the things that he would.

We invite the attention of the reader to the seventh chapter of Romans, where we learn that the work wrought in regeneration, or in the new creation, pertains only to the inner man, in this life. Notwithstanding the work of making us new creatures is begun, yet it will not be completed until it extends to the body, or outer man. Hence the apostle says, "I delight in the law of God after the inner man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind [inner man], and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members," or outer man. John says, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." He also says, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." So we see that the inner man does not, cannot sin; yet the outer man can and does sin. So we see that the christian is a sinner in the sense above named; for as long as we sin we are sinners.

Thus by "rightly dividing the word of truth" we have found two classes of sinners; the one dead in trespasses and sins, and the other alive as to the inner man, but dead as to the outer man.

We now propose to show that the Scriptures teach a conditional salvation. "Take heed unto thyself and unto the doctrine; continue in them; for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee."—1 Tim. iv. 16. The conditions in this text are, first, taking heed unto himself and unto the doctrine; and, second, in doing this he will save himself and his hearers. The negative of this is, that if he does not comply with these conditions he will not save himself and his hearers. "Ye see then how by works a man is justified, and not by faith only."—James ii. 24. Here we see a justification by works; that is, by obedience to the commands of God. "The like figure whereunto baptism doth also now save us." God has commanded us to be baptized. Peter teaches that obedience to this command saves us. "And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?"—1 Peter iv 18. This portion of Scripture, as well as kindred texts, is by conditionalists misapplied. They tell us that the salvation here referred to is in the future; that in the great judgment day "the righteous" will be admitted into heaven; while "the ungodly and the sinner" are the finally impenitent, who are to be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord. But this Scripture has no allusion to such a time, as will be seen by reading the seventeenth verse of this same chapter, which says, "For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?" We see from this that the time of this judgment had already come, and that it was confined to the house of God, and was not general to the world of mankind. The house of God is the church or kingdom of Jesus Christ. And before a kingdom can exist there must be a king, and subjects, and a law to govern them; and, of course, a law must have a penalty; and persons when judged are judged by the law they are under. If they violate that law, they will be punished according to the penalty of it. If they obey that law they will save themselves from being punished by it. Paul says, "What the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law." Thus the people of the United States are not under the laws of Great Britain. Thus while all men are under God's moral government, and are responsible to God for their conduct, yet none are under the law of Christ's kingdom, or the house of God, except they that are members of that kingdom or house. And since this is a spiritual kingdom, its subjects are also spiritual. "Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son."—Col. i. 13. Thus we become subjects of this kingdom by the unconditional salvation. We do not have to obey the laws of a kingdom in order to become subjects; but we must be made subjects in order to obey its laws. The prophet speaking of this kingdom says, "A king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment." The twelve apostles are these princes. A prince is an officer next in authority to a king. Hence Christ, the King, has delivered to these princes the law by which the subjects of this kingdom are to be judged. This judgment began when the kingdom began its existence. The gospel is the law of this kingdom, embracing every command in the New Testament, and all the doctrine necessary for the subjects to believe. The penalty annexed to this law is chastisement. The reward and consequence of obedience to this law is fellowship with God and with one another, the comfort of the Holy Spirit to sustain us in all our trials and difficulties in this life. In a word, our happiness as christians in this world depends more or less upon conditions of obedience to the commands of Christ. This then is the conditional salvation taught in the Bible.

We will now call attention to the Scripture, "If the righteous scarcely be saved," &c. Notice, "scarcely," barely, hardly, saved. The righteous are the obedient to the laws of this kingdom. We have said that the penalty of this law is chastisement. By consulting the twelfth chapter of Hebrews we find that all the sons or subjects of this kingdom are chastened, and that none wholly escape. Therefore if they are scarcely saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? When we do that which is right we are godly. When we do that which is wrong we are unlike God, or ungodly, and, of course, are sinners. This Scripture does not tell us where such shall appear; hence we must look for the answer somewhere else. Paul says to the Hebrew brethren, "If the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward, how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation?"—Heb. ii. 2, 3. Here we see the apostle uses natural Israel as a figure of spiritual Israel. He says, "How shall we escape?" Thus he includes himself with the Hebrew saints. As natural Israel is often used in the New Testament Scriptures as a figure of spiritual Israel, we wish now to draw the analogy between them. In the first place, God chose Israel as a nation to be his peculiar people; not because of any foreseen good works in them, neither did they have to perform conditions of obedience in order to be elected; but their election was entirely unconditional on their part. Thus we read, "Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them."—Psa. cxxxix. 16. So we see that the election of the members of Christ's body, the church, took place when there were none of them actually developed, and, of course, before they had complied with any conditions.—See Rev. xiii. 8; xvii. 8.

When Moses was sent into Egypt he was sent to deliver God's chosen people, a people who were God's by choice, yet they were Pharaoh's slaves and servants; and instead of being free agents, they were in bondage. Moses tells us that he was a type of Christ.—Deut. xviii. 15; Acts iii. 22. So when Christ was conceived of the virgin Mary, the angel said to Joseph, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." They were his people, because God had chosen them, and had given them to him. Yet in their natural state they were slaves to Satan, the antitype of Pharaoh. They were also the servants of sin.

Natural Israel did not have to obey the law given by Moses in order to be delivered from under Pharaoh's dominion; for this law was not given them until after they had crossed the Red Sea. So of the sinner: he does not have to obey the law given by Christ, the antitype of Moses, in order to be delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into his kingdom; but he must first pass through the antitype of the Red Sea, which is the cleansing efficacy of the blood of Christ, and have his conscience purged from dead works, to serve the living God.

Thus we have traced both the figure and the substance across the Red Sea, and have reached the place where the conditional salvation begins. In the word spoken by angels we are told that the law was ordained of angels in the hands of a mediator; that is, God gave the law to Moses through angels, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward; that is, the penalty annexed to that law was sure to be inflicted upon the violator. Thus we see that the happiness of Israel in this life depended upon their obedience to the law. Then how shall we, the antitypical Israel, escape if we neglect to keep the commandments of Christ? We take the position that we will not escape. But what is it that we will not escape? Why, of course, the penalty annexed to the law of Christ's kingdom.

We will now call your attention to Heb. x. 26-29. "For if we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries. He that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses: of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace?" Here we see that our punishment will be greater for disobeying the commandments of Christ, than it was for disobeying the law of Moses. But we are not told in this place what the punishment is. The thirtieth verse ends by saying, "The Lord shall judge his people," but does not tell us what the result of that judgment will be; so we must ascertain this by some other portion of God's word. See 1 Cor. xi. 31, 32: "For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world." Thus we see that when God judges us he lays the chastening rod upon us. "If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments; if they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments; then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes: Nevertheless my loving-kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail."—Psa. lxxxix. 30-33. Jesus says that the servant that knew his lord's will, and did it not, shall be beaten with many stripes. This is where the ungodly and the sinner shall appear. He shall not only be deprived of the enjoyment of religion, but shall be beaten with many stripes.

Another way in which we may fail to save ourselves is by not taking heed to the doctrine, by not studying God's word, but suffering others to lead us, and thus become lost in the broad way of error, and dead to the strait (difficult) and narrow way of truth.

Much more might be said on this subject; but as we only intended in this to lay the foundation, we will leave it with the reader to build thereon.

A. A. EDWARDS.

BROTHER A. B. BRES:—I have just read your article entitled, "Are they Christians?" If I understand you, you convey to me the idea that one to be a christian must first be quickened by the Spirit, and taught to know that Jesus is Lord, and taste of his grace, and learn that he is the one altogether lovely, and the chiefest among ten thousand, and submit himself to the ordinances of God's house, by going to the church of Christ, or the christian church (Old, Predestinarian Baptist Church), and there doing the duties of a member of that church, or "walking in all the ordinances of the Lord's house blamelessly." Am I right? If so, so far so good. Now, my brother, I do not know that we ever met in the flesh, or that we ever will meet on earth; but having a faint hope that I have passed from death in sin to life in Christ Jesus, I want to talk to you on the subject of the christian church.

What is it? Will a christian church pass judgment on a brother who is moving his family into their midst with the expressed intention of becoming one of them, before they ever see the brother or hear what he may say in his own behalf? Will a christian minister call a fellow-worker brother, with the most assuring pretensions of christian love and fellowship, grasping the hand of the brother, and then, without having any further knowledge of the brother, on the same day tell other brethren that this man he called brother was guilty of such revolting crimes that his neighbors were talking of mobbing him? Will a christian minister, after he has told his brethren that a certain man was about to be mobbed, when the man calls upon him to know why he circulated such a report, reply that several parties told him that such was the talk? Will a christian minister refuse to give the names of his authors, when the injured brother asks for them? Will a christian minister, when insisted upon by the injured one, finally say that he only heard one woman say that the man would be mobbed, and then refuse to give the name of that one woman? When the injured one calls for a committee of his neighbors, and publishes a public meeting, and asks for a thorough investigation, and especially invites the traducer of his character to attend said meeting, and bring all the evidence he knows of, when the committee meets the accused is there, the traducer is not there, the committee being the family physician, and two reputable physicians living in an adjoining city, all high-toned, honorable gentlemen, would the tale-bearer, if he were a christian minister, have failed to be there, so that if a wrong had been done, to make proper reparation to the injured one? Will a christian church refuse its aid and comfort to the way-worn traveler who is a stranger in their midst, simply because they have heard bad things about the stranger? Will a christian church, when they see a strange preacher, who was baptized in the same faith by one who was known to be in full fellowship, and came from a church in their correspondence, by the invitation of the Moderator of their own association, and one of the leading members of its own body, look coolly on and see the strange brother drive away with his wife and six small children, without giving the hungry wife and children something to eat? After having done this, would a christian church have failed to see whether the reports were true? and when proven to be false by the accused, would a christian church still refuse to take any further notice of the brother? Is a christian church one that will disregard the eighteenth chapter of Matthew, and uphold a brother who has disregarded the said chapter? Will a christian church be so ignorant that they will disregard the laws laid down in the Bible for their government?

Now, my brother, I have known all the above things to be done by those who have worn and still wear the name Old, Predestinarian Baptist. Christ says the tree is known by the fruit it bears. It is said of christians that their fruit is unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. So I would rather see the fruit right, if the name is not quite right, than to see the fruit so bad, when the name may be right. Please answer; and if you wish, I can give the names of both preachers and churches referred to above—names you are familiar with. Much more

I have seen among the Old, Predestinarian Baptists, but will not speak of it now. It is a glorious thing, the christian church molded by the Spirit of God, where the brethren dwell together in unity, and where the fruits are tasted, and real benefits flow out to all the world, like the waves of the still and placid waters flow outward from the falling pebble until they die away on the remotest shores. Christianity says, Be forbearing, be merciful, be kind, be careful to entertain strangers, judge not, cover a matter, not to repeat it. No, my brother, I have for twenty-five years borne, and am still willing to bear; for I find many who are the children of God, and show it by their lives of chastity, temperance, faith, hope and charity, that are not Predestinarian Baptists, which might be if all Predestinarian Baptists were christians.

A PREDESTINARIAN BAPTIST.

SPENCERVILLE, Ohio, Oct. 6, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I feel desirous of complying with the request of "A Predestinarian Baptist," although I am aware that I am limited in judgment and fallible in nature, and therefore feel to present such views of the precious order of God's house as I have, with diffidence, hoping that my correspondent will carefully and prayerfully examine them in the light of revelation, and also that all brethren everywhere will profit by the sad results of disobedience spoken of in these queries. There are so many cases so similar, and yet so different in their associated connections, that it is impossible to give a plain yes or no in answer to the statements of the case.

I cannot say how far astray a christian church may go and yet be a christian or Baptist Church. It depends upon organic structure and the continuance of disorder that is either checked in time for their salvation, or allowed to progress to their destruction.

It is not good order for any one to pass judgment without evidence; but in such a case every brother moving to other churches should carry letters of recommendation or give good evidence of their good standing at home.—See 1 Cor. xvi. 3. Paul recognizes the need, in some cases, of "letters of commendation" (2 Cor. iii. 1), and every brother should humbly submit his case to the judgment of the church until he can either secure their confidence or obtain suitable evidence from his brethren at home. A christian minister, or any other member of the church, cannot, in order, report the tales of the world against a brother until they have first been faithful in the discharge of their duty towards him. "Speaking the truth in love."—Eph. iv. 14. "Wherefore putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbor: for ye are members one of another."

I am sure that every brother under the influence of the Spirit will be truthful, humble and faithful; and every appearance of deceitfulness is truly unworthy of the christian character. While christian ministers are no better in their nature than other members of the church, I can only judge it to be their imperative obligation to set better examples of christian faithfulness and order before their brethren; and if they fail to so discharge the sacred duties of their office as "ensamples of the flock," they should be held as much responsible as any other member of the church, and should be held responsible for every such departure from righteousness. While it is necessary that Baptist ministers shall "have a good report of them that are without" (1 Tim. iii. 7), I know of no rule for "calling for a committee of his neighbors, and publishing a public meeting," "for a thorough investigation." Read 1 Corinthians vi. 1-10, forbidding judgment before unbelievers. All judgment is there confined to the church; and that church or body of people who adopts any other mode of judgment is in danger of losing, if not already having lost, its standing as the church of God. I hold that evidence may be obtained from the respectable and trustworthy people of the world; but the world should not be called to sit in council. Their evidence can only be obtained through the authority and under the direction of the church. I am at a loss to know how any church of Christ can "refuse its aid and comfort," even to the erring. "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith."—Gal. vi. 10. Again, Jesus' blessed command is to "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you." "If ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so?"—Matt. v. 44, 47. Churches that claim to be totally independent of one another cannot be in fellowship one with another; and there is no real independence in churches, any more than there is in individual members of one church. In truth there is but one church of God. "One body and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." This one body, or one church, is under but one law, or bond of brotherhood; and members of one local body are as much entitled to all the blessed privileges of any other local body as in their own—not entitled to any arbitrary or unbecoming assumption in either, but to only such blessed liberty as unites in bonds of holy union, love, peace and joy, and all the blessings of the Holy Spirit. Those blessings cannot be demanded under the laws of legislative or church rules, but alone secured through the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. The eighteenth chapter of Matthew is the prime law of Zion, and no church can persistently disregard it without involving itself in the dangers of lost visibility. It is indeed a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, who is the trier of the reins of men. It is often possible for all to err, and yet be the church of God; but their error must be righted under the spiritual and holy operations of God's sweet Spirit working in their hearts, or they will eventually pass away or wreck upon the shores of Babylon.

It is no wonder that many feeble ones are sorely tried, and mourn over the sad state of Zion; but such is and has always been the occasional afflictions that await the children of God. They were chosen in a furnace of affliction, that each one should be led to see that this earthly house and heavenly places here are not their final home.

In humble hope of a better state,

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—I have thought for a long time I would like to tell the brethren and sisters how much I delight in reading their able communications in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. How my heart goes out in praise to the Giver of every good and perfect gift, though I often feel too unworthy to receive such great privileges and blessings as I have enjoyed in church capacity. I do feel that the Lord has blessed this locality very much, in bringing sinners to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. I think it will make one's heart rejoice to have their neighbors come and say, We have been great sinners; you know our lives; we have done many things that have been wrong. I feel that there is hope for such when they can say, I feel to hope that God for Christ's sake has forgiven me all my sins.

Six have been added to our church by baptism, and it truly seems that the Lord's promise concerning Zion is fulfilled, that he will help her, and that right early. His promises are ever sure; not one will fail. He also says that whom he loveth he scourgeth. Some feel this in one way, and some in another. All is for their good and God's glory; and when they are tried they shall come forth as gold. Then they shall see the hand of the Lord in their deliverance, and give him all the praise and glory, knowing that the Lord has delivered them as no man could. When everything looks dark and dreary, the Lord alone can deliver us from all our trials. He can make crooked things straight, and rough places smooth; and he will never leave his people helpless or hopeless; for in mercy he has redeemed them, and will lead them to fountains of living water that shall never dry; for he will be in them a well of water springing up into everlasting life, though sometimes we may feel that we have no water to quench our thirsty soul. Then again we are made to know that the Lord will never leave nor forsake us, but will be with us in six troubles, and in the seventh will not forsake us. Sometimes we feel to say, Is any one so sorely afflicted as I am? I have felt sometimes like murmuring because my lot was so hard; and then again I have been made to say that affliction was good, to bring me near my God, and to make me learn his law, and make me say, What wilt thou have me to do? And then all I could find to do was to "stand still, and see the salvation of God."

So it has been with me in the different scenes the church has passed through. The dear Lord has been her helper, always disappointing the devices of the crafty, so that their hand could not perform their enterprise; often turning their work to a good account. Though men have meant it for evil, our God has meant it unto good. So liberty is given where bondage and death were intended; because the ways of the Lord are always equal. Under his divine guidance Zion rejoices, because her Joseph lives; and truly she can say, Mysterious are the works of the Lord, both in providence and grace; sending by whom he will, speaking by whom he will, to comfort his dear people; for all he has predestinated must come to pass, though men oppose it ever so much. Our God is greater than all, and he will make his saints rejoice with unspeakable joy, and delight in his everlasting love, as they sit together in heavenly places in Christ.

I think many of us have witnessed the goings forth of the Lord in the peace of the churches. I have felt to say that the hand of the Lord is underneath his saints. His power is able to and will accomplish his purpose. His word shall distill like the dew. None need fear what men can do; for if God be for one, who can be against that one? The love and mercy of our covenant-keeping God is manifest in the sweet fellowship of brethren and sisters, all praising God, from whom all blessings flow; who also will bring to light the hidden things of dishonesty, and cause his church to flourish and come forth in her garment of salvation.

I felt at our association like old Simeon. Mine eyes beheld God's salvation. It seemed as though there was such a oneness of feeling manifest among the brethren and sisters, and the preaching was so good and comforting, it appeared as the house of God and the very gate of heaven.

Dear brethren, I feel like penning some thoughts on the unity of brotherly love. How careful we should be to strive to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

If we have anything to say against a brother or sister, let us go and tell them, and thus strive to maintain brotherly love, that it may be continued according to the word of Jesus; for there is nothing so good as to see love and peace among brethren. Then each can feel his brother's sigh, and with him bear a part. O may we all desire to walk more and more in the footsteps of our dear Savior, and exalt his mercy and his loving-kindness to us, poor sinners. I feel too unworthy to commit any of my thoughts to paper, still I cannot get rid of making the attempt. By day and night it is on my mind to write for publication; still I feel very doubtful whether I can write anything that will edify the saints. Yet I feel to go on, trusting in the God of the whole earth. It seems I have seen so much of the goings forth of the goodness and mercy of our covenant-keeping Savior, I want to write to satisfy my mind, if it never appears in print.

I have thought for a few years past to examine what the Spirit of Christ teaches the Lord's people to observe; not only to try the spirits, but to walk according thereto, and not be carried away with the pride of the world, which wars against the Spirit, and brings us into condemnation and barrenness of soul, instead of rejoicing in Christ Jesus our living Lord, who commands us to take up the cross and follow him. I think the christian has a daily cross to bear, appearing sometimes so heavy that they can hardly bear up under it. I am sure they could not, except the everlasting arm were underneath them, to support and comfort in such sorrow, as the loss of a dear companion, or a child they have doted upon as a comfort in old age. Yet in all these trials and crosses we are made to see our heavenly Father's hand, dealing with us in mercy, and leading us in the way he would have us go, saying to us, "Fear not; I am with thee;" and assuring us in these afflictions that he will never leave nor forsake us. He works all things after the counsel of his own will, and all things work together for our good, as his favored and peculiar people. These light afflictions work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not on things that are seen, which perish, but on unseen things, imperishable and eternal.

I have sometimes thought, If I am one of that number that John saw coming up through great tribulations, having washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, what are these few trials, or years of sickness, or even death itself? for the presence of the Lord cheers the soul, as in the case of dear sister Mary Parker, and many others of his tried people. His presence, as the strong deliverer, filleth all in all.

I have been a member of the church over sixty years, and have often asked myself, What progress have I made? I am often sinning and repenting, often brought to judgment, and complaining because of the evil that I do. The good I would, I do not. Can it be possible that such a sinful, vile creature can hope in the Lord, and be so unspeakably happy as I am, when the presence of the Lord cheers my soul, and I am favored with an ear to hear what the Spirit saith to the churches, and can listen to the proclamation of the glorious gospel of the Son of God, as the delight of my soul, and feel carried away in the spirit of my mind to say, "The Lord reigns, let the earth rejoice," and, "The Lord reigns, let the earth keep silence?" My glad heart is filled to overflowing with love to God and heaven-felt fellowship to the afflicted and poor people of my God.

May Israel's God sustain and keep his people, lead them into the truth, keep them in his fear, enable them to be followers of God as dear children, and bow in humble subjection to his holy will in all things, is the prayer of your unworthy sister in Christ, who desires to send love to the household of faith.

MARY JENKINS.

TAYLORS, Miss., Oct. 13, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Surrounding circumstances have caused me to study and investigate the Scriptures considerably in reference to order and disorder, and recently I have felt an impression to speak through the SIGNS on that subject, by your permission. I do not wish to write in a dictating spirit, nor would I dare claim perfection for my views; but inasmuch as "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness," &c., it behooves every saint, every church and every association to be guided alone by that unerring standard in all their transactions and deliberations. By a strict observance of the rules laid down in the inspired word only can love, unity, peace and fellowship reign and be perpetuated among the saints while sojourning in these tabernacles of clay.

If I understand the meaning of order, it means unity, harmony, concert, &c. Disorder means the reverse: it means confusion. But I believe that a church or body of churches may get into disorder and confusion, and yet be the churches of Christ, and their acts valid. If this is not true, then hundreds of Old School or Primitive Baptist Churches of the present day might as well be counted out; and as many as six of the "seven churches of Asia" might also have been counted out. There is an idea among some Baptists that if a church gets into disorder she cannot move a wheel, and that none of her acts are valid until she clears herself of all disorder. Such an idea, to my mind, is contrary to the teaching of the inspired word. If a church is a church of Christ at all, my opinion is that it never ceases to be a church of Christ, so long as "two or three" meet together in the name of Christ, and "contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." But, of course, when it is seen that they are overpowered and outnumbered, and cannot rid themselves of disorder in any other way, it is best to withdraw fellowship, and "come out from among them, and be separate." But I think that in such cases great forbearance and caution ought to be exercised, "lest that which is lame be turned out of the way; but let it rather be healed." "For who art thou that judgest thy brother? or why dost thou set at naught thy brother? Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth. Yea, he shall be holden up; for God is able to make him stand. Let us not therefore judge one another any more; but judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling-block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way."—See Rom. xiv.

This question of order and disorder affects no other class of God's people as it does preachers. For instance, if a preacher goes among strange brethren, the first question asked is, "Where are you from?" The next question is, "What association do you belong to?" The recognition of preachers in this day and time seems to hinge, not upon the doctrine they preach, nor upon their moral qualities, but altogether upon what association they belong to. Now while I enjoy and love associations, as worshiping assemblies of the true and living God, I think this is carrying the thing a little too far. Where is the law, either in the Bible or out of it, compelling a church or individual to be identified with some association, before said church or individual can be recognized as a sound Baptist, and must be set at naught as otherwise? When Paul came from Damascus to Jerusalem the disciples did not inquire what association he belonged to, nor whether he belonged to any or not, nor whether his church was in order or not; yet when he "assayed to join himself to the disciples," they were "afraid of him," and "believed not that he was a disciple." "But Barnabas took him, and brought him to the apostles, and declared unto them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and that he had spoken to him, and how he had preached boldly at Damascus, in the name of Jesus. And he was with them coming in and going out at Jerusalem."—See Acts ix. Now this was all the evidence or testimony required by the apostles at Jerusalem; that was, that the Lord had appeared to him in the way, that he had spoken to him, and how Paul had preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus. It seems to me to be rather an attempted improvement on the Scriptures even to require a "letter of dismission" from one church to another. When Paul found the twelve disciples at Ephesus he did not inquire of their order or standing, except to ask, "Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?" And, "Unto what then were ye baptized?" He preached unto them Jesus. "And when they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus." When Aquilla and Priscilla heard Apollos preach they did not inquire after his order or standing, neither did they ask as to what particular church or association he belonged; but they took him (that is, they received him), and "instructed him in the way of the Lord more perfectly."

On one occasion, when Jesus was here in the flesh, John said, "Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and he followeth not after us; and we forbade him, because he followeth not us. But Jesus said, Forbid him not: for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly speak evil of me. For he that is not against us is on our part."—Mark ix. 38-40. Now I do not regard this circumstance as authorizing all the so-called religious orders of the present day, but I do regard it as a stunning rebuke to those who are so particular as to order and standing in a practical way, regardless of the gospel preached by the servants of our God; and it is intended to show us that we have no scriptural right to forbid any man preaching the gospel of Christ, simply because he is not identified with "our association," or some other association that is in correspondence with ours, or even if he belongs to a church that is not identified with an association at all. Some sound and able ministers of the New Testament are cornered off and shut out from usefulness in the cause of Christ on account of their connection with some association, or because some brother or brethren considers them in disorder. I ask, What does a consideration of disorder amount to, if there is no real proof? I contend that I have no right to judge my brother, or to "set at naught" my brother, or to fail to recognize him in the full sense, until it has been proved that his own church has preferred and sustained charges against him, and expelled him from the church. Then, and not till then, can I afford to slight him in the least. When I do so I criminate myself, and thus become a disorderly member of the church. Paul admonishes us in all his epistles to receive one another for Christ's sake, to forgive one another, and pray for each other. John tells us of some that did not receive the brethren themselves, and forbade them that would, and cast them out of the church. I am satisfied that a great many of the exclusions and nonfellowship resolutions of the present day are the result of envy, prejudice and jealousy, and originate in the flesh, and not in the Spirit.

Hence so much division and confusion among the Baptists in different portions of the country. John says, "If any man come unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him Godspeed." This, I claim, is the only test of fellowship and recognition for the saints to be governed by. If we attempt to find a church that has never had trouble, disorder nor confusion, and one that has made no missteps, I think we shall have to leave this world to find it. I do believe that the Baptists are one people the world over, though they may and do differ in their understanding of some portions of the Scripture. But the great trouble is, all do not practice what they do know. I feel my own shortcomings in this particular. O how my poor heart would rejoice to know that the Baptists were united everywhere, and walking together in love, as Christ also loved us, and gave himself for us. In the language of Paul, I would say, "I say not these things to condemn you, but as my beloved sons I warn you."

I have not written as I desired, but have done the best I could. I hope I have said nothing wrong. May God's blessings rest upon us all, is my prayer for Jesus' sake. Amen.

Yours in gospel bonds,

H. J. REDD.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Having been assured repeatedly by the many contributors of the SIGNS that the story of God's love and mercy in bringing his children manifestly nigh to himself by his own precious blood, is ever new and welcome to a place in our excellent family paper, I gladly send the exercises of sister Goodrich as she wrote them to my niece, who is a member of our family at present. We feel that hers are the breathings of a contrite spirit. Her expressions tell the sad tale of woe because of indwelling sin and its fruits, and of the great grace applied in blotting out as a thick cloud her transgressions, causing her to trust and not be afraid, and to be joyful in the presence of the King in Zion. Then she can tell of the beauty of the church, the love of the brethren and sisters, and of feeling like a child at home. What rest is like this? What joy unspeakable and full of glory does the salvation of God bring! Saved by grace, which is indeed favor of the Lord. Well might the psalmist say, "Let the inhabitants of the rock sing, let them shout from the top of the mountains." For while they were yet sinners, Christ died for the ungodly. All who are inhabitants of the rock are sinners saved by the amazing grace of God; and though they are enabled by that sweet grace to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory in God's love, they feel that of sinners they are chief. Because they are such, they groan, being burdened, longing to be clothed upon with their house which is from heaven. They cannot hope that the thorn will be taken from their side, but their loving Savior assures them that his grace is sufficient for them; and so it is. Each redeemed child has his bitter trials and disappointments, but all are for their good; not one too many. They shall work patience and experience.

"Trials make the promise sweet;
Trials give new life to prayer;
Trials bring us to his feet,
Make us low, and keep us there."

Sometimes when the flesh is very weak I find trials not joyous, but grievous; and again, when the Lord increaseth my strength, or rather is my strength, I can rejoice in tribulation, and be glad that God visits me, even though it be to refine by trial. This morning I awoke heavy-hearted, and immediately I thought, There is no cause for this; and the words, "Unto you," were repeated several times in my mind. Then the complete sentence came so sweetly as to let me fall quietly asleep, "Unto you which believe, he is precious." How good it is to see those for whom such great things have been done, brave and patient, having no time for needless fretting and complaining, knowing, as all do, how unworthy they are of God's choice blessings. I greatly desire to think of the manifold mercies of the Lord to me, rather than to spend my time in sighing because of affliction.

Dear kindred, may we, as sinners saved by grace, be enabled to walk in Christ Jesus the Lord as we have received him, in meekness, love and sweet humility. I only thought to write briefly, and fear I have written disconnectedly; but I trust the brethren will deal faithfully, and not allow anything from my pen to appear that would be better unsaid. I am so fallible that I do and say many things without wisdom; but those who know me personally need not to be told this.

May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with all who love the assembly of the saints.

In love, your unworthy sister,
WATIE A. BEARD.

JUSTUS, Pa., Sept. 9, 1889.

MISS PEARL VAIL—DEAR SISTER—If one so unworthy as I am may call you sister. I hope you will pardon me for taking the liberty of writing to you. I have felt a great desire to write, but felt too unworthy; but to-day it has been constantly on my mind to write you some of the Lord's dealings with me, a poor, miserable sinner.

I was very young the first time I remember thinking of death, and of where I should go if I were to die. I would think about it very often, and at times be greatly troubled on account of my sins. Then I would read the Bible, but it was a sealed book to me. I traveled on in this way until last spring, when my burden began to grow very heavy. The first day of June I went with my husband to covenant meeting for the first time, and, as I thought then, for the last; but it seemed the Lord ordered it otherwise. I felt as if I were standing over a great gulf, and I should surely be lost. As I was so vile and sinful, there could be no help for me. At times I would think I never would go to meeting again; and at other times I could hardly wait for the time to come to go. The next time Elder Vail came I went again. My brother told what the Lord had done for him, was received, and baptized the next day. Those two days were the darkest of my life. I felt as if I should die, and I had no desire to live. All day Sunday these words were on my mind,

"When through the deep waters I call thee to go,
The rivers of woe shall not thee overflow."

I felt as if I must find them as soon as I came home from meeting; but as my husband was sick, I had no time that night, but felt sure they were in the hymn book. I felt no better next morning, so I got the hymn book and began looking for those words. I looked through every hymn until I found them. They were in No. 751, Beebe's Collection. I read it many times, but felt no better. Something seemed to say, "You must sing it." So I went up stairs, saying many times as I went, "Lord, have mercy." I sat down and sang it through, as well as my falling tears would let me; and when I had finished singing the last verse my burden was gone, and I seemed to be standing on the other side of that great gulf, and it was closed up. I came down stairs, and how changed all things looked! I felt as if everything was praising the Lord. O, I thought, if I only knew how, I could praise him too; but I could not find words good or great enough to express my feelings. The next night I had a beautiful dream. I dreamed of standing by the water, and hearing beautiful singing, and Elder Vail led me down into the water to baptize me. But I soon awoke, and my joy was turned to sorrow, when I found it all a dream. The next day was very dark to me. I had many doubts and fears. But as I was riding along these words came to my mind, "Fear not; I am with thee." Then I felt at peace. A few days after, as I was reading in the Bible of the crucifixion of the Savior, I saw it all so plainly, and felt that he died for me. I felt very happy, and many beautiful passages of Scripture came to my mind at that time. Then I began to think of going before the church. At times I felt as if I could not wait until Elder Vail came again, and at other times I would have so many doubts and fears that I thought perhaps I had been deceived. But when the time came for meeting I went and told them something, I hardly knew what. I was received, and next day was baptized. This was the happiest day of my life. O how good the Lord's people do look to me! for if I know anything of my heart, I do love them. I never shall forget the words of comfort your dear father spoke to me the day my brother was baptized, when I was feeling as if there were no hope for me. I still have many doubts and fears, but hope the Lord will keep me; for I know I cannot keep myself for one moment.

I do not think this worthy of a reply, but would be glad to hear from you.

Your unworthy sister, if one at all,
MRS. G. W. GOODRICH.

PRATT MINES, Ala., Oct. 10, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN IN THE FAITH AND PATIENCE OF JESUS CHRIST:—This week has been one of sadness, sorrow, and many thoughts with me. I went to meeting on Saturday, but returned home sad in the evening, and did not go back on Sunday. I have visited a church northeast of me before I joined the Baptists, and that church has had many pleasant meetings. Their former pastor lived at a distance, and about four years ago he told them he could not serve them any longer, and they called me. I served them one year, and on account of my own infirmities and the health of my family, I told them to call some other. They made another call, but the man did not serve them regularly, and two years ago they called me again. The second year expired on the first Saturday in September. I esteemed the whole church, and have been with them at nearly every meeting, and had brother Redd to be with us one meeting. Also, I got brother Lively, of Georgia, and brother Curry, of Kentucky, to visit among us. I did it for the welfare of all, and their visits and themselves seemed to be well appreciated. The church has moved on all this long time in peace, and the meetings have been pleasant till last May. Elder Curry was present when a preacher tried to divide the church on predestination; but he made a signal failure, and left, and has not been back since. It is the wolf that scatters the sheep. God's true ministers seek to gather the sheep, and keep them in the fold, and protect them from the ravenous wolves. We have seen their teeth and heard them howl all over this country, and the sheep are not all in a solid herd as they were a few years since.

Some twenty-five or thirty years ago the church in this country was guilty of spiritual adultery, and it extends over a large territory. I do not know the full limits of it. Some protested against it at the time, but influential, bombastic, wolf-natured preachers overruled, and got in their work of disorder. About ten or twelve years ago all began to repent, and to try to restore the churches to the primitive order.

They had a division, but since prejudice upon doctrine has come in, and evil is being hunted up. There are unpleasant irregularities being found, and much trouble and division are coming again. On last Saturday the former pastor was present at the church northeast of me, and when the time for conference came one deacon arose and stated that he did not consider the church in order to transact business any longer, and made statements concerning the order of the church that surprised me; and the only remedy for reform is to tear the church down to the ground and rebuild it. The former pastor supposed that he now was in order, with a party that could do the work to stand; but myself and a majority of the church are not convinced of that. I could not sustain either side of the question, and I proposed a cessation of meetings; but the deacon proposed to continue to meet and pray together, and take time to meditate. This was a good move, and I aimed to leave it for the church to decide among themselves. I told them I would return home. We sang a hymn, and shook hands, all in tears. I cannot describe the feelings of myself and others. I can only say that it was a solemn thing to witness and experience among a little band that has stood together so long in peace and fellowship, and all endeavoring to hold to the true principles of the doctrine of Jesus Christ. We talked a good deal in the meeting, but no prejudice was manifest. There seemed to be more tears than malice, or I would not write of it. I never before was at such a meeting, and I hope all who read this, if printed, will pray for us. I had got but a short distance from the meeting house till I learned that some of the sisters were badly hurt because I had quit them, and I promised to go back at the next meeting time. The former pastor was to preach next day (Sunday), and did so; and I hear that he aims to bring an arm or helps from his church, and that the deacon and a few others aim to set up on a new platform next third Sunday. The other deacon and some others will hold up for meditation and more advice. I have written to the deacon, and exhorted him to stick to his proposition to meet, and pray, and meditate, and try to save the church whole. I do not know what effect entreaties may have. I feel sad about it, and everything seems to be covered with a gloom. I know that God is at the helm of affairs, and that he will bring his people all off more than conquerors. Though they be cast into the den of danger, or into the hot furnace of affliction, or go deep down into the dark dungeon of despair, he will not leave them nor finally forsake them. "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will we not fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea:

though the waters thereof roar and be troubled: though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacle of the Most High." This river is the pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, and proceeds out of the throne of God and the Lamb. "And in the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." This great river, and the tree of life, its fruits and leaves, are all for the healing of the wounds of the chosen generation of Jesus Christ; and he knows when and how to apply them; and he has never failed to effect a cure. But we often get weary, and are unprepared at such time to obey the command, "Be still, and know that I am God."

I have not written to cast any reflection, but to give vent to my feelings, and to solicit sympathy. If I could portray that meeting and my feelings, some (if not all) would read with interest and sympathy. I close, in deep affliction of mind and heart.

P. J. POWELL.

P. S.—I should have stated that when the churches here reformed they were received into fellowship all around; and although there were some things overlooked in some churches, it is almost like being tried twice for the same offense. I omit a full history, lest I should misrepresent.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I inclose a letter received a short time since from a brother in the flesh, and also, I hope, in the Spirit, which I think will be read with interest by the readers of your most valuable paper. I read it with comfort, and think it contains sound doctrine. If you think it worthy a place in your paper, please publish it, and oblige, REBECCA DOVE.

DELTA, Ohio.

DEAR SISTER IN CHRIST:—I will try to write you a few lines and send them with John's letter. Since I have been sick I have taken much comfort in reading the Bible and in contemplating the dealings of God with his people; and I often feel that I have been taught to know and realize the blessedness of the hope that Paul said we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast. We find in the Scriptures many precious promises, which we sometimes fear are not meant for us; and while we look within we see so much sin and corruption that we are ready to say, Surely one so vile cannot hope to ever see the face of him who sits upon the throne of God. But while we see in ourselves no good, but all sin, we only cling to Christ the closer; for we are taught in the Scriptures that Jesus came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance. Only by his grace are we enabled to see our sins, and to hate them; therefore if we hate sin, we love holiness, without which we shall never see God. But all is in Christ. He is our righteousness, our sanctification and redemption. "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." "And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." So then we can claim all the promises, if indeed we have been "born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." But how often we doubt this, and fear that we are deceived in the whole matter, and that we are only poor, deluded mortals. Then our thoughts go back to the time when we had given up all hope of being saved; when we saw the justice of God in condemning us and forever casting us from his presence; and we remember the joy that filled our souls when Christ was revealed unto us as our Savior, and we were enabled by faith to receive him as such. Now we follow all along, and pick up evidence after evidence of God's dealings with us, until we are enabled once more to lay hold upon the hope set before us; which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast. Now we are ready to say, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." Surely he has carried us all the days of old. "He has put a new song in my mouth, even praise to his name." Now we feel we can claim all the promises, through faith in Christ. What precious promises they are! Jesus, in speaking of his sheep, says, "I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish; neither shall any pluck them out of my hand. My Father, which gave them me, is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand." Now, my dear sister, do we believe him? If we do, let us not fear; for surely all his chosen are or will be saved with an everlasting salvation. Let us trust in the Lord forever. Amen. Pray for poor me.

REJOICING IN HEAVINESS.

"WHEREIN ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations."—1 Peter i. 6.

Among the peculiarities which identify the followers of Jesus in their sojourn in this earthly house of their pilgrimage, nothing is more clearly manifest to their own comprehension than the fact that their seasons of joy and of sorrow are not dependent upon the circumstances by which they are surrounded. In the midst of temporal prosperity they may be oppressed with a sense of utter wretchedness and poverty; and again, when in the midst of worldly distresses and adversity, they may be filled with joyful emotions. Not only is this peculiarity unaccountable to their companions in this world, but it is equally a mystery to their own natural reason. No efforts of the carnal mind can ever comprehend this fact. It is so effectually hidden by the will of God that it will always be as wonderful to those who behold it as it was when in the desert the angel of the Lord appeared unto Moses in the bush that burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed. In that type was revealed the purpose of God in choosing his people in the furnace of affliction. As the presence of the Lord was attested by the preservation of the bush in the midst of the fire, so the trials of the subjects of salvation afford unquestionable testimony that they are saved by the angel of his presence. Thus every sorrow and distress which is suffered by them is made to bear witness in giving them assurance that they are the special objects of that infinite and eternal love of God by which they were ordained unto salvation from sin through the grace that is in Christ Jesus.

"Wherein ye greatly rejoice." This expression refers to that "lively hope" which is mentioned in the preceding context. That hope is not like any mere natural expectation of the fulfillment of an earthly desire. No hope for temporal things can be called a lively hope in the sense in which the apostle here uses that expression. The desire and its object must both be subject to death if earthly things are hoped for. Since the ground was cursed for the sake of man "the fashion of this world passeth away." This is the seal of death which God has set upon all that pertains to time. The "lively hope" of Christ, which is the abiding witness within every saint, embraces the eternal promise of God, that cannot lie; and therefore it entereth into that within the veil, whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made a high priest forever after the order of Melchisedec. This hope is not of the earth, and consequently neither in its anticipation nor in its object is it subject to the power of death. Such is indeed "a lively hope." The rejoicing which it inspires is not affected by the transitory afflictions and trials of this world. The rejoicing of the saints in this hope is heavenly in its character, and its greatness does not consist in the transient excitement of natural exultation. It is the divine power of living faith which constitutes the greatness of that rejoicing which is in Christ Jesus, and not in self-confidence. Not even their conflicts and tribulations can prevent their rejoicing greatly in the everlasting consolation of this living and abiding hope. If they were dependent upon their own strength for this rejoicing, they would never know anything of joy. It is only when they look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen, that they can thus "greatly rejoice" in the fact that their trials are temporal and but for a moment, while their hope is centered upon the unchanging realities of eternal blessedness in Christ Jesus. When the joy of Jesus remains in his saints in its living power, making their joy full, then they do indeed "greatly rejoice." Experimentally they realize this rejoicing in those seasons when in themselves they are most oppressed with conscious destitution and weakness.

"Though now for a season." Perhaps the saints are more inclined to forget the limitation of their sorrows by the love of God than they are apt to be conscious of. Indeed, it is seldom that we consider the wonderful mercy manifest in giving us the brief measure of time in which to endure "our light affliction." The severest experience appointed to any saint "is but for a moment." The suffering which has been endured is past—we have not to bear that again; whatever remains to be encountered has not yet come upon us. It is but for a moment that the most painful affliction must be borne. Even though our whole time in this world may be passed in the endurance of affliction, every moment is quickly past, and each succeeding wave of tribulation leaves still the remaining portion less. Thus time itself is among the things which "work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." Our griefs and pains are borne away upon the fleeting wings of the passing moment, while there is no measure for that "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory," which is wrought for us by these evanescent sufferings. When passing through the deep waters of affliction it is a strong consolation to know that it is "but for a moment." In our impatience and fretfulness the moments of our tribulation seem to linger, and it has been well said that

"The wisest of us all, when woe Darkens our pathway here below, Are childish to the last degree, And think what is must always be."

The result of all our affliction is declared to be for our profit. It is not that we are to receive that profit in the presence of God in the heaven of ultimate glory. The finished work of our victorious Redeemer has secured for every one of his saints all the glory of his throne with the eternal Father. Nothing can be added to the infinity of that perfect bliss. It is in their present experience that they receive the result of that measure of affliction which they are personally called to endure. The same inconceivable love of God by which they were chosen in Christ unto salvation from sin is displayed in giving them "in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake."—Phil. i. 29. If we could feel this truth when crushed beneath the weight of accumulated sorrows, it would bring strength to make us "greatly rejoice" in such confirmation of our hope in the salvation which is of God in Christ Jesus. The little season of tribulation would then be welcomed as the testimony of God in our individual experience in confirmation of that hope wherein we greatly rejoice. When by faith this assurance is revealed in the saints, the remembrance of their affliction seems inestimably precious to them. Their very darkness glows with the light of divine assurance, so that the season of heaviness is an everlasting pillar in their memory of the way in which the Lord has led them to a strong city of habitation. While they may at times doubt their brighter manifestations of the favor of God, they recall their endurance of deep and sore affliction, without a question of its reality, as "a more sure word of prophecy." In this way the promise of the Lord is fulfilled by making darkness shine as precious light in the leading of his spiritual Israel. They must feel this darkness in order to enjoy the heavenly comfort of the light of assurance which is therein written by the love of God. It is the hand of our God which leads his people in the darkness of midnight as well as when they rejoice in the light of noonday. He forms the light, and creates darkness. He uses both for the good of his chosen people.

"If need be." This cannot signify that necessity controls the eternal purpose of our God in choosing his people in the furnace of affliction. In his sovereignty and omnipotence nothing superior to the eternal counsel of his own will can limit his appointment of all creatures and all the circumstances which must ever surround them. Even the choice of his saints in Christ Jesus does not result from any difference between them and other sinners in themselves considered. It is expressly declared to be "According to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved." This sovereignty of God in his electing love is not like anything in the natural world. To all creature sovereignty there is necessarily somewhere a limitation. Not so with him who works "all things after the counsel of his own will." No higher law restrains that will. It is the perfect standard of righteousness. He is no less infinitely holy in the dreadful visitation of divine wrath upon those angels whom "he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day," than in the revelation of his love in saving his people from their sins. No "need be" can govern or limit the will of the Almighty God. "Whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did he in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and in all deep places."—Psa. cxxxv. 6.

This "need be" applies to the temporal experience of the "afflicted and poor people" of his choice, in their fellowship of the sufferings of their Redeemer. They cannot follow him in any other path but that which he himself has led. There is manifestly a "need be" for their endurance of tribulation in the world. Of necessity they must be subjected to suffering with him. It was not to unbelieving people that Paul was talking when he was "Confirming the souls of the disciples, and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God."—Acts xiv. 22. "For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost."—Rom. xiv. 17. Those who hunger and thirst after righteousness can only find the entrance into that kingdom of God through the endurance of much tribulation. Here is the "need be" for every affliction which is endured by them. "For unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake."—Phil. i. 29. "It is a faithful saying, For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with him; if we deny him, he also will deny us; if we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himself."—2 Tim. ii. 11-13. From these portions of Scripture it is clearly manifest that the "need be" for the temporary suffering of heaviness by the saints is the provision of grace whereby they enter into experimental fellowship with their Lord in his affliction. In this necessity they are brought into such consolation of the gospel of Christ as they could never enjoy without following in his pathway and drinking of the cup of bitter sorrows, whose dregs were drained by the suffering Captain of our salvation.

"Ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations." It should be observed that the saints are not simply required to experience these "manifold temptations;" they must be "in heaviness" through them. If they might have such strength as to endure the temptations triumphantly in the assurance that they were thereby following Jesus, the "need be" of our text would not be therein fulfilled. Not even the inspired apostles were exempt from this experience of the heaviness which comes through the manifold temptations which all followers of Christ must needs endure. They were "As sorrowful, yet alway rejoicing." Often the sorrowful ones look forward to a time when they expect to attain such strength as to be able to meet the trials of the way without feeling their terrible heaviness. If they could do this, the trial would not be profitable to them. It must produce the heaviness in order that they may be partakers in the rejoicing.

The "manifold temptations" are not necessarily those inclinations to sinful action which are sometimes presented to tempt the saints. The meaning of the word as here used is whatever form of trial they are called to encounter. Whether it be persecution, or destitution, or pain, all that tries the faith of the disciple is included in these "manifold temptations" which are needful for their growth in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. When this truth is recognized by them their "manifold temptations" but serve to increase their occasion for greatly rejoicing.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Juniata Old School Baptist Association, convened with the Providence Church, Bedford Co., Pa., October 4th, 5th and 6th, 1889, to the associations with whom she corresponds, sends greeting in the Lord.

In the providence of our God we are again met in an associational capacity. Our correspondence from sister associations is small, yet our association is one of great interest to us in our lonely condition. The preaching has been clear and sound, and that poor, lost sinners of Adam's race are the ones for whom Jesus died, and not eternal spirits. Now, dear brethren, may we ever be willing to be little children, sitting at Jesus' feet, and learning of him. Dear brethren, we greatly desire a continuation of your correspondence.

Our next association is appointed to be held with the Sidling Hill Church, Fulton Co., Pa., to commence on Friday before the first Sunday in October, 1890, where we hope again to meet your messengers; and may the blessings of God be with us all. Amen.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

My father, Elder E. W. Earle, died on the 6th day of March, 1877, at my house, in the seventy-eighth year of his age.

He died as he had lived, in the blessed hope of immortality beyond the grave, prepared before the foundation of the world for all God's people. I send you some of his writings, written on the fly-leaf of his Testament only a short time before his death, requesting you to publish them in the SIGNS.

BEN. P. EARLE.

DAWSON, Ky., Oct. 17, 1889.

"E. W. EARLE'S book. In the year of our Lord 1800, on the 4th day of February, I was born, in Greenville District, S. C. My father moved to Kentucky, and I joined the Regular Baptist Church in Caldwell County at the age of fourteen years. I have been a member of the Regular Baptist Church sixty-three years, fifty-four years of which time I have been in much weakness trying to preach the gospel of the grace of our God. I have preached in eight states, where I have met with many precious brethren and sisters that I hope knew and loved the truth. I have been in the division of two associations. We had a hard conflict with those who taught the doctrine of the Judaizing preachers, that men must do something or they could not be saved; but after the separation we enjoyed union and peace. They said many things against me because of my opposition to their doctrine. I have fought my fight, and the time of my departure is near at hand. I have a good hope through grace that there is a rest prepared for me with all the redeemed, and that I shall see Jesus, and be like him. Written in the seventy-seventh year of my age."

E. W. EARLE.

DIED—At his home in Cass Co., Ill., Aug. 30th, 1882, Elijah Watkins. Brother Watkins was born in Hart Co., Ky., July 22d, 1797.

ALSO,

His wife, Lydia A. Watkins, died Oct. 6th, 1889. She was born May 5th, 1802.

Brother and sister Watkins were married April 29th, 1816. Sister Watkins received a hope in 1822, and brother Watkins about two years later. They went before the Primitive Baptist Church in Hart Co., Ky., and were received. They moved to Wayne Co., Ill., and put their letters in a church of the same faith in that county. In 1834 they moved to Menard Co., Ill., and joined the Little Flock Church of Primitive Baptists by letter, living in that church until their death. They were faithful members, ever ready to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, having no fellowship for the unfruitful works of darkness, and always filling their seats when health would permit. Brother Watkins served the church as Deacon for a number of years. They had born to them fifteen children, nine sons and six daughters, five of whom survive, three sons and two daughters.

The funeral of brother Watkins was deferred until after the death of sister Watkins. Elder G. W. Murray preached their funeral on the second Sunday in October, 1889, to a large and attentive congregation, using John xiv. 1-6.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HALLVILLE, Texas.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have two letters that I received from my cousin in Arkansas. I will send them to you. Do as you wish with them and all will be right.

W. H. SHADDOCK.

DALARK, Ark., June 28, 1889.

W. H. SHADDOCK—DEAR COUSIN:—I never received your letter of May 5th until last Saturday, it being sent to Holly Springs, while I live about twenty-five miles from there. I was truly glad to get your letter, and have thought many times of writing to you since I heard that you had joined the church. I will be glad to receive a letter from you at any time, for I love to read of the joys and sorrows of the dear people of God. But I am often in such a downcast mood that I feel very little like writing or talking to any one on spiritual subjects, so that you will probably find me a poor and uninteresting correspondent. You strike a responsive chord in my breast when you say that you fear that you are not entitled to the name of a Primitive Baptist. I find so much evil in myself to contend with that I am often cast into doubts and fears, lest I am professing to be what I am not. True, the brethren manifest that they have a great deal of confidence in me, and I have too much confidence in them to believe that they would deceive me; but then they do not know me as I know myself. They cannot know, nay, I cannot tell them, of the terrible temptations and evil thoughts that encompass my mind by day and by night. They only know me as they see me outwardly, and derive their confidence from my public actions and speeches, never seeming to believe that under a bad enough outside there is a still worse heart. Often I feel little or no desire to read my Bible; and instead of the praise of the great and glorious God, whom I profess to love, being uppermost in my mind, I am wholly engrossed in my worldly business, studying how to make money, or increase my worldly substance; or I am indulging the carnal disposition, and my thoughts are running riot in things that pertain alone to the fleshly lusts; or if my mind should turn to things pertaining to the church and God's people, it is far too often in remembrance of some occasion when I have been permitted to enjoy liberty in preaching the word; and instead of feeling thankful for the blessing, I am inclined to feel boastful, and disposed to take some part of the honor to myself. O if I were to be saved or lost according to my deeds, how hopeless would the case be with me. But while doubts and fears thus take possession of my soul, I take some little encouragement; for if there had been no work of the Spirit of God within me, would I feel troubled because of my carelessness, carnality and boastful disposition? These are the things that the Adamic nature delights in; and were there no other spirit within us but that of father Adam, we would go on enjoying the things of this life, without knowing the way of peace, or having the fear of God before our face. What is it in us that makes us hate lying, theft and adultery, but the Spirit of him that said, "Thou shalt not bear false witness," "Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not commit adultery?" Then I can truly say with the apostle that "In me, that is, in my flesh, dwells no good thing," and that "when I would do good, evil is present with me." Then when we do that which is right, it is not of any free volition of our own, but it is because God works in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure. But when we do read, why is our understanding so dull? Because the carnal mind cannot understand the things of the Spirit; for they are foolishness to the natural man; neither can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned. And we often read with our carnal understanding, instead of with the mind of the Spirit. But when blessed and highly favored of God to be in the Spirit (and that is on the Lord's day), then wherever we turn there a blessing we find. So we are made to depend on the Lord in all things. And when we can truly realize this, together with our unworthiness, our little hope, which was only sufficient to keep us from despair, rises into a blessed assurance, and we feel a reconciliation that surpasses all earthly things. And indeed that reconciliation is not earthly, but is the bestowal of God; for "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself." But Arminians preach that we are to reconcile God.

God, working all things after the counsel of his own will, writes his law in the hearts of his people; and the first precept of that law written in our hearts convinces us that we are sinners. We at first hope to effect some change by which we will cease to be sinners and become righteous; but we are more and more convinced of our sinful condition, until all hope of improving our own condition is fled, and we feel in a lost and undone condition, without God and without hope in the world. The "Reverend Doctors" of our day are continually describing the condition of the sin-sick soul, and prescribing their remedies, which are always something for the creature to do; but the poor sinner that has tried all their vain experiments knows they will do no more good than did the vain and multitudinous offerings of Balaam when he tried to obtain for Balak a curse against Israel. We can depend alone on the mercies of a just and holy God; and that because of the choice of his people in Christ before the world began, and his having predestinated them unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ unto himself; for he is God, and changes not. The apostle further tells us that all spiritual blessings are bestowed upon us, according as he has chosen us in Christ before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love. Then how comforting to the child of grace is the heaven-taught but world-hated doctrine of election and predestination; for he knows that it is upon this that his sins are pardoned and that he receives every grace. "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began."

I am glad that you are blessed with church privileges; and though your number be small, a poor and afflicted people, the laughing and gazing stock of the world, these are true marks of the church of God, the ground and pillar of the truth. I would be glad to meet with you, according to your request, but it is entirely out of my power to do so at present. I am a very poor man, with a large family to support (ten in family). I have a school to commence on the 8th day of July, that will detain me until the 16th of August (thirty days). Besides, there is a district meeting to be held with our church (Chapel Hill) at the same time of your meeting. But I contemplate a trip to the Indian Territory some time after the middle of August, and under the blessing of God I may get around to your country also. I am sorry that you have concluded that I am a "big preacher," for should I be enabled to come you will find yourself disappointed. You must make allowance for Rufus Seale's opinion of me, as he is a special friend. It is by the grace of God I am what I am. Your affectionate cousin and brother in Christ, I hope,

W. H. SHADDOCK—DEAR COUSIN AND BROTHER:—Your highly appreciated letter of the 3d inst. was received a little more than a week ago; and I should have answered it before now, but have been away from home ever since I received it, and have been very busy. I hope that I feel grateful when some of God's dear children so remember me as to write to me, and especially when they deal in those things which I by experience am a partaker of. I do not know that I am entitled to a hope based upon the grace of God, but I do know that I have drank freely from the fountain of tribulation. I have traveled, and do travel, the dark and thorny path of which you speak, but learn, as you have, that tribulation is a part of the inheritance of God's people. I am sometimes encouraged to hope that it is because I am numbered with them that I partake so freely of tribulation; and, indeed, all the sorrows of God's people are turned into blessings; for tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed. And as did our Savior, so do we, learn obedience by the things that we suffer. David says, "Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now have I kept thy word." But for the correcting influence of our troubles which come upon us as the chastening rod of our loving Father, we would wander far from the pathway of righteousness; but our Father loves his children too well to suffer them to stray beyond the reach of sovereign mercy; therefore he visits their transgressions with the rod, and their iniquities with stripes; yet his loving-kindness he will not utterly take away, nor suffer his faithfulness to fail. We are all wayward children, and disposed to turn from the right way; therefore every one he loveth he chasteneth. None are without chastisement. If ye be without chastisement, then are ye not sons, but bastards. All these things, when viewed in the light of divine grace, tend to encourage our hope—that hope which is the gift of God, and is supported by his love and care, and therefore is unfailing. It is an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and entereth into that within the veil, whither the Forerunner has for us entered. Our hope may wane and grow, or it may at times appear so small that we are tempted to throw it by, and cease to claim it, and try to convince ourselves that it is a creature of the imagination; and again it may appear sufficient if we were called to die. But with all its variations it is sufficient to hold us securely unto that heavenly inheritance that is treasured up in Jesus for us; for it is Christ in us the hope of immortal glory, and abideth forever. The world often derides God's dear little ones because of their hope and the evidences of it. I once heard a minister tell his congregation that if he could get nothing better than a hope, he would not have that; there was no assurance in hope; that the basest sinner in the world could have a hope of heavenly felicity; that if he did not know he was going to heaven, he would have no confidence in his religion. Now I believe this was done to tempt and try some of the Lord's little ones; and I was a young professor, and not much acquainted with the Scriptures.

O how doubtful and fearful it did cause me to be! for I did not, nay, I could not, know. I could only hope. But how different it sounds when you say, "I live by hope; and if it were not for the hope of eternal redemption, I could not live in this gainsaying and aristocratic world." Therein you strike a responsive chord in the breast of every child of grace. Again, worldly professors and the devil all tell us that the feelings of deep distress on account of sin, and of joy for the hope of salvation in Christ from sin, is the work of an overstrained imagination, or of a diseased condition of the affections. But it is because they have never been thus tried in the furnace of affliction, nor experienced the joy of the love of God shed abroad in the heart. It is certainly an evidence of that humility that belongs alone to the family of Christ, to feel weak and ignorant, and yet be able to speak with the wisdom that God giveth. We of ourselves know nothing of spiritual things; and feeling our weakness and inability to pry into spiritual things, we conclude that we know nothing as we should, and sometimes are even inclined to go to the church with a confession of our ignorance, and ask the brethren to exclude us, because we are so far behind in point of wisdom and understanding that we feel unfit to be members with the lovely little flock of Christ. But, dear cousin, we should remember that it is good for us to feel so; for let him that thinketh he knoweth anything, think this yet again, that he knoweth nothing as yet as he ought to know. O may God give us then to feel our ignorance. The Pharisees, like worldly professors in our day, did not believe they were ignorant or blind, as is evidenced by their question to the Savior, "Are we blind also?" He answered, "If ye were blind, ye should have no sin; but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth." What reason for thankfulness in those who feel ignorant and blind; your experience places you in company with him who was a man after God's own heart, David, who said, "Such knowledge is too high for me: I cannot attain to it." Then a felt sense of our lack of wisdom brings us to depend on God's mercy; even as James says, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all liberally, and upbraideth not." Could we truly ask of God that of which we felt no lack? I think not.

What a great mercy then to be made to feel our ignorance; and how full of promise, too; for he that humbleth himself shall be exalted. But O what is the condition of him that thinks he is wise, and can teach spiritual wisdom to his fellow-man? Better is a fool, than he that is wise in his own conceit. These things often cause us to grieve and mourn. But Solomon, the wise man, comes in with a little consolation on this point, by telling us, "Better is the house of mourning than the house of joy." The Savior says, "Blessed are they that mourn; for they shall be comforted." Come, then, let us return unto our God; for he hath torn, and he will heal us: he hath broken, and he will bind us up. Do you feel to pass under clouds of darkness, and through storms of tribulation? It is the Lord's work. He rideth upon the storm in our help, and clouds are the dust of his feet. Behold, this is the Lord's work, and it is marvelous in our eyes.

I hope you will not conclude that I will tire of reading after one that tells of the riches of God's grace, as I think you do. I had hoped to pay you a visit soon, but do not now see the way open. If God shall open up a way, I will try to come, but cannot now tell when. I would be glad indeed to receive a letter from brother Jones, or any other of God's dear people that feel like writing to such a poor, unworthy worm as I am.

Now, my dear cousin, you want my consent to send my letter to the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I have never written anything for publication, nor have I ever considered anything that I could write worthy of publishing. I felt by that letter as I do by this, that it is hardly worth sending to a single correspondent, much less to go before the public. I do not remember now what I wrote; and though I have not desired to obtain notoriety by going into print, I will submit the matter to your judgment, and to that of the brethren Beebe, if you choose to send it. I hope that God may bless you and yours. Remember me at the throne of grace.

I remain your humble brother, I hope,

GILBERT BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I have just received such a good letter from Elder F. M. Casey, of Adairsville, Ga., that I would like it published in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, that others may read it. I had the pleasure of hearing the brother preach three sermons when he visited me the first of September last. I enjoyed his preaching, the first of the kind I had heard for a long time.

Yours in hope,

W. R. STITH.

ADAIRSVILLE, Ga., Oct., 1889.

W. R. STITH—DEAR FRIEND AND (I TRUST) BROTHER IN CHRIST:—I have neglected to write you. The cause has been fear. I often fear to speak or write, for I feel that it is far better to keep silent than to speak or write wrong things. Then if I could speak and write of right things, things that would comfort, edify and encourage fellow-pilgrims in this vale of sorrow, I would love to do so. How often do I feel the need of comfort, and think, Can there be any words that are truthful and righteous, that can be spoken or applied to me, that will give comfort to my fainting heart? Why am I cast down? What am I doing? How am I living? Am I living all the time after the flesh? Am I dead, or am I living? One thing I know, that is, I am living in the flesh. The five senses of nature are somewhat active, and by them I know that I am living in the flesh. But have I been crucified with Christ, and yet live? Does Christ live in me? Is my body dead because of sin? Is the spirit alive because of righteousness? If so, why am I so carnal? Why do I live so much after the flesh? Or do I know that I have ever been quickened by the Spirit? Have I been born again, and made a new creature in Christ? If so, why do I not live Christ-like? Ah, here is the mystery. "I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members." "So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin." Were it not for such comfortable words as these, would we not despair? We are well acquainted with this law of sin which is in our members, for it is with that law that we have to contend daily. Yes, we see its power in all our members—the lust of the eye, the lust of the flesh. O how lustful is the eye! It never can be satisfied in beholding the beauties of this world; neither can the lust of the flesh. It never says, Enough. The pride of life seems to embrace all, seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting and feeling. But the law of the mind, that is, the new mind, the new man, the new creature, Christ in his people, the life of Christ, the Spirit of Christ, eternal life, which he gives us in the new birth, serves the law of God. So then the natural or carnal mind is the earthly man, created in Adam, and born of the flesh; and the new mind is the heavenly man, created in Christ Jesus unto good works. "Born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." Then the spirit lusteth against the flesh, and the flesh against the spirit; and these are contrary the one to the other. This is the cause of the great warfare. When we remember that the one is every way in opposition to the other, ought we not to crucify the flesh and the affections thereof, and live after the new man, or mind, which is created in righteousness and true holiness, after the image of him who has created him? Paul said, "Whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son." I have often thought of this conforming work, which is evidently the work of the Spirit; for it is impossible for the flesh to conform to the image of Jesus; for "His visage was so marred more than any man."—See Isa. lii. 14. Hence this work of being conformed to the image of Jesus is the work of the predestination of God, and is a great cross and trial to the flesh. So if men were free to carry out their wills and ways they would all be wrong. When we can see and realize that the predestination of God is for our good, we rejoice in it, notwithstanding it is to the destruction or crucifixion of the flesh. Hence it is a needs be that offenses come. They must and did come upon Jesus, the head of his church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all. If we are under that work of conformity to the image of Jesus, it is a glorious work, and will end in the full likeness of Jesus in heaven. But O how we find ourselves striving against this work! Even Jesus himself cried out and said, "If it be possible, let this cup pass. Nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done." See how completely here he represents his people in all their infirmities; yea, as it is said of him, "Himself took our infirmities, and bear our sicknesses."—Matt. viii. 17. Remember that all the life Jesus lived on the earth was conformable to his people, obedient unto death. Then this is the life of his people on the earth, conformable to his death, filling up that which is behind of the afflictions of the body of Christ. How could he suffer for us, and with us, otherwise than on the principle of unity, or oneness? "Both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one; for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren, saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee." Was he not their brother? He was the Son of God. They are the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. Again he saith, "A garden inclosed is my sister, my spouse, a fountain sealed, a spring shut up." The unity is so perfect that when one member suffers, he suffers with them; for "in all their affliction he was afflicted." This is the cause of our suffering on earth for our sins. We know that we are sinners, for we suffer for sin; yea, we suffer with Christ; for without him we cannot suffer in mind, in the new man, for sin. Neither can we reign without him in glory. This makes us heirs of God, and joint heirs with the Lord Jesus Christ; joint heirs with him first in suffering in the flesh, and then to reign with him in glory. He was the chosen of the Father, and sent into this world to suffer and to die for and with his people; and his people, of every nation, kindred and tongue, were chosen in him, and blessed in him, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love. Then in Jesus they are all fair. There is no spot nor blemish in them. "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth." O that we could glorify God as we ought, and as I hope we desire, in our bodies and spirits, which are God's.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Oct. 22, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST—If a poor sinner like I feel myself to be should be allowed to claim such near relationship as brother; but if I am what I profess to be, a child of God, surely the tie that binds us together is much stronger and more lasting than all earthly relationships; for it is spiritual and eternal, abiding forever. It is that relationship that has, does and shall exist forever. It is that life that was given us in our Lord Jesus Christ before the world was, and is now being made manifest to the heirs of promise in the dispensation of the fullness of times, and cannot be brought in before the time appointed of the Father, who works all things after the counsel of his own will, and has all power in heaven and earth. Therefore we should be quiet, and wait the manifestations of all that our God has appointed for us. For we hear the prophet Isaiah declaring the word of the Lord, saying, "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner stone, a sure foundation. He that believeth shall not make haste." I think the poet must have had a clear view of this sure repose of the saints when he composed that good old hymn,

"How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord,
Is laid for your faith in his excellent word."

There is a rest that remaineth to every child of God, when that Rock, which is Christ Jesus, is revealed to them. It is a glorious rest provided, and given to all the children of God; and they are commanded by the Captain of their salvation to come unto him, when weary and heavy laden, while in this pilgrim state in the earth, amidst all their trials and temptations here in this time life, and he will give them rest. Yes, we must take all our cares and troubles to him, for he careth for us, if we be his. He is the panacea for all the troubles, sorrows and distresses that we are subject to while sojourning in this wilderness; and we are told that when he giveth quietness, what can give trouble? I will not forget the fact that the Captain also commands those who have this given rest to take his yoke upon them; yes, go tell the church what the Lord has done for them, and be obedient to every ordinance of his church, that he has established upon the earth. Take up the cross and follow him in being baptized, and then in the observance of all the laws of his kingdom; for in so doing we shall find rest. I am persuaded that there is no other way for one of these little ones to find rest. He says, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart." Notice, we must learn of him, who of God is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption. You see that in learning of him we get that wisdom that cometh down from the Father of lights. It is that wisdom which is above the reach of this world; with all its power to communicate, the world cannot teach it; for the Scriptures emphatically declare that the world by wisdom knows not God. He is only known by revelation of Jesus Christ. The school of Christ is the one that these little ones take their lessons in, and receive all the knowledge they have of spiritual things from him who is our Counsellor, Teacher, Priest and King. He is all and in all to his people. If any of his children lack wisdom, let them ask of God, who giveth liberally, and upbraideth not.

I did not intend to write a communication when I took my pen in hand a while ago; but I have kept on thus far, following the drift of my mind. It was my intention only to send you my remittance for the SIGNS, and to order the Church History and more hymn books for our church, a list of which I herewith inclose. I have been undergoing this year, since February, some experiences I am convinced that man never gets in any other way. On Feb. 17th last our church in conference agreed to make an effort to build a house of worship, and appointed a committee on building, with power to purchase a suitable lot in the city, and to build such a house as they thought in their judgment we could build by raising the money. We were poor financially, and had to raise money by subscription, from any person that felt willing to contribute to us for that purpose. I was one of that committee; and as my list will show, I have not neglected my duty. I have given it my prayerful and thoughtful attention. I have approached nearly all shades of religionists, besides many of no pretensions whatever to any religion, and have met with a general response in a small way from a great number, sufficient to justify us in building a good, comfortable church house, which is now completed, except seats and painting. We have bought chairs enough for the present, till we can have our seats completed. I fear I am wearying your patience with this letter, but I feel like telling of some things I learned. I found among all classes of religionists of the world that they were ignorant of what Primitive Baptists (or Hard Shells, as they call us down here) are; and I found some that thought we ought not to have any meeting house, and were honest enough to tell me so. Then I found not a few who gave us help in memory, they said, of some near relative, father, mother, or grandfather, or aunt, in whom they had the utmost confidence in their salvation, and some would say they were the best people in the world, though they were connected with some of the popular denominations of the world. The reference to these departed saints often would bring tears to their eyes. I found that most all who gave any expression thought the faith would do to die by, but was very unpopular to live by, with the world. The clergy of this city have not given us any helping hand, but rather gave their influence against us here. The pastor of a Missionary Baptist Church said he would give us fifty dollars, upon conditions that we, when we got in our new house, would have Sunday School, and take missionary collections. I told that fox that we did not want any of his money, if we had to sell out to get it, and that we would sooner pitch a tent upon the commons; that they did not have money enough to purchase any of the liberties of the free-born sons of Christ. Yes, if Christ therefore shall make you free, you shall be free indeed. I have been careful to tell all, when convenient, that our God did not need any of their money, and that the rocks of the mountains served his purpose as well as the gold in their banks; but a few of the Lord's poor needed the money to build them a house, to shelter them from the storm, the heat, the cold, the rain and the sunshine. We feel thankful to God that we have been blessed in our undertaking. We recognize the hand of the Lord in the matter, and have felt, "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." We know there is nothing in a house, in itself, although it marks our identity here in this city, to those who look for things that are seen. But to the spiritual vision there must be other and a more enduring sign of the Lord's people than these houses built with hands. There must be evidences of spiritual life among us. We must be of Zion, the planting of the Lord; and we have the assurance of our King, who said, "Every plant that my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." We hope we are of the Lord's planting, and that the vine he has planted will remain, and bear much fruit to his honor and glory, and that in the ages to come the lambs of God will have a church organization here in this city.

We hope the ministering brethren that pass through this city will make it convenient to stop among us and preach for us, when in the providence of our God they can do so. We are a little band of warm-hearted Baptists, and will feel like we are blessed in having so distinguished a guest among us to whom the Lord has committed a dispensation of the gospel, unworthy though we be to receive such honor.

If, dear brethren, you find anything in this scribble worth a place in our family paper, you can publish it, if it will not exclude better matter. I have followed my mind, and hope I have been guided by the Spirit to write what I have.

Yours in hope,

W. P. BURKS.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Having finished my letter on business, I wish to pen an item of glorious news, glorious to me, and to many at our church, New Hope, at Greenbush, Warren Co., Ill., and I hope it will interest many of your readers. On last Sunday, Oct. 20th, six females were baptized at our church by our beloved and able brother, Elder B. F. Querry, of Raymond, Ill. Three of the parties were our daughters, viz., Mary Shields, visiting from Missouri, and our single daughters, Susie and Martha. The latter united at the water's side. Also, our daughter-in-law, Mrs. Jennie Vanmeter, Mrs. Rena Bowen and Miss Alice B. Holeman, both daughters of Deacon Isaac Holeman. Our venerable brother, Elder B. R. Warren, of Bently, Ill., was also with us, and added his testimony that salvation is of the Lord. Two of the six came forward on Saturday at noon, and three at night, and one on Sunday morning at the water. After baptism and an able and comfortable discourse by Elder Querry, the Lord's supper was attended to, and we went to our homes rejoicing. Others are looked for at our church soon, from the signs we see. May the Lord be praised for the reign of his grace.

Your brother in Christ,

I. N. VANMETER.

HONEA, Ala., Sept. 20, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN EDITORS:—I am a reader of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and was many years before the late war. I am well pleased with the doctrine it advocates. There are many false doctrines in this section. We are having some trouble among professed Primitive Baptists. Associations are at variance. Some hold that there is no resurrection; some hold the Arminian system, preaching a mixture of works and grace. If I know anything about the plan of salvation, it is by grace alone.

I would not trouble you with my imperfection, nor expose my ignorance, but want you to give your views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on Luke xv. 13. Who was the "elder son"? Your compliance will accommodate a poor old sinner, if a saint at all, less than the least of all. May the good Lord bless you in your labor.

In hope of eternal life, most truly your brother,

WM. HONEA.

THE ELDER SON.

"AND he said, A certain man had two sons; and the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living. And not many days after the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living. And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want. And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat; and no man gave unto him. And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants. And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet: and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry: for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry. Now his elder son was in the field: and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard music and dancing. And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things meant. And he said unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and sound. And he was angry, and would not go in: therefore came his father out, and entreated him. And he answering said to his father, Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment; and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends: but as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf. And he said unto him, Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found."—Luke xv. 11-32.

IN compliance with the request of our esteemed brother, Wm. Honea, on this page, we will present such thoughts as are given us in connection with this parable. Although our brother specifies the thirteenth verse, we cannot understand that the truth designed to be taught, can be seen in the consideration of that verse separately from the remaining portion of the parable of which it is a part.

It will be observed that this parable and the two immediately preceding ones were spoken by our Lord in reproof of the murmuring of the Pharisees and scribes, who complained that he received sinners and ate with them. In its primary application, therefore, we understand it to rebuke the assumption of those legalists who rely upon their own works of righteousness for acceptance in the presence of the supreme Judge of all men. In illustration of that particular case, the elder son in the parable would represent those Israelites who lived according to the letter of that law which was given by Moses to that natural people. They expected to attain to righteousness by the works of the law, and were stimulated to obedience in the letter of it, by the supposition that they were thereby securing to themselves the favor of divine justice. The Lord showed them in this parable their utter destitution of the principle of true holiness, as their conduct and motives were clearly represented by the character of the elder son. Since the motive prompting them to observe the directions of the law of Moses was selfishness, they were justly charged with hypocrisy in all their religious pretensions. Under that legal dispensation there could be no discrimination between those who were merely complying with the formal observance of its requirements and those who were moved by the love of holiness; so it is written that "There is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before, for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof; for the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which we draw nigh unto God."—Heb. vii. 18, 19.

The younger son, whose profligate conduct had brought him to poverty, might well be understood to designate those natural Israelites who had disregarded the injunctions of the law of Moses. In making an end of speaking of this law unto all Israel, Moses said unto them, "Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day, which ye shall command your children to observe to do, all the words of this law. For it is not a vain thing for you; because it is your life; and through this thing ye shall prolong your days in the land, whither ye go over Jordan to possess it."—Deut. xxxii. 46, 47. Their departure from those ordinances of God was fitly designated as the wasting of their substance with riotous living. In consequence of such conduct they were brought into poverty, so that they were despised by their natural brethren as outcasts from the covenant given to the people of Israel. "The poor is hated even of his own neighbor; but the rich hath many friends. He that despiseth his neighbor sinneth; but he that hath mercy on the poor, happy is he."—Prov. xiv. 20, 21. The principle of selfrighteousness by which all who trust in their own works are governed always causes its possessors to trust in themselves that they are righteous and to despise others.—Luke xviii. 9. Such characters are ever ready to boast of their own obedience and good works, by which they suppose they are entitled to the special favor of God. Feeling no need of mercy themselves they are not qualified to rejoice in the manifestation of divine favor in extending mercy to those whom they regard as unworthy of the grace of God. This was the principle governing the elder son in the parable. He felt no need of the favor of his father; all his ground of complaint was that he had not been rewarded according to his merits.

In applying the parable to the religious world at large, the same two characteristics are manifested. All the trust of natural men is in their own righteousness; and they feel secure in their imagined ability to satisfy the requirements of justice, so as to deserve the approval of the supreme Judge. In proportion to their confidence in their own righteousness is their intolerance of the doctrine of justification by the grace of God. Like this elder son, they are angry when they hear of that grace by which salvation is bestowed upon the chief of sinners. While they talk of salvation by grace, their whole theory of religion rests upon the principle of merit in their own works of righteousness. They have no desire for the grace of God, because they think they have ample power to deserve the divine approval. Those who hold to this doctrine are the Pharisees of the present time, as truly as were those to whom this parable was spoken. When contending against the truth of the gospel, they will sometimes assert that if they are not saved in consideration of their good works they will charge God with injustice. In their carnal enmity they thus unconsciously expose their real character. In this they manifest the spirit which animates their works as being the same which was in Cain when he slew his brother. His offering unto the Lord was the result of his own labor, and was obtained from the ground which was under the curse of the Lord God. Its rejection caused him to show by slaying his brother the murderous spirit which was in his heart, and which prompted his offering. The same evil principle moves all worldly religionists in the present time. The corruption of carnal selfishness covets heavenly glory, and proposes to attain to it by the performance of duties and fancied good works. Thus it is evident that those who are led by that spirit are ignorant of their own just condemnation and of the righteousness of God.

A still closer application of this parable brings its lesson home to the individual experience of every subject of salvation. In the continual warfare between the flesh and the spirit, the elder brother very aptly illustrates the opposition of "the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts," and "the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness." Both these men are included in the saint who is manifested as the chosen vessel of mercy. He with the mind (the new man) serves the law of God; but with the flesh (the old man) he serves the law of sin.—Rom. vii. 25. Paul does not say that these are two separate and distinct persons; in both cases it is the same "I myself." When by the grace of God the saint is enabled to "walk in the Spirit," and "not fulfill the lust of the flesh," the enmity of the carnal mind is as fully aroused as was the anger of this elder son, in the parable. That carnal mind never does go in to the enjoyment of the festing and rejoicing which the Father has prepared for the welcome of his ransomed and forgiven child. Although it is said in the parable that the father came out and entreated the angry son, it is not said that he was reconciled. The remonstrance of his father does indeed demonstrate the unreasonable folly of the elder son, just as sound reason would show the inconsistency of carnal objections to the grace of God as revealed in the salvation of his people from their sins; but nothing less than the omnipotence of God can overcome the enmity of the natural man, which always opposes the work of divine grace in the salvation of sinners. Fleshly pride revolts at the thought of being dependent upon grace alone for justification; while self asserts ability to comply with the requirements of justice, thereby attaining the right to demand the approval of the judgment of God. In all this appears the disposition manifested by the elder son in the parable.

On the other hand, the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, as it shines in the heart of the quickened sinner, clearly manifests his condition as portrayed in the poor wanderer realizing his wretchedness while he vainly seeks among the swine for food. Those unclean animals can be satisfied with the husks which contain no nutriment for the poor prodigal, whose hunger is only aggravated by the recollection of the abundance of provision in his father's house. The swine desire nothing better than the husks which are their appropriate food; but it is not for such provision that the appetite of the suffering stranger longs as he feels his utter destitution. He needs no exhortation to desire such food as his father can bestow; but he is painfully conscious that he has no claim upon that father's bounty. Necessity drives him to apply for the place of a hired servant where he has forfeited the right to claim the favor of a son. He comes as a beggar seeking the charity of a hired servant's place; but the father still recognizes him as a son. In this particular the parable illustrates one of the most wonderful of the appointments of the infinite grace of God. No height of rebellion and no depth of depravity can ever dissolve the relationship by which the son is endeared to his father. Although an outcast in rags and want, his father still recognizes him as his son, who was dead, but is alive; who was lost, but is found. There is strong consolation here for the conscious sinner who hungers and thirsts after that righteousness of which he feels himself hopelessly destitute. While the suffering of hunger attests that the outcast is a living character, the fact that he longs for the bread which abounds in his father's house is conclusive proof that he is the very same son who left that abode of plenty to rove in a strange land and to waste his substance in sin and folly. Justice demands that he shall suffer the legitimate consequence of his evil deeds; but the infinite riches of grace are displayed in the satisfaction of all the requirements of justice by the one offering of the Redeemer, and the fullness of mercy abounds in the free justification of the guilty sinner by that grace which is in Christ Jesus.

The paternal love which is manifested by the father in this parable, is not the effect of the action of the prodigal, either in his wandering or in his enforced return. It will be observed that the remonstrance of the elder son fails to recognize this fact. He presents the contrast between his own devoted labors in obeying the commands of his father, and the dissolute conduct of his younger brother, and bases his complaint upon the ground of his own merit and his brother's just deserts. This is the only principle which the natural man can comprehend. But upon such a system there could be no salvation for any sinner, since the first violation of the law brings condemnation, from which no future obedience can bring relief. The law knows no repentance, and it can accept no compromise from the sinner who is guilty in one point. It demands perfect and perpetual obedience, and its curse rests upon "every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them."—Gal. iii. 10. It is evident that the stain of sin can never be removed by subsequent obedience, since the violated law immediately condemns the sinner. This is true of the finite law of our country. The convicted murderer may be very sorry for his crime, yet he must suffer the legal penalty of his guilt. So the transgressor of the holy law of God is already condemned; and no subsequent obedience can be accepted by that law. So it is written, "By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified."

The system of legal righteousness is all the way which is known to the natural mind of man; and that system is born in every one who is manifested as a child of Adam. In his one offense all his unborn posterity were made sinners; and the consequence of that dreadful fact is seen in the universal reign of death even over them who have not (in their own person) sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression. They are not condemned for Adam's sin, but for their own sin when they were yet in Adam. The justice of this divine judgment is demonstrated in the fact that those who are able to act out the principle which is born in them, invariably show their sinful nature by their earliest conscious individual deeds. The religion of nature is always the same as that which was in Cain. Its sinful character appears in the selfishness that prompted him to slay his brother, "Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous." The elder son in the parable manifested very clearly the same spirit which prompted the murderous conduct of Cain. So, in the application of the parable to the experience of the saints, the carnal mind is never satisfied with the way of salvation which is entirely dependent upon the grace of God in Christ Jesus. The flesh is ever desirous of some occasion for gloring in self; but it is only in that salvation which is revealed by the grace of God through the faith which is in Jesus, that the conscious sinner can have hope. The mind which is born of the flesh, like the elder son, is always ready to boast of creature works as the ground of acceptance with God; but the Spirit of Christ leads every one who is governed by its direction to confess, with the penitent prodigal, "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son." In this perpetual conflict the carnal mind is well represented by the elder son. There can never be any peace between these two opposing principles which dwell in every sinner who is born of the Spirit of God.

The parable is very applicable in many ways in illustration of the experience of the afflicted and poor people of God in their subjection to the vanity of the body of this death. Time and space would fail us to mention particularly all that might properly be said in connection with the subject; but we trust that what is written may meet the favorable consideration of our inquiring brother, and that he and other readers may be impressed to favor us with more extended reflections upon it. May the Spirit of truth lead us, with all who are interested in the doctrine of God our Savior, into all truth; and to the glorious name of Jesus be praises evermore. Amen.

THE NEW HEAVEN AND NEW EARTH.

"AND I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea."—Rev. xxi. 1.

The Scriptures which are given by inspiration of God, of which this book of Revelation forms a part, are a testimony of Jesus Christ. The opening words of the book are, "The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to shew unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass; and he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John, who bare record of the word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of all things that he saw. Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein; for the time is at hand." For his faithful testimony of Jesus he was banished to the isle that is called Patmos, by the enemies of God and truth. But God never forsakes his servants, and the times of greatest persecutions have been to them the times of sweetest communion with their God, when the heavens have been opened, and they have been favored with visions of God.

Among the many wonderful things which were shown to John in this vision were the new heaven and the new earth. The prophets had spoken of the same things, and the faith of the people of God to whom they spake believed their report. The dear Redeemer said to his disciples, "Blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear. For verily I say unto you, that many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them."—Matt. xxiii. 16, 17. The prophecies all pointed to Jesus Christ, and to the glory of that kingdom which he should set up, when the old covenant should be removed. The first covenant was declared to be faulty. All things pertaining to it came far short of the perfection and glory which is now revealed in the new covenant, the gospel of the grace of God. "For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices, which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect. For then would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshipers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins. But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year."—Heb. x. 1-3. The priesthood itself was imperfect, and the priests were not permitted to continue, by reason of death. "If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood (for under it the people received the law), what further need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron? For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law."—Heb. vii. 11, 12. Moses had spoken of a Prophet, even Jesus Christ, that the Lord God would raise up, and whom the people should hear. "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him ye shall hearken." "I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him."—Deut. xviii. 15, 18, 19. Hence those Jews who rejected Christ, and who rejected his doctrine, were cut off from the true worshipers of God, and were miserably destroyed.

The prophet Isaiah, speaking of the dissolution of the old heaven, says, "And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll: and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree."—Isa. xxxiv. 4. Also the prophet Joel, whose words the Savior quoted, has given a description of the passing away of the old heaven, or legal dispensation, and the establishment of the new. "And I will shew wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered: for in mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance, as the Lord hath said, and in the remnant whom the Lord shall call."—Joel ii. 30-32.

John describes a wonder which appeared in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars.—Rev. xii. 1. Here the law dispensation, represented by the moon, is seen as being no longer the existing heaven, but is under the feet of the woman, or the church, which is brought to view with Christ and his twelve apostles. By reference to the record in Matthew xxiv., we learn that at the time the first heaven and earth passed away, the sun was darkened, the moon did not give her light, the stars fell from heaven, and the powers of the heavens were shaken. The Jewish rabbies, or doctors of the law, are not to be found in the gospel church; for the law which they taught has been fulfilled by Jesus, and is taken away. That legal dispensation had lived all its appointed time, and expired by limitation. "The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached."—Luke xvi. 16. We must leave Pisgah, and travel onward to find the Canaan of the gospel. We must leave Moses before we find the Christ, of whom he wrote; and when brought to Christ we are brought to him who "taketh away the first, that he may establish the second."—Heb. x. 9. We are then brought into that heaven where the Sun of Righteousness appears and shines, with healing in his wings. It was in the end of the Jewish world, the old heaven, that Christ appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. This closed up the offering of sacrifices; for by his one offering he perfected forever all them that are sanctified—sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ.—Jude 2. As he was the antitypical sacrifice, all the shadows and types are swallowed up in him. "Then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second. By the which will we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all."—Heb. x. 9, 10. The old covenant or heaven was removed, and all that belonged to it, and the new covenant was established, with its superior blessings and glories. "And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new."—Rev. xxi. 5. The taking away of the first (Heb. x. 9) we understand to be the same as the passing away of the old heaven and earth in the text. The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews, speaking of the worshipers in faith under the old covenant, says, "And these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise: God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect." "For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second. For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah."—Heb. xi. 39, 40; viii. 7, 8.

In the passing away of the old heaven and earth, or the taking away of the old covenant, we see the taking away of those conditions which were peculiar to it, and the bringing in of the new covenant, of which Jesus is the Mediator and Head, and by whom all its provisions are fulfilled. As that faulty and conditional covenant is removed, the hope of every conditionalist that is resting thereon is taken away; for by the deeds of the law, or conditions performed by men, no flesh living shall be justified. We see the pillars of smoke arising from that fire which Jesus said he came to send on the earth, and which was then already kindled. The carnal Jews claimed that they were Abraham's seed and Moses' disciples; but Jesus informed them that there should not be left one stone upon another of all their system that should not be thrown down. "Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham."—Matt. iii. 9. The old heavens were rolled together as a scroll, and all their elements melted with fervent heat, and the host thereof were dissolved. The fruitless fig tree, or Jewish nation, is cursed, and it withers away. "Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away," said Jesus. The gospel kingdom is set up, and the new heaven and earth are revealed to the saints as a spiritual kingdom, and they are taught that "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." And, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

The Spirit of God in the prophet Isaiah said, "For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy."—Isa. lxv. 17, 18. Evidently this is a prophecy relating to the gospel church, the church of Christ, of which he is the Head and the Builder. The Spirit spake by the prophet Daniel, saying, "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."—Dan. ii. 44. Jesus, the King, appears in his beauty, and the saints behold him in his glory, full of grace and truth. He brings in everlasting righteousness, and seals up the vision and prophecy. All prophecy was and is sealed up in Christ, for he is the substance thereof. The law and the prophets were until John, and since that time the kingdom of heaven is preached. The new heaven and earth are established, and the church is set up in gospel order, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail, as said Jesus. A King reigns in righteousness, and princes rule in judgment. The government is upon the shoulder of the King, and his name is Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth, even forever.—Isa. ix. 6, 7. When the time for the fulfillment of this prophecy had rolled around, "came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea, and saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." In this kingdom, or new heaven, Christ is the Prophet, Priest and King. Now "he is not a Jew which is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God."—Rom. ii. 28, 29. Into this kingdom Gentiles are gathered, and are no more strangers and foreigners, but are fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. This kingdom shall never be destroyed, but shall stand forever. As long as there is an heir of glory upon the earth, shall Christ sit a King upon his throne, and sway the sceptre of that kingdom, which is an everlasting kingdom. "He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy (that) shall be destroyed (is) death." At the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.—Phil. ii. 10, 11. This heaven and the seed of Christ are of equal duration; for it is written, "For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain."—Isa. lxvi. 22. It was in this heaven where John saw the mighty angel flying, having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell upon the earth, saying, "Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ."—Rev. xii. 10. Here are found those peculiar joys and heavenly blessings which are given the saints of God, whom he has gathered with his arm, and brought within the gates of Jerusalem. Here are the courts of his holiness, and here his saints shout aloud for joy. Here are the gates of pearl, and here the street of pure gold, as it were transparent glass. Here is the pure river of the water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and the Lamb. Here the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor; for God has made them kings and priests unto him, and they shall reign forever and ever. Here no temple is seen; for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it. This earth hath no need of the sun, nor of the moon; for Jesus, the Sun of Righteousness, in the firmament of heaven, giveth light to all them that dwell therein. "For the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." There shall be no curse here; but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it. These sayings are faithful and true. These are the wonderful and glorious things which are in vision given to the saints, who are by the new and spiritual birth enabled to see the kingdom of our God and his Christ. An inspired writer in this new heaven and earth has assured the saints that they have indeed come to this glory; for he says, "But ye are come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the First-born, which are written in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel."—Heb. xii. 22-24. Thus we see that the heavenly Jerusalem and the church of the First-born are one and the same. It did not spring up out of the earth, nor did it rise up out of the sea, with the beast and the false prophet, but was seen by John as coming down from God out of heaven. The members are born from above, born of the Spirit, born of God, and their life is hid with Christ in God. The new Jerusalem is prepared as a bride adorned for her husband; for the church is the bride, the Lamb's wife. She shall be brought unto the King in raiment of needlework. Her clothing is of wrought gold. Her Beloved brings her to his banqueting-house, where she sings aloud for joy, being abundantly satisfied with the provision which he has blessed.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Salisbury Association, in session with the church called Messongoes, to the several churches represented, sends greeting.

DEAR BRETHREN:—You will no doubt expect the customary annual address from us, as these annual sessions bring up vividly to our minds our relationship to each other, and our mutual obligations to be helpers of each other's joy, because of the temptations that beset our pathway, and because it is by faith we stand. It may be questioned whether there is any lack in this respect of wholesome admonition and exhortation. The shortcoming is more likely to be in giving heed to and obeying the words spoken. In writing messages of instruction and spiritual admonition to churches, or to brethren, it is something to be able to say and to feel that our labor has not been in vain.

All the rich and varied gifts in the ministry have become almost common property to all the churches, poverty and obscurity being no hindrance. General correspondence on all subjects appertaining to doctrine, order, discipline, experience, &c., has obtained to such an extent that no one need be deprived of its benefits. The light of ministerial gifts has been called into exercise upon the darker portions of Scripture, and upon all doubtful questions, that might have a tendency to more or less confusion, penetrating the most remote corners; so that if any were sitting in darkness and doubt, they might be instructed and profited. Whether these privileges and advantages are appreciated and are being utilized as they should be; whether being thus furnished we have attained unto every good word and work, are proper questions for our investigation. It has been pretty generally taken for granted that the several churches are established in the truth, and that truth and a belief of the truth and walking in the truth constitute the basis of fellowship. If this is so, we should not be carried about by every wind of doctrine, nor drawn away from the simplicity of the gospel of Christ by ambitious and designing men. Those should be most highly esteemed whose labors in the churches promote harmony and spiritual fruitfulness, cementing the brethren together in loving bonds, so that their appointments for meeting are fulfilled by a coming together in spirit. The grand design of the gifts conferred upon the churches was undoubtedly to this end. If, on the contrary, there should at any time be found among us those who are disposed to raise issues, and to foment divisions, and form a party contrary to the doctrine in which we have professed to be established, we should take heed to ourselves, and not allow our esteem for any man to draw us away from our steadfastness. The truth and the fellowship of the brethren should be of more value to us than the name or notoriety of any man. A man of eloquence and argumentative powers, if he err from the truth, is more to be feared and more likely to do mischief and produce schisms than one of inferior natural endowments. It is a sad commentary on human nature that numbers who were once strenuous advocates of certain points of doctrine have been the first to fall away into the grossest errors in an opposite direction. Among the lessons that we may hope that we have been taught by word and by experience is this: To follow no man only as he follows Christ. The professed churches have been for years courting the favor and applause of the world. The world in turn has shown a disposition to name itself and its institutions by christian names, that thereby might be taken away its reproach. Happy are they that have kept their garments unspotted, and can thus lay claim to that religion which is pure and undefiled before God and the Father. We are well aware that the current of worldly influence is strong and difficult to resist. It is the more difficult to overcome in this conflict because we may not always be aware of its devices. It is not altogether the outside world that we have to contend with. The worldliness that we all have within ourselves is perhaps more difficult to combat and more difficult to detect. Children are more easily enticed than grown people, their minds being naturally weaker, and parents are more readily reached through their children than in any other way. Hence all manner of allurements that are calculated to charm and attract the young are presented to them on every hand. It is sad to be under necessity of warning the heads of families against things that are christened with saintly names. But most of you know that a pretense of religious design is used only as a bait or gilding to quiet the consciences of parents and allure the children into sinful amusements, debasing games, and anything and everything by which money may be collected from their pockets. Parents may thus be inadvertently drawn into an implied sanction of what they do not and cannot approve, and to contributing of their funds to support and uphold institutions and practices which they know that the Master would speedily scourge out of his temple. While hotels and hotel-keepers have been denounced, and sweeping anathemas hurled against their parties and other schemes to collect the youth, as debasing, the ball and the festival and the sociable have been removed to what is called the church, and the world has really been outdone at its own game. We do not allude to these things to molest or disturb their patrons at all, but to admonish the children of wisdom to beware. Where is the voice of him that saith, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean; and I will receive you, and be a Father to you," &c.? Where is he whose eyes are as a flame of fire, and who will search Jerusalem as with candles? "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy." The temple is indeed adorned and decorated, but it is with purity, sincerity and the spirit of worship. It has no need for the cattle and sheep of the Amalekites. If the world is filled with hypocrisy and vain show, and spiritual wickedness abounds, our love should not on that account wax cold. It is all the more important that we should be steadfast, unmovable, abounding in the word and work of the Lord. Do we all continue to love as at first, and that love show in our works as it did then? or are some of us chargeable with having left our first love? It is a matter of the greatest importance that we fulfill the obligations that naming the name of Christ imposes on us. While on the one hand we keep our hands clean and our garments undefiled from the world, we should show that we prize our privileges, and that it is our delight to do the will of our heavenly Father. It is enjoined upon us to frequently assemble ourselves together, and in uniting with the church we have taken the obligation upon ourselves to meet with the members at their appointments. The labor and expenses incident to keeping up public worship devolve upon all the members alike. What is the duty of one is the duty of all in this respect. It does not speak well for us or for the sincerity of our profession if we find time and means to attend more regularly and promptly to our worldly interests or home comforts than to the interests of the church and kingdom of the Redeemer. The church is indeed a banqueting-house, but then we do not banquet all the time. There is an order out to "go work to-day in my vineyard." If the church meetings are not attractive enough to make it desirable to attend them, we may ourselves assist in rendering them more attractive. As the church is composed of several individual members, so church comforts are composed of individual contributions. It is with the members to make the church what it might be and ought to be. The love of saints and of religious meetings are tender and delicate plants, capable of being nourished and their growth promoted. If the glory of God fills the house, the things that attract only the world will be crowded out. The apostle's admonition to young Timothy was among other things to give attendance to reading. He evidently intended the Scriptures, as he speaks particularly of the Scriptures in the connection. There is reason to fear in this day that even sincere believers do not give attendance to reading the Bible as they should. The world is filled with trash, and the most worthless fiction occupies the time and absorbs the minds of many of whom we would like to think better things. Instead of wholesome instruction it is but an intoxicating stimulant, exciting an unnatural and depraved appetite, which, while it still craves, can never have enough.

With great propriety the voice of wisdom inquires, "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not?" We wait the fulfillment of gracious promises. The Lord hath sworn by his right hand and by the arm of his strength that he will not give the corn that his people need, and for which they have labored, to be meat for their enemies. It is nevertheless declared that the place where it shall be eaten is in the courts of his holiness.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES FOR 1890.

ABOUT a year ago we announced our decision to publish the SIGNS OF THE TIMES an eight-page weekly at the same price we were publishing the twelve-page semi-monthly, and made the unprecedented offer to allow one-half the subscription price as a commission to all our paid-up old subscribers for every new subscriber they would procure us, and the result was that we received an addition of more than two thousand names to our list. Many, however, of these new subscribers paid but one dollar to the old subscriber, who sacrificed his commission to procure the new subscriber, having in view simply the increasing of the circulation of the paper. The question now is, How many of those paying only one dollar last year will renew for 1890 at the regular rate of two dollars? If we shall be able to retain a good proportion of those, and can still increase our circulation two thousand more, we will then be able to furnish the paper weekly at one dollar and fifty cents a year; and should it be increased four thousand, we would be able to publish it weekly at one dollar a year.

Many doubtless do not understand why we can publish at one dollar a year with the increased circulation, and for the benefit of such we will explain. It takes just as much type-setting, imposing forms and making ready for press to print one paper as it does any number of thousands of copies. In fact, after the paper is once "to press," the additional expense is but a trifle more than the cost of the blank paper. For instance, say it cost five thousand dollars a year to run a weekly of five thousand copies; it would probably not exceed seven thousand dollars to print ten thousand copies. The inquiry may arise with some, How is it that the local publications of but a thousand or fifteen hundred circulation can be published for two dollars a year? The reason is that those papers rely almost entirely on their advertising patronage for support. If the SIGNS should take two or three pages of advertisements it could be published at one dollar a year.

Another thing our readers are not aware of is that although the subscription price is two dollars a year, our gross receipts do not average one dollar and fifty cents for each subscriber, our loss from delinquent and gratuitous subscribers being more than twenty-five per cent. While most of our subscribers know and appreciate the above facts, there are many who do not, and consequently consider the price of the SIGNS too high.

Although the increased expenses of publishing the SIGNS weekly this year are several hundred dollars more than the increase in the receipts, we have decided to continue it weekly another year, and make the following

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!

From now until the first of next

January, any one who is now a subscriber, and whose subscription is paid up, may send us new subscribers at one dollar a year; but no one can get the paper from this office at less than the regular rates. ## OBITUARY NOTICES.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have received a request recently from Edgar, Neb., by letter, from the heart-broken widow of a noble and worthy man, to prepare an obituary of the deceased for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and I take pleasure in trying to gratify the beloved sister, but have not been furnished with all the particulars which the friends of the deceased would expect to see published.

Mr. Henry Ditch died at his residence, three and one-half miles northeast of Edgar, Neb., Aug. 8th, 1889, in the forty-eighth year of his age.

The deceased was born Sept. 16th, 1841, in Jackson Co., Ind., and on March 12th, 1865, he was united in marriage with Miss Harriet V. Bair. They resided some years in Warren Co., Ill., and while there I baptized sister Ditch, who had been connected for some years with the New School Baptists, and she became connected with New Hope Church, where I have been a member more than thirty-two years. Mr. Ditch and his beloved wife were faithful attendants at our meetings; and while her very sweet voice joined in our praises, and he sat so humbly on the back seats, we often wondered what could keep him from uniting with us; for he gave us good evidence of his attachment to our people, and his love for the doctrine of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, but claimed to be too unworthy. A few years ago they moved to Nebraska, and a secular paper there says of him: "Mr. Ditch was a man highly respected by all who knew him. His was an exemplary character. Kind and indulgent as a father, a true and devoted husband, courteous and obliging as a neighbor, scrupulous in all his business dealings, a consistent christian, he was naturally loved by all, and in his death the community loses one of its best citizens."

Sister Ditch writes that her husband suffered extremely with lung fever for two weeks, but three physicians and loving friends were all baffled by the relentless hand of death. He told his friends that he was ready to go, and called for his heart-stricken wife, who was also lying on a sick bed. She was carried to him, and received a kiss from his dying lips, bidding her good-by. The trial nearly took her life, but she says that God has sustained her. She and one daughter, with a host of friends, are left to mourn. I tender to sister Ditch and her daughter, Mrs. J. C. Nicely, my profound sympathy.

Deacon James Armstrong departed this life July 23d, at the house of his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Ryburn, near Acton, Texas, with whom he had lived since the spring of 1873. He was eighty-two years and three months old at the time of his death. He and his wife, whose obituary appeared in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES in October, 1885, were baptized in the fellowship of the Friendship Church of Old School Baptists, in the state of Mississippi, by the late Elder Joel Harvy, in 1843. He was faithful as a member of the church, and was highly esteemed by his brethren and by all who knew him. As a Deacon he served his church to the entire satisfaction of all the members. He had the name of being one of the best Deacons, and I believe he was unexcelled by any one in that office, so far as my knowledge extends. He and his wife came from Mississippi to Texas in the spring of 1873, and made their home with their youngest daughter and her husband until they were called away by death. Old School Baptists found a pleasant home and a hearty welcome at their house; and although the old brother and sister are gone to their eternal home above, and we are sad when we visit the family, yet Old Baptists meet a kind and hearty reception by the dear ones at the old home.

Our dear brother was afflicted about five years, so that he was almost helpless a great deal of the time, even before our sister's death, and about four years after, and particularly about a year before his death he was quite helpless. All was done to relieve his suffering and make him comfortable during his long and tedious illness that loving hearts and hands could do. The writer spoke at his funeral from the language of the apostle Paul to Timothy, "For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith," &c. Our brother requested that the above language should be inscribed on his tombstone, if he were worthy. He kept the faith, no doubt. Elders W. B. McAdams and James Wagner paid us a visit on the first of August, expecting to see brother Armstrong; but while they were preaching at his house on Wednesday night after the first Sunday in August, his poor body lay silent in the tomb, and his spirit was with God, who gave it.

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"PRAISE the Lord from the earth * * * stormy wind fulfilling his word."—Psa. cxlviii. 7, 8.

While reading in my family this morning the psalm named above, the words which I have quoted fell upon my mind with peculiar power, and have remained more or less with me all day. Particularly the last clause, "stormy wind fulfilling his word," has been sounding sweetly in my heart. I feel this evening like trying to put down on paper some of the things that have seemed so pleasant to me, for the readers of the SIGNS.

The whole psalm is an expression of praise from the overflowing heart of the writer, in which he calls upon all things, animate and inanimate, to join him in this high worship of his God, who also is the Author of their being and the Upholder of them all by his almighty power. Celestial things, terrestrial beings and rational creatures are each in turn called upon to praise God, their Maker. The special reason for all this ecstasy of joy and praise was the view which had been opened to him of the goodness and mercy of God vouchsafed to Israel, as expressed in the last verse of this psalm, "He also exalteth the horn of his people, the praise of all his saints; even of the children of Israel, a people near unto him. Praise ye the Lord."

One reflection which has been in my mind all day, suggested by this whole psalm, is the truth that when the praise of the Lord is in the heart of any man, to that man all things will also praise God. The Old Testament is full of declarations in which the glory of God is said to be revealed in all his works. All things do praise the God that made them, even the dragons, as is said in verse seven, and creeping things, as said in verse ten; but brutish, sinful, fallen man neither praises God himself, nor can he see the praise of God in all his works. "Praise the Lord, our Maker," is the voice of every creature; but his heavy ears do not understand the sound; his blinded eyes do not behold the handiwork of God. The natural man sees a sort of beauty in what his eyes behold, and he rejoices in it. Like the Canaanitish maiden of whom an infidel once drew a fancied picture, man by nature, if he worships at all, worships the creature rather than the Creator. She was represented as in the beautiful dawn, bowing and kissing her hand to the sun, as in her view the author of all this splendor. God was not in all her thoughts. She saw no heavenly wisdom and love in all that was before her. So man, unquickened man, by all that he sees does not know God. It is true, emphatically true, that by faith alone do we know that the worlds were made by the word of God. Man looking with blinded eyes gropes and stumbles on, and never finds his way to God. Though God be with him, and his glory is over all, and his voice is in all places, yet he never feels him, nor hears his voice, nor sees his glory. But when God has once revealed himself, not to, but in, any man, that man looking with new eyes, and hearing with new ears, cannot turn in any direction, nor flee anywhere, but that God is there. We see only what is within ourselves. If God is not in our hearts, we shall not see him anywhere. But if in the face of Jesus, through the Spirit, we behold the glory of God, then indeed to us the very heavens will declare his glory, and the firmament will show forth his handiwork. Day unto day, to that man, will utter speech, and night unto night will show knowledge, and to him there will be no place where their voice is not heard. All this is very wonderfully set forth in this psalm, where the writer, looking with new eyes and a new heart, sees the glory of God in all things, and calls upon all things to praise him.

Another pleasant reflection to me has been, that in the view of the writer of this psalm the one thing among all others most wonderful and most deserving of praise is his mercy and grace toward Israel. That mercy should be shown to sinners, that gifts should be received for the rebellious also, that rebels should be pardoned, and the unworthy and the weak exalted and made strong, is the crowning glory of God, and that for which the highest praise must be rendered to him. So, at the advent of him who brought all this to pass, the angels sang in the presence of the shepherds, "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good will to men." Israel is the chosen nation. All other nations have their bounds set according to the number of the children of Israel. All things that God has made must bend to the carrying out of God's gracious will concerning Israel. So Paul could say, "All things are yours." And, "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." God exalts Israel, he exalts their praise, and they are near unto him. The psalmist was himself one of that happy people. Their exaltation was his. As they were near to God, so was he. Out of the fullness of his heart he speaks forth the wonders of redemption, and utters the divine glory that appears in all the works of God. In his view, renewed and exalted as he is, all that he sees testifies of the unseen things, even "his eternal power and Godhead." Overwhelmed by a similar view of the wonders of redeeming love, good old Simeon, clasping the divine babe in his arms, could only say, "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." The things that are seen can never satisfy the desire of a heaven-born soul. That soul must have heavenly food. He must see God, or he can never be satisfied. God reveals himself to such an one. To his ear the whole universe speaks of God, and all leads him on, as in this psalm is represented, to God's most wondrous work, which angels desire to look into, the redemption of sinners. The unregenerate man sees only man in redemption; but the regenerate heart sees only God in it.

One more reflection has been most pleasant to me as I have been writing. All natural things are but emblems of spiritual things. The proof is that God inspired prophets and apostles to show spiritual things by natural figures; and Jesus often said, "The kingdom of heaven is like" some natural thing, or some providential event. So in this psalm, many natural things are bidden to praise God. How can they better obey than by revealing to our view the forms of the "better things" which are represented by them? All things show forth the power and glory of the spiritual world. If we fail to see, or misread, it is our failure, and not a failure in the truth here presented. I have long believed that in deed and truth there are "sermons in stones and running brooks." But here we hardly know the alphabet of this wondrous language. At best we can spell out but a few words of this voiceless preaching. Yet it is good to meditate and to talk of all the glory of God, in all his ways and in all his works.

Thus I come to speak of the one thing in this psalm which this morning seemed most wonderful to me. The stormy wind that fulfills his word also praises the Lord. Most literally is this true. My mind has been led over several instances noted in the Scriptures, to which I will first allude. It is said that he holds the winds in his fists; that he stayeth the rough wind in the day of the east wind. The stormy wind did his bidding at the Red Sea, dividing its waves asunder. How quickly it obeyed his voice when clad in human flesh. He bade the winds and waves be still. He had but to speak, and straightway the stormy wind hastened the apostle onward, that he might preach the gospel at Rome, though he went in chains, and through the wreck of the ship. These instances are given, not as exceptions to the way of his doing, but as instances setting forth what is true all the time. As in these cases, so in all others, the stormy wind fulfills his word. He has graciously shown us, how it fulfills his word in a few instances, that we may rest and be calm whenever and wherever we meet a storm. Jehovah still holds the winds in his fists in a very literal sense. Not a leaf in autumn is torn from its stem by any wandering breeze, except as that wind fulfills the word of Jehovah. Thus the wind praises God, its Author and its Master.

But it was not to speak of the wind literally that I began this letter, though this is worth our adoring wonder, since it always renders obedience to him; but rather of that which "the stormy wind" represents do I wish to speak. The wind is an emblem of various things. The gentle breeze, the cold and icy storm, the tempest rushing onward with destruction in its path, all represent diverse spiritual things. The "stormy wind" represents adversity and sudden and severe trials, which are hard to bear, as is the stormy wind. The lesson taught us in the text is that all sorrow and trial and adversity are but fulfilling the word of the Lord, and do praise him who holds them all in his hand. Both thoughts have occupied my mind; first, that every sorrow or trouble but fulfills the word of God; and second, that they do redound to his praise, "from the earth." The pathway of the Master was one of continual trial and persecution. Men hated him without a cause. His own disciples misunderstood him. Of the people there was none with him. Inward trials also beset him, until at the last his cry was heard, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" But all these stormy winds of trouble but obeyed the word of God. He said, "The Son of man goeth, as it was appointed for him." He said, "I came not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." He said, "Thou couldst have no power at all, except it were given thee of my Father." Our Elder Brother recognized that every blast of adversity was but fulfilling the word of God on earth. From the earth each stormy blast praised the Lord. So also the spirit of inspiration by Peter said of Jesus, "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain." Again, the same apostle testified, "The rulers have conspired together against the Lord and against his Christ, to do what thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done." The word counsel in both these texts means simply "purpose or decree." Jesus again said to the confused and sorrowful disciples, "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken, ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" What wonderful testimony all this is, that every blast of the biting storm by which he was assailed was but fulfilling the word of God! Here Jesus rested, and was reconciled, and content. For when in the hour of his agony he uttered the bitter cry, "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me," immediately by overcoming faith he cried, "Nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt." God's will must be done. Jesus in the conflict overcame, and said, "Thy will be done." When Jesus could say this, the conflict with the powers of darkness in his soul was decided. The great battle was fought, and the victory was won. In every step of this sorrowful way the will of God was being done. All was working together for the final glory of Jesus, and the accomplishment of the will of God.

Thus far concerning our Leader and Savior. But Jesus and his saints are not separated in anything. If all things worked for the glory of the Head, the members can rejoice in the same. If the stormy wind beating upon Jesus but fulfilled the word of God, so it is true of all his people. It is wonderful consolation in the midst of any trial, from whatever source it may seem to arise, to remember after all that it is but fulfilling the word of God. David said, "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it." This he said when oppressed by reproach and sorrow. When Shimei cursed David, and Abishai desired to take off his head, David said, "Let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, Curse David." It made David submissive, and took away a revengeful spirit, to believe this.

Job said, when he was most sorely afflicted, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; and blessed be the name of the Lord." He did not say that the Sabians or the Chaldeans had taken away, but the Lord. Again he said at this time, "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" (at the hand of God). Again he said, "The Lord performeth the thing which he hath appointed for me, and many such things are with him." Seeing as he did that it was the Lord who had done it all, he did not curse God, but the rather blessed his name. It is good for us all when we can believe that every such stormy wind fulfills his word. But his word is fulfilled whether we believe it or not. In the New Testament the same calm confidence in God under all circumstances appears in Paul, in the record of his whole life and teachings. It made him calm and submissive amidst all his persecutions, to believe that in all these things God was making him more than a conqueror through Jesus Christ. Each stormy wind was but fulfilling the word and will of God for him, and all things were working for his good. No truth in all the record seems to me more sublime and God-glorifying and heart-satisfying than this. How can any one object to it? Surely no troubled, storm-beaten soul ever can. It is joy to believe that God, the God of wisdom and of love, is in it all.

The stormy wind not only fulfills his word, working out his purposes of love and mercy for his people, but it also praises the Lord. Here I would notice the peculiar expression, "from the earth," in the text. It is in the earth literally that stormy winds are found. There they fulfill his word, and praise him. So trials and sore afflictions, appointed of God and fulfilling his word, are felt in human flesh, and from this "earth," or earthly nature, praise God, who has sent them. As stormy winds work good in the earth, though fearful to behold, so all manner of trials work good in the people of God. Thus they praise the wisdom, love and power of God. Trials humble the child of God, and drive him to the throne of grace, and make him the more to appreciate the grace which sustains him. Paul, who knew whereof he affirmed, said, "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not at the things that are seen, but at the things that are not seen: for the things that are seen are temporal; but the things that are not seen are eternal." This surely is to the praise of God. Paul could even say that he took pleasure in reproaches, in persecutions, since by them and through them God should be glorified in his body. He could say with great heartiness, "Most gladly will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me." The point in all these quotations is that such trials felt in his flesh resulted in praising God. They are manifestations of his purpose, power, wisdom, goodness and love; and they work out his holy will in that saint where they are experienced.

Now, lastly, I will add that it is only as the God of all wisdom reveals these things that we can see them. To read such truths in the Scriptures is one thing; to see them, or to feel their truth in our own hearts, is quite another thing. It is true of these things, as of all others that pertain to the kingdom of God, that "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him; but God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." But when saints do see the deep design of love and mercy that God has in all their afflictions, they can and do praise God in the fires. O! is it not a wonderful triumph of faith, when upon the authority of the word of God each afflicted child can say, "But he knoweth the way that I take: when he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold?"

I have not written as I desired or thought I should; but I will leave what I have written with the readers of the SIGNS. Many of you know these things by experience far better than I do, I know. May God bless his word to us all.

I remain your brother in a precious hope,

F. A. CHICK.

REISTERSTOWN, Md., Oct. 31, 1889.

"EVEN unto them will I give in mine house and within my walls a place and a name better than of sons and daughters: I will give them an everlasting name, that shall not be cut off."—Isa. lvi. 5.

This exceeding great and precious promise is to a peculiar character, who had no right to enter into the congregation of the Lord under the legal dispensation. The prophecy relates to gospel times and gospel subjects, when the wall of separation between Jew and Gentile should be broken down, and the salvation of God should be preached among the Gentiles; when the son of the stranger that had joined himself to the Lord should not say, "The Lord hath utterly separated me from his people. Neither let the eunuch say, Behold, I am a dry tree." As the prophecy began to be fulfilled, and the Lord appeared to his people among the Gentiles, the apostle Peter was favored of God with a vision, in which he was taught that God is no respecter of persons; but that in every nation he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him.—Acts x. "Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles," &c.—1 Tim. iii. 16. The Lord said he would bring down the high tree, and exalt the low tree; dry up the green tree, and make the dry tree to flourish; when Jesus should be planted in the mountain of the height of Israel.—Ezek. xvii. 22-24. While the green tree (the Jewish economy) was flourishing, the Gentiles were, so far as covenant mercies had been made manifest to them, without God, were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world. But now, in Christ Jesus, they who some time were afar off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ. For he is their peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition.—Eph. ii. 12-14. Thus in the covenant of life both Jews and Gentiles are embraced, and the son of the stranger is not to say that the Lord hath utterly separated him from his people, nor that he is a dry tree. It is true they had been separated by the former covenant; for in it they had no interest. But in the covenant made with Christ they are embraced, and in the bringing of the blessings of it they are brought into the house of the Lord; for in this house Jew and Gentile, bond and free, are all one in Christ Jesus, and are made nigh by his blood, and by one Spirit have access unto the Father. To all these God will give a place in his house and within his walls. The house of the Lord presents a theme of deep and sweet consolation. It was presented in figure or type by the temple built by Solomon. When Nathan was commissioned to give David commandment from the Lord concerning this house, in which Jehovah said he would dwell, there was a promise given of the durability of the throne of David in his seed. "And when thy days shall be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build a house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever. I will be his Father, and he shall be my son." "And thy house and thy kingdom shall be established forever before thee: thy throne shall be established forever." God appointed a place for his people Israel, and planted them, that they might dwell in a place of their own: and he established the throne of David. But this house was not to be built until the enemies of Israel were all conquered, and the last arm of power subdued, which otherwise might be stretched out against it in its being built. David, who was a type of Christ, as a conqueror over the enemies of God and his house, must conquer all enemies to Israel, and sleep with his fathers, before the temple is built. Solomon, the type of Christ risen from the dead, built the temple, although David had made preparations for it. When the temple was completed the priest came out of the holy place, and the cloud filled the house of the Lord, so that they could not stand to minister, because of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord filled the house. It is a delightful truth that in the church of Jesus Christ, and in the gospel ministration, there is no room for the legal priesthood. The priesthood of Christ is the only one known in the gospel, and it excludes that which was under the law. The glory of Christ fills the church; for he is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the all and in all, in that church, which is the ground and pillar of the truth. As the cherubim and ark were in the temple, and Solomon spread forth his hands and made supplication to God for all Israel, and the Lord hearkened to the supplications of his servant, and of all Israel, so do we find the effectual intercession of Jesus for his church to ever be effectual. As the ark contained the rod of Aaron (an emblem of the living priesthood of Christ), the tables of the testimony, and the pot of manna, even so do we find the everlasting High Priest in his church, and the law of God in his heart; and also Christ, the heavenly manna, is in the midst thereof. The city of Jerusalem, in which the temple was built, was inclosed with walls the most invulnerable, for the protection of the city, and particularly the temple. In the temple were walls, or partitions, which separated the outer from the inner court, the outer one being called the court of the Gentiles; and they were not permitted to enter within the inner walls. But the text speaks of their having a place within the walls, in the house, which Isaiah here refers to. The apostle has spoken of the wall which separated the Gentiles from the Jews in the temple built by Solomon, and has said that Christ hath broken down the middle wall of partition, which separated between Jews and Gentiles. By reference to these things we are aided very much in understanding the true meaning of the prophet in the text under consideration.

"Even unto them will I give in mine house and within my walls a place and a name." The temple was founded upon a rock, and so is the church. The city of Jerusalem was inclosed with walls, and so is the city of God. "In that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah, We have a strong city: salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks."—Isa. xxvi. 1. The former was literal; the latter is spiritual. The church of Christ is built upon himself, the foundation which God laid in Zion. It is elect, precious and sure; and he that believeth thereon shall not make haste. Is it possible that the Holy Ghost has here made a mistake? Are those believers in Christ, the sure foundation of the church, who are from time to time engaged in their means and efforts to hurry the Lord and help him along in the work? Methinks not. The prophet, under the infallible inspiration of God, has said that they that believe in Christ shall not make haste. With patience do they wait for Jesus to gather his lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom. Though he tarry, yet they wait for him, for he will come. Like Abraham, they are fully persuaded that what he has promised he is able also to perform. Those who believe in Christ as the sure foundation of the church know that he is the wise Master-builder thereof, and that all things are going prosperously on; for he has conquered all the enemies of the church. He will work, and none can let or hinder. None in earth or hell can stay his hand, nor say unto him, What doest thou? Touching this very subject, the eternal God, who is not a man, that he should lie, hath declared the end from the beginning, saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." The Lord has declared that he is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness. But those who do not believe in God, and regard not what he has said, are saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things remain as they were; and are we to expect God to come and work without our using the means? Say they, We must use the means, and then the Lord will come and bless them, and the church will be built up. But those who believe in Christ do not thus make haste, but in this patience possesses their souls. Still they say, Though he tarry, yet will I wait for him. Like Mary, they sit at Jesus' feet, and commune with and obey him, trusting in his word and finished salvation, knowing that the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many. Such persons delight in praise, glorify God, obey his voice, talk of his power, walk in his statutes, cast all their cares on him, and thus show forth the praise of him who hath called them out of darkness into his marvelous light, and out of bondage into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. The church is in Christ, and it rests upon him. He has said, "And upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." When Jesus asked his disciples, "Whom say ye that I am?" Simon Peter answered and said, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."—Matt. xvi. 15-18. This rock, or foundation, is Christ, and was laid by Jehovah in his eternal counsel; and all knowledge of our interest in, union with and knowledge of him, and all things pertaining to salvation through him, are made manifest and enjoyed only by the revelation of God, through Christ, the Rock of Ages. This is something that flesh and blood cannot attain to, nor aid in its furtherance. It is exclusively the work of the Holy One, and all who are exercised by it must say with one of old, "Not unto us, not unto us, but unto thy name, be all the glory." For on this rock does Jesus build his church, and the work is beyond the reach, aid or comprehension of flesh and blood. He is the Builder. He works, and none can hinder; and all his work is perfect, a God of truth and power is he.

The house being spiritual, it is composed exclusively of spiritual materials. Both the foundation and the materials are spiritual, and there exists a living union between them. "To whom coming, as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious, ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. Wherefore also it is contained in the Scripture, Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded."—1 Peter ii. 4-6. Here then we have a living foundation and a living building, and the life of the house is the life of the foundation. Our sonship is in the sonship of the Son of God. Our life is in his life; and when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory. This house then is a spiritual building, and is the house in which the Gentiles have a place. But what is the place allotted them? Is it merely a space into which they may at times take shelter from the storm, and, when it may serve their worldly interests, leave the things of the kingdom and pay their devotions to the things of this world, and bow to the shrine of the riches and honors thereof? No; this is not the place. But as lively stones they compose a part of the building itself. As the different members compose our national body, and all have a place in it, so do the members of Christ's mystical body, in living union with him, their living Head, compose the church, the body of Christ, the fullness of him that filleth all in all. In his epistle to the Ephesians the apostle Paul has brought this subject to view in a very clear and convincing light. In addressing these strangers, or Gentile converts, he presents this house, and declares to them in language which cannot be misunderstood that they are component parts of it. "Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; in whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord: in whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit."—Eph. ii. 19-22. How any man of understanding can read this Scripture, and then deny the absolute predestination of God, and the doctrine of eternal, unconditional election, is to me a wonder. Every intelligent man knows that it takes a given number of materials, and of given dimensions, to constitute a perfect building; that the whole arrangement is determined before the building is brought together; that the foundation is laid with special regard to the superstructure; that the building or house is framed with special regard to the foundation. With regard to the body of man, just so many members and organs are necessary to constitute a perfect body; and in the absence of the most atomical part it is blemished with imperfection. Who will say that the body of Christ is imperfect? It is true that all the members of his mystical body are not yet made manifest in the world, but in the fullness of time they will be made manifest; and none will ever be made manifest as members of his body but what were chosen in him, he being their Head and Life. Yet some are ready to say, and do say, that the volition of the will of man must decide how many lively stones shall be in this house, and how large it shall be. Did free agency, as it is called, have anything to do in creating the quarry, or the cedars of Lebanon? or did those materials break loose from their native state and come to the temple? or did the builder, with a will and a power which was absolutely sovereign over them, take them from their native state, and fashion them all, and place them where he pleased, and thus perfect that grand superstructure? If this figure were not designed to show God's absolute predestination, the election of grace, and his sovereign will and power in and relative to the church, we ask, Why has the Holy Ghost selected it, and why has the God of heaven placed it before us as a convincing illustration of the whole? Christ is the wise Master-builder of this house (which house are ye, said an apostle); and Jesus, the Son over his own house, is faithful in all which his Father has appointed him. When we can see the revelation of God through Christ in the church, and contrast it with free-willism, we can see that the great plan of redemption is as far above the free-will system as heaven is high above earth, and as God is above fallen and depraved man. The one is of and in God, and the other is of and in man.

But some are ready to say again that the devil is hindering the up-rising of this house, and that it may be possible for him to almost destroy it. The temple was not commenced by Solomon until all the enemies of it were conquered, and were in subjection to Israel's king. Is the devil a conquered enemy? We must either admit that he is, or we must deny the plain voice of inspiration. For Jesus hath conquered death, and him that had the power thereof, which is the devil. Boundaries are set to his power, and within those boundaries he is chained. His conqueror says to him, "Thus far shalt thou go, but no farther." When the proud waves and billows of hell's wrath have reached their appointed point, the Commander says, "Here shall thy proud waves be stayed," and they speedily obey. Has Jesus all power in heaven and earth, and over all flesh? Has God given him power over all flesh, to give eternal life to as many as the Father hath given him? Does all the fullness of the Godhead dwell bodily in him? Who or what then can stay the stretching forth and willing of that almighty arm which he has made bare in the eyes of all nations? He makes his people willing in the day of his power. He brings the Gentiles to his bright rising; for they were chosen in him before the foundation of the world, and were predestinated to a place in God's building. They are fitly framed in Christ, and are brought and put in their predestinated place in that house, which is securely inclosed with the walls of salvation. This house can never be reached by the enemy, for it is within the walls (the covenant of grace); and the Lord God is a wall of fire round about it, and the glory in the midst. And if the enemy attempts to break down the wall, he finds upon his approach that our God (who is the wall of fire) is a consuming fire. Within these walls, or in the covenant made with Christ, the elect among the Gentiles were embraced. "And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising." "Then thou shalt see, and flow together, and thine heart shall fear, and be enlarged; because the abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, the forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee."—Isa. lx. 3, 5. No foe can ever destroy this house, for it is founded in infinite wisdom and protected by almighty power, and the foundation of God standeth sure. All the attributes of Jehovah in the eternal purpose of his grace surround it for a defense. His awful majesty and heavenly glory are in and round about it; and how sublime and happy is the following description of its security: "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise."—Isa. lx. 18. Here is the tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man; and here is the presence and protection of our God; for upon all the glory there is a defense. This then is the house which is inclosed with walls, in which the Gentiles have a place, and which Jesus builds, and relative to which he counted the cost before he began to build, and is perfectly able to finish it. None can ever laugh at him in consequence of a failure in perfecting it. And in it we can say, How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord! how beautiful are thy courts! And may our desires prompt us to say, "Come ye, and let us go up to the house of the Lord, to the mountain of the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." The Gentiles not only have thus a place in this house, but also a name, better than the name of sons and daughters; an everlasting name, which shall not be cut off. The name of the natural descendants of Abraham is far inferior to that name which the children of God receive by their union to God in Christ. "Ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." Jacob received a new name, which the mouth of the Lord named, and in that name the seed of Jacob were afterwards called. The Edomites received their name from Esau, and the Israelites from Jacob, who was named Israel by the angel of the Lord. The children of promise are counted for the name or seed, and in that seed the name is given and retained. "And it shall come to pass, that he that is left in Zion, and he that remaineth in Jerusalem, shall be called holy, even every one that is written among the living in Jerusalem."—Isa. iv. 3. The name is an everlasting one, and shall not be cut off. "And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name. Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God."—Isa. lxii. 2, 3.

With these cheering testimonies before us, and with some realizing sense of the substance embraced in them, we cannot fail to comprehend to some extent the blessings received with this most glorious of all names in heaven or earth. It is a name which originated in God, and belongs exclusively to his family. It is a name as far superior to that of an Israelite literally, as the glory of Christ surpasses the glory of Jacob. The name embraces both the head and the body, or rather is applied to both, as it takes both to constitute the person to whom the name is applied. As Israel received their new name in Jacob, so do Christians receive their name in Christ. "In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely: and this is his name whereby he shall be called, THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS."—Jer. xxiii. 6. Again, it is written, "In those days shall Judah be saved, and Jerusalem shall dwell safely: and this is the name wherewith she shall be called, The Lord our Righteousness."—Jer. xxxiii. 16. "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it."—Rev. ii. 17.

May the Lord grant us the evidence that we have received the white stone, having in it this new name written, the everlasting name, that shall not be cut off.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have been thinking for some time that I would once more write a few lines to the dear children of God. We read that they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened and heard it; and a book of remembrance was written before him, for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. How many there are of the Lord's people who cannot speak to each other, from afflictions and other causes, which the Lord foreknew. But he has said that he will be with those that think upon his name. O what a name to think upon! It is a subject that can never be exhausted. Think of God's great love in giving his dear Son to die, that poor sinners might live. O what love in Jesus, to give his life a ransom for poor, helpless, hell-deserving sinners, such as we feel ourselves to be. Jesus paid the debt of his people, that they might go free. Was ever love like this? Jesus tells us that he came not to call the righteous, but sinners, who have no hope in themselves, but are sick of self and sin. Those who are satisfied with themselves do not want the great Physician. Well do we remember the time when we felt, if we did not give utterance in words, "We will not have this man to reign over us." We were satisfied with ourselves, and thought we were as good, if not better, than others. As long as the strong man armed kept the heart, we thought we were safe. But when a stronger than he came, everything was turned bottom upward, as it were. All our comeliness was turned into corruption, and our cry was, "God, be merciful to me, a sinner." This is the cry of every one who cannot help themselves; and they have to go to Jesus, whom they have despised, and esteemed as a root out of dry ground, without form or comeliness. But how different we now feel! We can say that he is the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely. We cannot love him as we desire, nor shall we as long as we carry about these poor bodies. We grieve, being burdened. O how rich is that grace that takes such poor sinners out of nature's darkness, and gives them new desires, new affections, to choose the things that they once hated, and to hate the things they once loved.

Dear kindred in Jesus, I will tell you a little of my travel. It is now more than a half century since the Lord brought me, as I hope, to feel my need of him. Many days have passed since then, and many changes

I have experienced; but the Lord has been very good to me, in preserving me amidst all my heart wanderings. O how many times my foolish heart has wandered from him, my best friend. I do feel the depravity of my heart so much, and the world has been a snare. O how many times I have cried out, Wretch that I have been, to be carried away with such trifles. I have wondered if it could be that the grace of God dwells in such a heart as mine. Can it be that the Lord has begun a work in my soul? I know if he has, he will never leave that work, but will perfect it. I know I want to lay passive in the Lord's hands. I do love the psalms of David, who felt that his heart was as a cage of unclean birds. His prayer is the prayer of every Christian. They want the Lord to hold them up; and if the Lord holds us, we shall be safe. O that we may be living near our dear Jesus, and be learning of him, for that is the safe and happy place for poor, helpless sinners to rest. O that the blessed Spirit may lead us and teach us, and take of the things of Jesus and reveal them to our understanding. I pass through many changes, and have much to mourn over, having such a hard heart and such wandering thoughts. I would be different. I feel that the Canaanite is still in the land. The two natures will be at war as long as we are in this world of sin. But what a mercy it is that we have such a precious Jesus to go to, who is touched with the feeling of our infirmities. He knows our frame, and remembers that we are dust. I do believe that I love my dear Jesus, and sometimes feel him precious. At other times I feel cold, and, I was about to say, dead; but that cannot be, for the dead have no feeling, as I know I have. I do feel that I am a great sinner, and I need a great Savior.

"My hope is fix'd on nothing less Than Jesus' blood and righteousness."

This one thing I can say, I love the church of God, and have had some happy meetings in the years that have gone by, when I lived in New York state. Sister C. and myself used to attend the Conference at Riker's Hollow, in Steuben Co. I once met you, Elder Beebe, at South Dansville, N. Y., and met your dear, honored father many times, with many other dear brethren that have passed away to that rest that remains to the people of God. How anxious we were for the times to come, and what good meetings they were. Surely it was a foretaste of that meeting around the throne of God, where all the redeemed will meet, with no sin to mar the peace. I have a hope that through grace I shall be one of that number. If I shall, it will be all of rich grace, and we shall join in that song, "Worthy the Lamb that was slain."

We have a little church here, and have services once a month. It is more than two years since I have been able to meet with them, owing to old age and infirmities. Our dear old Elder always makes me a visit, unless prevented. I am always glad to meet my dear friends, but they are so far off from each other that I do not see them as often as I would like.

My christian love to you all. I remain, I hope, your sister in Jesus, HESTER RUMNEY.

COOPSTOWN, Md., Oct. 4, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS IN CHRIST—If one so sinful as I am may call you brethren. It has been for some time on my mind to speak a few words to you concerning the thoughts which are almost constantly with me. I feel very poor in spirit. I am discontented on account of my shortcomings. I do not know sometimes which way I am traveling. I desire to live near my God and Savior, but I feel that I come so short that it keeps me away down in the valley, with my harp hung upon the willows. There are very few of our faith and order near me. I feel a great desire to be with and talk with the Lord's people, and have hoped it would for the future be better; but it is no better yet. O how I desire to spend the remainder of my days with God's dear children, as they are the people I love. I very seldom can raise a smile, my heart is so heavy, and I exclaim, "O my shortcomings! Is there any one like me?" But when I look back at times that are past and gone, when the candle of the Lord shone in my heart and soul, when I tasted that the Lord is gracious, it gives me sweet peace at times, which I would not take ten thousand worlds for. The Lord has done all things well; but my complaint is my shortcomings.

"After so much mercy past,
Will he let me sink at last?"

Jesus is all the hope I have for life and salvation; and if I miss it through him I am gone. I have no merits to bring, no oblation to plead, but look for all in Christ. But how many ways there are to sin, no living mortal knows, and I sometimes fear I may come short at last; but if I do, my Jesus does all things right. The thought often comes in my mind, How could I bear to be banished from my God and Savior and the blood-bought throng in heaven, where I could not be with them? O distracting thought! Dear brethren, does such a thought press your souls? I think my sun of life is fast declining, and I am not satisfied, because I cannot live nearer my blessed God. I cry out, My leanness! my leanness! It is the grief of my soul. It looks strange to me, after the Lord has shown me so much in times past, that my way should be so dark now. I would like to know if there are any of God's dear children who feel to be stumbling along like me. I was so happy when the Lord took me up from the mire, and placed my feet upon the Rock, that I thought I never should stumble again. It does me more good to look back than it does to look at the present. This earth has no charms for me. It is altogether vanity and vexation of spirit. O how I love to be in company with the Lord's people, and talk of the heavenly kingdom! I am low down in spirit. If any of you feel like I do, I would like to know it, as it might bind up my wounds and let the captive go free. I do desire to be a true servant of my blessed Master, but constantly my shortcomings are weighing me down. O, dear brethren and sisters, pray for poor, worthless me. I plead with our blessed Lord so much, I fear I shall weary him.

If I am not gone to rest when I am gone from this world of sin and sorrow, I do not want any one to say, She is better off, unless there is reason to say so. I do not know of any one particular cause for such despondent feelings. But I know I am a sinner, and I greatly desire to be a christian, though I feel I come so far short of it. This world is a wilderness of woe, and has no joys for me. But sometimes the blessed Sun of Righteousness sends some sweet rays of heavenly light into my soul, which strengthen my poor, fainting soul. All the peace I have comes from above. Dear brethren and sisters, if any of you have been in such a frame of mind I would like to know it. Sometimes I wish to see some of my Father's children, and talk about our heavenly home; for there is my treasure. At other times, when I see them, I feel so shut up, and under a cloud, that I cannot talk. O! is there any one like me? I do love my God and Savior above all things. When I think of the cruel pains our dear Jesus bore in his own body on the cross, it brings tears from my eyes. How could I bear the thought, If when he calls his own my name should be left out? Dear brethren, let us look to Jesus, who is the author and finisher of our faith. I have some sweet, refreshing times, but travel more in darkness than in light. How soul-cheering it is when we walk by the light of God's holy Spirit. But my hope is so small at times that I can scarcely find it, yet I would not take ten thousand worlds for it.

Dear brethren, if you see fit you may give this poor scribble a corner in our paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. It is a poor thing, but it accords with the feelings of my heart. May God be with you all.

JANE MIDDLEDITCH.

"AND why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?"—Luke vi. 46.

If I send this article for publication, and the brethren editors think it worthy a place in the columns of the SIGNS, I have no other reason to give than that this Scripture has engaged my mind for some time. I feel that it would be a great comfort to me to know that by the Spirit of the Lord I have comforted some of God's dear children.

"And why call ye me, Lord, Lord?" Jesus says that every tree is known by his own fruit. We judge a tree by the quality of its fruit. Some one may ask, Who is it that cannot say, Lord, Lord? But I ask, Who is it that can and does say, Lord, Lord, in deed and in truth? None but those who have been born of the Spirit. "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost."—1 Cor. xii. 3. When the Lord is revealed to us as our sin-bearer, we are made to look away from self, and from all earthly aid, and exclaim with one of old, "We plead not our own righteousness, but thy great mercies, O God." With such, calling upon the Lord is not merely a privilege, but is a necessity; for they have learned by experience the truth of the word of the Lord by the mouth of the prophet, "Cursed is man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm." There are many who cry, Lord, Lord, and have not this experimental knowledge, but cry or pray as did the proud Pharisee. We may hear them saying, "We have earnestly labored all the year for this great revival." There are many who say they want religion, and begin to cry, "Come, Lord, come now; help, Lord." As much as to say, We have done most of the work; and now, Lord, just a little help from you, and the work will be done. But it was not so with the poor publican. He cried to the Lord because of the deep-seated pain in his heart, caused by sin. So it is with every one who calls upon the Lord in truth. It is because the Spirit of the Lord has made bare our wounds, and we cry because of misery and pain. When God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shines in our hearts, it gives the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. It is then that he rises with healing in his wings. Then with joy we shout, Alleluia! glory, honor, dominion and all power belong unto the Lord our God.

If this shall come under the observation of any who have been thus blessed, and who are yet neglecting what Jesus has commanded them, let me impress upon your minds the words of the text, "And why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" Doubtless there are some whom the Lord has taken up out of the pit wherein is no water, and has put a new song in their mouths, even praise unto our God, who have not gone to their friends, the church, and told them what great things the Lord has done for them. If so, they are not doing what the Lord has said. Others have become ensnared in the meshes of the net of false religionists, who seem to me to be represented by the characters that Joshua addressed, when he said, "Now therefore fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and in truth; and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt; and serve ye the Lord. And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom ye will serve; whether the gods which your fathers served that were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell: but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." It seems to me that the gods before the flood represent the gods worshiped by the unregenerate, being the institutions of men, such as human efforts and means, by which they claim to save the world. I verily believe there are heaven-born souls who are blinded by false teachers, to the extent that they worship they know not what. But when it pleases God, who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, to show such the error of their ways, then it is they learn of a truth that such worship is idolatry, and are made to cry in bitterness of soul, Lord, forgive. Now they worship a God of all power, and with the apostle exclaim, "By the grace of God I am what I am."

I must stop. I feel that I have hardly touched the subject. There is more in the text than in my weakness I can comprehend. May Israel's God abide with all Israel, especially with the editors of the SIGNS, which is unto us a cup of cold water when thirsty.

In conclusion, let us exclaim with the psalmist, "Preserve me, O God: for in thee do I put my trust. O my soul, thou hast said unto the Lord, Thou art my Lord: my goodness extendeth not to thee; but to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight. Their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another god: their drink offerings of blood will I not offer, nor take up their names into my lips."—Psa. xvi. 1-4.

ATTENBERY, Ill., Oct. 25, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I seat myself to write a few lines to the dear readers of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I was born in the state of Virginia, in the year 1852, my parents moving to Illinois in 1853, where I was raised. My mother joined the Primitive Baptists before I can remember. Until I was twenty-two years of age I never thought much about my condition in a state of nature. When quite young I used to be troubled some about death; but as I grew older those thoughts left me, and I thought I was not much of a sinner, as I did not engage in wickedness to such an extent as others around me. I became satisfied with my condition and surroundings, and thought I was as good as many of those professing christianity. I was married October 11th, 1874, and on the 22d of the same month started for Crawford Co., Kansas. In the summer of 1875 I first saw myself a sinner in the sight of God, having no hope, and without God in the world. I have no language to express my feelings at that time. I saw my condemnation, and saw that it was just. I tried to pray to God to have mercy on me, but felt I was too great a sinner for God to hear my prayers. I thought I would do better; but the more I tried the worse I got, until it seemed I was the most wicked person in the world. I went on in this way until February, 1877, when I had given up all hope. I thought the time had been when God would have heard my prayers, but I had sinned away the day of grace, when all at once my burden left me, and I was made to rejoice in hope of the glory of God. I felt that I wanted to tell everybody how thankful I felt to the Lord. In April of the same year I with my wife joined the United Baptist Church, and remained in full fellowship with that church until the fall of 1879, when I moved back to Illinois, getting a letter of recommendation from them. When we got it I told my wife that I never expected it to do me any good, for I had become dissatisfied with the doctrine and practices of that church, but thought I was not fit to belong to the Primitive Baptist Church. In the fall of 1882 I went to hear Elder W. Phillips, a Primitive Baptist preacher, and that was the first gospel sermon I ever heard, to my understanding; but I did not present myself to the church until Saturday before the second Sunday in June, 1886, when I with my wife went before the Little Flock Church, in Cass County, and tried to give a reason of our hope. We were received, and the next day were baptized by Elder G. W. Murray. Since that time I can truly say that I have had many sittings together with the children of God in heavenly places in Christ.

But for fear this will be too lengthy I will stop. Do as you please with this, and it will be all right with me.

Yours in hope of eternal life,
S. HUGHETT.

ALLIS HOLLOW, Pa., Sept. 26, 1889.

DEAR SISTER BESSIE:—I have been trying to write almost ever since I saw you, but fearing I would make a failure I have put it off until now. I feel it is my duty to write a few lines, not only for myself, but for one who loves the truth as well as I trust we do.

You told me about Mrs. Horton. She came to see me, and a good meeting we had. She showed so much zeal for the truth, as the Old Baptists preach it, and was so animated in the cause, that she could hardly express herself. How disappointed she was when she learned that there had been meeting at your place and she did not hear of it. She wished me to write and tell you all how well she had enjoyed herself since that meeting when she joined the church; that she had been happy ever since, but really felt unworthy of so high a position. How I did wish, if it had been the Lord's will, that I could have been there, and went down, or followed our blessed Savior into the liquid grave. But if it is not his righteous will, all is right. I know I am not worthy of this, nor of the blessings I do enjoy. I tried to ask the Lord, if it were his will, to make it plain to me if I should go and be baptized and be one with you. I was singing one morning, and meditating on these things, when it occurred to me to look in the hymn book. I opened it, and found hymns that satisfied my mind, so that I feel there is nothing in the way but my unworthiness. If it is the will of the Lord, I must wait his bidding. The hymns were 1109 and 1111. I must tell you that at times I feel altogether unworthy, and such a coldness and deadness comes upon me, and in spite of all efforts I feel sad and lonely and discouraged; but I hope my trust is in the Lord. As Mrs. Horton says, there are no people I love as I do the Old Baptists; and if you preach, dear brother Silas, anywhere this side of Vaughan Hill, please let us know, and if possible we will come, and will bring all we can to hear you preach. I would that I were able to go to Vaughan Hill, but am not as yet. I am not feeling at all well now, but hope to be better soon.

I must stop for this time, so good-by. I know you will overlook all blunders. Much love to you all.

From your unworthy friend,
ELIZA O.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Salisbury Association of Old School or Primitive Baptists, in session with the church at Messongoes, Accomack Co., Va., October 23d, 24th and 25th, 1889, to the several associations and meetings with which we correspond, Greeting.

BELOVED BRETHREN:—We desire to be thankful to the Giver of all good that it has been our privilege to once more withdraw ourselves for a little season from the turmoil and strife of the world, and that we have had such sweet manifestations of his Spirit, and that we have been greatly refreshed in our inward man, in which we also hope we have realized a renewing by the Holy Ghost. We have been cheered by some sweet evidences of the promises of the heavenly Father (Bridegroom). Our churches have been well represented, and all report peace and harmony, with some additions. Your messengers have come to us in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel, and we have felt refreshed, as a weary traveler is by refreshing shade and a draught of cold water. We as an association are united and harmonious, standing fast in the precious doctrine of grace, without any signs of schism or divisions.

Our next meeting is appointed to be held with the church at Salisbury, Wicomico Co., Md., to begin on Wednesday before the fourth Sunday in October, 1890, when and where we hope to meet you again.

THE WITNESS OF TRUTH.

DEAR FRIENDS:—If it is not asking too much, I would like to have your views on John iv. 29. This Scripture has been on my mind for months, and I would like to have the views of any of the Lord's children upon it, either privately or through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

Respectfully,

A FRIEND.

REPLY.

"COME, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did; is not this the Christ?"—John iv. 29.

The language of this text will be recognized by Bible readers as the proclamation of the woman with whom Jesus talked at Sychar, where he sat on Jacob's well. The conversation is recorded in the preceding verses of this chapter. It appears to have been but a brief interview, and only a few sentences were spoken by our Lord; yet the testimony of the woman, as expressed in our text, is unquestionably true. It is not stated as a merely accidental circumstance that Jesus met with this woman at the time and place where this interview was held. "He must needs go through Samaria." It is evident also that the woman must at that very time come thither to draw water. She was not seeking him. The fact that he, being a Jew, would ask of her for water, was unaccountable to her, "for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." Her amazement appears in the question which she asked. The words of Jesus were to her so wonderful that she perceived that he was a prophet. Then she sought this decision of the controversy between the Jews and her own people as to the proper "place where men ought to worship." In answer to this question Jesus taught her the necessity of that worship which is "in spirit and in truth." Then he revealed himself as the Messiah, "which is called Christ." Upon receiving this knowledge she "left her waterpot, and went her way into the city, and saith to the men" what is written in the words of our text.

"Come." She did not propose to carry Jesus to the inhabitants of the city, as modern will worshipers profess ability to carry him in his gospel to distant lands; she called upon the men to come to the same place where she had seen him. So those who have received the knowledge of that salvation which is in Christ Jesus know that they cannot bring him to their fellow-sinners. They can only tell of his omnipotent grace as exhibited in their own cases, and call attention to what he has done for them. In this declaration they glorify him as the Savior of sinners, and their testimony is glad tidings only to such as know their need of just such a perfect salvation as is revealed in him.

"See a man, which told me all things that ever I did." It is said, in the account given of the conversation, that Jesus told her of her sinful conduct in the violation of her marriage relations; and nothing is said of any other things in her past conduct. But in that brief interview the sins of all her life were brought to her remembrance. Those who have heard the voice of the Son of God can witness the searching power of his word in exposing all their inmost thoughts and feelings. There is no clearer evidence that sinners are ignorant of the judgment of God than the fact that they suppose it must be needful that he should be informed of the sins which are hidden in the secret thoughts of men. All who are taught of God to know the exceeding sinfulness of sin in their own hearts can witness by personal experience that "The word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart."—Heb. iv. 12. When Jesus said, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" the proud Pharisee at once saw all his sinful and polluted works arrayed in condemnation of his religious zeal. So also Jesus but looked on Peter in his wicked denial of his Lord, and the conviction of all his guilt came with such power that Peter "went out, and wept bitterly." In thus telling the conscious sinner all things that ever he did, it is not needful that a multitude of words should be used. The light of life shining in the heart reveals all the corruption which is hidden there, and then for the first time the sinner is himself able to see his own lost and hopeless condition. This revelation qualifies every one who receives it to testify to the divine power of the word of the Lord. All who have heard his voice can bear witness that "Never man spake like this man."

The word of the Lord alone has power to set our secret sins in the light of his countenance. The effect of this light shining in the heart is conclusive evidence that "All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do." There is no necessity for argument in the case of the sinner who is brought into judgment at the bar of infinite purity and wisdom. Acknowledging the justice of his condemnation, he can only pray for mercy. No other power but the piercing word of God can thus carry conviction to the heart of the sinner. This is the experience of every one who has been quickened by the voice of the living God. Evidently those have never heard that voice who can talk of pleading their own merits before the throne of the holy Judge of quick and dead. It is equally certain that none can know the justice of God in their condemnation until they are made alive by the power of the life-giving word of the Lord. It is frequently a serious question in the mind of the tried subject of salvation whether his hope is genuine; and the comforting assurances which he has received are often doubted. Reason suggests that he may be mistaken in regard to those evidences in which he has been made to rejoice. Under such trial it would be well if he could remember that the first manifestation of divine light showed the exceeding sinfulness of sin in his own heart. No natural investigation ever could discover this truth. None ever saw himself utterly lost and under just condemnation unless that truth was revealed by the word of the Lord. He alone "searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts." The fact that this revelation has been given to any sinner is an abiding testimony that he has been taught of God. In the thick cloud of conscious guilt God has set the bow of his everlasting promise of justification and life through the grace which is in Christ Jesus. There is no more conclusive assurance that the light of divine life has shined in the heart of a sinner, than the fact that he has seen the hopelessness of his condition as being already under the just condemnation of the holy law of God. This is the real condition of every one of the family of the sinner Adam. The shining of the light does not make man a sinner; it only reveals the fact that he is already under the condemnation of justice. "But all things that are reprov'd are made manifest by the light; for whatsoever doth make manifest is light."—Eph. v. 13. The word of the Lord entering into the heart of the guilty sinner reveals the depth of sin which was hidden there; until that light shines in his heart he cannot see that fountain of corruption. Therefore none can know the exceeding sinfulness of sin in himself without the manifestation of the light of life. "The entrance of thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple."—Psa. cxix. 130. When any sinner knows himself as justly condemned before God, it is certain that the truth has been revealed by the entrance of the word of the Lord into his heart; and this is the abiding witness of divine truth, which shines even in the thick darkness of conscious guilt, giving assurance that the words of truth have entered there. Nothing is hidden from the penetrating rays of that sun of righteousness whose tabernacle God has set in the heavens of his eternal justice. Every sinner who is made alive by the entrance of the living word of the Lord is ready to confess that his secret sins are set in the light of the countenance of his omniscient Judge. Thus every one who is taught of God is qualified to testify that he is indeed the all-wise God.

"Is not this the Christ?" The evidence upon which this poor woman rested in the conviction that she had seen the true Messiah was not simply that he had said to her, "I that speak unto thee am he." Evidently she was satisfied of the truth of his assertion; but the ground upon which she proclaimed him as the Christ was her personal knowledge that he had brought the sins of her own life to her remembrance in telling her all things that ever she did. This witness is borne by every one in whom Jesus is revealed as the only hope of salvation. None could be qualified to testify to this truth by merely hearing others tell of the assurance which they had received. Each one must have the testimony for himself. "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself."—1 John v. 10. This enables each one to speak from personal knowledge in bearing witness. All who are thus taught are able to speak in the language of the inspired apostle, "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us."—1 John i. 3. The fellowship of the saints is confined to those who have this witness of truth in themselves. It cannot be extended to such as have learned by the pious efforts of men to say that salvation is of the Lord. There is a vast difference between the consent of the natural mind to that which is itself true, and the knowledge of truth which is indispensable to enable one to testify to that truth. Those who have been taught of God can readily see this difference.

Although the form of a question is used in this language of the woman, it is not to be understood as implying a doubt in her mind of the fact stated. The evidence which she presented clearly established the reality of the divine character of him whom she had seen. Indeed, there is no stronger form of assertion than that which is there used. The question in connection with the declaration of what she had witnessed is an appeal to the evidence as conclusively confirming her knowledge that she had seen the true Messiah. The saying of the Samaritans, as recorded in the subsequent connection, shows this to be the correct understanding of these words. They said, "Now we believe, not because of thy saying; for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Savior of the world." This is in accord with the experience of all who have heard the voice of the Son of God in the forgiveness of their sins. There is no intermediate witness between guilty sinners and that life-giving Word by which they are cleansed from all guilt. They cannot ascribe their deliverance to any other name but Jesus only. When his voice is heard in the conviction of sin, or in the assurance of deliverance from condemnation, there is no need of any created witness to inform the subject of such instruction that it is the word of the Lord which has brought that knowledge. Jesus says, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life."—John vi. 63. As the lightning is itself the power which accomplishes the work for which it is sent forth, so the word of the Lord is the irresistible witness of its own divine authority and omnipotence. That word of truth is the test which determines the character and condition of every one who hears it. To those who are led by the Spirit of truth the proclamation of this word is the joyful sound of the gospel of salvation by the grace of God; to all who are yet in the darkness of natural death in sin, the same word of truth is a savor of death, in which they find nothing of comfort. Every one who receives with joy the testimony of Jesus, has the witness in that fact by which he is enabled to testify to the truth. In this way the witness of truth reveals the thoughts of all hearts where it is applied.

WHO WISHES TO ASSIST?

FOR many years the SIGNS OF THE TIMES was published on terms that no other paper within our knowledge has ever been able to offer, viz., two dollars a year for those who were able to pay that amount, one dollar a year for those who were not able to pay any more, and free to those who really desired the paper, but were not able to pay anything; and we do not remember ever refusing the paper to any one who asked for it free until we started the weekly, and then we just simply could not do it. We have carried on an average in the neighborhood of a thousand gratuitous subscribers for years, until those who were paying full price began to complain that the subscription price of the SIGNS was too high, and to discontinue the paper on that account. We therefore were obliged to increase the amount we gave them for their money, and to do this we had to drop hundreds of names from our free list, which was one of the most unpleasant things we have ever been obliged to do.

While most of our brethren are poor, and feel hardly able to pay their own subscription, yet we believe there are some who, if they knew of the case, would rather assist in carrying this list than have them deprived of the paper. We have therefore concluded to submit this proposition to them. We will keep a list of names of those who appeal to us for the paper free, and if any of our brethren feel disposed to assist us in bearing the expense, we will for every dollar received enter one of these names on our list for one year, and send the person remitting the money the name and address of the person to whose subscription their money has been applied.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES FOR 1890.

ABOUT a year ago we announced our decision to publish the SIGNS OF THE TIMES an eight-page weekly at the same price we were publishing the twelve-page semi-monthly, and made the unprecedented offer to allow one-half the subscription price as a commission to all our paid-up old subscribers for every new subscriber they would procure us, and the result was that we received an addition of more than two thousand names to our list. Many, however, of these new subscribers paid but one dollar to the old subscriber, who sacrificed his commission to procure the new subscriber, having in view simply the increasing of the circulation of the paper. The question now is, How many of those paying only one dollar last year will renew for 1890 at the regular rate of two dollars? If we shall be able to retain a good proportion of those, and can still increase our circulation two thousand more, we will then be able to furnish the paper weekly at one dollar and fifty cents a year; and should it be increased four thousand, we would be able to publish it weekly at one dollar a year.

Many doubtless do not understand why we can publish at one dollar a year with the increased circulation, and for the benefit of such we will explain. It takes just as much typesetting, imposing forms and making ready for press to print one paper as it does any number of thousands of copies. In fact, after the paper is once "to press," the additional expense is but a trifle more than the cost of the blank paper. For instance, say it cost five thousand dollars a year to run a weekly of five thousand copies; it would probably not exceed seven thousand dollars to print ten thousand copies. The inquiry may arise with some, How is it that the local publications of but a thousand or fifteen hundred circulation can be published for two dollars a year? The reason is that those papers rely almost entirely on their advertising patronage for support. If the SIGNS should take two or three pages of advertisements it could be published at one dollar a year.

Another thing our readers are not aware of is that although the subscription price is two dollars a year, our gross receipts do not average one dollar and fifty cents for each subscriber, our loss from delinquent and gratuitous subscribers being more than twenty-five per cent. While most of our subscribers know and appreciate the above facts, there are many who do not, and consequently consider the price of the SIGNS too high.

Although the increased expenses of publishing the SIGNS weekly this year are several hundred dollars more than the increase in the receipts, we have decided to continue it weekly another year, and make the following

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!

From now until the first of next January, any one who is now a subscriber, and whose subscription is paid up, may send us new subscribers at one dollar a year; but no one can get the paper from this office at less than the regular rates. Any one who is not now a subscriber can have the benefit of the above terms by sending two dollars for their own subscription, and one dollar each for additional new subscribers.

MARRIAGES.

On Nov. 5th, 1889, by Elder Benton Jenkins, at the residence of Mr. Wm. J. Kellam, in the city of Middletown, N. Y., Mr. John O. Bailey and Mrs. Virginia B. Little, daughter of the late Elder Gilbert Beebe, both of Carmel, Putnam Co., N. Y.

Oct. 7th, at the home of the bride, Kenton, Delaware, by Elder Silas H. Durand, Victor S. Durand, of Philadelphia, and Miss Florence E. Downs.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

OUR dear mother, Mary Black, died at her home near Peru, Ind., Sept. 19th, 1889. She was born in Dutchess Co., N. Y., Jan. 30th, 1809, having lived to the age of 80 years, 7 months and 20 days.

At about the age of twenty years she moved with her family to Ohio, where she was married, Sept. 18th, 1832. In 1835, with her husband and daughter, she moved to Miami Co., Ind., where they reared a family of four sons and three daughters, all of whom remain to mourn the loss of a devoted christian mother. She was a faithful and consistent member of the Old School Baptist Church for more than thirty years, her membership having been with Pleasant Hill Church, of this county. Our father departed this life at about the same age, having preceded her nine years. She often expressed a wish that she might follow him at the same age, which desire God in his goodness granted her. Her disease was that consequent to old age, at times suffering greatly, which she bore with christian fortitude. She did not have the company of many of our Baptist friends, as there is no church near. She had been failing all summer, but was able to visit her children. She wanted to see all her children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, which she did, and then seemed satisfied. The last two days she did not talk much, saying she was so tired. At about three o'clock Thursday morning she quietly fell asleep.

"Asleep in Jesus! blessed sleep!"

From which none ever wake to weep." We truly feel that our loss is her gain. Her remains were conveyed to their last resting place, to await the dawn of the resurrection. That her dear ones left behind may be sharers in that salvation in which she rejoiced, is the prayer and desire of

HER CHILDREN.

Mrs. Julie A. Jones, wife of A. J. Jones, of Benton Co., Miss., and daughter of Melven and Nancy Whittington, was born Feb. 20th, 1848, in Jefferson County, Ala. Her father moved to Benton Co., Miss., in the fall of 1865, where she lived until her death. She was married to the writer in 1879. In 1872 she professed a hope in Jesus, and joined the Missionary Baptists, leaving them and joining the Primitive Baptists in June, 1882, and was baptized in August by Elder S. A. Wells. She was a faithful member, and a loving wife and mother, ever ready to entertain the brethren, sisters and friends. She had been troubled for several years with chronic liver complaint and bronchitis, but bore her affliction with as much fortitude as any one I ever saw. She died Sept. 15th, 1889, leaving a husband, three little children, brothers and sisters, with a host of friends, to mourn their loss, which we feel is her eternal gain, for she in her last sickness rejoiced in her home in heaven. We have every evidence that she is at rest with Jesus. The loss to the community in which she lived is deeply felt. May our dear children be enabled to follow in the footsteps of their dear mother. My loss is great, and I can only be comforted by him who has the power to give and to take away.

A. J. JONES.

☞ Potts Camp, Miss.

Barbara McArthur, wife of John McArthur, was a great sufferer for more than ten years, which she patiently bore until her once strong constitution gave way, and she fell calmly asleep in the early morn of Oct. 23d, in the 67th year of her age, in hope of a blessed immortality.

All that the skill of physicians and the tender care of family could do for her was done. In early life she received a hope of her interest in the atonement of the Lord Jesus Christ, joined the Covenant Baptist Church of Canada, and continued steadfast in the doctrine of the gospel to the end. An appropriate discourse was delivered by Elder Wm. Pollard from the words, "By the grace of God I am what I am" (1 Cor. xv. 10), to a large concourse of sympathizing friends and neighbors.

DIED—In the city of Middletown, N. Y., on Thursday morning, Oct. 31st, 1889, of diphtheria, Mary Leana Wollenhaupt, daughter of Henry Wollenhaupt, and grandchild of the late Oliver M. Comfort, of New Vernon, aged 8 years, 1 month and 27 days.

"The dear delights we here enjoy,
And fondly call our own,
Are but short favors borrowed now,
To be repaid anon."

"'Tis God that lifts our comforts high,
Or sinks them in the grave;
He gives, and (blessed be his name)
He takes but what he gave."

DIED—In the city of Middletown, N. Y., at 2:30 a. m., Oct. 29th, 1889, of hemorrhage of the lungs, Miss Hattie M. Johnson, daughter of Charles D. and Carrie Johnson, and granddaughter of the late Stephen Harding, aged 21 years.

"Peace! 'tis the Lord Jehovah's hand
That blasts our joys in death,
Changes the visage once so dear,
And gathers back the breath."

"Silent we own Jehovah's name,
We kiss the scourging hand,
And yield our comforts and our life
To his supreme command."

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. ### DAVID AND GOLIATH.

1 Samuel xvii.

TWO ARMIES are arrayed in battle garb,
Prepared for strife—each on a mount doth stand.

The one is Saul, with Israel's chosen men;
The other, 'tis the vast Philistine band.

Out from Philistia's host a giant stalks;
Goliath 'tis, of Gath, both strong and great.

For forty days at morn and eve he comes,
And Israel's host he sorely doth berate.

Cried he, "Why set your battle in array?
Send down to me a man, that we may fight.

If slain I am, your slaves we all will be;
But if he's killed, your service is our right."

When Saul and all his people heard these words
Their hearts were filled with terror and dismay;

For well they knew that not a man was there
Who could remove this giant from the way.

Young David, fair and ruddy, Jesse's son,
To take provision for his brethren, goes
Up to the battle-ground, and there doth see

Goliath coming forth from Israel's foes.

Then God, who seeth not as man doth see,
But worketh out his will through devious ways,

Who ere all time began declared the end,
And ruleth everything to his own praise,

Did put it into David's youthful heart
That he, upheld by God, could slay this foe.

No sword nor spear, but with a simple sling,
Clothed with Jehovah's strength, he forth doth go.

When this fair youth the giant did espy,
With not a weapon in his hand to wield,
Quoth he, "Come forth; your flesh I'll quickly give
To birds of air, and beasts that roam the field."

But David, by God's mighty arm sustained,
Goes onward, fearing not those boastful words,
And tells him that before the day is done
The earth shall know the battle is the Lord's.

By heavenly guidance he the stone doth sling,
With deadly force it strikes the giant's head;
And in surprise and fear Philistia groans,
Because their trusted champion is dead.

So we our huge Goliaths have to fight;
The greatest one of all is "Giant Sin;"
But he whose trust is placed in God above
Will by his grace in every trial win.

AARON WITHIN THE VEIL.

BY THE LATE JOSEPH IRONS.

"AND Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually."—Exodus xxviii. 30.

How solemn must have been the scene, how interesting the service, and how high the expectations of the worshipers, when Aaron, the high priest of Israel of old, enrobed according to the commandment of God, and furnished with the errands, which all the worshipers had brought to the outer court, entered within the veil, and the veil dropped, to hide him from their view! Methinks I witness the dead stillness of all the congregation, the profound interest, the earnest waiting, the high expectation and the fixed watchfulness for his return, that they might know the result of his negotiations with God on their behalf.

Did such solemnity pervade the tabernacle service in the wilderness, and the temple service in Jerusalem, and had it not a spiritual, high and all-important signification for the children of Israel down to the end of time? Does not our text declare it is to be "continually," perpetually? Then, behold, a greater than Aaron is here; and while the Aaronic priesthood has passed away, and given place to the priesthood of Melchisedec, our glorious High Priest, whom Aaron typified, still "bears the judgment" of all his ransomed Israel "upon his heart before the Lord," and that continually.

How high the honor to which Aaron was raised! How uniform the estimation of that honor among all the people of Israel! How invariable the consent that he should have it all, and that everything should be intrusted to him! Would that it were so among Christians, that they were all of one mind to honor Christ, and all of one heart to commit everything to him, and all in waiting posture to receive everything from him. Then should we understand a little of what my text means in its spiritual import. "Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually."

My object this morning, as God shall give me liberty and success, is to relieve every Israelite here (if God will) of all legal distress and painful forebodings, by showing them the heart of Christ, by showing them what is borne upon that heart of his, that they may forget themselves, and remember their sorrows and miseries no more, rejoicing that Aaron has got it all upon his heart before God.

Let me, first of all, invite your attention to the official business of the high priest; to "bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart." Then, secondly, to his uniform charge, "the children of Israel;" he had nothing to do with the Philistines and Ammonites and Moabites. He was not a universal-redemption high priest; it was for Israel, the people of God. Then, thirdly, the result which invariably followed, and which must follow to the end of time, and be enjoyed to all eternity by the Israel of God.

First of all, a few words relative to the official business of the great High Priest within the veil. Mark here, I have no more to do with Aaron now, but to Aaron's antitype I am directing your attention. I may have occasion to bring in Aaron as an illustration here and there; but my great purpose is to view the person of our glorious and exalted Redeemer. For another Priest has risen, after the order of Melchisedec, and not after the order of Aaron (except as far as Aaron's priesthood was typical of Christ's), and now to him alone must all the cases of the children of Israel be carried, and he alone must bear them upon his heart within the veil. Precious Jesus! come and manifest thyself to us, while we attempt to speak of thee in this character.

Now, first of all, I beseech you, look at the solemnity of his mediation. It was death, under the law, for any but the high priest to go within the veil, and he must not go without the blood. He was to become acquainted with all Israel's wants and concerns, and he was to go out of their sight, within the veil, and negotiate with the great Eternal on their behalf, and then to return to them, and tell them Jehovah's answers. Exactly the office of our precious Christ; exactly the work and employment in which he is perpetually engaged. "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." "There is one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus." With him all that concerns the church's salvation, and all that concerns Jehovah's glory, are positively and by covenant and oath intrusted, and committed altogether to his care. I am anxious to dwell upon this point, because of the miserable, wretched things that people call christianity in these days; in which all is to be contingent, something proposed to man, what the creature can do, dependent upon his repenting, and returning, and believing, and seeking, and watching, and the like. I grant all that you wish with regard to these things in the way of evidence and by way of contrast; but I will not allow that anything hangs upon them in the way of salvation. If I do, I at once get rid of a precious, glorious Christ, and dishonor his name, instead of exalting him.

Mark, then, that all the work is with Christ, intrusted to him. Blessings on his great and glorious name, he came forth from the invisibility of the Father's glory, from his own bosom, into the outer court; he came down to assume the tabernacle of our flesh, and dwelt in a body like ours, only without sin; and what for? Why, to become personally acquainted with the feelings and wants and miseries and necessities of all the Israel of God; and therefore it is said of him that he is touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. He knows all about the matter, therefore, and consequently can carry it upon his heart most feelingly, having descended to the outer court for the express purpose of becoming acquainted, in his manhood, with the things that pertain to his own church, "the children of Israel."

Observe, further, how capable he is of intercourse with the Father, intercourse with God. He is not merely man, but truly and properly God. While as man he knows all the feelings of a man, as God he possesses all the prerogatives of God. As man he can be familiar with his brethren, in all points like as they are, yet without sin; as God he "thought it not robbery to be equal with God;" and though he "took on him the form of a servant," he never relinquished, never lost the possession, the inherent possession of all the attributes and perfections of God. He was truly and properly God and man in one precious, glorious Christ. Aaron was never competent to be a priest, except typically; he could only be a typical priest; and all through Aaron's priesthood Christ was eyed and depended upon by the Jews, as he is by us now. Whether we look at Aaron or Melchisedec, the Lord Jesus himself alone can be our High Priest; nor can we allow the title to any but himself.

Mark, then, the sublime occupation in which our precious, glorious Christ is at this moment engaged. There he lives, to make intercession; there he lives, the advocate of his church; there he lives, the forerunner and representative of all Israel, within the veil, before the throne, exalted "far above all heavens, that he may fill all things," and wearing his priestly vesture. Not a merey comes down from the throne to a poor, ruined sinner but through him; nor can a breath of prayer or praise ascend to the throne but in and through him. "No man cometh unto the Father but by him." It follows, therefore, that Arians and Socinians never come to Christ, and therefore can have nothing to do with God. Their prayers are mockery, their praises are insults, and their whole religion is Paganism in disguise.

Observe here that it was not their wants nor their clever mode of telling them that secured success to the Israelites; but it was the blood that the high priest took within the veil. Just so it is not our repentance, it is not our prayers, that have anything to do with success; but it is the blood and the incense that our precious High Priest presents perpetually within the veil. There is the ground of our success. O blessed position for our glorious Christ to occupy! If he speaks to his Father, it is with "I will;" if he speaks to his people, it is with "They shall;" if he speaks for our petitions, it is for the merits of his sacrifice to bring answers of peace; if he speaks for our spiritual progress, it is for supplies of grace to be poured down from his own fullness; and if he speaks for our temporal wants, it is that the treasure which is with God may be communicated in his own time on behalf of his people.

But I pray you to mark particularly one word in our text, "judgment," with reference to this solemn position in which Jehovah Jesus stands between God and us. Now the word "judgment" has, according to our English vocabulary, a variety of significations; and so it has in Scripture. I shall take two or three examples, just to show you what Jesus bears upon his heart.

First, I think it may refer to the varied cases of the Lord's people, upon which they can form no decision, nor anybody else for them. I borrow this idea from the thought of the various cases brought into a court of judicature, upon which there is judgment to be given, a decision concerning them. Now I pray you to make a catalogue, if you can, an epitome, or a full account, as extended and particular as you can, of every case of soul distress you have been the subject of, every case of spiritual anxiety, from the first dawning of deep concern brought into your heart, the first cry of "What must I do to be saved?"

through all the legal doubts, slavish anxieties, soul temptations, heart conflicts, cruel persecutions, deep feelings, gloomy fears, midnight sorrows, winter chills; it would take me an hour to call over the catalogue, but bring them all up, and what then? Jesus bears them all upon his heart. There they are graven, and he will never lose them; he wrote them there himself; he bears them there before God. All glory to his grace, that though I cannot tell them all (and frequently am charged with shooting over people's heads), he can. I have not heard those sighs you heaved upon your knees this morning, I have not counted those groans you expressed, I cannot enter into the detail of all the workings of flesh and spirit in you, the effort of "the old man" to conquer "the new," and the endeavor of Satan to assist "the old man;" but they are all known to him, and your case is part of what Jesus bears before the throne upon his heart.

Moreover, by the term "judgment" we frequently understand the decision; for the case, however difficult, must be decided, and judgment given. Here I take up the poet's words, when he says, after speaking of anxieties and fears, whether all is right or not, "Lord, decide the doubtful case." He seems to have an eye upon the High Priest, and "the judgment" borne upon his heart. Ah, my brother, it is Jesus' own province to decide the case, to make it known, to send down the Spirit to "bear witness with our spirits." You may talk with a fellow-christian, and you do well; you may compare notes, and trace the correspondence of experience, and ask whether he has fared so and so, whether he has passed through such and such temptations, and whether such and such threatenings appeared to him overwhelming, or whether he was encouraged by such and such promises. I wish it constantly took the place of worse conversation; but after all your christian brother cannot decide for you. When you have gone to half an hour's length in this manner you retire, sighing, "Ah, there is something he does not know now. I have told my minister all I could, but he does not know the ten thousand vile corruptions in my heart, that I cannot give a name to—the worldliness, the coldness, the doubts, the questionings, absolutely the atheism sometimes." Well, go with it to the Lord Jesus; it is he alone that shall bring decision into thy soul, to take comfort from. Do mark how it was with poor Mary, when she "supposed it to be the gardener." I dare say, if any of the apostles had come and argued with her, they would not have convinced her, or brought her to decision; but one single word from his own lips, "Mary," and she answers instantly, "Rabboni, Master," and goes to the disciples and tells them "she had seen the Lord." My dear hearers, ten thousand sermons, ten thousand meetings for conversation with the most exalted christians, will not do for you what Jesus once pronouncing your name will do. No; let him speak to your heart, and there is peace; for he bears your judgment upon his heart.

This would bear amplifying, but I must pass on. By the term "judgment" we understand frequently a recompense, passing judgment and executing judgment upon persons. This, I think, is the meaning of the Holy Ghost by the prophet when he says that he is "the God that pleadeth the cause of his people;" and again, when we are told so emphatically, "Their Redeemer is strong, the Lord of hosts is his name. He shall thoroughly plead their cause." I conceive many texts of that description carry this idea of the "judgment" that is upon the heart of Christ; that wherever injury is done to his people on earth (sinner, may this smite your conscience, if you are treating God's people unkindly), that injury is known in heaven, and "the judgment," the recompense of it, is upon the very heart of Christ. "Vengeance is mine [what then?]: I will repay, saith the Lord." O! it is a fearful thing to "touch the apple of his eye." It is a fearful thing to say even an unkind word against a disciple of Jesus Christ. He will surely take recompense. He "bears the judgment," the denouncing of judgment, and the executing of judgment, too, upon his foes, on his own breast, on behalf of the children of Israel. Therefore I am sure there can be no need for you and me to cherish anything like revenge against the worst persecutors, the bitterest enemies, we meet upon earth; it is a very bad feeling. I remember, and to the day of my death shall never forget, when I meet with this text (though the circumstance occurred at least five-and-forty years ago), the case of a shining christian, who had been for a length of time grievously oppressed, in fact robbed and plundered, and so hemmed in by circumstances, like a fly in a spider's web, that he could not possibly get away. At length there opened circumstances in providence in which the godly man had as clear an opportunity of taking vengeance for himself as any carnal mind could desire; and at first old Adam was about to do it, but before he did it (I remember the dear saint telling me of it) that text dropped into his mind, "Vengeance is mine: I will repay, saith the Lord." Not one word now about vengeance. "Vengeance is mine." Jesus has got it upon his heart. To follow the case to its issue, I lived to see that injuring character die in wretchedness, and the injured christian triumphing over every trouble, proving that Jesus bears our recompense, our judgment, upon his heart. I am as sure as I am of my existence, that he will visit in retribution those who injure his saints; and therefore let us always leave it to him, and only pray for them, and pity them with our hearts, for they are in sad condition that offend against Christ.

But one more view here. I think "judgment," in its comprehensive sense, means the entire government and management of all that relates to the children of Israel. All glory to his name, this agrees with what is set down by the prophet Isaiah concerning him, "The government shall be upon his shoulder." There is not a single feature of the interests, either temporal or spiritual, of his beloved family, but he has it upon his heart; and he orders all providence, and governs all worlds, and will reverse even nature itself, rather than any design of his shall be frustrated. It might be the intention of Jezebel to starve Elijah to death. No, no, says God; I will send the ravens first. It might be the intention of his enemies to murder Paul. No, no, says God; I will make them the very instruments of sending him out of the way. The arranging, the governing, everything relating to his church, is "upon his heart continually."

Every word of my text seems emphatic. "Borne upon his heart," where Aaron wore the breastplate, there are all the names of the children of Israel, and all their interests interwoven with their names. This is "before the Lord continually;" so that (my soul begins to feel a little of heavenly ecstasy at the thought of it) the whole of thine interests and mine are at this moment exhibited within the veil, before all the perfections and attributes of Deity. So that Jesus stands there, as the great "High Priest of our profession," with all our concerns and interests upon his heart before the Lord; justice and condescension and power and love and mercy, immutability, omniscience, omnipresence, eternity, all looking to my interests, all viewing my name upon Jesus' heart. "Before the Lord," exhibited in his sight, presented in heaven. Why, is there any doubt about my getting there, when my interests are a matter of concern there already, my name there already, and perpetually upon the High Priest's heart? All glory to his name, it is to be "continually." He hath "an unchanging priesthood;" and there is not a single moment, even of dark and trying and sorrowful and wintry seasons, but Jesus is exhibiting the case of each individual member of his mystical body in heaven.

I pass on to the second particular of our subject. For while I have gone through these hints on the glorious person and office of our precious Christ, and his work within the veil, there may be some ready at once to quibble, and bring in Satan's suggestion, But is all this for me? O if I could be as sure as you seem to be, that my name was there, and that my interests were there! You speaking with confidence and, as some of us think, with presumption. I pray God to make you as presumptuous as me. If ever he causes you to pass through the depths of the sea, as he has caused me, you will find that nothing but that confidence, which you call presumption, will do for deep waters.

But now, in order to meet the fearful apprehensions and doubts of the timid soul ready to inquire, But is all this for me? may I put in my claim? O that I could but call this High Priest mine, and could but be sure that he has my name upon his breastplate, and my name upon his heart! Mark what my text says. It is for "the children of Israel." He has one unvarying charge, "the children of Israel." All you have got to do is to recognize your character, your relationship, your affinity, and to come to some decision as to whether you are an Israelite; for it is for all Israel. It does not say merely the tribe of Dan, or the tribe of Judah, or the tribe of Benjamin, or the tribe of Joseph, but the whole Israel of God. Not merely for Episcopalians, or Dissenters, or Presbyterians, or Methodists; there is no such name known in this great business. But the High Priest appears for all Israel, for every true Israelite.

Then, say you, how are they to be known? For you know Paul says, "They are not all Israel which are of Israel." I will give you a threefold view of God's Israel, with the hope that the most timid soul may be able to put in his claim. First of all, they are the seed of a covenant Head, born in the covenant line. You know some of Abraham's posterity, who were carnal, pleaded this literally, that they were Abraham's seed, and not born of fornication. So you may be, said Jesus, and yet you may be "of your father, the devil," in another sense. So that, in a literal point of view, descent is nothing. The godliness of the father and the godliness of the mother will not save ungodly children from eternal condemnation. O no. Are you then individually the seed of the covenant Head? The apostle John tells us they are those that are "born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." Can you discover your spiritual birth? If you can discover that you have a life that is supernatural, a nature given you from above, the life of God in the soul, communicated by the regenerating operations of the Holy Ghost, verily you are the seed of the covenant Head, verily you are an Israelite, verily your name is upon his heart, and all that concerns you.

Take a second view of the case. They are the true circumcision, and mark the phrases employed as descriptive of them. "We are the circumcision [who are they? Spiritual worshipers.] which worship God in the spirit [in possession of saving faith, and trusting in him, and consequently], rejoice in Christ Jesus [and reject Arminianism. What, say you, is it set down so? No; but it is set down in stronger terms, meaning the same thing], and have no confidence in the flesh." Therefore it is quite clear they cannot be free-willers. Mark the points of investigation here. "We are the circumcision which worship God in the spirit," spiritual worshipers. Let thine own heart and conscience decide this: Dost thou know what it is to be engaged spiritually with that God who is a Spirit? I want to find out God's real Israel, or make them find themselves out. Dost thou know what that text means, "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth?" Dost thou know what it is, with or without words (I do not ask which), to have the powers of the soul going forth with ardent desire, holy longings, spiritual concern, sacred adoration, fervent petition, earnest groanings, heaven-taught sighs after the God who is a Spirit; fleeing to him, dealing with him, bowing before him, trusting in him, and pleading for mercy through the Redeemer's blood? That, I think, is something like spiritual worship. If you want another epitome, I should say it is the adoration of all the perfections of Deity. It is the application of a heaven-born soul to Father, Son and Holy Ghost for a whole salvation. It is the supplication of a broken-hearted sinner for a supply of his wants, and a communication of the merits of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is the surrender of body, soul and spirit to God. Do you know what this worship is? Is there not a spice of it in thy religion? There may be a sound creed repeated, and not one breath of worship in it; there may be half the Bible read, and not one breath of worship in it; there may be prayers as sound as the Pharisees uttered, and not one breath of worship in it; there may be a score of hymns sung, in beautiful language, and to a good tune, and not one breath of worship in it. God Almighty show you what it is we want. It is to "worship God in the spirit." It is the engaging of all the powers of the soul with Deity.

Observe a second feature in this character. "Rejoice in Christ Jesus." I allow that this is a high attainment, and I may be permitted to speak of some of its lower steps, that even those who cannot yet "rejoice in Christ Jesus" may have as full evidence of being Israelites as those who can. If thou canst place a confidence in him, if thou canst trust thy soul with him, if thou canst believingly and prayerfully commit all into his hands, if thou canst only come as Esther came to the heathen monarch, and say, "If I perish, I perish" there, I can tell thee there might be a doubt with regard to Ahasuerus, but there is none with regard to God. His sceptre is already held out; and as sure as thou dost approach him with such spiritual acts of devotion, thou art an Israelite, thou art of the family of Abraham; for "they that are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham." These "are the circumcision" really, the children of the living God really, the Israel of the Most High.

Then, again, they are the true circumcision who "have no confidence in the flesh." Now do mark the force of that expression. It is very significant. A great number of persons that pass for christians in these days seem to have a great deal of "confidence in the flesh." They have a great deal of confidence that they can command the flesh, and some of them that they can command even their thoughts. They are not Israelites. I will not say what they are, whether they are Turks, or Pagans, or what; but they are not the true circumcision. For my own part I confess I have no more confidence in the vows and resolutions and professions that I may make than I have in what the devil may make for me. I have no confidence in the power of the flesh, or its responsibility, and especially none in that favorite of these days, man's free agency. The free agency of the devil's slave in chains! the free agency of one that is "led captive by the devil at his will!" I cannot comprehend what free agency there is to be until the Lord, the Spirit, sets the spirit free; for "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." Those who "are the circumcision" "have no confidence in the flesh," renounce all confidence in good thoughts or bad ones, in good words or bad ones. The whole is relinquished, that Christ may be all in all. Then just try this, beloved, if you would know whether you are an Israelite: Are you cured of your hypocrisy, and brought to rest wholly on Christ? These only are the Israel of God.

But I cannot quit this without another remark upon the phrase, "rejoice in Christ Jesus." I am very anxious that all my hearers should come up to this point. I am very anxious that they should learn this valuable lesson, and receive this sacred attainment. It only requires a knowledge of salvation, an assurance, sealed by the Holy Ghost, that Christ Jesus has done all and suffered all for thee; and with this wrought in the heart thou canst not but rejoice in him, and will be obliged to say with the spouse in the Canticles, "This is my beloved and my friend," and know how to practice that injunction, "Rejoice in the Lord alway; and again I say, Rejoice." This is the privilege of the true Israel. May the Holy Ghost work it in your soul.

One thought more. "The children of Israel" were a nation incorporated as a theocracy. O! if I were to give scope to my feelings here, I should be led out at great length. Nothing suits me, in the government of the church, but a theocracy. I am thoroughly sick of all besides. I see nothing like christianity in democracy on the one hand, or in priestcraft on the other; from the lowest order of republicanism in the name of christian liberty, to the highest pretensions of the devil's imp at Rome. I must have a theocracy, or I am away from my Bible. The government must be of God. I am as firmly of opinion as I am that there is a God in heaven, that every real child of God is the choice of God, the redemption of God, the workmanship of God; and I am equally sure and positive that every appointed servant of Jesus Christ, every real minister, is of God's making, of God's sending, of God's qualifying, and God's using. A theocracy, therefore, is what I contend for. Moreover, I am equally determined upon this point, that every law that is binding upon the church must be found in the word of God; and therefore I will recognize neither a christian, nor a minister, nor a law, nor a statute, nor an ordinance, which I cannot trace up to "Thus saith the Lord." Jehovah himself is King in Zion. He "sitteth King forever," for the express purpose of exercising his own divine sovereignty over friends and foes, over good and bad, over visible and invisible, to order all things "after the counsel of his own will." Moreover, such is the uniform and invariable character of the church of the living God, the Israel of the Most High, that this theocracy is owned (or shall be) and bowed down to by every real Israelite, every child of God. I pray you mark this, that you will be counted a rebel against Jesus Christ, as sure as you are born, unless you can bow down to his absolute sovereignty.

I pass on to the third particular. We have seen what is the official business of the High Priest before the throne, and who are the persons that constitute his uniform charge; and now we have to look at the result. The first feature of it is the transactions of grace between God and his people. When Aaron went within the veil he went to unbosom to God all that I have stated as matters of "judgment," the cases, the interests, the rights, the wants, the cares, the sorrows, the perplexities, of all the Israel of God. He was to wait and know the mind of God, and then forth he came with answers, with pardons, with comforts, with mercies, with manifestations of acceptance of their offerings, and the sweet assurance of divine favor. The very business of our glorious Christ, the very purpose for which he visits our congregations. And art thou here, precious Christ, this morning for this purpose? What! is he sealing forgiveness upon that conscience? What! has he come forth from within the veil to "anoint those eyes with eye-salve?" What! has he come forth to rebuke and reprove that heart, and to give a lesson of wisdom and instruction to that seeking soul? What! Jesus here! my almighty Master present! What! is he come forth to give life to that dead sinner, and light to that blind child of Adam, and love to that poor, carnal heart, and liberty to that poor, captive soul, removing the bonds, taking away the fetters, and casting behind his back the sins of his people? Is he come forth to meet the case of distress that is not known to the preacher, the case of darkness, the case of sorrow, the case of oppression, the case of persecution, the case of care, the case of affliction, the case of bereavement? What! has he come to meet them all? Precious Jesus! I see him come forth from the invisibility of his own exalted glory, with his hands full of ascension gifts, and especial mercies, and all the fullness of grace. You know we do not deserve them. You know we could not buy them. They are all transactions of grace, that the great and glorious "High Priest of our profession" comes forth from within the veil to carry on and accomplish in the souls of his people. This is the first result, direct communications from the throne. If you can recognize, beloved, either in public or in private, either in his ordinances or at your own habitation, some light dawning in the soul, some promise applied, some comfort ministered, some consolation poured in, some relief from agonizing distress imparted by the ministry of the Holy Ghost, what is it but our glorious Aaron, in the transactions of his grace, before the throne, communicating to his people the blessings they severally need?

Do not lose sight of one point here, that when Aaron went within the veil upon these errands it was always before the mercy-seat, which was upon the ark of the covenant; for it was there, and there only, God promised to meet him. "There will I meet with you, and there will I commune with you, from above the mercy-seat, between the cherubim." There intercedes our precious Christ, before the covenant fullness, at the mercy-seat. I have heard of an ignoramus, a little while ago, speaking of apostolical succession, talking about leaving dissenters to "the uncovenanted mercies of God." I will give him leave to do that, if he can find them. All the mercies my soul has received, since I knew him, have been covenant mercies; and I view them as such, issuing forth from within the veil, before the mercy-seat.

But a second result is decision. You know there were many cases of old, such as the man gathering sticks on the sabbath day, and the young man that blasphemed God's name while striving with another, in which the parties were shut up till the mind of the Lord was known. I wish I did so, and you too. Every case that is at all difficult let us shut it up till we know the mind of the Lord. You see the poor wretches were not allowed to run about till then, but they were shut up at once; and then at his command they were stoned. Whatever difficulties you may have do the same. Shut them up; do not leave them at large. Do not have to pursue them again; and when his will is known act upon it. But in some cases it appeared a very difficult and uncertain and mysterious thing what the mind of the Lord was. God said it should be known through the high priest. He should have in his breast the Urim and Thummim; and whatever they were (and nobody can tell), it was the medium by which God infallibly communicated through Aaron what was his will. The words mean simply lights and perfections. Now all light and perfection are in the heart of Christ; and consequently they who are dealing with a precious Christ must have the mind of God unfolded by these. Hence it is said, "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." He has got the Urim and the Thummim; and as it is written, "Let thy Thummim and thy Urim be with thy Holy One." The Son of God is the "Holy One." All that is necessary for us to know of the mind of God upon earth is with Jesus Christ. "No man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him." It is his province to make known in his office the mind and will of God.

The next result of the High Priest's office appears to me to be of infinite value, the transfer of responsibility. I know poor, proud, vain mortals are very fond of harping upon the responsibility of man, and I never denied it in my life; but I should sink into despair directly if I did not know how to transfer it. Now when the people of Israel came into the outer court, and told their errands to Aaron, they left them with him, and trusted him, and they had nothing at all to do with the responsibility of what went on within the veil. They had nothing to do with the manner in which Aaron told it, nor the manner in which he came back. They had only to bring it to Aaron, and receive Aaron's reply. Just so with our precious Christ. All the responsibility within the veil is transferred to him. All that is essential to salvation was laid upon him in the covenant of life and peace; but I am now speaking of the responsibility, as far as you feel it. I say, Only just carry your case to Jesus, and then quietly wait. Let your conviction be, Now I have nothing to do but to wait for an answer. If he directs me to walk through fire or through water, I will go; but as to the responsibility I leave it wholly with him. O blessed transfer! I have been engaged in it thousands of times. I have gone to him with a burden of guilt that I could not carry, and have thrown it upon him. Now, Lord, it is for thee to plead my cause. Here is a burden of old Adam corruptions; Lord, conquer them for me, for I cannot. Here is the curse of a broken law; Lord Jesus, I commit it all to thee, that the blessing of Abraham may come on me through thee. Moreover, I have gone to him with temporal cares and anxieties. What have I to do with them in a right mind? I transfer all to him, and then sing,

"Good when he gives, supremely good,
Nor less when he denies;
E'en crosses from his sovereign hand
Are blessings in disguise."

O the importance of this transfer of responsibility! If your responsibility is not transferred to Christ, it will damn you. If your responsibility is not transferred to Christ for your justification, your sanctification, your preservation and your glorification, you will be ruined eternally under it. We do not deny man's responsibility; but we mean to insist that it is sure to ruin him. Nay, it has already ruined him; and nothing can save him but the transfer of that responsibility to a precious Christ. It was laid upon him of old by his eternal Father; but the sinner comes to the knowledge and appreciation of it only when he feels a deep concern about his everlasting salvation.

One thought more. Success insured is the result of committing all to the High Priest. You know, in all the five books of Moses, in all the history of the children of Israel, in the entire word of God, we never read of one case of failure. There were many mischiefs and many miseries when the children of Israel tried to manage their own cause; but never do you read of a failure when it was committed to Aaron. I believe (though it may seem a bold assertion) that the greater part of our sorrows, as Israelites passing through the wilderness, may be traced to the wicked perverseness of trying to manage things ourselves, instead of committing them to Aaron. Let Aaron manage them; put them all into his hands. He has got a censer large enough to take every desire, every want, every woe; leave them to him. If thou canst trust him, he cannot be deceived; if thou canst trust him, he cannot be unfaithful. I have sometimes thought there might have been a shadow of excuse for some of the Israelites suspecting Aaron and his sons, and thinking, Who knows whether they will be faithful? Who knows whether, when they get within the veil, they will tell it all out? Who knows whether they will bring a right answer? They are only men; who knows whether they will be faithful for us to God, and faithful for God to us? Such scruples might arise in regard to a human priesthood, and I would to God that in our day they did. God hasten it in his time. But with regard to our great High Priest, our glorious Melchisedec, our divine Aaron, there can be no such scruples. "Faithfulness is the girdle of his reins, and righteousness the girdle of his loins;" and therefore he can neither neglect the case of one, nor deal untruly with God or with us. Not a case did he ever fail to present; not a case did he ever misrepresent; not an answer did he ever withhold.

Well, then, ye doubting, trembling, fearing souls, who really cannot trust yourselves, and know not where to get comfort, believe me, it is best to leave it all with Aaron. It is best to cast it all upon the person and into the censer of our glorious High Priest within the veil. There he ever lives to make intercession, and to send down answers of peace. He tells us plainly, "If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it." O trust him, love him, exalt him, honor him. Be done with the creature, relinquish all false confidence, and let your glorious and exalted High Priest be your whole confidence.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"Now when John had heard in the prison the works of Christ, he sent two of his disciples, and said unto him, Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?"—Matthew xi. 2, 3.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—It is very seldom that a letter from me appears in our family paper, the SIGNS, but that I get letters from brethren who are strangers to me in the flesh, some of whom express surprise that I am so full of doubts as to whether or not I am one of those highly favored people of God whose sins and iniquities shall be remembered against them no more. Recently I received one such letter, which was, through the kindness of a brother, forwarded to me. Upon reading it the foregoing Scripture came with such force into my mind that I cannot rid my mind of it. I have heard brethren say that they did not believe that John doubted after he baptized the Savior; but if the language recorded by Matthew means anything, most certainly John did doubt. We have the same testimony recorded by Luke (vii. 19); and it is said, "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established." I shall not refer to further proof.

It was revealed to John, previous to his baptizing the Savior, that upon whom he should see the Spirit descending and remaining, the same was the Son of God.—John i. 33. "And I saw, and bear record that this is the Son of God."—Verse 34. Now if one who was quickened by the Spirit even before he was born a natural birth, as John was (Luke i. 41), and seeing the revelation he had received from high heaven fulfilled when he baptized the Lord, could be so filled with doubt as to send two of his disciples to inquire of Jesus, "Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?" then I conclude it is no marvel that I, a poor, sinful man, should be found to doubt and fear that I never knew Jesus as the Son of God, whom to know is life eternal. The question is asked me, Could it be possible that one could be chosen, called, quickened unto life, and not know it? I know I am a peculiar being, so much so that I am a mystery to myself. I often conclude that there is not one among all God's creation like me. If I could but know beyond all doubt that God has for his dear Son's sake passed by all my sins and iniquities, nevermore to be remembered against me forever, I feel that I would be the happiest mortal upon God's footstool. It may seem strange to many who may read this when I say that I do not know this; but I can say that I sometimes have a hope that my many sins and iniquities are for Jesus' sake forgiven me. Dear saints, if I could but know that I had in all my life uttered one acceptable prayer unto God, it would fill my poor soul with that joy which no mortal tongue can express. But I do not even know this, but sometimes hope so. When the thick and dark clouds of unbelief hang over me, and I feel to almost yield up all in utter despair, I am led back to a period in my life, when but a boy, to a particular spot of earth, where I fell upon my knees, nevermore expecting to arise, nor see again the light of yonder sun; and then I remember those precious words, "Thy sins are all, for Jesus' sake, forgiven thee," which appeared so audible to me that I quickly arose to my feet and looked around to see who had spoken to me. I feel to hope that it is even so; and though that hope sometimes gets to be very small indeed, yet, dear brethren, I would not exchange it for ten thousand worlds like this below the sun. This hope, though small it is, is the anchor of my soul, and by it I trust I have been enabled at times during my pilgrimage here below to see within the veil, whither the forerunner, even Jesus, hath for his people entered.

Not many years ago I received a letter from a dear old brother in Illinois, which letter was full of the most bitter denunciations of self, telling of his imperfections, how wicked and above all things deceitful his heart was, and how full of doubts and fears he was that he had never been born again. When I received that letter I was groping my way through thick darkness; but when I began reading it light suddenly sprang in, which caused all darkness, doubts and fears to flee away. O what a joy it was to me to receive such a letter from that dear old brother! In replying to him I told him how I had been edified upon reading his letter; that if he had told me how good he was, and that he felt to thank God he was not as other men, but was better than "this poor publican," then I should have had no confidence in him.

I will try to give you the reason of the hope that is within me. John says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." When I meet with those who can tell me of my doubts and fears, tell of the dark seasons, which are many indeed, with now and then seasons of rejoicing, and tell me of the many sore trials and temptations through which I daily pass, then I conclude that they are led by the same Spirit and in the same path with me. I feel to say, Thou art my brother or sister indeed. If I know my poor heart, I know I do love my brethren; and often do I pray that I could walk like them, when I see them walking, with the image of the Master stamped upon them. But O how far short I come of it! Many times I am led to wonder how it is that my brethren can have any fellowship for me. I have often told them that if they could only get a glimpse of this poor, sinful heart of mine, they would be ashamed to call me brother. If I ask myself, What profit am I to these people, among whom I have had a name nearly thirty years? I have to answer, I can see none.

Dear brethren, since writing the foregoing I have been prostrated with a severe attack of rheumatism, such as I had about a year ago. I am slowly recovering, but cannot remain in any one position any great length of time. I shall write no more than to say that any one who can or does claim to be born of the Spirit, born of God, regenerated, or born again, and never has any doubts afterward of being born again, I have to doubt for him. My experience, if I have any, is so different from such an one that I must conclude that one or the other of us is surely deceived.

Brethren Beebe, I submit what I have penned to your better judgment. Publish it, if you think it will be a benefit to any one; otherwise cast it aside, and all will be well with this poor, doubting creature, as I know I am. Farewell.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS IN CHRIST:—This is Sunday morning, and it is about time for our meeting to commence; but as it is very stormy, I think it most prudent for me to remain at home to-day, living a mile from the meeting-house. I have not been well for some time, but at this time am better, both in body and mind. I would like to have gone to meet the dear saints to-day, but trust the disappointment is for my good. I have felt impressed to write for our dear family paper for some time, especially when reading the letters from my Father's children, and my soul would be made to rejoice. I would feel as if I were talking to them, and must write to them privately or through the SIGNS; but it seems the time did not come. Now I feel that I am forced to relieve my mind, as it seems full to overflowing; and from the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Dear brethren, if I should ramble in this, please bear with me. Not long since I was in a very dark state of mind, and felt to say with the poet,

"O! when shall my sorrows subside?
O! when shall my suffering cease?"

But it seemed the Lord was pleased to lift the cloud and fill my soul with joy and peace. Last week I attended the yearly meeting at Welsh Tract. It was surely a feast to my soul. There were several ministering brethren present, but I cannot say there was any "best one" among them; but all seemed inspired to speak of the love of God to his children, what he had done for them, and what he is doing now. It seemed to be one chain linked together. Elder Beebe, with his usual animation, in his discourse made my soul rejoice. I felt I could not tell whether I was in the body or out of it. It seemed that all those around me must feel as I did. I wondered, "From whence doth this union arise?" I went to Elder Staton's that night, and in the morning the words were still in my mind. I asked to have the "union hymn" sung, and it had never seemed so sweet to me as it did then. That love we heard much of during the meeting.

"It fastens our souls in such ties
As distance and time can't remove."
I thought,

"O why then so loath for to part,
Since there we shall all meet again?
Engraved on Immanuel's heart,
At distance we cannot remain."

What blessed promises are for us if we are his. This last week has been a happy one to me. I have seemed to have but little trouble, and my work around the house seemed easy. I felt no ill will toward any one I could think of. The "union hymn" seemed to be in my mind, and I would find myself singing as I was going around my work, thinking of that love that binds us together.

"Love is the brightest of the train,
And strengthens all the rest."

Dear brethren and sisters, do not think those bright seasons will always last. O no! When my heavenly Father sees fit to withdraw the light of his countenance from me, may I feel that it is all for my good and his glory. We are told in his word that through much tribulation we must follow our Lord. If we follow him, we must come through affliction. If there were no afflictions, we would not feel the need of the Physician. As a church we seem to be in health. I trust all are esteeming others better than themselves. We have Elder Durand as our pastor. We feel that he preaches the gospel in its purity, and shuns not to declare the whole counsel of God. We have great reason to be thankful for all favors granted us, while so many are deprived of such blessed privileges. We miss many who have been called home in the last year. We trust they have gone where there is no more parting, never to go out any more. I have sister Bertha Wells in my mind, and I want to speak of her. She is from Canada spending some time at Elder Durand's. She is some distance from her home, but we hope she feels at home with us. No doubt many or all the readers of the SIGNS have read the letters published, written by her mother. How beautifully she sends words of comfort to her through this medium. How consoling it must have been to receive such messages of love from mother. It seems we can never go so far from home that we cease to be a child of our parents. That is natural. So in grace, once a child of grace, we must always be. Though we may wander far from home, as it were, yet with loving cords we are gently drawn along till we come to our Father's house, there to be with him in a world without end.

Dear brethren and sisters, I often wonder if there is any one like me. My understanding is very limited in divine things. I know nothing only as it is revealed to me. But we are told in the word that none by searching can find out God. It must come by revelation. This seems to cheer one by the way. I find myself prone to wander in by and forbidden paths, which often makes me weep and cry for mercy. Then I feel to "Ask the Lord that I might grow

In faith and love and every grace;
Might more of his salvation know,
And seek more earnestly his face."

I have written this in a rambling way, just as it has been given to me, and I give it unto you. I feel it is a subject that never grows old, and the half can never be told, so I will leave it, with love to all the dear saints.

In hope of a blessed immortality beyond, I close.

PALESTINE, Texas, Oct. 13, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—After the business part of my letter, I want to tell you something of the condition I am in, and have been in for a long time. I will try to be brief. I am in such darkness, coldness and deadness that I am not enjoying anything, as I have heretofore. I often hear brethren complaining, to some degree, in this way; and I also know from the Bible that it has ever been thus with God's people. I have often tried to work myself out of it, and have often concluded that none but God can "Drive these dark clouds from my sky,

And make all within me rejoice."
None but God can warm this frozen heart. None but Jesus can do helpless sinners good.

Brethren, I feel that there is no use in my trying to describe my condition. Is there any one like me? If I go forward to look for him whom I hope I love, I find him not. He is not seen on my right hand, nor on my left. It almost seems that he is clean gone forever. So in all my searchings I can find nothing but that little hope, and it seems very small. I would like to have the enjoyment I have had; and I will yet have it, if it is the purpose of God.

Farewell to you all for this time. Pray for unworthy me.

GOD THE DELIVERER OF ISRAEL.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Please give your views of Psalm lxxxiii. 11, 12, and oblige many others as well as your little brother in Christ, as I hope,

JOHN J. NORMAN.

LOWNDES CO., Ala., July 31, 1889.

REPLY.

"MAKE their nobles like Oreb, and like Zeeb: yea, all their princes as Zebah, and as Zalmunna: who said, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession."—Psa. lxxxiii. 11, 12.

Under the night of the legal dispensation the doctrine of the gospel of God our Savior was not proclaimed by the direct testimony of his servants, as it is now declared by the inspired apostles of Jesus. It was then revealed in types and shadows to the chosen subjects of salvation; and the faith of the Son of God which was given them was constantly directed by those symbols to the great antitype of all such expressions, which was not manifested until Jesus was crucified and raised from the dead. It is indeed true that all the inspired record of the law and the prophets is the testimony of Jesus; but that witness was purposely hidden in the literal and ceremonial events which are therein written. Not only in the divinely commanded ritual of the law of Moses was this glorious mystery shadowed forth, but in every circumstance of the history of the chosen nation of Israel the Spirit shows the same great truth. When our Lord referred his opposers to the Scriptures in which they thought they had eternal life, he did not say that therein were some expressions in reference to him; he included all of them when he declared, "They are they which testify of me." When John would have worshiped him who revealed the truth to him, the angel said unto him, "See thou do it not; I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus. Worship God; for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy."—See John v. 39; Rev. xix. 10.

In this inspired Psalm the same gospel truth is proclaimed which shines in all the sacred Scriptures; and whatever else we may see in any expression of the record which God has given, it is not the essential meaning of that passage unless Jesus is seen in it. The Holy Ghost moved holy men of old to speak no other words but such as did testify of him. Although they cannot by reason discover that hidden wisdom, those who are taught of God will not dispute this word of the Lord.

In the darkness of their own comprehension they find the true occasion of the obscurity which conceals from their understanding the light of that divine truth in which Jesus appears in his glory. While the natural mind may be filled with admiration of the lovely character of the man Christ Jesus, without the revelation of the Spirit no sinner ever did or can behold his glory as the Savior of his people from their sins. It is only "When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory. He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer."—Psa. cii. 17, 18.

The sorrowful complaint poured forth in the preceding verses of this Psalm fitly expresses the grief of the afflicted and poor people who constitute the church, which is the body of Christ. Those enemies there named are appropriate shadows of the sinful adversaries whose tyranny extorts from the saints perpetual groanings. As the nation of Israel could hope for deliverance from no other source but the arm of the Lord, so his spiritual people have no other refuge but in his omnipotent grace. The figurative dispensation of Judaism would have failed to portray the experience of the saints of God if it had not been included in the commandment of the Lord concerning Jacob, "that his enemies should be round about him."—Lam. i. 17. By the oppression of those enemies the chosen national people were driven continually to cry unto the Lord. So by reason of their sufferings under the burden of their own sins, the spiritual Israel, including every subject of divine instruction, are constantly moved to "pray without ceasing," that they may be delivered out of their conflicts and distresses. Not even the chosen apostles of our Lord were able of themselves to gain the mastery over the combined powers of iniquity by which they were oppressed. Paul could not conquer in his own strength when he cried, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" By faith the answer is given to this earnest cry for help, "I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Rom. vii. 24, 25. This is all the refuge of the afflicted followers of Jesus to the end of time. All their varied experience is needful to teach them that "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble."—Psa. xli. 1.

"Make their nobles like Oreb, and like Zeeb; yea, all their princes as Zebah, and as Zalmunna." The carnal mind can see in this prayer nothing but the expression of natural resentment in imprecating vengeance upon the cruel foes of whom the psalmist was complaining. This seems clearly to be contrary to the direction of the Spirit of Christ, who commands his disciples, saying, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust."—Matt. v. 44, 45. To those who read the Scriptures only in the light of nature many such contradictions appear throughout the inspired directions. When the Spirit of truth takes such apparently contradictory portions of the word and shows to the saints their true meaning, the beauty of holiness and truth is seen in their strict harmony as the one testimony of God. The revelation which is written in the Scriptures cannot be received by the natural mind even of the saints; for then the wise and prudent would have great advantage over babes. Through the faith of the Son of God all are shown the mystery of this hidden wisdom. However it may please their fancy, the saints are not safe in receiving anything as truth but that which they have been themselves taught in their own experience. In this they will find the whole record of inspiration in perfect accord. As enemies of Israel the characters named in this portion of our text, with all the oppressors of that chosen nation, were devoted to destruction. This was the decree of that God whose holiness forbids that his commandments should be measured by the finite standard of created intelligence. What he does is just and righteous altogether, simply because he does it, and there is no law to which he has subjected himself other than his own sovereign will. Aside from the good pleasure of his will there is no just reason why he should spare and save from sin one of the race of Adam, as there is no obligation resting upon him to save the devils whose dwelling is in the pit of despair. If this could be understood by the unbelieving world men would not be found blaspheming his holy name as devils dare not do, by charging that there is unrighteousness with God. He is essentially and in himself immaculately righteous in the condemnation of sinners, as he is "just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus."—Rom. iii. 26.

By reference to Judges vii. 25 and viii. 21, the reader will find how the Midianitish princes named in our text were slain by "The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon." As love to Israel was inseparable from hatred of their usurping oppressors, so the love of righteousness is necessarily the hatred of sin. When sin is felt as a burdensome bondage there is certainly that longing desire for deliverance from its power which Jesus describes as "hunger and thirst after righteousness." It is the Spirit of Christ in the saints which originates the prayer for the utter destruction of every emotion of the heart that forbids conformity to the holiness of the Redeemer, whose perfect righteousness is the only fulfillment of that desire.

"Who said, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession." The Midianites proposed to do this in the seizure of that land which God had given to Israel for a possession. In the antitype, the law of sin claims possession of the saints, and would hold them subject to its hated oppression. As those heathen powers literally said of the houses which God had given to Israel, Let us take them in possession, so these sinful lusts which war in the members of the saints ever seek to take them in possession, and to turn them from being manifestly the houses of God to be the polluted abode of every hateful sin. Those who have long been endeavoring to follow in the pathway of Jesus, have not failed to find that their greatest conflict is not with their fellow-mortals, but each of them has learned that his most bitter and relentless foes are "they of his own household." They do not have to go so far as to those who dwell in the same literal house with them to find these foes; they go with them into the solitude of their most secret thoughts, and even when no mortal is near them they suffer the oppression of these cruel foes which remain in this earthly house of their tabernacle. These foes are too strong for the weak and helpless saint; he can do nothing for his own defense against them. His very suffering cries to God for relief, as did the wretchedness and distress of Israel in Egypt when the Lord heard their grief and came down to deliver them. From these many afflictions, which are peculiar to the righteous, they can be delivered by none but the hand of their God.

It may seem inconsistent with the directions and example of Jesus that his followers should pray for the destruction of their enemies, as the supplication in this connection does implore. This will be explained by observing the difference between that longing for deliverance from the power of sin, which is here typified, and the carnal disposition to imprecate divine vengeance upon our fellow-mortals from whom we suffer persecution. When the disciples James and John proposed to call down fire from heaven to consume those Samaritans who would not receive Jesus, they were doubtlessly under the delusion that they were moved by devotion to their Lord, but he rebuked them, and said, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of; for the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them."—Luke ix. 51-56. It is worthy of special notice in this case that these mistaken disciples were sustained in the proposal they suggested by the misapplication of Scripture. The temptations of Satan are never more deceptive than when presented with the indorsement of perverted expressions of Scripture. Since the immediate followers of Jesus were liable to such deception, it is certainly very important that the saints now should be distrustful of their own ideas and motives. The whole testimony of the Spirit agrees in proclaiming all truth; any theory which has not this perfect seal of the Spirit is unworthy of the confidence of the saints. While the Spirit of Christ is manifested in love and mercy to those who are seeking our hurt, that Spirit is equally devoted in the destruction of the principle of sin which opposes and exalts itself above all that is called God. Under the guidance of this Holy Spirit the saints will never seek to injure their most bitter personal enemies. By the same holy principle they will always desire the utter destruction of the power of sin and false doctrines in themselves and wherever it is manifested in opposition against the truth of God. The grace of God alone has power to discriminate between the deceptive promptings of the natural mind and the direction of the Spirit of Christ. They are exposed by their after effects. The selfish pride of the saints is always gratified by the course which is dictated by the carnal mind; and the direction of the Spirit always has the effect of humbling self and glorifying God. When the Lord has given the victory to his weak and helpless child, there is nothing in which that child can boast. Since he must acknowledge God as his deliverer, to his grace alone he must ascribe all glory.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES FOR 1890.

ABOUT a year ago we announced our decision to publish the SIGNS OF THE TIMES an eight-page weekly at the same price we were publishing the twelve-page semi-monthly, and made the unprecedented offer to allow one-half the subscription price as a commission to all our paid-up old subscribers for every new subscriber they would procure us, and the result was that we received an addition of more than two thousand names to our list. Many, however, of these new subscribers paid but one dollar to the old subscriber, who sacrificed his commission to procure the new subscriber, having in view simply the increasing of the circulation of the paper. The question now is, How many of those paying only one dollar last year will renew for 1890 at the regular rate of two dollars? If we shall be able to retain a good proportion of those, and can still increase our circulation two thousand more, we will then be able to furnish the paper weekly at one dollar and fifty cents a year; and should it be increased four thousand, we would be able to publish it weekly at one dollar a year.

Many doubtless do not understand why we can publish at one dollar a year with the increased circulation, and for the benefit of such we will explain. It takes just as much typesetting, imposing forms and making ready for press to print one paper as it does any number of thousands of copies. In fact, after the paper is once "to press," the additional expense is but a trifle more than the cost of the blank paper. For instance, say it cost five thousand dollars a year to run a weekly of five thousand copies; it would probably not exceed seven thousand dollars to print ten thousand copies. The inquiry may arise with some, How is it that the local publications of but a thousand or fifteen hundred circulation can be published for two dollars a year? The reason is that those papers rely almost entirely on their advertising patronage for support. If the SIGNS should take two or three pages of advertisements it could be published at one dollar a year.

Another thing our readers are not aware of is that although the subscription price is two dollars a year, our gross receipts do not average one dollar and fifty cents for each subscriber, our loss from delinquent and gratuitous subscribers being more than twenty-five per cent. While most of our subscribers know and appreciate the above facts, there are many who do not, and consequently consider the price of the SIGNS too high.

Although the increased expenses of publishing the SIGNS weekly this year are several hundred dollars more than the increase in the receipts, we have decided to continue it weekly another year, and make the following

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!

From now until the first of next January, any one who is now a subscriber, and whose subscription is paid up, may send us new subscribers at one dollar a year; but no one, either new or old subscriber, can get the paper from this office for themselves at less than the regular rates. Any one who is not now a subscriber can have the benefit of the above terms by sending two dollars for their own subscription, and one dollar each for additional new subscribers.

Address,

G. BEEBE'S SONS.

Middletown, Orange Co., N. Y.

WHO WISHES TO ASSIST?

FOR many years the SIGNS OF THE TIMES was published on terms that no other paper within our knowledge has ever been able to offer, viz., two dollars a year for those who were able to pay that amount, one dollar a year for those who were not able to pay any more, and free to those who really desired the paper, but were not able to pay anything; and we do not remember ever refusing the paper to any one who asked for it free until we started the weekly, and then we just simply could not do it. We have carried on an average in the neighborhood of a thousand gratuitous subscribers for years, until those who were paying full price began to complain that the subscription price of the SIGNS was too high, and to discontinue the paper on that account. We therefore were obliged to increase the amount we gave them for their money, and to do this we had to drop hundreds of names from our free list, which was one of the most unpleasant things we have ever been obliged to do.

While most of our brethren are poor, and feel hardly able to pay their own subscription, yet we believe there are some who, if they knew of the case, would rather assist in carrying this list than have them deprived of the paper. We have therefore concluded to submit this proposition to them. We will keep a list of names of those who appeal to us for the paper free, and if any of our brethren feel disposed to assist us in bearing the expense, we will for every dollar received enter one of these names on our list for one year, and send the person remitting the money the name and address of the person to whose subscription their money has been applied.

INQUIRIES AFTER TRUTH.

WILL brother Chick please tell us through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES what is the difference between the sacrifice and the atonement made by Christ?

R. P. HELM.

WILL Elder Wm. J. Purington please give his views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on 1 John v. 8, and oblige one who is searching for truth?

OBITUARY NOTICES.

I AM requested to forward a notice of the death of Mrs. Margarette E. Reed, who died at her home in this county, Feb. 16th, 1889. She was not a member of the visible church, but gave evidence before her death of a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. Through a long and painful illness she manifested that patience and resignation to the heavenly will experienced alone by the children of the living God. The deceased leaves her husband and two children to mourn their loss in her death. May it be sanctified to their good.

WM. M. SMOOT.

OCCOQUAN, Va.

Rachel Harrington, daughter of Philip and Sarah Evans, was born May 8th, 1815, and died Sept. 4th, 1889, aged 74 years, 3 months and 27 days.

She was married to Charles G. Harrington, Dec. 9th, 1849. She was a member of the Harmony Baptist Church about forty-eight years. She was a sufferer with consumption about twenty-seven years, and was confined to her bed from the 5th of May until she died. She was very patient during her sickness, and was willing to go, often saying, "Welcome, death!" and, "O the pure and living water!"

A funeral sermon was preached at the Harmony meeting-house, on the fourth Sunday in October, by brother George Cottrell. She leaves a kind husband, one daughter and many friends to mourn her departure.

PLEASE publish the death of my daughter, Mrs. Ellen A. Stone, which occurred Sept 1st, 1889.

Her disease was consumption. She was born March 5th, 1852. June 5th, 1869, she was united in marriage with Mr. Henry Hamilton. Of this union one son was born, James H. Hamilton, who survives both his parents, his father having died when he was an infant. October 18th, 1888, she was married to Wm. T. Stone. She never made any public profession, but left strong evidence that the Lord had blessed her with his salvation. She seemed perfectly resigned to the will of her Master. She gave orders for her burial as cheerfully as though she were going on a pleasant journey, and requested that Elder Ludwick preach her funeral at our house; but we could not get him in time. She dreamed of conversing with him, and asking him to sing the hymn, "Amazing grace! how sweet the sound!" Elder Ludwick preached a funeral sermon from 1 Cor. xv. 35, and Elder Harris followed with some comforting remarks, at the Bethel Old School Baptist Church.

MARY LYNCH.

My dear old father-in-law, John Morse, departed this life July 12th, 1889. He was born May 11th, 1817, in South Carolina, and was married to Miss Lucy Foshe, in Alabama, in October, 1836. He moved from Alabama to Louisiana in 1839, and to Jasper Co., Texas, in 1843, joining the church the same year. He died from some unknown trouble of the stomach and lungs. His suffering was great at times. When we called a doctor, or asked him to take medicine, he would say, "I can take it, but it will do me no good. I have no faith in medicine. It is all the work of the Lord; and if it is his will, I will get well. If not, his will be done." He was a kind and loving father and husband, and we shall greatly miss him; but we sorrow not as those who have no hope. We think that our loss is his gain. On Christ, the solid Rock, he stood, and counted all other ground as sinking sand.

"His hope was based on nothing less Than Jesus' blood and righteousness."

NANNIE M. MORSE.

DIED—At his residence in Port Jervis, Orange Co., N. Y., on the morning of Nov. 4th, 1889, of congestion of the brain, Mr. James Riley Mapes, in the 42d year of his age.

Several years ago a cousin of Mr. Mapes, Ralph Ketcham, took up his residence in the family, for the purpose of attending school, and about the 15th of last month was stricken down with a severe attack of typhoid fever, and died in the afternoon of the same day that Mr. Mapes died. Almost the entire care of the young man devolved upon Mr. and Mrs. Mapes, and they were both taken down from care and anxiety. Owing to the fact that Mr. Mapes endeavored also for a time to attend to his duties as operator in the Erie dispatcher's office, his brain became seriously affected.

On the 28th day of December, 1870, Mr. Mapes was united in marriage with Miss Minta, daughter of Deacon Samuel B. Beyea, of the New Vernon Church, by whom he is survived, together with his mother and one brother, who have the sympathy of all who know them in their sad bereavement.

Mr. Mapes was blessed with a peculiarly pleasant disposition, which won for him many warm friends, and who sincerely mourn his departure in the full strength of manhood. Although not a member of the church, he attended the meetings of the church at New Vernon when opportunity offered, and appeared to be of that number of whom Jesus speaks, saying, "Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me."

After a short service at the house in Port Jervis, where his companion was confined to her bed, on Wednesday, Nov. 6th, the remains were taken to New Vernon and interred, after the funeral services there, which were conducted by Elder Benton Jenkins.

"The evils that beset our path,
Who can prevent or cure?
We stand upon the brink of death
When most we seem secure."

My grandfather, Wm. H. Horn, was born in Edgecombe Co., N. C., Oct. 19th, 1801, and died in De Soto Parish, La., June 29th, 1889, being nearly 88 years of age.

He moved to Georgia about the year 1840, thence to Alabama, and from there to De Soto Parish, La., where he finished his days. He was married in North Carolina. To them were born five boys and seven girls. Six of the children yet live, and were present when his remains were laid in the silent grave; also a large portion of his grandchildren and great-grandchildren were present. His grandchildren and great-grandchildren number about sixty, and all but one family live in the community and surrounding communities. Grandmother Horn started to a neighbor's on the 19th of August, 1878, and died very suddenly by the roadside on her way, about one fourth of a mile from home. She was afflicted with smothering at the heart, from which she died so suddenly. Grandfather died from advanced age. He was very stout until about four years before his death, and was able to work some on his farm this spring, but his vital forces gave way about the first of May. He often said that he was not sick, but giving way through weakness, and would soon be gone.

He attached himself to the church of the Regular Primitive Baptist faith and order, holding the doctrine of election and predestination, on Saturday before the third Sunday in September, and was baptized by Elder H. H. Lumpkin. He lived a faithful member until the summons came to call him from this world, we hope, to a fairer world on high. Being asked a few hours before his departure if he was willing to die, he replied that if it was God's time he was ready, but added, "I hate to leave you, seeing you all love me so well." He said he had for a long time prayed that when he died he could die easy. A few hours before he died he seemed to suffer a great deal; then it seemed that all pain left him, and the last words that he uttered were, "All Israel shall be saved."

The writer tried to speak some words of comfort to a large audience, from the last words he was heard to utter, "All Israel shall be saved." They are not all Israel that are of Israel; but all in the covenant of redemption belong to that spiritual kingdom, and Jesus shed his blood for such. Let us be still, and wait the Father's will.

W. C. FOSHEE.

LOGANSPOUT, La., Aug. 4, 1889.

My dear father, Wilson Long, departed this life Sept. 15th, 1889, aged 66 years, 4 months and 22 days.

He was born in Ohio, April 24th, 1823, and moved to Indiana with his parents when seven years old. He joined the Old School Baptist Church of Crawfordsville, Ind., when but nineteen years old, and lived a faithful member until his death. In the year 1843 he married Sarah A. Newhouse, who survives him. Four children were born to them (three sons and one daughter), three of whom are left to mourn their sad bereavement. His last years on earth were attended with great suffering, yet he bore it all bravely and without complaint. About five weeks before his death he had a light stroke of paralysis, which prostrated him for awhile; but he partially recovered from that, and his friends were hopeful of his recovery until he was stricken the second time, from which he never rallied, but gradually grew worse. A few hours before his death he suffered intensely, until the last few moments, and seemingly passed away sweetly and painlessly to his heavenly home. During his illness he spoke to mother several times about dying, saying that he was ready, and knew that he would be happy, and said, "Ma, don't grieve for me." Just before he died his tongue seemed paralyzed. He tried hard to talk, but we could understand very little. The family tie is broken. With grief and tears we have to give our poor old father up. We know that he is happy and free from suffering. He was a kind and loving father, a good and affectionate husband, a kind neighbor, and loved his church and its people dearly, always attending when it was possible. The places which once knew him shall know him no more forever.

"Dear father, must we give thee up,
You whom we loved so well?
How can we drain this bitter cup,
And say a long farewell?"

Father's funeral will be preached by Elder Novels at the Old School Baptist Church in Crawfordsville, Indiana, on December first.

DUDA H. ENOCH.

DEPARTED this life August 10th, 1889, sister Harriet Burton, at the age of 64 years. She was a worthy and a beloved member of the Old School Baptist Church of Schoharie, N. Y., for more than thirty years, having been baptized in the fellowship of this church Feb. 20th, 1859, by Elder L. P. Cole. Though entirely deprived of the sense of hearing for very many years, yet

"Her place among her brethren she was always sure to fill, Low at the feet of Jesus, to do her Master's will."

Jerusalem was preferred to her chief joy. So attentive had she been to the preaching that she could understand by the gestures and movement of the lips of the speaker almost the entire discourse. She seemed to understand by spiritual intuition or divine teaching the glorious truths of the doctrine of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, as revealed by his Spirit; for he says, "My Spirit is life." Again, "I am come into the world that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly." Sister Burton's gift was remarkable; and though unable to hear or converse with the brethren, her remarks were at all times consistent and in harmony with the teachings of the gospel, and ever and always edifying and encouraging to brethren and sisters, thus affording indisputable evidence that she had been taught of the Lord. The exercises of her mind, when related by her, found a ready response in the hearts of all believing brethren, and she was highly esteemed for the truth's sake. It was the custom of the sisters living near her, when depressed in spirit, to resort to her home, and listen to the wonderful revelations of her mind as bestowed by our great spiritual Leader and Teacher. She was possessed of much humility; and though her gifts were rare, yet she often expressed great unworthiness, and of sinners herself the chief. Much of her time was devoted to reading the Bible. She bore her sickness with christian fortitude, and in the hour of death was sustained by a living faith in that blessed Redeemer who had so many years before called her to follow in his footsteps, and who had now come to call her home to himself, to see him as he is and be like him.

In her removal by death one of the principal lights of the church has set; a vacancy is made in our visible organization which seems to cast a pall of mournful sadness over our hearts. Yet as we looked upon her inanimate form, as she lay so sweetly and peacefully in the embrace of death, we felt in our inmost soul an abiding assurance that her Master had called, that she had put off this mortal and put on immortality, and that for her to die was gain. In her lifetime she was a faithful wife, a kind and indulgent mother, an esteemed and worthy neighbor. Her husband, who is a believer of the same faith, three daughters and one son survive her.

A comforting and appropriate discourse was preached by Elder John Clark, of the Lexington Association, after which her mortal remains were laid to rest in the cemetery at Schoharie, awaiting the resurrection morning. We desire to be in humble submission to the providences of God, believing that he doeth all things well.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. ### PSALM CXLIII. 6.

"I stretch forth my hands unto thee."

I stretch forth my hands unto God,
With hope in his covenant love;
His counsels all ages have stood,
Nor will he his purpose remove.

I stretch forth my hands unto God,
For I have no strength of my own;
Though chastened at times by his rod,
I trust to his mercy alone.

I stretch forth my hands unto God,
He helps me on Christ to rely;
While treading this dark, thorny road,
My affections would mount up on high.

I stretch forth my hands unto God,
And thirst for a drop of his love,
When weary and faint with my load,
Not knowing at times how to move.

I stretch forth my hands unto God
When trouble and sorrows attend;
He help in such times doth afford.
O what an unchangeable Friend!

I stretch forth my hands unto God
When comforts from him I receive.
My sorrows I spread all abroad;
Through grace I can all things believe.

CORRESPONDENCE.

COTTONWOOD, Texas, June 6, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS IN CHRIST:—I will try, the Lord being my helper, to tell you why I, a poor worm of the dust, can ever say brother or sister. I hope it is because God has called me by his grace, which was given me in Christ Jesus before the world began, according to his own purpose.

When I was but seven or eight years old I was taken to a Methodist meeting. It was on a funeral occasion. I listened to what was said with all the attention that any one could, though I was but a child. The preacher, who had been blind from his childhood, was portraying the happy christian life that the deceased sister had lived here on earth, and was then enjoying in heaven with God and all the blessed. I was somewhat interested, and wished I could be a christian. And as he said we could be, if we would, he gave me some hope. Bear in mind that this was only a hope based on good works that I was going to perform, such as repeating the Lord's prayer, going to Sunday School, learning the catechism well, and many other inventions of men, but which are of no use to the child of God. All these works I thought I could do, and that then the Lord would bless me while I lived, and would give me a home in heaven when I died. So I went about the work, and in a short time was so self-righteous that I did not want to live any longer, but wanted to die and be with God. I well remember that one day I prayed almost continually, with my childish form of prayer, that God would take me from off the earth, so that I could be with him above. In the evening of that day I began to think it might be that the Lord was going to do it. So I went to the house and got the looking-glass, to see if I could behold any change in myself. But I saw none, except red and inflamed eyes, caused by weeping and rubbing. I thought God would not hear my prayers unless I appeared very sorrowful and wept a great deal. You may know that I was working in faith; but it was only a natural faith, which had been given me by the blind preacher; for the Bible says that faith is the gift of God. "For by grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God."

I went on in this way until I was nineteen or twenty years of age, when the thought got to troubling me. It may be that you have no religion, or your religion will not save you in the judgment. Then I would take to reading the Scriptures, to see if I did have religion. In other words, I was searching the Scriptures, for in them I thought I had eternal life. As Jesus said to the Jews, "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they that testify of me."

About this time I began to talk of the Scriptures to others; and as I had been taught that I could fall from grace, or could get religion and then throw it away, I began to think that I had fallen from grace. Then the words recorded in Hebrews vi. 4-6 would trouble me so much that it seemed I must be lost; for every time that I picked up a little hope these words would rush into my mind, "If you were once enlightened, and have tasted of the goodness of God, and the powers of the world to come," and would almost drive me to despair. Then my conscience would accuse me, and tell me that if I had received the benefits of this Scripture I had sinned, and that willfully; for I had been claiming that I had been living a christian life ever since the preacher told me how I could become a christian. Now twelve years had nearly elapsed since I had accepted Christ as my

Savior, and I had never seen that I was a condemned sinner in the sight of a just and holy God. Yet I could see that I had done many wrongs, contrary to the national law of Israel; and to atone for those wrongs I would do many good works to the Lord, and ask him to forgive me, and so would patch up the work. This is the way I spent the ten or twelve years of my supposed christian life. But the last two years were not so sweet and happy as the others had been; for I began to see there was nothing good I could do, but evil was mixed with it. I would read the Scriptures, but in trouble. But I did not want to read the sixth chapter of Hebrews, neither did I want to think of it; but this was out of my power; for the first thing I knew this Scripture would bolt into my mind. My Methodist brethren would say to me that I had only backslidden, and the Lord was whipping me for it; that I must attend their meetings more regularly, the prayer and the class meetings, and take up my duty of praying in public, and have family prayer at home. All these things I tried to perform; but instead of getting better, I grew worse. One night in the month of February, 1868, I vowed that I would take up the cross of holding family prayer in my house. This had become a great cross to me. I picked up the New Testament, which I had been reading the greater part of my life, during all my spare time. I turned to the tenth chapter of Hebrews to read, as there was a portion in this that had given me great trouble, which reads, "For if we sin willfully, after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins." I thought I would read this Scripture, and then pray. But when I got to the latter clause of the eighteenth verse I was about choked, because I could not bear testimony with the witness of the Holy Ghost that the Lord had put his laws in my heart and written them in my mind. Then I knew I had been a sinner from my earliest recollection, and was now compelled to confess that I had no religion. No one can bear witness to what I felt that night but those who have realized the true sense of the Scripture which reads, "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." I do believe that on that doleful night I realized a little of what it is to fall into the hands of the living God; for I saw myself justly condemned before the sin-avenging God. I never expected to see the rising of the sun again. I walked the floor, wrung my hands, all the time begging for mercy. But it seemed to me that I had sinned away the day of grace, and there was no mercy for me. But I was delivered out of this state of mind, and something seemed to say to me, "You have denied the Savior, and now he is denying you. Go to work and pray. You must hold family prayer, and read that chapter, as you said you would." So I went down upon my knees. But while I was trying to pray my sins seemed to rise above my head like great mountains. The carnal mind is enmity against God, not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be; for while I was shown on that night my helpless condition in the sight of God, yet this carnal mind was enmity against him, not subject to his law. Even while the poor sinner was in the hands of the living God, the carnal mind was trying to carry out its own way, saying, "You must read that chapter, and pray." I took the book and again tried to read, but could not. I also tried to pray, but could not. After weeping and walking the floor for some time I prepared to go to my bed. My wife was sick at the time, and I went to her bed and told her of my condition. She tried to comfort me, but there was none for me; for it seemed to me that my doom was fixed, and that I would soon be cast into the dark and bottomless pit, where I should be tormented forever. I went on in this awful state for several days, until my wife became somewhat alarmed about me, as I could eat nothing. She said I would starve if I did not eat something. I told her that for her sake I would try; but I could not. I got up and went to the door, and all at once the darkness and gloom vanished away, my burden was gone, and everything appeared bright. I was given faith in Jesus, and realized that there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved. Then I could receive him as my Savior, my all in all.

Now I want to state that while I was living a Pharisaical life I was received into the Missionary Church, in the summer of 1860, and lived with them until the fall of 1863, when I quit them and joined the Methodists. I lived with them in perfect peace until, as I have already stated, trouble came. Then I began to quit walking with them, as we could not agree. I would tell them of their mockery, and they would beg me to come to their church meetings. I would tell them that I had no use for their church meetings, and asked them to take my name off their church book. They said they could not do that, for they looked upon me as a christian.

After I was delivered from the power of Satan, and was translated into the marvelous light and liberty of God's Son, I had rest for a little while. O what sweet rest and comfort I enjoyed on that beautiful mountain! Why should I say mountain? Well, I must say that on that mountain Jesus talked with his loved ones, which the Father gave him out of the world. Here Jesus called whom he would unto himself, and taught them his commandments; that is, all the laws of Zion. Surely it is to be called a mountain where Jesus speaks peace to the poor, despairing soul, who has been the servant of sin all his life. My Father's children, was it not on this beautiful mountain that we first could sing,

"What wondrous love is this,
That caused the Lord of bliss
To bear the dreadful curse?" &c.

Dear brethren, I have had this scribble on hand about three months, laboring under much trouble of mind as to what to do with it. But since reading sister Mary Parker's communication in the SIGNS of April 10th, I have decided to send it to you for publication, as it has been my mind to do so for about fourteen years. What words of comfort that dear sister did give in that letter! Although she is a stranger in the flesh to the writer, and in a far distant land, where but few of her faith are to be found, as it is also in these parts, may she take courage from the words spoken by her Master, "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." If we ask any of the little ones who are called to pass through afflictions in various ways, as this dear sister has, why such is their lot, will they not say, It is for my good, and for the glory of God? Let us strive to be of one mind, and be careful how we speak or communicate with each other in regard to the Scriptures. While I know there are some loving and able brethren who will not agree that God has predestinated all things, yet I must confess that I receive (or hope I do) these "all things" in the full sense of the word. We hear Paul saying, "In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."—Eph. i. 11. "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose."—Rom. viii. 28. What are these all things? Do these all things embrace all the wicked devices and acts of men? I must answer with the Scriptures, as they are the only witnesses whose testimony we are commanded to take. "And when they heard that, they lifted up their voice to God with one accord, and said, Lord, thou art God, which hast made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is."—Acts iv. 24. We learn from the connection of this Scripture that the apostles had been drawn before the rulers, and charged by them not to teach nor speak any more in the name of Jesus. Then the apostles went to their own company, and reported all that the chief priests and elders had said unto them. Now what do we learn from the Scripture we have quoted? The plain confession of the apostles that God had made heaven, and the earth, and the sea, and all that is in them. Does not this cover all things? Surely it does. "Herod, Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done." Now do we understand by God determining that to be done, that God rendered the false witness against Jesus, and spat upon him, and mocked him? Surely not. Well, why was this done? asks one. I allude to those wicked acts of men, and not to the determinate counsel of God, which he had before determined to be done; because that was the wickedness of men; and "every imagination of the thoughts of his heart is only evil continually." Well, how does that prove that God predestinated all things? says one. I answer, By God choosing the wickedness of men to carry out his purpose, which he had before determined to be done. God's counsel was that the holy child Jesus should be put to death, and that by wicked hands. If that was not a sinful act, I know not where to find one. Then, my dear brethren, let us not accuse our brethren of making God the author of sin, just because they hold that God predestinated all things.

My dear brethren, I ask in the name of Jesus, and in his name only, please pray for me and mine, that we may be kept by the power of God, and that we may faithfully discharge every duty; for I feel that I need the prayers of the saints.

I remain your poor, unworthy brother, if one at all, in hope of life beyond this sorrowing world,

J. M. GRIFFIN.

ELDER LEE HANCKS—DEAR SIR:—As your name has been absent from our family paper for some time, I would like to hear from you again. Though we are strangers in the flesh, I trust we are not so in the Spirit. I read your article in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, May, 1888, which gave me great comfort, and I have wanted to see you preach ever since; but for fear I shall never hear you, please give your views through the SIGNS on 1 Timothy iv. 16. You will oblige a little one, if one at all, in tribulation, L. E. BENNETT.

REPLY.

My financial embarrassments forbid my taking the SIGNS; hence I have not been taking it nor writing for it lately. I miss it greatly, there are such able writers, such as Elders Beebe, Chick, Durand, Purington, Rittenhouse, Vail, Jenkins, and many others, who always seem to bring words of comfort; and they are firm, old-fashioned Baptists, I think. I feel very thankful indeed if I have ever spoken a word to encourage one poor, little lamb. But God deserves the praise; I do not. You say you want to hear from me. Well, I am, as to health, in poor health, and have no hope of ever feeling well again. I am troubled greatly with dyspepsia, kidney and heart troubles; but I want to be resigned to my lot my few remaining days on earth.

The text reads, "Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine; continue in them: for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee." The first and most important thing for the servant of God is to take heed unto himself; hence this was a charge which Paul gave to Timothy, a young minister, and is equally binding upon all God's servants now. When Paul gave the charge to the Elders at Ephesus the first thing was, "Take heed therefore unto yourselves." If one engages in this high vocation who is not called, he will not prove a blessing to Zion. No one should take this honor to himself but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. Perhaps there may be men to-day who are good deacons, and can exhort the brethren to duty, and pray in public, that the church has tried to make preachers of, and destroyed their usefulness. The greatest evidence that a man is a preacher is that he preaches. The churches should be very careful whom they set apart to this sacred calling. The brethren should see the qualifications of a minister. A minister "must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant [watchful], sober, of good behavior, given to hospitality, apt to teach; not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient, not a brawler, not covetous; one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity," &c. "He must have a good report of them that are without." Not that they shall love his doctrine, but his daily deportment should be commendable. If you hear of a preacher going to bar-rooms, and having gamblers for his associates, that would be a bad report. Or if he should drink too much, or drink with the drunken, that is a bad report. If he should fail to tell the truth, or to be honest in his dealings with his fellow-man, that is a bad report. He should shun every appearance of evil, and stay away from the company of the wicked. He should pay his just debts, tell the truth, and live in peace with all men, especially the household of faith. No matter how able a man may preach, if he does not live an exemplary life, and preach by his walk, his preaching will have a poor influence. He should be an example to believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity. He should be a peace-maker, and work to unite the children of God. He should study to show himself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing (make the proper application, for it belongs to the man of God) the word of truth. He should give attendance to reading the Bible, and searching after truth. That which he knows nothing about he should let alone. He should take heed to his feet, to have an orderly walk; to his tongue, to have a godly conversation. He must be gentle unto all men. He should be controlled by a spirit of meekness and love.

Take heed to the doctrine. Doctrines are frequently spoken of in the Bible, applying to men, the "doctrines of men," "doctrines of devils," "winds of doctrine," &c. The church does not have "doctrines," but "the doctrine," a definite doctrine; the doctrine of Christ. There are some that teach for doctrines the commandments of men; but they cannot endure sound doctrine. When one preaches Christ he preaches "the doctrine;" for everything that pertains to "the doctrine" of salvation is in Christ. If it is "the doctrine" of eternal salvation, it is in him. If it is "the doctrine" of the "common salvation," it is in him; for it is God that worketh in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure. A preacher, then, to be sound in doctrine must know it. It is not learned in the schools of men, but by the revelation of Christ. A man must have a revelation from God in order to know the doctrine. We cannot expect a church to be sound in doctrine that has an unsound ministry; no more than you could expect a flock of sheep to be healthy that lived or were fed on poisonous food. They should be fed on the "sincere milk of the word, that they may grow thereby." Give them good, strong, solid food. If you want to see a church sound on the doctrine of election and predestination, just go where there is a ministry that preaches it fearlessly. Wherever I find an unsound ministry I find an unsound church. Hence the great necessity of a sound ministry; for preachers cause more trouble than anybody else, and the church should be on her guard. The preacher should preach nothing he cannot substantiate by the Scriptures. It is better to tell that which we know; and I assure you it will be more comforting than mystified things, that are obscure to us, and will leave them more so to the hearers.

"Continue in them." There is a necessity for continuing in the doctrine and practice. We should not be turned about by men, as a weathercock is turned by the wind. But we should continue our orderly walk and godly conversation every day, and not shun at any time or under any circumstances to preach "the doctrine" in meekness. Never yield the doctrine to please anybody. "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." "Earnestly contend for the faith." If a preacher preaches grace one day, and works another, and just preaches to suit the congregation he is with, his preaching is worth but little. He should "continue" in being separate from the world, and not be joined or married to Babylon's pretty little daughters; for they are watching to take advantage. "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled with the yoke of bondage." Faithfulness and firmness are most excellent qualities in the true ministry. The unregenerate admire firmness in a man.

"In doing this thou shalt both save thyself, and them that hear thee." There is a salvation for the minister which is not an eternal salvation; for he is already a called servant of God. But he saves himself from errors of various kinds. He saves himself from Arminianism, from worldly institutions, from the gainsayers, by stopping their mouths, from a condemned conscience, from the death that the disobedient are heir to. He enjoys a sweet rest in the presence of God and his brethren; yea, he has the fellowship of saints, and a home in the church of God. His influence has a savory tendency upon those that hear. A dead man cannot hear. The unregenerated sinner has ears, and hears not; a heart, and understands not. None but the children of God hear the servants; for they are all that want to hear, and they are all that have ears to hear. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." But the living are all that are thus blessed. None can hear spiritually but a child of God. "He that heareth my words, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." Hence hearing and believing are evidences of a passage from "death unto life." Hearing then is a fruit of eternal life, and not the cause. Now the child of God hears and knows the joyful sound, and walks in the light of God's countenance. He hears, because he is a living child. Now this is the one that the sound, faithful and orderly walking minister saves. He saves him from the gins and snares of Babylon, by pointing out their corrupt theory, and showing him that the Bible teaches "the doctrine" of election, predestination, specific atonement, final preservation of the saints, and the resurrection of the dead. He shows by the Bible that God is a Sovereign, and will do all his pleasure, and that he is not dependent upon men or means to accomplish his purposes. The faithful minister then saves them from going into error, such as Arminianism, and from joining Babylon's societies, by laying a good example before them. "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe;" not to make believers out of unbelievers. There is a use for preaching, and there is a salvation in it to the believer, or hearer, here in time, but not eternally. I feel it my duty to encourage those who have a hope in Jesus to live in obedience; and when they do this they work out their own salvation with fear and trembling, and are not neglecting this great salvation. They seek their enjoyment in the kingdom here. There are many admonitions to God's children to live in obedience, and by so doing they eat of the good of the land. The child of God in being baptized receives the answer of a good conscience, and enters that found rest. The minister is to feed the sheep and the lambs, and the great Shepherd furnishes him with a sufficiency to feed all the poor, hungry children, and the minister saves them from hunger.

Now, in conclusion, the minister must have an orderly walk, must be sound in doctrine and practice, must be steadfast, not wavering; and he saves himself here, and saves the living children by his exemplary life and faithfulness in word and doctrine, with a time salvation.

May we all be saved here in time with that common salvation, and find a sweet rest in the banqueting-house of Jesus, where, though we are lame in both feet, sweet Jesus will bring us to the King's table, where we can eat continually. May the Lord enable us to be faithful in discharging our every duty, and keep us as the apple of his eye, and under the shadow of his wings. He knoweth the severe trials that await us in the future, and may he give us grace to bear us up, that we may be faithful soldiers of the cross, and be of one mind, and all speak the same things, in love and fellowship. Amen.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—How familiar to my ear sounds the first appellation used above! How dear to my heart are the sweet recollections that crowd around the pleasant name! Elder G. Beebe, made precious by the chain of precious links of doctrine committed to his care by him who forged, welded and brightened each connecting part, and made it fit for every child of God in their pilgrimage through time. From my earliest recollection of Old School Baptists his name has been most familiar to me, though I never saw him at but two associations, a year or two after I became a Baptist. As for you, my dear brethren, I have seen only brother Benton L. But I doubt his recollecting me among the thousands that he has seen within the twenty-five years that have passed since then.

In all my reading I recall but few thoughts that ever graced your father's editorials but what I have fully believed, both in doctrine and order, and I can say equally so of you. The SIGNS OF THE TIMES is the only religious paper I ever took. While your father was yet alive I received a prospectus of a paper soon to be published, which was evidently thought to be more promising of good, as it promised to endeavor to promote a greater harmony. I had my misgivings, therefore I did not aid the enterprise. I saw nothing in the SIGNS (though not claiming infallibility) that I thought would tend to disturb the harmony of the brotherhood, and have not to this day. I want to say right here that lack of harmony begins outside of the SIGNS, or any other periodical; and party strife, for personal ambition, often seeks to build up its side by using some paper for a prop. Dear brethren, I know that you as publishers can only judge the apparent substance of matter sent you for publication; and as for my own feeble productions, I often wonder that any of them are used. But while I never wish to write anything that I ought to be ashamed to own or subscribe to, yet I have often written and laid aside my pieces, and often sent such as I desired to see in print; not because of greater merit than that of others, but because of thoughts I took pleasure in rehearsing, or of sorrows. I desired to find some one who could share them with me. But as to you, brethren, we should all look and expect you to use your watchcare, excluding all that you feel to suspect of injurious intentions, or of injurious tendencies. None should feel slighted though our articles fail to appear. I know that the SIGNS cannot contain all the precious truths that are sent you, and therefore feel to share some measure of the disappointment with others, knowing that in some way there is some blessing under the hand of God in it all. We have had the private feast of writing down our joys, or tasted in secret hope that some poor, tried and tempted soul is somewhere in like sorrows, and qualified to sympathize with us in ours. I do not feel like the infidel poet that says there are roses that waste their fragrance on the desert air. It may all seem strange to us that we cannot see God's blessed hand in every event of life, in every thought that seeks expression, in every groan and every secret falling tear. But only let us stop wherever we are, whether on the mountain's top, where there "shall be a handful of corn," or in the desert, which "shall blossom as the rose;" for God, even our God (O could we always call this blessed name to mind!), has said it; and yet we must pass through each scene in life to feel its truth.

Why, brethren, my mind has wandered, I see, from the reminiscence I began; but this also is my lot, and gives some respite to the monotony of my dull narrative. I wished above all things to say that I have watched the SIGNS (excuse the word), and I do not see how much better you could have done, even though some pieces from the pens of some I know of conveyed to your mind that they were your most ardent friends, while secretly they sought the overthrow of the main distinctions that have followed the SIGNS all the way down, and frequently repeated in its prospectus. I can never hope that this can be avoided; therefore I take the SIGNS for what it is—the only paper that sustains avowedly the principles of my faith.

One more thing I wish to say, and that is, if this reaches the eyes of its readers, I do not hold it to be necessary that all should use the same identical words that I do; but I do hold that there must be sufficient agreement in our doctrine and order to secure peace and fellowship, without contention and strife, or I am too weak to travel far in the company of such as will not endure sound doctrine. They who are "weak in the faith" I love, and wish to cherish, but not they who are sufficiently strong to enter into "doubtful disputation," and to deride that precious doctrine that I have without wavering tried to preach for twenty years, to wit, absolute predestination of all things, the eternal vital unity of Christ and his people, the actual election in Christ of all that ever can be saved, and the blessed privilege of praising God only, who without means did beget, quicken and bring to the birth every son in Zion. These I consider to be essential points of faith, that I cannot yield up or compromise, thus far in life, and trust the Lord will still leave some names as blessed witnesses of his truth. There are some points of sectional order that I do not wish to contend against, though I cannot deceive my brethren and say that I see them clearly, favorable to my adoption, viz., the washing of feet, and the imposition of hands in ordaining deacons. I feel that I could live in a church that practiced these, or either of them, without offense to me; just as I could bear with a brother who did not feel to say that he could see through predestination of all things, if he did not oppose me in the blessed privilege of preaching it in its place. I am willing to share the companionship of all those who "both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Savior of all men, especially of them that believe;" not only of good men, but even of the "vessels of wrath fitted to destruction," so far as they have any temporal salvation through the long-suffering of God. Very early in my ministry an aged man, whom I had felt to highly regard, and who was very kind to my face, warned another young brother against me; for said he, "He has embraced that dangerous doctrine of predestination of all things." I sought an understanding on the subject, and he wrote to me that if it was "necessary, in order to have faith in God, to believe that he predestinated all the evil that has been done since the world was made, and all that ever will be done while the world stands, it is an undeniable truth that I lack faith in God." I have borne it these many years, but it has been blessed to my comfort, as God's sweet grace soothed the wound. While I have unshaken faith in the doctrine, I have always desired to hold it in its harmony of connection, and, as I have repeated through the SIGNS, not to thereby make God the "author of sin." I have frequently explained to those who charge me with holding that God makes men to sin, and then punishes them for it, that it was not necessary for him to use new and unprovided energy on his own part to make men to sin, as man uses present force to compel obedience to his will. But that the predestination of God secured all of the parts, principles and immediate powers necessary to follow all down the line of human existence; and that each act, through the predestinated course of events, secured its proper result, for the glory of God, and that all was for the good of his people. Let, therefore, every tried and tempted saint take courage in the sweet assurance that all things work together for their good. "Therefore let no man glory in men: for all things are yours; whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come: all are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's."—1 Cor. iii. 21-23; see also Rom. viii. 33-39.

"Be hushed, my sad spirit! the worst that can come But shortens my journey and hastens me home."

Turn and read it, and see how sweetly all things blend in benefits to be realized by every child of God. There is no other way than by predestined experience of each and every trial of faith.

I know not where to stop, as I begin to look after the all things that are yours; but I must close this already lengthy letter. May God bless the holy contemplations of his providence and grace to your comfort, is my humble prayer.

A. B. BRES.

KELLY'S CORNERS, N. Y., Nov. 5, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—If one so unworthy may address you and the household of faith through your valuable medium, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, in whose columns are found rich gleanings, as in the field of the spiritual Boaz, as the Spirit takes of the things of Jesus and shows them to his dear people in their experience. Truly we may say of the dealings of God with his people, "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty: just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints." His judgments are always unsearchable, and his ways past finding out. He ever works all things after the counsel of his own will, causing all things to work together for good to them that love him, and are the called according to his purpose. So each one must bear this testimony, "Thou hast wrought all our works in us." The Lord knoweth my uprisings and down-sittings, and remembers that I am but dust. Therefore as the saints are drawn along by the soft and strong cords of his loving-kindness, they will sing of that grace that raised them from the fall, knowing it is amazing grace indeed; for no sinner, conscious of the almighty power that is dealing with them, can attribute it to works of righteousness which they have done or can do. How needful are all their trials, to prove the words of Jesus true, "In the world ye shall have tribulation." Yet for their comfort when troubled he has also said, "In me ye shall have peace."

In reading the different communications in the SIGNS we can see the different gifts, each feeling himself or herself to be the least. Thus each edifies the other; and all things are done to edification that are done for the profit of one another, as the Scriptures command. Love is found to be without dissimulation, and there is an abhorrence of that which is evil, and a cleaving to that which is good. As I look over the communications in No. 44, and reflect on the dealings of God with his people, as described in that issue, I find some very young in experience, and some very aged; some rejoicing, and some very much troubled; the Zion of God very much troubled in some places, and the Lord's servants in tears because of her perilous condition. Yet all this but shows us the truth of the word of prophecy, "I will leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord." It also proves to those who leave all with him, that "The name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it and are safe." And those are the only ones that do or can cease from their own works, or from man, whose breath is in his nostrils. Jesus sits in the throne of his glory, as a refiner and purifier of his people, that they may offer their offerings in righteousness, and in their songs crown him Lord of all, knowing that without him they can do nothing. Thus as they know how helpless and dependent they are, and feel that they come short in everything, they are the more fully prepared to glorify him in their body and in their spirit, which are his. Only in this way do they realize that they are not their own, having been bought with a price, even the precious blood of Christ. Surely every witness must know this truth, to be prepared to testify to God's goodness, mercy, loving-kindness and long-suffering, as he is leading them along in the way he will have them to go, as the sheep of his pasture. What a blessing it is to know that he leads his own flock like a shepherd, gathers them to himself, carrying the lambs in his dear bosom. And as he sheds abroad his love in their hearts, and they are drawn together to worship in his holy temple, how sweetly do they sing the new song, loving each other with a pure heart fervently, and letting brotherly love continue. Then do the saints abound in the work of the Lord, and bear one another's burdens. Then will each bear his or her own burden without murmuring, knowing it is God that works in them to will and do of his own good pleasure, as of his own will he hath begotten them with the word of truth.

I read with interest the communication of our aged sister, Mary Jenkins, of the Andes Church, expressing her delight and interest in the gracious work of her Lord and Master, in bringing his sons from far, and his daughters from the ends of the earth. Since the session of the Roxbury Association there in September last, his power has been manifest as the King of Zion, in bringing three more to bow their necks to his yoke. One of them had been wedded to the Methodists for ten years, and was immersed by them. Yet she came, leaving all behind, to follow Jesus, whom she only knew and loved since last winter, by a happy experience. She was brought to love the Old Baptists, whom she formerly could not love. Thus the church was caused to rejoice because of the goodness of the Lord to her and to them, trusting alone in the mighty God of Jacob to build up and increase. Surely in blessing and multiplying there is none like him, who doeth wonders, causing the outcast and perishing to come and worship at his footstool, knowing that he is God, and beside him there is none else. His name is great, and he alone is to be praised. My chief desire is that the remainder of my days may be spent in his holy service, as a servant to the church, to wait upon the guests at the table of my living Lord, a servant for Jesus' sake. I know that if I am a child of grace, I am the least in my Father's house, and of sinners the chief. I have to say that the Lord has been very good and gracious to me. It is not because I have walked so correctly, or pleased my brethren so well, for it has been quite the reverse with me. I am prone to do evil; yet I have rather courted than opposed watchfulness. While divisions and contentions abound, the Lord reigns, and the earth keeps silence.

All our little churches in the Roxbury Association are rejoicing because of the goings forth of our God in his sanctuary.

WATERLOO, N. Y., Nov. 10, 1889.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Having read the editorial in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES of November 6th, I feel like writing you a few lines, which are at your disposal, either to publish or to consign to the waste-basket. I had written a letter to you about two years ago on the passage referred to (the elder son, or the two sons); but feeling my inability to do the subject justice, withheld the same, hoping to hear from some of the brethren who are better able to divide the word of truth. As you request the brethren to write their views, I will try and express my views as best I can, in as few words as possible, with all love and fellowship for those I esteem far my superiors in understanding of the record of the word of God.

It looks to me as though the Savior was talking to a multitude of people that trusted in their own works of righteousness for their salvation, and that by a knowledge of the law they would be saved. But in the two parables preceding he shows them that God had saved his people with an everlasting salvation. In the first place we have the parable of the sheep, showing forth that although one sheep out of the hundred went astray, it did not change its nature, but was found and brought back to the fold a sheep. Also, the woman that lost the piece of silver lit a candle, swept the house, and sought diligently till she found it; and she found it bearing the same engraving. It was the same metal; but, no doubt, it was tarnished somewhat by being lost. But she recognized it as hers, and called her friends and neighbors together, saying, "Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece which I had lost."

Then he puts forth the parable of the two sons, saying, "A certain man had two sons: and the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living." The younger son went into a far country, wasted his goods with harlots, and in riotous living. When he was found by the Spirit of God he was made to feel the famine in the land. How many we see who seem to have a good experience, and yet are feeding with the husks the swine eat, and no man gives it them. But when found by the Spirit of God, and made to see their lost and ruined condition, they return to their Father's house penitent, willing to be made as one of his hired servants, feeling unworthy to be called his son. As one of old says, "I would rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." Now we see in the elder son one, perhaps, that has never wandered away from the fold, but was the heir to his father's goods. He, perhaps, never has been brought into the same condition of the younger son, who, when his goods were wasted, joined himself to a citizen of the country. He had to have a living, and was out of the fold. But how soon we find him loathing the food. The elder son had always lived in his Father's house, and knew salvation was of grace, and not of works; but here we see the Adamic man rise up and say, "Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment; and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends." It looks to me as though the parable was to show that salvation is of the Lord, and that his ever-watchful eye is on his children, to keep them and bring them safely to the fold, though they may be beaten with many stripes. It looks to me as though the two sons represent his people in the visible church. Though one may err more than another, to outward appearance, yet God with his ever-watchful eye and powerful arm will bring them into the fold in his own time and own way.

Hoping I have written these few lines with the guidance of the Spirit, and of love and good will to all who may read them, I will leave this at your disposal, dear brethren. I subscribe myself less than the least of all saints, if one at all,

NEWARK, Del., Nov. 8, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—In closed please find a letter written by brother B. F. Coulter, which I hope you can publish. It seems that the Scripture quoted, and what it sets forth, had taken entire possession of his mind, and he was compelled to write. Letters thus written are generally interesting to the lovers of truth. I have wished many times that the Scriptures would come to me with such force and power; but they seldom do, if ever, unless I am speaking. I am generally exercised very faintly by the Spirit upon spiritual things.

As ever, in hope and fellowship,
JOSEPH L. STATON.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Oct. 29, 1889.

DEAR BROTHER STATON:—The moment I sat down to write to you the words of the Lord by the psalmist David came into my mind, "Many are the afflictions of the righteous," crowding out everything else that I wanted to say to you. I waited for them to pass away, that I might go on and write; but the more I tried, the more deeply they impressed me. So now I have opened the Bible and found the words in Psalm xxxiv.; and verses 18-20 have so riveted me that I feel to be utterly undone, and I am possessed with such a desire and longing to be assured that I am one of that poor and afflicted people spoken of in those (to me) three beautiful verses. Of course they are familiar to your pure mind, for you have realized and enjoyed all their beauty and significance; yet I will repeat them, though I tremble at them: "The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart; and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit. Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the Lord delivereth him out of them all. He keepeth all his bones: not one of them is broken." How wonderfully secure are all the subjects of that precious declaration. Not a doubt of the power of him who uttered the words by the psalmist's mouth to accomplish all his purpose. Not the ripple of a cloud upon the noonday sky to mar (in the saint's bright vision) the truth and certainty of the divine protection. The doubts and questionings come because of this fleshly tenement which we inhabit; and by reason of the weakness of the flesh we cry, "Am I his, or am I not?" Can it be possible that I (wretched, sinful man that I am) am one of that innumerable company who fear the Lord and call upon his name? Can it be my happy privilege to be despised by the world (despising the shame, as did our Savior), and so be numbered among and as one of that peculiar people? Am I part and parcel of that chosen generation, chosen in Christ Jesus before time began, and out from among the heathen called to be a follower of the Lamb, baptized into his death, to be raised with him in newness of life? Have I been made worthy (through Christ's righteousness, not my own) to enter into that royal priesthood, whose robes denote the spotless purity of the Son of God? Am I worthy to be recognized as a citizen of that holy nation, a fellow-citizen with the saints? If I could enter into the sufferings and realize the agony of the cross, how that Christ suffered for the sins of his people, then would the broken heart be my portion, and the Lord be nigh unto me. I do truly long for the contrite spirit; and I believe I know that he saveth such. With meekness I desire to follow him as a little, helpless child, shorn of all pride and self-conceit, having no other dependence, and with the apostle to say, "To whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." But many are the afflictions of the righteous. I imagine myself standing where two roads diverge. One is smooth and pleasant, with many attractions, having in it all the facilities for satisfying the desires of the flesh. The other is rough and dangerous, and in it I behold yourself and all the saints, being buffeted, tossed and torn, falling to the ground and rising again, looking not to the comforts of this present world, but, with a foretaste of what is to come, looking away yonder to the enjoyment of the sweets and fullness of eternal joy. I feel that I so often wander into that other road, and am not worthy to walk with the dear saints; but, dear brother, I do sometimes feel that I could rejoice to suffer affliction for Christ's sake. I feel that it is better for me to cry out from the depths than to be on the housetop. When some tell me how very low down they have been, I mourn to get where they have been. When they tell me of nightly visions, in which their Savior is presented to their sight, I sigh that I have not been there. If I have had an experience at all, it has been that gradual coming into the light, an imperceptible dawning of something precious, that I would not turn back to lose for all the world. The last time we drove to Newark we left Philadelphia before daylight; and on our way, at the proper time, a streak of gray appeared in the horizon eastward, and for an hour my experience presented itself to me in that beautiful sunrise. It came to me as a figure of my whole life. The bondage of Egypt was as a thing of the past. The darkness was being lifted as a curtain. The sentence of death under which I had been imprisoned still hung as a pall about me. When at this hour of dawn I came into a realization of the enormity of my sins and of the depravity of my heart, I found myself altogether unsound and desperately wicked, having all my days sinned against the just and holy God; and now, as darkness is being made light to my soul, and I discover the loathsome prison-house I am in, I cry, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Now the pardon which was sealed by the blood of Jesus eighteen hundred years ago has reached my prison cell; and as the natural sun arises, making manifest the light of the natural day, so to me the Sun of righteousness arises with healing in his wings, bathing my poor soul in God's holy love, showing me the presence of Jesus as the Daysman, the Mediator and the Redeemer. As the sun rises and goes on through its daily course it is not always clear sunlight; clouds obscure the vision, storms and thunderings, and the wind bloweth where it listeth. So has my life been, full of doubts and murmurings; and although the clouds may be dark and heavy in the natural sky, yet I do not doubt that the sun is still shining. So no matter how dark and wayward and fitful my life, my walk and conversation are, I know that my Redeemer liveth, and forever sitteth at the right hand of God, making intercession for those whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life. When we are by grace enabled to look upon things not seen, our afflictions, though many, are light indeed, because then we know something of what the afflictions were through which our dear Savior passed.

"But the Lord delivereth him out of them all." I feel to rejoice that the reading of that declaration is just as it is. Had it read "from them all," I am afraid I might feel as did the man of whom you told me, who gave you his view of salvation, stretching forth his hand when the poor sinner had crossed the log by his own effort. But I hope I realize (as I know you do) that Jesus as the Bridegroom came into the very chamber of his bride, entered into the transgression, took upon himself all the burden of her sins, through suffering and death making whole the violated and broken law; not as a substitute, but being, as he is, the very essence, the life and the head of the body, which is his church. His lost sheep are in the horrible pit and miry clay, and he stands not upon the bank ready to lift them out if they should get near enough to his hand; but he goes into the very bottom of the pit, and when through death he comes up they are all brought out with him, for in all our afflictions he was afflicted. He alone deserves the praise. All the merit is in him, for he hath loved us with an everlasting love, and with loving-kindness hath he drawn us.

"He keepeth all his bones: not one of them is broken." How comforting is the word of truth to the subjects of his pardoning love! All of them make one perfect body, each bone fitting in its proper place, a place for every bone, and only complete when each and every one is fitted in its proper position and clothed with the attributes of his precious love. Not even a little finger can be spared from that perfect body.

Now, dear brother Staton, I am ashamed of the way I have run on in the mist, and hesitate to send it; but knowing your great forbearance and kindness of heart, and conscious that you know all my weaknesses, I feel that you will read it considering the source from whence it came.

NEW WINE IN THE KINGDOM.

WILL brother W. L. Beebe be so kind as to give me his views on Mark xiv. 25? Hoping the Lord will sustain and bless you, I am, as I hope, your sister in a blessed Redeemer,

R. P. HELM.

HICKMAN, May 30, 1888.

REPLY.

"VERILY I say unto you, I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine, until that day that I drink it new in the kingdom of God."—Mark xiv. 25.

This request of our esteemed sister has not been overlooked, nor has the delay in complying with it resulted from unwillingness to do as desired. While deeply impressed with the solemn import of these words of our Lord, conscious incompetency to write of the subject in its fullness has been the cause of our hesitancy in attempting it. Even now we are oppressed with a sense of insufficiency to do justice to the subject, but will present some thoughts in connection with it, and unite with our sister in requesting our brethren to give such views as they may have upon the text.

From the preceding context it will be seen that this declaration of Jesus was uttered immediately after he had given the disciples the ordinance of the communion supper, which was to be observed by them in remembrance of him. Since that wonderful beginning in which "God created the heaven and the earth," no such solemnly important moment ever was known to finite intelligence as the awful night in which this ordinance was given to the disciples by the suffering Redeemer. In bearing the sins of all his members in his own body he was crushed beneath the weight of all the wrath of infinite justice, which could be satisfied with nothing less than the life that could be yielded by none but himself. It was not merely as a substitute for sinners that Jesus was made a curse for all his chosen people. As the life of his body, the church, it was written of him to do the will of God. That will is written in the irrevocable decree that "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Inflexible justice offers no alternative to this demand for the life of the sinner. Rivers of oil and the cattle on a thousand hills might all be offered in vain. Much less can justice be satisfied with tears of penitence and prayers for pity. The holy law knows no mercy. It has no power to give the life it takes from the guilty sinner. That death which passed upon all men in the transgression of Adam, for that all sinned in him, must be fulfilled in the case of every individual who was in him in the transgression of the commandment of his Creator. Under this condemnation all the chosen vessels of mercy were hopelessly lost, in the common judgment which came upon all the family of the earthly Adam.

—Rom. v. 12-19. Therefore our Redeemer did not come to keep any sinner from being lost. He says, "The Son of man is come to save that which was lost."—Matt. xviii. 11. Every one who has felt the burden of sin in his own soul can witness to the agony of despair under which he was crushed in that experience; but who can know the anguish endured by the holy Son of God when the load of all the sin of every one of his chosen people was laid on him? The "sweat as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground" in dark Gethsemane, the dying cry on the cross, and the darkness hiding the noonday sun, faintly portray the inconceivable suffering of the great Captain of our salvation when alone he trod the wine-press of almighty wrath. Only as sustained by the omnipotence of his own eternal power and Godhead was our Savior able to meet the demand of the holy law, and to triumph over sin and death. In all this dreadful strife he was cheered by no refreshing fruit of the vine. The cup which was given him by his Father, with all its bitterness, he must drink. Its last drop was needful for the salvation of his people from their sins; and for the joy that was set before him he "endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."—Heb. xii. 2. As the throne of God is the figurative expression of divine sovereignty, so the declaration that our Redeemer is set down at the right hand of that throne signifies the complete satisfaction of eternal justice in his atoning sacrifice, by which "He hath perfected forever them that are sanctified."—Heb. x. 14. Justice demands nothing more either of him as the Surety of his people, or of them as the subjects of his gracious work of salvation from their sin and guilt.

At the time when this sacred ordinance was given to his disciples our Lord Jesus was still under the law which he came to fulfill; and he differed nothing from a servant in the obligation to render obedience to all the requirements of that law. For this cause, "Being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross."—Phil. ii. 8. In his humiliation and suffering he could not drink of the cheering fruit of the vine, which is throughout the inspired Scriptures used as the symbol of comfort and rejoicing. As the sin-bearing victim of divine justice he could know nothing of consolation. The gloom of that shadow which shrouded Calvary was but the type of the inconceivable horror of great darkness under which the Lord of life must sink when the sword of justice fell upon him. Under the burden of the sins of all his members he went down into death; and from that dreadful pit of condemnation he cried unto God for deliverance, saying, "Withhold not thou thy tender mercies from me, O Lord: let thy loving-kindness and thy truth continually preserve me. For innumerable evils have compassed me about: mine iniquities have taken hold upon me, so that I am not able to look up; they are more than the hairs of mine head: therefore my heart faileth me."—Psa. xl. 11, 12. While his redeemed people are made to rejoice in the victory which was wrought through his death, that triumph cost him untold agony and blood. Hence, while it was proper that they should partake of the wine as significant of their rejoicing in his delivering grace, it was also solemnly expressive of his anguish and sorrow of soul that he might not drink of that emblem of joy and victory until he should "drink it new in the kingdom of God." The oppression under which he groaned was not the mere physical pain of the scourge, the thorns and the cross. While enduring all this he could pray for his murderers, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do!" Deeper and more terrible was that anguish which wrung from his dying lips the cry which rent the rocks and shook the earth, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Until this awful baptism of agony was accomplished, the Captain of our salvation was straitened. He could not then be cheered with wine, although in the assurance of his triumphant resurrection he could give this symbol of rejoicing to his disciples as the emblem of their victory over sin and death through his blood.

The declaration of Jesus in our text does not signify that he was restrained from drinking of the fruit of the vine by any power outside of himself. He says, "I will drink no more;" not I am forbidden to drink. The dreadful burden of sin under which he was oppressed, as a cart laden with sheaves, might well fill his soul with such distress as to cause him to desire no cheering wine. So long as the law held its demands against him he could not rejoice, as the drinking of wine would indicate. The weight of that chain of condemnation under which he groaned shut out from him all sense of joy and comfort. While he was under the law, he was under the curse of that law which his members had transgressed.

"Until I drink it new in the kingdom of God." The victory of light over darkness is recorded in all the revelation which God has given. In the curse which consigned the seed of the earthly Adam to death, the Lord God incorporated the promise of the Seed of the woman, who should bruise the head of the serpent. As in the natural creation darkness was manifested before light was commanded to shine, so it is through the deeper darkness of sorrow and death that the Lord of life and glory must pass in bringing life and immortality to light through the gospel. The joy that was set before him in the glorious result of his toil and suffering was the consideration which sustained him in all the afflictions to which he was subjected. Being anointed with the fullness of the holy Spirit of the Lord God, he could confidently say, "Behold, now, I have ordered my cause; I know that I shall be justified."—Job xiii. 18. But he must satisfy all the demands of the holy law which his members had violated before he could enter into that glory which was rightfully his. So he says to the desponding disciples, "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" He must pass through the agony before he could rejoice in the victory in which his glory was manifested. As the Vine in whose fruit was treasured the blessing of the wine of all gospel consolation, he must be crushed under the condemnation of divine wrath, before that blessing could be poured forth upon the members of his ransomed family. While fulfilling that dreadful sentence of inexorable justice, he could only drink the bitter dregs of that cup which was prepared by the Father for him. In no other way could he do the will of that God who sent him to save his people from their sins. In the accomplishment of that great work he says, "My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?" So long as he was thus borne down under the curse of sin he could well say, "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise."—Prov. xx. 1. But when he had finished the work which was given him in the eternal purpose of God he was assured that he should drink with his redeemed children in the kingdom of God; and that new wine which should cheer him then should have no trace of bitterness. In the full enjoyment of his victory over sin and death he did indeed drink abundantly of the new wine, which was the result of his suffering. With exultant shouting he was raised from the dark bondage of death under the law; and leading captivity captive, he ascended his glorious high throne, having in his omnipotent hand all power in heaven and in earth. Now, in the everlasting kingdom of God, he drinks of that fruit of the vine; not as when he instituted this memorial ordinance of himself, as the panting victim of divine justice, but now as the exalted King of glory, in the throne of his own victorious sovereignty.

The kingdom of God is not of this world, nor is it subject to the changing power of time. The wine of that kingdom is not the literal fruit of the vine, which is of the sin-cursed earth. As Jesus is himself the bread which came down from heaven, of which if a man eat he shall never die, so the new wine of the kingdom of God is the everlasting consolation of that gospel of grace and truth which came by Jesus Christ. This wine is well designated as being new. It is not derived from the ruins of the old dispensation of legal works and the slavish observance of the ritual of Judaism. It is found nowhere but in that glorious kingdom of which God declares, "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy."—Isa. lxy. 17, 18. This gladness and rejoicing is the true significance of the wine which our Lord blessed as the type of his blood in the holy ordinance of the communion supper. As it is expressly declared by inspiration that the ordinance of baptism is "not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God," so the eating of the bread and drinking of the wine in the communion of the saints is not to be understood as being the literal partaking of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus. It is indeed the solemn declaration that we have no hope of salvation in any other justification before God but in the redemption, which is in Christ Jesus; so that in that sense we do eat his flesh and drink his blood. If we are trusting in any merit or righteousness of our own as entitling us to participate in the observance of this ordinance, we are not eating and drinking in remembrance of Jesus. When, conscious of our own sinfulness and condemnation, we are tremblingly trusting in the atoning virtue of that blood which was shed on Calvary, then we are qualified to ascribe all glory to his holy name as the Savior of sinners, of whom we know ourselves the chief; and only such are they who are saved by his precious blood. All such are led by the Spirit of God, and are authorized to sit with him in the kingdom of God, and to eat and drink with him in the observance of this sacred ordinance, in remembrance of him.

IN RESPONSE

To OUR inquiry, "Who wishes to assist?" we have received a number of remittances, and have sent the paper to a corresponding number of brethren and sisters who are not able to pay for the paper themselves, and forwarded the name and address to whom each paper was sent to the party sending the money. We also informed the person receiving the paper who paid the dollar for their year's subscription.

See notice mentioned in third column of this page.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES FOR 1890.

ABOUT a year ago we announced our decision to publish the SIGNS OF THE TIMES an eight-page weekly at the same price we were publishing the twelve-page semi-monthly, and made the unprecedented offer to allow one-half the subscription price as a commission to all our paid-up old subscribers for every new subscriber they would procure us, and the result was that we received an addition of more than two thousand names to our list. Many, however, of these new subscribers paid but one dollar to the old subscriber, who sacrificed his commission to procure the new subscriber, having in view simply the increasing of the circulation of the paper. The question now is, How many of those paying only one dollar last year will renew for 1890 at the regular rate of two dollars? If we shall be able to retain a good proportion of those; and can still increase our circulation two thousand more, we will then be able to furnish the paper weekly at one dollar and fifty cents a year; and should it be increased four thousand, we would be able to publish it weekly at one dollar a year.

Many doubtless do not understand why we can publish at one dollar a year with the increased circulation, and for the benefit of such we will explain. It takes just as much typesetting, imposing forms and making ready for press to print one paper as it does any number of thousands of copies. In fact, after the paper is once "to press," the additional expense is but a trifle more than the cost of the blank paper. For instance, say it cost five thousand dollars a year to run a weekly of five thousand copies; it would probably not exceed seven thousand dollars to print ten thousand copies. The inquiry may arise with some, How is it that the local publications of but a thousand or fifteen hundred circulation can be published for two dollars a year? The reason is that those papers rely almost entirely on their advertising patronage for support. If the SIGNS should take two or three pages of advertisements it could be published at one dollar a year.

Another thing our readers are not aware of is that although the subscription price is two dollars a year, our gross receipts do not average one dollar and fifty cents for each subscriber, our loss from delinquent and gratuitous subscribers being more than twenty-five per cent. While most of our subscribers know and appreciate the above facts, there are many who do not, and consequently consider the price of the SIGNS too high.

Although the increased expenses of publishing the SIGNS weekly this year are several hundred dollars more than the increase in the receipts, we have decided to continue it weekly another year, and make the following

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!

From now until the first of next January, any one who is now a subscriber, and whose subscription is paid up, may send us new subscribers at one dollar a year; but no one, either new or old subscriber, can get the paper from this office for themselves at less than the regular rates. Any one who is not now a subscriber can have the benefit of the above terms by sending two dollars for their own subscription, and one dollar each for additional new subscribers.

WHO WISHES TO ASSIST?

FOR many years the SIGNS OF THE TIMES was published on terms that no other paper within our knowledge has ever been able to offer, viz., two dollars a year for those who were able to pay that amount, one dollar a year for those who were not able to pay any more, and free to those who really desired the paper, but were not able to pay anything; and we do not remember ever refusing the paper to any one who asked for it free until we started the weekly, and then we just simply could not do it. We have carried on an average in the neighborhood of a thousand gratuitous subscribers for years, until those who were paying full price began to complain that the subscription price of the SIGNS was too high, and to discontinue the paper on that account. We therefore were obliged to increase the amount we gave them for their money, and to do this we had to drop hundreds of names from our free list, which was one of the most unpleasant things we have ever been obliged to do.

While most of our brethren are poor, and feel hardly able to pay their own subscription, yet we believe there are some who, if they knew of the case, would rather assist in carrying this list than have them deprived of the paper. We have therefore concluded to submit this proposition to them. We will keep a list of names of those who appeal to us for the paper free, and if any of our brethren feel disposed to assist us in bearing the expense, we will for every dollar received enter one of these names on our list for one year, and send the person remitting the money the name and address of the person to whose subscription their money has been applied.

We hope our brethren will bear in mind that in thus furnishing the paper for one dollar we are not financially benefited ourselves, as it is really below actual cost of publication.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Selah Wickes died at his home in New Baltimore, Greene Co., N. Y., Aug. 3d, 1889, in the 91st year of his age.

The deceased was born near Preston Hollow, Albany Co., N. Y. At about the age of seven years he removed with his parents to New Baltimore, Greene Co., N. Y., where he lived during his life. His father was an Old School Baptist preacher, and brother Wickes was a regular attendant at the meetings, his wife being a worthy member. When he was asked to say anything of the dealings of God with him, he would plead his unworthiness, and make as an excuse that he came to bring his wife. Although he liked to hear the people of God talk of his goodness to them, he would not present himself to the church on account of his unworthiness. He never could tell the time when he did not like the people of God and their company. He would often remark that he lived on the crumbs that fell from his Master's table. In September, 1859, he was baptized by Elder Wm. Choate, and became a member in full fellowship with the Old School Baptist Church of Christ in South Westerlo, where he lived a consistent member, always adorning his profession by a well-ordered life and godly conversation. He acknowledged God's power, grace and glory, saying that it was for no good works that he had done, but through the abounding goodness of the just God that he had a hope through God's mercy. The last time I saw him was in March, 1888. In speaking of his age and inability to get around, he manifested his willingness to be in subjection to God in all things. If it were God's will he was ready to go, but expressed himself like one of old, "All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come." In his last sickness he was a great sufferer. We feel to say that a good man and a father in Israel has fallen, but we maintain a hope that our loss is his eternal gain.

Brother Wickes leaves a wife, who is a worthy sister in the church to which he belonged, to mourn her loss, together with the church.

E. R. ST. JOHN.

OREGON, Wis., Nov. 2, 1889.

DIED—In Wilmington, Del., Oct. 29th, 1889, Mrs. Mary Frist, in the 92d year of her age.

Sister Frist's maiden name was Meredith, and she was of the family of Merediths in the central part of the state. She was born Aug. 10th, 1798, and was of course at her death 91 years, 2 months and 19 days old. She was baptized in the fellowship of the church in Wilmington during the summer of 1864; and although quite an aged woman then, she has lived to adorn her profession and enjoy the love and fellowship of the church for more than a quarter of a century. I believe she had been connected with the Methodists for some years previous to her coming to us. She gave us no reason to suspect the exercises of her mind, but kept away from us until she had fully decided upon her course. I learned that she had been borrowing the SIGNS to read for some length of time. It would be hard to find one anywhere in whom the spiritual life and fruits of the Spirit were more manifest and abounding. For the last two years her strength and sight and hearing were all defective, and she was pretty much confined to her room; but her spiritual sight and understanding were bright and clear unto the last. Loving and faithful children ministered to her every need, and she died as she had lived, peacefully and in the triumphs of faith. I have sat by her bedside and heard her rehearse the experience of her early life, when, left a widow with a family of children and without means, amid the sorrow and dark hours she felt the support of gracious promises; and thus supported, resigned herself to the patient discharge of her duty, resting on the faithfulness of him who had said, "A father of the fatherless and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation." She could say with evident emotion, after her travel of fourscore and ten years, that not one thing had failed her of the fulfillment of gracious promises. For twenty years she has been a regular subscriber, all the time paying subscriptions for others, besides her own. I feel to say that she had this testimony for herself, and also left it to others, that she possessed that faith with which God is pleased. On such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and reign with him in his kingdom.

Thomas Williams, Sr., was born in England, Feb. 9th, 1833, moved to America in 1855, was married to Miss Hannah Ashby Oct. 10th, 1858, and died Sept. 15th, 1889, aged 56 years, 7 months and 6 days.

He leaves a wife and eight children to mourn their loss, besides a great many friends. He was not a member of any church at the time of his death, but had been a member of the United Brethren in Ohio. His wife said that he gave good evidence that he was prepared to go, and said, "All is well," and passed away from earth, to be seen no more. He had been a very hard working man, and tried to meet the demands of his family, but was so often defrauded of his wages that it kept him very poor in this world's goods. May the God of heaven bless the widow, children and friends, that when we are called we may be prepared to meet our God in peace, is my prayer.

DIED—At his late residence in Trenton, N. J., Oct. 23d, Levi Lawshe, in the 58th year of his age.

Mr. Lawshe was the husband of my youngest sister, who has long been a devoted member with the Old School Baptists. A few years ago he was slightly paralyzed, from which he never fully recovered. He had also of late suffered from heart disease. A sudden attack of obstruction of the bowels on Sunday, the 20th, attended with intense suffering, in a few hours terminated his earthly pilgrimage. He never made any public profession, but was always friendly, showing great respect to his wife's profession and to her Baptist friends. He was always very energetic and devoted to business, quite successful, and a very kind man in his family. He gave evidence in his later years of a deep interest in spiritual things, and seemed to show that discernment and earnest conviction which result from experimental knowledge. Many brethren and friends have for many years shared the hospitality and christian kindness of this family, and will now share their sorrow in this hour of sore trial.

The wife of brother Samuel E. Garrett died at their home near Philomont, in Loudoun Co., Va., Aug. 14th, 1889.

Her disease was complicated, and she suffered much at times for several years. Though she had been unwell for several days previous, her death was unexpected by her friends, as she had often recovered from similar spells before; but it would seem, from the following verses written by her on a scrap of paper, that her departure was not unexpected by herself:

"A precious one from us has gone,
A voice we loved is stilled,
A place is vacant in our home
Which never can be fill'd.

"God in his wisdom has recalled
The boon his love had given;
And though the body molders here,
The soul is safe in heaven."

Sister Garrett was baptized by Elder J. N. Badger, and united with Ebenezer Church, Loudoun Co., in September, 1884, and continued steadfast in the faith until called hence. She had a fruitful mind in the things pertaining to the kingdom, and always seemed ready to give a reason of her hope. She always had a word of encouragement for her brethren, whose welfare she had at heart, and it was a pleasure to her to minister to their comfort, both temporally and spiritually. But she has filled her allotted place in the church militant; and while we miss her, we feel that our loss is her eternal gain.

Besides a large circle of relatives and friends, she leaves a grief-stricken companion and two little boys (Tommie and Batson), to whom she was a devoted wife and mother, and who were devoted to her. May God in his infinite and inscrutable wisdom sustain and comfort the bereaved and afflicted ones, and prepare them for the "last enemy," as we believe he prepared her.

PANSON, Va.

Miss Callie Taylor united with the church in June, 1883, on a profession of faith, and her life was that of a faithful, consistent christian. She cherished a great zeal and solicitude for the church, always ready by her efforts to promote its welfare. She was an earnest christian, and her death is severely felt in the home, in the church, and in the community in which she lived and died. Her sickness extended through many weary months, and her physical suffering at times was very great; but through it all she was ever patient and uncomplaining. She bore her afflictions with christian fortitude, and with a degree of composure and cheerful resignation seldom witnessed. Her many friends visited her often during her months of suffering, and she was always pleased to see them, exerting herself to be agreeable and cheerful. Even toward the last, when she had grown so weak as to be utterly helpless, those who visited her with sad and aching hearts, knowing the end was near, were astonished at her cheerfulness, and her solicitude for their comfort. She was of a genial, social and lovable disposition, a loving friend, an affectionate sister, a devoted daughter, a faithful christian. She has gone from us—her body reposes in Evergreen Cemetery; but we feel assured that her spirit has entered into the realms of eternal bliss, and now dwells in the presence of her Savior, where there is fullness of joy, and pleasures forevermore.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ANANIAS AND SAPPHIRA.

Acts v. 1-11.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Last night I received a request by letter to say something through the SIGNS upon the subject embraced in the Scripture named above. My correspondent gave no name, but the postmark was Nolensville, Tenn., if I am not mistaken. I would have preferred writing directly to my unknown correspondent, had the name been given; as it is I will try to suggest a few thoughts for the SIGNS upon this most important theme. It is important and full of solemnity to us, because that in it we see displayed a disposition that is abhorrent to God, and the judgment of God is against those who do such things.

The wonderful scenes of the day of Pentecost were just past, and the first gospel church had just been organized. The hearts of the thousands of believers were filled with zeal and love to the cause of God and to each other. They felt themselves to be brethren indeed; and the tie that bound them together was felt to be higher and holier and nearer and dearer than any earthly relationship. It was also a time when the malice and enmity of the ungodly world about them raged very fiercely. This also served to weld their hearts more closely to each other, even as iron is softened and welded in the fire of the furnace and by the blows of the hammer. As has been the case in all ages since, so was it the case then, that many poor were among them; and such was the love and brotherly feeling among them that each one who could was anxious to minister to those who had not, and each one felt that what he had was the Lord's, and was as much for the use of his brethren as for his own. There was no command that any one should sell what he had and bring the proceeds into a common fund; neither afterward do the apostles enjoin any such thing. In fact, all that they say in their various epistles to the churches with regard to the duty of giving implies that each brother or sister was to retain his own portion of his Lord's goods and use it individually for the glory of God and the good of others. But here they were filled with perfect love, and love made them feel that they were all but children in a common family. The possessions of this world looked small. The world itself was soon to fade away. Persecution was all about them. No man said that what he had was his own, and they had all things common; and no one lacked, because those who had possessions sold them and brought the price and laid it down at the apostles' feet, and distribution was made to every man as he had need.

Now I wish to make a suggestion or two right here. The spirit in the disciples that led to this is a right spirit. It is the spirit of him who kept back nothing from his needy people, not even himself. The same spirit should actuate us in all our lives. It is Christ-like to be asking not what has our brother done, or what is he going to do, but, What can I do for the relief of my needy brother, for whom Christ died? It is Christ-like to say not, How little must I do? but, How much can I do? This is love; love such as brought Jesus down to die for us; love that can never do too much to honor God and comfort in any way his people. The same love now will lead each believer to count what he has as not his own if another is needy. A mother, out of love, counts nothing too costly for the child she bore. So was it at this pentecostal season, and for a time afterward, among the followers of Jesus.

A second suggestion is this, that they brought what they had and laid it down at the apostles' feet, that they might do with it as they would. The apostles were men inspired of God, and what they did was from heaven. Their decisions were the decisions of God. To-day they sit on thrones judging all the Israel of God in all things. We are to-day bound by their judgment. Our time, our property, our every qualification, are of right subject to their control by the commandment of God. We also ought to always bring everything that is ours and subject it to the will of the apostles, as expressed in their various letters to the churches. It is as true to-day as then, that nothing that we have is our own, that all things should be regarded as common, and that all should be held by us to do with it as the word of inspired apostles dictates. We are not commanded to have a common treasury or a community of goods, as do the Shakers, or followers of Ann Hutchison, or as is the dream of Socialists to-day; but we are commanded to hold what we have as the Lord's, and to do with it as his word requires.

It was a delightful time in the church when love filled all hearts, and union and sympathy were felt. But there is no Eden without its serpent; there is no lovely church without its blemish; there is no exaltation without its thorn in the flesh to humble us. So right here, in this garden of the Lord, so richly watered by the rivers of his grace, where the fruits of the Spirit were growing so abundantly, we are told of one spot of darkness and deceit and sin against God. By it we may learn that we need not expect to find a perfect church on earth. No matter how orderly, how loving, how zealous a church may be, we need not be surprised if we find members who bring sorrow to our hearts by some evil way which they are following.

Here we have the account of a man and wife, members of the church, and apparently as earnest and full of zeal as any others, who yet were not one in spirit with the rest. They wished, no doubt, to be thought as earnest, as loving and as zealous as any of the rest. They wished to purchase popularity, and at as cheap a rate as possible. They also sold their possessions; and then, instead of bringing all, they kept back part of the price secretly, and sought to deceive the apostles and the brethren by making as though they had brought all. They lied to God! This suggests one or two reflections. First, Peter charges upon Ananias not a wrong done to his brethren, but a sin against God. "Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost?" In this is seen a great principle of truth, which ought to control our judgment in all cases where wrong is done. It is not against man, but against God, that any of us sin. So David, after he had so grievously wronged Uriah and Bathsheba, and was aroused by the words of Nathan to see the enormity of his crime, said, "I have sinned;" and in his confession to God in the fifty-first psalm he said, "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned." The view of his sin against God swallowed up all thought of the personal wrong done to his devoted captain and his wife; and in the subject under consideration Peter was not moved by the thought of not having all this money to handle, nor by the thought that some poor ones might suffer any lack in consequence of this, but solely by the consideration that Ananias had lied to the Holy Ghost. How differently we should act if when we are wronged we always remembered that the injury to us is nothing, and the sin against God everything. So Stephen made no complaint about any personal injury, but simply thought of the sin of those who stoned him, and at the last prayed that this sin might not be laid to their charge. Does any one feel or speak or act wrong toward us, then let us also remember that they sin against God, and we shall find no room for anything but pity and a prayer for their forgiveness. If we have injured our brother in thought or word or deed, let us remember that to wrong our brother is but a small thing compared to the thought that we have sinned against God in what we have done. If we regret the wrong done our brother, which may be repaired, how much more must we repent the sin against God, which the blood of Christ alone could atone for!

The second reflection is this, that the sin was not in failing to give all into the common fund, but in the attempt to deceive involved in the matter. While the earnest love of those early Christians was prompting them to such a display of unselfish generosity as would excite the wonder of all who did not feel the same heavenly love, yet there was no command to do this. No man sinned who kept what he had in his own hand, meaning to use it himself as he might think wisest and best; but this man and woman desired a reputation for a love which they did not feel, and so endeavored to deceive their brethren. They wished credit for giving all when they gave but a part. Covetousness is abhorrent to God, but hypocrisy is still more abhorrent.

The judgment of God was not long delayed. Both this man and his wife fell down dead. The penalty was severe, but the sin was a fearful one. Lying to the Holy Ghost! The penalty was also needful as a solemn warning to the church of God in every age. It is a lesson that we need as well as they. The effect then was that great fear fell upon the church, and upon all who heard these things. No doubt the same evil leaven might have spread further, since carnal nature is alike in every one; but wherever this story should be told it would be seen that God requires truth and honesty among his people above all things else. We must not profess more love than we feel. It is bad to love but little, but it is worse when, loving little, we desire a name for loving much.

It seems to me that one of the most solemn questions for each of us to ask is this, Are we professing more than we feel? What we feel is measured by what we do. Are we claiming that we are holding all that we have at the bidding of the God whom we profess to serve, when we never think of asking, much less doing, the will of God in using what he has given us? Is our profession of love to God and his cause and his people hollow and vain, or is it real, vital and earnest? It is better to say frankly, "I do not hold all I have at the bidding of the Lord; I love my own pleasure and profit better than his will," than to act in this way while professing the opposite.

To-day, as then, there are many calls for help in a financial way in the church. The poor must be cared for, houses of worship built and maintained, the pastor, who does as he is bidden of God, devoting himself to the interests of the church, must be supported, and other calls there are for needed aid. Are any of us saying, "I am doing all I can," when we know that we are not? Are any of us refusing to lay our all at the feet of our Lord, while at the same time desiring that it should be thought that we are yielding all to him? If so, are we not bordering on this sin of Ananias and Sapphira? If we do not love the cause sufficiently to sacrifice something for it, let us frankly say so at once. Let us say, "I will give nothing for its support," and not, "I can give nothing." Let us at least be frank and honest. This, it seems to me, is the one great lesson taught by this judgment of God upon this man and this woman. It rebukes the spirit in man which desires to appear what he knows he is not. Elsewhere in the New Testament is the duty to give enjoined upon all, each one as the Lord has prospered him; but this is not the special lesson taught here, and therefore I will not enter into this theme. If any having this world's goods are withholding them, to God must they answer. If any do not love the cause they will feel it a hardship to help it in any way; and if they do help, it will be because they desire to be thought well of, and not for the glory of God. We can judge only the outward act, but God judges the heart. These two people were stricken dead literally for their deceit. Many die in an experimental and spiritual sense because of this same sin. I trust that nothing may be found contrary to truth in what I have here written.

I remain your brother in Christ,
F. A. CHICK.

REISTERSTOWN, Md., Nov. 20, 1889.

MACOMB, Ill., Nov., 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have been requested by very dear brethren and sisters of late to write something again for the SIGNS; and I also feel a desire to pen a few thoughts for our dear family paper, which comes to us each week so filled with able communications and sweet experiences that it would seem there is nothing lacking. Still I have a desire to add my testimony, although when I examine myself and behold how imperfect and unworthy, how sinful, how vile, and how far short I come of living as I would like to live, much less as one who has professed the name of Christ, I feel I should not attempt to write. But could I write as I wish to, or as others do, it seems to me it would prove a pleasant task. I think of those who have requested me to write, who, it seems, are capable of speaking comfortably to Jerusalem, but who seldom write for the public, and I feel my unfitness and incapability all the more. And whether these desires or impressions are from a right source or not, I cannot tell; but I hope I take a deep interest in the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, and prefer Jerusalem above my chief joy. Should I say anything from which the least one can glean a crumb of comfort, I will be more than paid, and to God's dear name be all the praise; for we know we cannot of ourselves do anything good. But God works in us, to will and to do of his own good pleasure.

First of all, I wish to tell you all of some good meetings I have been privileged to attend during this season. In June I attended the yearly meeting of the church where my membership is. There were eleven ministers present, and brother H. E. Puris was ordained to the work of the ministry. It was a solemn occasion to me. Brother Puris, in a very feeling and impressive manner, gave account of his travels from nature to grace, his call to the ministry, and all the way the Lord had led him, even from a far distant state to this place, and to the people of God. Not many dry eyes were there. How solemn the sight, to see him kneeling, and all those venerable soldiers of the cross who placed their hands upon his head, while prayer was offered, and the charge delivered. Much feeling was manifested while the hand of fellowship was given. During the three days meeting I heard much good preaching. No means or inventions of men found place, but "Salvation is of the Lord" was the theme from first to last. Surely the gospel was preached in its purity. Elder B. F. Querry, an able minister, and who had never been with us before, preached much to the comfort and consolation of the saints. I came home, my little hope strengthened, my faith renewed, and felt built up in the most holy faith.

Then on the first of September I was permitted to attend our annual association, held about sixty miles from us. I enjoyed this meeting very much, and heard the truth of the Lord proclaimed through the gospel. This was not a very large association, nor many ministering brethren present; but all met together in peace and harmony. The preaching was all of the same piece, and had the same joyful sound. "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound." Surely the Primitive Baptists are that people; for it seems to me no other people know the true gospel sound, and preach it, and feed on it, but the Primitive Baptists. They seem to be the most loving, the most forgiving, the most humble, of any people. They seem always ready to instruct, and speak words of comfort to those who wish to hear. This all seemed so plain to me at this meeting. Elder Ketchum was present (with other dear friends) at this meeting, and it seems he never tires. I am sure no one tires of listening to his words of instruction and wisdom, and hearing him expound the Scriptures, which he does in such a plain, forcible manner that it seems the least can understand it; and while he preached from the verse beginning with these words, "Our Father which art in heaven," it seemed he was handing a morsel to each one of us. I felt he was enabled to place the food in the lower troughs, where little ones like myself could get a crumb; yes, not only a crumb, but we were filled with the good things of the kingdom. I often think of this meeting, and of the many dear friends I met there. I ever will remember them, and those little fireside chats, and the sweet singing I enjoyed.

Now I want to tell you of the good meeting at our church, which I attended three weeks ago. There were four teams went up from our neighborhood, a distance of twenty miles, to be at this meeting. Elder Warren, Elder B. F. Querry and my father (I. N. Vanmeter) were present, and all preached much to our comfort. On Saturday, after preaching, when the opportunity was given, two of my sisters (Mrs. Mary Shields, who was visiting at my father's, from Missouri, and sister Sue) came forward; and after telling the church what the Lord had done for them, they were received with joy, and the next morning was appointed for their baptism. Then at night meeting my brother's wife, and two daughters of Deacon Holeman, came forward, and our hearts were again made glad while hearing these tell of their joys, sorrows and deliverances, and who were gladly received, with the other two. Then the next morning, when a large congregation met at the water for baptism, sister Mattie came forward and said she could not go home without being baptized, if they would receive her; and, telling her feelings to all, she was welcomed with joy and gladness, and all six were baptized by Elder Querry. All seemed very happy in discharging their duty, and came out of the water praising the Lord. Sister Mary, who was three hundred miles from home, felt almost overjoyed, and said she had been waiting twenty years for this, and that she wished always to live with this dear people. We all repaired to the church-house, where, after preaching, we all partook of the Lord's supper. It was a joyful meeting for the whole church, and we felt it was good to be there, and felt to praise the Lord for bringing in his chosen ones, and leading them in the path of duty. My dear father and mother were much rejoiced at seeing their children brought into the fold in their declining years. I felt it to be, as Elder Querry remarked, that "The Lord is always better than we think he is." Yes, I felt truly that this was the case with me. For at this meeting I was made to look back to the time, five years ago that day, at this same place, when I was buried beneath the yielding wave, and, I trust, arose to newness of life. All came vividly before my mind, the bright, clear, calm day. All nature was at rest, and so it was with me. Nature was not more peaceful and calm than were my own feelings; and these words seemed mine, "My peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled." No, I was not troubled about anything. Yes, I tasted the sweet fruits of obedience; for the Lord has promised rest to those who take his yoke upon them and obey his commands. Yes, one day spent in his courts is worth a thousand spent in the tents of wickedness. All the wealth and honors of this world are not to be compared to the peace and enjoyment which God bestows on his obedient children.

I wish to say to those dear ones who have just named the name of Christ, that I hope they are wiser than I was at the time I was baptized; for I truly thought my sorrows were over, and felt that "I should be carried to the skies

On flowery beds of ease."

And,

"I could not believe
That I ever should grieve,
That I ever should suffer again."

But I soon began to realize that "I must fight if I would reign." For, dear ones, there is a continual warfare between the flesh and the Spirit, and you still have your evil nature to contend with, which I find to be my worst enemy. I hope and trust your path may not lead you through so many trials, sorrows and manifold temptations as my way has led me, or, I trust the Lord has led me through it all; for I believe he leads us through the darkness as well as the light. I pray he may lead you all into the marvelous light and liberty of his dear children. But God's people are an afflicted and poor people. Not only are they poor in temporal things, but spiritually poor; no righteousness of their own to plead; no good works nor great things they have done to bring them into favor with God or to appease his wrath; but after wasting all their own strength in prayers, supplications and tears, they are made to trust in the name of the Lord, and find in him is everlasting strength. Though poor, sinful and unworthy, the promise is theirs. For Christ says, "Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Thus we see the very characters that compose the church of Christ, or the kingdom of heaven, are the poor, the halt, the lame and the blind; and when we are enabled to thus view ourselves, and look to Christ, who is our righteousness, we can rejoice. I feel like sister Belle Irwin expressed herself in the last SIGNS, that though she had been a visible member of the church for eleven years, she was but a poor, halting sinner yet. Thus it is with me. I have no more hope of performing any good thing than I had five years ago, and do not seem to be getting any better, or any further away from my deceitful heart or sinful nature, but am nothing but a poor, unworthy, stumbling sinner. But one thing have I learned, not to put any confidence in myself, but to hope and trust in the Lord; for he alone has the words of eternal life. He can comfort us when cast down. He has promised to be with us in all our trials, and has said he will not forsake us. "In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." Then may we look unto him for grace, for help, for strength. May he be with us, lead us, guide us, direct us, be our Father, our Savior and our God.

We much enjoyed a visit at our house from Elder Querry a short time ago, and hope soon to see him again; also brother Puris. We were sadly disappointed in not seeing him at our meeting at Greenbush. We expected to see him there, and to hear him preach the unsearchable riches of Christ. Now, to those who requested me to write, and to all who may read this, I leave these rambling thoughts. They are full of imperfections, and are not like I wish them to be, and not what I even intended to write. But I trust you will overlook all that is amiss, and know that I remember you all in love.

Now, dear editors, please forgive me for thus trespassing on your valuable time with such a lengthy scribble. Do with this as you think best, and all will be well. May God keep you, and all his chosen people, is my desire and prayer.

Unworthily,

SARAH E. RUNKLE.

NEW HOPE, Ark., July 25, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I am called upon to give my views on Matt. iii. 12, which reads, "Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into his garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."

Those words were spoken by John the Baptist, the harbinger or forerunner of Christ. He was addressing the Pharisees and Sadducees, who had demanded baptism of John, without bringing forth fruits meet for repentance; without giving any evidence of fruit in Christ, or an experience of grace, or evidence of the new birth, all of which amount to the same in meaning. Then upon what did they expect to receive the ordinance of baptism? Why, they expected to receive it upon the very thing that they received the ordinances under the law; that is, because they were Abraham's literal seed. But John said to them, "O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?" John knew that they had not been warned by the Spirit of God. And the children of God know, when an individual presents himself to the church, being a Pharisee, expecting admittance and baptism upon what great things he has done, instead of what great things the Lord has done for him, that he has never been taught of the Spirit. John said, "Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance." John was the first gospel minister or preacher. The apostles required evidence of faith, an experience of grace; and so do true gospel ministers require the same now. This is what makes the distinction between the wheat and the chaff. "And think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." Plain testimony this that the Jews as a nation were not all to be saved, and that Gentiles were not to be rejected from church privileges under the gospel dispensation; that is, those of them who should bring forth fruits meet for repentance; for they were included in the great plan of salvation. "Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." This is the same as saying, You need not think you will be saved because you are literal Jews; for God is able of these stony hearted Gentiles to raise up children to Abraham. John had an eye to the coming in of the Gentiles. Jesus said, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one Shepherd."—John x. 16. "They are not all Israel which are of Israel: neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children; but, In Isaac shall thy seed be called."—Rom. ix. 6, 7. "And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire." Not so with national Israel under the law dispensation. But now the law dispensation is accomplished and brought to a close, and the gospel dispensation is here at hand. For John preached, saying, "Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." "The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached."—Luke xvi. 16. "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire." John is here prophesying of that which was to come upon the disciples on the day of Pentecost, when they were both filled and overwhelmed with the Spirit, and with the everlasting love of God. This love I understand to be that baptism of fire; for love is one of the attributes of God. John says, "God is love." And it is written, "Our God is a consuming fire." Also, it is written in the prophecy of Malachi, "And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness." "Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor." We view this as setting forth the condition of the children of God, or the church under the law dispensation. Under the old covenant the unbelieving as well as the believing Jews could prove that they were the peculiar people of God, or the chosen of God. The unbelieving Jews had the same right to the Jewish ordinances that the believing Jews had. Those were typical ordinances. "For see, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount."—Heb. viii. 5. This, we say, was to illustrate the condition of God's people under the law dispensation. The wheat and the chaff were mixed together upon the floor; the saints and the hypocrites; the believers and the unbelievers. Those who worshiped God by faith, through types and shadows, sacrifices and offerings, looked forward by faith to the coming of the Messiah, the true substance, the great antitype, and to the offering of Jesus, which was equal to the demands of justice; for without the shedding of blood there could be no remission of sins. And it was not possible that the sacrifices and offerings under the law, the blood of slain beasts, should take away sin. But those unbelieving Jews, which the chaff represents, only looked to those sacrifices and offerings, the blood of those slain beasts, for cleansing, healing, justification, life and salvation. Now to prove this, the Scriptures testify that they were looking for an earthly monarch, to come in pomp and splendor; for a temporal deliverer, instead of one born of poor parentage, a meek and lowly babe of Bethlehem; and consequently when Christ came those unbelieving Jews, represented by the chaff, would not receive him as the true Messiah. They would not have the man Christ Jesus to reign over them. For thus it is written, "He came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name; which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."—John i. 11-13. Those who received him are the wheat, though mixed with the chaff, until the fanning should take place, or the purging of the floor; which fanning began with the preaching and baptism of John. John was the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ.—See Mark i. 1. This fanning and purging of the floor has been going on ever since, and will continue until the last heir of salvation shall be brought in. Then will be the final separation of the wheat and the chaff, of the sheep and the goats, of the wheat and the tares. Then will the wheat be gathered into the garner; the gathering of the saints, the elect, into those eternal joys and eternal bliss prepared for them before the foundation of the world; into those mansions the blessed Savior has prepared for them in his Father's house.

By the burning of the chaff with unquenchable fire, I understand is meant their being cast into hell, with all the nations that forget God, forever to endure his wrath; into perpetual, eternal darkness, with a guilty and condemned conscience; into that lake of fire where the beast and false prophet are. This is the second death. In a word, I understand this unquenchable fire to be eternal vengeance.—Read Matt. xxv. 31-46; Rev. xx. 12-15.

The Lord Jesus holds the fan in his hand, and uses it to purge and cleanse his floor, or to separate the wheat and chaff. I conclude that the ministers of the glorious gospel of the blessed God are the fan; for he holds the seven stars in his right hand, while he walks in the midst of the golden candlesticks. "The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches."—Rev. i. 20. The Lord holds his ministers in his own hand, and uses them to cleanse or purify his floor, or church. And how does he do it? He calls them with a holy and high calling; for "no man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron."—Heb. v. 4. He fills his ministers with the Holy Spirit, inflames their hearts with his love, gives them a zeal for truth, and enables them to speak forth the things that pertain to the kingdom of God and his glory, the salvation of his people, and the glorious blessings and comforts he bestows on them. None but he uses the fan, his ministers, in preaching the gospel. This has a separating effect, drawing a line of distinction between truth and error, good and bad, light and darkness, life and death, law and gospel, grace and works, wicked and righteous, the true church and the false, and between ministers of the gospel and false teachers. Again, he uses his fan to keep the institutions, laws and ordinances of men out of his church, and to cause the members of his church to adhere strictly to the law of Christ, their Head and only Lawgiver. Thus the separation is going on.

I have only hinted at the subject, but must close. My health is very poor, and I am very nervous. If you think this will be profitable to the household of faith, correct errors and publish it. I desire an interest in the prayers of all God's dear children.

Dear brethren and sisters, write on. It is indeed meat and drink to read the SIGNS in my affliction and old age.

I remain, I hope, your brother in affliction,

J. C. FOX.

THOMASVILLE, Ga., Nov. 6, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I do not feel worthy to address you as such, nor to write a word, nor to take upon my sinful lips the precious name of Jesus; but I have a desire to let the children of our blessed Lord know what he has done for such a poor, unworthy sinner as I am. We all need the prayers and sympathy of each other; and how can we know each other unless we speak to each other? My native home is in Sampson County, North Carolina. As I was brought up entirely with Arminians, I deem it necessary to explain what they taught. I was brought into the Sabbath School while a very small boy, and was told by those who taught me to give my heart to God; that Jesus had died for me, and had purchased eternal life for me on condition; that I had to meet God half-way; that I had to arise and go to my heavenly Father, or I would be forever lost and damned. I could not bear such a thought, and so tried to work my way to heaven as they taught me. But I soon saw that it was too hard a task for me to perform, and so gave it up. I was ashamed of myself, and said I never would try to pray again. Some time after this there came a very strange feeling on my mind. I began to feel miserable. I felt that I needed help beyond the help of poor, frail man. It seemed the Lord was pleased to show me that there was no power in man to give me relief. I often thought of the words,

"O where shall rest be found—Rest for the weary soul?"

One day, while at my daily toil, the Lord was pleased to humble me. I fell on my knees to the cold ground, and asked God to be merciful to me, a poor sinner. It did seem that there was a compelling power I could not overcome; and, thank God, from that day until this I have felt the same compelling power, which forces me to yield. My pen fails to describe my feelings, the anguish of soul I then underwent. By and by the storm ceased, the burden of guilt that had been crushing me down left me, and I felt that my sins were all forgiven. Everything seemed to be perfectly lovely, and to be praising God. The sun seemed to shine brighter, and the birds to sing sweeter. My joy was inexpressible and full of glory, and these precious words were ringing in my ears, "Christians, I am on my journey;

Ere I reach the narrow sea
I would tell the wondrous story,
What the Lord has done for me."

Finally this precious season was followed by doubts and fears, sometimes fearing that all this was only imaginary. Yet if I am saved, I am a poor sinner saved by grace alone.

I was surrounded by everything but what was favorable to the cause of our blessed Lord. I had no one to talk to who had any desire to hear from me, nor to return any words of comfort to me. This work in me brought about quite a change, which caused me to live a life of severe trial and persecution. My greatest desire was to learn more of Jesus and his love. I loved to read God's blessed word. I could not pray, nor could I talk about Jesus and heaven, nor had any one to talk to me. It did seem to me that I could not bear it.

Some time after this I wanted to be baptized, and so connected myself with the Missionary Baptists, and was immersed by them; but it gave me no relief of mind. Still the warfare was great, and it seemed that the Lord intended for me to pursue a different way. The members of that church and of others would not hear to my belief. The Lord was pleased to reveal his precious truth to me in part, sufficient to give me a great desire to learn more of his holy and righteous will. I am glad to say that I had no desire to drive it away.

At last God saw that it was best for me to leave my native home in North Carolina, and he led me to the home of my dear brother and sister, in Thomasville, Georgia. This was in the year 1888. When I left North Carolina I had never heard a Primitive Baptist preach, and had met but two of their members in all my life. It was the honest desire of my heart to remain with the Missionaries. When I arrived at my brother's home in Georgia, after a few days my brother and sister asked me to tell them of my hope. I gave them a relation of my experience, as I have tried to do in this letter, and they told me I was no Missionary Baptist, but was a Primitive Baptist. They said the Missionaries would not allow me to express my mind among them, as I had just expressed it to them. Their kind words to me caused me to think very seriously and prayerfully upon this all-important subject. It did seem to me that I never could give up some of my ideas of the Scriptures, which was a burden to my very soul. I took it all to our blessed Lord in prayer, who soon gave me sweet relief. I am glad to say that my brother and sister were members of the Primitive Baptist Church. O what a change there was in my life! Before that time I had no one to encourage me; but now I had a brother and sister who were anxious to hear from and to talk to me. It seemed like old things had passed away, and the home of my brother and sister has been a little heaven below. It is the dearest spot on earth to me. Day after day we had such good times, and the Lord was pleased to meet with us daily. It was not long before the Lord was pleased to send a dear brother, a Primitive Baptist preacher, to my brother's house. We had just been talking about Jesus and heaven as the dear old brother came in. I loved his very presence. If I ever enjoyed the presence of our blessed Lord, it was with that dear brother that day. I believe that the Spirit of Jesus Christ was with us, and blessed our weary souls.

It was not long before there came two more dear brethren, who were Primitive Baptist preachers. I do believe the Lord had a purpose in sending those dear brethren to us, to show me the way in which I should go. I still prayed with all the earnestness of my heart that God would continue to give me more light on this all-important subject. The Bible seemed like a new book to me. All the precious promises that we read in God's blessed word I then saw were to the church of God, instead of the world. God's holy law was my meditation day and night.

A very short time after this I was lying on my bed. I was not asleep, for I could not sleep. I was made to think of the birth of Jesus. I do not know when I had ever thought of that Scripture before. We are told that the wise men were directed by a star that went before them, until it came and stood over the place where the young child was. My mind was directed in the same way, back to the first time that God was pleased to bless my poor soul. And it had led me all along, from one thing to another, to the home of my brother and sister, and at last to the conversation of the dear old Primitive Baptist preachers who had called at our home. Then my poor heart was running over with joy. I cannot express my feelings. I loved those dear children of God. I wanted to see them and be with them. I still waited, and still dreaded to give up my old faith. But I was so glad that the Lord was pleased to show me my error, and to teach me so plainly the way in which he intended me to go. I knew I never could live with the Missionaries any more, and resolved at least to offer myself to the dear children of God, if they would have me. On February 16th, 1889, I went to a Primitive Baptist Church. The dear old brother that first called at our home was pastor of that church. After preaching, the door of the church was opened, and I could wait no longer. I told the church what I believed the Lord had done for me. I was received, and on the next day was baptized by that dear old brother, the first Primitive Baptist preacher I ever talked with. We know there is no power in the water to save us, but there is the answer of a good conscience in obedience to our Lord's command. I did not feel that I was worthy of such a privilege. I cannot tell you how happy I felt when the brother led me out of the water. I am made to know that we are saved by grace alone, which is the gift of God. All that the poor sinner is to do is to live in obedience to our Lord's commands, after being brought to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus.

"How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord,
Is laid for your faith in his excellent word."

Yes, it is firm. Who can weary of telling of the loving-kindness of the Lord? Let us speak often one to another of him. I love to rest upon the precious promises of God, who chose us in Christ before the foundation of the world. How much there is to cheer and console. Just think of the security of the humble child of God. May God help us all to be humble, and faithful to our blessed Lord.

Now, dear brethren, I have tried to tell you what the Lord has done for your unworthy brother. It is left with you to dispose of as you think best, and I will be satisfied. Please correct all mistakes.

Your unworthy brother in hope of life through Christ alone,

W. J. LEWIS.

JUSTUS, Pa., Nov. 19, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have many times felt a desire to write to you; but being only a babe in Christ, and feeling a deep sense of my weakness, unworthiness and total inability to write anything that would interest or comfort any of God's little ones, if you should see fit to give it a place in your paper, I have put it off from time to time, in the hope that if this desire originated in my natural mind, which is enmity against God and the truth (for God is truth), it would cease to trouble me. Believing you have that brotherly kindness and charity for the little, weak and trembling ones which will enable you to overlook the errors and blunders of one so ignorant as I am, I will endeavor to express some of my feeble thoughts; and should I be able by grace divine to say anything worth your notice, do with it as you think best.

First, I want to say that God's dear people at this place, known as the Abbington Old School Baptist Church, of which I am an unworthy member, are in harmony, dwelling together in the unity of the Spirit and in the bond of peace. What a great blessing the Lord has bestowed upon me, in giving me a home here with his people, where fellowship and love abound, each one esteeming their brethren better than themselves. My prayer to God is that I may be kept by his sovereign grace from bringing a reproach upon his people; and, if it be his will, that he may give me that growth in grace and in the knowledge of the truth that will enable me to walk as becomes a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus. We have the gospel preached to us once a month by that devoted and faithful servant of God, Elder D. M. Vail. Elder Jenkins was here in August, Elder Durand in October, and Elder Bundy was with us last evening. They all preach Jesus Christ and him crucified, which is the only theme of a true gospel sermon. They gave undoubted evidence that they had been with Jesus, and had received of that anointing which was upon our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ when he was sent to preach good tidings unto the meek, to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and to open the doors of the prison to them that are bound. Truly there is but one Preacher who can do a poor sinner any good while he is in a state of captivity.

"None but Jesus, none but Jesus,
Can do helpless sinners good."

But when Jesus speaks even the dead hear his voice; and they that hear shall live. How assuring, how comforting, to one who has heard the voice of the Son of God bidding him live, are the immutable wills and shalls of our immutable God. "And thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." O blessed thought! Jesus, our Lord and Savior, left the bright regions of eternal glory, and came into the world to save poor, guilty and justly condemned sinners. For "this is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief." He has power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father gave him. This number embraced all the election of grace, all who were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world; and he has declared that he will raise them up again at the last day. Having met and fulfilled the divine requisitions of the just and holy law by which they were held in bondage, he has redeemed them from the curse of that law, and by one offering (when he laid down his life on the cross) has perfected them forever. "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died." And, thanks be to God, "by his stripes we are healed." What blasphemy to doubt for a moment the words of our blessed Savior when he said, "It is finished;" or to think that our salvation depends on anything we can do; or that Jesus, who has all power in heaven and in earth, did not accomplish the object for which he came into the world, but that poor, puny man, whose breath is in his nostrils, must help him. God's people are saved, and called with a holy calling, not according to their works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given them in Christ Jesus before the world began. This salvation is made manifest to a poor sinner when Jesus appears to him as his Savior and bids him live. I have many doubts in regard to my being one of the Lord's redeemed. I cannot by any power of natural reasoning see how God could be just and save such a miserable, justly condemned sinner as I am. I have heard people say that if they believed the doctrine of eternal, unconditional election, and the predestination of all things, they would have their fill of sin, as God would save them, no matter what they did. But God's people, who have the love of God shed abroad in their hearts, do not feel like this; for they are continually mourning on account of sin, which reigns in their mortal bodies; and, like Paul, they are made to exclaim, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" I feel that I love the brethren. I enjoy meeting with them and hearing them tell of the glorious work of salvation by grace. I love to hear God's servants speak of the sovereign grace of God in bringing poor sinners from nature's darkness into his most marvelous light, translating them into the kingdom of his dear Son.

I have not written as I intended. Do with it as you think best.

G. W. GOODRICH.

CAMP HILL, Ala., Nov. 13, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—Inclosed please find two dollars, for which give me credit on the SIGNS. I have been from home some time, and miss very much the opportunity of reading the SIGNS, which I esteem quite a privilege. I have visited several associations this year. They were well attended, and there seems to be a spirit of unity among the Lord's people; and I am glad to know that where they differ some in mind about some things, there seems to be a disposition to "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," which is encouraging. There is in some places a strong opposition to the doctrine of absolute predestination, as it is called; yet it does not amount to a division. Some, however, seem to think that it ought to be a bar to fellowship, and would advise the closing of the pulpit against those who preach it; but there are but few of this opinion, so far as I know. We hope that no such step as that will be taken, as it would destroy the comfort of many saints. There is a great deal of comfort in the doctrine to me; and if I had never experienced it, I could not receive nor believe it. Through much tribulation and trials we see that this doctrine is the grand base doctrine, and all the doctrine of the Scriptures rests upon this doctrine; and this doctrine is the doctrine of God our Savior. "He is before all things, and by him all things consist." We are let to see the necessity of all things being just as they are, when by revelation we enter into the mystery of godliness; and it is then that we can conceive the mystery of iniquity also. If things were not just as they are, I have no idea how they would be; neither need I to be anxious to know. But since I am taught that "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose," and that God "works all things after the counsel of his own will," that is enough for me to know. Why do we believe such doctrine? Because it is popular? No. Because it is consistent with human reason? No. Because it is embraced in the law? No. Because others do not believe it? No. Because we heard some one preach it? No. Because we read of it from some able pen? No. Why then do we believe it? Because it has been revealed to us, and we find it in the word of God. The doctrine of revelation is also a hard doctrine to be believed by some people, because they have had no experience therein. They do not comprehend the idea that as Abraham slew the five kings, and met Melchisedec on his return and was blessed, that his faith was the cause of the triumph, and enabled him to meet Melchisedec. So does faith now enable us to triumph over our five senses, and meet Christ in the revelation of this glorious knowledge, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. "God be thanked that ye were the servants of sin; but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered unto you." His hand hath formed the crooked serpent. These are parts of his ways; but the thunder of his power who can understand? He formed the light and created darkness. He is God, and besides him there is none else.

"My God, I would not long to see
My fate with curious eyes,
What gloomy lines are writ for me,
Or what bright scenes may rise.

"In thy fair book of life and grace
O may I find my name
Recorded in some humble place,
Beneath my Lord, the Lamb."

With best of wishes for the editors, correspondents and readers of the SIGNS, I subscribe myself yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

FREMONT, Texas, July 3, 1889.

DEAR KINDRED IN CHRIST:—It is in much weakness and fear that I attempt to write a few lines, to bear testimony to the doctrine of God our Savior. Paul says, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Thus we learn what the Scriptures are for. At times we read that blessed book, and by the Spirit can claim the precious promises as our own. There are many doctrines in the world, and even among those claiming to be Old School Baptists we hear different sounds. Surely the time has come which the Spirit speaks of, when some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils. We hear some of them saying that there is too much doctrine preached; that the ministry ought to preach practical godliness. But if I know anything of it, it all goes together. Paul said, "Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine." My dear friends, you will never kill the church of God by preaching his doctrine. Preach Jesus, the way, the truth and the life. Exhort his children to practice what they know. They shall all know him, from the least to the greatest of them; and they will believe in him. "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." Paul said to Titus, "This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto men." All that we need we find in Jesus. In him all fullness dwells. Then let us earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints. It is called the faith of God's elect. But it does not please the carnal mind; for the carnal mind is enmity against God, is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. Let us look unto him who has but to speak, and it is done; who commands, and it stands fast; who declared the end from the beginning, saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Then fear not; for our God reigns, and works all things after the counsel of his own will, according to his eternal purpose, which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord. Let us not call the predestination of God in all things cold fatalism, as some do. The doctrine that some call "Beebe doctrine" is what I love, and I believe it is the doctrine of God our Savior. I never saw anything in the editorials I have read in the SIGNS that I did not believe, as far as I could understand. May it please God to put all differences and evil speaking far from all his people; and let us not strive for the mastery, but endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Brethren Beebe, do with this as you please and think best.

Yours in love,

J. A. RUTLEDGE.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—After finishing the business part of my letter, I feel like writing a few lines for the SIGNS, to tell its many readers of some of the joyous seasons and good meetings that I, a poor, unworthy being, have been permitted to enjoy. This fall I attended the Pine Forest Association, in Ozark County, Missouri, which began on Saturday before the third Sunday in September, and continued three days. I think it is an Old, Regular, Primitive Baptist Association in order. The preaching was all of a piece. No uncertain sound was heard. The theme was Jesus Christ and him crucified, the only Savior of lost and ruined sinners. There were several very able ministers present. Elders Henry Braziel, F. J. Johnson, William Dunham and Z. Wiseman occupied the stand on Sunday. I believe the Lord was with us. I shall never forget the good meetings, the love and fellowship that was manifested. I returned home, and on the fourth Sunday in September had the pleasure of baptizing a brother and a sister in the fellowship of our little church. We had a good meeting, having partaken of the Lord's supper and washed each other's feet.

On the first Sunday in October we constituted Little Hope Church. On Saturday before the fourth Sunday in October we met at my house and agreed to constitute an association on Saturday before the second Sunday in September, 1890, to meet with Enon Church; Elder E. S. Casey to preach the introductory sermon, and Elder Joel Sinar his alternate. Elder F. J. Johnson was with us, from White County, Missouri. We had a good meeting. The association will be composed of three churches, to wit, Enon, Little Hope and Salem. We hope the Lord will bless us, and the true cause be made to prosper. May God bless all his children, and enable them to do their whole duty.

WM. J. CASEY.

NORTH BERWICK, Maine, Nov. 23, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN:—I will say that the last days of June I was taken sick with a severe cold, and it caused me to have the typhoid fever and pneumonia, and for some weeks I seemed to hang between life and death. The doctor and others could not see any way that I could pull through it; but after about three weeks the fever left me, as weak as an infant, and from that time to this I have been gaining strength by littles, so that last Sunday I preached at the meeting-house, and last Tuesday I rode three miles and preached at a funeral. I am weak yet, but can walk a short distance very well. I had the very best care that could be had from a large number of brethren, sisters and kind friends, for which I return my best thanks.

Yours as ever,

WM. QUINT.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I am still living in northwest Kansas, and have not heard an Old School or Primitive Baptist preach since I have been in the west. All the preaching I get is through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I want to say that I thank you for still sending the paper to me. I want it as long as I live and can pay for it. I wish you would publish this in the SIGNS, that if there are any brethren or sisters in this section who are taking the paper they may know where I live, and that I am almost alone. There are only two here that I can call sister, that I know of. I have meeting at my home on the first Sunday in each month, when I try to speak in the name of my Lord and Savior. If any will come I will give them a hearty welcome; and if any of the brethren should chance to pass through here I would love for them to give me a call, as I am almost alone.

I will close, hoping the Lord may be with you and all the dear brethren, and keep you as the apple of his eye.

Your brother, I hope,

STEPHEN MURPHY.

REPLY.

"AND I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."—Matt. xvi. 18, 19.

Much has been spoken and written in discussing the words of our Lord to which our attention is called by this inquiry. It is generally understood that the whole system of the papal hierarchy claims to find its basis in this declaration. Assuming that Peter was divinely exalted by this gift as superior to the other apostles, carnal pride has prompted ambitious men to claim the same authority as his successors. Not having the power of God for their support in this usurpation, the sword of civil government has been used to enforce the obedience of the nations to the mandates of the Pope. The records of history are red with the bloodshed resulting from this gross misapplication of the text, in which the saints are known to have been cruelly persecuted, and many of them slain, because of their refusal to acknowledge the blasphemous pretensions of this antichristian combination. While it is not necessary that our readers be told that this is not the meaning of the words under consideration, it is not clear to some at least just what is the true import of this portion of the inspired record of the language of our Lord. Unquestionably Jesus spoke nothing but what is strictly and unalterably true in this case as well as at all times. But it does not follow that our understanding is always correct when we suppose that we have received his word. Scriptural expressions may be detached from the connection in which the inspired writers were moved to record them, and by misapplication they may be made to conflict with other expressions of the same revealed truth. This is handling the word of God deceitfully. The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy; and unless our understanding of the meaning of any text harmonizes with the whole testimony of the Scriptures, it is manifest that we are mistaken in our view. The whole record of inspiration is one testimony, and if any conflict could be found in it, the result would be that the whole must be rejected as unworthy of credit. It must be altogether true, else it is altogether false. It is not our purpose to try to convince any unbeliever of the truth of the record which God has given. If we could succeed in such an attempt, they could only have the belief which causes devils to tremble. God has reserved to himself the work of giving the knowledge and love of his truth to sinners. With all the light of nature, and with all the education of which the carnal mind is susceptible, the Lord declares that "All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him."—Matt. xi. 27. This is the rock of eternal truth upon which rests the whole "house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth."—1 Tim. iii. 15.

"And I say also unto thee." This solemn form of expression marks the importance of the truth declared. It is no general announcement of a principle without special reference to the time and circumstances under which it was presented. When Jesus speaks to one of his chosen followers it is not an address which might as well be applied to some other person. He always discriminates and singles out the very individual to whom he designs his word to come with power. His word does not go about seeking one to receive it. It comes expressly to that one unto whom it is sent by its omnipotent Author. The same word is indeed spoken with power to every one of the vessels of mercy; but it comes to each one in the solitude of his own heart, and he knows that he is the very subject of its address as clearly as did the sons of Zebedee, or the persecuting Saul of Tarsus. That is not the word of Jesus which requires the eloquence of some trained elocutionist to give it the attention of the sinner to whom it is addressed. He says, "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life."—John vi. 63. It is not needful that power should attend his word, because that word itself is "quick [that is, living] and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart."—Heb. iv. 12. That word is not spoken by any mortal tongue, nor is it heard by the natural ear. When God speaks to the sinner, although his voice shakes the earth in its application to him, it is not heard by his most intimate associates.

"That thou art Peter." To the natural mind it seems that there was no necessity for the Lord to tell this disciple that he was Peter, as it is recorded that this name was given him by Jesus when he was brought to him by his brother Andrew.—John i. 42. But there is a far deeper significance in this expression than the mere identification of the man addressed. If that were all that was meant by the words, there would have been no need of their being left on record for the instruction of the saints in subsequent ages. By faith those who are led by the Spirit of God are shown in this language not only an important reproof and admonition to that zealous disciple, forbidding the self-confidence to which he was strongly inclined, but individually every saint has need of the same divine instruction. The revelation which he had received of God, by which he was enabled to recognize Jesus as “the Christ, the Son of the living God,” had not changed his identity as a sinful man, in himself dead as an inanimate stone.—See John i. 42, marginal definition. Throughout the whole system of that salvation which is revealed in our Lord Jesus, every manifestation of divine grace clearly forbids creature boasting. This express declaration of Jesus forbids the claim of superiority which carnal religionists have sought to establish for this apostle. With all the grace bestowed upon him he is only Peter, that is, a lifeless stone, destitute of ability to do anything of himself. While this is true of him as a chosen apostle of Jesus, it is much more manifest that every sinner saved by grace is utterly without strength in himself. Thus boasting is excluded by the law of faith.—Rom. iii. 27. The sinner in whom Christ is revealed as the hope of glory is in himself only a guilty sinner still. All his righteousness is in Jesus, “who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.”—1 Cor. i. 30, 31.

“And upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.” There is but one character presented in the Scriptures as represented by the rock which Jesus here declares to be the foundation upon which he will build his church. Of our God Moses sings, “He is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he.”—Deut. xxxii. 4. In the revelation which this God has given of himself by the word of inspiration he is described as being the Truth. It is in this character that he appears as the Rock upon which the whole building of his church is founded. He says, “I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed.”—Mal. iii. 6. Surely this foundation is firm and secure. Since the members composing this church were chosen in Christ “before the foundation of the world,” it is evident that the foundation of that everlasting monument of divine grace cannot be of any temporal origin. The church of Jesus was established in the eternal counsel of God before the creation of the material worlds. Indeed, all the natural universe may be regarded as the mere temporary scaffolding of the everlasting house of God, which is the church of the living God. All the wonderful works and sufferings of the Son of God were but the manifestation of that eternal purpose of God in the building of his church. That this heavenly house should rest upon so frail a basis as the disciple Peter is too absurd for argument in the view of those who know the infinite wisdom of God. While that chosen apostle was a stone in that glorious building, he derived all his life from the Spirit of Christ by which he was quickened. In common with all the subjects of redeeming grace, Peter himself must rest upon that foundation of the apostles and prophets, which is Jesus Christ; “For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.”—1 Cor. iii. 11. So far was Peter from having power of himself to withstand the assault of the combined “gates of hell” that he was overcome by the accusation of a damsel.—Matt. xxvi. 69-75. The Builder of the church of God is not so simple as to choose a foundation so unreliable as Peter. By reference to the verse preceding our text it will be seen that the Lord there declares the only source from which the knowledge of himself as the Christ can come. This is by the direct revelation of that knowledge from the Father which is in heaven. This is the rock of eternal truth upon which the church is built by our spiritual Zerubbabel. His hands have laid the foundation of this house, and his hands have finished it. He did not fail nor become discouraged. The whole work of building the church was committed to him; and in his resurrection glory he beholds that work completed.

The gates of hell include all the devices of sin and Satan. All the powers of iniquity and enmity against God were combined against the fulfillment of this great work of our Redeemer; but he triumphed over them, and accomplished all the work which he came to do. The gates of hell signify the various ways by which the powers of iniquity come forth in assailing the subjects of grace, who are the materials of which the church of Christ is built. It often seems to them that these terrible gates are surely about to prevail against them; but when they are brought low the great Builder appears for their deliverance, and at his word every enemy is instantly destroyed. So he gives the victory to his helpless little ones in every conflict. They do not stand in their own strength, nor overcome by their own efforts; in the strength of their eternal Rock they are kept by the power of God unto salvation. Under this omnipotent protection not only their life is secure, being hid with Christ in God, but every chosen vessel of mercy is sheltered under the same infallible shield. In all their wanderings they are never out of sight of the watchful care of their faithful God. Their Redeemer is strong. He has through death destroyed him that had the power of death, and now he has the keys of hell and of death.—Rev. i. 18. Hence he can speak with certainty of the impossibility of those gates prevailing against the church which he has built upon the Rock of eternal Truth. In laying the foundation of this everlasting monument of his grace, as a wise man he digged deep, removing every grain of the sand of natural will and carnal devices; he trusted nothing as the support of his church but the immutable truth of the eternal counsel of God. Since God changes not in his perfect will, this foundation is forever secure. While the holy throne of Jehovah is established in the heavens, this basis on which Jesus has built his church can never be removed. Well might the psalmist sing, therefore, “Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee; the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain.”—Psa. lxxvi. 10.

WHO WISHES TO ASSIST?

FOR many years the SIGNS OF THE TIMES was published on terms that no other paper within our knowledge has ever been able to offer, viz., two dollars a year for those who were able to pay that amount, one dollar a year for those who were not able to pay any more, and free to those who really desired the paper, but were not able to pay anything; and we do not remember ever refusing the paper to any one who asked for it free until we started the weekly, and then we just simply could not do it. We have carried on an average in the neighborhood of a thousand gratuitous subscribers for years, until those who were paying full price began to complain that the subscription price of the SIGNS was too high, and to discontinue the paper on that account. We therefore were obliged to increase the amount we gave them for their money, and to do this we had to drop hundreds of names from our free list, which was one of the most unpleasant things we have ever been obliged to do.

While most of our brethren are poor, and feel hardly able to pay their own subscription, yet we believe there are some who, if they knew of the case, would rather assist in carrying this list than have them deprived of the paper. We have therefore concluded to submit this proposition to them. We will keep a list of names of those who appeal to us for the paper free, and if any of our brethren feel disposed to assist us in bearing the expense, we will for every dollar received enter one of these names on our list for one year, and send the person remitting the money the name and address of the person to whose subscription their money has been applied.

We hope our brethren will bear in mind that in thus furnishing the paper for one dollar we are not financially benefited ourselves, as it is really below actual cost of publica-

SIGNS OF THE TIMES FOR 1890.

ABOUT a year ago we announced our decision to publish the SIGNS OF THE TIMES an eight-page weekly at the same price we were publishing the twelve-page semi-monthly, and made the unprecedented offer to allow one-half the subscription price as a commission to all our paid-up old subscribers for every new subscriber they would procure us, and the result was that we received an addition of more than two thousand names to our list. Many, however, of these new subscribers paid but one dollar to the old subscriber, who sacrificed his commission to procure the new subscriber, having in view simply the increasing of the circulation of the paper. The question now is, How many of those paying only one dollar last year will renew for 1890 at the regular rate of two dollars? If we shall be able to retain a good proportion of those, and can still increase our circulation two thousand more, we will then be able to furnish the paper weekly at one dollar and fifty cents a year; and should it be increased four thousand, we would be able to publish it weekly at one dollar a year.

Many doubtless do not understand why we can publish at one dollar a year with the increased circulation, and for the benefit of such we will explain. It takes just as much type-setting, imposing forms and making ready for press to print one paper as it does any number of thousands of copies. In fact, after the paper is once “to press,” the additional expense is but a trifle more than the cost of the blank paper. For instance, say it cost five thousand dollars a year to run a weekly of five thousand copies; it would probably not exceed seven thousand dollars to print ten thousand copies. The inquiry may arise with some, How is it that the local publications of but a thousand or fifteen hundred circulation can be published for two dollars a year? The reason is that those papers rely almost entirely on their advertising patronage for support. If the SIGNS should take two or three pages of advertisements it could be published at one dollar a year.

Another thing our readers are not aware of is that although the subscription price is two dollars a year, our gross receipts do not average one dollar and fifty cents for each subscriber, our loss from delinquent and gratuitous subscribers being more than twenty-five per cent. While most of our subscribers know and appreciate the above facts, there are many who do not, and consequently consider the price of the SIGNS too high.

Although the increased expenses of publishing the SIGNS weekly this year are several hundred dollars more than the increase in the receipts, we have decided to continue it weekly another year, and make the following

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!

From now until the first of next January, any one who is now a subscriber, and whose subscription is paid up, may send us new subscribers at one dollar a year; but no one, either new or old subscriber, can get the paper from this office for themselves at less than the regular rates. Any one who is not now a subscriber can have the benefit of the above terms by sending two dollars for their own subscription, and one dollar each for additional new subscribers.

MARRIAGES.

NOVEMBER 21st, 1889, by Elder Joseph L. Staton, at the residence of the bride's parents, near Newark, Del., Mr. M. H. Barton and Miss L. S. Wilson, both of New Castle Co., Del.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Mr. James Littell was born in North Carolina, July 13th, 1803. He moved with his parents while quite young to Washington Co., Tenn., where he lived until 1827, when he moved to Todd Co., Ky., where he was married to Miss M. A. Carson, daughter of Elder Daniel Carson (a minister of the Primitive Baptist Church), July 10th, 1831, with whom he lived for more than fifty-eight years. He was paralyzed on the evening of Nov. 4th, just as he took his seat at the supper-table, and lingered in a semi-conscious condition until the morning of the 9th, when he peacefully and quietly passed away, in his 87th year.

It seems that in answer to his oft-expressed desire he was spared that long and painful illness which many have to suffer in dying. He could make known his wants until too weak to utter words, when he raised his right hand and arm, pointing upward as high as he could reach, as if in token that he was going home up yonder to be at rest forever. He often told us that he was ready to go whenever the good Lord should call him home. His daily life was exemplary in many of the christian virtues. He always admired consistency in a christian character. He will be remembered for his high sense of honor, and for his noble, unflinching integrity. Being a sincere lover of truth, both in temporal and spiritual things, he enjoyed a peaceful conscience, which was void of offense toward God and man. The outlook to his mind was hopeful and serene, and his end was as calm and peaceful as the fading twilight. So we sorrow not as those who have no hope, assured of the truth that those who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. As the infirmities of age gave a tottering gait to his feeble frame, his thoughts ran back much on the events of his early life, while his affections for the world and its deceitful allurements were weaned away to things that belong to the eternal. As his years increased, his faith and hope grew stronger to the end. For the last sixteen years of his life he was nearly blind, but listened with delight as his wife would read to him from the Bible and the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, which was a great comfort as well as a mutual enjoyment to them, especially when not able to attend their church meetings. His bereaved wife, now in her 78th year, bears her loss with a calm, sweet, christian fortitude.

Mr. Littell professed experimental religion in his young manhood, from which good hour he believed that it was all of grace, and not of works. About ten years ago he joined the Primitive Baptist Church at West Fork, in Christian Co., Ky., where his wife had been a member for more than fifty years, and thus they more happily trod the same pathway. He died as he had lived, in hope of heaven. Peaceful and sweet will be his long and dreamless rest.

J. T. SMITH.

HOPKINSVILLE, Ky., Nov. 22, 1889.

"LORD, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is; that I may know how frail I am. Behold, thou hast made my days as a hand-breath; and mine age is as nothing before thee: verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity."—Psa. xxxix. 4, 5.

Sister Susan Jenkins died Sept. 30th, 1889, at her residence near Rock Springs, Lancaster Co., Pa., in the 69th year of her age. She was baptized by Elder Thomas Barton, Sept. 23d, 1855, and remained a worthy and consistent member of the Rock Springs Church until her death. Sister Jenkins was well known among the Baptists, particularly in the Delaware Association, and her house was a comfortable stopping place and a welcome home for them at all times. She was a most devoted and faithful member, ever at her post at all the meetings of the church, a quick discernor, decided and firm in the doctrine of God our Savior. When I first visited the Rock Springs Church, thirty years ago, it consisted of thirty-five members. Since sister Jenkins' decease there are but three of that number left. How forcibly we are reminded by this of the brevity of human life. Swiftly the wheels of time move on, bearing us to our eternal home. Sister Jenkins was afflicted the last few years of her life with paralysis, which deprived her of the use of her limbs, and from the effects of which she gradually sank, until death ended her sufferings. She was patient in affliction, although suffering much from shortness of breath, particularly when lying down. The loss is sensibly felt by all the family, unto whom she was truly devoted; but particularly heavy does the affliction fall upon the husband, brother George Jenkins. They were one in life, and it was hard to be separated in death. The church has lost a good member; but it is the Lord: let him do what seemeth good in his sight.

She leaves a family of eight daughters and two sons, now much scattered, the latter being in the far west, and on that account could not be present at the funeral. The daughters were all present, together with a large gathering of friends, to pay the last tribute of respect to one they held in high esteem. The end was peaceful and calm, often sighing for home. She was laid to rest at Rock Springs, Oct. 4th, 1889, with some remarks on the occasion by the writer.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

DEFENSE IN THE DAY OF TROUBLE.

BY THE LATE JOSEPH IRONS.

"THE Lord hear thee in the day of trouble; the name of the God of Jacob defend thee."—Psa. xx. 1.

There is no part of the word of God concerning which I am so dissatisfied with commentators and expositors in their few remarks on it as the Psalms. I know not a commentator on the Psalms that I ever read without a shudder of disapprobation. I once mentioned this to my dear and ever-valued friend in memory, Dr. Hawker. I asked him how it is that such and such truths, so important and so delightful, are so frequently overlooked by commentators on this book. My heart trembled as I spoke, for I had read his own commentary at the time, and I shall never forget the good old man's smile and confusion as he said, "My dear fellow, we commentators get into the traces, and then we always pull in one way." I replied, "Then God grant that I may always be a single horse, and never get into the traces at all." I would have you then, my dear friends, be cautious how you receive the jejune and quaint things which are to be met with in commentaries, particularly on the Psalms.

I am led to this severity of remark in opening my subject this morning, because it does appear to me that commentators have positively perverted the whole psalm, of which I have now read to you the commencement. This may appear extremely vain in me; but I have no hesitation in telling you how I came to this conclusion. When this verse was first presented to my mind I determined not to take it as my text. I looked the book through, and still this passage returned to my view; but I did not wish to expatiate on days of trouble. Yet while I would not even look at it, my mind, as it were, by the special intervention of God, was fixed on the passage, and I said to myself, Who is this that speaketh in the text, "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble?" I would not look at one commentator or expositor until I considered myself prepared for the pulpit. That is my uniform practice. So, looking down the psalm, which is short (and with a brief summary of which I must lengthen my exordium), I came to the conclusion that it was a bold and beautiful dialogue between Christ and his church. It is opened by Christ, addressing his church in his character of Intercessor and Advocate, amidst all her afflictions and trials, wars and conflicts (and some critics refer the whole psalm to the wars of David). Jesus Christ says (and we know that, as in the days of his flesh, the Father heareth him always), "The Lord hear thee." I advocate thy cause; put thy prayers in my censer; the Lord hear thee. Some commentators render this in the present tense, "The Lord heareth thee;" but I prefer the version as it stands, "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble." "The name of the God of Jacob defend thee;" referring to the covenant character of the God of Jacob. "Send thee help from the sanctuary, and strengthen thee out of Zion." It is there that strength is prepared, proportioned to the day of the Lord's people, amidst all their conflicts. "Remember all thy offerings, and accept thy burnt sacrifice," as presented to God under the law, and accepted through our great Intercessor and Advocate. "Grant thee according to thine own heart, and fulfill all thy counsel." This is the intercessory prayer in behalf of his church; and a blessed fullness there is in it. Then the church takes up the dialogue. It is remarkable that while the singular is used in the first portion of the psalm, the plural is now used. "We will rejoice in thy salvation;" now that Jesus has become our Advocate; now that the Lord of hosts himself has taken it in hand; now that Jesus pleads our cause on high. "We will rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners." Then, appealing to the intercession of Jesus himself, the church exclaims, "The Lord fulfill all thy petitions." Our own prayers are so stammering, imperfect, polluted, corrupt, wandering, that we have no hope of their being heard; but we look to the great Advocate himself. "Behold, God, our Shield, and look upon the face of thine anointed." "The Lord fulfill all thy petitions," all the prayer of Jesus Christ in behalf of his church. Immediately after this David introduces himself. "Now know I that the Lord favoreth his anointed;" that he heareth the Intercessor always, and that salvation is secure for all his people. "He will hear him from his holy heaven with the saving strength of his right hand." Then the three verses that close the psalm contain the exultation of the church in consequence of Christ's intercession and advocacy in their behalf, pleading for them perpetually in heaven. This appears to me, in the most hasty manner in which I could present it to you, a simple outline of the psalm.

We go back, then, to the language of our text in the first verse, and there we observe, first, that the Intercessor recognizes his people in a day of trouble; and while he recognizes them in the midst of trouble, he incites them to prayer, "The Lord hear thee." Then they must be praying. "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble." Then we have the same gracious Intercessor appealing to the covenant name, the name of the God of Jacob, in behalf of his people. Lastly, there is the demand (I call it demand, like his supplication before he left the world, "Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory"); the demand that the Lord may hear and defend us. "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble, the name of the God of Jacob defend thee." Jesus himself calls on the name of a covenant God, for a covenant people, for our defense. May God give me strength to say as much about this blessed passage of his word as I enjoy.

First of all, I would say a word or two relative to Christ's recognition of his people in the day of trouble. "The day of trouble" here referred to may relate to human affairs, to inflexible foes, and to spiritual distress. "The day of trouble" experienced by God's people may relate in the first instance to human affairs. While we are in the world crosses, disappointments, burdens, perplexities, poverty, losses, snares, anxieties, domestic distresses, diseases, death, are among the lot of the people of God. "In the world ye shall have tribulation." That is one part of the legacy; but I must not withhold the other, "in me ye shall have peace." If, then, this be the legacy, what arrant fools must we be to think of going through the world unmolested! How could it be? Did you ever see or hear of a high-toned, spiritual-minded man living near to God, and very devoted for God, passing through the world unmolested? I will not say there never was one, but I will say I never knew one. I never knew a very decided, spiritually-circumspect, highly-useful christian pass through the world without a very considerable share of trouble, without knowing what a "day of trouble" meant. It is, I repeat it, part of the legacy; and I beseech you, do not imagine you can get rid of the cross. I remember, thirty-six years ago, I determined I would, by taking care, that no one should know what pretensions I had to religion. But it must come out. Be sure of this, the path of tribulation in the wilderness is the path in which the Lord's children, training up with high spiritual attainments, must go. You know how the apostles confirmed the disciples. Theirs was a confirmation which would not be liked by modern professors. They went about and confirmed the disciples by telling them that through much tribulation they must enter into the kingdom.

But mark, that while the Lord's people have to share in the common lot of adversities, crosses, anxieties, and trials, there are two differences between them and the men of this world. The first is, that they have a God to go to, and appeal to his promises for refuge and assured protection; and, secondly, they have sanctification put into the smallest portion of temporal good they may enjoy. It is better, as said Solomon, to have a dry morsel, and quietness therewith (that is, a quiet conscience, enjoying God), than a house full of sacrifices, with strife. So that the child of God, in trying circumstances, with reference to human affairs, has a God to go to, whom he knows to be the God of providence as well as grace; and, in the next place, there is a sanctifying power put into the dry crust, which the world has not, with all its luxuries.

There are also "days of trouble" for God's children on account of being surrounded by inflexible enemies. The probability is that David penned this psalm when he was about to enter on some conflict with his enemies; but the Israel of God may also be viewed as exposed to inflexible enemies. I call them inflexible, because all attempts at reconciliation, all overtures of peace, must be deceitful. You can never be at peace with the world without being plundered by it. Take the case of two countries, one the inflexible foe of the other; they never can be reconciled to each other in heart and spirit. You may yield to the one in certain points, you may propose terms of peace, you may prescribe certain securities, you may fancy that hostilities have ceased, and your armies and navies have been dispersed; but what has been the result? The foe, being implacable, seizes the first opportunity to overleap the conditions which had been laid down, and to make new inroads, and commit fresh depredations, as far as it can. So it is with the world that surrounds you. You may yield, you may indulge the spirit of the world, you may come to terms in a carnal spirit of conciliation with the enemies of God; but what is the consequence? Just as soon as you have come into these terms of peace, there is another snare, another overture, another breach in your privileges, another wall built up to prevent the enjoyment of your God, blighting your evidence, casting down your hopes, serving you, in short, as the spider does the fly, tying your head and heels together, and sucking out all your blood; taking everything but your life. They cannot take that; for "your life is hid with Christ in God." O! be not then conformed to this world; it is an inflexible foe, a determined, implacable enemy. You cannot be friendly without losing by it.

There is another implacable enemy, the devil, the roaring lion, the devourer, the tempter, the prince of darkness, as he is variously described. You cannot be friends with him. The more you concede, the more he will demand. If he cannot get you into hell, he will drag you to its very gates, and torment you with its flames, so that you may lose all your peace and comfort. To arms, then! to arms! The trumpet of the gospel is a warlike trumpet, and you must take "the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked;" and take the helmet of salvation, and have the sword of the Spirit always unsheathed, and be always very decided for God.

There is another foe, as implacable as the former, and he does reside in your own hearts. He dwells in your flesh. "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." When you have such foes as these to contend with, it is a "day of trouble." But in your "day of trouble," with reference to human affairs, when human affairs are very distressing, do you cry unto the Lord, and our great Intercessor will take it up, and cry, "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble." Then with respect to inbred corruption, fleshly inclinations, of which the apostle says, "Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul," these are implacable foes. You can never reconcile old Adam to the new; you can never reconcile the flesh to the Spirit; you can never reconcile carnal corruption to the Spirit's graces. They will be hostile as long as we are in this world. He that is born after the flesh persecutes him that is born after the Spirit. The believer has to war against the world, the flesh and the devil. That is a "day of trouble."

But I pass to a still deeper "day of trouble," a day of soul distress. I am willing to give full weight to all the troubles that arise out of human affairs. I allow all the weight that is due to the days of trouble arising from conflicts and wars with the implacable foes of God and man; but when I come to speak of soul distress, that indeed is a "day of trouble," which defies all language fully to explain. Perhaps some of my hearers do not know what such distress is. I pray God that he would make you acquainted with it, if you are not yet. By soul-trouble I mean the state of a child of Adam, when the Holy Ghost brings home the holy and inflexible law of God, with power upon his conscience, convincing him of sin, showing him his own depravity, laying him low in the dust of abasement, and causing him to cry out, "Woe is me, for I am undone!" I mean that day of trouble in which all the refuges of lies are swept away, the vain thoughts of being as good as other people; that God is merciful; that they will repent in good time; and a thousand other ridiculous and frivolous things which carnal man take shelter in. When all these refuges of lies are swept away, as with that hailstorm which the prophet Isaiah was commissioned to describe; when the mighty grace of God brings home the sentence of the law, as in the case of Saul of Tarsus, so that sin revived, and he died; when all hope seemed extinguished forever; then is there a "day of trouble," such as you never before experienced. You may have had many a worldly trouble, you may have been threatened with poverty and ruin, as regards temporal affairs; but now the other threatens you with eternal damnation. Now you see nothing before you but "the blackness of darkness forever." Now is a "day of trouble," in which the almighty Creditor, thundering from Mount Sinai, says, "Pay me that thou owest." Peradventure, the Pharisaism of that crooked, old, deceitful sinner, free-will, may prompt you to propose a compromise; but mark what follows, "cast into prison, I tell thee, thou shalt not depart thence, till thou hast paid the very last mite." Unless the very last mite be paid, there is nothing for you but eternal death. While all this is passing in the conscience, and there is no acquaintance with Christ, no believing apprehension of a Surety, no knowledge of imputed righteousness, then indeed is the soul in distress. The man is afraid to live, and afraid to die; he is frightened at everything around him, and he cries out in anguish of soul, "Woe is me! I am undone!" His mouth is stopped, guilt is fastened on the conscience, nothing but villainess is discovered in his whole frame, in body and soul, and the poor sinner can only exclaim, "O Lord, I am vile!" If you have never experienced that "day of trouble," I rather pity than envy you; for you will never know the preciousness of Christ till you have felt something of it. He may struggle long, he may make many efforts, as Bunyan expressed it, "to get out of the slough of despond," and think of making some compensation for his past sins; but all ends in failure; he makes bad worse; every time he tries to put a patch on his poor, old, tattered garment, the rent is made worse. All hope seems gone, and he is ready to give himself over to absolute despair. Truly that is a "day of trouble," when there seems nothing before him but eternal perdition, and all his efforts to escape from it are abortive. But a voice more soft than that of the turtle-dove, more melodious than the music of heaven, whispers to his soul, "There is redemption in Christ Jesus;" "There is forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace;" "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." When this discovery is made the spirit of prayer is awakened, and he exclaims, "Lord, save, or I perish;" Lord, save me according to the riches of thy grace; "God, be merciful to me, a sinner." The glorious Advocate on high takes up the prayer, and replies, "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble." The pardon is sent down, the peace communicated, hope springs up in the soul, the Son makes him free, and he is free indeed.

But his "day of trouble" is not at an end when he has got his pardon and fondly hugs it in his bosom. No; new troubles and sorrows will arise. Buckle on your armor, you young recruits; there is war before you; you will have to encounter evil beasts in the wilderness; you will meet with many fogs and mists and cares and anxieties, of a spiritual kind. There will be seasons when the heavens are as brass above your head, and the earth as iron beneath your feet; when heaven and earth will seem to be against you, and you shall cry out, If I am the Lord's, why is it thus? This is a "day of trouble."

The believer's days of spiritual trouble are not likely to be at an end while he remains in the wilderness. There will be answers to many prayers suspended, promises sealed up, times of sorrow, and days of trouble in church fellowship. He will find this a world of sorrow and trouble. What of all this? Again and again, in every season of trouble, cry earnestly unto the Lord, and our Advocate immediately answers it, "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble."

I will mention one more "day of trouble," and I believe every christian knows something of it, mentally and spiritually, though many of them are mercifully spared it openly; but there are those who know what a "day of trouble" is from open backsliding. There are those who, like David and Hezekiah and many others, have been left in the conflict to get sore wounds from their enemies, and broken bones by negligence. That is a "day of trouble." I have known such cases, and I may say I have had the honor and happiness of being instrumental in helping some privately in this important soul's "day of trouble." The poor, broken-hearted backslider ought not to be treated with indifference or supercilious contempt, as is too generally the case; but "let him that thinketh he standeth take heed, lest he fall." I cannot help relating one instance, which occurred in the history of my little scribblings, and one individual at least will be thankful as long as he lives that he had heard of me from my little book called Nathaniel. The case to which I refer was that of a prominent professor, who stood high in public opinion, but was left so to fall into sin that he dared not show his face, not only in the congregation where he had worshiped, but at all out of doors even. In his agonizing distress, in his "day of trouble," he at length determined to bear his existence no longer, and literally arose from his chair, and was walking across his parlor, purposing to throw himself into a pond in his lawn. As he passed, little Nathaniel lay in his way (I leaped with joy when I learned that my pen had been so honored of God). How it came in his way he himself could never tell; but there it lay open at the chapter which was headed, "The backslider." It stopped him in his progress, he sat down and read the chapter, and the Lord broke his heart with it. I introduce the case this morning for this purpose, that whenever there is a day of such trouble (and there are such cases in God's family), if the poor wretch can be favored with one breath of prayer, the Intercessor answers it, "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble."

Peradventure there may be some supercilious and proud individuals here, who will exclaim, "That will never be my case; I do not want such preaching as this." If so, I tell such that they do want such preaching as this; for if they be never left to become blasphemers, or to commit some great crime, there is the secret corruption, the wandering affection, which is well known to God. That is a secret, heart backsliding, if not open backsliding. What! have you never mourned in secret over these abominations you felt struggling within, and feared might break out and ruin you? Have you never mourned in secret over these secret corruptions, and prayed to God to crucify them? Have you felt this as a "day of trouble?" Then hear what the dear Redeemer saith, "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble;" for "when the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him."

Secondly, observe the excitement which this gracious Intercessor gives us to prayer. The very expression, "The Lord hear thee," intimates that we are already excited earnestly to prayer. Think for one moment of the privilege, the special privilege, of having a God to go to, whatever the "day of trouble" may be. Think for one moment of the condescension of the eternal God, allowing poor, rebellious worms to come to him with all their troubles. We are apt to be worn out with a tale of woe; but here is a gracious, a holy God, who says, "Call upon me in the day of trouble." Just the reverse of what mortals say. We are apt to say to one another, "Do call on me when you are in prosperity, when you can come in your carriage, with pockets full of money." But it is far otherwise with God. His language is, "Call upon me in the day of trouble." Whenever you stay away, be sure you do not stay away then. "Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me." Should it not cover us with shame and confusion of face (it does me) to think that in the "day of trouble" we nevertheless resort to any others rather than God first?—to parents, if we have them, to friends, to ministers, to personal acquaintances. I do not find any fault with running in these directions for advice and temporary assistance, as circumstances may require; but I do not like things to be turned upside down. Whether my "day of trouble" have reference to human affairs, to conflicts with inflexible foes, or soul distress, I would rather have five minutes' communion with my God than five months' laborious efforts of all other friends. I do not undervalue the latter, but I want things in their proper order, to make use of an high privilege, and to run at first to the stronghold, the hiding place, the grand asylum, whither "the righteous flee, and are safe." What a shame that we should go limping with our heavy burdens, when God says, Cast them upon me! I am ashamed of my ingratitude to my God. It is the privilege of prayer I am urging; and sure I am, if the Lord's family were living near to God in secret communion, their troubles would be lighter, their enemies would be impotent, their victories would be more numerous, their joys more abundant. The more trouble, the greater would be their triumphs. O for closer communion with God! O for more power of prayer to be pleading with the Most High!

For our encouragement in this work, observe that our great Intercessor is habitually responding in heaven to what we pour out on earth. Jesus, our High Priest and Advocate, takes up our petitions, puts them in his censer, presents them on the mercy-seat above. Jesus asks for all that he teaches us to ask for. He never taught me to breathe out a desire to which he did not respond in his Father's ear. Therefore he says, "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble." I have sometimes felt in prayer so straitened and stammering that I have been ashamed, and said, Surely God will never hear such wretched, miserable croaking. I have been more ashamed of my prayers than of the worst thing I ever did. But there are seasons (and they are precious ones) in which the spirit of prayer is so restored, and the fervor of the soul so engaged with God, and the confidence of faith so united with the believing effort, and the sight of the Intercessor's censer so clearly discovered, and the confidence of relationship to the covenant God, to whom I am praying, so sweet, so powerful, and the promise I have been pleading so melting, and clearly descending in drops, and so fast, that it were impossible not to feel in such circumstances that the Lord heareth us in "the day of trouble." These are blessed moments; and the worldling, whatever he may say of prayer, knows nothing of these seasons. He does not know what it is to feel that one's very petitions were enough to bring down condemnation; nor does he know what it is to have close, intimate fellowship with the Most High, to lay hold on the very pillars of the throne, and refuse to go without a blessing. "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble."

I pass on to the appeal which the Intercessor makes to our covenant Head, "the name of the God of Jacob defend thee." Who is this God of Jacob? The God that gave him the blessing of the birthright, though he was the junior; the God that delivered him from the murderous hand of his brother in the day of his trouble; the God that enriched him with Laban's spoil, and gave him the desire of his heart; the God that protected him, and manifested himself to him, his covenant God. The name of the God of Jacob is a strong tower. It is the immutable and incommunicable name, Jehovah—Father, Son and Holy Ghost; and the precious, glorious name of Israel's God stands pledged for their salvation and defense. The name of God the Father, and all his fixed decrees and irrevocable predestinating engagements, coupled with the honor of his name; the name of God the Son (and I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God), with all the responsibility of his covenant engagements and voluntary official character, coupled with the honor of his name; the name of God the Holy Ghost, with all the sovereignty and power of his ministerial operations and communications of grace, going on invincibly in the hearts of his people. So that if one operation of the Holy Ghost could be frustrated, his honor is gone. If one drop of atoning blood could be shed in vain, the name and honor of the Son of God is gone. If one fixed purpose of electing love could be reversed, the name and honor of God is gone. The name of "the God of Jacob" is pledged for the defense and salvation of his people. "The name of the God of Jacob!" Hell trembles at it; heaven is melodious with its praise; earth is sustained by the omnipotence that goes forth from it. The church derives all her happiness from the knowledge of it; for "this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

O! my hearers, what do you know of this blessed "name of the God of Jacob?" The knowledge of it will absorb the soul where it resides; it will shut out everything else; it will make everything look little and despicable; a special apprehension of "the name of the God of Jacob" as a covenant God, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, enacting, determining and covenanting for the accomplishment of our salvation. "The name of the God of Jacob." That name was responsible for the salvation of the whole church before Christ came. That name it was that Christ Jesus came to vindicate and honor. That name it was in which the apostles did all their mighty works. That name it was in which they were commissioned to go forth and preach the name of a covenant God. Would to God that it resounded in every pulpit.

"The name of the God of Jacob defend thee." Mark here that God has not kept this a secret. He has not confined the register of his truth and holiness to heaven. He has given us on record "yea and amen" promises. The promises of God's word are yea and amen in Christ Jesus, ratified, affirmed, solemn oaths. So that, when I look into God's word, and meet with precious promises, suitable to certain spiritual exigencies, I am authorized to take them as copied out of the covenant book by the finger of God. He has condescended in these promises to give us as much of his secret mind as is necessary for our comfort, in his written and revealed word. This is only an abstract, a little epitome, a slight outline; so much copied out in these sacred pages as may tend to the comfort, the satisfaction, the joy, of the church of God, and lead her in childhood homeward to everlasting glory. So that I might lay down this book on my pillow when dying, and say, Now I am done with you. I am going to read the original to all eternity. God himself ratifying every promise, purpose and decree in his everlasting covenant!

I hasten to the closing part of my subject, the demand for our defense. "The name of the God of Jacob defend thee." There is an assurance of thy protection, of thy safety in the midst of ten thousand foes, and of thy perseverance to the end. One thing here must be considered quite essential. A place of refuge, a for-trell, a strong tower for defense may be built; but however strong or invulnerable, it is no defense to me unless I get into it. I tell you there is no defense in a covenant God but through Christ. What I speak of is not common to all the world alike, but only for those that believe in Christ Jesus. I beseech you to look well to this point. The covenant, the oath and purpose of God the Father, the responsibility of God the Son, and the invincible operations of God the Holy Spirit, are a sure defense, but only to those who, as the apostle expresses it, "have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before them," God working in their hearts to bring them to it.

One thought more. "The name of the God of Jacob defend thee." This has been rendered by some critics, "defendeth" thee. Then if it be so, what a reproof to our unbelief, and what an encouragement to our faith! "The Lord is on my side; I will not fear what man can do unto me." Yea, says the psalmist, "I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people that have set themselves against me round about." "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble; therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof." Though all around be terrific and alarming, though nature be convulsed, and nations overturned, though empires be overturned, and universal consternation seize on every unregenerate man, we have nothing to fear. The God of Jacob is our refuge, our security and our defense.

Such is the rebuke to our unbelief; and what an encouragement to our faith! For "they that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed." Amen.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ELKINS, Randolph Co., W. Va.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—From some cause that I cannot tell, I have felt a desire to write to you, though I feel myself a poor, helpless sinner in the sight of the just and holy God. We are much pleased with the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, which we receive every week. We prize it very highly for the blessed truth which it contains. I read so many precious letters from the dear brethren and sisters that I feel unworthy to try to write. Yet I hope the Lord will direct my pen. I feel as the poet has said,

"A beggar poor, at mercy's door,
Lies such a wretch as I;
Thou knowest my need is great indeed;
Lord, hear me when I cry."

I will try to give you a short sketch of my experience, but will not try to give the dates in particular.

About seven years ago, as near as I can tell, I hope the Lord commenced his dealings with me. It seemed to me that my burden was more than I could bear. Many times I was compelled to go by myself and weep, because I was such a sinner in the sight of God. I remember that once I went to hear a Baptist minister preach, and he told my feelings so precisely that I thought some one had told him about me. Yet I thought I had never told any one about my feelings, and wondered how he knew anything about my trouble. Once while in great agony this Scripture came into my mind with great force, "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled." That relieved my mind for a time, yet I did not think my sins were pardoned. I went on, and at times in great distress, and many times tried to pray, but could not, because I thought I was too great a sinner for the Lord to hear. Many wakeful hours did I spend while the family would be sleeping, mourning over my dreadful condition. One evening two of the dear brethren, David Murphy and his son, both ministers of the gospel, came home with father from meeting. They talked of their experience, telling of the great things the Lord had done for them. I thought I would never have that privilege. I thought that was the most dreadful night I ever experienced. I surely thought my time had come to leave this world, and that torment would be my eternal doom. I thought once that I would tell the family I had to leave them, and that torment was my doom. Then I thought it would distress my father, so I did not tell any person about it. During that night I got up to get some medicine, and father asked me what the matter was. I told him nothing much was the matter, only that I was a little sick. One night I dreamed that I saw my Savior in a beautiful garden. I thought it had the most beautiful trees in it I had ever seen. I did not know how I got there. I thought I gave my Savior a glass vessel, and told him if he would only give me that glass full of the water of life, which I had so long thirsted after. I thought he gave it back to me, and said, "Thou canst not drink of that water now, but thou shalt drink of it hereafter to thy fill." Then he immediately disappeared out of my sight. I had other sweet visions, which would take too much space for me to tell. But I was not satisfied with this. My trouble still continued, until the summer of 1885. One day one of the neighborhood women was at our house, and in the evening when she was ready to go home she said I must go home with her. At first I told her I thought I could not go; but she pleaded with me, and I told her at last that I would go with her. I was in great trouble at that time, but no one, not even my father, knew anything of it. If my dear mother had been living I do not suppose I would have told her. So I went home with the woman that evening, and about eleven o'clock that night, as near as I can tell, while I was weeping over my sins, and thinking the Lord would never hear me because I was such a great sinner, all at once my great burden was gone, and a great light seemed to shine about me. I saw my Redeemer hang bleeding for me, and a voice said to me, "Daughter, thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven thee. Go in peace." I found myself praising my Redeemer. I thought I would never see trouble again.

"That sweet comfort was mine
When the favor divine
I first found in the blood of the Lamb:
When my heart first believ'd
O what joy I receiv'd!
What a heaven in Jesus' name.

"'Twas a heaven below
The Redeemer to know,
And the angels could do nothing more
Than to fall at his feet,
And the story repeat,
And the Savior of sinners adore!"

But soon doubts and fears began to trouble me; for Satan would tell me that I was deceived. I did not tell any one about my having received a hope until the spring of 1886, when I was cast on a bed of affliction, and expected never to get up again. I then told my father of my hope, and he asked me if I was afraid to die. I told him that I was not; that my hope reached beyond this vale of tears. I had thought I could serve my Master without going to the church, and that I would not tell any one about my hope. Yet I loved the brethren and sisters with my whole heart, if I knew anything about it. Many times I had the watery grave in view, but felt too unworthy to go forward. I prayed to the Lord while I was sick to raise me off the bed of affliction, and promised him that if he would spare my life I would walk in his holy ordinances, if it was his holy will. I got well, and on the tenth day of July, 1886, went to the church, and was baptized on the eighteenth day of the same month by our pastor, Ezra P. Hart. I had been in trouble about three years before I received a hope, and remained out of the church about one year after I received a hope.

Dear brethren Beebe, please give your views on Revelation xi. 3-8, and oblige an unworthy sister. I hope the Lord will ever bless you, that you may grow in grace, and that, if it is his will, you may long live to publish the blessed truth of God which is contained in the SIGNS.

Your sister in hope of a glorious resurrection,

MARY C. HANSFORD.

CAMP HILL, Ala., Nov. 17, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—It has come into my mind to write again for the SIGNS, which I esteem as an important medium of correspondence, showing "the footsteps of the flock," or the tracks made by the church in her travel in this present evil world, by which she is known from all other bodies claiming to be the church of Christ. In the Song of Solomon the question was asked by one interested, "Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?" The marks of the true church are very distinct to the true inquirer, and hidden from the blind, so that by faith only are we able to trace the true church and find where the flock doth rest at noon. The evidence is conclusive that God has a flock there; for Jesus said, "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." The pasture of this flock is said to be a fat pasture, on the mountains of Israel. Here sheep are used to represent God's people; and as the sheep is a peculiar animal, different from all other animals, so are God's people peculiar, different from all other people. They feed upon the grass which God causes to grow for them, and they are entirely dependent upon him, and look to him for their portion. One of the noted peculiarities of God's people is, they have two lives: one from Adam, by transmission, and one from Christ, by regeneration; and yet Christ is their life. The marks of the church are visible. Her identity is preserved through her entire journey. She walks by faith, and not by sight. Her tracks are seen as such in her walk. While a goat's track appears something like a sheep's, yet there is a marked difference. When closely observed, the sheep's track is straight, and the sharp points of the toes mark the direction they are going; but a gang of goats going in sand after a rain appear to be going both ways, so that you cannot tell from their tracks which way they are going. So goat preachers preach both ways. The true mark of the church is that they are in the world, but they are not of the world, being chosen out of the world. The word ekklesia, from which we have the word "church," means an assembly called out. So the church of Christ is called out of the world. They have not a worldly ministry, nor do they have a worldly membership. They trust in God for a ministry and a membership. They have no modern incubators to hatch out preachers, no seminaries to look to for a supply, but look to the hills, from whence cometh their help. She is not reckoned with the nations of the earth. When statistic blanks are sent to Old Baptist preachers, they should write on the blank, "We are not reckoned among the nations, but we are to dwell alone, according to the edict or decree of our King." The church has the promise that she shall condemn every tongue which riseth against her in judgment. When her enemies tell her that she is where Christ left her more than eighteen hundred years ago, she replies, "He has never left me nor forsaken me, as he promised." No enchantment formed against her shall prosper. She has for more than fifty years stood the flood cast out of the mouth of the dragon, and worldly religionists have helped her, in swallowing the flood of ungodly men, who would have found entrance into the church but for them, and would have injured her. So all the religious enchantments of to-day cannot hurt the church. The money-getters who were going to convert the world in so many years with money, means and men, have really done so, from bad to worse; for they wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived. God has, does and will preserve his people from this time henceforth and forever. She shall dwell alone. She is the only body that stands aloof from all religious orders, has no picnics nor fairs, and stands separate from all orders of the day, as a virgin, chaste, in that respect, as the body of Christ. She does not recognize the religious works of the women who claim to be the church. She is tried, and will come forth as gold tried in the fire, to the praise and glory of God the Father.

These are a few of the marks; and I may, if the Lord will, write more upon this point, as I have some exercise of mind upon it. I hope it may be of some benefit to the Lord's tried children in this vale of sorrow; for there are many, very many visible marks, to me, showing who are the true church; and some who read the SIGNS, who have some light, may be asking the question, "Where dost thou make thy flock to rest at noon?"

Yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

ACWORTH, Ga., July 31, 1889.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I received a letter from sister Redd, of Taylors, Miss., in which she asked me to write my views on Heb. xiii. 2, for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I do not feel that I can write anything that would be interesting, or of any benefit to any one on earth.

"Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." Entertain means to treat with hospitality; to amuse; which means to entertain agreeably. So says the common dictionary.

The first verse of this chapter reads, "Let brotherly love continue." The third verse reads, "Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them which suffer adversity, as being yourselves also in the body." I have thought that if we are as careful as we ought to be in entertaining strangers, we will in so doing "let brotherly love continue." That is, so far as we are able. Will we not also be remembering them that are in bonds? Who can see a brother or sister in bonds, or in adversity, and not feel bound, or suffer to a greater or less extent? I cannot. I have many times had a desire to give in cases of temporal adversity, when I could not give, and have wondered why it was so; and yet the desire was so great. But Jesus said, "For I was a hungered, and ye gave me meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me in: naked, and ye clothed me: I was sick, and ye visited me: I was in prison, and ye came unto me. Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee a hungered, and fed thee? or thirsty, and gave thee drink? When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked, and clothed thee? Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee? And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."—Matt. xxv. 35-40. We see from the above Scripture who the strangers are. But we do not always know who they are; so we ought, as we have opportunity, do good unto all men, especially unto those of the household of faith. I do not think this applies only to temporal things, because we read, "As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God."—1 Peter iv. 10. In turning to some of the references I am surprised to see the differences that have been made in time past in entertaining strangers; and how much blood has been shed on account of failing in this thing; so it seems to me. I see only one resort for the Lord's people in this, as well as in every other good work or fruit. If we abide in the Vine, we bring forth good fruit; for without him we can do nothing. I have said and done things, thinking I was right, and afterward found that I was not. How sad is such experience! So we must look to Jesus to work in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure. Herein is all my hope of doing anything right. It seems that Abraham and Lot entertained angels as though they were men. Pastors of churches are sometimes called angels.

Will some of the brethren write on this subject?

Dear brethren Beebe, do as you think best with this letter.

Your sister,

L. P. McDANIEL.

WOODHULL, Ill., Nov. 1, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS:—I thought I would write you this Sunday morning in regard to helping you send our good family paper to the poor, as you have borne the burden alone for so many years. I do think your offer very generous indeed, and hope the good Lord will open the hearts of his people to respond in a generous manner, remembering that it is more blessed to give than to receive. How many blessed promises there are to them that remember the poor. I can say, for one, that your blessed paper is a feast to me. I have never joined the church, but the Old Baptists are very near to me, and I love them for the truth's sake. I feel the most of the time to be the most sinful creature that ever lived. I feel that I have been so sifted and tempted of the devil that I have done business in great waters, and have seen the wonders of God in the deep. I think I can say that by the grace of God I am still alive to the things above. I would like very much to see you, and have a talk with you about how strangely I have been dealt with in my experience. It would take me a long time to write it. What a revelation there was to me of Jesus Christ in all his fullness to all the needs of poor sinners. From that day I have wanted to hear nothing preached but Christ and him crucified, the way, the truth and the life. He is the door to the Father. No man cometh to God but by him. I believe that all his will and purposes will be worked out in due time, and that his special providences extend to everything. I try to leave everything with him; and when I can do that it gives me perfect rest. He tells us to cast all our burdens and cares on him, for he careth for us. May God Almighty bless and protect you in your labors of love.

I will send you a post-office money-order for ten dollars. I want you to pick out ten names among those to whom you have been sending it free. I will leave it all to you. I do hope you will get it all right.

I am old and feeble. I hope you will excuse my poor writing and spelling, and take the will; I hope that is all right.

With love and respect,

W. T. CLARK.

GIFT OF THE KEYS.

(Concluded from last number.)

DEAR BROTHER BEEBE:—Please give your views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on Matthew xvi. 18, 19, especially the latter verse, and oblige a reader of the paper and a lover of the truth.

REPLY.

"AND I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."—Matt. xvi. 18, 19.

"And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." It is evident that this promise of our Lord is not to be understood literally, nor yet as giving to the man called Peter power which was not bestowed upon the other apostles. Such a construction of this promise would conflict with the inspired record of the gift of the Holy Ghost alike to all of them on the day of Pentecost.—Acts ii. 4. Although Peter is named in the account given of this wonderful display of the mighty power of God, it is expressly declared that he stood up with the eleven. He had no pre-eminence over the eleven. All were filled with the Holy Ghost, and all "began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." If this promise had been confined to Peter alone, the eleven would have had no part in the manifestation of its fulfillment. There is not the least intimation in the record which God has given from which it might be supposed that any gift was ever bestowed upon Peter by which he was exalted above his companions in the apostolic office. On the contrary, by inspiration of God Paul declares, "In nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing."—2 Cor. xii. 11. If Peter had been exclusively the recipient of the gift promised in our text, certainly Paul must have confessed that in that gift he was behind Peter; hence that is not the true meaning of this promise. In the inspired record will be found the fulfillment of this word of Jesus. To this same Peter and the other disciples Jesus said, "Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."—Matt. xix. 28. In this judgment the keys are given to the chosen apos-ties. They are not authorized to construct false keys by which to lock and unlock the hidden mysteries of this kingdom. The keys which Jesus gives them are exactly fitted for the use to which they are designed. As stewards of the mysteries of God, the apostles are entrusted with the keys of their Lord's house. This does not mean that they are authorized to open or close the door of that house at their own volition. Indeed, the apostles themselves are included as material in that house, and as constituent members of that kingdom of heaven of which our Lord speaks. When he gives the keys to his servants they are to be used only according to his direction. Not even the chosen apostles were sufficient of themselves for the responsibility of applying the keys of the kingdom in unfolding the mystery of eternal truth, or in rendering decision upon any case which required the application of these keys of the kingdom of heaven. They were commanded to tarry in the city of Jerusalem until they should be endued with power from on high.—Luke xxiv. 49. Even they must confess that their sufficiency is of God.—2 Cor. iii. 5. The only keys which can unlock the awful mysteries of the kingdom of heaven are found in the guidance of that Spirit of truth by which the Scriptures are inspired. The world cannot receive that Spirit, because it sees him not, neither knows him.—John xiv. 17. Since the natural mind of the saints is of the world, it is not possible that the Spirit of truth should be known even to them by that mind. It is only as they have the gift of the keys of the kingdom that they are enabled by faith to receive the revelation of those things which are hidden from the wise and prudent, and revealed unto babes.

It is certainly true that the apostles were specially inspired to render such judgment in every case as should be the only rule of faith and order in the church of Christ to the end of time; and their decisions can never be altered nor revoked. In their apostolic office they have bound on earth all things which it is lawful for the church to recognize as authoritative. Neither is there any provision for successors to the chosen apostles in their official character, nor is there need of such succession. But there is another sense in which all the saints are included in the gift which is in our text promised to Peter. To every little child in the kingdom of God, as well as to the fathers, it is written, "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things."—1 John ii. 20. In this fact appears one of the peculiar marks which distinguish this kingdom from all the kingdoms of this world. Not only the whole law of this kingdom is in the heart of every subject of our King, but by his Spirit the King himself dwells in each of his people. The fruit of that Spirit is love, which is the fulfilling of the whole law in them. This heavenly principle is the key to every secret chamber in the whole kingdom of heaven. As it is the fulfilling of the law, it is also the bond of perfect unity, which brings all who are thus united to dwell together in the fellowship of the gospel of Christ. The gift of these divinely blessed keys does not confer upon even the apostles the power to reverse the eternal counsel of God, by which the names of all the redeemed subjects of salvation are written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. The truth of God is irrevocably pledged that they shall never perish, having received of Jesus the gift of eternal life. That life is hid with Christ in God, and no power of earth or hell can ever penetrate that secret place of the Most High. The authority of the apostles is limited to rule in judgment in the organized church while here in time. For this office they were specially qualified by the gift of inspiration. They could not fail to render every decision which ever could be required in the temporal sojourn of the church, because they were led by that Spirit which "searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." The Lord promised that the Spirit should bring to their remembrance all things whatsoever he had spoken unto his disciples. Nothing less than this perfect direction could have qualified them for the important work to which they were called. Under this infallible guidance they could not err in establishing every principle of truth and righteousness according to the will of God. Hence, it is settled in the church that from the apostolic decisions there is no appeal. All that they have bound on earth is forever bound in heaven. Their judgment is the declaration of the infallible wisdom and knowledge of God, being the expression of that mind of Christ which moved them in all their official action.

"And whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." Our Lord himself declared to Pilate, "My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence."—John xviii. 36. It is evident, therefore, that the heaven and the earth in which the authority of his chosen apostles should be established is not the natural firmament and the earth which is under the curse of sin. Jesus himself refused to exercise his own authority in judging of temporal matters, as recorded Luke xii. 13, 14. Certainly he did not confer upon Peter or any of his disciples powers which he disclaimed for himself. The keys he gave were not of earthly authority. They were of the kingdom of heaven. It is not only expressly declared that this kingdom is not of this world, as our Lord said, but Paul by inspiration defines what that kingdom is.

He says to them who are "beloved of God, called saints," "Let not your good be evil spoken of; for the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost."—Rom. xiv. 16, 17. The keys which open the gates of this heavenly kingdom are the precepts and example of our Lord. In obedience to the commandments of Jesus his followers enter into the blessed experience of this kingdom. They always receive the answer of a good conscience toward God in observing the principle of the law of Christ. "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. For without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie."—Rev. xxii. 14, 15. Evidently this holy city is the new heavens and new earth, of which Isaiah was moved to prophesy. The keys of this kingdom being given to Peter as an apostle, does not signify that our Lord has transferred to him, or to all the apostles, his own sovereignty as the only and blessed Potentate who sits upon the eternal throne of the kingdom of heaven. The fact that the Lord gives these keys involves the truth of his own sovereign control of the kingdom as well as the keys. When he sent forth his apostles into all the world to preach the gospel to every creature, he asserted his universal dominion, saying, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." Less authority than this would have been insufficient for their qualification and protection. It is only as sustained by his omnipotence that they are able to fulfill the commission which he gave them. Peter and all the apostles and prophets unite in the ascription of supreme authority to our Redeemer, saying, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created."—Rev. iv. 11. Although Paul could claim to have labored more abundantly than all the apostles, he could not assume that he had power to do anything of himself. He says, "But by the grace of God I am what I am; and his grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain; but I labored more abundantly than they all; yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me."—1 Cor. xv. 10. It is repeatedly declared by the apostles that they were not of themselves able to do the wonderful works by which their divine authority was attested; they constantly ascribed all their power to the name of Jesus. As signified by the promise in our text, Jesus gives all the power of which the keys are emblematic; and it is absurd to understand that gift to make his servants independent of him from whom they have received all the power which is vested in them.

These keys are not like the instruments of a burglar which are designed to open locks to which they are not rightfully adapted. They belong exclusively to "the kingdom of heaven." Those keys which are fitted to the binding and loosing of earthly kingdoms are not such as our Lord has given to his inspired apostles, and such keys can never be applicable to the binding and loosing of things pertaining to the kingdom of heaven. Since the entrance of sin into the world it has been the unceasing effort of will-worshippers and idolaters to devise means by which to unlock those hidden mysteries of the kingdom of God which he has bound in the secret of his own eternal purpose. The power and wisdom of God ever has and ever will turn all such works to confusion; for he has called his Servant, our spiritual Eliakim, whom he upholds with his own omnipotence, and he has laid upon his shoulder the key of the house of David; "so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open."—Isaiah xxii. 22. The power and permanence of the action of the apostles is not in themselves as men; neither are they authorized to bind or loose anything in heaven or on earth, except as they are moved by the Spirit of Christ, who is their Master. Hence, the excellency of the power is of God, and not of Peter, nor of all the apostles. All the power of the keys is in the sovereign God who gives them to his chosen apostles. In common with all the inspired servants of God, the apostles only spoke with authority in their official judgment when they were moved by the Holy Ghost. That which was thus bound by them has all the infallibility of the direct voice of that God by whom they are set in thrones of judgment in the gospel kingdom. The church of Christ has no right to receive anything as binding upon the saints unless it bears the seal of apostolic authority; nor are the subjects of divine grace at liberty to disregard any doctrine or practice which the inspired judges have bound by their decision as recorded in the law of Christ. These holy keys of the kingdom of heaven are not to be treated with contempt by those who hope in the salvation which is revealed in Christ Jesus, for it is by his authority that the inspired apostles rule in judgment.

HEALING OF A LEPER.

"AND there came a leper to him, beseeching him, and kneeling down to him, and saying unto him, If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And Jesus, moved with compassion, put forth his hand, and touched him, and saith unto him, I will; be thou clean. And as soon as he had spoken, immediately the leprosy departed from him, and he was cleansed."—Mark i. 40-42.

Leprosy is the most expressive type of sin found in the Old Testament, and the law of Moses respecting it is very prolix. Although recognized by the law of Moses, yet that law prescribed no remedy for the cure of it. Nothing short of almighty power could remove the malady. While by the law is the knowledge of sin, yet by the law sin is not removed. But what the law could not do Jesus has accomplished. The law of Moses required that the leprous Israelite should show himself to the priest, and appointed certain sacrifices and ceremonies for his purification, and for restoring him to society, from which he had been separated. All this was but a ceremonial cleansing. It will be remembered that under the law the leper was excluded from the society of men; and when the disease infected the head he was required to wear or use the signals of deepest mourning. His clothes were to be rent, his head bare, and a covering upon his upper lip; and as he went he was to cry, "Unclean! unclean!" But what tokens of mourning are deep enough to express the leprosy of sin as it is felt by the spiritual Israelite, when the commandment comes, and sin appears exceeding sinful to him? He feels, as David has expressed it, "I am troubled; I am bowed down greatly; I go mourning all the day long. For my loins are filled with a loathsome disease: and there is no soundness in my flesh."—Psa. xxxviii. 6, 7.

"No bleeding bird, nor bleeding beast,
Nor hyssop branch, nor sprinkling priest,
Nor running brook, nor flood, nor sea,
Can wash the dismal stain away.

"Behold, I fall before thy face;
My only refuge is thy grace.
No outward forms can make me clean;
The leprosy lies deep within.

"Jesus, my God, thy blood alone
Hath power sufficient to atone.
Thy blood can make me white as snow;
No legal rites can cleanse me so."

The record in Mark does not inform us of the place where Jesus was when this poor leper came to him. It is a matter of little consequence. No more does it matter where we were, nor what were our peculiar surroundings, if Jesus has only healed us.

Simeon and they that were with him said to Jesus, "All men seek for thee." But Jesus said to them, "Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also; for therefore came I forth." If it were true that "he must needs go through Samaria" on a certain occasion, because one of the lost sheep was there, and required his ministrations as the good Shepherd, it is also true that "he must needs" journey at this particular time through the place where this distressed leper was. The steps of this good man were ordered of the Lord, and not one of them was without a purpose.

It is very evident that this leper had heard of the power of Jesus, though he had not himself experienced it; that he had heard of the marvelous cures of diseases that he had wrought, and was convinced that he was the promised Messiah, who, when he should come, should raise the dead, cast out devils, heal the lepers, &c. To our mind it is doubtful whether Jesus in the days of his flesh did ever perform a physical cure upon any one that was not a subject of saving faith; and all such cures were emblems of spiritual healing, and presented Jesus as the great Physician of souls, from whom alone sensible sinners can hope for a cure of that worst of maladies, the leprosy of sin. Hope sprang up in the heart of the poor leper that the compassionate Jesus might heal even him. Ceremonial cleansing he might hope for from the Jewish priest, when his disease had reached that point that he was leprous from head to foot; but ceremonial cleansing was not sufficient to satisfy him. He longed to be perfectly healed of the disease. He approaches the Savior in faith and hope. There is now no doubt in his mind as to the power and ability of Jesus to heal him. "If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." But he was a leper, unclean, and had no right to approach unto men. How dare he approach Jesus? But his faith and hope overleap all ceremonial bounds. Ceremonies are nothing to him now. He can but be repulsed and perish.

"I can but perish if I go;
I am resolved to try."

He goes forward, and falls at the feet of Jesus, saying, "If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." Here is pure worship, a belief in God as a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. "Lord, help me," was the worship of another wretched character mentioned in this same gospel. While he was bold, he was humble. He confesses with his mouth the Lord Jesus, and believes in his heart that he is God, and has power on earth to forgive sins and heal diseases; and such, it is declared, shall be saved. How many poor, distressed souls have felt and said, I fear that I am too great, too vile, a sinner for God to save. How can he remain just, and yet show mercy to me? But, like this poor leper, the time has come that they must "venture on his grace;" for Jesus has said, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out."

The record says that Jesus was "moved with compassion." What a merciful and compassionate Physician and High Priest is Jesus! "Such an High Priest became us." He is "easily touched with the feeling of our infirmities." "Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them." "He put forth his hand, and touched him." Had another touched the leper, he would have been defiled. But Jesus is not defiled by coming in contact with the touch of a leprous sinner. How wonderful is the touch of Jesus! How wonderful was the effect of his touch upon that leprous body! What a transformation! The leprosy departs, and the leper is cleansed. What a change! What a thrill must have passed through that body at the touch of the immaculate Savior of sinners! But the touch was not all; for it was followed by the words from the sweet lips of Jesus, "I will; be thou clean!" They were the kisses of his mouth. "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth; for thy love is better than wine." "His mouth is most sweet; yea, he is altogether lovely. This is my Beloved, and this is my Friend, O daughters of Jerusalem."—Song i. 2; v. 16.

ENCOURAGING.

THE interest which the brethren are taking in increasing the circulation of the SIGNS, as already manifested by the new subscribers sent us, leads us to hope that by another year we will be able to publish the paper weekly at one dollar a year. It is too early for us to say whether our list will be increased this year as much as it was last year; but we can say that thus far, since our notice to our paid-up old subscribers that we would accept from them one dollar a year for every new subscriber they might send us between now and the first of January next, the list has increased fully as fast, if not faster, than it did for the same length of time last year. As we have said before, our object in receiving new subscribers at so low a rate is to enable our old subscribers to remunerate themselves for their time and expense in assisting us in introducing the SIGNS among brethren who would not otherwise get it, and the hope that after the new subscriber has had it for one year, he will continue the subscription in after years. The new subscriptions we received last December do not expire until the end of this year, and we therefore cannot tell as yet how many will renew at two dollars. We request the brethren and friends of the paper who so kindly assisted in increasing the circulation last year, to use their influence in inducing those they obtained last year to renew their subscription for next year. The SIGNS has suffered a heavy loss of subscribers from various causes within the last few years, and we were becoming seriously alarmed lest after being sustained nearly sixty years, it should at last have to be discontinued for want of sufficient patronage; but from the interest which the brethren have shown in its welfare during the present year, both by their financial aid and their contributions to its columns, as well as by their private letters of approbation, we feel greatly encouraged. It does seem to us that at no time, unless it was at the time the paper was started, has the cause of truth needed such a publication more than at the present time.

Since starting the weekly we have not varied more than three hours in the time the paper has left this office; and if there has been any irregularity in its reaching its destination the fault has been in the mails, and not from any delay on our part.

We cannot promise any improvement in the matter contained in the paper next year, but we do hope to make an improvement in the mechanical part, for we have purchased a machine to paste and trim it; so that within a week or two our subscribers may expect to receive their paper with the four inside pages pasted in the four outer pages and open at the top, so that the paper will leaf the same as a book. This will be a great convenience to our readers, and we believe will be duly appreciated.

Thus far we are several hundred dollars behind on publishing the paper weekly, but we have decided, the Lord willing, to continue on, and again appeal to our brethren to continue their support, both in sustaining the expense and by their writings. As a semi-monthly our subscribers received 288 pages a year, but as a weekly they get 416 pages, an additional amount of 128 pages, or nearly one-half more than they received as a semi-monthly. To fill these extra pages we need our brethren and sisters to write for publication. We do not publish the paper to make a display of eloquence or rhetoric, but for the comfort and instruction of the saints scattered throughout the country, many of whom have no other means of communing with their brethren and sisters.

Now, brethren, we leave it with you to decide whether a weekly publication can be supported among us. The coming year will decide it. If we can receive the same increase of circulation that we received last year, and retain at two dollars a year a good share of those now on our list, which many of our friends received at one dollar, sacrificing their own dollar, then we cannot only continue weekly, but can do so at a reduced subscription price. We therefore repeat our

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!

From now until the first of next January, any one who is now a subscriber, and whose subscription is paid up, may send us new subscribers at one dollar a year; but no one, either new or old subscriber, can get the paper from this office for themselves at less than the regular rates. Any one who is not now a subscriber can have the benefit of the above terms by sending two dollars for their own subscription, and one dollar each for additional new subscribers.

Please make no mistake about the above terms. No one, either new or old subscriber, can send to this office and get the paper for themselves for less than the regular rates; but if any of our paid-up subscribers choose to sacrifice their commission and take the new subscriber for one dollar, that is their matter.

Again thanking you, dear brethren, sisters and friends, for the kind encouragement you have given in an hour of darkness and discouragement, we will close and await developments. If approved of God, we shall be sustained; if not, we pray that we may be enabled to say, "Thy will be done."

THANKS!

WE trust that it is with true feelings of thankfulness that we acknowledge in this number the contributions received to aid in sending the SIGNS to those who are not able to pay for it for themselves; not so much for the receipt of the money as for the spirit of christian love manifested. Financially we are not benefited, as we send the paper at below actual cost; but we do take great pleasure in entering the names of those on our list to whom we have had to deny the paper on account of their not being able to pay for it. We were carrying quite a number of gratuitous subscribers ourselves, but could not take all. We have now adopted the plan of keeping a list of all that appeal to us for the paper; and as fast as remittances are received we take from these names and place them on our subscription list, and notify the party sending the money to whose subscription his money was applied, and also the person receiving the paper to whose kindness they are indebted for the same.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

By request of brother Jesse Arnold, I attempt to write the obituary notice of his wife, sister Fannie Arnold, who died at their home in Juniata Co., Pa., near the Tuscarora Church, in the afternoon of July 1st, 1889, in the 46th year of her age.

The deceased was a daughter of the late Elder Joseph Correll, by whom she was baptized. Her disease was complicated, but her most distressing suffering was caused by her heart and dropsy. No doubt many of those who were at the Baltimore Association in May, and attended the meetings held at their house in the evenings, will remember the sweet, gentle face of our dear departed sister. She had been a great sufferer for about five years, but bore it with such cheerful resignation as is seldom witnessed; yet it did not seem so to her. She would often speak of her lack of patience, and say, "If I could only learn to bear my suffering without complaining;" but to those about her, I think, she ever appeared patient and kind. She was affectionately known in the neighborhood as "Aunt Fannie," and was certainly loved by all who knew her. To me she was one of the dearest, best friends here below; and while it is sad to think that we can never see her dear face again, yet what a sweet comfort to feel that our sorrow is nothing when compared with the joy and happiness which we trust is now hers in that blissful abode, where she will never know pain nor suffering again. Her chief delight was in hearing the gospel, and in reading the Bible and the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. On Sunday afternoon before she died Elder Francis was at their house. She requested that he should preach, which he did, and she seemed to enjoy it very much. They had no children, but she leaves a devoted and affectionate husband, who, with a skillful physician and kind friends, did all they could for her comfort. May brother Arnold be comforted in the thought of "who has done it," and that he knows what is best, and doeth all things well.

ONE WHO LOVED HER.

It is my sad duty to report the death of our beloved brother and Deacon, John Cockerill. He was born April 6th, 1801, and was baptized in 1825 by Elder Johnson, then pastor of Frying Pan Church, Fairfax Co., Va., and was chosen Deacon of that church in October, 1832. He died at the home of his granddaughter, in Fairfax Co., Va., Nov. 19th, 1889. It has been my privilege, and greatly to my advantage, I think, to know him for the last ten or twelve years as Deacon of the Frying Pan Church, which I serve. He was a noble soldier of the cross. Kindly, firmly and conscientiously did he serve the church, knowing only the Master's honor. He was indeed a dear child of God, beloved by us all, and against whom there was never a breath of suspicion, to my knowledge. With us his name and his character are as pure and as clear as the crystal fountain and as the song of the nightingale. A few days before his death he told his brother (Wm. W. Cockerill, a brother in the flesh and also in the church, himself about 84 years of age) the reason of his hope, to his entire satisfaction.

It is hard to part with such, yet there is no regret save for ourselves. To die is gain for them, but to us to live is gain. I tried to preach on the occasion of his burial from 2 Cor. v. 1-4. May the good Lord comfort the mourners, is my prayer, for Jesus' sake.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

"In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GOOD AND PERFECT GIFTS.

"EVERY good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."—James i. 17.

The religion of the world does not deal in gifts, but in wages. Man is too proud by nature to want a religion which presents utter helplessness and abject wretchedness on the one side, and gifts, only gifts, on the other. One may acknowledge all that the Scriptures say of the condition of man as a sinner, totally depraved, helpless; but if he has not been made to know this by a personal experience of it through the quickening power of the Holy Spirit he will be sure to seek a religion which requires work as a condition of salvation, and will expect and desire the favor of God only on the ground of having earned it. He regards heavenly blessings as rewards, not as gracious and merciful gifts, entirely undeserved; and never, until divine life is given him as a light by which to see his justly condemned condition, will he "learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice."—Matt. ix. 13.

The people of God have only gifts to speak of in the dealings of God with them; gifts amazing, because so entirely unmerited and unexpected. All the wages that ever shall be given to men they have already received. "The wages of sin is death." The natural man is dead in sin, but does not know it. These have been given the power to know their own death state, to feel the just condemnation which all are under. "Death hath passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."—Rom. v. 12. "When the commandment came, sin revived, and I died."—Rom. vii. 9. The power by which we realize this state of sin and death in which we lie is itself a gift, the first of all the rich and glorious gifts of God, including all that follow. "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Rom. vi. 23. This life is the only light by which men can see sin, and know its power reigning unto death; and therefore this first, this precious gift, is the cause of all the experience of trouble and affliction by the children of God, for without it there could be no godly sorrow for sin. "In him was life; and the life was the light of men."—John i. 4. "All things that are reprov'd [or discovered] are made manifest by the light:

for whatsoever doth make manifest is light."—Eph. v. 13. It is an infinite blessing for one to know that he is a vile sinner, to know that all his strength is weakness, his wisdom foolishness, and his righteousness filthy rags. "Your God hath given you treasure in your sacks," said the steward to Joseph's brethren.—Gen. xliii. 23. The money thrown back upon them as worthless, and in a manner to make them appear guilty, was a treasure. To learn that our works are worthless, to learn that with them we have not paid for the favor of God, and never can—this, though it brings at first the most overwhelming sorrow of soul, and confusion of face before God, is a treasure of untold value, a priceless blessing. "Blessed are the poor in spirit." "Blessed are they that mourn."

The first effect, therefore, of life is to clear away the rubbish of self-righteousness, self-confidence, self-complacency, pride in one's fancied power and goodness, and thus make room for the precious gifts of the dear Savior, who is himself the unspeakable gift of God, and with whom are given "all things." By the light of life the sinner is shown to himself in all his hideous deformity, is made to "know the plague of his own heart," and is thus brought in misery and wretchedness and self-aborrence to the gates of the grave. His mourning, when he "knows his own sore and his own grief" (1 Kings viii. 38; 2 Chron. vi. 29, 30), is such that his soul refuses to be comforted.—Psalm lxxvii. 2. Comfort only comes to those who are in this trouble, as life comes to the dead, by the gracious command of God. All this affliction is but the needed preparation of the poor soul to appreciate and rejoice in and be thankful for the infinite riches of the good and perfect gifts of God to him.

"A gift is as a precious stone in the eyes of him that hath it: whithersoever it turneth it prospereth."—Prov. xvii. 8. It always bears the marks and characteristics of its divine source. It never turns toward the earth, nor draws the mind of its favored possessor to the vain things of time, but always points to eternal and infinitely holy and glorious things, thus always causing prosperity, though this prosperity is at the expense of earthly good, never coming but through the cross of Christ. These good and perfect gifts are precious only in the eyes of them that have them. Their infinite and unspeakable value is known to them alone; therefore they are not desired by any others, but despised. Man by nature is too proud and vain to be seeking for gifts of this kind, as though he were a vile outcast and beggar. Even those who are not ashamed to beg for gifts of worldly value, but will greedily receive all they can obtain even by false pretensions of need, will scorn the intimation that the favors of God must be received by them, if received at all, as gifts of which they are in no wise worthy. The pride of man causes him to expect the personal esteem of the Lord on account of personal merit. He believes that God is a respecter of persons, and that he regards with favor none who are not personally distinguished by some righteousness of their own, either inherited from righteous parents, or obtained by their own good works. Those who in their own esteem have thus distinguished and exalted themselves in the sight of God cannot but look down upon other men, and especially upon such as acknowledge themselves vile, and make no claim but upon the ground of mercy; for they cannot for a moment allow the thought that they are vile, much less that they are the chief of sinners. If they will admit that they ever were very great sinners, as some notorious criminals who have professed to have been converted must, they are more lifted up with pride, on account of having raised themselves so high. How lightly such persons regard sin, how insignificant in their view is the holy law of God, when a declaration that they mean to serve the Lord, and cease their vicious and criminal practices, will, in their esteem, be a sufficient satisfaction for and put out of sight all the sins and crimes of their former life, and at once lift them to a high seat among the righteous, and give them a good title to all the good things of heaven as a reward. What do those who regard themselves as righteous want of gifts? It is rewards they look for, rewards to which they feel justly entitled. They have no doubt that the Lord is pleased with them on account of what they have done. "They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men." "Their eyes stand out with fatness; they have more than heart can wish." If it shall not please the Lord to bring them up from their death state to a knowledge of their justly condemned condition as sinners, how terrible will be their awakening when they shall hear the words of the righteous Judge, saying, "Depart from me, ye workers of iniquity. I never knew you." "How are they brought into desolation as in a moment! They are utterly consumed with terrors."—Psa. lxxiii. 19.

"Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above." Then those who are favored to receive these gifts are absolutely free from any dependence upon an arm of flesh. No thanks are due to any one on earth for anything that is good and perfect; and they can certainly do without anything else. They may well rejoice in the afflictions through which they have been made to lose all confidence in the flesh; for there is nothing that man can give them or do for them of permanent value or lasting benefit, since every good and perfect gift is from above. There is also no cause to fear what man can do unto them, since he who gives all good and perfect gifts is infinite in power and without shadow of turning. Let us look over some of these precious gifts. Children sometimes look over the gifts of dear parents who have left them, and are comforted as they thus recall to mind the tender affection and loving care which prompted the gift. A dear friend is often brought very vividly before the mind by some gift bestowed upon us in former years. So what comfort there is sometimes for the dear children of God, even in seasons of darkness and sorrow, when they are enabled to contemplate the gifts of their heavenly Father and most loving Friend, and remember the love and goodness and tender mercies manifested to them in the years of the right hand of the Most High.

Jesus is the great, all-sufficient, "unspeakable gift" of God, in whom are included all other heavenly gifts. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 16. "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him."—1 John iv. 9. To the woman at Jacob's well he spoke of himself as the gift of God, and declared the blessings that would certainly follow a knowledge of that gift.—John iv. 10. "He loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it."—

Eph. v. 25. Infinitely blessed is he who can by precious faith say, "Who loved me, and gave himself for me."—Gal. ii. 20. "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift."—2 Cor. ix. 14. Life is the first gift to contemplate, for its possession is necessary to any other. But Jesus is our life.—Col. iii. 4. "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Rom. vi. 23. Righteousness is as necessary a gift as life in order that heavenly gifts may be enjoyed; for none can appear before God, or be known by him, without it. But Jesus is our Righteousness. "The Lord our Righteousness" is the name by which he shall be called; and so closely united are he and his people that his name as the heavenly Husband belongs to them as the bride.—Jer. xxiii. 6; xxxiii. 16. Righteousness is the only road through which the reigning power of grace can bring any of the fallen race of man unto eternal life; and that is all by Jesus Christ our Lord.—Rom. v. 21. But while all gifts are in a sense included in this first gift of Jesus, our Life and Righteousness, let us consider some of them separately, and see if we may not find some evidences that they have been bestowed upon us, and that therefore Jesus, who is always and only manifested through them, is ours. For it is characteristic of the heirs of these blessed gifts that they are greatly inclined to doubt their right to them; not because they do not know and love and value and greatly desire them, but because they feel themselves so unworthy to receive such heavenly favors, and constantly see more of that unworthiness in themselves; forgetting that the gifts are in and through Jesus, whose worthiness, and not theirs, is regarded; and forgetting that a gift bestowed because of especial worthiness would be a reward.

The Holy Spirit is the gift of the Father, and is sent by the Father and the Son.—John xiv. 16, 26; xvi. 7. He was not given until after Jesus was glorified, and is therefore the gift of God to the church in the gospel dispensation.—John vii. 35. This Spirit of truth is a gift which the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; therefore no natural man can receive or know anything about any of the things of the Spirit, or the gifts of God. For this Spirit is expressly given to the saints, "that they may know the things that are freely given to them of God."—1 Cor. ii. 9-14. Only as he takes of the things of Jesus, "which God has prepared for them that love him," and shows them unto his people, no man on earth can know them; for "The things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God." Therefore we are sure that all the schools and institutions of a religious character established by men, of whatever order and pretensions, are vain, and only show the ignorance of the carnal mind concerning those things.

"All things that the Father hath are mine: therefore said I that he [the Comforter,] 'the Spirit of truth' shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you."—John xvi. 7-15. Therefore he is called the Comforter; for the things which are freely given to us of God, and which he hath revealed unto us by his Spirit, are the only source of true and lasting comfort for the people of God while in this world of sin and care and sorrow.

Repentance is the peculiar gift of Jesus, who was exalted with the right hand of God to give repentance unto Israel, with the forgiveness of sins.—Acts v. 31. The godly sorrow for sin, which works repentance, must therefore be his gift and a rich blessing. "Blessed are they that mourn." "They shall come with weeping, and with supplication will I lead them."—Jer. xxxi. 9. No other way of approach unto God; no other road from the prison-house of the law to the heights of Zion, where they shall all come and sing.—Jer. xxxi. 12; 2 Cor. vii. 10. "I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me."—Jer. xxxi. 40. "The fear of the Lord is to hate evil." This makes it "a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death," and causes that by which all godly sorrow for sin is produced to be called the Lord's treasure (Isa. xxxiii. 6), "the beginning of wisdom," and "the beginning of knowledge." It is a perfectly clean and pure principle, and can never be corrupted or destroyed. "The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring forever."—Psa. xix. 9. This is the spiritual meaning of the language of Joseph's stewards, "Your God hath given you treasure in your sacks." Have you felt sorrow in your heart on account of sin? That is the gift of God, a good and perfect gift. Has your soul turned with mourning and abhorrence from your sins, and from yourself on account of your depraved nature, and from your fancied works of righteousness, as seeing them to be vain and but as "filthy rags?" Have you felt that the publican's cry for mercy was all that was left you? That is repentance, the gift of Jesus Christ; and with it is always given the forgiveness of sins. Thus the deepest sorrows and heaviest afflictions that the heart of man can feel, as well as the repentance unto life and the forgiveness of sins which invariably follow the experience of this sorrow, are good and perfect gifts which are from above.

When Jesus ascended on high he received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord God might dwell among them.—Psalm lxviii. 18. Their captivity under the law is broken up and destroyed forever, and there is now therefore no condemnation for them. This makes Zion a place of glorious liberty in Christ Jesus, and the perfection of beauty to those who are prepared to look upon it, for out of it God shines.—Psa. 1. 2. All these gifts Jesus received as the Head, and gave to them; and in and through these gifts the Lord God dwells among them, and they through the blessed power of these gifts grow up into him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ.—Eph. iv. 8-16. By these gifts the man of God is thoroughly furnished in the Scriptures unto all good works. They are all in Jesus, "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." While these gifts are freely bestowed upon the people of God, and enjoyed by them in all their riches and sweetness and power, they can never be in any manner or degree separated from Jesus; nor can any man, however wise or strong, find out the hiding place, or obtain one of them. Wherever one of the heavenly gifts is, there Jesus is. The love of God, that "is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us," is still in Jesus Christ, and therefore no creature can separate us from it.—Rom. viii. 39. The grace which brings salvation to the people of God, and which instructs, supports and comforts them, was given them in Christ before the world began, and is still in him; and whenever we are privileged to behold his glory, he appears to us "full of grace and truth."

The gracious and glorious gifts of the ascended Savior to his people, which are "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ," are in Jesus as fully after they are thus given as they were before, and more manifestly. He gives them, but does not part with them. In him they are preserved for the benefit of the church until their perfecting work shall be done. If one of them should be for a moment given into the care and keeping of the best and wisest man that ever lived on earth, it would be forever lost to the church. But they all remain in him, and only by his power and in his name can one of them be used. Apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers, all are earthen vessels, in which it pleased him to give the gospel treasure, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of men. He holds and handles these vessels as he will, and by his hand the refreshing treasure of gospel truth is poured out unto his thirsty people in infinite wisdom as they need. When the poor and needy come from the uttermost parts of the earth to see the wisdom of our spiritual Solomon, when they "see the house that he has built, and the meat of his table, and the sitting of his servants, and the attendance of his ministers, and their apparel, and his cupbearers, and his ascent by which he went up into the house of the Lord," they are so astonished at the order established by him, and the wisdom displayed in all his work, that there is no more of their own spirit left in them, and they acknowledge that the half was never told them of his wisdom and prosperity, while they bless his holy and glorious name.—1 Kings x. 1-14.

When we look upon things that are seen, and our own spirit is engaged in observing and judging, we think we see great disorder and confusion in the Zion of God, and are often in great distress on account of fearful apprehensions of disaster to the church of God; and, perhaps, filled and fired with zeal and self-confidence, we put forth our hand in energetic efforts to save the ark of God from destruction, because we have seen it jostled a little. But when we are looking with spiritual eyes, we see only Jesus and his wisdom and power in all that we behold, and such perfection appears in him that we can perfectly trust him. We then know that he places all his servants where he wants them to sit, and clothes all his ministers, and causes them to attend upon him, and do his bidding, and spreads his table with just what he desires his people to eat and drink, and sends morsels of his rich provision and cups of refreshing water and cheering wine by the hand of whom he will, to every hungry and thirsty soul at just the right time. No one is overlooked or forgotten. "Bread shall be given them, and their waters shall be sure." We behold a King reigning in righteousness, who has left nothing dependent upon any one of all his servants. He has appointed princes to rule in judgment, but has not left the welfare of his people to depend upon them as men. The apostles have done their appointed work, and are now seen as a crown of twelve stars upon the head of the church. According to that light, coming from the Sun, but given forth by them, the church is directed in her walk. When the order thus established is attained unto by any visible church, peace and prosperity abound in that church. The prophets proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ just when and where the King wills that they shall; and no power on earth could cause one to preach a word of gospel truth when Jesus has not sent him with that word as a special message. Every evangelist is taking just the tour which the King has ordered. If one could take a tour not thus especially ordered, he would be while on that tour one of those of whom the Lord says, "They run, but I have not sent them," and would not be the gift of Jesus to his people. The pastors are ruling, and the teachers are teaching, in the name and by the authority of Jesus, in such places in his church as he has assigned them. All is orderly and quiet in the spiritual Jerusalem. When we look upon Zion our eyes behold Jerusalem a quiet habitation, and we have no reason to complain of our King as having overlooked anything, or failed to fulfill his will in any part of Zion, or as having made any mistakes.

The trouble with us is that we so often are regarding the earthen vessel, which is full of faults. We sometimes want to choose the kind of a vessel from which we or others shall be supplied; and sometimes we claim it as our right to fill the vessel—to tell the preacher what to preach here or there. We very often want to be consulted as to where the vessel shall be placed. Sometimes dear saints have insisted upon having a vessel placed where they judge it would be most useful, and then have found that they had done a most wretched piece of work, perhaps providing themselves with a broken cistern. But this they will learn in their humiliation for their comfort, that they have neither advanced nor hindered the work of their King. We want our own way, but we shall not be allowed to have it, for it would not be good for us. We want some responsible work to do in directing the affairs of Zion, but we shall not be allowed such ground for boasting. Only One directs, and each servant is required only to do each day what is then commanded him, and not look to the result, so that he be absolutely sure the work has been commanded him. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." We want the earthen vessel that holds such precious treasure exalted and praised. But that cannot be allowed. In one way or another we are kept in mind that they are only earthen vessels, and we sometimes get very fretful about it, and impatient with the poor servant because he is so entirely earthen—no part gold, or silver, or even any material that can be turned to other account.

All the dissensions, all the noise and strife, which we think we see in the city (Psa. lv. 9), are a part of the "all things" which work together for the good of those who love God, who are the called according to his purpose. No affliction of any kind can be stolen away by men or devils out of this wonderful array of "all things." To us it looks sad and gloomy when we see such troubles among brethren, and we cannot but desire and strive to restore peace. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." That is our privilege. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord." That is the command in just such straits and afflictions. If we insist on carrying it ourselves, we shall fall under it; but when we are in sweet trust and confidence enabled to cast it upon the Lord (Psa. lv. 22), we are made to know that our Savior rules in Zion; that no hand but his will ever be allowed to steady the ark; that he will sustain under the heaviest burden all who cast that burden on him, for he will never suffer the righteous to be moved from the foundation on which he has placed them; that his church can never be harmed, for he is her defense against every enemy, and will help her right early, and will not allow any weapon formed against her to prosper; that every wave of trouble that is allowed to dash over any of his people, over any of the churches of our God, is for some purpose of good to them; that he by storms often clears the atmosphere of pestilential vapors, clears the church of poisonous errors, removes false professors, breaks down self-dependence by dissolving partnerships which we have made, or which we would prolong; as when Paul and Barnabas, both servants of God, parted asunder and went to separate fields of labor. In one way or another the dear Lord makes all his people know how helpless they are, how vain it is to put any trust in man, and causes them to look unto him as their only Helper, as "the Hope of Israel, the Savior thereof in time of trouble." Then can we say, as the queen of Sheba did, "Happy are thy men, and happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee, and hear thy wisdom. Blessed be the Lord thy God, which delighted in thee to set thee on his throne, to be king for the Lord thy God: because thy God loved Israel, to establish them forever, therefore made he thee king over them, to do judgment and justice."—2 Chron. ix. 7, 8, 12. We find, as she did, that his gifts to us are equal to all our desire, and we are satisfied with the goodness of his house.—Psa. lxxv. 4.

These gifts are good, and goodness is found nowhere else. "There is none good but one, that is God." In the work of salvation "God was manifest in the flesh," and thus "prepared of his goodness for the poor;" and when the power of these gifts is blessedly felt in the soul we can say, "O how great is thy goodness which thou hast wrought for them that fear thee; which thou hast laid up for them that trust in thee before the sons of men."—Psa. xxxi. 19. Perfection is here alone, and through the preaching of Jesus, and the warnings and instructions of his servants, every man of his redeemed is presented perfect in him.—Col. i. 28. Who can tell all the goodness of these gifts, or estimate their value? They cover all the ground of our need. We love to think them over. There is rest to the laboring and heavy laden; bread to the hungry; light to those who sit in darkness, and eyes to the blind, that they may see it; to those who mourn in Zion there is "beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness;" "peace that passeth understanding" to the one harassed by a ceaseless warfare; "love that passeth knowledge" to the one who hates his own life; and to the soul sunk low in sorrow "joy that is unspeakable and full of glory." But while we are naming some of these precious gifts which are from above, we must not omit the rebukes that are evidences of God's love (Rev. iii. 19), and that manifest love to God in the heart of a wise man (Prov. ix. 8); the "re-proofs of instruction that are the way of life" (Prov. vi. 23), and the chastisements and scourgings which prove that we are received as sons of God.—Heb. xii. 6-8. These are gifts from the same loving hand which dispenses all pleasant blessings, and are for our good, working in us that which is well-pleasing in God's sight. They bring into manifestation meekness, humbleness of mind, tenderness of heart, long-suffering, and all such sweet, spiritual gifts and graces.

"From above." The apostle implies the possibility of his beloved brethren erring on this important point, and so getting to esteem something of an earthly origin above its true value, as a source of help and comfort. It is necessary to remember that every gift that is good and perfect is from above, and also that it comes down from the Father of lights. What a wonderful title! All true light is begotten of him in the soul. All besides that, however highly esteemed as light among men, is gross darkness. All the saints were some time darkness, but now are they light in the Lord.—Eph. v. 8. They are "children of the light." The infinite value of these gifts is more fully expressed by thus naming him from whom they come down, "the Father of lights." In contemplating gifts received from earthly relations and friends, there must be sadness mingled with our pleasure on account of the constant changes that occur on earth, and the variable character of all the race of man. Perhaps the dear one who had such tender regard for us, and whose amiable qualities are freshly brought to our mind by the gift now looked upon, has gone from earth, and we are sad that we see the dear face and hear the loved voice no more. Or it may be that a sudden change has taken place, and that this gift, once so highly prized as a token of love, now reminds us that love for us has gone out in that heart, and that he who once held us in affectionate esteem now fills his mind with bitter thoughts concerning us, and "whets his tongue like a sword" when he speaks of us, and "bends his bow to shoot his arrows, even bitter words." Yes, it is sad to look over the gifts of earthly friends, for they cannot tell us certainly what that friend is to us now. But not so in regard to these heavenly gifts, for with the Giver of them there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. What any one of these gifts expressed of his love when bestowed upon us first, it expresses now. "He is the same yesterday, and to day, and forever." We cannot mourn this Friend as removed from us by death, for "he ever liveth." We cannot, or ought not, think of him as having forgotten us, or turned to be our enemy; for "He is in one mind, and who can turn him?" "Having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them to the end." It is because he is the Lord, and changes not, that we are not consumed.

Thus when tempted to doubt the continuance of his love and care for us, we are made to remember the years of the right hand of the Most High, and consider the impossibility of a change with him. Did we ever feel his love in our hearts? Then it is ours world without end, for his is "an everlasting love." Did we ever feel one pang of godly sorrow for sin? Then all the rich array of good and perfect gifts is ours forever—repentance, forgiveness of sins, patience, experience, hope that maketh not ashamed, with love and all the glorious train; for "The gifts and callings of God are without repentance;" without change of purpose on his part.

Then look them over, dear kindred in Christ; consider these precious gifts, dear, doubting, mourning friends. Gather them up from the past, call them forth when they are hidden away in the heart that was once made glad by them. Can you not see and feel some assurance that they were once yours? If we cannot be so sure of the bright and happy tokens, yet we may be certain of those darker experiences which are presented in the Scriptures as absolute assurances of our heirship to all the gifts of God. Poverty of spirit, mourning, a sense of utter unworthiness, sighs and cries for mercy, hungerings and thirstings after righteousness; all who have felt these things are heirs of the kingdom of God. His love has been with them, and has at times made the bitter sweet to them; for without love to him no such affliction could be possible; and all such, after they have been tried, shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

SILAS H. DURAND.

SOUTHAMPTON, Pa., Nov. 30, 1889.

"AND Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking. Wherefore she said unto Abraham, Cast out this bond-woman and her son: for the son of this bond-woman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac. And the thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight because of his son. And God said unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad, and because of thy bond-woman; in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice; for in Isaac shall thy seed be called."—Gen. xxi. 9-12.

DEAR BRETHREN EDITORS:—A sister, who subscribes herself "A little one in tribulation," requests my views of the above Scriptures. A volume might be written of the shadow and substance of the text, and the half would not be told. If our sister will read the third and fourth chapters of Paul's letter to the Galatian brethren, she will find a condensed and the most perfect elucidation of these Scriptures that has ever been given. I need not be tedious, but only note briefly a few points in each verse.

Paul sets forth these two women, Hagar and Sarah, and their two sons, as an allegory of the two covenants and their people. Hagar represents the Sinai covenant. "For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem, which now is, and is in bondage with her children." It was impossible for Hagar, a bond-woman, to give birth to a free child, though Abraham be its father. That old Sinai covenant was a system of bondage from beginning to end, and the observing of its ceremonies never could give life to a dead sinner. "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law," and we would have no need of Christ. The law, instead of giving life, only gives a knowledge of sin. "Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made." Wherefore serveth Hagar? She was added to Abraham to bring forth this bond-son, because of the transgression of Sarah in becoming impatient to wait upon the Lord to fulfill his promise to give them a seed. The church has sometimes become impatient in waiting upon the Lord to add to their number, and has resorted to unlawful measures to hasten on the work; but it has only resulted in getting bond-people into the ranks; and they have had to be cast out, and there was grief and division. The years from 1832 to 1840 afford proof of that fact.

Our mother Eve was a bond-woman as soon as she transgressed the law; and it was impossible for her, or any of her daughters, to give birth to a child free from sin. "Ye must be born again."

Every false system of religion and counterfeit church is made up mostly of children of the bond-woman; and when they meet together at their appointed places, and the doctors with them, and they are confined for a week or more at the time, and have an increase of proselytes, like Leah of old they will say, "Now therefore my husband will love me." Leah never was the legal wife of Jacob. He never served one hour for her. He never loved her. But she continued to court his favor, and believed in the hireling system; but she did not win him. His love for Rachel was immutable, and he loved Rachel's boys. "Leah was tender-eyed," and her boys must have inherited the same defect. They could not see the doctrine of election, and mocked at Joseph's dreams. They did not believe in absolute predestination, and sold Joseph, to try to have things their own way. I am fearful that it is some of Leah's weak-eyed sons that have cast our sister out of their synagogue for believing absolute predestination. But if she is firm in the faith, the Lord will be with her, as he was with Joseph. If she is like I am, she would as soon be outside as inside, or would as soon belong to a church that had Sunday School, as to be in one that has a non-fellowship resolution against predestination.

Ishmael and his mocking represents the people of the Sinai covenant (the Jews) and their mocking at Christ and the disciples. We read that "The men that took Jesus mocked." "And Herod, with his men of war, set him at naught, and mocked him." And the soldiers "bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews!" And when he was suspended upon the cross, the chief priests mocking, said among themselves, with the scribes, "He saved others; himself he cannot save." This mocking continued among them till the sun was darkened, the vail of the temple and the rocks were rent; and as soon as this shock was over, "Some, when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, mocked."

Ishmael must have been ignorant of the bond state of his mother, and did not comprehend his own bondage. He had Abraham to his father, and his mocking signified that he did not feel to be in bondage to any man. So the Jews seemed to be ignorant of the bondage of their mother (the law), and did not comprehend their own bond state. They claimed Abraham as their father, and declared that they were never in bondage to any man. Time would almost fail us to speak of the instincts of the two people, so nearly the same.

The casting out of the bond-woman and her son points to the end of the ceremonies of the Sinai covenant (the law); and the casting out of that people, and the giving of the inheritance of the gospel church, to the true heirs, that were born by promise, and born of the Spirit. When John the Baptist came preaching in the wilderness, he rejected all who could not bring forth fruits worthy of repentance. By this mark he could detect the free heirs from the children of the bond-woman. And John said unto those rejected ones, "And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees. Every tree therefore which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire."—Luke iii. 9. Christ said, "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."—Matt. xxi. 43.

The grief of Abraham, mentioned in verse eleven, must point to the lamentation of Christ over Jerusalem. Ishmael was Abraham's son in the flesh, and he had sympathy for him. The Jews were related to Christ in the flesh; they were his own, that he came unto, and they received him not. He knew their end, and felt for them, and says, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!"—Matt. xxiii. 37. The command of God to Abraham, in verse twelve, to hearken unto the voice of Sarah, and his obedience, point to the command of the Father to the Son, and his willingness at all times to do the will of him that sent him. He says, "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." The Son of God was not a free agent. He was bound by the immutable will of the Father; and his delight was to do all of that will, and not to conform to the will of men. "And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." This gospel was preached to Abraham when the Lord called him from among his kindred in Ur of the Chaldees; and these words of the Lord to Abraham, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called," were to fully assure Abraham that Isaac, and not Ishmael, was the heir in which his seed (Christ) was to be called. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." If we trace up the genealogy of Christ, or Joseph, his supposed father, we find that it never touches Esau, Ishmael or Cain. "Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob, and Jacob begat Judas and his brethren."—Matt. i. 2. And Paul says, "For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Juda."—Heb. vii. 14. "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."—Gal. iii. 29.

I have extended this writing longer than I expected when I began, and have omitted much that might be said. Those verses are an index to a large body of matter that is interesting. If I have written nothing that is edifying and instructing, I hope that I have not darkened counsel by words without knowledge. If we have only one talent of this ministry, and it very small, I do not understand that we are to bury it to escape criticism.

Yours in gospel fellowship,

HANNIBAL, Mo., Nov. 26, 1889.

MY DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I feel this morning a desire to thank the God of all comfort for putting it into your mind and heart to publish in the SIGNS of the 20th inst. the precious words of the late Joseph Irons upon the priesthood of Aaron, which I have just read with peculiar pleasure, joy and comfort, in the midst of my many trials, afflictions, doubts and fears as to whether indeed I have a good hope through grace abounding to the chief of sinners; whether I am an Israelite, a child of God, or not.

After reading the sermon through (for such it is; a gospel sermon, too) I felt to exclaim, as I laid the paper down, Surely I am indeed in the number of "the children of Israel;" and I could and did rejoice in Christ Jesus, having no confidence in the flesh. He has laid down the way-marks so clearly of the experience of the "afflicted and poor people," that I thought all who read it, and had been taught of the Lord, let their doubts, fears and trials be what they may (and who has more than myself?), could upon reading it but exclaim, with a poor, doubting one, "Lord, I believe: help thou mine unbelief." O that I could at all times bring all my numerous sins, trials and afflictions to our ever-glorious and precious antitypical High Priest, our Lord Jesus Christ, realizing that he bears the judgment of the children of Israel before the Lord upon his heart continually. O what a blessed sin-bearer; not sometimes, but "continually," evermore. That portion, no, every portion, is so beautifully and comfortably set forth that we can rejoice in it, and say with the psalmist, "The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad." These precious things are for "the children of Israel" only. As he says, they have nothing to do with Philistines, nor Ammonites, nor Moabites.

If I were to write all day I could not add to the fullness, nor the beauty, the glory and comfort of what is there written; neither did I take my pencil for any such purpose, but only to bear testimony to its excellence and the precious truth, and to call the attention of any who may not have read it to do so, and to those who have to read it again. I know the Lord alone can apply the precious truth to our comfort. O what a blessed Comforter is the Spirit of truth, "whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him."

Of this blessed antitypical Aaron, our Lord Jesus, the apostle to the Philippians says, "God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name: that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow," "and every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." And the prophet Isaiah records the same exalted truth. Well, now, after reading such precious, consoling truth, even in this one number of the SIGNS, and there are fifty-one more in a volume, with many just as good as this 20th number, who will feel like discontinuing it? Then I hope all will still assist in sending forth to the scattered children of God these precious "gems" of truth, to the end that we may all be comforted together. It is my desire that all on my list will continue; and should this meet their eyes before the present volume expires, I hope they will consider how much of comfort they would lose, and be induced to continue. May the Lord bless his dear covenant people according to his eternal purpose, which he purposed in himself before the world was; and unto his holy and reverend name be praises now and evermore.

Your unworthy brother and companion in tribulation,

W. F. KERCHEVAL.

BATH, Maine, Nov. 24, 1889.

MY DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS:—I have felt for a long time as if I would like to write to you all, and tell you I enjoy reading the SIGNS, and am glad it comes every week. I would like to write of the power and wisdom of God, for it includes everything. God has all power, and knows all things, and this is the God I desire to love and worship. I am glad I have a name and place with the people who love to hear God exalted. Although I know I am unworthy of their love and fellowship, yet I want it, and it seems as if I could not endure this life without it. I often feel cast down, mourn an absent God, am led into darkness, find a warfare that I must engage in, on account of sin dwelling in me, and I cannot do the things I would. I often fear I have not been taught of the Lord, and try to think of some passage of Scripture that gave me comfort; and when I have taken my Bible and found a passage, it is all sealed up. I have one place in my experience where I knew I was a lost sinner; and when every prop was taken away, Jesus was revealed as the Savior of sinners, and the love of God was shed abroad in my heart. I know there was a change here, for my sorrow was turned into joy. I know I shall never be told, while I travel here, that I am a child of God; but amid my doubts and fears, darkness and unbelief, my mind will be led back to places in my experience, and I shall be told "again" that Jesus lives forevermore, and because he lives I shall live also. I do rejoice because God reigns and does all things well; yet I am sorrowful on account of sin in my members. I can read of other's complaints, and feel satisfied that they are children of God, taught of him; but oftentimes when I experience the same complaints I feel sure I cannot have been taught of the Lord. I cannot reach out and take them as evidences for myself. Sin is mixed with all I do, and causes me to mourn; but God always comforts me in his own time and way. I desire to be found declaring his works with rejoicing, speaking of his power, goodness, love and mercy; for I know I am a sinner, and can have no confidence in the flesh. The name of Jesus is precious to me, because he came to save sinners; and I have felt a joy that is not of this world in the assurance that he finished the work, and his people are saved with an everlasting salvation. Their life is hid with Christ in God. I am glad Jesus is my hope; for, sinful though I am, it enables me to rejoice at times that by and by I shall be free from sin, shall see him as he is, and be like him. I can say with David, "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness."

Dear brethren Beebe, do with this as you think best. I had decided not to send it; but I received a letter from brother Chick, which made me think I would send it, and leave it with you. My desire is to exalt the God of my salvation.

Your unworthy sister,
ATTIE A. CURTIS.

HURRICANE BRANCH, Tenn., Oct. 29, 1889.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I much appreciate our dear old family paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I have just finished reading the number for October 23d, 1889, and it is good news to me from a far country. Dear editors, I was made to rejoice in reading the editorial on "Church Order." I believe you pointed out the right way, according to the Scriptures, to preserve gospel order in a church. You touched the key-note (love). O that God may enable all the dear saints to love one another with a pure heart fervently.

My heart went out in love toward brother C. C. Heath and brother H. J. Redd, while reading their pieces. I thought it was wine well refined. For the benefit of the readers of the SIGNS, I can inform them that I visited the brethren and sisters composing the Red Bird Association of Primitive, Predestinarian Baptists, accompanied by Elder James McDonald and brother Thomas J. Miller. I am glad to tell the brethren and sisters that we found them in peace, and sound in the faith of the gospel. I was glad to see the association pass off in peace. The preaching was all of a whole piece, salvation alone by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. After an absence of eleven days I returned home and found my wife and three little ones well as common. I do feel to thank the good Lord, and take courage; for he is good, a stronghold in the day of trouble, and knows them that trust in him. When I came home there were two letters in the office for me, one from sister Emma L. Smith, of Albion, Ind., the other from sister Mattie S. Derr, both requesting me to give a sketch of the last days of Elder B. E. Caudill. For the benefit of these sisters, and all who knew brother Caudill, I now attempt to write.

I first became acquainted with dear Elder Caudill about three years ago. I have visited the association of which he was a member three sessions. I have been to the church that his membership was with once (Rock Castle), located in Clay Co., Ky., about one hundred miles from my house. I found brother Caudill sound in the faith of the gospel, and he continued so till his death. He was beloved by his brethren at Rock Castle Church and the Red Bird Association, and has been the Moderator of that association for years. He was orderly in his walk and conversation. His chief desire was for the glory of God and the good of Zion. Being sent for, brother Caudill came to Tennessee to look after a difficulty in Union Church, Union Co., Tenn. After laboring among us for several days and nights, and enjoying himself well among the brethren and sisters, he left us, intending to visit some churches north of the Cumberland Mountains on his way home. He was accompanied by brother Eli Miller to Powell's Valley, where they stopped for the night; and next morning, while they were on their way to Cumberland Gap, brother Caudill was taken with a chill, and stopped at friend Carr's to rest. But he was never able to pursue his journey. He suffered intensely for ten days, after which he became easy, and remained quiet until he fell asleep in Jesus, which occurred on the morning of February 11th, 1889. Surely a good and great man is gone to his reward. Several of the brethren visited him during his sickness, and he conversed freely with them, and said if it was the will of the good Lord to take him away, all was well. Dear sisters, while thinking of him, and trying to write this, it brings to my mind the saying of the apostle Paul, which I think is appropriate in brother Caudill's case, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." His remains were taken to London, Ky., and interred near Henry Yaden's, his son-in-law, on Thursday, the 14th.

"Asleep in Jesus! blessed sleep!
From which none ever wake to weep."

He was followed to the grave by his dear wife, children, and a goodly number of relatives and brethren, besides a host of kind friends. Dear brethren and sisters, let me say in conclusion that we sorrow not as those that have no hope; for we believe that our dear Elder Caudill has entered into that rest that remains to the people of God.

JAMES C. WALTON.

HERNDON, Va., Oct. 14, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—I have hesitated to write to you, knowing how poor and worthless I am. Although feeling to be the poorest and weakest of the flock, if one at all, and conscious that I am unworthy of a place in the thoughts of the dear people of God, yet if not altogether deceived I do love them in whom I see the image of Jesus. Many times this love is all I have to sustain my hope in the grace of God. In myself there is nothing to encourage that hope. Before I became a member of the church I thought if I could follow my Lord in baptism I might be able to live a better life; but with grief and sadness I find that I still have to contend with the flesh and sin and Satan. Sometimes it seems that I will have to give up all hope, and yet be cast away from my Savior forever. How terrible the thought! For

"Prisons would palaces prove
If Jesus would dwell with me there."

Dear brethren, sometimes, and most of the time, I am afraid to talk of spiritual things, or write of them; for I know what a sinner I am. But it is written that Christ came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance. And Paul says, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief." Such scriptural declarations as these encourage my hope. If he had come to call the righteous, then I could have no hope at all. Blessed Jesus! that he should stoop so low as to remember poor, sinful worms! How earnestly I desire to love him more, if I do indeed know what the love of God is. O that I could praise him who has done so much for guilty worms like me!

How easy we rest until made to see ourselves as already under the condemnation of the holy law of God. Then all our righteousnesses appear as filthy rags. Shut out from the presence of the Lord, and without hope, how terrible is our condition. Then we cry for deliverance, "God, be merciful to me, a sinner!" This is the continual prayer of our broken heart. Then Jesus comes in his divine grace and makes our darkness light. He binds up the broken heart, and all is peace within. In his presence is fullness of joy. Has he not so loved his people that he has bled and died for them? There is no greater love than this. It is an incomprehensible mystery to me, if indeed it be so, that he has suffered for me, even poor and wretched me, the most unworthy of his love. My feet are so prone to wander in the paths of destruction that if I dare to claim it I may truly say,

"Jesus sought me when a stranger
Wandering from the fold of God."

May the Lord bless you in your labors, and enable you to visit us another summer, is the desire of the poorest and weakest of all. Pray for me.

Your unworthy sister in hope,
MARY D. OLIVER.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—My remittance is due this day, and in this letter I will send you two dollars for another year. I am an old subscriber to the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, having taken it over fifty years. I am past eighty years old. The doctrine the SIGNS sets forth and contends for is the doctrine that will stand forever. It is as firm as God's eternal throne. The glorious Redeemer said, while here on earth, "Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away." He is the embodiment of all truth. He is the way, the truth and the life. There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved. He fills the poor with good things, while the rich he sends empty away. The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick of sin. O what a glorious

THE ANGELS THAT SINNED.

BRETHREN G. BEEBE'S SONS:—I wrote you some time ago asking your views on 2 Peter ii. 4. I may have failed to write it correctly; but this is right. I do not wish to annoy you if you have not time to attend to my request. There have been doubts with some of the brethren as to who is meant by the expression, "Thy neighbor," as used by our Lord. I would be glad to know what you think on the subject.

My wife says she cannot well do without the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. It always comes laden with good news. I wish that I could write a long letter, but I am no scholar.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I am, I trust, your brother,

L. C. GODBEY.

REPLY.

"For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment."—2 Peter ii. 4.

While we have no recollection of having received the former request of brother Godbey, to which he refers in his note, it is possible that it has been overlooked among the many similar applications which are constantly addressed to us. Neither in this case, nor in any other instance, should our correspondents understand our failure to comply with their wishes for our views as indicating the design to ignore their inquiries. It would be very presuming in us to claim ability to answer all questions which may occur to our patrons; and even to write briefly in reply to every one would require much more space than would be afforded by the limits of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

It is of little consequence what we or any other uninspired man may think in regard to any portion of the revealed truth of the sacred word of the Scriptures. God has purposely hidden the glorious mystery of his will, so that no efforts of the wise and prudent can ever discover that hidden treasure. He has expressly declared that under the gospel dispensation not even the knowledge of the Lord can be taught by mortals one to another. Much less is it possible that the real meaning of any portion of his inspired truth can be discovered by the research of finite minds. May divine grace restrain all who love and fear the Lord from attempting by natural reason to attain to an understanding of that unsearchable mystery. Our great Redeemer gave thanks to the Father that he has ordained no other way by which this knowledge can be received but by that revelation which God alone can give. Failure to observe this divine appointment has betrayed many of the dear saints into the same spirit of intolerance which has prompted worldly religionists to shed the blood of the saints from the days of Abel to the present time.

In considering the text submitted by our brother, it is important to observe the connection in which it is written. Many wild and erroneous sentiments have been advanced by those who claim to be teachers among men, who suppose that the apostle here alludes to some unrevealed history of a rebellion among the hosts of angelic spirits. For such an understanding there is no authority higher than the fevered imagination of the natural mind. Milton and other poets have written a vast amount of blasphemous nonsense in support of this notion; but their authority for it is found only in the traditions of heathenism, and the sentiment itself is inseparable from rank atheism.

By reading the preceding portion of this epistle it will be seen that the inspired apostle clearly asserts the unlimited power and sovereignty of God as the very foundation of the doctrine of salvation by Jesus Christ, which is presented in the whole epistle. If that sovereignty were liable to be defied by angels or any other created beings, the eternal purpose of divine grace might be defeated by some such rebellion, and the work of Jesus Christ might yet prove insufficient for the salvation of his people from their sins. Such a theory is too monstrous to be for one moment admitted by those who know the omnipotence and perfect wisdom of that God who is "the Author of eternal salvation unto all that obey him."—Heb. v. 9. There is no revelation given of the existence of sin before the transgression of the commandment of God by his creature man, in partaking of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and of evil. It is written that "By one man sin entered into the world;" and again, "By one man's disobedience many were made sinners."—Rom. v. 12, 19. Morbid curiosity may ask, Where was sin before it entered into the world? But it has not pleased God to reveal the answer to this question. It is enough for the saints to know that sin has brought death upon all the children of the earthly Adam. This they are individually taught in their own experience. The things which are not thus revealed are wrapped in the unsearchable mystery of the eternal counsel of God, among those matters of his own of which he giveth not account.—Job xxxiii. 13. The object for which all Scripture is given by inspiration of God is "that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."—2 Tim. iii. 17. Nothing further than that which is thus revealed can be profitable to the subjects of divine instruction. The lust which was the motive for the first transgression was the desire to obtain that knowledge of good and evil, which the serpent promised in the day when our parents should eat of the forbidden fruit. In like manner, the desire to know what God has not revealed to his saints always originates in the flattering allurements of the adversary of our peace. "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and our children forever, that we may do all the words of this law."—Deut. xxix. 29. Paul spoke by the Spirit of Christ when he said to the Elders of Ephesus, "I kept back nothing that was profitable unto you, but have shewed you, and have taught you publicly, and from house to house, testifying both to Jews and Greeks, repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ."—Acts xx. 20, 21. Hence it is evident that the desire to know things which are not revealed in the revelation which God has given arises from the suggestions of Satan in the carnal mind, which is enmity against God. In the close of the letter containing our text Peter exhorts the saints, saying, "Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness. But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." There is no scriptural admonition to the believers in Jesus by which they are authorized to grow in the knowledge of the origin of sin and of the devil. Such knowledge is not from heaven, but is "earthly, sensual, devilish." The pride of the natural mind may be puffed up by imaginary attainments in such knowledge, but it can never afford the consolation of the gospel of peace to the troubled child of grace. All inquiries in that direction are included in the caution given by Paul, "But foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes."—2 Tim. ii. 23. No such evil consequences result from growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. The more fully this heavenly growth is developed in the saint, the more ready and willing he is to be accounted as less than the least of all saints. The difference between the effects of the two kinds of growth is so manifest that the saints when led by the Spirit cannot fail to discriminate between them. But even they are often deceived when trusting to their own reason.

After reminding the saints in the preceding chapter of the "exceeding great and precious promises" which are given unto us, Peter refers to the abiding testimony of the truth which the indwelling Spirit of Christ bears in every one who is led by that Spirit. This witness is attested by the Scriptures, which are not of any private interpretation. "For the prophecy came not in old time [or, at any time] by the will of man; but truth, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom Paul said he was chief. But I feel to be the very chief of sinners. In my flesh dwells no good thing. I find a law in my members, warring against the law of my mind. When I would do good, evil is present with me. The evil I would not, that I do. Then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. I often feel to say, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" The glorious Redeemer told his disciples that in the world they should have tribulation, but in him they should have peace. He has overcome the world. To those who believe, he is precious. He has conquered death, hell and the grave, and has brought life and immortality to light through the gospel; and the gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.

Dear brethren, I commenced this letter on the fifteenth day of June, and then was taken to my bed. Now it is the twentieth day of June, and I am but just able to sit up. I have been much edified by some of the letters in the SIGNS lately. The Circular Letter by brother Purington was the ablest I ever read.

When I began this letter I thought I would write a few lines to send with my remittance; but you see my mind and pen have run along, and I have scribbled this sheet about full. You must cast the mantle of charity over this.

S. R. PATTON.

JUNE 16, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I take my pen this evening to try to write a few lines to you. This is Sunday, and I am cut off in this western country, where I cannot go to hear any good preaching, and so I do not go at all. I cannot enjoy such self-righteousness as is taught in the preaching here. I feel myself to be weak, for in my flesh there is no good thing. If I am ever saved it will be by the power of God, and to him alone I must give the praise. I feel like I am a poor castaway, and sometimes have to go hungry and thirsty, as there are none to comfort my fainting heart. But if I am of the Lord's poor, little ones, I will not be entirely cut off. I am not saying what I intended to write, but forgive my wandering. By the date on my paper I see the subscription has expired. I thought I would say to you that I do not feel like I can do without the SIGNS. I have a family growing up, and they all love to read it. I do not know what dear friend sent it to me the past year, and I do not expect they will renew for me. If they do not, I would like you to send it on, and we will pay for it between now and the end of the year.

From a poor, little sister, if one at all,

holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Continuing the same instruction, he speaks of the false prophets who were among the people, and declares that there shall be false teachers among the saints to whom he writes, who privily (that is, stealthily, or deceitfully) shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and shall bring upon themselves swift destruction. The awful wickedness of these false teachers and of their followers is as positively foretold as it can be expressed in words, and the terrible judgment which is reserved for them is also declared in the same settled and unchangeable manner. Then follows the language of our text. From the fact that the whole connection is treating of the things which are written in the Scriptures concerning events in the temporal experience of the children of men, it seems to be an unwarrantable perversion of the application of the text to understand it as referring to an unrecorded rebellion among the hosts of the heavenly world. Throughout both the Old Testament and the New the term angel is used to designate any messenger or important officer, whether clothed in flesh and blood, as of the human race, or of those spirits which are invisible to finite comprehension. Buck's Theological Dictionary says, "The word angel is Greek, and signifies a messenger. The Hebrew word signifies the same. Angels, therefore, in the proper signification of the word, do not import the nature of any being, but only the office to which they are appointed, especially by way of message or intercourse between God and his creatures. Hence the word is used differently in various parts of the Scriptures, and signifies: 1. Human messengers, or agents, for others.—2 Sam. ii. 5. 'And David sent messengers [Hebrew, angels] to Jabesh-gilead.'—Prov. xiii. 17; Mark i. 2; James ii. 25." Other definitions are given of the word, but this is the meaning of the word as used in our text, as we understand it. The false prophets, whose destruction is declared in the immediately preceding context, were not spared by the justice of God. They were cast down to hell, and delivered into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment. Not only was this true of such characters as Jannes and Jambres, who withstood Moses (2 Tim. iii. 8), but even those who were evidently subjects of the mercy and grace of God, when they were following their own carnal minds, were brought to experience the same severe condemnation. So David says, "I will praise thee, O Lord my God, with all my heart; and I will glorify thy name forevermore: for great is thy mercy toward me; and thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell."—Psa. lxxxvi. 12, 13. Jonah cried out of the belly of hell, and the Lord heard his voice. He says, "I went down to the bottoms of the mountains; the earth with her bars was about me forever; yet hast thou brought up my life from corruption [literally, "from the pit"], O Lord my God." From these and many other passages of the inspired record, it is clear that there is a sense in which the saints are made to feel the severe visitation of the rod of chastening in their disobedience, which is to them the experience of being cast down to hell. Under this suffering the chastened saints are taught that it is indeed a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.—Heb. x. 31. The same psalmist who says, "I love the Lord, because he hath heard my voice and my supplications," declares in the immediate connection, "The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold upon me; I found trouble and sorrow."—Psa. cxvi. 1, 3. In this experience of the pains of hell there is no hope of deliverance to palliate the suffering. While under the rod chains of impenetrable darkness forbid the entrance of one ray of light. If the chastened one could know that the suffering was the evidence that God dealt with him as a son, that assurance would alleviate his affliction. But the presence of that comfort would not allow him to realize the pains of hell. Then his experience would fail to correspond with that of the old servant of God. He would therefore come short of the fellowship of the sufferings of Christ, for all the groaning and lamentation of the inspired servants of God only testify of the afflictions which were fulfilled in our great Redeemer.

We cannot understand that the justice of God has delivered any men into chains of darkness to await a future judgment to determine whether their condemnation is according to justice. Such an idea involves not only imperfection in the infinite wisdom of God, but further, it is inconsistent with his immutability. The sentence of which our text is the beginning is concluded in the tenth verse. In the ninth verse the Lord is said to know how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished. Evidently in both these verses the word judgment signifies the visitation of just punishment upon the guilty. The declaration that "The Lord knoweth how" to execute his just decree in the case of the godly and of the unjust emphatically denies that knowledge in any other being. The afflicted and poor people of his love are constantly rendering judgment against themselves; but though their heart condemns them, God is greater than their heart, and knoweth all things. His judgment is unto victory for them, and by that judgment they are more than conquerors over sin and hell. He gives the victory to every one of his redeemed people.

In this brief compliance with the request of our esteemed brother we claim no infallibility for our views.

The truth of revelation is all that will endure the test of divine scrutiny. May that Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, neither knoweth him, guide us, with all who love our Lord Jesus Christ, into the perfect light of his holy word; and to him be all the glory now and evermore. Amen.

We will give our understanding of the expression, "Thy neighbor," in our next number.

ONE YEAR OF THE WEEKLY.

WITH our next issue we close the first year of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES as a weekly publication. It was with many forebodings that we started this volume, lest we might not receive sufficient increase of receipts to enable us to meet the increase in the expense; but we made the venture, and the receipts are only a few hundred dollars behind the extra expense, while our subscription list is increased by many hundreds of new subscribers. But nearly all of these were received at one dollar a year; and it now remains to be seen how many of them will renew their subscription at the regular rate of two dollars a year before we can tell whether or not the weekly can be sustained. We hope our brethren and friends will take into consideration, before ordering their paper discontinued, that even though they may be so situated that they can attend gospel preaching and enjoy the society of the saints, there are thousands who cannot, and that to them the SIGNS is the only means they have of communing with their brethren and sisters. The question is not simply, "Do I want the paper in addition to my other religious blessings?" but the fact should be taken into consideration that by paying their own subscription they are contributing to sustain a publication that is a great source of spiritual comfort to those lonely ones scattered throughout distant and spiritually-desolate countries. Could our readers but spend a few days in our office, and read the many letters from these dear saints, expressing their high appreciation of the privilege of reading the SIGNS, they would feel that it was a pleasure to assist in continuing the publication; and we actually need all the subscribers we now have to enable us to continue it successfully. Brethren, imagine what it would be without any SIGNS OF THE TIMES!

The present year has been more successful financially than we expected; and being thus favored of the Lord, we again repeat our terms given last year, viz.:

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!

From now until the first of next January, any one who is now a subscriber, and whose subscription is paid up, may send us new subscribers at one dollar a year; but no one, either new or old subscriber, can get the paper from this office for themselves at less than the regular rates. Any one who is not now a subscriber can have the benefit of the above terms by sending two dollars for their own subscription, and one dollar each for additional new subscribers.

Please make no mistake about the above terms. No one, either new or old subscriber, can send to this office and get the paper for themselves for less than the regular rates; but if any of our paid-up subscribers choose to sacrifice their commission and take the new subscriber for one dollar, that is their matter.

MARRIAGES.

DEC. 5th, at the residence of the bride's father, near Warwick, by Elder Wm. L. Beebe, Mr. Jacob R. Feagles, of Amity, and Miss Belle, youngest daughter of Mr. George A. Hyatt, all of Orange Co., N. Y.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Mrs. E. F. Mathis was born in Virginia, Sept. 6th, 1823, and died in Putnam Co., Ga., Sept. 25th, 1889. She was the oldest child of Mary and John Farrar, and when about four years old moved with her parents from Virginia to Putnam Co., Ga., continuing to live in that county until her death. She had only one sister, Mrs. M. P. Whaley, who is now living. Three brothers, John, Joseph and Samuel, are dead. She had no children. She was twice married: first to Joseph B. Cox, with whom she lived until his death; and next to Major J. T. Mathis, in 1866, who died in 1885. Soon after her marriage to Mr. Cox she joined the Primitive Baptist Church at Enon, Putnam County, in the Ocmulgee Association, and remained a most consistent and faithful member till her death. Nothing but the most adverse circumstances could prevent her attendance upon her meetings. The pastor and members of her church were dear to her heart, and she never forgot them when it was in her power to help them. It was not her custom to proclaim from the housetop her numerous charities. Many are the kind acts of hers to the poor and needy to which the Lord only is a witness. Never did any calamity meet a neighbor but that she sympathized with him, and divided her substance with him. If there was nothing good to be said of people, she did not mention their faults. The community in which she lived lost at her death one of its most valuable members.

The funeral was preached at her late residence, Sept. 27th, by Elder D. L. Hitchcock, after which the remains were laid to rest in the family burial-ground.

STANFORDVILLE, Ga.

SISTER Jennie Stanley was born Nov. 29th, 1863, and died Nov. 25th, 1889, aged 25 years, 11 months and 26 days.

She was married to Charlie Stanley on June 25th, 1884. Three children blessed their union. She was baptized by Elder W. L. Lines in the fellowship of the Old School Baptist Church (Mt. Salem) near Albion, Ind., March 7th, 1886, where she lived an exemplary member until her death. It is with a sad heart that we record the death of dear sister Jennie, for she was indeed a great comfort to us; and when we think of our pleasant visits, drives, walks, and our sittings together in heavenly places, we can only weep that they are forever ended on earth. She was wonderfully blessed with heavenly mindedness, and seemed ever ready to talk of divine things; and when she could not talk of that heavenly rejoicing, she was ready to talk of her feeble frame, of the weakness of the flesh, and yet of God's overreaching grace. How welcome the letters that used to come to my school-room from her by the pupils who passed her home! The last one came only a few days before her death, when she was rejoicing with joy unspeakable, and when for a time she knew that her Redeemer lived. She also said in this same letter, "I have been so blessed in the past week! Surely I can read with an understanding that I have not known for months. I could not believe, nor hear, nor read, all that long month that you enjoyed so much of the presence of the Lord, and which I hope you soon will again. I feel truly that God is my refuge and strength, and that underneath are his everlasting arms. How desirous I am of feeling as submissive as I now do, and to feel that all things work together for good to them that love the Lord, which I trust I do, if I know my own heart (a fact which I so often doubt). Indeed, I feel so much like a hypocrite at times, and as if I am deceiving the dear saints of God. But O how comforting when some of the dear ones come, telling the old story of their doubts and fears!"

The above letter I have read and re-read; but O the sorrow that I shall never receive another! May the Lord reconcile us, make us to indeed feel in our hearts that he has only taken his own, and with the dear sister, feel that submission that she felt when she wrote.

She leaves a sorrowing husband, two children and her mother, with many friends and brethren, to mourn their loss. Elder Bretz was blessed with much liberty in speaking words of comfort to the sorrowing friends from Job xix. 25-27.

EMMA SMITH.

ALBION, Ind., Dec. 2, 1889.

"HELP, Lord; for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men."

Rhudy Minor Lemmon departed this life March 6th, 1889, aged 78 years, 1 month and 6 days. He had been in poor health for several months, but had been able most of the time to attend to his business, and to oversee the work on his farm. The day of his death he was out on his farm, and, when last seen alive, was on a load of rails, driving his team toward the house, and but a few moments later was found dead, lying beside the wagon, his team standing still, and the lines yet in his hands. His physician, who had previously warned the family of the nature of the disease that was preying upon him, stated that he died of paralysis of the heart, and that his death must have been instantaneous. Though sudden, it did not take him unawares, for he had often expressed himself as looking for it to come in some such way, but that it made no difference to him, as he had no confidence in the flesh; his trust was solely in Jesus, and his Lord was his hope.

The subject of this notice was born Feb. 1st, 1811, in what was then Green Co., Ky. In after years he went to Greene Co., Ind., where he was united in marriage to Miss Matilda Runyon, March 16th, 1837. In 1839 he and his wife joined Scaffold Prairie Church, and were baptized by Elder Nathaniel Moss. They emigrated to Illinois in 1850, and joined South Fork Church, in the Sangamon Association. They came to Saline Co., Mo., in 1865. Here brother Lemmon went into the constitution of a church called Little Flock, which held her meetings first in Johnson Co., Mo., and afterward in Saline Co. He was ordained Deacon in this church, and served in that capacity until his death. A large and sympathizing congregation assembled on the occasion of his death and burial, which showed the esteem in which he was held in the community where he lived. Very comforting religious services were held at the time by a young brother Barnes. Afterward the writer tried to preach at the house of the bereaved family for their consolation. Brother Lemmon leaves behind, to toil and suffer awhile longer in the flesh, his beloved companion (the wife of his youth, who is aged and infirm, and grievously afflicted, yet I believe trusting in the Lord) and six living children, three sons and three daughters, one child having preceded him on the last journey. There are also several grandchildren, besides other relatives and friends, the brethren and sisters of his acquaintance, and especially the writer, to mourn his departure; but we mourn not as those who have no hope, "for if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

Our departed brother, like all other "called saints," had his trials and afflictions, as his dear Master had taught him, saying, "In the world ye shall have tribulation," and he was also made to realize, "In me ye shall have peace." He was deeply taught in the dealings of the Lord, in which school none but the spiritual receive instruction. He was sound in the faith, in charity, and in patience, and had purchased to himself "a good degree, and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus." While he was strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus, he was also meek and quiet in spirit. He was ever at the feet of his brethren, and loved to minister unto them of his carnal and earthly things, and to participate with them in spiritual and heavenly things. The writer has often partaken of his hospitality, and with him enjoyed richly spiritual delights and comforts. May the Lord comfort the bereaved and much afflicted family, make them to know the wondrous work of his love and grace, sustain and supply them out of the rich fountain above, lead them by his Spirit, guide them by his counsel, and afterward receive them into his glory.

"Why do we mourn departing friends,
Or shake at death's alarms?
'Tis but the voice that Jesus sends
To call them to his arms."

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

"In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. ### SACRIFICE AND ATONEMENT.

DEAR BRETHREN:—I notice in the SIGNS for Nov. 20th a request from sister R. P. Helm that I should say something upon the difference between the sacrifice and atonement of Christ. Our aged sister has presented a very important question for our consideration; for without these two things no sinner could be justified and reconciled to God. The two words mean very different things, and yet they, in Jesus our Redeemer, are inseparably joined together. Both words contain cheering truth for the comfort and joy and hope of every one who feels the plague of his own heart, and the curse denounced against sinners for their sins. Sacrifice and atonement! Here is the one grand doctrine of the Bible, the one truth upon which all others rest. Eliminate the atonement by the sacrifice of Jesus from the Bible, and immediately the Bible becomes a mere teacher of good morals, and Jesus is no longer God manifest in the flesh, but becomes simply a man—a man a little wiser and better and nearer to God than other men, but still a man, a creature of God, who could not save himself, and of course could not save others. The atonement of Jesus is the theme of inspiration, the wonder of angels, the hope of the penitent, and the joy of the pardoned sinner. All the promises in Christ are yea and amen, because of the finished atonement of Jesus. All gospel precepts, and every principle of doctrine by which God is honored and saints made glad, find their vitality and force in the bleeding sacrifice of Calvary. These two things are the keystones of the arch upon which the building of mercy rests. If they are removed, the building of mercy falls, and buries the hope of every saint in its ruins. If all this be true, we cannot too closely scan this foundation, and we cannot too earnestly admire it. We may well say, If this foundation be removed, what shall the righteous do? I trust that I am glad to spend a little time in the contemplation of so vast a theme. First, I will try to briefly answer the questions as to the difference between the sacrifice and the atonement of Christ.

The word atonement occurs but once in our New Testament. This is in Romans v. 11. The original Greek word is katallage. But the noun katallage, or the verb katallasso, occur in several other places, and are translated "reconciled," "reconciling," or in some form of this word. The word in Romans v. 11 is the same, and has the meaning of reconciliation. Other places where this same word is translated reconcile, and reconciling, &c., are Rom. xi. 15, 2 Cor. v. 18-20, 1 Cor. vii. 11, Rom. v. 10, Eph. ii. 16. The word atonement is supposed to have been literally at-one-ment. At all events the force of the Greek word katallage means to make one out of two opposing elements or individuals. It occurs frequently in the Old Testament, meaning, wherever used, either the sacrifice offered, or the effect of the offering of the sacrifice. This last is its proper meaning. The first meaning is but an accommodation of language, using the word in a secondary sense.

The word sacrifice is used about twenty times in the New Testament, and six of those times it clearly relates to the offering of Jesus upon the cross for the sins of his people.—Eph. v. 2; Heb. ix. 26; Heb. x. 12; Heb. x. 26; 1 Cor. v. 7. The original Greek word is thusia, or thuo, the first the noun, the second a verb; and it signifies either the thing sacrificed, or the act of sacrificing. The word sacrifice itself means "to make sacred." Anything offered to God, by this act becomes sacred, or devoted to him. In the Old Testament the word occurs many times, and always with this idea of something devoted to a being who is worshiped as God. The heathen sacrificed to their gods. The sacrifices of the old covenant were offered for various things, but chief among them was the sin offering. In the New Testament the word is used in various ways, but here also its most important use is in regard to the offering for our sins. I have been thus particular in tracing out the meaning of these two words, because there is a wide difference between them in meaning and use, and it seems to me very important that we use Bible words carefully and with a definite idea of their meaning. I think that any faithful, God-fearing minister will not want, in preaching, to use such solemn words carelessly, or with no clear view of them.

Now to express the difference in the use of these two words in a few words, I will say that the word sacrifice expresses the cause, the word atonement the effect. We are reconciled to God by the death (the sacrifice) of his Son. Jesus died upon the cross, and the result is the at-one-ment, or reconciliation of sinners to God. Jesus put away sin by the sacrifice of himself, and by him we have now received the atonement, or reconciliation. We are said to be reconciled or atoned in the body of his death, that we might be presented blameless before him. The sacrifice is the work and suffering of Jesus for us, in which he alone could have part. We could not atone for our own sins, nor assist in the work. The only sacrifice that would avail, Jesus must offer. But the blessed effect, the result, the at-one-ment, the reconciliation, was all ours. The work his, the everlasting sabbath rest ours. The sorrow his, the joy ours. The conflict his, the fruits of victory ours. He ascended on high, he led captivity captive, and received gifts for men, even for the rebellious also, that God might dwell among them. Jesus gives the sacrifice; we receive the atonement, or reconciliation.

Thus far I have written in direct answer to the request of our sister. But I do not feel like leaving the subject here. I trust the readers of the SIGNS will bear with me while I try to consider the theme of the atonement a little farther. On the one side of this subject we have the terms sacrifice and offering, and on the other the words atonement and redemption. I desire no longer to dwell upon the words, but if I may, upon the grand theme itself, as one who, for many years, has had a little hope of salvation through that one offering by which all the sanctified are perfected. As I try to present scriptural testimony concerning this sublime theme, I hope that out of a heartfelt experience we shall all be able to say, Amen. For the Scriptures are not to be tested by our experience, but our experience is to be tested by the Scriptures. Happy are we indeed if our experience is in harmony with the written word. "To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

First. The Scriptures testify that man is a sinner. He has sinned against God. By one man's transgression sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all, for that all have sinned. Ever since the transgression by our first parents, man is born into the world defiled. This is evident from the fact that infants die with pain and suffering as well as others. "The wages of sin is death." Sin and death go hand in hand, the one properly belonging to the other. Scriptural proof need not be multiplied that all men are sinners. Two things I wish to call attention to in this connection, however. The first is that in spite of the prevailing idea that infants are innocent and pure, they are sin-defiled from the beginning. Outward transgression they have not committed it is true, but God looks at the inward parts, and there he sees all the ills that grow; and only time and opportunity are needed to call this hidden evil into exercise. Covetousness, selfishness and ill-temper are among the first emotions exhibited in a child. Everybody pays a testimony to the truth of original sin when they say of a bad child, He has had his own head; he has gone his own way. What is this but saying, His own bent was to evil, to do wrong? The second thought is that it is not the outward transgression that makes man a sinner, or that cuts him off from God. Man is a sinner, and therefore he commits sin. What he is makes him a sinner, and not what he does. God looks at what he is rather than at what he does. God restrains some men from acting themselves out. Others he suffers to go on to the end, and thus show how vile men are. God judges men as they are, not as they seem to be. His testimony therefore is that none have done good, that none are righteous, no, not one. If any have not lived out so much sin as others, it is only because the fountain has been shut up, and its waters hindered from coming forth. But corruption boils up within all the same. This was prefigured by the atonement money of the sanctuary. The same amount, a half-shekel of silver, was demanded of all. The rich could not give more, nor the poor less. It was called atonement money. The type regarded every man as being equally guilty. There is no boasting one over another in the kingdom of God. When the grace of God shows a man that his lips are unclean, he also sees that all around him have unclean lips. Paul expressly says, "For there is no difference." One man needs no more nor no less than another. Christ does no more for one saved sinner than he does for another. Our outward life affects our joy or sorrow in this state of existence, but beyond, what we are, not what we do, settles our destiny.

When souls stand naked before God, "there is no difference."

Now second. The Scriptures testify that death is the penalty of sin. Men are sinners, and men must die. To Adam it was said, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" [or, margin, "dying thou shalt die"]. This takes in all death. Henceforth man is dead in sin, and must die temporally and eternally. I have heard it questioned whether the death of the body was a portion of the penalty of sin. It is said that man must have seen his body wear out, and must have laid it off in the end, even if he had not sinned. I answer that this seems to me vain reasoning when set up against the testimony of God that the death of the body is the result of sin. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin," &c. Unredeemed and unquickened man is now dead to God. When such an one goes into the unseen world, he is still dead to God and dead in sin. Sin continues to all eternity to work out in him its own proper result. From this state unquickened man cannot redeem himself. From this state he has no desire to redeem himself. He cannot have such a desire, for desire belongs to life, and he is dead.

Third. The Scriptures testify that his works or offerings cannot avail to cleanse him from his sins and justify him before God. If he were alive unto God, still his works, flowing out of that life, and therefore good and spiritual and acceptable to God, could not atone for the sin of the heart nor the sins of the life. At the best, even this obedience is imperfect; and besides, all that enables him to obey is the gift of God to him, and therefore contains no merit on his part. His obedience praises God, and not himself. But man is dead to God, not alive, and his works are dead works. God is not in them. God is not their author, and he is not glorified in them. The works and sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to God; and all unregenerate men are wicked in the Bible sense of the term. Such a man's religious works, though he may then count them much gain, are yet all loss and dross and dung in the sight of God. So by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified.

Fourth. From all this it will be seen that if any man is justified and saved, it must be by the life and death of another. To this the Scriptures testify from beginning to end. The whole Bible is unintelligible without the atonement of Christ. The Mosaic law, the prophecies, the gospels and the epistles, all center in the cross of Calvary, and gain all their meaning in the one grand truth that the death of Jesus was to redeem sinners. Every sacrifice where blood was shed testified to the fact of the sinfulness of man, and that in the shedding of blood alone was there remission of sins. It was needful that Jesus should come. Thus he expressly declares for himself, "Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer." Again, "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." As man had lived a sinful life, he must live a spotless life. As man was cursed and must die, so he must come under the curse and die. As the unjust could not atone for his own sins and live, he must die the just for (instead of) the unjust, that he might bring us to God. All this it was needful that Jesus should do, if any man were saved.

Fifth. The Scriptures testify that Jesus' work was effectual. Jesus himself, at the last, cried, "It is finished." We are said to be justified freely by his death. Paul called the brethren at Galatia foolish, because they had looked away from the perfect atonement of Jesus to the weak and beggarly elements of the law. It was said, "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." To this also all the types agree. Every sacrifice then offered fully accomplished all that was intended by it. Every promise in the New Testament is based upon an effectual atonement. Besides, atonement is not atonement at all, except it be effectual. Neither the Bible nor any human law or people knows anything about an atonement which does not atone. Jesus Christ "is the propitiation for our sins." This propitiation is the basis of the atonement. Our sins are compared to a debt, and the death of Jesus paid that debt. No law, human or divine, demands payment the second time. The first payment was ample, and blotted out our indebtedness forever. If it be not so, then all the types fail, and, then, every promise is insecure. If the atonement is not effectual, then we are yet in our sins, we have believed in vain, and all our rejoicing is unsubstantial and premature. But, blessed be God, the atonement is effectual. Jesus will not be disappointed, and he shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied. By his knowledge he shall justify many, for he shall bear their iniquities, said the prophet Isaiah.

Sixth. From all this it follows that salvation is not a thing offered to man, but completed for man and given him. The theory that Jesus died for sin in the abstract, and not for sinners as individuals, is not only unscriptural, but also absolutely unintelligible. If true, it might follow, yea, it absolutely would follow, that not a sinner of our fallen race ever would be saved. Jesus did not come to heap up a mass of righteousness over against the mass of the sins of mankind, out of which when we should ask for it the Father would give us a portion sufficient to cover our portion of sin. But himself bore our sins. Here is a sublime and wonderful mystery, but it is nevertheless Bible truth. He did not offer to bear our sins, but he bore them. He did not offer to redeem us, but he redeemed us. He did not offer to save us, but he saved us. The gospel is not an offer made to the sinner, but it is the proclamation of good news. It does not speak of a work which is yet undone, but it proclaims a fact accomplished. It tells the sinner that Jesus has died for his sins, and that by the resurrection of Jesus he is freely justified before God. It tells him that no charge from henceforth and forever stands against him. It tells him that he is freely justified by the grace of God through the redemption there is in Christ Jesus. All this is in harmony with all the preceding truths here presented.

Seventh. The doctrine of personal election is in harmony with all this, and necessarily grows out of it. There is a divine harmony in all the principles of the doctrine of God our Savior. One principle of doctrine rightfully understood leads right on to all the rest. So if it be true, first, that man is a sinner and under the sentence of death, if he cannot be justified by his good works, if Jesus must die for him, if his work is effectual, and if therefore the gospel is not an offer, but a proclamation of a work completed, then it follows beyond all question either that all men are saved, or else that the doctrine of election is true. This I will not stop to argue further, but appeal to the testimony of the word as to the doctrine of personal election. The Bible declares again and again that God has an elect people. Israel was an elect people in the type, and they set forth the election of grace, else the type is worth nothing. Jesus as the head of his people is called "the elect." There is declared to be a people upon earth who are the people of Jesus even while they are yet dead in their sins. Again and again they are called a chosen people. This election is said to be before the foundation of the world, and according to the foreknowledge of God, and not on the ground of any good or evil that we have done. It is said to be in Christ, and to be unto holiness and to the obtaining of eternal joy. It is not an election of good people, but of sinners; not of glorious or glorified spirits, but of men. This doctrine is glorious in the eyes of believers, but hateful to those who have never felt the plague of their own heart. Extremes meet in opposition to this doctrine. One class denies that God elects or chooses men, and the other denies that men are elected or chosen. Both say that to assert that God elects men to salvation is to impugn his justice. But the humble-hearted believer must say it is right and just because God does it. In this doctrine he sees his only hope. Thus the atonement and election as here briefly presented stand or fall together.

Eighth. The atonement for the elect secures to them all other spiritual blessings in time and in eternity. Without the atonement there are no spiritual blessings that can come to us. For the sinner there can be nothing but condemnation. Until the curse is removed he can find no favor or enjoy no communion with God. All present favor or future bliss rests upon the work completed upon Calvary. As Christ himself suffered these things and entered into his glory, so we by the cross alone can enter his glory. This is shown forth by Cain and Abel. Cain not having faith, not knowing the need of an atonement, brought the fruit of his toil as an offering to God, and it could not be accepted, because there was no recognition of sin, or of needed sacrifice on Cain's part. Millions, it is to be feared, are Cain-worshippers to-day. But Abel, having faith, came to God by way of the atonement, and was accepted. He recognized the need of blood to wash away sin. There is no coming to God for a sinner but by the atonement. The types also shadowed forth the same truth. No priest or Levite could enter the sanctuary for worship, no evidence of Jehovah's presence could be given, no offering could be accepted in the sanctuary set up in the wilderness, until the atonement blood had been shed and was sprinkled upon the mercy-seat, upon the sanctuary, and upon all its vessels, and upon priests and Levites, who were to minister there. Sin must be washed away first. So now no spiritual privilege can be enjoyed by the soul until the conscience is sprinkled with reconciling blood, and sin is washed away. This is true in experience as well as in the letter of the doctrine. Peace and communion with God are obtained only by the blood of the cross. Faith always looks to Calvary.

Now lastly I would say, Does not all this exalt the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world? These scattering remarks but faintly show forth his glory. But my heart has burned at times within me as I have been writing these things. This doctrine praises God, and not man; exalts the Savior, and not our works. Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive blessing and honor and power and glory forever!

I remain your brother in the precious faith of Christ,

REISTERSTOWN, Md., Dec. 4, 1889.

CAMP HILL, Ala., Dec. 3, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD, OF THE HOUSEHOLD OF FAITH, OF GOD'S ELECT:—It came into my mind to write you concerning Jesus of Nazareth, and as a foundation I will use the words recorded in Matthew ii. 1: "Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem."

We often think of writing to edification, and we know of nothing more profitable to write than of Jesus, our Captain and King, the promised Messiah which should come. Whether many were looking for him or not, or how many were expecting him to come as he did, we know not; but we are sure that there were some who expected his advent into the world at this time. The salutation to Mary had been treasured up, and Simeon and Anna and the wise men of the east were witnesses, awaiting with anxious desire the fulfillment of the glorious and unforgotten promise of God. The prophet had said, "Thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda: for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule my people Israel."—Matt. ii. 6; Micah v. 2. When these wise men started from their homes, and where they met, and what was said among themselves, is not known; but I understand they were especially and divinely directed when to start, and where to go, and how they should find the child whom they searched for. They were wise men indeed, wiser than the kings of the earth and all the astronomers. While others could, perhaps, see the star, they could not divine its meaning, neither were they able to follow it. The star of Bethlehem, the star of hope, the guiding star, stood directly over where the young child was; and they were to find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, and lying in a manger. O what a wonderful sight by midnight! Was any sight up to this time half so grand! The sight of Israel's God, the Deliverer, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law. O the grand midnight scenes at Bethlehem! The shepherds were minding their flocks by night, and the air was filled with heavenly music, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men."

Never did symphonies nor harps nor lyres make such glorious music to those who could hear and understand the sweetness of the sound. "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound. They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance." He was known by the wise men, for he was to be wrapped in swaddling clothes, and to be in the manger. There they found him. I am inclined to think he is the same to-day and forever, and he will ever appear the same; and the wise men yet find him in the same place. Wise men always follow the same indications, following the same course and direction given them of God. The humblest disciple can be comforted in the birth of his King, for the exceeding lowliness of his birth, reaching below them. Thus are we able to see that he was made lower than the angels, and crowned with glory and honor, that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man. "It behooved him to be made like unto his brethren." "He took on him the seed of Abraham." "He humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." "Wherefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name." Though he was rich, for our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich. He was indeed "the seed of the woman," and the only one who was the seed of the woman. The wise men found the child wrapped in swaddling clothes, and lying in a manger. They presented unto him gold and frankincense and myrrh, precious gifts, which were needful things for the mother and the child—gifts directed by wisdom, even the wisdom of God. I am inclined to think the wise make the same precious gifts yet; and the same gifts are yet appreciated, because sent by wisdom, and bestowed in wisdom, and received in the same way, and wisely appropriated. When Jesus was presented in the temple, at eight days old, there were some who tarried in the temple and waited for the consolation of Israel. To Simeon it had been revealed by the Holy Ghost that he should not taste death till he had seen the Lord's Christ. When Mary brought in the child Simeon recognized him, and said, "Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word; for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all people: a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel." This was quite a contrast from the swaddling clothes (perhaps the cloths used to rub down the stock), in the arms of faith held by old Simeon, and this wonderful confession of salvation, which God had prepared and sent. The remarkable fact was that it had been revealed by the Holy Ghost. Then this doctrine of revelation holds good throughout, from the beginning to the end, Christ revealed as the Savior of sinners, as the great Deliverer, who should come out of Zion and turn away ungodliness from Jacob, his people. The knowledge of Jesus is wide as the earth; his fame is gone out into all the world, as the King of kings and the Lord of lords. Books have been written, the country is flooded (so to speak) with books, and yet how little is known of this illustrious King of kings, born to set his people free. While many have read of him, and know of him, how few really know him by revelation. This is the precious knowledge reserved for and given only to the heirs by promise. Simeon knew him from all other babes. So do all believers know him from all other kings. Now the important inquiry comes to us who read this, Do I know him? Do I love him? Is he the chief among ten thousand to me? Is he altogether lovely, and is there an excellency surpassing all other excellencies in him to us? If we know him, how and upon what principle do we know him, whom to know is life eternal? Have we read of him in the Bible? Have we heard our father or mother speak of him, or have we learned him in the Sunday School? If this is the way we have learned him, we can only appreciate him in that sense, and we may know him only in part. Should a witness be examined, and should he say, "I know Christ; I have heard the preacher speak of him." "Stand aside," says the judge; "that is hearsay." Another says, "I know him; I read of him." "Stand aside; that is not the testimony required in this court." Another says, "I learned him in the Sunday School; I read of him in the catechism." "Stand aside; you are not a competent witness." Another says, "I know the man." "How do you know him, and what do you know of him?" "He was revealed to me by the Holy Ghost, and I saw him when he was in the manger at Bethlehem." "Ah," said the judge, "upon what principle did you receive this knowledge?" "Upon the principle of faith." "Then speak on." "I know that Cæsar Augustus made a decree that all the world should be taxed, and that Mary and Joseph went to Bethlehem; and while there the Scripture was fulfilled which said that a virgin should conceive and bring forth a son, and he should be born in Bethlehem." "Were you there in person?" "No; but I was there in faith, and this knowledge was communicated by the Spirit of God. If I had seen it with my natural eyes, I could not have known it as well as I now know it. I know it upon the same principle that Moses wrote the book of Genesis, and wrote of things that had taken place, as accurately as did Isaiah of things that were to come. The power of God is in this matter." As Paul knew Jesus by revelation, so do all the heirs to-day know him upon the same principle. He was born, and was carried to the temple, and circumcised, and dwelt in Nazareth, that he might be called a Nazarene. At twelve years of age he went to Jerusalem, and was found among the lawyers and doctors of the law, both hearing them and asking them questions, and confounded them, inasmuch that they were astonished at the wonderful wisdom which he exhibited, surpassing all the schools of the learned and the ancient rabbies. The question was asked, "From whence hath this man all this wisdom, having never learned letters?" He answered, "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me." The glorious doctrine is from above, the highest and most sublime order of knowledge, by faith and revelation, exceeding in highness all manner of wisdom. At the age of thirty years he entered upon his public ministry, and went forth manifesting himself to Israel. He was tempted, and he endured, and went on to the bloody scene of Calvary, and "gave his life a ransom for many," and said, "For this cause came I forth." He died according to the Scriptures, and rose again, and ascended on high, and led captivity captive, and is now on the right hand of the throne of God in the heavens, ever living to make intercession for his people. This witness is true. We are bound to acknowledge this testimony; for it is the truth, and this witness is qualified to testify in this court. The most sublime order of testimony is now heard. Yes, my dear brethren, fellow-travelers to a better clime, if you have this knowledge of him you are indeed a witness; and if the witness of men is great, the witness of God is greater. He that believeth that Jesus is the Christ hath the witness in himself. This holy testimony comes in the new birth; for he that believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God. If we know him, it is by no virtue of us, but must be the gift of God; for it has been given us to know and believe on him. "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." By this only can we know the true God and Jesus Christ. "For to you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom." We cannot attain unto it by any method of study, but we are born unto it. It is revealed unto us by the Spirit of God. For God hath revealed it unto us by his Spirit, who reveals the deep and secret things of his kingdom, and only such things as we ought to know, and which will glorify him who has called us from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God.

These thoughts occurred to me, and I submit them. If you think proper, publish them; if not, do as you think best with them, and to God be praise and dominion and glory, both now and forever. Amen.

Yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

MORRISONVILLE, Ill., April 19, 1889.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Having been impressed to write a few lines for the readers of the SIGNS, I will now, by the grace of God, endeavor to do so. Eleven years have passed since I took up my cross and was adopted into the Old Baptist family, which I believe to be the church of God. It is very seldom that I get with them, living distant from the church, and having no conveyance of my own; but when I do meet with them it is an unspeakable pleasure. The SIGNS affords me a great deal of comfort. There I read the communications of a people who commune in heart with one another, though strangers in the flesh, and each has the same knowledge of the crucified and risen Savior. Like the rest of the family, I have had many trials and difficulties to encounter. But when I compare my afflictions with the sufferings of Jesus for our sins, I feel to say, Rebellious heart, be still.

Being left a widow, with five small children to look after, my pathway was rugged indeed. But God has brought me through it all. When I was too shortsighted to see the way myself, I would fret and complain over what I deemed my hard lot, till I became forgetful of the God who bestows all needful blessings upon us. But one night as I was lamenting my hard fate, not knowing how I was to get food and clothing for my family, these words were forced upon my mind, "Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? (For after all these things do the Gentiles seek:) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you."—Matt. vi. 31-33. Glorious promise to all who can lay hold of it. I have realized that promise from that time to the present, which has been eleven years. Though my road has been rough, the blessings have all come in due time. O what condemnation I felt for distrusting the God of all mercy. I now feel that I can fully rely upon him without complaint.

Dear brethren and sisters, though the pathway of some of us seems to be full of obstructions, and the way dark and gloomy, do not let us forget the saying of our Savior, "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." Since that memorable night I have felt to trust him for all things that are needful; for he has never left me nor forsaken me in the hour of trial.

Your sister in Christ, I hope,

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Inclosed you will find one dollar, for which please send our dear family paper, the SIGNS, to some one of the dear saints of our God who may desire to read the truth as it is in Jesus. I am sixty years old, and, so far as money and property go, am very poor. It does seem to me that all God's people who are able ought to assist you in sending the SIGNS to those dear brethren and sisters who are so unfortunate as not to be able to pay for it themselves. May the God of heaven put it into the hearts of all his dear children to assist you in doing this, is my prayer. I hope to be able to send you a few subscribers between this and the first of January next. May God bless you, dear brethren, in publishing and sending the truth to his afflicted and poor people, is the prayer of your afflicted old brother in hope of a blessed immortality beyond the grave,

WHO IS THY NEIGHBOR?

THE evidence of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures which testify of Jesus clearly appears in the fact that not even their express declarations can be understood by the natural man. In all the teaching of Jesus this truth is manifest. While he declares that all the law and the prophets hang upon the two commandments which enjoin supreme love to God, and that thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, this simple truth is so deeply hidden from the wise and prudent that none of the children of men have ever been able with the natural mind to understand the instruction which is contained in the record so plainly written. As the chosen servants of God by whom the sacred words were written could write only as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, so that which they were inspired to record can be understood only as the same Spirit of truth shall take of those things of Jesus and show it unto them to whom it is given to know God and the Lord Jesus Christ, whom the Father has sent.

When a certain lawyer, tempting Jesus, asked, "Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" Jesus referred him to the law of Moses, in which he and all carnal Jews trusted. He could give the letter of that legal requirement, and Jesus said unto him, "Thou hast answered right; this do, and thou shalt live." It should be observed that the life which was here promised was the same life which the law assured to those Israelites who were obedient to its demands. "For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man which doeth those things shall live by them."—Rom. x. 5. The law made no provision for giving life to sinners already dead under its righteous condemnation. "For if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law."—Gal. iii. 21. Under the law of Moses all rewards for obedience and all penalties for transgression were temporal. There was neither the condemnation of eternal death to the sinner, nor the promise of eternal life to the obedient subject of that law. The people to whom it was given were already under the dreadful sentence of that death which passed upon all men, for that all sinned in the first man Adam. The truth and immutability of God forbid that the demand of justice should be modified or revoked. The law which was given on Sinai neither made the condition of the sinner any better nor any worse. "Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made."—Gal. iii. 19. "Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. Was then that which is good made death unto me? God forbid. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that which is good; that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful."—Rom. vii. 12, 13. This is the inspired declaration of the design and usefulness of that law which was given to the nation of Israel by the ministry of Moses.

The divine Author of that law was certainly competent to expound it in its application to those to whom it was given. The self-reliant and proud teachers of legal religion were unable to determine the meaning of the requirement of love to their neighbor, because they could not with certainty decide the question which this lawyer submitted to Jesus. The same difficulty still bewilders all those who seek for justification by the works of that law. Failing to see in it the prophetic testimony of Jesus, they seek to meet its demands in their own obedience to its exceeding broad requirements; and inevitable failure must ever result from all such efforts. So Paul says, "Therefore by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight; for by the law is the knowledge of sin." It is as much beyond the power of any sinner to love his neighbor as himself as it is impossible for the carnal mind to love the Lord God supremely. The very principle which moves the natural man to desire the approval of the justice of God is itself that covetousness which is expressly forbidden in the law which brings the knowledge of sin. All the religion which originates in the will of the sinner springs from this fountain of carnal selfishness. The divine love which is the fulfilling of the law can be produced only by the Holy Ghost which is given unto those who are born of the incorruptible seed, which is the word of God. By the power of God the love of holiness is wrought in the heart of every one who is led by his Spirit, so that the righteousness of the law is to them the object of their strongest desire. It is this love of righteousness which causes them to groan under the bondage of corruption, by which they are made to feel their inability to do the good which they would do. Their desire is well expressed by the Lord, as "hunger and thirst after righteousness." This principle would not be satisfied with the assurance that they should at last escape the punishment of sin; they long for the present experience of holiness and perfect conformity to the likeness of that Jesus in whom they see all the perfection of God. Where this love of righteousness produces its own fruit in the heart, carnal selfishness is cast out, and in such as are led by that Spirit of truth the love of God is supreme. They do indeed love their neighbor as themselves.

In the parable recorded in the tenth chapter of Luke, the Samaritan who showed mercy on the half-dead victim of the thieves is presented as the neighbor of the sufferer. There is much deeper significance in this parable than simply the lesson of the duty of compassion to the subjects of distress. The journey of the man was "down from Jerusalem to Jericho." Jerusalem was the typical city which God had blessed, and in that city was the holy temple, in which was preserved the ark of the covenant which God gave to Israel. This certain man had left that city, and was on his way down to Jericho, the city which was under the especial curse of God. This was the first city of the Canaanites which fell before the hosts of Israel, and Joshua by inspiration then adjured the people, saying, "Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it."—Josh. vi. 26. This curse was literally fulfilled as recorded in 1 Kings xvi. 34. The signification of this city in the parable of our Lord, as the proposed destination of the man who went down from Jerusalem, is clearly significant of the experience of those who leave the resting place of trust in the grace of our Lord Jesus, and go down to the service of legal works for justification before God. The unfeeling indifference of the priest and the Levite, who "passed by on the other side," shows how utterly hopeless is any confidence in legal provisions for the relief of such helpless characters as have been stripped of their garment of justification by works of their own, and left half-dead under the condemnation of divine justice. No reviving balm of consolation can be administered by that holy law which provides only that the man who renders perfect obedience to all its demands shall live, and denounces death as the penalty of the first transgression. With all its ceremonial cleansing of the transgressions of the people to whom that law was given, it still held the sinner under condemnation. By the first failure to obey its rigorous commands the sinner was justly condemned; and all its provisions "passed by on the other side" of delivering him from death. No healing oil nor cheering wine can be administered by the law of works. Much less can the performance of any conditions which God has never enjoined bring life and peace to the guilty sinner.

It is said that the priest came that way "by chance;" and "likewise a Levite" was at the place. His presence there is represented as a matter of chance, like the coming of the priest; but neither of them could bring help to the wounded and naked sufferer. The "certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was." He did not stop, and call the sufferer to come to him; and it is not said that he asked how he came to be thus helpless. "He had compassion on him, and went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him." Every conscious sinner who has been delivered from condemnation by the infinite grace of God will readily see in this compassionate Samaritan a representation of the merciful Savior by whose grace he was saved from that death which was justly due to his transgressions. The picture is too striking to be mistaken for any other character in earth or heaven. But there is one point which is particularly significant in the specification that it was a Samaritan who brought relief to the man who was thus distressed. The Samaritans were despised by the Jews as being Gentiles, whom they regarded as having no claim to favor in the sight of God. They were descended from those foreigners whom the king of Assyria sent to dwell in Samaria after he had carried the Israelites from that land into captivity. They were hated by the Jews more than other Gentiles, because of their occupying the land which the Jews regarded as rightfully belonging to themselves.—See 2 Kings xvii. This hatred had continued until the coming of our Lord, so that at that time the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans.—John iv. 9. In presenting this Samaritan as the one who showed mercy to the sufferer, Jesus taught the great truth that the mercy which is revealed in the grace of God does not depend upon the law of Moses. In this lesson there is a manifest refutation of the notion so prevalent in the world, which looks upon the gospel of Jesus Christ as a mere modification of Judaism. Doubtless many of the subjects of salvation are held in heavy bondage under the mistaken idea that the law of Moses is in some sense binding upon them. Let such consider the truth declared in this parable, that it was a Samaritan whom Jesus used as a representative of himself.

While it is true that the Lord Jesus is himself the only Neighbor in an unrestricted sense who does indeed come where the perishing and suffering sinner is, and in his matchless mercy saves sinners from their sins, it is also true that he has given to his people his own holy Spirit to dwell in them and be their leader and guide, so that they are thereby enabled to manifest the same principle which is perfectly displayed in him as the great Leader and Guide whom they are commanded to follow. There is no manifest evidence that any man is a subject of saving grace unless he is led by the same Spirit which was so gloriously exemplified in Jesus. Paul says,

"Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." On the other hand, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."—Rom. viii. 9, 14. This apostolic decision definitely settles the question in every case whether any individual is manifestly a subject of divine grace. It must be observed, however, that the fruit of this Spirit is not found in the natural mind of the saints. If the indwelling of the Spirit did at once banish the carnal mind, then there would be no conflict found between the flesh and the Spirit. Of this warfare Paul himself had to complain. So all who are led by the Spirit find in their daily experience that they are still oppressed under the bondage of vanity in the body of this death. From this oppression they are as helpless to deliver themselves as was the wounded man in the parable. The works and ceremonies authorized by the law of Moses afford no relief to the conscious sinner. Instead of finding comfort in the righteousness which is of the law, or in the sacrifices therein authorized, he sees all things which are written in the legal covenant pass by him on the other side, only confirming his hopeless condemnation. While he sees that the law is holy, and just, and good, he has to confess himself carnal, sold under sin. In his utterly lost condition he feels that he is without hope. Then Jesus is revealed to him as coming where he is, and bringing the oil of divine consolation and the wine of everlasting rejoicing, by which he is made to know the exceeding riches of the grace of God which brings salvation to the justly condemned sinner. He then knows his gracious Savior as his Neighbor indeed. Those who have experienced such deliverance will ever desire to be governed by the same holy principle; and while they are not able to manifest it as they would in their daily deportment, they will earnestly long for conformity to the perfect example which is revealed in the Lord Jesus. Following him requires a constant denial of self. None can in truth love his neighbor as himself except he is led by the Spirit which was in our Lord Jesus, and which is perfectly revealed in no other character. In an absolute sense Jesus is the only Neighbor of the sinner who is saved by his grace. The Spirit of Jesus is manifest in that love which identifies his disciples by their love of such as are led by his Spirit. Every one who bears this seal of the Spirit is the neighbor of all who love our Lord Jesus Christ.

CLOSE OF VOLUME FIFTY-SEVEN.

WITH this number we close volume fifty-seven of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and a busy year it has been, having fifty-two numbers, instead of twenty-four, to mail. And when it is taken into consideration that it requires as much labor and time to address and wrap an eight-page paper as it does a twelve-page, our readers can form some idea of the increase in work in furnishing it weekly instead of semi-monthly. While we had no fears but what we could supply the required extra labor, we were a little fearful lest the patrons of the paper might not be able to sustain the increase in expense, or furnish sufficient matter for its columns. But the year is now past, and we are only two or three hundred dollars behind on our receipts as compared with the increase of expenses, while its columns have been filled, although increased in amount nearly one-half. While we have sensibly felt our shortcomings, we feel that we have obtained help of God, and at no time have shunned to declare all the counsel of God.

We return thanks to our patrons and correspondents, whose liberal support during the past year affords us reason to hope that our labors have not been in vain, and that we shall be sustained during the coming year; and relying on the kind providence of God to support us in the future as in the past, we would commit all into his hand, and pray that we may be in submission to his righteous will in this and in all things.

15DEC89

A NUMBER have written us saying their time was out the fifteenth of this month, because the date next to their name reads as at the top of this notice. While this would be the case with any other month, it does not count with December, and all who are thus marked are entitled to the paper for the full year, or to December 31st, 1889.

LEE HANCKS' SUBSCRIPTION.

WE have received a number of remittances for brother Lee Hancks, and have credited him for several years ahead. We make this mention that those who wish to send in especially for him may know that his paper is secured to him for a number of years to come.

EXTRAORDINARY OFFER!

From now until the first of next January, any one who is now a subscriber, and whose subscription is paid up, may send us new subscribers at one dollar a year; but no one, either new or old subscriber, can get the paper from this office for themselves at less than the regular rates. Any one who is not now a subscriber can have the benefit of the above terms by sending two dollars for their own subscription, and one dollar each for additional new subscribers.

Please make no mistake about the above terms. No one, either new or old subscriber, can send to this office and get the paper for themselves for less than the regular rates; but if any of our paid-up subscribers choose to sacrifice their commission and take the new subscriber for one dollar, that is their matter.

MARRIAGES.

By Elder T. M. Poulson, Nov. 27th, 1889, at the house of the bride's parents, in New Church, Accomack Co., Va., Mr. Elmer E. Foulmer and Miss Hattie E. Marshall, both of Accomack Co., Va.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Phebe Northrup died at the residence of her only surviving child, Mrs. Phebe Nellis, March 17th, 1887, aged 90 years, 9 months and 19 days.

She was a good mother, and we can truly say that a mother in Israel is gone to reap her reward. She was strong in the faith that salvation is of the Lord. She had enough of this life, and wished to be gathered to the assembly of the blessed. She was born in Orange Co., N. Y., May 28th, 1796, and married to Stephen Northrup in 1812. She moved to Susquehanna Co., Pa., and from there to Tioga Co., N. Y., where she was baptized by Elder Yellett, in 1827. She moved to Michigan in 1833, and united with the Baptists in Fairfield, Lenawee Co. She was one of the members of the first Baptist Church constituted in Fairfield, and there remained a faithful member until her death. Elder James Carpenter was their pastor. She was a widow for thirty years, living with her daughter. Her husband and six children are laid away in the cemetery where her body now rests. She and her sorrowing daughter have been members of Fairfield Church more than half a century. The funeral sermon was preached by Elder Thomas Wyman.

"The reaper came when the harvest was ripe,
And gave the tried one relief;
He severed the grain with his loving hand,
And bound the golden sheaf."

Albert Davis died at the residence of his brother-in-law, Wm. Terry, at Forest City, Holt Co., Mo., April 4th, 1889.

Brother Davis was born in Jackson Co., Mo., Feb. 15th, 1839, making the days of his pilgrimage on earth 50 years, 1 month and 18 days. He was the son of Silas C. and Manerva Ann Davis. He united with the Mill Creek Church of the Regular Predestinarian Baptist faith, situated near Forest City, in the year 1881, if I mistake not, and was chosen Clerk, and served the church faithfully as long as he lived. He was sick about two weeks, and bore his afflictions with christian patience, ever reconciled to his heavenly Master's will.

"Asleep in Jesus! Blessed sleep!
From which none ever wake to weep."
He was known among the Old Baptists throughout the United States by his many able letters published in different periodicals. The writer has been intimately acquainted with him for six or seven years, enjoying many pleasant as well as profitable conversations; for he was well-informed on almost any subject, and especially the Scriptures. So ably could he handle the deep fundamental principles of salvation that one not acquainted with him would think him an able minister of the gospel. He remained a strong Predestinarian Baptist until his death, dying in full triumph of a living faith in Christ, and having no confidence in the flesh.

Thus the church has lost a faithful member, the community a neighbor and citizen, and his sister, four nieces and one nephew a kind brother and uncle.

R. CLEVENGER.

VIBBARD, Ray Co., Mo.

WITH sadness of heart I now attempt to write a notice of the death of our dear aged mother, Elizabeth Hurst, wife of John Hurst (who preceded her thirty-six years to his heavenly home), which we desire you to publish in our family paper, which she read with delight and prized so highly from its early publication. She fell asleep in Jesus on Dec. 2d, 1889, aged 94 years and 24 days. She was born in Clarke Co., Ga., Nov. 8th, 1795, and was married to John Hurst in 1814, in Jasper Co., Ga. They soon afterward moved to Buncombe Co., N. C., where she obtained a precious hope in her blessed Savior in the year 1819; and in about the year 1821 they moved back to Newton Co., Ga. On Jan. 15th, 1825, she went to the church at Harris Spring and related to them what great things the Lord had done for her (which I have often heard her tell since, and how she was chastised for a neglect of the great obligation she was under to her precious Redeemer for his long-suffering to her, often feeling that she could not live if she did not follow him in the watery grave), being heartily received by them, and was baptized by the late Elder Joel Colley, then pastor of the church, her father, Elder David Montgomery, being present. Although she had been a pilgrim in this world of trouble and sorrow for about seventy years, yet she stood firm in the faith of Jesus, being ever ready to give a reason of her hope, and contending earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints. When the division came, in 1836 and 1837, she did not waver, but stood firm and unshaken with the Old School, and continued so until her Savior called her home. She was one of the most devoted of companions, mothers and Christians that it has been our privilege to know. Indeed, we can say that she was a precious mother in Israel, always filling her seat, if not providentially prevented, at church meetings. She was a dear lover of music, and took great delight in singing the songs of Zion. Just a few days before she left us she sang the following verse, which she had learned more than eighty years ago:

"This is a world of trouble
And grief, I plainly see;
And when in deepest sorrow,
O God, I look to thee.
Thou didst deliver Daniel
When in the lions' den,
And didst protect him ever—
O why not other men?"

She raised a large family of children, six daughters and seven sons, nine of whom survive her. The eldest one, George J., is in his seventy-third year, with whom she had made her home since 1860, until she came to our house, more than two years ago, to spend the remainder of her days (my companion being her daughter).

Just at eight o'clock p. m. of the day stated she passed away without a struggle, to receive the crown of glory. The writer and her son, Elder M. F. Hurst, spoke on the occasion of her funeral, using as a text 2 Timothy iv. 7, 8.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.
