It frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. Or if the paper is being sent in her name and the renewal is sent in her husband's name the same thing is likely to occur. Please be very careful to give the same name in which the paper is already coming, also the post office address at which it is received.

me of all my fears, and taken me into his banqueting house. But excuse me, and I will turn to the subject.

By the expression, "His righteous servant," I presume he had reference to his manhood, during his personal sojourn on earth. He acknowledged his servile work, saying, "I came down from heaven, not to do mine will, but the will of him that sent me." The Father sent him here on an errand, and in the performance of that work he endured the hardship of a servant; yet it was "by his knowledge," all his work being open before him. He knew all its turns, and all the hindrances that men and Satan would attempt to throw in his way. By his knowledge he knew how to thwart all their purposes, and bring to naught all the cunning of men and the wiles of Satan, in order to accomplished the great work that was assigned him. He was able to finish the work and make salvation free. That work was to justify his people from all things from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses. He shall "justify many." As it is written, "For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." By his obedience Jesus brought about the justification of life. The question involved in the justification of the guilty is one of considerable moment. It is easy for us to conceive the fact of an innocent person being justifiable in the many transactions of life, but how a guilty person can be justified contains more deep thought than pen or tongue can express. We can conceive of but one plan by which the guilty can be justified, and that is for the law of justification to antedate the crime from which the person is to be justified. Therefore God's rule or law regarding justification was with him and by him in eternity, and the plan all fixed before man was made, or before God had created the sea or earth, or the highest part of the dust of the ground; when his wisdom was by him, as one brought up with him, continually rejoicing in the habitable parts of his earth, and his delights were with the sons of men.—Prov. viii. Before the foundation of the world he fondly embraced his elect, who were chosen in him; and in his sovereign capacity and wisdom he viewed all the plan of their redemption, and their consequent justification. We see man fallen into a state of sin by transgression, and guilty. Then how can man be clean, so that he can stand before God as though he had never been guilty? We see the children of Israel under the law coming to the altar and making their offerings and sacrifices, by faith looking forward to the promised Messiah, the seed of the woman that should bruise the serpent's head. We will stop and illustrate. The husband is accountable for all the contracts and consequent indebtedness of his wife. In his absence she contracts a debt. Her faith in his return, and in his ability to pay when he returns, makes her promise that all her indebtedness will be fully met and canceled by him when he returns. Every time she comes she renews her vow and promise of payment when her husband returns, on account of her faith in him that he is able to pay her debts. Her creditors demand payment. The law says she must pay all demands. Everybody says, and the law says, that she is guilty; and under the power of conviction she herself pleads guilty; but at the last stage of her conviction her husband puts in his appearance, demands her release and pays all demands. By this he shows the respect he has for the law under which he lives, and also shows the love he has for his wife, and declares her justified from all things of which she had been held guilty. Now all this our blessed Savior did. Hence the people of God under the law always came with their offerings, which was a declaration of their faith in him who said, "I am married unto thee." It is in this sense only that the circumcision were justified by faith. As I can declare my wife justified from all her indebtedness that is set to my account, by meeting all demands thus made, so God's righteous Servant declared all the children of God justified, by meeting all demands that were against them. My act itself declares my wife not guilty. Jesus' act declared his bride, the church, not guilty. How did he do that? The text says, "For he shall bear their iniquities." Yes, here is the justifying act. "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquities of us all." "By his stripes we are healed." When he bore our griefs and iniquities he did it with patience. When he wore the crown of thorns, piercing his tender temples, he showed no resentment. When he was spit upon he took no revenge. When he was crucified he prayed, "Father, forgive them." He was delivered for (because of) our offenses, and arose for (because of) our justification. All this was done according to his knowledge. What he foreknew is an absolute certainty; and nothing in the compass of his foreknowledge will ever miscarry, but is numbered among the wills and shalls of Jehovah in the eternal covenant made with the house of David, ordered in all things and sure.

Hoping that what I have written (poor as is my scribble and composition) will meet the feelings of our dear sister Bowen, I subscribe myself yours to serve as ever, very truly,

IRA TURNER.

"THEREFORE be ye also ready,"—Matthew xxiv. 44.

This Scripture has occupied my mind quite much of late, and as I have neither seen nor heard an explanation of it from my own brethren I feel moved to pen some thoughts I have in connection with it, for your inspection, brethren Beebe, and also for the readers of the SIGNS, if they shall find a place therein. I have heard a great deal of what appears to me a wresting or false interpreting of this Scripture, within the last few years. In the first place we remember that the Master was speaking to his disciples only. In the next place we notice it was spoken that they might be ready. Let us notice particularly the first word of the text, "Therefore," which means for this or that reason. Then he must have had a special reason for instructing them as he did, which was all for their profit. Why was it so necessary that their readiness should be perpetual? Because of deceivers. As he sat upon the mount of Olives the disciples came to him privately, saying, "Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" It was the legal or Jewish world that he was speaking of, whether his disciples so understood it or not. But the best understanding the Arminian world has of the Master is that he meant this material world, and that his coming was to take the whole world to eternity. They think they must set sinners to getting ready for it. "Jesus answered and said unto them, Take heed that no man deceive you." This was one thing they were to be ready for. "For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many." Therefore they were in danger. "And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold." What a lamentable picture is this. How complete was his instruction. He assured them that false prophets and false christs should come, and how they should come, and what would be their cries, "Lo, here is Christ, or there. Believe it not." For he neither strives nor cries.

Suppose we illustrate it in this way. You have the promise of the coming of a friend that is to bring you glad tidings; but some one learns that there are those that are not this friend, nor do they have good news to bring; and the one that has learned this shows his interest in your welfare by describing to you the distinction in the appearance of the true friend and the deceiver. Then he has posted you, and you are ready for the occasion. Then he would say, Therefore (for this reason) be ready—ready to receive and rejoice in the coming of the true friend, and ready to reject and not become entangled with the pretenders. This was just what the dear Master was doing for his beloved disciples. He well knew that all these things would come upon them, which were calculated to try their hearts and their faith. Therefore he did not leave them in ignorance, that that day should overtake them as a thief in the night. He told them that these false prophets should show great signs and wonders, so much so that they would deceive the very elect if it were possible. I think he had allusion to himself as the elect, who is precious. But he distinguishes the manner of his coming from that of the false ones; for says he, "As the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west, so also shall the coming of the Son of man be." Not with a great hue and cry, but unbidden; yet controlling all things upon which its rays fall. I understand his coming to be at the close of the old Jerusalem, with its rites and ceremonies, its temple and its priests, and every particle of its scaffolding. Then that world is at an end; and, behold, we look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness; when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to establish his Jerusalem, which John saw coming down from God out of heaven, adorned as a bride for her husband; when he shall establish his eternal Priesthood, and officiate as King and Priest forever, never to undergo any change, henceforth and forever.

Now, dear child of God, are these things only as a dead letter unto us, or were they written aforetime for our learning? They were spoken to the disciples then for their safety and comfort, and written and preserved for ours also, if we are disciples. We are not to suppose that antichrist in all its forms passed away with the day and generation that then was. No, not at all; for its forms and deceptions have multiplied, and there is now more deception, trickery and craftiness, as the elements of antichrist, than ever before since the beginning of this material world. So we should take heed to the same wholesome instruction, remembering that this crying and yelling, saying, "Lo, here is Christ, and lo, there," in the distracted parades of every kind which the world is running after, is the very nest that false zeal has contrived to hatch young Hagarines. "Be ye also ready" to reject them, and to receive our glorious King as he appears to his people, causing them to bring forth the royal diadem and crown him Lord of all. He has come, and is yet coming, as the lightning, which none can control; causing his rays to fall wheresoever he will, bearing life and immortality with it. He comes also to strengthen and establish his work; for he said, "Ye shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds, with power and great glory. These clouds are the witnesses which he sends to gather his people from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other—the gospel heavens. And, dear child, by rejecting every false way and cry, and showing that you have no sympathy with nor interest in any of the ways or institutions which are the signs of antichrist, your name will be cast out as evil. But let none of these things move you; "for if they did these things in the green tree, what will they do in the dry?" said the Master. May God help his dear people everywhere to keep in sacred remembrance the precious words of the text, "Therefore be ye also ready."

Dear brethren Beebe, I have penned these few thoughts, which are at your disposal; and I hope, if they are published, all will throw the mantle of charity over my weakness.

LUELLA, Ark., April 12, 1892.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—While the cerulean vaults of heaven are bedecked with innumerable stars I grasp my pen to write a few lines to the dear brethren and sisters through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, as I have been requested several times to write again; and I should have written sooner but for fear of intruding. I have been compelled to keep silent, as I am not able to take the SIGNS; yet I dearly love the truth it so faithfully contends for. Still I have been blessed with the SIGNS, for it never gets old; it is always interesting to me.

The present seems to be one of the darkest seasons of my life. We live so far from any place where there is preaching that we scarcely ever hear what we dearly love to hear. It is true there are other denominations near us, but it is like a tinkling cymbal, or a bell that has an unknown sound to us. Our little place of worship has been destitute of a preacher more than a year, except a few times, when we have had a visiting brother to call on us. We meet once a month to talk and be together, hoping that our heavenly Father will send us a word of comfort. It seems to me that there is a dark cloud hovering over us, as it did over the children of Israel when Pharaoh was pursuing them. O how unworthy it makes me feel. Moses said unto the people, "Fear not: stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord." That is all we can do, to wait on; and perhaps the Lord will sooner or later take away the dark cloud and place it behind us, as he did for the children of Israel. I know that we are blessed with the Bible to read, while as yet I am not able to comprehend the hidden mysteries of God as some of the dear children of God are; but God is to be praised for his tender mercies. Paul tells us to "be not conformed to this world; but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. For I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith." I believe there is light given to some of God's chosen people on different parts or Scripture that some cannot comprehend so easily. O what a sweet consolation for us to know that our holy Father loves all his little ones just alike, and that we are to be saved only according to the purpose and grace given us in Christ Jesus before the world began; yet we are so apt to be doubtful when those dark clouds overshadow us. O think of our dear Savior while on earth, how he was persecuted from time to time. How different were his sufferings from ours. O let us think what he had to bear for us, and had to wear a crown of thorns, and be crucified and slain. "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain." We believe that God loves his people all alike, for he has ever been with his people Israel. The Scriptures tell us, "Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love: therefore with loving-kindness have I drawn thee." I feel that God's grace is sufficient to save his sheep everywhere. His love for his little fold is confined to no particular climate, nor to any exclusive region of the globe. His grace is experienced as well among the snows of the north as in the mild climate of the temperate zones, just so far as this world is peopled. The Scriptures tell us that before the end of time he shall send his angels, and shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from the uttermost parts of the earth to the uttermost parts of heaven. We learn that he has a people among every nation, tongue and kindred. The Scriptures tell us that "we know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." This is a comfort to me in my darkest hours of adversity, to know that there is a drawing love in the true gospel. How often do I think of the holy covenant which the Lord made with the house of Israel. "For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: and they shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more."

Brethren Beebe, will you please give your views on the fallen angels, spoken of in 2 Peter ii. 4 and Jude 6? I cannot understand that there ever was one of God's angels that stood condemned before him. I know that in Revelation it speaks of the war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon, and the dragon and his angels fought. Dear brethren, I hope you will forgive me for asking your views on anything, if it is too much trouble to you. I do so much enjoy your replies to your correspondents. With much love to all the kindred in Christ, I will close.

Your sister in hope,
FANNIE J. ALLEN.

DILLY, Oregon.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Having finished the business part of my letter, I feel like saying a few words more, although they be very few. If I might express my feelings I would tell of my love, which I hope emanates from God the Father. My dearly beloved kindred in Christ Jesus, go on as you are going, speaking often one to another of the good things in the Father's kingdom, the things which are revealed only to spiritual children, which the world cannot comprehend nor know. Let those who are not of us prate about our narrow-mindedness, and what they are pleased to term our delusions. It matters not to us; for we understand that their eyes are blinded that they may not see, and their ears are stopped that they may not hear. The "hard doctrine" set forth in the SIGNS is meat and drink to me. It makes me feel like extolling the name of God, even to the utmost of my feeble ability. It puts "glory to God" in my heart, though my tongue expresses it not, believing it to be the only doctrine set forth by Christ and his apostles, as well as by the prophets of old. There are many dear brethren who cannot see these things clearly, simply because it has not pleased God to make the doctrine plain to all. Doubtlessly there is a wise purpose in it, known alone to God himself. There are some who seem "touchy," and think the apostles made a mistake in recording such hard sayings. Jesus himself told Pilate, "Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above: therefore he that delivered me unto thee hath the greater sin." These are "hard sayings," but who, my brethren, is able to gainsay them? It is a comfort to me to believe that the Lord directs the evil as well as the good, in such a manner that his name is exalted above all else. If we are to believe the Scriptures in some things only, who shall say what to believe and what to reject? If we discard unlimited predestination, then we must have little left. "I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things." I rejoice in believing that God thus creates evil, knowing that it is for our good and for his glory. Our finite minds cannot see wherein the good comes. It is right that we should hate many of the things which God has created, he having purged us from sin, and clothed us with his righteousness, and turned our hearts heavenward.

Yours in hope of life eternal,
MRS. J. K. BOYD.

WILLARD, Va., June 18, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—From the days of the apostles to the present time there have been serious controversies among the saints, and divisions have resulted therefrom, and it is remarkable that none of them have been based upon the teaching of the Scriptures, but upon some word or phraseology invented by some learned and gifted preacher who is most highly esteemed among his brethren; and in all subsequent discussions of the peculiar doctrine promulgated by him no reference is made to the Scriptures, but all quotations to substantiate their claims are made from his utterances. The all-important question is, "What saith the Scripture?" We profess to take the Scriptures, the writings of the apostles and prophets and the teachings of Jesus, for our guide, or rule of faith and practice. We profess and hope that we are builded upon this foundation. Even the best of men may err, and in following them we must be sure that they are following Christ. I notice that in the controversies which have arisen of late years this same disposition is manifest; and there are abundant quotations from the writings of those able brethren who were engaged in the controversies of forty years ago, which they themselves uttered in the heat of controversy—to prove what? That we stand where they stood. The question is not, Do we stand on the same ground doctrinally that they occupied? so much as, Do we occupy scriptural ground? This is the question for us to consider. In establishing our claim to be the church it is far more important that we follow the rule given us in the word of the Lord than that we are holding the same things which were held and contended for by our brethren of forty, sixty, or even a hundred or a thousand years ago. Then, brethren, let us search the Scriptures, and study to show ourselves approved unto God, workmen that need not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. I consider it of far more importance that we do this, and that we keep well read up in the record of the divine testimony, than that we have well-preserved copies of old Circular Letters, and can quote whole paragraphs from them to show that we are right, and that those who may be of a different mind are wrong. One quotation from the writings of an inspired apostle is worth a volume of the opinions of men.

As ever, in hope, your unworthy brother,

A. B. FRANCIS.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

SISTER Hannah Tooker Kymer, wife of Barret P. Kymer, died at her residence in Branchville, Sussex Co., N. J., May 24th, 1892, aged 66 years, 9 months and 20 days.

She was born on Pleasant Ridge, near Westtown, Orange Co., N. Y., Aug. 5th, 1825. She was baptized by Elder Benton Jenkins in the fellowship of the Middletown & Walkill Old School Baptist Church, on June 11th, 1882. She was a most exemplary character, always true and conscientious. From her youth she was ever ready to assist the sick and needy, and never spared herself in ministering comfort to others. She was never known to turn a deaf ear to any one in distress. She was highly gifted with what might be considered a heavenly enlightenment and revelation, or spiritual vision and visitation. Her death was due to pneumonia, ending in heart failure. She gave up on Sunday, and died on Tuesday following. She is survived by her husband, son and daughter, two sisters and one brother. We mourn our loss, which is her gain.

"Asleep in Jesus! blessed sleep!

From which none ever wake to weep."

The funeral services were conducted at her late residence by Elder Knox, who spoke from Revelation xiv. 13, and read hymns 1246 and 1249, Beebe's Collection. Her body was interred in the Branchville cemetery.

HER SISTERS.

Lucy A. Hutchison, daughter of Wm. and Sarah Kemp, was born near Luray, Va., Sept. 27th, 1811, was united in marriage with Joseph Hutchison, by Elder Ambrose Booton, June 23d, 1831, moved to the state of Ohio in 1842, and in 1863 removed to Coles Co., Ill., locating in the village of Humbolt, where several years since brother H. passed beyond these mortal shores to receive the crown of righteousness, the end of his hope, that awaited him. The subject of this brief sketch, the devoted companion, survived until the morning of July 1st, when she too, after a three weeks' illness, closed her eyes in death, which had no terrors for her. Her age was nearly 81 years.

Though she had never made a public profession of religion, yet she was blessed with a spiritual mind, and delighted in the truth that debased the creature and exalted Christ. A sense of her unworthiness and nothingness as compared with the perfections of the Savior, kept her from offering to the church; but the same hope that had been her solace and comfort in life was her stay and staff in death. Her son, brother G. F. Hutchison, of Nebraska, and another son living in Colorado, reached the bedside of their dear mother before her spirit took its flight. These two sons, with a daughter, are the surviving children, who with a large circle of friends mourn the loss of a mother, friend, neighbor and citizen.

The writer was called by telegram to attend the funeral on Sunday, the 3d inst., when he tried in weakness to speak words of comfort to the sorrowing friends from Isaiah liv. 7; which was followed by a few appropriate remarks by Elder Wm. Luce, of Arcola, Ill. The funeral was attended by a large and attentive concourse of people. May the Lord sanctify the afflictions of his children to their good and the glory of his name.

J. G. SAWIN.

LOXA, Ill., July 4, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I am requested to send for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES a notice of the sudden death of sister Sarah A. Harlan, on the 14th inst., of paralysis of the heart.

She died at her home in Juniata Co., Pa., where she had lived just thirty years to the first of last April. She was a member of the little church at Tuscarora, Juniata Co., Pa., whence she had moved her membership from Rock Springs, Lancaster Co., Pa., where she was baptized by Elder Thomas Barton more than thirty years ago. She was a very useful member, well established in the faith of God's elect, a firm and unyielding advocate of the doctrine maintained by the Primitive Baptists. She was a widow, her husband, brother S. P. Harlan, having preceded her to the grave something more than two years. She leaves two daughters and five sons, three sisters and two brothers, besides many other relatives, by all of whom she was esteemed highly, and the church of her membership, to mourn, but not as those who have no hope.

She was a daughter of the late James Hanna, of Rock Springs, Lancaster Co., Pa., and was born in that vicinity on Feb. 24th, 1826, and was consequently 66 years, 3 months and 21 days old. Her death was sudden, though she had been ailing a great deal all the past winter and spring. She first had an attack of "La Grippe," but was supposed to have about recovered. Several brethren and sisters visited and spent the day with her just two days before her death. She appeared to be quite well, and was very cheerful, engaging in spiritual conversation, in which she took great delight. The evening that she died she ate quite a hearty supper, after which she told her daughter, Mrs. Ida M. Hart, that she would water the flowers, while the daughter went to milk the cow. When Mrs. Hart returned she found her mother lying beside the flowers, dead. A doctor was hastily summoned, but too late to render help; the Lord had called her home.

Brother E. D. Varnes, of Illinois, who was visiting relatives in Juniata County, conducted the funeral exercises, much to the comfort of the mourners. May the Lord comfort them.

A. B. FRANCIS.

DIED—May 26th, 1892, at her home in Franklin Township, Hunterdon Co., N. J., Mrs. Mary Hulsizer, widow of brother John Hulsizer, aged 89 years, lacking a few days.

Mrs. Hulsizer had been for many years unable to walk, from a disease which came upon her long ago, so that she could not leave her home for many years; still her general health was good. She was not a member of the visible church of Christ, but by those who are judges of the work of the Spirit she was held in sweet fellowship, as one born of God. She was a reader of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES for many years, until her sight failed, and then her daughter kindly read it to her. As she was unable to go out, services were occasionally held at her house by our ministering brethren, when she would appear to appreciate it much. She was kindly and faithfully cared for by her youngest daughter ever since the death of her husband, brother Hulsizer. She leaves behind her four children and many kindred and friends to mourn their loss.

The writer attended the funeral at her home on May 30th, when her mortal remains were laid beside her kindred. May the dear Lord cause this affliction to work for good to the bereaved family, and glorify his great name in the same.

B. BUNDY.

OTEGO, N. Y., July 5, 1892.

DIED—Near Kennedyville, Kent Co., Md., June 2d, 1892, Wm. M. Frazier, in the 60th year of his age.

From early life Mr. Frazier had been a steadfast lover of the truth and of the church of his choice. My acquaintance with him has been for more than thirty years, and I have considered him an experienced man all that time. He has for several years resided at quite a distance from any of the regular preaching places, but he aimed to attend as regularly as he could. He was taken with that prevailing disease, "La Grippe," on the 26th of December last, which afterward ran into what was thought to be typhoid fever. He would be some better at times, but was never well afterward. You have lost a faithful subscriber, and we have lost a worthy citizen, a devoted husband and kind father, as well as one possessed in a good degree of the Spirit of Christ. There are those who follow the Shepherd and obey his voice, who yet through diffidence and distrust of themselves remain outside the fold.

A widowed companion and a grown daughter (the only child) are left to mourn the sad bereavement.

E. RITTENHOUSE.

STATE ROAD, Del.

SISTER Lillie Giles, wife of Mr. Job B. Giles, of this city, entered into everlasting rest on Friday, June 11th, 1892, at about 6:30 o'clock p. m., aged 27 years, 8 months and 26 days.

While on her way to attend the Warwick Association, at New Vernon, on Wednesday, the 8th, in company with her mother, Mrs. Mary A. Williamson, the road-cart in which they were riding was upset while turning a corner, and both were thrown upon a pile of stones. Mrs. Williamson had one of her arms broken in several places, while Mrs. Giles sustained a fracture of the skull and a broken jaw, with other injuries, producing unconsciousness, from which she never rallied. Her husband, who had been for several weeks visiting relatives in England, sailed for home on the same day that she was injured, and reached his desolate house on Wednesday p. m., the 15th. The remains of the loved one were embalmed, and dressed in a new garment, which she was to have worn on the arrival of her husband; so that the husband had the satisfaction of once more looking upon the face of her from whom he had so fondly hoped to receive a glad welcome, which looked almost as natural as though she had just fallen asleep. They were married about six years ago.

The funeral services were held at her late residence on Thursday p. m., June 16th, and were conducted by her pastor, Elder Benton Jenkins, who spoke to the large gathering of relatives and friends, using as a text the words recorded Revelation xxii. 4: "And they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads." The burial was in Hillside Cemetery, this city, near the lake where several years ago she was buried in baptism by Elder Jenkins, in the fellowship of the Middletown & Walkill Old School Baptist Church, to whom she had greatly endeared herself, and who all feel that they have sustained a great loss; for she possessed in an eminent degree the christian virtues, being possessed of "the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price."

May the God of all grace and consolation support and comfort the deeply afflicted family, who have the sympathy of the entire church and community.—Ed.

Arthur L. Wilson, of Topsham, Maine, died July 2d, 1892, aged 81 years and 10 months.

The day he died he was in his usual health, and undertook to take a short ride in a hack; but before going far he was taken with hemorrhage of the lungs. He told the hackman to drive back, and before they reached the house he was dead.

Brother Wilson was a worthy member of the Bowdoinham Old School Baptist Church, and had been a sound Baptist for nearly sixty years. It can be truly said of him that through life he adorned the doctrine of God our Savior in all things. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace."

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

KELLY'S CORNERS, N. Y.

MY DEAR SISTER IN THE LORD:
—Your letter was very welcome. It is a sacred comfort to my soul to commune with the household of God concerning their welfare in heavenly things. I felt while reading yours that your language was the breathings of one who was blessed and taught of God. The welfare of Zion is dear to your soul. The peace and edification and fellowship of the members of the body of Christ is what your heart rejoices in and desires to see; but O how our heart aches when it is otherwise in the streets of Zion. Sometimes, as of old, it may be said, "Judgment is turned away backward, and justice standeth afar off: for truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter. Yea, truth faileth; and he that departeth from evil maketh himself a prey: and the Lord saw it, and it displeased him that there was no judgment."—Isa. lix. 14, 15. "How is the faithful city become a harlot! it was full of judgment; righteousness lodged in it; but now murderers."—Isa. i. 21. If there is any resemblance to any such a state as this among the churches anywhere, our eyes may well weep day and night over the desolations of Jerusalem. Our God hath said, "They shall prosper that love thee."—Psa. cxxii. 6. I am assured in my heart that you, dear sister, love the Zion of God. You mourn for her, and rejoice for her.—Isa. lxvi. 10. May you ever prefer Jerusalem above all the things of this world, above your chief joy. As you are aware, we are now living among the hills; but it is not all mountain-climbing in these parts, for our paths from place to place are often winding around the base of the mountains. We wend our way in the valleys. Here we meet with flowing brooks, and many things to engage our thoughts. Shall we together in the gospel of the kingdom of Christ visit some of the valleys spoken of in the Scriptures? If the Holy Ghost is our guide I am sure, no matter what valley he leads us into, that we shall see "the lily of the valleys;" and the sight and companionship of our Beloved and Redeemer will make our stay in the vale sweet and profitable to our souls. I had a little peep into one of the valleys the other day, and my soul has been desirous to enter more fully therein, and to explore by the eye of faith the scene of which I caught a glimpse.

Let us enter this valley by reading Genesis xiv. 17: "And the king of Sodom went out to meet him [Abram] after his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer and of the kings that were with him, at the valley of Shaveh, which is the king's dale." God hath given to Abram the victory over Chedorlaomer and the kings confederate with him; he has rescued Lot, and now with the spoils has returned. The king of Sodom meets him; but a far nobler personage is there, the Lord of this vale. "Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine: and he was the priest of the most high God." This is indeed a notable gathering in this vale, and has been a theme that has engaged the minds of God's elect from that time till now. The sweet psalmist of Israel sang, by inspiration of God, of Christ the Son of God, saying, "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool. The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion: rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning: thou hast the dew of thy youth. The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek."—Psalm cx. In the epistle to the Hebrews the apostle tells us that the priesthood of the Son of God is after the order of Melchizedec. "For this Melchizedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him; to whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all; first being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace; without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually. Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils."—Heb. vii. Let us then look upon the scene in Melchizedec's dale. Here once Absalom reared up for himself a pillar.—2 Sam. xviii. 18. But it is not this sight that we will contemplate, but behold in Melchizedec our King and Priest, Christ Jesus, the Son of God. There is the patriarch Abraham, the father of the faithful, and his three hundred and eighteen armed servants; while on every hand see the spoils they have taken from their enemies. Rescued Lot is among the host. The king of Sodom is there, asking for the persons whom Abraham hath brought back from the captivity of Chedorlaomer and of the kings that were with him. But our eye is now taken up with the sight of that wondrous person, Melchizedec, king of Salem, the priest of the most high God. He brings forth bread and wine for Abraham. In Melchizedec by faith we behold our Lord Jesus Christ. Our Redeemer is the King of righteousness, the King of peace, and is our great High Priest unto the most high God. He reigns in righteousness. Righteousness is the girdle of his loins. In righteousness he doth judge and make war. He is King of kings and Lord of lords; and our glorious and gracious King has by his own hand wrought out and brought in an everlasting righteousness, in which he arrays all the subjects of his kingdom. "He was made sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." We are perfect through his comeliness which he puts upon us. We are poor and needy, but our King saves us. "He shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper. He shall spare the poor and needy, and shall save the souls of the needy."—Psalm lxxii. 12, 13. In the valley of Shaveh, the king's dale, "Thine eye shall see the King in his beauty." Our glorious King hath triumphed over all his foes. He hath redeemed his people out of the hand of the enemy. He hath saved them from their sins. For them he hath triumphed over death and conquered the grave. He died for our sins, and rose again for our justification. O how rich is the grace of our King! He saw us in all our wretchedness, and in his surpassing love he brought salvation to us. We were his willing subjects in the day of his power.—Psalm cx. 3. O what majestic beauty sits enthroned upon our Savior's brow! The sceptre of his kingdom is a right sceptre. His own strong arm, the cords of his everlasting love, brought us as needy suppliants at his feet. He did not cast us out, but held out his golden sceptre to us, and we lived; and in due time, through his manifested mercy and salvation, we were seated by precious faith with him upon his throne. He clothed us in his righteousness. O what wondrous things our King hath done! He was made flesh, was made under the law, was made sin, was made a curse for us, and hath redeemed us from under the law. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh: that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit."

Now the King bringeth us into his chambers. "The King's daughter is all glorious within: her clothing is of wrought gold. She shall be brought unto the King in raiment of needlework: the virgins her companions that follow her shall be brought unto thee. With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought: they shall enter into the King's palace."—Psalm xlv. 13-15. He is "the Lord our righteousness." Then we may well rejoice in the valley of Shaveh, which is the King's dale; for in this vale our Melchizedec, King of righteousness, is revealed. O Emmanuel! "thou art fairer than the children of men: grace is poured into thy lips: therefore God hath blessed thee forever."—Psalm xlv. Jesus, our Melchizedec, is King of righteousness, and also King of peace.—Heb. vii. 2. "The Prince of peace."—Isa. ix. 6. We have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. When we were enemies we were reconciled unto God by the death of Jesus. "The chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed." In him we have peace. O how sweet is the revelation of peace in our souls in our Lord Jesus Christ! Those who preach "another gospel" speak of God requiring sinners to make their peace with God. Can it be that they have entered this valley, the King's dale? There we behold Melchizedec, the King of peace. He has conquered all our foes; he has trodden them as in a wine-press. His garments are red, stained with the blood of our enemies.—Isa. lxiii. He trod the wine-press alone, unaided, trampled all our sins in his fury, and made an end of them.—Daniel ix. 24. "He is our peace."—Eph. ii. 14. We that were enemies, and far off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ. O precious, soul-cheering doctrine, speaking peace by Jesus Christ!

He is Lord of all. In our King we have the victory. The battle is over. Over sin we triumph by faith in our Redeemer's reconciling blood and justifying righteousness. Our Melchisedec reigns the Prince of peace. He gives us quietness and rest. He shows us his hands and his side. By his wounds we have peace with God. O come, thou gracious Prince, and reign in us and for us. Thou only art our peace when the enemy would invade our land and tread in our palaces.—Micah v. 5. In all the quietudes that we encounter, thy reign, Melchisedec, King of peace, will cause wars to cease unto the ends of the earth. O God of love, look down from the height of thy sanctuary, and behold thy Zion; strengthen the bars of her gates, and bless thy children within her. Make peace, dear Lord, in her borders, and fill her with the finest of wheat.—Psalm cxlvii. 12-14.

Often, dear sister, when full of unrest, when tossed to and fro, when tried about my own soul's affairs, and oft when weary and perplexed about the distractions and troubles in some parts of the Zion of God, my soul has been drawn, and I have wended my way into this valley, the King's dale, and there I have been met by Jesus, our Melchisedec, the King of righteousness and King of peace. I have showed before him all the troubles of my heart, and at the feet of the Prince of peace I have prayed for the peace of Jerusalem. When the reign of the Prince of peace is manifest among us, the bond of peace unites all the household, they are at peace among themselves, they live in peace, they love the law of Christ our King, and the God of love and peace is with them. "From whence come wars and fightings among you?" asks the apostle James. Not while we are subject to the Prince of peace; not while we are in the King's dale, beholding the King in his beauty; for he says, "Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart." O may we ever learn of our King. May he ever so reign in us, and grant us that wisdom which is from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy. O may we ever find mercy to walk according to this rule; then upon us shall be peace and mercy from our God.

I will leave you for the present, but hope to meet you again and continue our contemplation of the scene in this valley of Shaveh, which is the King's dale. Let me hear of your welfare, and also of the welfare of the church; for my mind is often upon the precious kindred in Christ Jesus in your parts.

From your brother, I hope, in Jesus, the King of righteousness, King of peace, and Prince of the most high God,

FRED. W. KEENE.

BLANCO, Texas, June 13, 1892.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have been requested to write for the SIGNS on the subject of election; and though I have consented to do so, I feel assured that owing to the magnitude and sublime nature of the subject, I shall be able under the most favorable circumstances to only give a few hints; so, in a limited and imperfect way, with your consent, I will offer some such views as I may be favored with.

I deem divine election to be that sovereign, gratuitous, irreversible and eternal act or purpose of God wherein in love he elected or chose in Christ a special or certain number of persons out of the race of man, whom he would create; as it was in view of their fallen state the elect were given to Christ, their head and surety, to be redeemed by him, which he fully consummated by rendering perfect obedience to the precepts of the law, and annulling its curse by the one offering of himself to its final demands. "For by one offering he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified," set apart, or chosen. As the family of Adam in time, under the leadings of divine providence, are properly sifted over the different portions of the earth, so by his blood, or perfect obedience, Christ redeemed the elect out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation.—Rev. v. 9. Where Christ is designated the elect of God, as in Isaiah, Psalms, and other portions of the inspired word, his headship and mediatorial character are referred to, as he was given to be head over all things to the church, or elect, and is the Mediator between God and men, or elect.—Eph. i. 22; 1 Tim. ii. 4. The relationship of Christ and elect is often called a covenant union; but as the union of Christ and his bride, or elect, is a life union, it seems that the term unity or oneness would better express the relationship subsisting between them, unless in the use of the term union we have reference to a union of essence or life. In this sense it is eternal vital union. As John says, "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son."—1 John v. 11. So we understand that the eternal life of Christ is the eternal life of all the spiritual members of his body, which was given them in him, just as their natural life was given them in Adam; and as they (the elect) received their natural or mortal life by a natural birth, so by a spiritual birth they receive their spiritual, immortal, eternal life.

This wonderful unity of Christ and the elect seems to be very clearly presented in Psalm cxxxix. The psalmist says, "I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made. Marvelous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well. My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them." In his mediatorial headship Christ embodies all the divine perfections of Deity, in whom they all center and harmonize in the salvation of his bride, or elect, as in him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. He is therefore the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person, and so upholds all things by the word of his power.—Col. ii. 9; Heb. i. 3.

Divine election is eternal, unconditional (or is not conditioned upon anything in the elect) and personal; that is, it embraces a definite number, and no more. That election is eternal may be evinced by considering the divine perfections of eternity, prescience and immutability; for if God has formed a design of saving his chosen through a mediator, that design must be eternal, or he would be mutable in his purpose, and this would imply a change in God himself; so that if God has revealed a plan of saving his elect, and according to that plan has called, and is calling some of them by his grace, beyond doubt he eternally purposed their salvation by or through the mediation of Christ, their covenant head. As God's knowledge is perfect, and cannot receive further accessions to make it more so, as at one view he saw all things with us, past, present and future, so this perfect knowledge of God rests upon a perfect foundation, which is the sovereign determination of his holy will. Therefore if God certainly knows future events, including the salvation of his elect, he as certainly determined their existence; for if they were undetermined, they were uncertain; and if uncertain, they could not be certainly known. But as to the eternal provision of election and salvation through a mediator, the Scriptures speak with no uncertain sound. In Ephesians, first chapter, the apostle with emotions of reverence and gratitude breaks forth in the following strains, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us [the elect] with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ [our covenant head], according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we [the election of grace] should be holy and without blame before him in love; having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will." As in this epistle the apostle is addressing his Ephesian brethren, who were of the fallen race of Adam, and as they in common with all the elect were blessed with all spiritual blessings in Christ, and were chosen in him, as their covenant head, to be redeemed by him, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love, having been predesti-nated to the adoption of children by him, it therefore seems that it was sinners of the fallen race of man alone that were embraced in election, or choice, as they were chosen in Christ to be redeemed by him; and as their eternal life was already in him, it needed no redemption. Gratuitous or unconditional election is a necessary consequence of its eternity; for if election is eternal, its objects had no existence when the choice was made, save in the eternal mind or predestinating purpose of the elector. And as this view of unconditional election is so fully sustained and confirmed by the whole tenor of Bible truth, and is so clearly demonstrated by the apostle in Romans, ninth chapter, I shall at present only allude to his teaching in reference to Jacob and Esau. As some who are opposed to the apostle's teaching have seemingly started theories adverse not only to his teaching, but also to the whole tenor of Bible truth on the subject, I will be as careful and plain as possible in my allusion to it. We find by consulting preceding verses that the apostle refers to the sad state of his brethren according to the flesh, who in their nationality are only a type of the church, or elect; as he says, "They are not all Israel [spiritually] that are of Israel," nationally. And "The children of the flesh [as descending from Abraham], these are not the children of God [or elect]; but the children of the promise are counted for the seed. For this is the word of promise, At this time will I come, and Sarah shall have a son." This, I think, refers to the fulfillment of the promise that God made to Abraham when he said, "In thee and in thy seed [or Christ, in his humanity] shall all the families of the earth be blessed." Then the apostle said, "And not only this, but when Rebecca also had conceived by one, even by our father Isaac." Now it seems that in the case of Abraham's seed Christ is referred to as the head of his bride, the church, or elect; so in the case of Rebecca we understand that in Jacob and Esau are brought to view both the elect and nonelect, or those not embraced in election. For says the apostle, "The children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand [as being the sovereign act of God], not of works, but of him [God] that calleth, it was said unto her [Rebecca], The elder shall serve the younger: as it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated." I will observe that as our God is not susceptible of emotional anger, pain nor pleasure, as his poor creatures are, the word "hate" here seems to mean that he did not regard Esau with favor, as he did Jacob; for as a representative character he chose and loved Jacob with an everlasting love; and so equally as ancient he hated or rejected Esau, who also seems to be a representative character; as the apostle seems to present and illustrate the case as exhibiting the absolute sovereignty of God in dispensing and withholding his favors, according to his good pleasure and the sovereign determination of his will. In Malachi, first chapter, it is written, "Was not Esau Jacob's brother? saith the Lord: yet I loved Jacob, and I hated Esau, and laid his mountains and his heritage waste for the dragons of the wilderness," &c. Some refer to this in order to evade the doctrine of personal election, and insist that it refers to nations and individuals; and thereby they endeavor to set aside the apostle's teaching on the subject, who being inspired had perfect knowledge of the import of the language of the prophet; and he also had perfect knowledge of the whole subject in all its bearings, without the aid of the prophet, and refers to the prophet as confirming testimony to his own teaching. But if in election or choice God were only to take nations into his favor, and protect, provide and care for them, and reject, torment and destroy other nations, when (as in the case of Jacob and Esau) the cause of this difference of treatment was not in the nations so treated, what, I ask, is the difference in principle as to the discriminating favor of God, whether of individuals or nations?

Another theory on the subject is as follows, that Esau typifies or represents the old or outer, or fleshly man, as he is a rough or hairy man; and that Jacob represents the inner, or immaterial man. As a figure, and in the secondary sense, this may be true; but to take this view as the true and only meaning of the apostle's teaching in this connection would when carried to its legitimate results involve the horrid idea of both universal salvation and universal damnation, as all the Jacobites being embraced in election would be saved, and all that Esau represents, being rejected, or not embraced in election, would be lost. But I believe, as the Scriptures teach, that each of the boys, Jacob and Esau, was possessed of real and individual personality peculiar to the family of Adam, and each represented a particular, special and definite number of persons of the race of man, who in their relation to God and men, as to their existence and destiny, differed, as clearly shown by the apostle, who, after saying that God loved Jacob before he was born (or from eternity), and as anciently hated or rejected Esau, and to show that as it was not for anything good in Jacob, nor for any evil or defilement in Esau, that God loved and chose the one, and hated and rejected the other, shows that the cause of this difference was not in the children, but in their Creator; otherwise election would not be of grace or mere favor. But to this teaching the apostle infers and suggests an objection, which is very common to this day, by persons whose minds are swayed by human sympathy and carnal reason; for if what is implied in what is said about Jacob and Esau be true, the carnally minded will conclude that there must be unrighteousness with God. But so far was this wonderful teacher from modifying his language, or compromising his statements, in order to harmonize with such carnal teachers, that he proceeds to confirm and strengthen the grounds already taken; and it would be extremely anomalous for his opposers to consent or agree with him in the answer to the inference of unrighteousness in God, to which he says, "God forbid. For he saith to Moses, I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion;" from which the apostle justly concludes that, in the matter of salvation, "It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth [or seeketh for], but of God that showeth mercy." He then refers to what was said of Pharaoh being raised up, that God might show his power in (or through) him, and that his name might be declared throughout the whole earth.

Again, how immense the difference between the apostle in his conclusion drawn from the case of Pharaoh, and that of some modern teachers, who say that Pharaoh hardened his own heart, and that it was only necessary for God to withdraw or remove his weighty judgments, and Pharaoh would harden his own heart. Now, this view of it supposes that God determines an end, and poor, little, impotent creatures provide and apply the means in order to its accomplishment; than which nothing can be wider of the mark, as shown by the apostle; for he says, "Therefore hath he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth." God's sovereign will, therefore, seems to be the central point upon which all things turn. Here the apostle states another objection to his teaching, as follows, "Thou wilt say then unto me, Why doth he [God] yet find fault? [or blame the conduct of any of his creatures] for who [that is, none hath or can] hath resisted his will?" In this objection all opposition to the divine sovereignty centers; for its opposers seem to suppose it is not at all consistent with the character of a just and holy God to act as stated by the apostle, and therefore insist that his language cannot mean what its terms clearly imply. But all such sophisticated cant the apostle meets with the significant negative "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God" for doing as seemeth him good in dispensing and withholding his favors? "Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?" That is, shall impatience and dust fly in the face of omnipotence and purity, and dictate terms by which he must regulate his conduct in dealing with his creatures, in order to be right or just? For instance, "Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump [or had not God power over the creatures he hath made] to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor?" In illustrating and further confirming his teaching the apostle concludes with the following strong and pointed language, "What if God, willing to shew his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: and that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory?" Who has a right to blame or test the conduct of his Sovereign before a human tribunal? The most refined and tender sympathies, and the most profound reason, when applied to their proper objects in the affairs of this life, are great blessings, and conduce greatly to the social well-being of society, but are utterly condemned when applied as a test of the divine goodness, or as a rule to measure the perfection and economy of God. Then, according to the apostle's teaching, when we say or contend that if God holds any of his creatures guilty, or punishes them for doing what he determined they should do, or when we say that God did not do or say this or that, when the Scriptures declare it, we in effect charge God with injustice, and blame him for finding fault with us; to all of which I say, God forbid that I should ever be guilty.

Although this is more lengthy than I designed (as I am much in favor of short articles for the SIGNS), yet I have said but little of what might profitably be said on the subject; so I may, in continuance, write again on the same subject.

Your brother, I hope, in gospel bonds,

JAMES WAGNER.

NEWPORT, N. C., July 2, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I feel that I should have written sooner than this, but since my return home I have been very busy filling appointments. The goodness and mercy of our God has (I trust) been my dwelling place, both in keeping me and my family in my absence; also the churches I serve, so that they were generally supplied with good preaching. Since my return I have visited two of them, and have had the pleasure of baptizing one at each church.

The kindness of my brethren and sisters, which they manifested to me both in word and deed, will not be forgotten soon. I am glad to say that I found the churches generally in peace, and love seemed to abound. At several of them I felt there were some of the little ones just at the door, who, I feel, will come in the day of the Lord's power. There is always something that is not just right until that day comes, and then all obstacles are removed, and the ransomed of the Lord cannot stay away any longer. An Arminian can make a profession of religion at any time, and can just as easily break it; but it is a very serious thing with the children of God, lest they should deceive the church of God. I know by experience that Arminianism never causes one to fear that he or she will deceive the church; but, on the other hand, it always tells us that we surely are christians, and for proof brings up a great many good works that we have done, and sacrifices that we have made for the cause of Christ. The true spirit of christianity cannot see any good works that we have done, nor any sacrifices that we have made; but, after doing all that we can, it says, What have I profited the Lord? for all this was only my reasonable service, and I have not done half that I ought. Therefore God does not owe us anything. I am made to conclude that we do not make any sacrifice for Christ, but he has made a great and wonderful sacrifice for us, and we are made partakers of his sacrifice. This is the reason that we are made willing to obey his commandments, and to be anything that he requires us to be. I think that none of us would ever naturally choose to serve the Lord. "Because the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be."—Rom. viii. 7. All the mind that we are naturally in possession of is the carnal mind, and that is God's enemy. Who will willingly serve a man that he is an enemy to? Surely no one. God gives his mind to his children, and it is by that mind overcoming the carnal mind that we are made to walk in the way of God. The carnal mind is never God's friend; no, not even in his own children. If it were, we would have no warfare. I have heard some say, "Since I joined the church I have not had any trouble." Surely these do not know anything about the christian warfare, and I conclude that they have only the carnal mind; for if they had the mind of Christ at all, it would surely show them the presence of indwelling sin, and they would have trouble. The christian finds an enemy dwelling in his house, and that disturbs his peace; for he knows by past experience where that enemy would lead him to; but his desires are to follow Christ; for he knows him to be the friend of such sinners as he is. This desire is in the heart of every one of the Lord's little ones, and it separates them from the world. The world can sin and treat it lightly; but the christian when he sins feels the chastening hand of God, and fears that he is deceived. Thus his sins are continually before him, and he is a continual mourner. He would do good, but knows not how. He would never commit another sin, but cannot escape it; for sin is mixed with all he does. If he preaches, prays, sings, gives alms, or visits the widow and orphans in their afflictions, he sees that all this

PROBATIONARY LICENSES.

IN his article on page 206, current volume of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, Elder A. B. Brees requests our views on "the propriety of giving licenses to preach, as a probationary precaution of the church." Briefly it might suffice in reply to say that there is no authority given to the church for the adoption of any "probationary precaution" in the case of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, either for preaching or for the benefit of the body in any other way. There is a very generally prevalent custom of formal recognition by the church of the qualification of a member for publicly speaking in expounding the Scriptures, and in defending the doctrine of salvation by grace. Doubtless it is of this practice that our brother intends to ask scriptural authority. There is no example on record of the church in the apostolic age trying any experiments for the probation of the gifts bestowed upon her. When the Holy Ghost spoke in the case of Barnabas and Saul, there was no intimation that they were to be tested before they were separated for the work whereunto they had been called of God.—Acts xiii. 1-3. It will be observed however that they were not under the necessity of calling the attention of the church to their cases; the Holy Ghost did not leave that unpleasant task for them to perform. To the church came the word of the Lord, by which the servants of God were commanded to be separated for that work which was assigned them. Nothing is said of probation in their case. The fact is recorded that there were certain prophets and teachers in the church that was at Antioch, among whom the Holy Ghost selected and called to the special work appointed them these two prophets. If we are authorized to accept this case as the apostolic pattern for setting apart those in whom the church recognizes the gift of the public ministry, it would be well to observe carefully that there is no record of the Holy Ghost giving to Saul and Barnabas any impression in regard to this separation. The church was commanded to do this work. The same Spirit which qualifies and calls those whom God has designated to serve in the public ministrations of the word, is the Spirit by which the church is called to recognize and appreciate the gift which he has bestowed upon his chosen servants. In any case now it is hardly safe for a brother to accept as the work of the Spirit an impression, however strong it may be,

if the church has heard nothing of it from the Holy Ghost. The ways of the Lord are equal; when he calls a prophet to speak, he also calls his saints to hear the word which is to be spoken by that servant. This must necessarily be the case, since the church must be the tribunal to judge all the angels (or messengers) by whom the Lord speaks to his people. If the church has no impression in recognition of the gift of a member, it is well for us to be very careful that the impulse of carnal ambition be not mistaken for the calling of God to the declaration of his truth. Much confusion and trouble often result both to the church and to the brother himself from failing to properly discern this distinction between the inclination of the flesh and the direction of the Spirit. Some very excellent brethren have not only destroyed their own peace and usefulness, but seriously burdened the church by falling into the error of mistaking their personal aspirations for the direction of the Spirit. When once captivated by this delusion they are just as sincere in it as if it were the Lord directing them. On the other hand, there may be an error on the part of brethren in being governed by blind prejudice, so that they refuse to acknowledge the gifts which the Lord has set in the body as it has pleased him. Where such willful blindness controls the church only the infinite power of divine grace can save the body from dissolution. Unless repentance is given to such a church the candlestick is likely soon to be removed out of its place, and the visibility of the church in that location may be lost.

There could never have been any occasion for the introduction of a provision for probationary licenses in the church if there had not been previously a departure from the apostolic pattern in the order and action of the church. Not only in the pattern of primitive simplicity of that order which was established on the day of Pentecost, when "All that believed were together and had all things common," but by special decree it is ordained in the law of Christ that "Ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted. And the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets. For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all churches of the saints."—1 Cor. xiv. 31-33. Where this perfect law of liberty is recognized all the saints are as free to speak in their assemblies as are the children in a well regulated family. It is not expected that every prattling babe will speak with the precision of grammatical and rhetorical correctness which might be observed by an accomplished orator; it is rather the broken and imperfect expression of the helpless child which falls with most sweetness upon the ear. So, in the church there is more fullness of the spiritual consolation of the gospel in the unstudied moaning of a conscious sinner than in the most elaborate and polished statement of the theory of the doctrine of the truth in its letter. God is never more gloriously worshiped by mortals than when the helpless and justly condemned prisoner cries from his despair, saying, "Lord! help me!" That last expiring groan ascribes greatness to our God beyond what can be declared in all the eloquent tones of men or angels. It sincerely confesses that he has power to save the guilty from the just condemnation which is his desert. This is the insurmountable obstacle in the way of educating by human teaching even one who is a subject of grace, to enable him to preach the gospel. None but the Spirit of truth can give the words of grace which find the response of faith in the hearer. Without this one Spirit in the speaker and in the hearer there can be no profitable preaching of the gospel. When the organized church is walking in the order established by the Spirit in the apostolic age, there will be manifest continually such gifts as are given by the Spirit, without the necessity of resorting to means devised by natural reason for their discovery. It will not be claimed by those who know the perfect law of gospel liberty that it can be improved by human devices. Certainly those who have experienced the perfection of that peace which reigns in the way of obedience to the law of Christ can never desire any improvement upon that divine order of which God is himself the author.

In our own experience, as doubtless in that of many of our readers, it has been the pleasure of the Lord to speak to the churches in calling from among them such as are chosen for special work, either as servants to the church in the place of ministers, or in other positions for which the particular gifts bestowed have qualified them. While in some cases there has been an uncertainty in the mind of the church in regard to the propriety of their being set apart to the work of the ministry, it has not been our experience to find that uncertainty dispelled in their probationary trial; although in some such doubtful instances the brother has been formally ordained. The result has been that his whole subsequent life has been troubled by the same cloud which overshadowed his ordination. It is not wonderful that under such circumstances his usefulness in the church has been hampered and circumscribed. When there is such a prevalence of the love of God among the members that they are of one heart, the church will know every member in the peculiar exercises of his individual experience, and in that knowledge the Holy Ghost will say to them as they minister, Separate me such as are called to each particular work.

There is good reason to question the propriety of any action on the part of the church of Christ for which there is no clear authority in the revealed word of our Lord. In the case under consideration, as already intimated, the practice necessarily results from a previous departure from the inspired rule. If the church were walking in the original order, there could be no occasion for the introduction of probationary licenses, since the gifts in the church would be manifest in the constant intercourse of the saints. Nothing can be better than a return to that primitive order. Some churches do approach so nearly to the pattern that every member feels free to speak in their meetings as he is impressed; and in such churches there seems no need for any other license than that which is given by divine authority, to which we have referred. In those churches where such liberty is not enjoyed by all, it is not clear how any gift is to be manifested to the church. Possibly the customary device may be as good as any other; but it should be remembered that there is no scriptural authority either for the church giving probationary licenses, or for the order in the churches which renders the resort to such devices apparently needful.

In presenting these reflections upon the subject suggested by the request of our correspondent, we have no desire to introduce any innovation upon the practice of the churches in various localities as established by the usage of the fathers whose example is entitled to reverential respect. So long as the principle of fervent charity pervades the church there will not be any serious departure from the primitive order in any form of action which may be adopted in expressing that fraternal love. The judgment of the King in Zion requires that the heart be clean rather than the mere formal compliance with any outward rule. So David says, "Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward parts; and in the hidden part thou shalt make me to know wisdom."—Psalm li. 6. The important point is to be led by the principle of love to God, which is manifest in loving one another with a pure heart fervently; and under the guidance of the Spirit of Christ there will be little danger of serious departure from the form of obedience to the external ordinances of the gospel of Christ. In the absence of this first fruit of the Spirit, whatever conformity there may be to the letter of obedience, it will come no nearer to fulfilling the law of our King than did the kiss of Judas, or the mockery of those who clothed him in scarlet, crowned him with thorns, and then hailed him as king of the Jews. Without divine love there is no obedience to the order of the gospel of God.

Reference to personal experience will remind those who have known the answer of a good conscience toward God that "All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do."—Heb. iv. 13. There is no necessity for him to depend upon the testimony of created witnesses to enable him to judge righteously. In his sight the proud orator who can sway the multitudes by his eloquence is not esteemed as declaring the testimony of Jesus with such power as the helpless leper whose necessity extorts the cry for mercy. The ablest minister of the gospel is not the one who commands the admiration of all his hearers by his conclusive arguments or magnetic influence. Men of the world may be attracted by such ability; but the preaching which is profitable to the mourning sinner and to the bewildered saint is that simple testimony of Jesus in which the preacher is lost sight of entirely, while infinite grace shines in the face of Jesus Christ to the glory of God. No loftier notes of praise to God are sounded in the highest heaven than the worship of that polluted and guilty sinner who cries out of the depth, saying, "Lord, if thou wilt thou canst make me clean."

The faith of the Son of God in the church will not fail to recognize the gift of the Spirit which enables a member to proclaim the grace of God in the salvation of his people from their sins. Therefore it is a living testimony of that faith in the church when such a gift is discovered by this assured response of faith in those who hear. There is no more need of rules by which to discover this conclusive evidence of the existence of the gift of the Spirit, than there is need of artificial light to discover the rays of the noonday sun. When the church is in the possession of spiritual discernment, and the liberty of the gospel enables every member in his constant deportment to work out that salvation which God works in him, it will not be difficult for the church to discern every gift which is bestowed upon any of her members. In humble gratitude to God, every such gift will be appreciated; and the blessing of reciprocal profit and enjoyment will mutually endear every member to all the others. Thus the saints are builded together as a holy temple in the Lord, for a habitation of God through the Spirit. In this wonderful building every one of the saints is inseparably identified with every other member of the one body of Christ; and the one life of the whole body is Christ Jesus, "Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption; that, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord."—1 Cor. i. 29, 30.

needs to be cleansed by God's grace, or it is unclean. Verily, if he were a "free agent" he would not have things this way. He would be a hypocrite if he did. Truly God's ways are not our ways. He has his own way of making himself manifest to us, and it is always in such a way as to make us praise him. If we become exalted in ourselves, God will surely abase us. He has appointed unto us to glory only in the cross of Christ. Therefore God will be exalted in his children; and we cannot exalt Christ and the flesh at the same time. The flesh must be crucified with the affections and lust; and we cannot do this of ourselves. It was not by our will that we were crucified with Christ, and it is not by our will that that crucifixion is now manifested to us. We are taught that we must deny ourselves and take up his cross. I know by experience that this is too hard for me to do; but I trust that Christ has enabled me to do both. It is not a hard thing to wear the yoke when the Lord lays it upon us, for then self is out of the way. "My yoke is easy, and my burden light." Thus we find it when he puts it on us. What christian will say, "It was so hard for me to submit to baptism at the time I was baptized?" It was a hard thing before, and something always kept us back; but at that special time it was easy, notwithstanding we were just as unworthy as we were before, and nothing could hinder us. It is so with all the duties and privileges of the church. It is a pleasant thing to speak in the name of Christ when we feel his presence; for at such a time self is abased, and God is exalted. A christian cannot love Arminianism, for that always exalts man, and would abase God and make him altogether such an one as ourselves, if it could. Saul of Tarsus had to be converted from Phariseism before he could be a christian. Even so we have to be converted from Arminianism before we can be christians. Creature helps must first all fail and be brought to nothing, both in bringing and keeping us in the way of God, and then the Lord is manifested as our Savior; and also that it was he who showed us our nothingness in the first place. Christ is the last resort. We will never come to him as long as we have any other to go to. In the days of old no one would flee to a city of refuge to live, if he could live in peace in any other city. Christ is our city of refuge, and no one can or will come to him but those who feel their condemnation just. Also his church (the Old School Baptist) is the last resort. No one will come to that who can find rest in any other. That is one thing I noticed in the churches that I visited; there were so many that had been members in "the flocks of thy companions," and had been compelled to come out from among them and seek rest in the fold of Christ. We bid all such a hearty welcome to our feasts of love. Boaz said to Ruth, "Go not to glean in another field, neither go from hence; but abide here fast by my maidens." What a glorious privilege to glean in the field of Christ! His food never faileth, neither is it diminished with much eating; but the more we eat the more we have. We, like Naomi and Ruth, always come at the beginning of the harvest; and ours is so much better than theirs; for theirs was over after awhile, but this one never ends. Theirs could only maintain natural life, but ours gives eternal life; or we enter into it at the same time that eternal life is given to us, or manifested in us. Those old things were only types, but we have received the reality.

Brethren, I have not written what I intended to write, but have run this out so long that I must stop, lest I weary your patience. I want to say to all the brethren, sisters and friends with whom I met that I reached home one day late, because of a train wreck just this side of Baltimore. I found my family enjoying good health, and they join me in love to you all. I trust that the good Lord will graciously sustain us, and if it be his blessed will, enable us to meet again in the same brotherly love that characterized all our meetings.

Your brother, I hope, in Christ,

RIPLEY, Tenn., June 23, 1891.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR EDITORS:—For some time past I have been thinking of writing to you, as I find so many letters of comfort in the SIGNS, the writers telling of the wonderful dealings of God with them. When I trace my life back to the year 1866 I cannot understand why I have been spared. I have been through midnight darkness, in bonds, and beaten with many stripes for my disobedience. My worldly connections have forsaken me, and my worldly substance has from me fled. I cast my lot among God's dear people; but soon my mind became entirely broken up, and in folly I became engaged, and soon became a wreck by the way. My friends told me I would soon lose my mind, but all their advice proved a failure. I came to the conclusion that those who are ready to receive advice do not need it. While in this condition my mind came again to me, and I could look back and see the hand of the Lord in it all. I frequently think of Joseph in Pharaoh's cell, where light was excluded. Like David I say, "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation." Joseph failed to see the sweet deliverance that was to come. But at the appointed time the Lord caused the king to dream things that finite intelligence could not comprehend; yet Joseph was the interpreter of God's plan to show the eleven brethren that they must go into a strange country and buy corn. It was not a mere happen so, but was appointed and ordained of God, who was to deliver a great nation by Joseph's hands; yet the eleven were ignorant of that purpose. At the appointed time when Joseph should make himself known to his brethren, the Lord caused the famine. Even so it is at the present time, when a gospel famine comes, it is proper to look around and see if Joseph is in Pharaoh's cell. How many precious lessons are drawn from this example, this sublime subject. Well might the apostle say, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." The sowing is not as hard as the reaping. The one who sows must also reap. At times the harvest seems severe, almost more than we will be able to gather; but as we sow, so we must reap. We know that every man must bear his own burden. How sad it is for us to look back over our past life, and mourn a misspent life, and grieve because we have not done as we should. While we should be governed by a humble and submissive spirit, we find ourselves at times full of malice and envy, backbiting, and trying to hurt the character of some poor, erring brother, who has erred from the truth, instead of admonishing him to repent of his evil ways, and to serve the true and living God. Would not the latter be better than trying to destroy the happiness of one for whom Jesus died? How can a man murder his brother for whom Jesus died, and yet expect to prosper? "And ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him." I have seen brethren trying to gain the world, who have left the things of God and ran after the world. May we awake, and put on the whole armor of God, and abide the plain teaching of Jesus. "From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?" "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you." How beautiful is peace. Let us follow after the things that make for peace. "As ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him." Did Christ give you bitter hatred for each other? Verily not. You cannot serve Christ and man. Christ has forgiven us, and not condemned. I cannot find authority for our condemning one another, but for reproving and rebuking. Christ gave the same charge to his apostles. "To be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace." I have thought that the character who makes peace has the best gift. Then should we not follow after the things Jesus gave to his people, and which he left for their spiritual enjoyment? Let the world do as they will; but let it not be said that the Primitive Baptists are following after them. Stand firm in the apostles' doctrine, and contend for the truth. The hope of heaven is all I have. My earthly enjoyments have fled. My kindred in the flesh have all passed to their eternal home, while I am yet left to battle through life's dusty way. I frequently wonder why I have not preceded them; but that is best known unto my blessed Master. I meet with many ups and downs in my rugged path. I can surely say with Paul, "In me, that is, in my flesh, there dwells no good thing." I am waiting for my Master to come, when I hope to leave this troublesome place, and go to that celestial city, whose builder is God. My afflictions seem more than I can bear. I hope for a crown of righteousness, through the atoning blood of Jesus, who is the Savior of all the elect heirs of promise.

While I believe in God's predestination of all events, from the beginning to the end, yet I do think many people try to get behind this beautiful pillar of truth in order to cover up their sins. While Joseph's brethren sold him into Egypt, and while the Romans put Jesus to death, those very acts accomplished the eternal counsel of God. The Lord's will stands, and his counsel is sure. None should question the justice of Jehovah, the Almighty God. While election remains a truth, yet there remain duties as well as graces. Because ye are God's sons, he requires at your hands obedience. While Israel were commanded to keep the law, it was not to make them Israelites, but because they were Israelites. Only the bitten Israelites were commanded to look to the serpent and be healed; so only those who feel that they are sinners are commanded to look to Jesus for life and salvation. Then how blessed for God's humble poor to possess the evidence that they have been purchased by that spotless offering which was once made for sin. Their fruit is justly credited to that obedience which Jesus rendered to the law for the elect family, who are chosen in the furnace of affliction. David says, "Many are the afflictions of the righteous; but the Lord delivereth him out of them all." Well might the apostle say, "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." Because of the exceeding great and precious promises they should walk in perfect obedience. As Jesus kept the law, even so should we endeavor to keep the law of grace. As Jesus was obedient unto death, even the death of the cross, and was tempted by Satan, so must we also be tempted. As he wept in Gethsemane, and was crucified, so must his followers go there, and also be crucified. As he lay in the tomb, and arose, so have his followers the sweet promise that they shall arise in like manner, to join the redeemed host, arrayed in white robes. Dearly beloved, having these precious promises, may we strive to enter in at the strait gate, and live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of our Savior, who shall come again, and we shall see him as he is, and shall be like him. Strengthen ye the feeble knees, sleep not, but continue in prayer and watching. Where is Jesus? He is at the right hand of God, and maketh intercession for his redeemed. Would we not be miserable if we could not follow him beyond the grave? O hope! sweet hope! May I be kept by the power of God, and be led by that meek and quiet spirit which will provoke unto love and good works.

I must close. I see this letter is much like the writer, being imperfect. I have digressed, and left what I aimed at in the start. I hope you will correct all errors if you publish this. I am a poor orphan boy, trusting alone in the blood of Jesus. Finally farewell. I hope we shall meet where the tree of life is blooming.

ELDER J. D. HUBBELL AND WIFE
—DEARLY BELOVED BROTHER AND

SISTER:—Once more, providence permitting, I will try to address a few lines to you, telling you in my feeble way something of my spiritual journey through this wilderness world. When I last wrote you I had been passing through great mental conflict; a struggle between hope and fear; between the powers of darkness and the Father's love. But thanks be to God, who ever giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ, the Sun of righteousness broke through and dispelled the dark clouds of unbelief and fear, and enabled me to bask in the sunlight of his love, and joy and rejoice in the finished salvation of God my Savior, filling my heart with a calm and settled peace, a peace which the things of this world can neither give nor take away. Although the trials of this life may be varied and many, it is very sweet to be enabled to look onward and upward, beyond this vale of sin and tears, and say, "He knoweth the way that I take. When he hath tried me I shall come forth as gold." Yes, blessed be his holy name, he knows every step of the way. He hath gone on before us, as our dear elder Brother, and made the way so plain for us to follow that a way-faring man, though a fool, shall not err therein. I have been made to read and meditate on the first five books of the Bible of late. Although I found much that seemed dark and mysterious to my poor finite mind, yet I have been enabled to see such beauty, such a wondrous, infinite love unfolded therein, such perfection of the divine plan of electing grace and mercy, that my heart has been made to adore and wonder. Well might the inspired apostle stop and exclaim, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

First comes Genesis, the book of the wonderful creation, of the fall of man, our federal head, and of God's electing love and covenant promise. Then comes Exodus, with God's glorious redemption from Egyptian bondage. Then comes Leviticus, with the ordering of the sacrificial offerings, all pointing to that one great sacrifice, Christ, our passover. Then comes Numbers, the wilderness book, with the ordering of the priesthood, and of the services pertaining to the sanctuary. How particular he was about everything that pertained thereto. They were to bear the ark of his testament, the covenant of his grace and glory, through the wilderness. And, dear brother, are not we, his professed followers, called to the same high and holy calling? Is not Christ, our passover, sacrificed for us? Has he not made us kings and priests unto God, so that the weakest, the very least of his saints, can enter within the holiest of all, and offer unto him the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving? And are not we, his professed followers, called to bear his precious name, his testimony and his glory, through this wilderness world? And as God went with Israel of old through all their wilderness journey, a pillar of cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night, so he is with his spiritual people in this day of darkness and unbelief. He has given us his blessed word of truth to be as a lamp to our feet and a light to our path, and his holy Spirit to search out those precious truths and apply them to our hearts as he seeth we have need.

While reading the wonderful record of their travels, of their oft repeated murmurings and rebellions, ere I was aware I would think, How could they have been so ready to depart from the living God? And as I thought of my own rebellious life, my many heart-wanderings, when darkness, doubt and unbelief have taken hold upon me in times that are past, and also of God's great goodness that has followed me thus far in my wilderness journey, O how it humbled me at his dear feet, and at the same time enabled me to extol him for his great love and mercy to one of the least; and as he is to one, so he is to all his tried and tempted children. He chastens us in love and mercy when we go astray, and brings us back to him with deep acknowledgment of our sin and guilt. And he is ever ready to pity and forgive. Then he puts a song into our heart, and enables us to sing of his goodness and mercy, and crown him Lord of all.

My brother and sister, may we as his dear children keep very near him, casting all our care upon him, with the realizing sense that he careth for us. May the Lord keep us walking softly, and tenderly watchful and prayerful, until we have laid aside these bodies, and entered upon that bright and blessed world above, where sin, death and defilement are unknown.

Dear brother, I hardly know why I have written all this to you, who know all about these things, and no doubt can enter into them with a deeper knowledge than such a poor, weak mortal as I can; you who have so often comforted me by bringing these things to my remembrance. But my heart is so full of these blessed things at present that it would have been hard work to write on any other subject. I feel that I have but given an outline of what is in my heart. I feel as though I must talk to some one, so I have singled you out, feeling that you will cast the mantle of charity over all defects. My health is much better than it was. May God be with you and yours. In much love I am your little sister,

SARAH VAN VELSAN.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—In connection with the remarks made concerning spiritual gifts, in the Circular Letter of the Delaware River Association, I will offer some suggestions. It appears to me that the Scriptures teach that every gift should have the fellowship of an orderly gospel church before it can be properly recognized. The Savior says, "Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house."—Matthew v. 15. The Son of man appeared to John in the midst of seven golden candlesticks.—Rev. i. 12, 13. The reference to removing the candlestick of the church at Ephesus out of its place, taken in connection with the other two references to it, leads to the conclusion that a candlestick is used as a figure to represent the gospel character and authority of a church of God. A candlestick upholds a candle, so that it will give light to those in the house. So every gift to the church must be upheld by the fellowship of a gospel church. Unless thus sustained it cannot be recognized as a gift of God.

A body of people may claim to be a church and yet have no candlestick, no divine recognition as a church, no gospel character and authority. Those whom they present as prophets, pastors or teachers cannot be received by the church of God as such, nor their work recognized as gospel work. A body of people may have once been a gospel church, but on account of disorder persisted in may have ceased to be such, their candlestick removed. From the time when their candlestick was removed, if that can be ascertained, neither the gifts they profess to have, nor their work (light), can be recognized by the church of God as gospel gifts or gospel work.

It does not appear that any man, not even an apostle, can decide upon his own character as a gift to the church. There must be some authoritative recognition of his gift, and of its order. In the case of all except the apostolic gift it appears from the Scriptures that this recognition must be given by a gospel church. The church thus recognized Barnabas and Saul as having been called by the Spirit to a special work, and in giving this recognition they fasted and prayed and laid their hands upon them.—Acts xiii. 2, 3. The gift that was in Timothy was given by prophecy, with the laying of the hands of the presbytery.—1 Tim. iv. 14. The laying on of hands was a formal expression of fellowship for the gift discerned in Timothy. In like manner men were chosen and appointed to serve the church in temporal matters.—Acts vi. 1-6.

Excellent brethren have sometimes thought that they should be recognized as gifts to the church when the church could not see the gifts in them. Some have continued to think for a considerable time that the church had made a mistake in not accepting their view of the matter; but as a general thing in such cases brethren have been willing to submit to the judgment of the church, being sure, as an aged brother once said, that the Lord never gave a gift to the church without giving the church eyes to see it. Those concerning whose gift the church has no question often hold back long, unwilling to accept either the judgment of the church or their own impressions as correct. Sometimes the weight upon them becomes too heavy for them to bear, and they are forced to obey the call of the church, which has seen the evidence that they have been called by the Spirit; and sometimes a solemn sense of filial duty to the church, as having authority to command the service of her children, and as qualified to judge as to the order of their gift, causes them to yield obedience. In all cases it is the church that recognizes the gift, and thus gives it the firm and authoritative support of a candlestick.

Conference meetings seem to me appropriate places for any one of the brethren to speak; but at the meetings appointed for the public administration of the word I have never felt authorized to call upon any one to speak, unless some special circumstances required it, who has not been recognized as a gift by some gospel church. The fellowship of the gift must be expressed by the church instead of the individual member. The authority to recognize and command the service of every gift is in the body, through which the will of our glorious Head is manifested. The Savior is always seen in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks, and upon those candlesticks will be seen every light which he appoints for the direction and comfort of those whom he calls into the house of God.

Your brother in the gospel,
SILAS H. DURAND.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—When I last wrote to the SIGNS I was in Gilmer, Upshur County, Texas, and when I closed I promised to write again from Texas; but as I did not then feel the impression I failed to write. Now, as I have a remittance to send, and as I wrote but little of my visit to Texas, with your permission I will finish.

After filling the appointment at night in Gilmer, having a large congregation, and liberty in speaking of the things of the kingdom of God, I spent the night at brother and sister Moncrief's, two elderly saints of God who reside in the place. Brother Wilson, of Paran Church, seventeen miles distant, met me with a good team, and at ten o'clock the next day we were on the grounds around Paran Church. There I met Elder R. T. Webb and Elder Odom, and a goodly number of brethren. In this community it was the day of the closing of the exercises of the school, and the congregation was small. Elder Webb had come about eighteen miles to meet me, and there he took charge of me, and carried me from place to place while I remained in Texas, until all the appointments ceased. Elder Webb is a true and tried soldier of the cross, and seems to be as full of vim and life in preaching as he was years ago; a man of wonderful constitution, and, I believe, a servant of the most high God. We visited Good Hope, in Camp Co., and Providence Church, in Franklin Co. At Providence I met Elder W. B. Stringer, who is an old soldier and firm, like Elder Webb, and valiant for the truth. At Providence they had trouble. Some rose up and wanted to pass nonfellowship resolutions on predestination. When all the church came together it seemed that there were only seventeen for the resolution, and seventy-four against it. A month's time was given them to decide whether they would go with the church or not; and as they would not go with the church, the church cut them off. So the very gallows they built to hang their brethren on seems to have fallen to them. While at that church I tried to preach on the subject; and it was the only place on the whole trip in Texas that I preached entirely on predestination. Some of the opponents of the doctrine were present, and said what I preached was sustained by the Scriptures, only that I did not go far enough. They wanted me to say and prove that God inspired wicked men to kill others, and to curse and swear; but as I did not believe it I could not preach it. But I proved predestination down to a hair's breadth, and thought that was close enough; but it seemed that some wanted to split that hair, and in the hollow find an object. If indeed the hairs of our heads are all numbered, so must our days and times be. The psalmist said, "My times are in thy hand." I hope the church may be more and more united, and that divisions and strifes will cease. There I tried to show the Scripture teaching that new-born babes desire the sincere milk of the word; but, alas! some are inclined to skim off the cream of predestination, which takes the best of the milk, and hence they fail to get the sincere (pure) milk of the word. I there had liberty to show the milk passages in Isaiah. "Whom shall he teach knowledge? and whom shall he make to understand doctrine? Them that are weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts."—Isa. xxviii. 9. "I have fed you with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it, neither yet now are ye able."—1 Cor. iii. 2. "For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat. For every one that useth milk is unskillful in the word of righteousness: for he is a babe. But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil."—Heb. v. 12-14. When we preach the truth of God we need not fear the result; for God will sustain us, though all forsake us. I do not suppose that I preached a sermon while in Texas without it, but not a set sermon on the subject. But God knows how to give his word what is needed in certain localities; and if we follow his mind, as he leads us, we will be sure to go right.

I continued with Elder Webb several days, and enjoyed his company, and he and I were agreed in doctrine. I will here take the liberty to say that Elder Webb does not believe the "hollow log doctrine," as it is called; that is, that as a rabbit or hare goes into a hollow log, and stays there awhile, and comes out, the log is no part of the hare, nor the hare of the log. What is called the no-change theory. I will also say that Elder Webb believes that that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. I do not believe that that which is born of the Spirit is flesh; nor do I believe that the flesh is spiritualized in the new birth; nor do I believe that the Scriptures teach such doctrine. Some call that the no-change theory, and call it two-seed and Arian, and I know not what else; but upon the testimony of God's word we can safely stand, and fear no assaults from without nor from within. It seems a little strange that people will get up divisions on such things as that, and other things written for our learning. Elder Webb preached nothing while I was with him but what I could heartily indorse.

The last appointment I filled was at Hopewell, Wood Co., six miles southwest of Winnsborough, at the regular meeting; and it was a meeting which will be long remembered by me, for there I met Elders J. E. Carter and Rufus Radney. During the conference a brother Wilson came forward (about grown) and told the dealings of the Lord with him, and on Sunday morning he was baptized by Elder J. E. Carter. On Sunday the meeting closed at eleven o'clock. The time it began was ten o'clock, in order that I should have time to get to Winnsborough by two o'clock. One hour was all I needed; and as no one else felt to speak the meeting closed. I then took my leave of the brethren. I wish to say to the brethren, I thank you for all the kindness shown me, and may the Lord bless you all. I will here say to all the brethren that I was well cared for, and returned safely home, and found all well and doing well, for which I trust I am able to thank the Lord, who doeth all things well.

Yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

WOODSTOCK, Mich., April 11, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—In great weakness both of body and mind I attempt to write, feeling that I am in the presence of the great searcher of hearts, who is not mistaken in the great matter of salvation. I am a mystery to myself. Often from out the burning fiery furnace, or out of great sorrow, a cry for deliverance goes up from the depths of my poor heart, that the lovely Lamb of God would look upon me; for he only can in love and pity deliver from the paw of the lion, and encircle me in the everlasting arms.

Dear readers of the dear old SIGNS, that precious and soul-cheering publication, how many times while reading some poor mortal's experience, so much like my own sad life, have I felt a little more evidence of that hope which is so precious, and which I hope the God of mercy gave me while sinking down in hopeless condemnation; for indeed and in truth to me my case seemed hopeless. Condemnation seemed written on everything my eyes rested upon; but I hope and trust that cloud did burst, and the Sun of righteousness did shine in this dark dungeon. Then did I receive an earnest of that inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away; reserved in heaven for all those who are kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time. Then I thought the evidence enough, and sweetly these words came, "Doubting Thomas, doubt no more." I was filled with joy and praise, and it did seem that the glorious evidence of that precious hope would reach from earth to the heavenly clime, where the King reigns supreme.

But of late my trials are heavy, and deep answereth to deep. I have thought of Job in his sore trials, who cursed the day of his birth; also of his miserable comforters and his wife, all against him. Yet Satan could not touch his life. He surely was afflicted, and his patience is referred to by the apostle. Also the sweet psalms of David have been very sweet a part of the time of late, especially the one hundred and fortieth to the one hundred and forty-third, which tell my mind. The psalms all seem so good in sore troubles. I hope ever to put my trust in the God of the whole earth, besides whom there is no Savior; and I hope ever to contend for the faith as held by the dear Old Baptists. I have been identified with them for nearly thirty-four years, and I desire never to lose their fellowship, love and esteem, and to remember the hole of the pit from whence I was taken.

Yours very unworthily,
M. P. LEWIS.

MOLALLA CORNERS, Ore., June 28, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I am every month or two receiving letters of inquiry from strange brethren concerning the country of Oregon, and they ask so many questions that it would require at least two sheets of paper to contain the answers. In former years I have answered hundreds of such letters; but now I desire to inform my strange brethren and friends through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES that I will henceforth answer no more, as I am now by reason of age and infirmity disabled from doing so. My age is now eighty-five years and eight months, and I do not want any longer to be troubled with the affairs of this world. Were I able I would greatly prefer giving a description of that country (kingdom) which is not of this world, where I trust my heart is, and I hope my treasure is there also. I have been very sick the latter part of the winter and the commencement of spring, so that I despaired of life; but my time to die had not yet come. I am still very feeble. I returned home yesterday from the Siloam Association. We had a very good meeting, the preaching was harmonious, not a jarring note was heard, and love appeared to prevail in a superlative degree.

JOHN STIPP.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

My dear brother, Charles B. Livesay, died at his home in Fairfield, March 24th, 1892, aged 58 years, 8 months and 26 days.

His was truly a sad case, the cause of his death being a cancer; but the location of it made it seem more terrible, as it made its appearance in the roof of his mouth. It makes our hearts ache and our tears fall when we think of his many sleepless nights of suffering; and I cannot keep back the blinding tears as I write of this dear brother, and the many precious visits we have had together from time to time. While we are sad that he had to endure this great affliction, we are glad and rejoice that he left for our comfort a good evidence that our loss is his gain. He was a faithful member of the Old School Baptist Church of Fairfield, and had been for many years, and was ever ready to talk of the kingdom, the power and the glory of the God he worshiped; and how I have seen his countenance light up as he conversed on this sublime and glorious subject.

To speak of him naturally, his was a grand and noble nature, kind and compassionate, and could not see any in trouble without trying to help them, and was ever ready to extend the hand of mercy to the most erring. When we have all these things to comfort us, death is not the saddest thing in this world.

His funeral was largely attended, and the sermon was preached by Elder T. J. Wyman, the pastor of the church where he belonged. He leaves a wife and one son, an only child, Frank A., to mourn their irreparable loss.

Of his wife I would say that she stood by him with patient and untiring devotion, and left not a wish ungratified. I am sure she can have no regret as to the care she gave him. About six weeks before his death I believe the Lord in his providence sent her brother, Mr. Roscoe Baker, to her relief; and he proved himself to be her friend in need and a brother indeed. May the Lord reward him for it, and comfort the afflicted ones, is the prayer of

HIS SISTER.

ADRIAN, July 12, 1892.

Georgie Lane departed from this world to a better world on May 25th, 1892, aged 18 years and some months.

Her disease was consumption. She was the daughter of my father's niece, Margaret Acre. Georgie was married to Mr. Thomas Lane on Sept. 24th, 1890. She was not a member of any church, but was a good, obedient girl. I dearly loved her, and every one who knew her loved her. I visited her twice while she was sick. The last time I saw her, while she could talk, she told me that she was willing to die, and wanted to leave this world of trouble for a world on high. She said, "I only dread to leave my sweet babe behind, as I do not know what will become of it."

She left her husband and babe, father and mother, five sisters and three brothers, besides other relatives and friends, to mourn; but our loss is her great gain. She died happy.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

CORRESPONDENCE.

KELLY'S CORNERS, N. Y.

BELOVED SISTER IN CHRIST:—I felt glad in my heart to receive a few lines from you, bearing tidings of your welfare in divine things. The apostle Paul once wrote, "Now we live, if ye stand fast in the Lord."—1 Thess. iii. 8. In some measure my soul is exercised in like manner. My joy is to hear of the saints that they are found walking in the truth, and in the love of God, as dear children. If we are of those who are born again, born of God, shall we not be found loving the people of God, loving the truth as it is in Jesus, and loving our gracious God? for "God is love." If the love of God be absent in our lives, then all our pretensions are vain. "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal," &c. I need not quote the whole of 1 Cor. xiii.; but the whole is very precious, so particularly describing the nature of this heavenly gift, charity. The love of God is shed abroad in our heart by the power of the Holy Ghost. If, dear sister, we are truly walking in love, it will be something more than in mere words. In deeds and acts of mercy, as enjoined by the law of Christ, we shall manifest that we are the disciples of our dear Savior. How precious is the sight when the dear children of God are living together in the fellowship of the gospel. The gathering together of the subjects of God's grace into New Testament churches is for the comforting, strengthening and building up of one another in spiritual things. If this is lost sight of, then coldness, shyness, unfriendliness and all manner of evils creep in, and even wars and fightings are then found among the saints; and if they bite and devour one another the Lord saith, "Take heed that ye be not consumed one of another." Every word of the Lord is pure. The counsels, admonitions and reproofs are among the precious and profitable things recorded in the Scriptures. While it has been my lot to be often comforted by the word of the Lord, it has been my heritage also for the Holy Spirit to administer to my soul sore reproofs, to correct me in the frowardness of my ways. "Therefore have I hewed them by the prophets; I have slain them by the words of my mouth: and thy judgments are as the light that goeth forth."—Hosea vi. 5. The times when we are hewed and slain are times when it is manifest that God dealeth with us as with sons. "For what son is there whom the Father chasteneth not?" "When we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world."—1 Cor. xi. 32. All our trials, whether inward or outward, are designed by our God to work for our good. We are taught in them the insufficiency of all things, and our own inability to procure our own happiness, or to minister to the hungerings and thirstings that God by his grace hath wrought in our souls. O! it is good to depend upon the Lord alone, from whom cometh our expectation.

"Though cisterns be broken, and creatures all fail,
The word he hath spoken shall surely prevail."

When I last wrote to you, dear sister, we were together viewing the scene in the valley of Shaveh, the King's dale, as recorded in Genesis xiv. 17-20. Our eyes were fixed upon the King, Melchisedec, King of righteousness, King of peace, and the Priest of the most high God. We contemplated in some degree his character as King. As we enter again into this valley of Shaveh, and look again upon the scene, we behold in Melchisedec the Priest of the most high God. The incarnate Son of God is a Priest after the order of Melchisedec. As poor sinners, such an High Priest as Jesus became us. By our transgressions we were far off from God; but Christ Jesus made reconciliation with his own sacred blood for the sins of his people. What innumerable obstacles impede and forbid our access unto the holy God! "Our God is a consuming fire." "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?"—Isaiah xxxiii. 14. Ah, how shall vile sinners dwell with God? We need an high priest "in things pertaining to God." O what wondrous love is the love of our God!

"High beyond imagination is the love of God to man;
Far too deep for human reason, fathom that it never can.
Love eternal richly dwells in Christ the Lamb."

The everlasting love of God is richly displayed in the office and work of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, our Priest of the most high God. Forasmuch as the children of God, the election of grace, are partakers of flesh and blood, the Son of God, the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person, likewise himself took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, and deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage. Jesus, our great Melchisedec, gave himself for our sins, a sacrifice well-pleasing and of a sweet-smelling savor unto God. Our hope of redemption as poor, guilty sinners is all bound up in the priesthood of Jesus, the Son of God. With his own blood he made atonement for our sins. On his heart he bears all the names of the loved and chosen of God. All his work was heart work; and by one offering of himself unto God he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified. He gave his own life for us, and his own precious blood was poured forth for our souls; and with his own blood he has gone into the heavens, and is set down (his work is complete) on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, having obtained eternal redemption for us. How gloriously the grace of Jehovah shines forth as revealed in the new covenant! In this covenant God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, sware and would not repent, saying, "Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." Have we been so taught of the Spirit to realize our miserable and perishing condition that we have been constrained to flee unto Jesus, the high priest of our profession, for refuge? All this is the fruit and effect of the eternal purpose which God the Father purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord. Now, dear sister, as we look upon what our High Priest hath achieved in our behalf, how he hath cleansed us, reconciled us unto God, perfected us, and presented us all fair, without blame or reproof, without spot, or blemish, or wrinkle, or any such thing, before our heavenly Father's face, can all this wrought out by our High Priest be disannulled or repudiated by God the Father? O no; Jehovah's counsel is immutable. He changes not. In the everlasting covenant he sware, and will not repent, "Thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec." Look at the language of inspiration in regard to this matter. What a revelation of the character of our God! Blessed be his holy name. Thus it is written, "God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath: that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us: which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil; whither the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made a high priest forever after the order of Melchisedec."—Heb. vi. 17-20. In the finished work of our dear Savior is our soul's rest. Here we have a safe retreat, a refuge from every stormy wind that blows. Ah,

"Where must a weary sinner go,
But to the sinner's friend?
He only can relieve my woe,
And bid my sorrows end."

Our high priest lives within the veil, making intercession for those whose sins he bore. He is a compassionate Savior, touched with the feelings of our infirmities; for he himself, in our flesh, suffered being tempted. He is able therefore to succor them that are tempted.

"My conquest is sure through his blood,
Though now there's a warfare within;
And Satan comes in like a flood,
To draw my poor heart after sin.

"Fresh succor from Christ I receive,
Who did all my conflicts foresee;
And through his rich grace I believe
He saved a sinner like me."

Jesus offered up himself unto God as our atoning sacrifice, and even now, "in things pertaining to God," he is our gracious Mediator. He ever liveth to make intercession for us. By him our supplications and praises come with acceptance before the Lord. Our Melchisedec is the "minister of the sanctuary and of the true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, and not man."—Heb. viii. 1, 2. O how many things we might contemplate in this altogether lovely one! Look yet upon this scene in the King's dale. Melchisedec brings forth bread and wine, and blesses Abraham, saying, "Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth; and blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand." The Israel of God are known by their eating and drinking. "They did all eat the same spiritual meat, and did all drink the same spiritual drink; for they drank of that spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ."—1 Cor. x. 3, 4. So this act of Melchisedec in bringing forth bread and wine sets forth the spiritual meat and drink that the church, the body of Christ, is nourished and cherished with by our gracious Redeemer. He saith, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him. As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father; so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me. This is that bread which came down from heaven: not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead; he that eateth this bread shall live forever."—John vi. 53-58. Israel lives by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. His doctrine, his promises, his righteousness and atoning blood, are the bread and wine upon which our souls feed. How gracious is our Melchisedec! He comes with bread and wine to nourish our souls. He brings us at times into his banqueting house, feasts us poor sinners at his own table, spread with all the fruits of his kingdom. His mercy and love, his matchless, reigning grace, his pardoning love, his justifying righteousness, his precious promises, yea, all the sure mercies of the everlasting covenant, are spread forth in the feast of fat things full of marrow, and wine on the lees well refined.—Isa. xxv. 6. O the unsearchable riches of Christ! how suited to a poor sinner like me! Our dear Savior, on the night in which he was betrayed, "Took bread; and when he had given thanks he brake it, and said, Take, eat, this is my body, which is broken for you: this do in remembrance of me. After the same manner also he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood; this do ye, as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me. For as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he come."—1 Cor. xi. 23-26. Bread and wine, precious memorials of the body and blood of the dear Lamb of God. Saith the apostle Paul, "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? For we, being many, are one bread, and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread."—1 Cor. x. 16, 17.

"We eat the bread and drink the wine, But O! our souls want more than sign; We faint unless we feed on thee, And drink the blood as shed for me."

When faint and weary, oppressed with cares, sorrowful, weighed down, as we sometimes are, under a sense of our sinfulness, we should utterly sink, but Jesus our Savior feeds us with the bread and wine of his own everlasting gospel. He shows us that all shall end well; that the oath and promises of God, his precious blood, his immutability and eternal love, is our security and everlasting consolation. We shall be more than conquerors through him that loved us. Thus strengthened and refreshed, we lift up our heads. By the kind assurances of our God we pursue our journey, and can sing,

"Yes, I to the end shall endure,
As sure as the earnest is given;
More happy, but not more secure,
The glorified spirits in heaven."

Melchisedec blessed Abraham, and said, "Blessed be Abram of the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand." What a marvelous thing it is that the most high God should bless sinners! But so it is. The glorious gospel of the grace of God declares this glorious mystery of Jehovah's grace. Paul by inspiration of God tells us of the church being blessed in Christ Jesus with all spiritual blessings, according as God the Father hath chosen us in Christ before the foundation of the world. Then the blessings of God in Christ Jesus are like God himself, from everlasting. Then, my sister, consider this, that the blessing is irreversible, unchangeable.—Num. xxiii. 8, 19-21. Are we tempted in times of trial, when darkness and conflicts are our lot, to fear that the Lord hath forsaken us, that he will be favorable no more? that though he hath blessed us in the past, he hath now cast us off, and will bless us no more? Then let us consider the priesthood of our Melchisedec, that he hath an unchangeable priesthood.—Heb. vii. 24. We are blessed in him. Our standing, our salvation and comfort are all in our precious Christ. He hath delivered us by his precious blood and righteousness from all our enemies. He grants us the victory, and we are glad, and triumph in the work of his hands.—Psalm xcii. 4. O what unsearchable riches we are blessed with in our Beloved! Blessed with eternal life, salvation, righteousness and everlasting glory. Blessed with a contrite heart, blessed with love to God and to his people, blessed with the sweet, consoling knowledge of the forgiveness of our sins, and blessed with his supporting grace in all our times of trial.

"His presence disperses our gloom,
And makes all within us rejoice."

Blessed in Christ Jesus with "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away; reserved in heaven for you [dear sister, and I hope for me], who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." Jesus, our Melchisedec, reigns in Zion. Here Jehovah commands the blessing, even life forevermore. This will encourage us, though the way be rough and trying. Like the apostle Paul, we can say, "I can do all things through Christ, that strengtheneth me." Though enemies without and within assail, we can well say, "Let them curse; but bless thou."—Psalm cix. 28. Abraham gave to Melchisedec tithes of all. O what a revenue of thanksgiving is due from us to our God for all his unspeakable mercies! In rendering to the Lord the glory due unto his name we very readily exclaim, with David, "All things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee."—1 Chron. xxix. 14.

But I will not further prolong my communication just now. May the Lord bless you, dear sister, and all the beloved kindred in Christ Jesus among whom you dwell.

I am, I hope, your brother in hope of life everlasting.

NEW HOLLAND, Ohio, May 30, 1892.

MISS BESSIE DURAND—DEARLY BELOVED SISTER:—This is, as you know, the national "Decoration Day." What a day of bustle and excitement it has been out on the noisy streets of this exceedingly patriotic village. In the large, beautiful burial grounds, which stand on a slight eminence overlooking the village and surrounding country, marked by pretty slabs or beautiful monuments, lie the remains of many a soldier. Our town since early dawn has been one living sea of human beings. Upon my little couch in the one corner where I manage to live my life of loneliness and pain from day to day, from year to year, I can see the great crowd as they surge by with their wreathes and garlands of bright, beautiful flowers, the grand army in full parade dress, with musket and sword, bringing up the rear, amid the low, soft funeral march played by the band. Alone in my sick room, alone with the multitude of my own thoughts, a great wave of love and pity for the dear, lowly Nazarene, the meek and lowly Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world, swept over my soul; and it was not until I had thought long and deeply of his sufferings, his death, all coming within the range of his sovereign, omnipotent predestination of all things, suffered, finished and made complete before he cried, "It is finished," that I could quiet myself and truly feel that "In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul." I would not find fault with the people, the great mass, for conforming to the rules of their country, for commemorating the beloved dead whose lives were laid down as a sacrifice upon the altar of their country, nor for giving due honor to their earthly ruler. But to the meek followers of him who was "meek and lowly in heart" "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," who seek a better country, a far more enduring substance, "a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God," will not all this noise and bustle and worldly display seem out of place? Could we expect to hear the "still small voice," so much more infinitely sweet and consoling to the weary soul than the finest earthly music, amid the noise and clamor of this worldly outcry? O no! We would rather, methinks, feel and say, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate." It was not to the great multitude that he promised to manifest himself; but "where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." When our dear Jesus was upon the earth it was not the masses who loved and worshiped him; only a few unlearned fishermen and their families. It was not the woman of fashion, who dressed in silks and satins, and dressed her person with gold and costly apparel, but the poor outcast Mary Magdalene, out of whom had been cast seven devils, who so loved the dear Savior, who washed his feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head. I could but wonder to-day, as I saw handsomely and fashionably dressed men and women pass my window, how many there were in whose souls Jesus was enshrined, who desired to follow him whithersoever he went, and who determined to know nothing save Jesus Christ and him crucified. How clearly it then appeared to me that it was all true where the Lord says, "I will leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people." "A remnant shall be saved." Also, his people are "a peculiar people." And then my thoughts went out to the only set of people who do not conform to worldly things; who "let the dead bury the dead;" who alone stand aloof from worldly worship; who are separate, alone, and despised of all nations; who are truly a peculiar people. How dear this same peculiar and poor people are to me. How my heart yearns for their companionship. How I crave their fellowship and love. We are assured though that among worldly people there are many who, when our Lord comes to make up his jewels, will be found among the pearls, who have not seemed to hear the voice, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate." But the question comes home to me, "Who maketh thee to differ?" who am by nature no better than the worldling. Why do I so love God and his people? Why do I feel almost jealous for my dear Savior, when I see men and women put forth their most ardent efforts to a worldly purpose, to worship man, and bow to the world and a worldly mandate, when he says, "My glory will I not give to another?" Also, "Cease from man, whose breath is in his nostrils; for wherein is he to be accounted of?" Solemn seems the question to me, and all unfit do I feel myself to be numbered among the Lord's people. "Unclean, unclean," I must cry, and truly say,

"There was nothing in me to merit esteem,

Or give the Creator delight;

'Twas even so, Father, I ever must sing,
Because it seemed good in thy sight."

It is now after nightfall, and I am the only occupant of the dear little house. The family, and all the families near about, I think, are attending a church festival held at the town hall. It is oppressively warm, the windows and blinds of my room are wide open, and outside I see nothing but inky darkness of a starless night. But the quiet after the noise and confusion of the day is really enjoyable. I am alone, helpless upon my couch of pain, unable to move about the least; but I am not afraid, for round about me most assuredly are the dear everlasting arms, overshadowed by infinite holy love. My room, so often the scene of only intense weariness and pain, seems this moment almost a hallowed spot; and the ticking of the clock, and the voices of the many insects, which are the only sounds I hear, seem full of music from the other shore. O how often dear sister, do I seem to come to the brink of the stream, at the crossing of the unseen shore; and O how my tried, weary soul longs to cross over, to come back no more forever. Yet, dear sister, it is sweet even to wait and suffer for his dear sake, when his blessed presence is felt in the soul; when we feel ourselves overshadowed by his love and encircled with his everlasting arms. But not always does his blessed Spirit abide with me; not always is the blessed Comforter come; not always can I catch even a faint glimpse through a glass darkly of the glories just beyond. Darkness, such as may almost be felt, at times envelops my soul. Black as the tents of Kedar seems my soul, and I cannot even cry unto the Savior of my soul, until the cloud be again lifted, and the sunlight of his love again cheers and strengthens me. Such a deep sense of sinfulness, such a feeling of guilt, has weighed me down much of the time of late. I feel so condemned because I so often neglect his word, and feel indifferent and cold in prayer, and to in no way be able to honor and glorify God. I have suffered so in body, have had such frequent chills, followed by stupor and delirium; and this renders it impossible for me to write to our loved ones. If I sleep any at night, on awaking my clothing and everything about me is saturated with the dropsical water which drips from my feet and limbs. I think this is the cause of my almost daily morning chill. I have not yet felt able to send to the SIGNS the letter of our poor afflicted sister of Georgia. I do so want to write some word of comfort to the weary and tried one, and say some word to the honor and glory of the dear Redeemer's name. But I have felt empty, barren, and unfit even to attempt to comfort one of his little ones, or to write or speak his holy name. O how it does make my heart ache to read of that poor sister's afflictions and trials. How much she and I, and other lonely sufferers, shut in from the beauties of this beautiful world, and shut out from the companionship of the saints, need the love and tender commiseration of those more favored and strong; those who can go about inhaling the fresh, fragrant and balmy air, enjoying constantly the beauties nature scatters everywhere. When I was moved from my winter quarters into this pleasant summer room I sat in the great arm chair a little time between the two windows, one looking out over a long stretch of beautiful country, sloping to a back ground of woodlands, the other overlooking the beautiful cemetery where dear father lies, with its flowers, pretty trees and shrubs. Love filled my eyes, and emotions I cannot express shook my weakened frame. I did not seem ever to have known that this world is so fair and beautiful. If heaven, when it bursts upon the freed soul, seems any fairer, the soul must become enraptured indeed. Then I thought it must far surpass the beauty on which I gazed; for the word says, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." O! is it not worth suffering with our dear Savior here, if we may reign with him amid the glory of such a glorious place?

But what a lot of paper I have scribbled over. Can you pardon me just this once? It is so rare a thing for me to have strength and will to write even a little; and O! it is such a comfort to be able once in a while to allow one's thoughts a free outlet. I am very weary indeed, though I am writing on Tuesday morning now. After a day like yesterday I am thoroughly prostrated.

With dear abiding love to and for all, I am yours unworthily,

MARY PARKER.

OZARK, Ala., July 5, 1892.

DEAR BROTHERS BEEBE:—While on my late tour in the northeast I was solicited by quite a number to write oftener for the dear old SIGNS, which is the oldest Old Baptist paper in America [or the world,] and has stood firm, and earnestly contended for the faith of God's elect in the midst of many sore conflicts and severe persecutions by the antichristian world. To-day the SIGNS contends, as it did anciently, against all the newly-fangled schemes of antichrist for the purpose of soul-saving and evangelizing the world, believing such to be of the devil and of fleshly origin, and wholly unscriptural. Hence these are plants which our heavenly Father hath not planted, and shall be rooted up. Those plants cannot remain in the garden of grace. The Lord at the appointed time reared that dear man of God, who was one of the most wonderful men of America, to wield the sword of the Lord and of Gideon in putting to flight the Midianites (Missionaries or New School Baptists) from the church of Christ. He stood at his post until he fell asleep in the arms of Jesus; and the mantle fell on his son (as Elijah's mantle fell on Elisha), who is a firm, uncompromising soldier of the cross, but is kind, tender and forbearing. He possesses a quiet, meek and humble spirit, and is kind and fatherly to the feeble lambs.

I wrote my first communication for this paper more than eleven years ago, and was ashamed when I saw my name in print, for I felt to be so vile and sinful that my unworthy name was a disgrace to the precious cause of Christ. I have been writing occasionally ever since, but have never been satisfied with anything I have written. I get so burdened that I cannot get an ease of mind until I write; but many times I have deeply regretted that I ever wrote a sentence for publication, fearing that I was deceived, and am not a child of God, and was no comfort to any one. But poor, ignorant and unlearned as I am, if my poor, imperfect scribbling has ever been any comfort to any one God be praised, and I do feel to thank and adore his blessed name for it. Yes, the Lord needs the praise, not us. We cannot have a spiritual thought nor inclination without the blessed Lord. We cannot have faith, love, peace, joy, meekness, nor any of the christian graces, without him; for they are all the fruit of the Spirit, and without his Spirit there is no love to God nor to his people. Without him we can do nothing. My poor heart is so contaminated with sin that my daily experience teaches me that I am totally depraved, and need the protecting hand of an all-wise God every moment of my life to keep and shield me from the many dangers, both visible and invisible, through which I am daily passing. How often I am searching my own heart to find something to recommend me into favor with God. What do I find? A heart that is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked, a cage of unclean birds, a sink of sin and an unbelieving heart, that denies the authenticity of the Scriptures, denies the very existence of a God, and tells me that I am no child of God. This is what I find in the flesh. Then I can say, with Paul, "I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing." Surely then we can say, "We are the circumcision, which worship God in the Spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." Yes, God's people are circumcised in heart, being cut off from the confidence of the flesh. My proud and boastful flesh wants to be exalted, wants to be regarded as something when I am nothing. The safest place I have ever found is at the feet of Jesus, feeling poor and humble. I cannot go there of myself. Free-will would never take me there. In order to feel humble and poor I have to go through the furnace of affliction, and have my fleshly confidence and pride consumed. I would not will to be thus sorely tried even if I could. The Hebrew children would not have willed to go into the fiery furnace in order to realize that Christ was with them to deliver them. I often pray for humility, but I do not pray for the sore trials that I have to pass through to make me feel humble. Jonah never prayed to be cast into the whale's belly to learn that salvation is of the Lord. God humbles us in his own time and way; we cannot hasten it. Man may devise his way, but the Lord directs his steps. The steps of God's children are ordered of him; and though they fall, yet shall they not utterly be cast down, for the Lord upholdeth them. Yes, the sore trials and conflicts are in the ordering of the Lord, and are in the pathway of the christian, and all those disappointments must be met before we reach our eternal home. The covenant which God made with Noah, that as long as time lasts day and night, winter and summer, seed-time and harvest, will not cease, is realized in every christian's experience. Night prepares us to appreciate the day, and winter to appreciate the summer. Our times are in his hand, our days are numbered, and it is impossible for one to die before his time, or the time which the Lord has appointed for us to die. Since our days and months and years are appointed of the Lord that we must live, it follows that we must pass through the nights and winters naturally before we go hence. So the christian's journey is marked out by the Lord; and he must go down into the very depths of darkness, gloom and human depravity, to teach him from whence comes his strength. The poor child of God is so proud that he would hate to come to the church, telling of his sinfulness, and tell that he felt to be the chief of sinners; hence many stay out a long time, waiting to feel fit or good enough to come. God's people do not feel fit, do not feel good; they feel that all their righteousness is but a robe of filthy rags. I love to see the poor, imperfect feeling ones come to us, for then they come fearing and trembling for fear they will deceive the people of God. The poor publican did not feel fit to pray, but the Pharisee did. Look at the poor, the maimed, the halt and blind that Jesus healed. Do you suppose they felt fit to be healed? None of God's children feel fit; all their fitness is in Christ.

I was at a church that I serve on Saturday before the fourth Sunday in June. One joined, and was to be baptized the next morning. I went home with the Deacon and spent a few hours. While there I began telling how indifferent I get, and how doubtful. I told him that I sometimes doubted my experience, doubted the Bible, and the existence of a God; and his daughter said that she had been staying out of the church four years because she had such feelings. Next morning she

BIRTH AND ADOPTION.

WILL brethren Beebe give me the Bible testimony in regard to one question? My unworthy name has been on record among the Old School Predestinarian Baptists about twenty-five years; and I have been, in my weak and bungling way, trying to preach Christ the way, the truth and the life, in which alone a poor, ungodly sinner can be saved, for about twenty-two years. I have come to the time in my life to realize that I do not know anything. Now I ask simply for information, Do the Scriptures teach that birth and adoption pertain to the same individual, or person? It seems so to me but I want to be right in this matter. Yours in truth,

R. FLOURNOY.

OLATHE, Kansas, May, 1892.

In submitting such understanding of this subject as we have for the consideration of our esteemed brother and fellow-laborer, it is with the express declaration that it is not designed to controvert any position which may have been taken by others in expounding the same subject. It might be sufficient to say that we agree with our inquirer in regarding the doctrine of the gospel as applying both the illustration of birth and of adoption to the subject of the salvation which is revealed in Christ Jesus. But while this is true, it is not to be inferred from this fact that there is no sense in which there is a difference between the two relationships. Birth develops a derivative and vital unity of existence and life with the parentage of which the child is born. Adoption manifests a legal and indissoluble relationship, in which the will of the adopting parent is sovereign, and the child adopted has no control in the matter. The word adoption occurs in the Scriptures five times. In but one of these places can there be any doubt of its limitation to the subjects of salvation. In Romans ix. 4, Paul uses it in reference to his kinsmen according to the flesh, "Who are Israelites, to whom pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed forever. Amen." It is in this case connected with the ceremonial ordinances of that legal dispensation, which are clearly typical in their character. Hence it seems evident that it is only in a figurative sense that the natural children of Abraham were included in the adoption to which Paul refers. In that natural sense the nation of Israel were adopted as the peculiarly favored people whom God chose from among the nations, to whom he gave marked evidences of his special care. In this adoption God displayed the sovereignty of his electing favor; for there was no other reason given for the selection of them from among the nations except that it was according to the counsel of his own will. So it was declared unto them, "The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people; but because the Lord loved you, and because he would keep the oath which he had sworn unto your fathers, hath the Lord brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you out of the house of bondmen, from the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt."—Deut. vii. 7, 8. Great as were the benefits resulting to this favored nation from this special manifestation of the mercy of God toward them in thus adopting them as his peculiar people, it gave them no vital relationship to the God who had thus chosen them. They were still a stiff-necked and rebellious nation, and they gave perpetual expression to the preference which inclined them to depart from the precepts of the Lord, and turn to the worship of idols. Thus their whole history is one continued record of transgressions against the covenant which their God had given them; manifesting the truth that the adoption which they had received had not changed their nature from the love of sin to the love of holiness. Even the holy commandment which was given them from Sinai had no power to give them that love of righteousness which identifies those who are born of God. If such a law had been given, then it could have given life, and righteousness should have been by that law. But such was not the design of the giver of the law. It was added because of transgressions; "Because the law worketh wrath; for where no law is, there is no transgression." "Moreover the law entered that the offense might abound."—Rom. iv. 15; v. 20. Evidently the adoption which pertaineth to the natural Israelites is not that birth by which the sons of God are manifested. Only "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." That divine leading is attested by the hunger and thirst after righteousness which characterizes those who are included in the blessing of our Lord. Certainly nothing less than a vital unity with the Spirit of holiness could give this conclusive evidence of the possession of eternal life. No adoption can bring the subject of it into this living union with the Father.

In the record which is given by the apostle John, it is declared of the true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world, that "He was in the world, and the world was made by him, and the world knew him not. He came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name; which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."—John i. 10-13. Designating these same characters as scattered strangers, "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ," Peter describes them as "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever."—1 Peter i. 23. In this birth it is manifest that they are partakers of the life which is in their Father; and so identified with him that it is his life which is developed in them. Without the assurance of this identity of life in their Redeemer the saints could have no hope for deliverance from their guilt as sinners against the holy requirements of infinite justice. Hence, it is no mere spirit of contention which prompts them to insist upon the truth declared by our Lord to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." There must be developed in the subject of salvation a life which is not under condemnation and which cannot be defiled by sin; in no other way can the guilty be made holy and without blame before God in love. The life which was breathed into the nostrils of man in his formation of the dust of the ground was polluted by sin; consequently in that existence which was given to man in Adam there is no other heritage but everlasting death. In order that the subjects of redeeming grace may have life, and have it more abundantly, they must be born of that incorruptible seed, which manifests their identity with the holiness of God as their Father. To this end it is written, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time."—1 Pet. i. 3-5. By this birth not only is it made manifest that the saints are now the children of God, but also it is settled beyond question that their life is eternal as it is in their divine Father. This is the immortality of God which forbids that they should ever perish. Only by the living unity of every child with his Father can the principle of vital unity be established. This is that eternal life by which the election of grace is so securely preserved in Jesus Christ that every one of them must live because he lives. There can be nothing but a birth which can develop this living unity of the sons of God with him as their eternal Father.

While it is unquestionably true that every subject of the electing love of God is made manifest by being born of God, and the Spirit of God leads every individual of them, causing them to love righteousness and hate iniquity, it is also true that they are made to feel themselves indebted to infinite grace for the unspeakable privilege of calling upon God as their Father. In themselves as the children of the earthly Adam they know there is nothing to commend them to the favor of God even as a palliation of their rebellion against him. The light of life shows them the justice of their condemnation, and they know that they have no claim upon that God whose holy commandments they have transgressed. There is no evidence that the hope of any sinner is genuine if he has no knowledge of being alienated from God by the pollution of sin dwelling in himself. Such a character could not hunger and thirst after righteousness. It is in this experience that the adoption of sons is manifested in the deliverance of the chosen subjects of grace from the power of darkness, and their translation into the kingdom of the dear Son of God. No conscious sinner could presume to claim the relationship of a son of God except as the Spirit of adoption enables him thus to cry Abba, Father. It should be observed that the relationship of an adopted son is not in any degree dependent upon the will of the subject of such adoption. It must be the act of the person whose choice is expressed by it, and the subject of its benefit is entirely passive in the reception of the favor thus bestowed upon him. The sonship which is secured by birth necessarily differs from that which is by adoption in that there is life unity in that which is by birth, so that the very life of the father is in the son. While adoption gives every legal advantage of sonship, it is manifest that it can convey no such vital unity. The only end secured by adoption is the placing of the adopted son in such a position that he may legally receive the advantages which would be already his if he were by birth the son of the father adopting him. The scriptural use of this figure is to show in the text where it is applied to the nation of Israel. The adoption which pertained to them is that sovereign act of divine favor whereby they were chosen from among the nations to be the peculiar people of God. So the Lord says to them by his prophet, "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities."—Amos ii. 2. In thus adopting them nationally the Lord separated them from all other families, and gave them peculiar privileges and rights to which they had no claim by their natural birth. It must be manifest even to the natural mind that in this adoption national Israel had nothing to do with the choice by which it was determined, nor with the securing of the benefits included in it. Clearly it was according to the sovereign purpose of God that he chose Jacob and rejected Esau. In their natural standing there could be no stronger example of perfect equality than that which appears in the case of these twin brothers. Whatever advantage there was between them, was in favor of Esau, who was the first born, and was loved by his father, who did eat of his venison. Yet the purpose of God according to election was declared in the love of God, choosing Jacob, and adopting him to be the recipient of all the grace which was promised in the covenant which God gave to Abraham. Herein is shown the sovereign will of God. This is illustrated by the figure of adoption. Nothing but the will of God can be assigned as the cause of this discrimination between the two sons of Isaac. Hence Paul well enumerates this adoption as among the peculiar advantages belonging to that favored nation. The same idea must be recognized in the application of the figure of election of grace as being chosen from among the children of the earthly Adam. None of the blessings resulting to them from that election can be ascribed to their earthly birth. All that they inherit from their natural father is guilt and condemnation. In order to be manifestly heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ they must be born again. In being born of the Spirit they are partakers of the divine nature; and this truth is attested by the abiding witness of the love of holiness which produces hunger and thirst after righteousness, by which they are identified as being blessed of the Lord. In this relation they are called the sons of God, having the Spirit dwelling in them and walking in them. The figure of adoption does not apply to this vital relationship. It is in illustration of their being called as aliens from the favor of God, and translated into the glorious liberty of his children, that they are the subjects of adoption. Both in their birth and adoption we understand that it is the sinner who is saved from his sins, who is born again, and who also is adopted. In being born again is manifested the vital unity of the children of God with him as their Father; their adoption presents the calling of the chosen vessels of mercy from among the children of wrath, and their exaltation as the justified children of God. These are not another set of children; they are the very members of the body of Christ, to whom Paul says, "Be not ye therefore partakers with them; for ye were sometime darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord; walk as children of light."—Eph. v. 7, 8. If the saints were free from the bondage of corruption there could be no need of such an admonition as this for their guidance. But since even an inspired apostle must cry for deliverance from the

the weak believer if he finds himself still groaning under the consciousness of his own subjection to such vanity. Only the quickened sinner groans under the power of sin dwelling in him; and this knowledge of the bondage under which he cries is most conclusive testimony that he is born of the Spirit. If he were destitute of the life of Christ there could be no desire for freedom from sin arising from that carnal mind which is enmity against God. Without that desire there could be no felt sense of conflict between the flesh and the spirit. So long as there is a longing for deliverance from the power of sin there is conclusive evidence that the life of Christ rules in the heart of the troubled saint. Such longing can be inspired only by the love of holiness, and that love is the fruit of the Spirit. In the very same individual or person, in whom the Spirit of Christ is attested by the hatred of sin and the love of righteousness, there is yet a consciousness of the burden of the body of this death; and this is the perpetual reminder to him that he is still subject to the power of sin, which wars against the law of his mind. It is to the saints in this earthly character that we understand the adoption to apply. So long as they remain in this bondage of mortality they have only to receive the Spirit of adoption, whereby they (not merely that Spirit) cry, Abba, Father; but when they shall be delivered from this earthly house of their tabernacle they shall no longer know anything of this relationship of adoption; for then, awaking with the perfect likeness of their Redeemer, they shall see him as he is. Neither has eye seen nor thought conceived the glorious fruition of that blessedness which shall be revealed in every one who has the present witness of this birth of the Spirit in the longing after righteousness; while painfully conscious of their relation to a sinful and polluted earthly father, they have also the abiding witness of that Spirit of adoption, whereby they continually cry, Abba, Father. Only they who are born of God bear this mark.

We cannot be satisfied to close this brief compliance with the request of our esteemed brother without a word of congratulation to him on the perfection to which he has attained in his experience of only twenty-five years. He will have ground for thankfulness to his divine Teacher, if he is able to retain the important truth which he has learned to realize. There is little danger of any saint becoming exalted in his own estimation while he knows his own ignorance. It is only when puffed up with vain imaginations that there is a disposition in the saints to bite and devour one another. While each is able to realize his own weakness and liability to error, there will be no difficulty in esteeming others better than self; then brethren can dwell together in unity. If one is overtaken in a fault, then there is hope for his restoration by those who are spiritual. And if there be error found in these comments, may the spirit of meekness move some brother to correct the error according to the record of inspired truth.

joined and was baptized. She told me that if I had not gone there and told my feelings she would not have come to the church, for she did not think God's children had such feelings. She said, "O I do wish I had joined the church four years ago, I feel so much better since I was baptized." Yes, that unbelieving spirit often keeps God's children living in disobedience. I relate this, as I believe there are many dear saints living out of duty to-day, waiting for a brighter evidence, and to feel fit. If you feel fit you will feel different from what I do. We believe there are duties enjoined upon the living children of God, and they should obey, not to make them children, but because they are. It is the duty of every christian to live right, not forsake the assembling of themselves together in a church capacity, abstain from every appearance of evil, not visit drinking saloons and drink with the drunken, not join the institutions of men, secret or otherwise. If you are living out of duty, come home to your friends, and tell what great things the Lord hath done for you. The church is a home for the poor and afflicted, tempest-tossed, troubled one who has no home anywhere else.

Love to all the precious ones.
Yours in hope of life eternal,
LEE HANCKS.

CAMMAL, Pa., March 21, 1892.

ELDER DURAND—DEAR BROTHER:—For years I have had a great desire to write to you, but my ignorance and unworthiness are so great that I did not dare to write. When I sent for the book (Mary Parker's) I could scarcely keep from writing. When I received your kind, unexpected letter how my heart overflowed with joy. I have received the book, and have read it nearly through, and I cannot find words to express the feelings both of joy and sorrow that are in my heart—joy to know that the dear Savior is leading and guiding the afflicted sister in all things. It is a sweet book, and I am glad that a way was provided for me to get one.

I suppose you never heard of the loss we met with on the 23d of November last. A cyclone swept over our place and blew down our house. I did not see it coming until it struck the house. I was alone with the children. We ran to the door, but the house was falling. Something seemed to say to me, "You won't be hurt." I threw my arms around the children with perfect confidence. Nearly everything we owned was crushed to pieces, except where we stood. Not even a piece of anything fell on us. We were perfectly safe. Then I believe I felt a thankfulness that I never knew before. I could cry with a loud voice, "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name." I have been kept ever since without a desire to murmur or complain. It was the old home of father and mother, where they lived and died. We are building near the old home, where so many happy as well as sorrowful hours have been spent.

Elder Vail came last Saturday to fill his appointment, and staid till Monday. He comes once every two months. Our meetings are just like they were when you first came here, all perfect love, and not a discordant sound. All are in peace and fellowship. I hope we have perfect love in our hearts for each other. It seems as though the Lord in much mercy has restored peace once more. Our new meeting-house is nearly finished. It is not very large, but is a happy place to meet in. It is built near the place where you led this unworthy worm of the dust down into the watery grave nearly sixteen years ago.

When I look back and see the trials and afflictions that I have had to pass through, nothing but the help of an all-wise God could keep me from despair; for I am perfectly helpless. I cannot even think a good thought. Sin is mixed with all I do.

Aunt Rhoda is living yet, and was able to attend our meeting, and enjoyed it very much. Her talk in conference meeting was the best, I think, I ever heard. She is getting old and very feeble, yet is kept strong in that perfect faith.

You said in your letter that you would call here, but did not say when. The voice of all the church is for you to come and make us a good long visit. I hope, if it is the will of God, that you will come soon, for I have a great desire to hear you preach the gospel once more.

Your unworthy sister,
MALINDA BADGLEY.

SOUTHAMPTON, Pa., July 1, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I send you this letter from sister Badgley because of the account it contains of the wonderful deliverance of herself and children when the house was destroyed, and also because of her reference to the condition of the church at that place. I know that letters which speak of the travel and welfare of churches are of peculiar interest to brethren generally.

I visited this church on my return from the Chemung Association, and also the one at Grover, Pa. Both are especially dear to me, as at each place it was my lot to preach, as an evangelist, the first sermon that had been preached there in many years, and to baptize many, and serve them for some years. At this place when I first visited the friends it had been sixteen years since a gospel sermon had been preached there. Three aged sisters were left of those who had been members. One of them only remains, the "Aunt Rhoda" referred to in the letter. She is the mother of the late Elder William Campbell, who was one of the twenty-one that it was my privilege to baptize there within a few years. Others were baptized by brother Vail, who has served them since the death of brother Campbell. I can never forget the many pleasant meetings we had there on my occasional visits. I enjoyed a pleasant season with the brethren there on this visit, though great changes have taken place, and I missed many dear ones.

The circumstance related by sister Badgley was quite remarkable. Her own two children were with her in the house at the time of the tornado, and also two children of sister Elliott, living near, who had just gone to a neighbor's, and whose house was destroyed. Remembering that one of the children was upstairs asleep, sister Badgley ran up and brought it down, and had just time to gather them all together and stoop down over them when the house was torn to pieces, except the spot where she was. Two trees were blown down over that place, and in some unaccountable way they with a part of the roof were kept just above her head, and protected her from the rain. Brother Badgley was in the barn. As soon as he could get to where the house had been he called out in great fear, "Are you hurt?" "No," she replied. "Say just what I say: 'Bless the Lord, O my soul.'" She said she felt as though everybody ought to say those words. She had said the day before, in conversation with some of the brethren, that she did not know whether she had ever been thankful. At this moment that remark came to her mind, and she now know that she was thankful to the Lord.

Your brother in hope,
SILAS H. DURAND.

CLARENDON, Ark., May 13, 1891.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I send you the experience of my daughter, Mrs. Smallwood. If I were not such a poor scholar I would write some of my travels since the Lord, as I hope, revealed himself to me as the chiefest among ten thousand and altogether lovely. I am a subscriber to the SIGNS, and like it very much. My parents were Primitive Baptists, as were also my first husband and his parents; but that was not what made me a Primitive Baptist. I feel very lonely here, as there is no church near. I am a Primitive or Old School Baptist because of what the Bible and my experience teach me. I love the doctrine of predestination, and believe it with all my heart. I do not want to worry you with my scribble, and this is enough for the present. Do with this as you think best. I hope you may long live to wield "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." My love to all the saints.

Yours in tribulation,
MRS. E. J. HURST.

GREENBRIER, Ark., Aug. 17, 1890.

DEAR MOTHER:—I seat myself to write you a letter. It has been a bright time with me for three days; but I have had a dark season for a long time previous. I do not know how long this light will last. It seems to me a long time since our last meeting at Cadron. It will be a week yet before meeting is held here again. I wish you were here to go with us and enjoy the blessings of God that will be distributed among his children.

I will go back to the year 1886, and will tell you some of my travels. I know I have been made to rejoice in God's word, after three years in the dark, deserted places. O how dark and dreary they were to me. I will go back to the time of the death of my Minny. When she died I thought I could not grieve if I were only prepared to meet her in heaven; but I felt that I was not prepared. I went on until April, 1886, when the Lord appeared to me in a dream. When I first saw him in my dream I tried to run from him, but my strength failed. When I looked the second time I thought he was a man. His raiment seemed brighter than glistening gold, and it seemed to me that the light would put my eyes out. I tried to hide the light from my eyes with my hands, but all was in vain. The more I tried to hide the light, the brighter the raiment seemed to shine. I could go no farther, and fell on my face, saying, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" He answered, "Cursed is he that cannot obey my commandment." At this I awoke, and thought I was going to die; and I knew if I died I would be certain to go to torment; for the Scripture says, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." I went on in a weeping condition, and finally had another dream. I dreamed the world was coming to an end. I could see the earth rolling up in a flame of fire. Then I prayed, and was saved. This gave me some relief, but it did not last long, for I was soon in as much trouble as ever. I had a third dream. I dreamed that I had died, and that people had come to bury me. But I was restored to life. I did not know that I had died until I came back to life. I then thought I would have to die again. But the good Lord came to me again on a white cloud, rolled the dust away, and lifted me out into the cloud, and set me down on earth again. This relieved me again; but nothing relieved me long. At that time I was attending the Baptist meetings, and thought I would ask some of them what the matter was with me; but when I would get among them I would rather hear those good people talk than to talk myself. I did not want to talk any more than I could help. It seemed to me that I was the meanest one that went to the meeting; but those good people treated me very kindly, and I could not understand why, as I felt beneath their notice. Since I have hoped that I am born of the Spirit of God, and I hope the Lord has dealt with me, my troubles have never since been so great. I was made to say, "Blessed be God in the highest." I have had many doubts since my baptism in June, 1890.

I will close, for fear I weary you. May God bless you, and all his dear children.

MARTHA E. SMALLWOOD.

LYONS, Ohio, Jan. 3, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—In the providence of God I am permitted to take my pen to write a few lines to the children of God scattered abroad. Our Lord and Master commands those who love him to also love one another. If I am not deceived, dear brethren and sisters, I do love you all, because you love the same God and his great salvation that I love, and because we travel the same road, which leads to the haven of rest. I have been trying to travel the road for fifty-six years, and have met with many troubles and trials; yet I love the road. I have been a reader of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES over thirty years, and I love it next to the Bible. My mother lived with me thirty years after my father died. Her name was Phebe Northrup. My mother died five years ago, and I was left alone. My family are all gone to the spirit world, except two grandsons. I bought a little farm, and one of them moved on it, and I lived in the house with him. I went to visit my daughter-in-law, who was married again, and on the night before I was going home I had a stroke of paralysis. I thought I could not live through the winter; but the spring came, and I said, "I cannot live through the spring." Now it is fall, and almost a year since I came here. I find that my time is not the Lord's time. Till he commands I cannot die.

"O for an overcoming faith,
To cheer me in my dying hours."

If I know my heart, I desire to be more humble, more watchful, more prayful, more like my blessed Master, and more like a child. O that the Lord may reconcile me to his will in all things, in all my afflictions and sorrows, and enable me to have my lamp trimmed and burning when he cometh. I want to say, Come, welcome death.

"Why should I shrink at pain and woe,
Or feel at death dismayed,
With Canaan's goodly land in view,
And realms of endless day?"

O the lonesome hours, days and weeks I have spent within the last year, with no one to talk with who is of my faith. The Old Baptists are not of much account in this place. Our Savior said, "Fear not, little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Why not believe what Jesus has said? The most enjoyment I have is in my little room. I feel that it is a little sanctuary to me, while I read my Bible, and sing some of the good old hymns in Beebe's Collection, and feel that the Lord is with me. Sometimes by day and by night I get a little manna from heaven. Sometimes I feel I would be glad if it were the Lord's will that I might fall asleep and awake in that heavenly mansion prepared for the redeemed of the Lord.

My object in writing, when I commenced this last October, was to throw in my little mite and let you know there is one more who can witness to that glorious truth contained in the old SIGNS. There I read such good sermons, good experiences, and good exhortations. While reading the editorials to the pilgrims and strangers, the little ones, I have felt I was one of them. You have told me just what I am, a poor, unworthy, helpless worn of the dust. I do believe those pilgrims are christians. I think I can say of a truth, Salvation is of the Lord. In him is my life, my hope, my trust. I have to fall into the hands of the living God, and leave all my future in his keeping. Let him do with me as seemeth good in his sight. It is a blessed thought to me that when the voyage of this life is over, when life's tempestuous sea shall be crossed, there is a safe and quiet home of rest for all the saints of God; for they are founded on a rock which is forever sure. Christ is our Rock, a firm foundation for all his saints. They are the chosen of God, secure in our blessed Redeemer. When their pilgrimage here shall be ended, they have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

I will stop. I have made so many blunders that I fear you will not be able to find out my meaning. In my lonesome hours I have felt that I would like to say a few words to the brethren and sisters in Christ scattered all over the States. Many of the old pilgrims who wrote in the SIGNS twenty and thirty years ago have gone home to rest. I feel that my days are about numbered.

Brethren Beebe, if this reaches your office look it over. If it is too poor for printing lay it aside, and all will be right with me. In much tribulation and sorrow I am your unworthy little sister in Christ, if one at all,

PHEBE NELLIS.

HANNIBAL, Mo., July 8, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I want to write you a few lines of experience this morning, which our dear Lord has recently given me, and ask you to insert them in the earliest issue you can of the dear old SIGNS OF THE TIMES. Not that I suppose they can be of much benefit to your readers, but they may be a feeble anthem of praise to the adorable name of our God, from one who feels to be the least of all saints, if indeed I am one of them, and show the infinite knowledge and power of our God.

As I was on my way home from our church meeting on Sunday, the third instant, being alone, I was run over by a passenger train (the Denver) on the Hannibal & St. Joe Rail Road. My horse was instantly killed, my buggy broken into fragments, and wonderful to say, I, an old, partially paralyzed man, almost eighty years old, was not seriously hurt. Our dear brother and pastor, Elder Walter Cash, spoke from the words of the apostle, "Casting all your care upon him; for he careth for you," with much comfort and edification; to which I added a few words upon the predestination of all things; that all things work together for good to the children of God, whether good things or bad; and if I were one of them, whatever befell me I was assured by the word of the Lord was for my good, and I desired to cast all my care upon him, with the assurance that he cared for me, as he did for them all. He that keepeth Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps. Before I reached home I had this signal manifestation of his care and almighty power in saving me from death. The many who gathered at the wreck, to whom I spoke freely, in my prostrate condition, while they were preparing to take me home, near by, were astonished that I was not instantly killed, as the horse was. It did look so to finite man; but let us consider, my dear brethren, the infinite wisdom and almighty power which controlled and directed the forces at each point, even to the cutting out of a part of my coat sleeve, and still not touch my arm. We can see some of the purpose of our God, that accidents do not abide with him, but are of the gods of this world. Israel's God works all things according to his eternal purpose. None will fail. What a blessed consolation it is to me in my feeble and almost helpless old age that I have one upon whom I can cast all my cares, and that he careth for me. Blessed be his holy and reverend name.

I have written this upon my bed, very sore and feeble, and hope to be able some time to write again of the goodness and mercy of God to me. The doctor thinks I may get as well as I was. Love to all saints.

SATURDAY MORNING.—I rested well last night, and feel something better and stronger. The principal pain is in my right hip. The same was most affected when I was paralyzed, and was very weak when I received this terrible shock.

Farewell, dear brethren, all of you. May the God of love be and abide with you, and comfort your hearts with peace in believing, for his own blessed name's sake. Amen.

W. F. KERCHEVAL.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—The Scriptures abundantly show the salvation of sinners, and also the order in which that salvation is manifested. "First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." God made choice of, or elected, his people before the world began; hence their election is eternal. It was not for aught of good in them, not according to their works, nor for works of righteousness which they have done; hence it is without conditions, and is also personal. Paul says, "Chosen us." Peter says, "Ye are a chosen generation," &c. Who or what was chosen? Men, and men only. Let us see if we are borne out by the word of the Lord. Jesus said, in his prayer to the Father (John xvii. 6), "I have manifested thy name unto the men which thou gavest me out of the world: thine they were, and thou gavest them me." Addressing his disciples, he said (John xv. 16), "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you," &c. Paul, writing to the saints at Rome, men whose earthly habitation was in the city of Rome, says (Romans ix. 22-25), "What if God, willing to show his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction: and that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory, even us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles? As he saith also in Osee [Hosea], I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her beloved, which was not beloved." Also, in Ephesians i. 4, "According as he hath chosen us in him," &c. But it will be objected that the saints were not in him, as men, before the foundation of the world. I will endeavor to show in a future article the principle of the vital unity or life union, oneness of life, between Christ and his church, and thus show how they were chosen in him, &c. What we want to show now is that men are the objects of God's love and the subjects of his choice. Paul, in his letter to the saints at Ephesus (iii. 1-6), says, "For this cause I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to youward: how that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery (as I wrote afore in few words; whereby, when ye read, ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ), which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit; that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel."

In love of the truth,

A. B. FRANCIS.

AGAIN the Frying Pan Church is made to mourn for the loss of a dear, devoted, faithful sister. Mary Rose, widow of George W. Rose, died June 10th, 1892, aged 68 years.

The writer baptized her and preached her funeral. She was a woman of tender, loving feelings, of strong and honest convictions, a true worshiper of the living God, and a faithful member of the church. We all loved her; but she is gone. May God keep and sustain us who are left.

LEESBURGH, Va., July 14, 1892.

BROTHER J. J. McDonald died at his home on Jan. 16th, 1892. He was born in Chambers Co., Ala., July 28th, 1851, and joined the Old School Baptist Church on Saturday before the first Sunday in June, 1880. He lived in that church until he moved a short distance away, when he united by letter with a church of the same association. He was a faithful member, a believer in the doctrine of the Primitive Baptists, and delighted to talk of the wonderful works of God. He requested that the writer be sent for to attend his burial, when 1 Cor. xv. 55-57 was dwelt upon in the presence of a large assembly of relatives, brethren and friends. He left a wife and four children (one had gone before) to mourn after him. It was hard for us to give up our brother, but the Lord saw best to take him, and we hope that our loss is his great gain. The Lord doeth all things right.

M. L. VANDERVEER.

QUINTON, Jefferson Co., Ala.

My dear wife, Mary Robinson, departed this life at Reynoldsville, N. Y., June 24th, aged 49 years.

Her disease was consumption of the liver, from which she suffered much for the past year. She bore her sufferings with calm resignation, sometimes saying, "All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come." She experienced a hope in the dear Savior about twenty years ago, but never felt worthy to follow him in the ordinance of baptism, feeling the church too sacred a place for her unworthy feet to tread. She seemed to grow more firm in faith to the last, telling her attending physician that the doctrine of election and predestination was her only hope.

She leaves a husband and four children, all settled in life except the youngest daughter, with many other relatives and friends, to mourn their loss. How we all miss her! But the silver cord is loosed, the golden bowl is broken, severing the first link in the household chain. She was a kind mother and a dutiful wife, always ready to minister to the wants of her family. She is gone, and we hope through boundless grace to meet her on the shining shore, where parting is unknown nor family circles broken.

Her funeral was attended at her late residence. By request of the deceased, Elder Charles Bogardus spoke on the occasion to a large and attentive congregation from the words, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!"

"It is not death to close

The eyes long dimmed by tears,

And wake in glorious repose

To spend eternal years."

MARTIN ROBINSON.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—By request of the friends, and in compliance also with my own feelings, I send you the following obituaries for publication in the SIGNS.

Mary Rosa Ealino Geist died Sept. 7th, 1891, at her home in Baltimore, aged 41 years, 3 months and 7 days.

She was the widow of Martin Geist, who preceded her a few years ago to the grave. Her disease was consumption, from the inroads of which she had been suffering for several years. I had known our deceased sister for several years, and can bear testimony to her rare worth of character, and her devotion to what she believed to be right. In July, 1887, it was my privilege to baptize her in the fellowship of the church at Black Rock, and all who knew her are sure that her profession was true and genuine. The later years of her life were years of intense care and great trouble. After the death of her husband the care of nine children fell upon her; and I can bear witness how cheerfully and uncomplainingly and courageously she took up the burden, and bore it until flesh and heart failed, and she laid down the burden in death. I was often at her home, and many times has she said to me that she regarded the sore trials of her lot as among the greatest blessings she had ever received. Like David, she could have said, "Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now have I kept thy word." Among all whom I have ever known none have manifested more cheerful and steadfast trust in God, nor more ready submission to his will. In all this the grace of God is manifest and is glorified.

I was absent from home at the time of her death, and so could not attend her funeral. She left nine children and many friends; but they sorrow not as those who have no hope for the departed.

ALSO,

Elizabeth A. Ensor, wife of Luke G. Ensor, and daughter of George and Rebecca Ensor, departed this life Nov. 15th, 1891, aged 40 years, 4 months and 17 days.

Her disease also was consumption, from which she had been failing for many months. It was my privilege to baptize our deceased sister in the fellowship of the Black Rock Church on March 6th, 1870. She was then young in years, and came to the church when there were no young members in their number. I remember well how willingly and gladly, and yet humbly, she came among us, and how she rejoiced at the tokens of fellowship extended to her. Six months afterward it was my privilege also to baptize her mother, who had entertained a hope for twenty-five years. Sister Lizzie, as we all called her, came to the church and found a home among us but a few days after she obtained a hope in Christ. She was of a gentle and kindly disposition, and was ever ready to care for the sick and suffering about her as best she could. Through various circumstances for a number of years she was largely deprived of the privilege of attending our meetings, but when I saw her I always found her glad to converse upon the theme of redeeming love and grace.

Her funeral was largely attended at Black Rock, and many tears testified to the love and respect in which she was held. She leaves a husband, who feels sorely bereaved, and six children, to grieve. May the God of all grace be their support and stay.

ALSO,

Shadrach Kemp was called away from earth on Wednesday, July 13th, aged 74 years, 3 months and some days.

His disease was cancer of the throat, from which he had been suffering for two or more years, having endured several surgical operations in the hope of relief. Together with his companion he was baptized in the fellowship of the Black Rock Church in December, 1879. She was called away nine years ago by the same dread disease; and now, after months of suffering, the dear husband has also departed. He leaves four sons and five daughters. Three daughters, the children of his last wife, lived with him, and cared for him during the wearisome months of his last illness. I was to see him about ten days before his death. He spoke of the devotion of these three girls, saying that they had done all that lay in their power for him. He also spoke of a great comfort and peace which had been given him a few days before, in which he had a view of the goodness of the Lord. He said this bright hope had measurably departed, but he felt sure it would return again. He wept as he spoke of the goodness of the Lord to him.

His funeral was very largely attended at Black Rock last Saturday, the 16th. Thus another of the aged has passed away from our midst. We at Black Rock as a church feel that we are sorely bereaved by the removal of all three named above. May we have grace to be still, and know that he is God.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

THE PERFECT FRIEND.

ONE only friend we have Accounted sure;
One only love is ours
That will endure.
All other friends are dear;
He knows how dear
Who gave them for our joy
And solace here.
All other loves are sweet;
He knows how sweet
Of whom sad souls that lack
For love entreat.
But friends, however true,
This life will test;
And they will fail us oft
Who know us best.
And loves, however strong,
In time may change;
Misfortunes may divide,
New ties estrange.
Sorest of all will come
Some sad offense;
Mistrust will chill, and doubt
Drive friendship hence.
O slow of heart to learn What yet we own—
One only perfect friend Hath any known!

"THEY SHALL BE CHANGED."

"THEY shall be changed! Yes, all things here,
The brightest and the best.
We often drop a falling tear,
And say, "Where shall we rest?"
"They shall be changed!" And yet we try To make a home below;
Knowing full well that all must die,
For we have proved it so.
"They shall be changed!" The falling leaves Show summer's swift decay;
And yet how oft the spirit grieves
When earth's joys pass away.
"They shall be changed!" Those friends of years,
We watch their slow decay,
And whisper softly 'midst our fears,
"They soon will pass away."
"They shall be changed!" Yes, one by one
Our earthly joys decay;
They hardly last the looking on,
Then die and fade away.
"They shall be changed!" Unchanging One, Wherever we may be,
O may we find, as time doth run,
There is no change in thee.
"They shall be changed" can ne'er be said
Of mercy, love and grace.
O may we pillow there our head,
And find a resting place.
"They shall be changed," those nights of woe,
For blissful, happy day;
Those things that vex and pain us so
Will quickly pass away.
"They shall be changed!" Yet stay the tear
That dims the weeping eye;
If we belong to Jesus here,
Our joys shall never die.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MY CHURCH.

THIS saying, common amongst men, has to my mind a spiritual meaning; for spiritually there is therein contained the revelation of Jesus Christ unto the sons and daughters of Adam, as recorded in Matthew xvi. 15-18: "He saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am? And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." This revelation of Jesus Christ, the Son of the living God, which is God manifest in the flesh, is the manifestation of that new creation, created in Christ Jesus before the world was; the perfect man, which was to come in the likeness of God; the Savior of sinners, whom to know is life eternal. Flesh and blood cannot reveal this knowledge, for Jesus says so. This revelation is spiritual, and is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, and is the rock on which Christ builds his church. No man nor woman can enter into that church spiritually, and become a member thereof here upon earth, except upon the testimony that Jesus Christ has been revealed unto them as their salvation, their redemption, their hope and their life. It is possible there have been received into the churches members who did not bear this testimony of the revelation of Jesus, and the churches have had to suffer on account of receiving them. For instance, one may come before the church who may appear sound in doctrine, even the doctrine of the apostles, as laid down in the Scriptures, may appear a firm believer in the doctrine of God's predestination, his election, and final perseverance of the saints, and may have been a follower of the Old Baptists for years; yet before you can receive such an one into church fellowship he must bring forth evidence that Jesus has been revealed unto him as his salvation. No other evidence will be admitted by a faithful church; and that evidence, we are told, the gates of hell shall not prevail against, for it is the rock on which the church is built. I think there have been,

and are, instances where persons have been admitted into the church upon a profession of doctrine, being strong advocates of the doctrine of election, predestination, and salvation by grace, and have become members of the church, and may have been considered able gifts, yet in their experience have not received the revelation that was given unto Peter and the disciples of Jesus; for if such were the case, from whence came these dissensions and divisions that have arisen in the churches, that have broken the fellowship of the brethren? Is Christ divided? Is it possible that the love they once professed for brethren could so easily be turned into hatred, and they become so cold as to denounce them as unsound in the faith, and say all manner of evil against them? Truly they do not bear the marks nor produce the fruit of a sinner saved by grace; neither is their course according to the apostolic admonition, "Let brotherly love continue," and be "kind one to another, forgiving one another, as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." In illustrating this subject I feel led to the parable in Matthew xiii. 24-30: "The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field: but while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares among the wheat, and went his way. But when the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also." This parable, to my mind, is a lively picture of the church to-day. The gospel of Jesus, the word of life, through the Spirit of God, has been sown by the servants of Jesus from the days of the apostles down to the present time, and the word has fallen upon the children of men; and wherever the Lord has prepared the ground to receive it, by the revelation of Jesus Christ to them, the blade has sprung up and brought forth wheat. The same word may have fallen by the wayside, or among thorns; and the cares of this world, the glory thereof, and the lusts of the flesh, have choked the word. The apostle declares, "When lust hath conceived it bringeth forth sin." We may have desires to be wise above what is written, and, like our mother Eve, to know good and evil, and be full of religious zeal, so much so that we think we are doing God service to persecute the saints, and show plainly that we are not wheat, but tares, in the kingdom of heaven. I would not be understood to say that the power of God is not able to save even a tare, if it is his will; for by nature we are all tares, as the children of Adam, conceived in sin and born in iniquity, and are the children of wrath, even as others; yet in the figure the kingdom of heaven is likened unto it. We see wheat and tares growing up together; and when his servants said unto him, "Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest: and in the time of harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them: but gather the wheat into my barn." Thus we see in the parable what the kingdom of heaven is likened unto. This one remark I will make, that not all the children of Abraham are the children of God; neither are all that profess to be followers of Christ the children of God; for Jesus says, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God," or the church, which the gates of hell shall not prevail against. The gates of hell I understand to be the carnal heart or tongue of men. The apostle James says, "The tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity: so is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell." Therefore the tongue and heart of man must be the gates through which have come forth all the hatred and enmity against the church. From the day of Cain down to the present time all the persecutions against the saints, the followers of Jesus, have proceeded and come forth out of the heart of man. From those gates poured forth the floods of enmity that killed the prophets, that crucified Jesus and the apostles; from those said gates poured forth the flood after the woman, the church, which fled into the wilderness; and from those said gates to-day are opened the batteries of worldly religion against the doctrine of God's electing love, his predestination, and his right to choose whomsoever he will from among the children of men as subjects of his grace. They are not slow to declare that if partiality is shown among the children of men such a God is unjust, and not the God they worship; that to choose one of a city and two of a family is impartial. They say that all men may have eternal life if they will accept it; that salvation is free for all, whether they will accept it or not; that all men are wheat by nature, and if they become tares it is their own fault. This, I think, is about the general idea presented throughout all Christendom from the tongues of men. From a natural standpoint, according to the reasoning among men, if all men were wheat by birth in nature there would be some foundation for their argument; but according to the Scriptures such is not the case. Men are born in sin and shapen in iniquity, and are therefore tares by nature; for it is declared by Jesus, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." He must be born of water and of the Spirit to enter into that kingdom, and therefore he must drink of the water of life by Jesus being revealed unto him as the hope of glory, by the Spirit of God, before he can enter into the joys of that kingdom; for Jesus says, "My kingdom is not of this world." It is not a kingdom like unto the nations of the earth, of flesh and blood, but is a spiritual kingdom; and they that worship in that kingdom worship in spirit and in truth. To be an heir of that kingdom "ye must be born again;" not a corporal birth of the flesh, but a spiritual birth, by the revelation of Jesus in you. Jesus says, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him: and I will raise him up at the last day. It is written in the prophets, And they shall be all taught of God. Every man therefore that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me. Not that any man hath seen the Father, save he which is of God, he hath seen the Father. Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on me hath everlasting life. I am that bread of life." This belief on Jesus is the birth which the child of God experiences in his deliverance from under the law; for a birth is a deliverance from the womb of nature. Therefore Jesus says, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." Not that the man is born over again, for that would not change his condition spiritually. He would be the same natural man, as a man. But spiritually born again, by the revelation of Jesus Christ in him the hope of glory. Jesus declares, "My kingdom is not of this world;" which I understand to mean is not a flesh and blood kingdom, of the will of man, but a spiritual kingdom, of the will of God. They that worship in that kingdom worship in spirit and in truth; therefore the need of a spiritual birth by the revelation of Jesus Christ in them. The apostle Paul testifies (Gal. i. 15-17), "But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, to reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen; immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood; neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me." Here, I understand, we have a lively type of the spiritual birth; for this same man, Saul of Tarsus, before God revealed his Son in him, was a preacher of Moses and the law; but now, after this revelation, or birth from under the law, he became a preacher of Jesus, the way of salvation, and declares that by the works of the law no flesh can be justified in the sight of God. Yet I do not understand that the carnal desires of the flesh of this man Saul were changed by this revelation; for his own testimony declares that he had the same carnal appetite. But the course of the man was changed; for now the same tongue that once could speak evil of the saints, and persecute them, is employed in speaking blessings for them; and the same hands that willingly held the clothes of them that stoned Stephen to death now administer to the comfort of the saints; and the same feet that walked down to Damascus to put in prison the followers of Jesus, and persecute them, are now employed in bearing the man to preach the everlasting gospel of the Son of God. Thus there is a complete change in the course of the man. The man spiritually is born again, or born from above, as in the margin, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against him. O how often our carnal hearts rise up against the wisdom and power of God, in opposition to his will and his providence on earth in his dealings with the children of men; for I find in my own heart the gates of hell, and often feel to say, like Paul said, in sentiment, after he had preached the gospel to others, yet he feared he might be a castaway. Just so is my experience, that after I have written about the way of life and salvation, I daily fear I am a tare, just growing among the wheat; for I see that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing. My testimony is that I have the same carnal heart that I ever had. There has been no change in the workings of my flesh. I do hope that my course has been changed, in that I love holiness for holiness' sake, and that I love the company of the saints better than the attractions of the world. My great trouble is my sinful heart, which is as prone to wander as the sparks fly upward. Evil is continually before me; and I sometimes feel to offer one little prayer, in the language of the poet,

"O could I find some peaceful bower,
Where sin hath neither place nor power,
This traitor vile I fain would shun,
But cannot from his presence run.

"When to the throne of grace I flee
He stands between my God and me;
Where'er I rove, where'er I rest,
I feel him working in my breast."

Dear brethren Beebe, I feel that I am trespassing upon you in writing my thoughts on this portion of Scripture. I have thought I would stop writing, and not bother you any more; for after I have written my thoughts on paper they seem to come so far short of what I hope I see in the Scripture that it seems I have not touched the subject.

Affectionately yours,

JOSEPH BRODERS.

MOLALLA CORNERS, Ore., June 4, 1892.

ELDER J. H. YEOMAN—DEAR BROTHER:—We are strangers in the flesh, but that is no reason we should remain so when (as I hope) we are brethren in spirit. But brethren cannot always see everything exactly alike as regards spiritual things, although they may be born of the same Spirit, any more than two natural men, although born of the same parentage, can understand natural or temporal things exactly alike. I was just now reading your article in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES (Vol. ix., No. 21), in which there are some things which (to me) are objectionable. (You say you are nearing your sixtieth year. Well, I am still older than thou. I am in my eighty-sixth year.) That part of your letter which to me is specially objectionable is where you say, "Some have concluded that the fleshly body of Jesus, who was made of a woman, made under the law, was spiritual flesh," &c. My object in writing this is to prove by Scripture authority that in the fleshly body of Jesus pure divinity and pure humanity were and are inseparably united in one holy personage; that is, he is both God and man united in one indivisible personage. In order to be as brief as possible I will refer you to the account of his conception, as given by the angel to Luke: "And in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, to a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary. And the angel came in unto her, and said, Hail, thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women. And when she saw him, she was troubled at his saying, and cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be. And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary: for thou hast found favor with God. And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end. Then said Mary unto the angel, How shall this be, seeing I know not a man? And the angel answered and said unto her, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God."—Luke i. 26-35. Now I ask you, my dearly beloved brother, was that holy thing born without a Father? Was not God his Father, just as much as Mary was his mother? Was that holy thing born a part Jesus or a whole Jesus? Has he not said, "I, even I, am the Lord; and beside me there is no Savior?"—Isa. xliii. 11. Again, "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given:

and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace."—Isaiah ix. 6. Now this "Wonderful child" is the holy thing that was born of the virgin, and he is the mighty God, the everlasting Father, &c.; so that the Scriptures teach us that he is both God and man in one individual person forever. Again, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made. In him was life; and the life was the light of men. And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not."—John i. 1-5. Verse 14: "And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." Now, my dear brother, how can you believe that the body of Jesus was merely a human body, when the Scripture declares that the Word which was God was made flesh? In what sense can we say that Christ is the only begotten of the Father, other than that there was not another being, either in earth, heaven or hell, that was begotten after the same manner that Christ was, both human and divine? If I am asked how it was, then, that Christ could, according to your letter (my dear brother), hunger, thirst, become weary, and take rest in sleep, and, as Peter tells us, was put to death in the flesh, &c., I answer, Because he took on himself the whole nature of man, sin only excepted, and in that nature he could and did hunger, thirst, &c. He partook as well of the whole of the divine nature; for we read in the Scriptures, "For in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. And ye are complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power."—Col. ii. 9, 10. Do you believe this, my dear brother? I do with all my heart. John further saith, "No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him;" that is, made him manifest in the flesh of Christ as the only begotten Son of God. I do not believe that Christ, as the only begotten Son of the Father, received any of his human nature from the Father; neither do I believe that he received any of his divine nature from the mother. The two are separately considered, but inseparably united. I cannot tell you how, neither could an apostle explain it to our understanding, so I shall not attempt it. Jesus saith unto Thomas, "If ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also: and from henceforth ye know him, and have seen him. Philip saith unto him, Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us. Jesus saith unto him, Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; and how sayest thou then, Show us the Father?"—John xiv. 7-9. These, with many other things, are, when abstractly considered, too abstruse for our feeble comprehension; still we are bound to believe them, because the Scripture teaches them.

Now, my dear brother Yeoman, you say, "If we could find any scriptural proof that Abraham possessed a body of spiritual flesh, then we might safely say that the body of Jesus was spiritual flesh." O, my dear brother, why did you stop at Abraham? Christ saith unto the Jews, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was I am."—John viii. 58, 59. My dear brother, when the inspired writers say that he is the only begotten Son of the Father, did they mean father Abraham? If not, then why did you bring forward Abraham here? If the body of Jesus were begotten by Abraham, then there would be some propriety in your expression; but it was not. O no, not at all; by no means. When Mary inquired of the angel, "How shall this be?" the angel did not tell her that she should conceive a son by Abraham; but, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called [not the son of Abraham, but] the Son of God." The superlative degree is used here. There can be no power higher than the power of the Highest. "And the angel of the Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost."—Matt. i. 19, 20. Was it not the flesh, bones and blood of Jesus which was conceived in her? If not, then what was it? John saith, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life (for the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us); that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ."—1 John i. 1-3. We do not suppose that it was the Spirit of Christ, abstractly considered, that the disciples handled with their hands. It evidently was his body; for after he had risen from the dead he appeared to them, and stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them, "Peace be unto you. But they were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit. And he said unto them, Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have. And when he had thus spoken, he showed them his hands and his feet. And while they yet believed not for joy, and wondered, he said unto them, Have ye here any meat? And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish, and of a honeycomb. And he took it, and did eat before them."—Luke xxiv. 36-43. Although these things are too profound and abstruse for our comprehension, we nevertheless believe them to be true on account of their divine testimony. Jesus saith to the Jews, "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die. I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."—John vi. 49-51. Then his flesh was more than merely human flesh, for he says that it came down from heaven; and he surely knew. It was (in my opinion) divine and human flesh, mysteriously united in one Lord Jesus Christ, who thereby became a true and proper Daysman, one who is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

Dear editors, when I commenced writing I intended it as a private letter to brother J. H. Yeoman; but as I prolonged it far beyond my intention I have concluded to send it to you, to dispose of as your better judgment may dictate. I know it is badly written, and the composition is still worse; but I believe it is the truth. I find that my mental faculties are failing me very fast since my last winter's sickness. I perceive it more in writing than I do in preaching.

JOHN STIPP.

ROCKVILLE, Md., April 11, 1892.

DEAR BROTHERS EDITORS:—Will you, or some other dear brother, give your views of the locusts that came out of the smoke of the bottomless pit, as recorded in Rev. ix., especially from the seventh to the tenth verse? They had faces like men, and hair like women. Are we not living in that day, in which the different societies are managed by women, and so-called preaching by the same? Do they not have faces like men, to stand before large assemblies, and chatter with their tongues? The beauty of a woman is her modesty and virtue, and so I would be glad to see my own sex continue to possess those beauties. But alas! that day is passed with the world; but not so with the lovers of the truth as it is in our blessed, meek and humble Jesus.

Dear brethren, I will leave the subject to you, who have so much light given you to open the Scriptures, as I only see in the figure a prophecy being fulfilled in this day of religions delusion.

Brother Broders, in writing upon the frogs in Egypt, spoke to the point. Therefore I hope that yourselves and some other dear brother will be drawn out to give us light on the locusts with breastplates of iron and tails like unto scorpions, with stings therein. We live in the day when only such portions of the Scriptures of truth as suit the carnal minds of men are read and taught to the minds of the rising generation, in schools through the day, or on Sunday; and such they are spreading through foreign lands, to save the world. Truly the world loves its own. My attention was called to such in reading the programme for "Arbor Day" of the State Normal School in the city of Baltimore, and of the tree of life in the garden of Eden. My answer was, "But they leave out the flaming sword, that turned every way to keep the tree of life." Nevertheless the counsel of the Lord standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that he hath purchased with his own precious blood. May all who love the truth cling together as one, and not be led away from their steadfastness by those great deceivers, who are waxing worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived. The saints shall judge the world, and surely they are judging the things of the religious world of this day, according to the Scriptures of truth, as preached by our blessed Savior and his apostles, and left on record for our consolation. Appearances are very deceiving to the carnal mind, and what would we do if we had not the record to go to? I have for a moment at times been bewildered in my own mind, when light seemed to be withdrawn from me. But when I go to the record of truth, as I always do, all is made plain, and I am made to see that the inventions of men, or women with the faces of men, are false, and are an abomination, in the light of the Scriptures of truth. My heart goes out in great sympathy for the young mind in being so deceived, and my heart is often led to ask to be kept near his side; that the Lord would keep his people everywhere; that the young may not be entrapped by the snares of deceivers; that the aged and infirm may be strengthened and find consolation as they totter down life's rugged way.

"For 'tis a strait and rugged road,
And mortal spirits tire and faint;
But they forget the mighty God,
Who feeds the strength of every saint."
It is often night with my soul, and darkness gathers thick and great, with scarcely one ray of heavenly light. He that walketh in darkness and hath no light, let him stay himself upon his God. I am compelled to wait for him to draw me, that I may run after him; for him to open my mouth, that I may sing his praises; to teach me his love; to have respected unto his commandments, as did the sweet singer in Israel. But like our beloved apostle when tossed upon rough waters in his voyage, when all hope of being saved is almost gone, I come to land—a land flowing with milk and honey, with clear crystal waters, and ever green fields. From this land I eat, and am no longer hungry. From the open fields I gather every blooming flower, perfumed with his love, and can exclaim in the language of the poet,

"O love divine! how sweet thou art!
When shall I find my willing heart
All taken up by thee?
I sink, I faint, I die, to prove
The mystery of redeeming love,
The love of Christ to me.

Stronger than death or hell his love;
His riches are unsearchable.
The first-born sons of light Desire in vain its depths to see;
They cannot reach the mystery,
The length, the breadth, and height."

Our dear medium of correspondence, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, is received every week; and, as in the beginning, it is filled with good news, in experiences of many dear brethren in all the world; also views on portions of the Scripture, from which I draw much consolation; especially the editorial on forgiving in love, which we cannot do unless grace, that unmerited favor, abounds in us, and love, that shining grace, is in our hearts. O that the Lord may create within me a clean heart and a right spirit. In the name or power of our blessed Jesus within us must we do all things, or all is naught; for

"If love be absent, I am found
As tinkling brass, an empty sound."

May you, dear brethren, one and all, be kept in the future, as in the past, by the same power, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time. That seems to be always present with me. Do not forget our beloved editors, who labor for our good and edification.

In hope of eternal life,
RUTH ADAMSON.

CHARITY.

DEAR BROTHERS BEEBE:—After the appearing of my letter in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and after it was read by one who is not a lover of the doctrine of the Bible, I received a protest from that one. I have nearly forgotten that letter, and I presume it is altogether forgotten by the readers of the SIGNS; so I will state that the main objection was that I had no charity for anybody only the "elect." I will also state (or perhaps confess would be a better word) that I am always accused of "no charity;" neither is it always from those who are without that the accusation comes. In times that are past I have had charity preached (or pounded) to me in such a way that it does seem there ought to be nothing left of me but charity and sweetness itself. Again, it has come in the form of a suggestion, intending to be put up in as mild a form as possible, that a little more charity would become certain per-

THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST.

"Jesus answered, My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered unto the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence."—John xviii. 36.

To the comprehension of natural reason the mystery of the spiritual kingdom of our Lord Jesus can never be made more clear than was the exhibition of his own divine character when in the likeness of sinful flesh he was manifest among the children of men. There could be no hope of showing to the world anything pertaining to the glory of that kingdom by the most earnest efforts of all the saints to whom it has pleased God to reveal it. It is so far beyond the comprehension of carnal minds that they cannot even grasp the fact of its existence when it is plainly declared unto them as in the language of our text. The mind of man can conceive of nothing which is not tangible to those mediums of sense through which it must receive all its impressions. When a kingdom which is not of this world is declared to be the government belonging to Jesus, the thoughts of man are bewildered and lost in the effort to imagine such a kingdom. Being himself of this world, he can think of nothing beyond the range of worldly things.

The occasion when the words above cited were spoken by our Lord was when he was arraigned before Pilate, and the accusation had been made against him that he claimed to be a king; which would have been to rebel against the authority of Cesar, to whom the Jews were then tributary. It was upon this charge that Pilate was examining him when he asked in the judgment hall, "Art thou the King of the Jews?" Knowing the malicious falsehood by which his accusers sought to pervert his words, Jesus asked, "Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me?" To this question Pilate replied by the declaration that the nation and chief priests of his own people had delivered Jesus unto him; and demanded of him to say "What hast thou done?" To this question the reply is embraced in our text. So far as it refers to the immediate charge then preferred against him the sufficiency of this answer was confessed in the decision rendered by Pilate, "I find in him no fault at all." But there is a deeper and more important sense in which the answer of our Redeemer concerns every subject of his saving grace. There can now be no question that the condemnation and death of Jesus was the most awful crime of which mortals were ever guilty. The fact of his perfect freedom from sin is not only established by every testimony which can be conceived by the natural mind, but the God of justice has given assurance unto all that he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by him, in that he hath raised him from the dead.—Acts xvii. 31. By this divine evidence is the infinite dominion of our exalted Lord proven to include the control of death as well as all other powers in earth and heaven. Less than this could not suffice for the deliverance of his people from the pollution of sin, and from the power of death which is the consequence of sin. There could be no manifestation of divine omnipotence in vindicating the righteousness of those who were not under condemnation. No law could demand their condemnation so long as they were found free from transgression. The glory of the everlasting kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ shines in the grace whereby he is able to justify the ungodly, making them holy and without blame before God in love. No power of men or angels could accomplish this wonderful work. The most that can be claimed for finite power is that it should be able to remit the penalty due to transgression. Even that can only be done by the sacrifice of the truth of the law which condemns the sinner. Such display of mercy in the pardon of a sinner could never deliver him from the guilt of his sin. The murderer who is delivered from death by the clemency of the executive does not become an innocent man when he is restored to liberty; in his own conscience and in the sight of infinite justice he is still a murderer. So, the mere remission of the penalty due to the sinner could not make him holy in the sight of God. There must be such satisfaction rendered to the demands of justice that they can never again be charged against the guilty transgressor; otherwise there can be no salvation from sin. There never was an earthly kingdom possessing power to thus blot out the guilt of a transgressor. Only the King in Zion has power on earth to forgive sins. This divine glory can never be imitated by the rulers of this world. It is not by the exercise of arbitrary power that sins are forgiven by our Lord; it is only as he has honored the utmost requirement of justice that he is just in the justification of the ungodly. This peculiar glory of the everlasting kingdom of our Lord renders it diverse from all other kingdoms and governments which have ever been known to created intelligence. While other kingdoms are sustained by might and power which may be turned to oppression and robbery, this kingdom of God is itself righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.

"My kingdom is not of this world."

This wonderful declaration is full of important instruction to the saints to-day, as well as in all the ages past. When their feet have been almost gone, and their steps have well nigh slipped at the sight of the prosperity of the wicked, reason has suggested that in the painful contrast between the trials of the saints and the ease of the wicked, they have evidence that their hope is vain, and that God does not regard them with favor. There is a continual tendency in the mind of the afflicted and poor people of God to look for their heritage in this world; and their cruel adversary is ever ready to suggest that if the Lord indeed were their Savior they would have more enjoyment and less affliction in their daily experience. Let this suggestion be brought to the test of this declaration of our Lord. Can the saints follow Jesus without walking where he walked? His promise to his disciples assures them that "In the world ye shall have tribulation." In trials, afflictions and sorrows they read their title to all the heritage of eternal glory as secured to them in Christ Jesus. Eternal love did not choose the portion of those who are called to be saints where time and corruption could mar their heritage. As they are chosen in Christ Jesus, their unity with him secures for them in this world the same experience of tribulation through which he was pleased to lead the way. This vain and transitory world could afford no kingdom worthy of our glorious Redeemer; neither does it contain anything suitable for the manifestation of eternal love as bestowed upon the subjects of his electing mercy and grace. When oppressed under the weight of disappointments, afflictions and tribulations in their daily experience, the blessed Comforter can bring sweet consolation and grace to help in such time of need from the precious words of our Lord, in which he has told us beforehand that this is not the land of our abiding home. It is for their support in the conflict with their own natural mind that the saints are furnished with the strong consolation recorded by the pen of inspiration. From other enemies they may escape by avoiding their company, but the enemies which abide in their own earthly house of this tabernacle are ever present, and they cannot guard against their attacks by any watchfulness of their own. These artful foes always seek to withdraw the attention of the saints from the truth here spoken by our Lord. It is only by referring to the things of this world, which are seen by natural reason, that the saints can be robbed of the comfort of that hope in Christ which looks beyond this world for its fulfillment. Remembering that they are called to look away from this perishing world, and from the things which are seen by the natural mind, for the kingdom of God wherein dwell troubled by the prevalence of iniquity in the world, nor by the assaults of unbelief and sin even as found in their own members; since they know that the world with all that pertains to it is arrayed in opposition to the righteousness of God. The kingdom of Christ cannot be affected by anything which pertains to this world, since it is beyond the reach of earthly changes as far as the heaven of ultimate glory is beyond the varying seasons of this natural world.

It is not to be understood by this expression that Jesus disclaimed his relationship as King over his gospel church which is in the world. Neither does he teach that his power as the Sovereign Ruler of the universe does not include the events of time as they come to pass in this world; but it is evident from the connection in which this language is recorded that it was designed to show that his kingdom is not an earthly dominion. His kingdom does indeed rule over all; but it does not conflict with the governments of this world, which was the natural understanding of the heathen king to whom the language was addressed. In this sense it is not of this world now, as it was not in conflict with the dominion of the Roman empire then. Yet it is true now, as it was then, that the "Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men."—Dan. iv. 17. The kingdoms of this world, like everything pertaining to this world, must pass away under the destroying power of time. Such is not the dominion of our Lord. Time and change can never affect the throne of his eternal glory. This world could never produce such a kingdom as that which is established in righteousness by the divine power of our Lord Jesus. While the chosen people in whom this kingdom is revealed are in the world, they are not of the world; neither is it by any worldly qualification that they are made partakers of the kingdom of Christ. It is not by the performance of any works on their part that they enter into this kingdom; "For, behold, the kingdom of God is within you."—Luke xvii. 21. As has already been shown, this is not a natural kingdom; but it is the revelation of that principle of holiness which works in the saints "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." There can be no application of the laws and ordinances of this kingdom to any other people; for there is no other nation prepared to receive them. The same perfection of righteousness which is embodied in the law of the Lord, is put in the inward parts, and written in the hearts of the children of Israel. None can rightfully assume to be the recipients of this favor of God but such as have the abiding witness of the love of righteousness in their own mind. Where this holy principle abides it will be manifested in hungering and thirsting after righteousness. This peculiar mark identifies every one who is led by the Spirit of God; and it cannot be counterfeited. Nothing of an earthly origin can be like this divine principle; as nothing was to be made by the typical Israel like that holy ointment with which it was ordained that the priests were to be anointed.—Ex. xxx. 22-38. It must be remembered that in the antitypical Israel every one of the people is holy; for it is declared to them, "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light."—1 Peter ii. 9. This holy anointing consecrates every one of those who are thus born of God. Therefore the law of holiness is to them the perfect law of liberty. This could not be true of any others but those in whom the Spirit of Christ abides. None of the kingdoms of this world have this divine principle of holiness abiding in their people; and for this cause the law of holiness can be suited to none of them. Wherever the love of righteousness produces the desire for freedom from sin, there the kingdom of Christ is manifestly revealed. The very grief which is felt by reason of the bondage of sin, is incontestible evidence that the love of holiness dwells in the mourning one. The kingdom of Christ rules in all such, though it cannot be seen by the reason of this world.

If the kingdom of Christ were of this world, as carnal reason supposed, then it would be consistent that the servants of Jesus should use the weapons of carnal warfare for the protection of their King. But he declares, "Now is my kingdom not from hence." In no kingdom of this world could there be such a thing as that the whole people of his government should be supported and defended exclusively by their king. The mightiest monarch of earth must be sustained by those over whom he rules. But this glorious King in Zion is himself the protection and support of every subject of his throne. So closely is he identified with every one for whom he gave himself a ransom, that they can have no affliction but that is felt by him; and he has borne all their sorrows and was bruised for their iniquities. Well does our Lord declare, that his kingdom is not from hence; for this world can neither furnish the holy principle which renders this kingdom peculiar, nor a people who could dwell in such a kingdom. Only as they are born of the Spirit can any of the children of Adam ever see this divine kingdom. Much less can any sinner enter into this heavenly kingdom unless he is "Born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever." There is no use in this everlasting kingdom for the weapons of carnal warfare for the defense of either the doctrine or the ordinances of our King. Not only are the murderous weapons of literal war forbidden to those who would follow Jesus; they are not allowed to answer again when the tongue of slander and the malice of sin falsely accuse them. Jesus gave the pattern when he was reviled; he reviled not again. "As a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth." The servant of the Lord must not strive. It often seems that the opposers of the truth are so glaringly wrong that it is easy to expose them; but that is not required of the disciples of our Lord. It is indeed the privilege of the saints to declare the testimony of God as the truth is in Jesus. This may excite the enmity of blasphemers; but that is not for the servants of God to consider. The Lord himself will take care of his own truth. It is not the saints against whom the rage of opposers is excited; it is the God who is the author of that truth, against whom carnal enmity rages. No enemy can injure one of the little ones whose hope is in Jesus. Herod may indeed take off the head of the imprisoned John; but the glorified saint is only released from the body of his death that he may be satisfied when he awakes with the likeness of his Redeemer; the wrath of man can go no further than this. Set free from the chains of mortality, the dear servant of Jesus enters into everlasting rest, while his name glows with the radiance of those highly favored witnesses of Jesus who as "The morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." No brighter star appears in all that heavenly host than this martyred John; while his royal murderer is doomed to go down to the remotest ages bearing such a load of infamy as is equalled only by that which sinks the traitor Judas too low for execration to reach him. The little events which shake this temporary earth, and excite the hopes or fears of mortals, cannot affect that everlasting kingdom which is not from hence. There, on the holy hill of our God, far above all principalities and powers, and above every name that is named in earth or heaven, our Jesus sits upon the throne of his glory. His truth has been nearly two thousand years separating between the enemies of his truth and the subjects of his grace. Yet there have been none of the wise and prudent of this world who could see the glory of his kingdom, nor could they recognize his power. Only as his grace is manifested in revealing his glory to his saints can his kingdom be seen by any of the children of men.

sons; and one thing is always manifest to me (or it may be my extreme sensitiveness), that there is very little charity in those admonitions given, nor the spirit there. Charity is a wonderful thing when considered all round; and no one can ever be more afraid of themselves, nor more afraid that they never possessed this crowning grace of the Spirit, than I am. Sadly, sorrowfully, I have often accused myself of being destitute of it, more than anyone else could. Without it we are nothing, and all our pretensions are but an empty noise. Addressing the saints, Paul says, "And above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness." "Have fervent charity among yourselves." And if so be we should be found not having it at all, not even for the elect, as is sometimes intimated, then is our case hopeless indeed. Arriving at the place of concluding this to be my case, I was handed by a brother a little work by the late William Huntington, called "The Arminian Skeleton," in which "universal charity" was put on trial. I am yet undecided whether it was a benefit for me to read it. I almost accused the writer of not having any more than I had; and it might perhaps be better for me to have the company of those who are more charitable, so as I keep more smoothed down and quiet like. While I was reading Huntington I could not help thinking. If he had only turned his artillery upon baby sprinkling, and such like, it would have been wonderful indeed.

Though nothing but imperfection myself, yet I so longingly look for perfection in others, especially those who are examples, and are of report among the people. They seem to me like a jealous care, I want to see them so near right, forgetting that the apostle tells us that that which is perfect is not yet come, and will not until that which is in part shall be done away. I must also confess that to my simple mind what is sometimes called charity is what I would call license or indulgence. If the ways of evil are spoken against, there is a cry raised of evil speaking, fault-finding, &c. It is true these ought not to be indulged in, nor evil surmising. But the question is, What constitutes these things? If a man willfully murders his fellow-man is it evil speaking to say he has done it? Is it wrong for it to be published or chronicled in the papers all over the land, and for punishment to be administered according to the law? Or should charity be shown him, and his dark deed be covered, and let him go on in his wickedness? Would that be charity? But if we say one is a murderer, or an evil doer, when he is not, then I consider it is evil speaking; it is slander. But all modern literature, and all the modern Sunday School literature, teaches us that we must praise every body, and speak well and good of every one. This is considered a mark of good breeding and gentility at the present time, and it is truly as a great comforting poultice for us all when we consider that if all would do this we could do as we liked, and no one would be so very unkind as to make any remarks thereon. But is there any real honesty in it? And yet I may forget that there may not be any modern charity in honesty. It all looks to me just like covering up Satan; like patting him on his back all the time; like giving shame, vice and all manner of wickedness a front seat, if only it be well polished and refined and pleasing to our own carnal nature, and virtue and decency can take a back seat. I have thought there may have been times when Satan could have been more gloated with bloodshed and unvarnished cruelty than now; but how could he ever be more satisfied or tickled with the state of refined devilry and wickedness than at the present time? And it is considered so vulgar for one to even speak of it. High polished Satan and all his arts seem so much more pleasant than the despised Nazarene, who was in one sense slain because he told the truth. How the Scriptures could be so unrefined as to tell of the thief on the cross, or of the adulterous woman, and all the evil deeds of even the children of God, we do not know. There is nothing covered there, but told just as it is; and yet we are taught that these are forgiven their sins, covered by the righteousness of their Surety, by him who loved them and gave himself for them. We know these instances are yet mentioned in theory; but if deeds of wickedness are enacted, it is so impolite and uncharitable to mention them. It is not pleasant, perhaps; but it will all suggest an improvement upon the old plan, and as a sort of encouragement for evil doing, counting upon its being kept still, if "tattling" (telling the plain truth) can only be cried down, or stamped out. But if we see the vilest manifest the love of God shed abroad in the heart, causing them to truly forsake their dark ways, we are constrained to love them, just as the Father loves them. Just so long as we see this grace upon them we have that charity for them that covers all their multitude of sins. I somehow feel that there is yet with me a little spark of true charity; and I also feel that this charity should never fail toward the objects of God's love, even though they fall under the discipline of the law given to govern the church; yet we must love them still. It is sometimes urged that this charity should save us from all discipline; but then wherefore was the rule or law given? It covers a multitude of sins; but if it covers all of them where is the sin which is unto death, for which we are not even to pray? Some tell us we must be blind to our brother's ways if he does wickedly, and try not to see them; but the teaching of the apostle is to look diligently lest there be any unclean, covetous or idolatrous person among you. I think it was in the "dark ages" that licenses and indulgences were peddled to the people for these things. Also, it was established as a rule that women were to be submissive creatures in a general sense, and not question the authority of priests, &c. We do not suppose there are any parallels to those things at the present time, so we will try to pass on. It would be pleasant for the sisters to be as lovely flowers sending forth nothing but sweetness and loveliness; and none wishes that one could be such more than I; yet we must still reflect that the queen of flowers is slightly infested with thorns. No perfection here.

Perhaps I ought to forbear saying anything about benevolent or charitable institutions of any kind; but they seem to come into my subject, whether the true charity or love of God is in them or not; or is it merely love of one's self, or the benefits to be derived therefrom, that draws one toward them? Or is it scriptural teaching for us to test them, unite with them, walk with them, until we are convinced of their merits for good or for evil? I think I read, "Touch not, tast not, handle not; which all are to perish with the using, after the doctrines and commandments of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ." Wherever the name of Christ is forbidden, surely it is "not after Christ." If we were justified in joining any order for worldly benefit, some open, worldly, honorable (as the world goes) church where Christ is claimed to be professed would be preferable, as we all know they tend to prosperity and honor in this life. Why this should be forbidden, and union with religious orders not understood allowed, I fail to see; and if we point to the wrong doing of others to justify ourselves in anything, we only certainly acknowledge ourselves wrong. "Charity rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth;" and we feel it is the true love of God, and all that is after godliness.

Wishing more of this grace,

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Will you please give your views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on Zechariah xi. 7-9, particularly the seventh verse? "And I will feed the flock of slaughter, even you, O poor of the flock. And I took unto me two staves; the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands; and I fed the flock," &c. If you will give your views on the above you will greatly favor a poor sinner that desires to know the truth as it is in Christ Jesus, if he knows his poor heart; and if he has any right conceptions of the poor spoken of in the above Scripture, he has a humble hope that he has partaken of the crumbs of food dropped from the pulpit, and also from the dear saints who have written in your precious paper. It affords my poor heart much comfort to witness the boldness of the dear brethren in declaring the truth as it is in Christ Jesus, and also the leniency they manifest one toward another. Surely forbearance with one another's imperfections is an exhibition of love. If we have Christ in us the hope of glory, we have love one for another. We read that God is love. And Jesus says, "A new commandment I give unto you; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another."—John xiii. 34. We also read, "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them."—Eph. ii. 10. If we are this blessed workmanship, he says to us, "Love one another." This, my dear brethren, I believe is part of the good works before ordained that we should walk in. We remember how we have transgressed a holy and just law, in our federal head, and brought its awful condemnation on us, with all its humiliation and disgrace; yea, entailed upon us the calamities of sin in its various forms. We see our dear Savior step forward and shoulder all this great burden of sin, and pressed as a cart that is full of sheaves.—Amos ii. 13. "In all their afflictions he was afflicted, and the angel of his presence saved them: in his love and in his pity he redeemed them; and he bare them and carried them all the days of old."—Isa. lxiii. 9. I trust that by the eye of faith I have viewed him as suffering on the cross, the just for the unjust, and heard him cry out, "O, my Father, if it be possible let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt." Then we hear him cry, "It is finished," and all those precious sheaves are landed safe. In his prayer to his Father he said, "Glorify me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." He has adorned his bride with his own righteousness. All her old rags and sin-polluted garments are taken away, and instead thereof she is adorned with his robe of righteousness. Can it be possible that poor me, who am one of the weakest and most rebellious, having no beauty or worth in self, am one of those for whom he died on Calvary's rugged summit? If I am saved it is by grace alone. I sometime think I have a foretaste of the joys that await the redeemed. Again, I have many doubts and fears. May I be permitted to praise his dear name for the great blessings, both temporal and spiritual, I trust, which I have been blessed with here in this poor world of ours.

Dear brethren, let us remember the new commandment, that we love one another, and each esteem other better than himself, forbearing one another in love; and may he who carried us all the days of old bring us off more than conquerors, and house us safely in heaven, to forever praise Father, Word and Spirit in a world that shall never end. Amen.

J. A. TEAGUE.

BUCKSKIN, Ind., Dec. 21, 1891.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Having to write you on business, I feel like telling you how well I enjoyed myself last night while reading your editorial and brother Turner's communication. Now we know, as brother Turner says, that all of God's predestination is absolute, if we credit his blessed word. Hence it is written, " whatsoever God doeth, it shall be forever: nothing can be put to it, nor anything taken from it; and God doeth it, that men should fear before him."—Ecc. iii. 14. Again, "My counsel [or purpose, or predestination, or decrees] shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Again, as brother Turner says, it has bothered me to know how to fix it up, if God predestinated our disobedience, and then chastises us for doing that which he predestinated we should do. But we are poor, finite mortals, while he who has made us uphold all worlds. And shall we say that if he does so he is the author of sin? What law is he under? Who has brought him into existence? Who has said to him that if he does this or that he shall surely die? The prophet says, "Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter."—Isa. v. 20. Again, it is written, "The carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." When we look at God's predestination with our carnal eyes or mind we cannot see how he overrules the wicked acts of men and devils to his great glory and to the good of his people.

Brethren, write upon any subject that you may feel is impressed on your mind. I love to read your communications on the subject of predestination, as well as on any other subject. I have been reading the good old SIGNS at intervals for thirty years, and have read every communication in it for more than two years past. I have failed to notice any difference in the views of the writers on the subject of salvation by grace alone, through the sufferings and shed blood of the blessed Savior of sinners; but I am sorry to say that we have differed about the meaning of some words to no profit, and have fallen out and parted. Brethren, these things ought not so to be.

Brethren Beebe, my hand trembles so that I fear you will not be able to read this. If you can, and you see anything in it worth reading, please correct mistakes and publish it on account of my friend, Elder Turner, with whom I used to be acquainted.

I want Elder E. V. White to know that I rejoiced very much in reading his communication on the subject of predestination.

I remain your unworthy brother in Christ, I hope,

J. R. CRISWELL.

[In the following extract from a private letter our readers will readily recognize the power of God directing a chosen vessel of his mercy to find his spiritual kindred. No argument can so clearly vindicate the superiority of the way of our God over all human devices as the simple statement of the way in which he brings the blind by a way which they knew not. Those who find their heart burn with love and fellowship for the pilgrim stranger, therein read the assurance that they are born of the same Spirit which they recognize in him. He will be thankful to receive letters from any lover of truth who may desire to correspond with him. Address Donald McKay, Scotsville, Lake Anslie, Cape Britain, N. S.—ED.]

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., July 19, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Some time ago I received a letter from a Donald McKay, employed in a lumber camp up in Pennsylvania, inquiring whether we had a meeting-house here, and when we had preaching. I replied, inviting him to visit us, and shortly afterward he put in an appearance. He was en route for his home in Nova Scotia, from which he had been absent seven years. He remained with us three days, and then resumed his journey. His is a wonderful story of the way God manifests his children.

About seven years ago he left his home in Nova Scotia, came to this country, and in a short time found himself working in lumber camps in the Rocky Mountains. In trading reading matter in the camp he became possessed of a copy of the SIGNS, and through it first learned of such a people as Old School Baptists. He had been reared among Scotch Presbyterians, but had never felt at home nor happy with them; and his heart warmed with the doctrine set forth in the SIGNS. In all his wanderings he preserved that copy till he again reached civilization, three years later; then he subscribed for it, and also the "Editorials." He returned to lumbering, and now was on his way home again. He is an elderly man, illiterate, of poor address and speech (Gaelic being his tongue), but he spoke a pure language which the saints of God all understand.

After coming into my office, and introducing himself, he sat down, and proceeded to stare me out of countenance. I laughingly asked him if he were sure to know me again; and not knowing anything of his story then, I was amazed at his reply. "Yes," he said, "you are the first one I ever met whom I was sure was an Old School Baptist, whom I have been longing to meet for seven long years. No, I'll never forget you." If I ever felt a sense of unworthiness in my life I felt it most then; and when he told me his story I was deeply affected. I did not ask him if he had a hope; I knew it. There was sufficient evidence to me that he had passed from death unto life in the fact of his having traveled hundreds of miles out of his way to meet those whom he was persuaded loved the truth as he did. All the preaching he had ever had was through the SIGNS; is wonderfully well read in Scripture, and was, O! so hungry for preaching! He plied me with questions all day and every night till the small hours of the morning; and when he left he said, he had not asked the half he had been storing in his mind for years against this time. Such hunger and thirst for the truth I never before witnessed. I tell you, brother, I am sick at heart. No such hunger and thirst for the truth has ever afflicted me. It is a question with me much of the time, Am I ever ahungered?

In saying farewell, tears filled his eyes as he tried to tell me how much he loved us all, and how happy he would be if he but had a name with us; but it was not to be, he said, and he felt it was just, for he felt not fit to be named with the dear people of God. Where he lives in Nova Scotia, there are no Old Baptists; and he is going into a hot-bed of Scotch Presbyterianism. If you know anything of that order, you know how narrow they are, and how they persecute those who do not believe as they do. Somehow, I do not fear for his stability; I feel confident that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has so wonderfully worked in him his will, will keep him in obedience.

Remember us in love to all your family, and believe me your very unworthy brother, I hope, in the sufferings of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

It frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—June 5th, 1892, at the residence of Mr. David Heyd, near State Road, Isaac G. Frazier, in the 36th year of his age.

Mr. Frazier was the brother of sister Heyd, and the son of sister Ann Frazier, of Cow Marsh. The deceased showed a mental weakness before he was hardly grown, and had to be cared for, gradually failing in bodily health until the last. It was of course a serious affliction, and caused sadness and gloom over a large and interesting family, consisting of the widowed mother and a number of brothers and sisters. He was taken on the 7th to Cow Marsh, to repose in the family lot, where the father and one brother have gone before, in the cemetery in connection with the Cow Marsh meeting-house. "Come, and let us return unto the Lord; for he hath torn, and he will heal us: he hath smitten, and he will bind us up."

E. RITTENHOUSE.

STATE ROAD, Del.

OUR dear son, Wm. H. McDonald, departed this life March 29th, 1892, aged 41 years and five months.

His disease was inflammatory rheumatism. He was confined in sore pain for six weeks, and then fell asleep. He was born in Wilcox Co., Ala., came to this state when young, and was married to Elizabeth Dealman, with whom he lived five years, when she died. In 1880 he was married to Fannie Nettles, who died in March, 1891. One year and five days later he was called away, leaving six children, two by his first wife and four by his last. He was a man of noble qualities, always ready to help in time of need. He was not a member of any church, but he gave a reason of his hope before he died. We believe that our loss is his gain.

"Peaceful be thy silent slumber, Lying in the grave so low;
Thou no more wilt join our number,
Thou no more wilt sorrow know.

"Yet again we hope to meet thee,
When the day of life is fled;
Then in heaven with joy we'll greet thee,
Where no farewell tear is shed."

MARY E. McDONALD.

CAMDEN, Ark.

SISTER Mary McGeehon died March 16th, 1892, after being sick two months, first with partial paralysis, and then diabetes.

Her maiden name was Mary Austin. She was born in Tennessee, Feb. 13th, 1818, moved to Effingham County in 1828, and lived in the same township until the spirit left her body. She was baptized by Elder Hood in 1851, and lived a christian life, faithful in meeting with the members at their monthly meetings, being one of the faithful singers. Her delight was to talk with the lovers of the truth about her Redeemer, of his mercy and goodness to her in bringing her from darkness into the light of the Son of God, to whom she said all the praise, honor and glory belonged, as she had no righteousness of her own. She lived a worthy member until she was called home. She was a loving wife, a good neighbor, and a precious member of the Old School Baptist Church.

She leaves two children (eight having died), seven grandchildren, and some great-grandchildren. May the Lord bless her aged companion with heavenly blessings in his lonely hours.

A FRIEND.

EFFINGHAM CO., Ill.

Nathan Walters departed this life Dec. 18th, 1891, at his home in Adair Co., Mo., where he was born and raised, and lived all his life, except a year or two that he was in Montana.

Brother Walters united with the Spring Creek Church in May, 1868, and was baptized in June following by Elder John Collins. He was always contending for the Old Baptist doctrine, which is the true teaching of the Bible. He was elected church Clerk, and served us until his death. In May, 1889, he was granted license to exercise his gift in public wherever his lot might be cast. He was well-versed in the Scriptures, was an active business man, and was liked by all his Baptist brethren who knew him. He was firm in the doctrine of salvation by grace alone.

Brother Walters was born Dec. 12th, 1845, and was married Jan. 10th, 1864, to Nancy Ann Bish. He was buried in the grave-yard where many of his friends and relatives had been buried. He leaves many friends and relatives to mourn their loss, but we have reason to believe that our loss is his eternal gain.

Written by request of the Spring Creek Church.

CHARLES POWEL, Clerk.

DIED—At her earthly home in West Lodi, Seneca Co., Ohio, Oct. 25th, 1887, Lucinda Tompkins Bolin, second daughter of Isaac and Christenah Tompkins, and wife of James Bolin.

She was born July 4th, 1840, and all of the 47 years, 3 months and 21 days of her sojourn here she lived within a mile of where she died. She left a kind husband, daughter and son, and in each remaining heart there is a wound which time cannot heal. Hers was a delicate, sensitive nature, and from childhood much sickness was her lot; yet she bore it all patiently, ever preferring to minister to the wants of others than to be ministered unto. Her death was caused by cancerous tumor. During the eight weeks she lay in bed, wasting away from inability to partake of food, her sufferings were severe; yet she complained not, for her trust was in that God who is too wise to err, too good to be unkind, and who doeth all things well. Her mission was ever one of peace, and her loving christian life was worthy of imitation. She and her four sisters had good voices, and father, who sometimes taught music, taught them to sing sacred music. Many were the delightful hours for years spent together in singing. Later, with more than earthly joy manifest in his countenance, and saying to us, "I am dying happy," father went to the realms of glory; and mother, who so often longs to join in the songs of praise here, in the paradise of God will be given a voice of song, and be permitted to sing praises evermore to the great King.

IRA H. TOMPKINS.

TIFFIN, Ohio.

Eleanor L. Mayhew departed this life July 11th, 1892, in her 86th year.

Sister Mayhew was widely known and greatly loved among the Old School Baptists in the eastern associations. She had lived in Philadelphia, Pa., all the days of her natural life. When she was about eighteen or nineteen years of age she was baptized in the fellowship of the Second

Baptist Church of Philadelphia by Elder Kitts, and has been ever since a worthy, consistent and zealous member. During the sixty-seven or sixty-eight years of her membership the church has passed through two divisions. After the first it became the Mt. Tabor, and after the second the Salem. Whether in the dark or sunshine days of the church, sister Mayhew always stood firm with those who defended the truth and maintained the honor of the cause of Jesus. Her whole christian life was a sweet and clear manifestation of the work of grace in the heart. Her natural faculties of mind had waxed dim in her declining years, but her hope remained vivid to the last. She passed away quietly and unconsciously. Thus has another of our little band realized the joys of eternity.

B. F. COULTER.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

William Young and Harriet Young his wife have departed this mortal life.

Harriet died July 21st, 1889. She was the daughter of Edward Dewese; was born in Grayson Co., Ky., Dec. 19th, 1830; was married to Wm. Young Nov. 25th, 1851; was a faithful and loving wife and mother. Nine children were born to them, all of whom, except one daughter, were left to mourn their loss. Her illness was of long duration, having cancer of the stomach. Her sufferings were intense, which she bore with christian patience. She was a member of the Regular Baptist Church at Pine Knob, Grayson Co., Ky. She and her husband offered themselves to the church at the same time, were received, and the ordinance of baptism was administered by Elder W. B. McGrew. They lived faithful and loving members of that church until called from time. She left an example worthy to be followed by all.

Wm. Young was born Feb. 28th, 1823, in Grayson Co., Ky., and spent his days there, dying Jan. 25th, 1892. He was taken with "La Grippe," and some days later with lung fever, from which he suffered severely for seven or eight days; but he bore it with as much fortitude and christian patience as I ever witnessed. He was furnished with all the human aid possible, and his kind children seemed ready to administer to every demand with cheerfulness. He was a kind father and a good neighbor, and a leading citizen of our country. He manifested a special interest in the cause of Christ, and faithfulness to the church to which he belonged, administering to the church in defraying expenses. His departure is much mourned by all the brethren; but we feel to say, The Lord's will be done.

Their remains were followed by many mourning friends to their resting place, and laid side by side, to await the great day when the saints shall be all gathered home to part no more. They have been honored with a monument, on which is inscribed, "A kind, affectionate wife; a fond mother to all."

"Another link is broken in our band;
Another chain is forming in a better land."

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

BEAUTIFUL TREASURES.

Joyously count I the treasures untold
Of graces and mercies more precious than gold;
Hopefully cherish each gift from above,
As tokens evincing God's beautiful love.
Astonished, I wonder how deep it must be,
That prompted the giving such treasures to me.

Treasures of mercies unmeasured and free
Find I all treasured in Jesus for me.
In his compassion he suffered and died,
And in full justice his pardon applied.
Beautiful grace must have prompted the love,
Bringing him thus from his glory above.

O what a treasure in Jesus is given,
His righteousness here and the treasures of heaven;
Treasures of care in this wilderness world, While amidst tempests and darkness I'm hurled.
Beautiful light in the darkness I see,
Brief as the flash of his lightnings may be.

Beautiful providence chases the gloom,
Swiftly away from my desolate room,
If but a glimpse of my Savior I see, Wafting his storm-guiding hand unto me;
Sweetly I cherish earth's sorrows and woes,
As blessings disguised in the raiment of foes.

Oft as I range in the regions of sin, Fightings without and corruptions within,
'Tis by the contrast he maketh me see
The beautiful treasures he's given to me;
And in my weakness his blessings I share,
Sweetly to lighten the burdens I bear.

While through the valley of vision I press,
Sorely afflicted with pain and distress,
Kindly he whispers his solace to me,
Binding his beautiful promises free;
Hallowing even the terrors of death—
Beautiful message, recalling my breath.

Beautiful hopes overreaching the tomb!
Garlands of beauty enliven its gloom, Since Jesus hath risen and opened the way
That only remains through the beautiful clay,
Where saints may unrobe their mortality
there,
And rise in his likeness, his glory to share.

Beautiful songs, in that radiant land,
The ransomed are chanting on every hand.
Sweet harmonies gladden the rapturous throne,
While angels melodious pleasures prolong;
And heaven re-echoes the wonderful praise
That gladdens each spirit unmeasured by days.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., July 11, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—My love goes out to the brethren sometimes in a special way. Special, because it gives me a desire to write to them. Special, because the goodness, long-forbearance and tender mercy of the Lord is so richly manifested toward me that I feel I must tell it, not only to one, but to all whom I love for Jesus' sake. There is an especial sweetness and pleasure which fills my soul as my pen is guided by the spirit of love to testify before all the brethren how wonderful and precious is the love of Jesus to helpless and undone sinners. At other times, when the gracious Redeemer removes from my view the dark clouds of doubt and despair, presenting a cloudless, realistic vision of his transcendent loveliness, my mind goes out to some one of the precious brethren, to whom I am constrained to write. If I could feel that my writings, either in a public or private way, were not instigated by a desire for vainglory, I could write with an easier mind; for I am conscious that the children of God are thoroughly prepared at all times to detect that which cometh from a heavenly source, and also to reject that which is spurious and of fleshly origin. I know that my own natural mind is slow to detect error when the truth is closely counter-feited; but the Spirit of truth, which controls the mind that serves the law of God, cannot be deceived. The true light makes manifest all things, even the hidden mysteries of the gospel. Jesus said there is nothing hid which shall not be manifested, neither anything kept secret but that it shall come abroad. Jesus is the true light. He is the Word, which was in the beginning, was with God, and was God. He is the life, and the life is our light. He also is the truth. When the Spirit of truth, as a bright and shining light, illumines our soul, it is "as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even to the west." It makes manifest the secrets of the darkness. It has a separating power. It separates the chaff from the wheat, and the sheep from the goats. The powers of darkness flee before its life-giving power, by which an impassable gulf is fixed, separating the precious from the vile. "Unto the pure all things are pure; but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure;
but even the mind and conscience is defiled." In my own exercises of mind I find myself mostly upon the side of defilement. In the whole scope of my reasoning powers I am surrounded by an atmosphere of corruption. As in the experience of Job, "I am a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls." The stain of sin rests upon all that I have touched. Thorns and thistles grow up in my pathway; the roses and lilies are blighted and droop for very shame. "When I looked for good, then evil came unto me; and when I waited for light, there came darkness." My soul longed for the sweet waters of peace and contentment. I look for help whence no help cometh, because I look not aright. My face is turned away from the Rock from whence all my help cometh. I am seeking strength out of an evil and proud heart. I find it not, for my own leading is unto death. My mind is filled with unbelief, while with my flesh I serve the law of sin. My conscience is marred and blackened with promises unfulfilled, and defiled by evil emanations of the flesh.

The things that I would not, those I do. I travel in a weary and thirsty land, until by reason of exhaustion
I faint by the wayside. I have come to the end of all my creature strength, and my self-righteousness has proved unavailing to meet my ends; which dreadful state proves my soul's salvation. For right there in the bottoms of the mountains, in the belly of hell, prostrate and bleeding, I reach the everlasting arms. Jesus speaks, and my eyes are opened.
He had been with me all along my troubled journey, but I knew it not;
and although my heart burned within me as he talked with me by the way,
I did not know him. But now that Jesus has spoken all is changed—gloriously changed. Before I walked according to reason, in the defilement of my fleshly lust; now faith takes me by the hand, and my pure mind is exercised. "To the pure all things are pure." With the eye of faith I behold Jerusalem, my chiefest joy.
I can see that everything that hath breath is praising the Lord. I realize how the blood of Jesus hath washed away all mine iniquity, and made me clean and white and pure; not because I merited it, but because he loved me with an everlasting love.
This is why my heart goes out to you, my brethren, because (by faith)
I see you (the redeemed of the Lord) clothed in the spotless robe of Christ's righteousness, made pure as God is pure, holy as he is holy. How truly wonderful is this! I want that we should rejoice together, and in our rejoicing honor and praise him who hath made us meet to be partakers of the glorious inheritance of the saints, which is the power of an endless life, a glory that is above the brightness of the noonday sun, eclipsing in its regal splendor the glory of all created things. I become confused and tremble when I try to think how we obtain a knowledge of this wondrous mystery, for my finite mind cannot comprehend the power of faith. "The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not." Only by faith can I look into my brother's heart, and there behold the beauty of the Lord. When I am cold and barren and listless, I often envy my brother who manifests a sacred nearness to God, being embraced in his tender, compassionate love. Not that I want to see him enjoy it less, but I want to be just where he is.

Two years ago I met with a dear young brother at the Warwick Association, who with his wife had been baptized perhaps a year before, whose earthly home was isolated from all the brethren, and who had not heard preaching since the time of his baptism. It was with both interest and pleasure that I looked upon him, and my love went out to him. It was with intense eagerness that he listened to every word that was spoken of his gracious Master; and when either in preaching or in conversation Jesus' name was exalted his face would light up with keenest pleasure and joy. It was the most realistic exhibition of the love of God being shed abroad in the heart of a subject of his grace that I have probably ever witnessed. I again met him at the same association this year. For the two years past he had (I think) heard no preaching, and I was rejoiced to see the same manifestation of the power of God's love; still eager and intent to catch every word that was spoken, that he might be edified and instructed in the things of Jesus, and to know more and more of him, who is his life and his salvation. My own coldness and indifference is in such contrast to the dear brother's warmth and vitality that truly I wonder how I can claim the sweet relationship which exists only in those who not only possess, but also manifest, the spirit of life and light and understanding; yet I am encouraged when I look upon the individual members of Christ's body and find they do not all manifest the work of the Spirit within them alike, each individual character exhibiting in its own peculiar way and manner the things by which it is exercised. This is particularly set forth in the life and actions of the twelve chosen followers of Jesus. While they were all true disciples, and all followed Jesus, who had called them from their various occupations, yet each one manifested his love to his Master in his own individual manner. Peter was impetuous, bold, and strikingly zealous; John mild-tempered and loving; Thomas full of doubts; Judas Iscariot covetous and treacherous; and so each one (all following literally alike) presented his individuality, which the others could not understand because of their own. It is not by external evidence alone that we have fellowship one for another. One may be naturally cold (as myself), and hide from external view (to a great extent) the fire that burns within. Another, naturally warm, may exhibit upon the surface the life and light by which he is exalted. It is the divine life that is the source and foundation of fellowship; that secret, unseen principle of power wherein, "when saint meets saint," "deep calleth unto deep," and each is drawn to the other by invisible cords and unuttered strains of God's sweet love. This is a secret companionship which none can join by their own volition; for it is the operation of the Spirit of grace, the power of God, which worketh unto eternal life in all whom the Father hath chosen in his well-beloved Son before the world was. Then how truly does this spirit of light and truth cause its subject to abase the creature and exalt the Creator. I will quote from a precious letter written to me lately by a dear sister: "Each in God's time is made to know that that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. They also learn by experience that a holy desire must originate with a holy God. He is the author of the desire, and implants it in the heart of his child. Then you hear the child make known the same in prayer and supplication to the God of his salvation. This prayer is also the work of our God, and will always be found in harmony with the will and purpose of our heavenly Father." This is why the creature is always abased in the prayer of God's children, and the Lord is exalted. We often hear from the lips of the saints, especially the aged ones, such expressions as this, "I have had many ups and downs." A homely expression it appears on the surface, but what a world of meaning and beauty to him who also reads it out of the pages of his own experience. Discouragements and encouragements (ups and downs) are the heritage of the saints. Discouragements are the superstructure, and indeed comprise all the materials of the building in which are stored the evidences of our hope in Christ, God's grace and mercy being the foundation; while the encouragements are the glad songs of heavenly music which permeate all our being, ascending in praise to God, while we are in heavenly places in Christ Jesus; all of which make up the christian warfare and experience.

Were I asked, dear brethren, why I have written so disconnected a letter as this to you, I could not tell; and were I further asked upon what foundation did I build so many words, I could only say that I sat down with a desire in my heart to express my love for the brethren, and something of the love of God to usward; and as my mind ran, so ran my pen.

Affectionately your brother in the christian warfare,

B. F. COULTER.

WOOLFORD, Md., July 22, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Inclosed you will find two letters; one from Elder George W. Staton to my dear father; the other from Elder Joseph L. Staton. He was quite sick on Sunday morning, not able to leave his room. He was better on Monday, and left for home. It was a disappointment to him and to us that he did not preach for us; but it was a pleasure to have him with us. We miss him, but trust that Israel's God, who never slumbers nor sleeps, will be our keeper. Do as you think best with the letters.

SUSIE L. WOOLFORD.

BERLIN, Md., Dec. 6, 1892.

DEAR BROTHER WOOLFORD:—I promised you or sister Sallie, I do not remember which, when I was at your house, to write to you. I now take my seat to redeem my promise. I arrived home on Tuesday and found my family all well. I have been getting along pretty much as usual. I was sorry you did not get over to Indiantown to our meeting. We had a pleasant interview with Elders Trott, Harding, Rittenhouse and Cox, and brethren and sisters from surrounding churches. Sister Waters was baptized, and according to the previous arrangement your poor, weak and ignorant brother was ordained to the work of the gospel ministry. My prayer to my heavenly Father was, after the arrangement had been made, that if it was his work he would permit it to go on; but if not, in some way of his own choosing to prevent it. I had not heard a word from any of the brethren in regard to it since I parted with them at the association; and I think had it been the Lord's will to prevent them from assembling for that purpose I should from my heart have said, "Thy will be done." I did feel, and yet feel, my dear brother, that surely ordination was never conferred by the church on one so unworthy, and in every way so disqualified for such a work; and I now tremble at the responsibility which the brethren have laid upon me, a poor, ignorant, sinful worm of the dust. I am not worthy of the lowest place in the church of Christ, much less to administer the ordinances of God's house, and to preach his eternal truth. O the goodness and mercy of our God! How wonderful is his work, and his ways past finding out! I am still trying to preach, for I find I cannot quit it if I would; for notwithstanding the many dark days, trials and temptations I have to pass through in trying to preach the word, whenever I have thought of stopping I have found my darkness increasing, doubts of my own election seeming to increase, and the blessed Jesus seeming to be hiding himself from me. Such horror of horrors seemed to be getting hold of me that I was glad to get a chance to try to preach again. Necessity seemed to be laid upon me, and I was compelled to say, "Woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel." Under these teachings I am constrained to open my mouth and trust him to fill it; and I know he can, if it is his will, speak through even such a poor instrument as I am, to the comfort and edification of his people; and the weaker the instrument, the more reason why God should have all the glory. I am often brought to feel that I am less than nothing, and that surely the Lord never made a preacher out of such poor material. But his ways are not my ways, and I know he knows what is best for me, and what is most to his glory. I try to give myself up entirely into his hands, and say, Lord, do with me whatsoever thou wilt. O what a blessed state of mind, to be able to throw ourselves entirely into the hands of our Lord and Master, and trust entirely to his guidance and direction in all things. In doing this we rid ourselves of all trouble, and all care, and all disappointments, and all sorrows in life, and are then only doing what he has commanded us to do. Could we always do this, my dear brother, all would be fair sailing, and O how happy we would be. But we will be trying to map out our own course, to lay out our own work, without submitting our plans in all cases to him, and trusting him to lead us in the path of duty. This old man of ours is Arminian to the core, and will be trying to do something to help the Lord on in his great work of providence as well as grace. Notwithstanding he graciously imparts to us his grace, and hedges us up so with his providence, and teaches us by our disappointments to trust him, and that he will take care of us, we cannot quite subdue this old Arminian within us. But the time is coming, my brother, and is not far off with any of us, when we shall lay this old man down in the grave. Then that which Christ has implanted in us here, and which is sometimes almost hidden by this crooked old man, will be without restraint. Then we shall see as we are seen, and know as we are known.

Let us quietly wait all our appointed time till our change come. While we abide in the flesh may we give ourselves up to the direction of our dear Redeemer. I often think of the pleasant visit I had at your house. May the Lord reward you all for your kindness. Give my christian love to sister Sallie, and tell her she must answer this for you; also my love to sister Woolford, and all your children. Salute them all by name, with all who love our dear Redeemer everywhere. May you all be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.

Your brother in Christ,

G. W. STATON.

PORTER'S STATION, Del.

DEAR SISTER SUSIE:—I missed the connection here at Porter's Station, and have to wait several hours for a train, and feel like spending part of the time in writing. I wish I could tell you and all the dear friends how much I appreciate your kindness. The good Master is always mindful of me, although I must at times, with all others, suffer affliction; yet there are always kind friends to alleviate in measure my sufferings. I trust it is in my poor heart to duly appreciate these blessings, and to be thankful to the great Giver of all good; for such favors and blessings always come from him, though they may be indirect. Now that I am on the way home, my mind is directed to the next appointment at Fishing Creek. If in the providence of God it should come, it will likely be on the day, according to our calendar, that our Savior was said to be born. Hence it is called "Christmas Day." There was a day, no doubt, when he was born of the virgin Mary, and, like us, was born unto suffering; only his suffering was "the just for the unjust." He was "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners;" "yet learned he obedience by the things that he suffered." True obedience always has been, and always will be, through suffering. They that suffer most are most obedient. He was obedient even unto death. When he arose from the dead he justified all those that ever, either before or after, have had fellowship with his sufferings. Hence there have been many "Christmas" days known and felt experimentally by the many for whom he died. That day on which a Savior is born to those who were chosen in him, is not to be counted as we count the days, months and years, but is sometimes even in the night time. He yet has power upon the earth to quicken whom he will, by that same life-power that raised him from the dead. When he speaks, his words are spirit, and they are life. Christ is born in the poor soul the hope of glory. As he was born once into the world, so spiritually and experimentally is he born in every child of his, and in their measure must every one of them know and feel for themselves what he suffered for them. The day is to be remembered indeed by those who have thus come to feel and know what the day means. No doubt the day that is counted in our calendar is enjoyed by many, very many, who know nothing of the birth of the Savior, nor anything of the power of his resurrection from the dead. But unto us a child is born, a son is given, and we rejoice to believe that the government of all things is upon his shoulder; for he is able to bear them, and us with them. But alas! to our sorrow many times in our pilgrimage we presume to attempt to have something to do with the government of things that belong alone to him. We set up our poor, weak, erring judgment as to what is right and wrong; and if the good Lord would suffer it, we would directly bring upon ourselves our own destruction; but he does not suffer it. He predestinates, and we are compelled to submit, for our own good and his glory. All the wrath of man that is not in some way to his praise he restrains. Where he begins the good work he performs it until the day of Jesus Christ. He performs in such a way as to watch over every intervening circumstance. He never slumbers nor sleeps. Whilst we are unconscious of a being, his ever-watchful eye is over us. Not even a sparrow can fall without our heavenly Father; and we are said to be of more value than many sparrows. We are, too, if we were bought with the price. O how we can rejoice to know that the salvation of God's people, nor the government and final destruction of the wicked, do not in any way depend upon the performance of the creature; but God directs all in wisdom, even though it may be by leaving us to our own wicked devices for a time, that we may learn something of the exceeding sinfulness of sin. Thank God, we always learn to our sorrow.

I have written more, perhaps, than will be interesting to you, or in any way to your edification; but I hope you can receive it as a token of my kind remembrance of you all in love.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.—I am at home, and feeling some better. I think I shall be well again in a few days. I hope you are enjoying the great blessing of good health. It is a great blessing indeed to be able to enjoy the things of this world; but it depends upon the preparation of ourselves to enjoy either temporal or spiritual things. The blessings will always prove to be such if we are prepared to receive them with thanksgiving.

Your unworthy brother,
JOSEPH L. STATON.

ELDER S. H. DURAND—DEAR BROTHER IN CHRIST:—According to promise I will write to you, and give you a sketch of the life of our

dear boy, Jerome. He was naturally an obedient, kind and loving child from his early life. About five years back, when he was twelve years old, he had a beautiful dream. He dreamed that the world had come to an end. As he stood and looked the sun had refused to shine, the moon was turned into blood, and the streams of blood reached to the earth. Darkness came over him, he could not see anything, and he thought he was lost. As he stood in great distress he looked toward the skies and saw an opening in the heavens, and a light coming until it came to this opening. To his great joy it was his Savior. He wore a beautiful crown, and was brighter than the sun. He could not look upon him, he shone so brightly. He made the twigs on the trees shine like gold. He came with outstretched arms and smiled on him, and he was very happy. He then heard sweet music, and was told it was Gabriel's trumpet. He was very much troubled on account of his dream. About that time he saw himself a sinner, and would often say, "I am such a bad boy. I would love to be a good boy, but I do not know how." I encouraged him that Christ came into the world to save sinners. He said, "I am too little for this to be the work of the Lord." Then I referred him to dear Elder Wm. Beebe, for whom he had great esteem, and who was young when he received a hope. From that time on he grew very fond of the Old Baptists. He loved to hear them talk and contend for the doctrine of the Bible. He loved to hear God exalted and given all the glory. He had a Testament which he carried in his pocket, and I would often find him reading it; and he marked many passages which we suppose he loved to read. Often he would leave his young associates and come in if there were any Old Baptists here, or if we were talking; and he would often talk with us of the wonderful works of the Lord. Two years ago this summer, at our association at Frying Pan, he sat on the floor of the stand at the ministers' feet; and he told during his last illness how he enjoyed hearing them preach, and particularly Elder Purington's sermon, when he used the words, "Entreat me not to leave thee." He did not want to go to the meetings of other denominations, nor to their Sunday Schools, but loved to go to Old Baptist meetings when he could. He would often say, "I believe they are the Lord's people, they love one another so much." I asked him once if he had a desire to be with those people, and he answered, "I am so young; they would not receive me." In his last sickness (for he had several spells of sickness when he was very low), when he had been sick about a month, he was made willing to die, but did not tell me then, because he feared it would trouble me. In all sicknesses before he said he never was made willing to die, but now thought, if it were the Lord's will, it would be best to take him at any time. Then he said, "If I were fit to die, or if I knew that I were going to heaven; but then I would have no hope, for hope that is seen is not hope." Once when brother White was here he talked very nicely to him of the power and wisdom of God. He said, "A God that can measure the earth with a span, and hold the waters in the hollow of his hand, can hold it or dash it away." He spoke of the preacher as an earthen vessel. He said, "It is like I being thirsty, and you bring me an empty glass. That glass does me no good; but bring me a glass filled with water, I drink and am satisfied. So it is with the preacher: if he is filled with the gospel of Christ it is food and drink to my hungry soul." When brother White started he said, "I am glad you came. I forgot all my pains." The next morning he awoke saying these words, "Principalities nor powers, things present nor things to come; there is nothing able to separate us from the love of God." He said, "If the Lord has begun a good work in me he will carry it on till the day of Jesus Christ." Then he quoted, "My Father, which gave them me, is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are one." He would often in the hours of night talk of the goodness and mercy of God. He seemed to have an abiding trust that the Lord was not slack concerning his promises. He seemed to exalt and praise his Maker, and would say, "I do not want to murmur at anything the Lord has put upon me. I want to bear it all." He would often turn and look at dear sister Mary Parker's picture, which hung in the room, and say, "Poor Miss Mary Parker! she suffers so much worse than I do." He would compare his sufferings with the sufferings of Jesus, and say, "Why should I murmur at my light affliction? I never had one pain too many. O how good and how merciful the Lord is to unworthy me. My hope is in his mercy." He asked me one night to read where Joseph was sold into Egypt. I read several chapters, and there seemed to be an opening up in his mind, and he talked beautifully of our spiritual Joseph, saying, "The Lord does all these things. How great and wonderful are his works." When the change came for him to go, the day before he died, he seemed to be caught away. He raised his eyes upward and smiled; and his eyes followed around until they rested on me, and he smiled again. I then said, "Romey, the Lord has shown you more than this world's beauties. You are so happy." He nodded and replied, "Yes, indeed." I said, "I rejoice with you; my cup runneth over." He laughed, and looked as if he would raise up his little body. He wore this lovely countenance for some time. The night before he died we were sitting by his bed. He tried to reconcile us to his death. He said, "It would be best for me to die; I find no rest here." I answered, "It would be a dark world to us without our boy." He turned his head, and in a most pitiful tone prayed, "Lord, have mercy." I said, "The Lord has had mercy on you." He replied, "Yes, indeed." I told him he would still have mercy, for he says that he will turn none empty away. "Romey, that prayer would be good uttered for me, though I know there is a prayer in your little heart for your mamma." He said, "Yes, indeed," and turned his eyes to his papa, as if to say for him also. Then he said, "O if this little body could be laid down in peaceful rest." Twice in the night he said, "Mamma, it will not be much longer." When the sun rose in the morning I said to him, "Romey, it is a lovely morning. See how pretty the sun shines in the window." He looked disappointed, and said, "I thought I would have died last night." About six o'clock in the evening of May first he called for his papa to raise him up, so that I could fix his pillows. When this was done he said, "Now let me rest." He then said, "My head aches," and turned his face toward us, fixing his hands as he always went to sleep, and without a frown or struggle he breathed out his sweet life. He truly did fall asleep in Jesus. I had prayed all through his sickness that he might fall asleep, for I did not feel like I could see him enter death. We always expect to mourn his absence while in this vale of sorrow. We desire to be reconciled to the will of God, but our little home is sad without him. We miss his good night kiss, his tender greetings, and his cheerful smiles and affectionate words to cheer us. In all this affliction how many things there are to be thankful for. How good and tenderly the Lord has led us, poor, unworthy worms.

Dear brother, I have written this in a rambling way. Do as you think best with it, and all will be right. We join in much love to you and yours, and hope you may visit us again not far distant.

Yours in tribulation,
M. D. OLIVER.

DEAR BROTHERN BEEBE:—It seems to be my lot to fulfill the request of our highly esteemed friend, Mrs. Mary M. Morgan, daughter of brother Jesse C. Line, of Shelby Co., this state, to inform their many friends who read the SIGNS OF THE TIMES of their sad calamity of a destructive whirlwind on the 13th inst. She writes me that they are "still living, but feeling a great deal the worse over that awful whirlwind we had last Wednesday. It killed our best horse, and destroyed nearly all our wheat and corn. Our oats are not hurt much. It tore our milk-house and the old barn all to pieces, and father's corn-crib, wood-house

FALLEN ANGELS.

IN her letter on page 222, current volume of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, sister Fannie J. Allen, of Luella, Arkansas, expresses a desire for our understanding of the texts which are commonly relied upon as authority for the popular belief that there are angels now raging against God, whose original state was in the heaven of glory. The passages cited are 2 Peter ii. 4, and Jude 6. In order to give a color of consistency to their inference from these texts, the learned teachers of the world have concluded that the apostles referred to some portion of inspired truth which has been lost. Certainly there is nothing in the Bible which can be distorted to signify any such God-dishonoring event as is said to have occurred in the heaven of the divine presence, when the holy angels rebelled against the commandment of their Creator, and waged war against him who gave them being. Like all other doctrines and commandments of men, this false theory is based upon the assumption that the Creator of the universe is altogether such an one as the finite creatures of his power. In thus representing their imaginary god, all such false teachers confess that they are included among those of whom Moses says, "For their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges."—Deut. xxxii. 31. It is wonderful that none of the wise men of the world have ever been able to conceive a thought of the true God in his sovereignty and infinite wisdom. In their imaginations they never think of the God of heaven as above their most exalted conception of holiness and purity. Hence, in all their religious doctrines they hold their gods accountable to the standard of their limited judgment. They can determine what is right for their gods to do; and feel no hesitancy in denouncing them as unjust if they do not conform to standards which men have set up. Those who have seen themselves justly condemned sinners, and who reverence the divine perfection of holiness, have no desire to judge the God of the whole earth. They know what he does is righteous, because he is the source of all righteousness, and there is no higher standard by which his works may be tested. He is just if it is his will to create nothing but the angels of glory. He is equally just in creating the material worlds with all their inhabitants. His glorious holiness is revealed in the gospel of his grace; in which he is pleased to show his people cleansed from all sin in the blood of Jesus, and made holy and without blame before him in love. While reason cannot grasp the mystery of godliness, it is revealed to the saints by that faith which is the fruit of the Spirit; and in this revelation they know that "He is the Rock, his work is perfect; for all his ways are judgment; a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he."—Deut. xxxii. 4. When this divine truth is known by any subject of salvation, he necessarily sees himself as vile and unclean, so that instead of presuming to enter into judgment with the Lord, his prayer is to God for mercy and the blotting out of his own sins. With reverential love and sacred awe, he then sees that God is just in forming the crooked and piercing serpent as well as in giving the downy wings to the dove. He will not then deny the goodness of God in creating evil as well as in making peace. The natural mind is incapable of judging what is abstractly good and what is intrinsically evil. Even the saints are often mistaken in regard to their own experience in this matter. The fulfillment of the promise given to Abraham was through such gloomy providences that only by the living power of faith could he believe God. So reason assured Jacob that the dreams of Joseph could never be fulfilled; but those very discouraging events which tried the faith of the patriarchs were the footsteps of the Lord by which he came to fulfill the promise of his grace. In all the record given in the Scriptures it is demonstrated that "The just shall live by faith."

"For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment." In construing any uninspired record men would not distort the plain statements written as they do the inspired testimony of Jesus. From the preceding context it is clear that the subject of which our text is a portion is the superiority of that word which was attested by the authority of God the Father, as compared with the word written by the prophets. While they spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, they could only testify to the glory which should be revealed in the coming of the Son of God. The light of the Sun of righteousness not only showed the fulfillment of all prophecy in the establishment of the gospel kingdom of Christ, but it demonstrated beyond question that all prophecy and all the providential government of God bear witness that Jesus is the great Truth of God, for whom and by whom all things were brought into existence. This is the essential use for which God created the material universe, and for which time itself was ordained of God. Reason cannot understand that the eternal purpose of his grace made all things for the development of that great love wherewith he loved his people, and gave them grace in Christ Jesus before the world began. Much less can reason comprehend the mystery of that eternal life in which the saints are one with their gracious Redeemer. There can never be any understanding of this mystery by reason, even in the saints to whom it is revealed by faith. No other reason is assigned for this concealment of divine truth from the wise and prudent, but as our Lord said, "Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight." Let those who fear not God deny his right to do his will; the conscious sinner whose only hope is in that sovereign grace, will rejoice that "The Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

In continuing the demonstration of the glory of Jesus as the Son of God, which is the theme of the preceding chapter, Peter speaks of the false prophets who were under the typical dispensation, and then declares that there shall in like manner be false teachers among those to whom he writes; for all that is recorded of that legal dispensation has its substance in the gospel church. Those false prophets were not of the nations surrounding Israel, but among themselves and of the favored tribes those idolatrous and presumptuous guides were found who sought to lead the people away from their allegiance to the God who had chosen them unto himself. The vengeance of God was visited upon those false prophets with fearful severity. They were cast down to hell in the confusion and shame which was poured upon them. This was exemplified in the case of the sons of Korah, and many other opposers of that truth which the Lord spoke by his chosen servants. All those false prophets were delivered into chains of darkness. Consider for a moment what heavy chains they were under. If they had been merely bound by chains of iron, there might have been a possibility that some pitying hand might break their fetters. But under those chains of darkness they were not only beyond the reach of help from any created power, but they were not able to see the heavy links which confined them. They could not even desire release. Such are the dreadful chains under which false teachers among the saints are reserved in that swift destruction which they bring upon themselves in their pernicious ways. It is one of the most fearful elements of their destruction that their eyes are so effectually blinded as to make them really think they see, while all the light they have is the blackness of darkness forever. Well may the admonition be left on record for the instruction of the saints in all ages and in every place, that every one may tremblingly pray for the preserving care and guidance of that God who is able to keep them from falling under such condemnation, and to present them faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy. Those who know the plague of sin in the secret depths of their own hearts will not feel that the solemn warning of the Spirit is unnecessarily written by Peter. It is well for us to observe closely the whole connection of this text, and in the light of the Spirit examine ourselves whether we be in the faith. This solemn instruction must not be passed over to those who are still in the death of carnal enmity against God. Living Israelites were deluded by those false prophets; so, living subjects of salvation from sin are to be admonished by their example. Peter wrote only to those whom he recognized as beloved brethren, who "have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God and our Savior Jesus Christ." So Paul warned the elders of Ephesus, "Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them."—Acts xx. 30.

The expression in Jude will be readily seen to allude to the same characters as "the angels which kept not their first estate." There is no more scriptural authority for referring this declaration to any unrecorded rebellion among those hosts of spirits who dwell in glory, than for looking in the heavenly world for the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, which is cited in the same connection. Our sister is correct in the confidence that there never was one of the sinless angels of God who stood condemned before him. The whole obscurity of these passages results from the failure to observe that the scriptural use of the word "angels" more frequently signifies messengers of an earthly nature, than spiritual characters, either heavenly or spirits of evil. This is true also of the angels spoken of in the texts in Revelation to which our sister refers. It is absurd as well as blasphemous to suppose that any opposing will ever existed in the eternal bliss of the presence of God, which is the fullness of heaven as revealed in the saints. Such a possibility would destroy the very existence of an infinite God. If the eternal purpose of God in the creation of one angel has been disappointed by rebellion against his government, how can there be any assurance that his purpose of saving his people from their sins will certainly be accomplished? May not a sinful power forbid the execution of the kind design of eternal love in the future, as easily as sin was introduced into a sinless world, if God did not design that there should be sin in the world? Again, if God designed that the world should be the abode of sinless creatures, and the entrance of sin into the world defeated that design, where did those sinless creatures find an abode after that the earth was cursed for the sake of man? There is no end to the inconsistencies which necessarily result from the notion that the entrance of sin into the world was an event not designed in the eternal purpose of God. If angels in the presence of their holy Creator could originate sin in defiance of his will, what will prevent the saints in ultimate glory from falling before the same irresistible temptation? But there is nothing in the revelation which God has given, from which such a dreadful conclusion could be drawn. The same sovereign will of God which was manifested in choosing the saints in Christ before the foundation of the world, also before of old ordained "certain men" to the condemnation to which they are reserved under chains of darkness. This is the plain statement of inspiration as left for our learning. While we cannot understand why this truth is declared of God, let none of them who love God deny his own testimony on the subject. It has never been required of creatures to vindicate the character of their Creator. The just God claims to himself the glory of being just and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus. He only can justify the ungodly. The godly could need no justification. Without the omnipotent sovereignty of God there can be no salvation for sinners.

When it is understood that "Our God is in the heavens; he hath done whatsoever he hath pleased," there will be no occasion for carnal reason to apply the little standard of finite judgment to those wonderful mysteries which he has hidden in his own infinite light. The laws which determine what is right among men, can have no application to that God who is himself the standard of perfection. He has commanded man, saying, "Thou shalt not kill," but it is not sinful when God sweeps away with a flood all the inhabitants of the earth, only saving his chosen few in the ark. In the judgment of mortals, it may be hard to grasp this principle; but it is nevertheless divine truth. So he is the same just and holy God when he creates the innocent lamb and the harmless dove, as when his hand forms the cruel wolf and hawk. He creates the smith that bringeth forth an instrument for his work; and he also creates the waster to destroy. This is the basis on which he can give comfort to Zion in the promise that no weapon that is formed against her shall prosper, and that every tongue that shall rise against her in judgment she shall condemn.—Isa. liv. 16, 17. Recognizing this infinite perfection of sovereignty in the government of our God, there is no difficulty in accepting the testimony of the apostles and prophets, in which they declare the subjection of wicked men and devils to the righteous purpose of our God in all things. No conflict nor deep affliction comes upon the chosen followers of Jesus, but that which God has appointed for the supreme good of that child who is called to endure it, and for the declarative glory of his grace in giving them the victory, even though it be through the sacrifice of their mortal life. Without the work of wicked men and devils, it is not revealed how the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God could have been fulfilled in the sacrifice of our sinless Redeemer; yet neither are his murderers justified by the predestination of God, nor is God guilty of the awful crime which he determined before to be done. For the execution of his will it was needful that there should be a Herod to decree the murder of the babes of Bethlehem; but that monster of cruelty must be forever the execration of humanity. So, there must be a legion of devils to drown the swine; but they could not do that, until they had confessed their subjection to the authority of Jesus.

The contention of Michael with the devil disputing about the body of Moses, Jude 9, clearly refers to the conflict in which the Captain of our salvation fulfilled the law, and put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. The same wonderful warfare was declared to be accomplished, in the prophecy of Isaiah, and in the twelfth chapter of Revelation. The legal heaven was indeed the scene of that conflict wherein our Redeemer was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities. But in that new heaven wherein dwelleth righteousness, no enemy of our King shall ever be found. There all is truth, purity and love. Not even the light of the created sun is pure enough to illumine the blissful heaven of the gospel kingdom. Much less can any enemy of truth and righteousness, whether visible or invisible, be found within the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High. It is of this new heaven that Ezekiel was inspired to prophesy, saying, "And the name of the city from that day shall be, THE LORD IS THERE." The glory of the typical Jerusalem consisted in the possession of the oracles of God and the covenants of promise; only the shadow of things in the heavens made that dispensation glorious beyond comparison. But there was war in that heaven. In the true heaven of gospel grace there can be no war, because there is nothing there from which war can proceed. The King is the Prince of peace; the people are all righteous; and they are willing to do the commandments of their King. They have unrestrained liberty to walk freely in all the paths of righteousness; and they can never be satisfied until they are released from the bondage of corruption which now forbids them to do the good which they would do. There can be no war in this blessed heaven. There is unceasing war waged against the followers of Jesus, whose dwelling is in this heaven, but it can never disturb their peaceable and quiet habitation in the heaven of trust in the Lord. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee."—Isa. xxvi. 3. In that heaven there is no enemy, consequently there can be no war.

and wagon-shed. Their orchard is all destroyed. Father, Esther and Hy were working in the barn up home. The doors were torn down. Father was in the hay-mow, and started down the ladder, when it was picked up with him on it, carried out into the yard, and whirled around like a top. He alighted on his feet, and is hurt a great deal. I cannot begin to tell you half how bad it is. The neighbors are trying to help us some to buy another horse. They think that father has lost more than one thousand dollars."

Thus in one brief hour the labor of years can be swept away; and it teaches us both the terror of the Lord and the sympathy of friends under the visitations of his providences. Brother Line has passed through severe afflictions before, and seems to be a special mark of divine favor under the strokes, which he esteems as all under the direction and predestination of God. I called on him a few years ago, while he was suffering with his eye, which had been put out by a chip flying into it while chopping. Though suffering greatly, he complained but very little; indeed, so patient was he that neighbors marveled while he told them it was not he, but that the source of his patience was far different from natural man. I delight to dwell on the theme of the afflictions of the righteous; for they show how wonderfully they trust in the living God under all calamities, receiving each stroke as a blessing dispensed by the divine hand. I recall the reply of our deceased brother, Uriah Trumbo, while under the surgeon's treatment of his hand, which had been frightfully torn while adjusting a saw-mill saw. The proprietor thought to taunt him with his faith in God, and said he would not like to think that God sent such upon him. Brother Trumbo replied, "I would rather he would afflict me, than not to think of me at all." A cousin of mine was also so blessed upon her death-bed that she said she had thought she would be afraid to die; "but," said she, "what is there to be afraid of?" She died in the triumphs of faith; as her sister writes, in Old School Baptist faith. A Methodist who witnessed her death said, "She has taught us how to die." Little did he seem to realize how little man's teaching prepares one for death. Nothing but the grace of God can ever prepare us to meet any calamity in true confidential patience. The humble writer cannot feel that he has ever passed through the trials that many others have, but I feel to witness to-day that I have borne more than any cold philosophy can account for; and though I do not wish to parade my selfish sufferings before the brethren to steal their sympathy, yet I often wish the record of my life could stand as a monument of God's wonderful providence, to show that every gift of grace has been bestowed in immediate connection with contrasting evil. I have been drawn to "Consider the work of God: for who can make that straight, which he hath made crooked? In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider: God also hath set the one over against the other, to the end that man should find nothing after him."—Eccl. vii. 13, 14. So in the losses of our aged brother, Jesse C. Line, let us consider not only the ways of God to men, but let the kindly feelings of sympathy enable us to prove the pleasing energy of God-directing charity at the hands of such of us as are able to minister to his present distress. He will not need continued aid, but a little from brethren who are able would be well directed. Address Jesse C. Line, box 41, Piqua, Ohio.

Yours in bonds,

A. B. BREES.

HENDERSON, Texas, March 20, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I have been thinking for some time of writing to you, but my weakness and inability have kept me silent. Unless aided by the Spirit I would still be unprepared to write anything edifying to the readers of the SIGNS. The apostle Paul said, "By the grace of God I am what I am." So it is with me. "If it be by grace, then is it no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace; otherwise work is no more work." So we see it cannot be of works that I am what I am. So then it is by grace we are saved, through faith, and that not of ourselves; it is the gift of God. "Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." I have a hope that in the year 1866 I had a manifestation of this grace. That call was to be an obedient child, to follow the Savior through evil report as well as good report; to obey his precepts and examples, which are laid down in his written word. But the question arises, Am I doing so? When I look back over my past life I am made to doubt whether I have followed him in the way. I see no good thing that I can do; for in my flesh there dwells no good thing. When I would do good, evil is present with me. I find that I would not do the things that I do. Then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. Where is boasting then? Where is there anything I can boast of? I must look to Jesus, the author and finisher of my faith, and give him the glory, honor and praise for his great love wherewith he loved me, even when I was dead in trespasses and sins; taking me up out of a horrible pit, out of the miry clay, placing my feet upon the Rock of eternal ages, and putting a new song in my mouth, even praise to his adorable name. He caused me to hunger and thirst after righteousness; and the Savior says that such shall be filled. I find myself thirsting for more of the manifestations of his love, and that I may be prepared for the work he gives me to do; that I may be an obedient child, and follow Jesus in the way. He says, "I am the way, the truth and the life." "There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

Brethren Beebe, these are a part of my rambling thoughts. You may publish them if you see fit.

Yours in the bond of love,
O. BELL.

NEW PALTZ, N. Y., Jan. 20, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—It seems as though I will have to write a few lines for the SIGNS in order to have peace of mind, as it is so strongly impressed on my mind. I have tried to get rid of the thought, but cannot. I have many friends and old acquaintances who cannot see me very often, and it would be a comfort to them to hear a word from me through our good and comforting paper. I am now sixty years old. My health has always been poor, but the good Lord has kept me through all the long years. I had an attack of "La Grippe" this winter, which left me more feeble, although I do my little work with the help of my husband and son. The Lord has blessed me with a good husband. I have to say the Lord did it; for I am a strong believer in God's foreordination, and was such before I belonged to the Old Baptists. My husband is not a member of the church, but is a strong believer in the Old School Baptist doctrine. I am here alone, there being no church of my faith and order here. All the preaching I get is through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, which is such company and comfort to us. I do sometimes feel as though the Lord had forsaken me altogether. I often think that as I grow older I grow more wicked. I think I will live nearer my God, but that does not amount to anything. I sometimes try to pray, but cannot, and say, Will I have to die feeling thus? But by and by the dark cloud will rise, and the Sun of righteousness will begin to shine. When I can see that Sun shining through the window of my soul, O what joy and comfort it gives. It is a heaven on earth. The Lord does not intend for us to be without trouble. It is for our good. The Lord knows I am weak and sinful, and I often fear to call upon his holy name. There is no good in me; that is, in my flesh there dwells no good thing. Still my hope is anchored in God. I have nowhere else to go for comfort, only to my blessed Savior. All my trust is in him. He will do all things right. I feel that I am watching and waiting his time to call me. If I am one of his chosen ones, when the time comes he will give me dying grace.

Tears blind my eyes so that I can hardly write. I ask the brethren and sisters to pray for poor me, that while I live here I may have strength to live near my God.

"Jesus, my all, to heaven is gone;
He whom I fix my hopes upon;
His track I see, and I'll pursue
The narrow way till him I view."

One night while I lay with my eyes closed, I saw a perfectly straight road, and at the end was a bright light. I hope I will some day get where that bright light is. I am traveling that road, but very often step aside. I am sure that if I am saved it is by the grace of God, and not for anything I have done. See how I have disobeyed. I promised God at one time, when I was sick, and before I joined the church, that if he would restore and raise me from that sickness I would love and serve him. I was pleading with him, when he came to me and said, "You will get well." O how good he was to me! But I did not live as I promised him I would. For some cause he has spared my life till now; but how much longer he will spare it I do not know.

Dear brethren Beebe, please publish this scribble in the SIGNS if it will not keep out better matter.

Your unworthy sister, if I may be permitted to call myself one,
ELIZABETH MYERS.

MT. CALM, Tex., June 26, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—As I have not seen the writings of any one from this part of the country I will try in my weakness to write a few words for publication, if judged worthy of room. For a long time I have wanted to write, but have felt so unworthy and ignorant that I feared I might make a failure.

In the year 1875 I saw myself a sinner, and tried to pray; but it seemed to me the more I tried the worse I got. I went on in this condition for some time. The Missionaries held a protracted meeting near by, and I attended it. When they called for mourners I went forward to be prayed for; but that did me no good. At last, while away from them, when I had given up all hope, at an unexpected time the good Lord, as I hope, forgave me my sins. It seemed like a heavy load left me, and a glorious light appeared to me. The minister wanted me to join them, but I told him I was a "Hard Shell." He told me I had no more right to my belief than a dog. I then tried to throw away my little hope. I continued in this way until last December, when, as I hope, the good Lord made me willing to discharge my duty. During this long period of time I was desperately wicked. At the October meeting of the church I thought I would join, but business interfered. At the November meeting I thought I surely would join; but my sister had a child to bury on that day, and that caused me to wait until December. None but those who have had such trials can know of the stripes I received. On Saturday before the first Sunday in December I offered myself to the church, and to my surprise was received, and was baptized that same day by brother B. G. Williams. Since that time I have enjoyed myself among the brethren. Sometimes I feel like I am the least of all, if one at all. The apostle says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." I am fully satisfied and love to meet with them. I am anxious for the meeting time to come around. We have a prosperous church, and in good standing.

I have now told some of the dealings of the Lord with me, as I hope. If it accords with the christian experience of any of the readers I hope it will be sweet to them. I hope it may not be found wholly uninteresting to the readers of the SIGNS, if published, and that God may be glorified in it.

Your brother in hope in Christ,
J. A. JAMES.

CHURCH LETTERS.

PRINCETON, N. J., July 27, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—BRETHREN EDITORS:—At the time of our association a number of brethren requested that our church letter to the association be sent to you for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. Our attention has again been called to it, and I herewith inclose it for your consideration and disposal.

Your brother in hope,
ELIJAH LEIGH.

The First Hopewell Church, to the Delaware River Association, in session with us at Hopewell, Mercer Co., N. J., June 1st, 1892.

BELOVED BRETHREN:—Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

On April 23d, 1715, one hundred and seventy-seven years ago, this church was constituted with fifteen members. This beautiful valley was at that time a wilderness. The trials and hardships of the Lord's people were many. The remote distance from each other, and the mode of traveling, as compared with to-day, presented many difficulties in attending the meetings of the church, and in speaking to each other in psalms, hymns and spiritual songs, and to receive comfort from the Lord's ministers in expounding the Scriptures, and applying the same to their experience. During this long period of years the number of believers according to the election of grace has varied from one hundred to two hundred and forty; and it has been the pleasure of him who doeth all things well to bless us with faithful ministers of the word, and long pastorates. No council has been called to consider the advisability of modernizing the Scriptures, nor changing the doctrine or order of the church as established by the apostles to suit the fancy of carnal worshipers, or conform to the progressive age in which we live; but we are contending for the same doctrine and order, our pastor reads the same Scriptures, and declares unto us with power and inspiration of the Spirit the same eternal truth that echoed from hill to valley through the Lord's called ministers in the early morning of our constitution. We would thank and praise the name of our God for his preserving care over us, and for the gift of faithful pastors, especially in this evil day; enabling his servant, our pastor, to maintain the sovereign, distinguishing grace of God, to faithfully reprove, rebuke and exhort with all long-suffering and patience, to apply the word of God to comfort the mourner in Zion, to strengthen the weak, and to give consolation to the afflicted.

We have had no additions to our number since our last report; but we rest in the sure promise of our God, that where he begins a work he will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ. Many constant attendants, earnest listeners and defenders of the truth, give us evidence that the Lord has begun a work in their hearts which will bring them to the feet of Jesus in love and unity of the Spirit, and to their home with their brethren in the church. Two of our sisters, blessed with the happy enjoyment of the graces of the Spirit, who were fruitful vines in the vineyard of the Lord, and who were not strangers to the cares and sorrows of a life beyond the allotted three-score and ten, have crossed the narrow sea dividing the heavenly land from ours, in the triumphant faith and hope of God's elect.

Our changes the past year are as follows: Died, two; dismissed, one. Our present number is one hundred and eighty-seven. We appoint as messengers to assist in the business of the association the following brethren: Our pastor, Wm. J. Purington, Clerk Elijah Leigh, Deacons J. S. Vandike, Wm. C. Tindall, James T. Sutphen, J. T. Blackwell, Wm. Simmons, Charles Hill, brethren D. L. Blackwell, Enoch Drake, J. B. Hill, S. B. Titus, R. Savidge, John Blackwell, L. T. Blackwell, Henry Shepherd, Daniel Stout, Eugene Drake, Wellington Garrison, Josiah Stout, A. S. Cook and Enos Titus.

Beloved brethren, members of this association, visiting brethren, friends and strangers, we bid you welcome to the joy and comfort of this meeting, and to the hospitality of our homes; and may the Lord enable us to lift up our heart and voice in praise and thanksgiving, that we are brought together in this one place to extol the name of Jesus, our only hope and consolation. May his Spirit rest upon us, and in our deliberations may wise counsels prevail, and the sweet peace of love and unity be manifest in all our acts.

Read and approved at our regular church meeting, Saturday, May 21st, 1892.

W. J. PURINGTON, Mod.
ELIJAH LEIGH, Clerk.

MARRIAGES.

At the house of the bride's mother, near the Nassaongo meeting-house, Wicomico Co., Md., on June 21st, 1892, by Elder T. M. Poulson, Mr. Lewis L. Jones and Miss Mary Ann Littleton, of the same county.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

BROTHER J. C. RASSON has gone, like many others, from whence no traveler ever returns. He was born and raised in Tennessee, and when about grown with his parents moved to Anderson Co., Texas. His first wife was a Rogers. She died some years ago, leaving two children (one son and one daughter), both grown. He was then married to his second wife, Miss Page. By this union there were two girls. He was a great sufferer most of his life from white swelling, which seized upon him when he was about fifteen years of age. I have been personally acquainted with him for eight years, living in the church with him, and I never heard him murmur. He said he would not suffer one more pain than his Master had purposed. He said he was ready to go whenever his Master called him. He said, "Brother Bell, you have been faithful to the little church; now continue to be faithful. This is all the Master requires of you." Some years ago he was baptized in the fellowship of the Fort Houston Church by Elder Ben. Parker. He lived a faithful and consistent member of that church until his death. He was a good father, a good husband, and an orderly member of the church.

We mourn, but not without hope, for we believe that our loss is his gain. We hope to meet him in heaven; not as father, husband nor brother, but as an angel of God.

U. J. BELL.

PALESTINE, Texas, July 8, 1892.

DIED—At her late residence in Wilmington, Del., May 15th, 1892, Mrs. Elizabeth Draper Todd, aged 83 years, 7 months and 20 days.

She was born in Wiltshire, England, Sept. 25th, 1808, and emigrated with her parents to America and to the city of Wilmington in early life. Her father I never knew, but her mother I was acquainted with for years, and knew her as a steadfast, unwavering Baptist; and through all the innovations and disorders introduced among the Baptists in this city mother and daughter stood together, ever adhering to the doctrine and order once delivered to the saints. There have been times when not only the names of those who stood steadfast were cast out as evil, but as though everything but the truth would have to be sacrificed. She lived through it all to see the church of her choice enjoying uninterrupted prosperity and peace. Those who really love the church appeared to cling closer to her in adversity. She however remained all her days outside of the organized church. I am unable now to give the reason why so many about whom we have no doubt of their faith assign to themselves the place of hired servants, rather than that of sons and daughters. She had for some years been deprived of sight, which she evidently felt as a sore affliction. Though quiet and uncomplaining, yet she evinced a settled desire to depart and be with Christ,

"Where faith would be sweetly lost in sight,
And hope in full supreme delight,
And everlasting love."

There was testimony in the case of both mother and daughter that

"E'en down to old age all my people shall prove My sovereign, eternal, unchangeable love."

E. RITTENHOUSE.

STATE ROAD, Del.

ON Monday, Aug. 1st, 1892, Mrs. Mary E. Warren was released from the sufferings of mortality at her home in Warwick, Orange Co., N. Y., in the 49th year of her age, leaving one son, one daughter and one sister to mourn their bereavement, in which they have the sincere sympathy of a large circle of relatives and friends.

Sister Warren was baptized in the fellowship of the Warwick Old School Baptist Church in July, 1872, by Elder Joseph N. Badger, who was then pastor of the church. Through much tribulation she has been sustained by the hope which she then confessed; and in the long and intense suffering of her last illness, which was paralysis complicated with other diseases, her only desire was to be called home. From the weary path of tribulation to infinite rest in Jesus, the change was doubtless gloriously joyful for her. The church is deprived of her society here, but we mourn not as those without hope. The children and friends feel that their loss is her gain; yet they cannot refrain from mourning for themselves. May the God of all comfort minister consolation to every wounded heart, and especially may divine grace lead the children to rest upon the faith which was the support of their mother through all her sorrows, and bring them into everlasting rest in the salvation which is in Jesus; and to the glory of his grace may each of the bereaved be enabled to say, "Thy will be done!"

The funeral was largely attended in the Warwick meeting-house, near her home, and the pastor tried to comfort the mourners in a discourse founded upon the expression, "I would not live away."—Job vii. 16.—Ed.

My dear and loving husband, Henry C. Myers, fell asleep on July 14th, 1892, aged 61 years and 16 days.

He has gone home to rest with Jesus. He was a strong believer in the Old School Baptist faith. When we lived in Olive, N. Y., we attended the Old School Baptist meetings there, although he did not have his name on their church book; yet I believe his name was written in the Lamb's book of life. He met with a change about fifteen or sixteen years ago. I was a member at Olive at that time. While his heart was full of grief he would weep bitterly, and say to me, "O! if I were only as good as you how happy I would be." Afterward that great load of sin and guilt was removed, and he was taken out of the horrible pit and miry clay, and O what rejoicing and comfort we had together; for I knew just how he felt, as the Lord had taught me in the same way.

Thus I am left alone with one son. My dear husband is gone. His chair is now empty, and I can no more hear his sweet voice in reading the SIGNS for me. I have to keep asking the good Lord to give me strength to bear my troubles; and I believe he does help me. My dear husband prayed to die, for he longed to go home with Jesus. In all his sickness he never spoke a murmuring word. I could not take his body to Olive for burial. We are strangers here in Milton, but the Quakers came in and helped us all they could.

"How blest is my husband bereft
Of all that could burden his mind;
How easy the soul that has left
This wearisome body behind.

"To mourn and to suffer is mine,
While bound in a prison I breathe,
And still for deliverance pine,
And press to the issues of death.

"What now with my tears I bedew, O might I this moment become;
My spirit revived anew,
My flesh be consigned to the tomb."

ELIZABETH MYERS.

MILTON, Ulster Co., N. Y.

DIED—July 5th, 1892, at her home near the Messongo meeting-house, Accomack Co., Va., after about two days of suffering from supposed blood-poisoning, Delitha Ann Byrd.

The subject of this notice was born April 12th, 1819; was married to Mr. B. T. Byrd on Feb. 2d, 1848; was baptized in the fellowship of the Old School Baptist Church at Messongo, Va., by Elder P. Waters, in the year 1860, and lived a worthy and highly esteemed member until her death. Many who will read this will remember her kind and pleasant way in making every one feel welcome at her house and table. She is highly spoken of for her industry and honesty as a citizen, as well as for her careful and godly walk as a Christian. She seemed always tender and affectionate toward everybody, and showed much of that charity which vaunteth not itself, and is not puffed up. She was a pleasure to the church, and also her help, all her life. How greatly she will be missed by us all at the meetings, as her seat was seldom vacant. One more Baptist home is closed, as she was the last of the family, but she made some provision in her will for the help of the little church; but she herself was worth more to us than all she could have given us. The little church seems to be growing weak in numbers, but we desire to look to God, who is our strength. I was away from home until she became unconscious; but we have a strong hope that our loss is her unspeakable gain.

She leaves to mourn and suffer awhile one sister and a host of other relatives, with the church. We feel to say that the Lord has done it. The writer tried to speak to a large concourse of people, using as a text 1 Thessalonians iv. 14, last clause: "Even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." Her remains were then laid in the old family burying-ground, to await the summons from on high.

T. M. POULSON.

OUR beloved brother, John Martain Delapp, was born May 12th, 1834, and died at his residence in Union Co., Tenn., July 21st, 1892.

His disease was chronic dyspepsia, from which he suffered for years. He had been married three times, his first wife being Martha Jane Butcher. They were joined together in wedlock Oct. 21st, 1855. She bore him five children, two of them having died when quite young, and three of them yet surviving. His wife was taken from him May 1st, 1864, leaving him with three little children. On Sept. 20th, 1864, he was married the second time, to Margery Childress, who bore him two children, one boy and one girl, who are yet living to mourn their loss of a dear father. His second wife was taken from him Aug. 28th, 1868. He was then married the third time, to Cinthey Jane Crawford, March 19th, 1870, who bore him five children, two boys and three girls, one having preceded him to the grave, having died Nov. 25th, 1888. So brother Delapp was the father of twelve children (five boys and seven girls), two wives and four children having preceded him to the tomb, leaving his third wife and eight children to mourn the absence of a dear husband and father. He also leaves an aged mother, two brothers and three sisters, with other relatives and friends, to mourn their loss, which is his eternal gain.

We cannot give the exact date of his joining the church. His widow says he had been a professor a great while before he joined the church. No doubt a felt sense of his unworthiness kept him from doing his duty, until he was given sufficient grace to enable him to deny himself and follow his blessed Lord. He first joined the Primitive Baptist Church at Hind's Creek, and was baptized in the fellowship of the same by the late Elder Isaac Gentry. Five years ago last May he was received into the fellowship of the Hurricane Branch Church of Primitive Baptists by letter. In March, 1890, he was chosen Clerk of the church, which office he filled until his death. On Saturday before he died on Thursday he was able to be out at his church meeting. He was always faithful to attend his church meetings when his health would admit. On Wednesday he worked some in his truck patches, and on Wednesday night was taken very sick, from which he never rallied. Thursday morning he sang part of the song commencing, "How happy are they who their Savior obey," &c. On being asked by his wife, if he should be called away, if he were ready, he replied, "I think I am." Then, bringing his hands together, he said, "Thank the Lord, I will soon be gone." He was asked if he would like to see James C. Walton, to which he said, "Yes, I would like to see brother Walton; but I will not be here much longer." I was immediately sent for, but on arriving it was only to behold the lifeless remains of a dear brother in Christ. God had called his spirit away, and we believe that he is now at rest. On Friday, the 22d, his remains were carried to the family grave-yard; and after singing the song which he had requested to be sung at his burial, commencing, "When sorrows encompass me round," &c., the writer tried to speak words of comfort to the sorrowing friends, using as a subject a portion of John xi. 25: "Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life." He was afterward laid between his two wives, to await the morning of the resurrection. "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power."

Brother Delapp was a steadfast believer in the doctrine of salvation by grace, and was a worthy member of the Old School Baptist Church. He was a kind husband and an affectionate father. The bereaved widow and fatherless children have our sympathy. May God bless this heavy stroke to his glory and our good, is our prayer.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

MEDITATIONS.

If thou, my Savior, would but dwell
Within my heart, all would be well;
All grief and care would pass away,
Like dew beneath the sun's bright ray.

O bid my wandering thoughts be still,
And reconcile me to thy will;
Give me of thy unbounded grace,
And O, dear Lord, hide not thy face.

Thou, mighty Jesus, canst release
A prisoned soul and give it peace;
Where thou dost open none can close,
Though all the powers of hell oppose.

Guide me, my Savior, that I may
All thy commands of love obey;
And when this sinful body dies
Take my glad spirit to the skies.

All things are present to thy view,
Thy pleasure thou wilt surely do;
Thy will can never be destroyed,
Nor be with human aid alloyed.

Lord, grant me peace beyond the skies,
Where heavenly pleasure never dies,
To praise thy name in joys divine,
And in thy glorious image shine.

THE SOUL'S DESIRE FOR CHRIST.

"Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions?"—Solomon's Song i. 7.

TELL me, thou whom my poor soul
Longs to love and to adore;
Thy sweet voice it can control
All the angry waves that roar.

Tell me where thy pastures are;
O that in them I might feed!
Why should I thus wander far?
Bless, O bless me, Lord, indeed.

Tell me where thou mak'st thy flock
Off to rest 'neath scorching heat;
Lead, O lead me to the Rock—
Thither would my soul retreat.

Tell me, for my soul is sad,
Yea, it doth now pant for thee;
Only thou canst make me glad:
Lord, wilt thou not speak to me?

Why so cast down should I feel?
Have I never felt thy love?
O do thou thyself reveal;
Fix, dear Lord, my thoughts above.

Thy companions, Lord, are mine,
And with them I love to dwell;
But do tell me, Am I thine?
Speak, and then it will be well.

Let me not be turned aside,
As a stranger in the fold;
Ever with me, Lord, abide,
And do thou my soul uphold.

Then, O then, it will feel good,
Knowing thou my Shepherd art;
Having thy most precious blood
Sprinkled off upon my heart.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PORT JERVIS, N. Y., July 28, 1892.

ELDER BENTON JENKINS—DEAR BROTHER:—I remember your request at parting, after church meeting following the association, "If you cannot meet with us often, you can at least write." O, my dear brother, if you knew the barrenness of this unfruitful branch you would know that I could not write one thing to interest the least of the little ones. The dear Savior says, "I am the vine, ye are the branches. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing. If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered." Alas! what do I see? Brambles and thorns are the fruit of this unwholesome branch, if one at all. Most truly do I realize that "without me ye can do nothing." I know that your kind heart will pardon my weakness in trying to tell you some of my journeyings through this wilderness.

At present I feel like one drifting at sea, without mariner or compass, tempest-tossed, and at the mercy of the waves. For a little moment my mind will be stayed upon some sweet promise. In vain I try to stay my thoughts upon it. Soon again all is chaos, and I am filled with doubts, fears and questionings, until I am compelled to cry, with dear old Paul, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Many times I must go back to that happy morning when the dear Lord set this captive free, to convince me that I ever passed from death unto life, notwithstanding I dearly love the brethren. The lovely vision that greeted my view as my spiritual eyes were opened to receive it I never can deny. The sweet peace and rest which my soul enjoyed for weeks that followed was something infinitely greater than this poor world can give. Whenever I am brought back to that time I am made to wonder how I ever can doubt the Savior's precious love, though steeped to the lips in sin as I am.

"But O! it swells my sorrows high
To see my blessed Jesus frown;
My spirits sink, my comforts die,
And all the springs of life are down."

Doubtless you remember that I wrote to you last winter when in great affliction and soul trouble. Your reply was so comforting and cheering that I was filled with a desire to hear you preach. The first Sunday in March it was my privilege to have the desire granted. Your text was in Hosea, sixth chapter, and part of the third verse: "His going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth." Truly the rain descended into my wearied soul that day as never before. Not a drop went astray; and for weeks it distilled as the dew. When you closed the Bible I felt a sense of regret, as the time seemed so short while you were speaking. Then truly did I feel "his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain," just at his appointed time. His ways are true and righteous altogether. O that I might praise and adore his dear name in darkness as well as in the light, believing his sure word of promise, "I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you." To-morrow is our church meeting day. Much I desire to be with you, but shall not be able. In spirit I desire to meet with you when the hour of assembling arrives. I hope you will cast the mantle of charity over this imperfect scribble, as you have discovered my ignorance and poverty long ere this. If I could clothe my thoughts as so many of the dear family have the gift, your time of reading might not be wholly wasted. At times my mind seems burdened with thought, but I cannot give utterance. If I make the attempt it takes flight like a flock of frightened doves.

Dear brother, if at any time you can spare the time I would ask your views on John xv. 6, last clause: "And men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned." Husband joins me in love to you and sister Jenkins, and all the dear family.

Your sister, I hope,
HATTIE A. WINFIELD.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., Aug. 4, 1892.

MRS. HATTIE A. WINFIELD—MY DEAR SISTER:—I read with pleasurable emotions your letter of the 28th ult., and also read it before the church when assembled in conference last Saturday, and they also were made glad by its contents. I felt that it belonged to them as well as to me. While reading it the sweet and precious words of the prophet Isaiah, or rather the words of the Lord through him, came to my mind, "O thou afflicted, tossed with tempest, and not comforted, behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires. And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones. And all thy children shall be taught of the Lord; and great shall be the peace of thy children."—Isaiah liv. 11-13. Yes, indeed, the Lord will comfort the children of Zion; and he will so exercise them with troubles and trials that they shall appreciate the goodness he has laid up for them that fear him, and that trust in him before the sons of men. "Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man; thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues. Blessed be the Lord; for he hath showed me his marvelous kindness in a strong city. For I said in my haste [or extremity], I am cut off from before thine eyes: nevertheless thou hearest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee."—Psa. xxxi. 19-22. You have proved the words of the gracious Redeemer true, "I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you." Yes, often in memory will you be carried back to that November morning when the Lord turned your captivity, and your mouth was filled with laughter, and your tongue with singing, and you called upon your soul, and all that was within you, to bless his holy name. His name was then revealed to you as Jesus, your Savior. I have never forgotten your relation of that sweet and gracious experience. That voice of your Redeemer is that to which the apostle John refers when he says to those little children who have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things, "Let that therefore abide in you, which ye have heard from the beginning. If that which ye have heard from the beginning shall remain in you, ye also shall continue in the Son, and in the Father."—1 John ii. 24. Though the Lord give you the bread of adversity and the water of affliction, yet he will not forsake you. Thine ears shall hear that word that is behind thee, which thou didst hear in the beginning; and it shall say to thee, when thou art perplexed, when thou shalt turn to the right hand, or when thou shalt turn to the left, "This is the way, walk ye in it."—Isaiah xxx. 20, 21. Though nature's powers may fail, so that we may even forget our own name, yet shall we not forget the voice of him in the beginning, who is the Way, and the Truth, and the Life. After the apostle Paul had heard the voice in the beginning, perhaps years after, he had another glorious revelation; and though fourteen years had elapsed it was yet fresh in his mind, for he said, "I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth); such an one caught up to the third heaven. And I knew such a man (whether in the body or out of the body I cannot tell; God knoweth); how that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter." No, it is not possible to express the unspeakable joy and gladness that is given us when our minds are caught away from the things of earth, and we are beholding the face of our Father in heaven. This revelation may be experienced when we are sitting under the preaching of the word, when we forget all our earthly surroundings, and we are not thinking whether we are in the body or out of the body, but are entirely swallowed up in the contemplation of the wonderful and glorious salvation of our God. Under such circumstances it is hard for us to believe that the speaker we have listened to has occupied an hour or more in speaking. There is no time to us when we are translated into that kingdom which is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. But how little, alas! any of us enjoy the manifest presence of him in whose presence there is fullness of joy. We are much of the time in the valley of doubt, in the lower story of the Ark, in darkness, groaning under a sense of inward depravity, instead of being in the upper story, and looking up through the one window into heaven. Whenever we look at ourselves, turn our eyes within, we see nothing cheering, for in our flesh there dwells no good thing; but when we are enabled to look unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, though we are sinners, we are enabled to run and not be weary, to walk and not faint. Let me say to you that very often those who feel the most barren and unfruitful are the ones who yield the most spiritual fruit, and are the most comforting to the Lord's people. The heads of grain that are well filled are the ones that droop, while those which have little or no grain in them stand erect. It is so spiritually among the saints. If we are indeed members or branches of Jesus, who is the true Vine, having his life in us, as he was in this world so will we be. As a servant under the law, doing his Father's will, he was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. The law of God was in his heart; and it is in our heart also if we are his. He loved righteousness and hated iniquity; so do we if we are his. If at times we are brought into captivity by the law of sin in our members, as Paul said he was, it will cause us grief, and make us cry out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" None but a branch of the true Vine can thus feel. If the life of the true Vine is in us it must at times be manifest, and must glorify God. Is not God glorified when we are groaning under a sense of our vileness, and crying unto him for deliverance? We are told in the record that a certain distressed woman worshiped Jesus, saying, "Lord, help me." Did she not bear fruit as a branch of the true Vine, and glorify God in that? She was one of the plants that the heavenly Father had planted, which should not be rooted up nor cast forth, but was bearing fruit. She was united to Jesus, and her faith was manifest in her helpless cry, "Lord, help me." It was the cry of faith. He did help her; and he will help and make fruitful, by his own life within, every one who thus comes unto him with a sense of their vileness and weakness. The more we feel our vileness and weakness, the more shall we bear fruit, and glorify our Father in heaven, and manifest that we are the disciples of Jesus. If there is no fruit in a branch it cannot bring forth fruit. The life and fruit must first be in the branch. It is true that fruit may be in a branch, and yet not brought forth or manifested. Jesus says, "Without me ye can do nothing." Does the Husbandman demand fruit of us without giving us the fruit? No indeed. Hear his gracious words of promise: "I will be as the dew unto Israel: he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon. His branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the olive tree. They that dwell under his shadow shall return: they shall revive as the corn, and grow as the vine; the scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon. Ephraim [who "feedeth on wind, and followeth after the east wind; he daily increaseth lies and desolation." He "also is like a silly dove;" "he bringeth forth fruit unto himself." "Is Ephraim my dear son? Is he a pleasant child? For since I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still; therefore my bowels are troubled for him; I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord."] shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?" Then the Lord says, "I have heard him and observed him. I am like a green fir tree. From me is thy fruit found."—Hosea xiv.; Jer. xxxi. Of such the Husbandman shall never say, "Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" Such shall not be cast forth and perish; for Jesus says, "I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish." Can anything separate the members or branches of Jesus from his love? Certainly not. Read Paul's testimony on the subject, recorded Romans viii. 35-39. There were, in the days of the Redeemer's incarnation, some who were called his disciples, but were only nominally such, not having the life of the true Vine in them. These were eventually cast forth as branches that were related to him in the flesh of Abraham only. There came a time when they could not endure his doctrine, and said, "This is a hard saying; who can hear it?" "From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him." These were volunteer disciples, and for a time their leaf appeared green; but there never had been spiritual life or fruit in them, and therefore they never brought forth any spiritual fruit. It was all the fruit of the flesh. But how different the character and fruit of the true disciples, who were united to the true Vine in the Spirit as well as in the flesh. To these Jesus said, "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain."—John xv. 16. These were never to be cast forth, and to be gathered by men, and be burned; but as fruitful branches they were to be purged by fiery trials, that they might bring forth even more fruit. The more the purging by trials, the more the fruit would appear on the branches. It has ever been so; it will ever be so, my dear sister.

Jesus was united in the flesh with the typical vine that the Lord brought out of Egypt, the root and stock of which was Abraham. His brotherhood was with that typical and fleshly nation, and should remain there until the Husbandman should reject that typical nation, and they should also reject the true or antitypical Vine. Then those among that nation who were only children of Abraham in the flesh, only brethren of Jesus in the flesh, not possessing the faith of Abraham, were to be cut off, cast forth as branches, and wither, and be gathered by men, and be burned, or destroyed. Thus the word of the Lord by Malachi should be fulfilled, "Behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven [that is, the gospel day]; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch. But unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves of the stall." The branches of the true Vine are never to be burned up, even though they may live after the flesh, and fail to manifest the fruit of the true Vine. Such shall find that "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God;" "for our God is a consuming fire." They shall experience "a fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries;" but it shall not devour them, for God has promised in the covenant of mercy, made with the spiritual David, "My mercy will I keep for him forevermore, and my covenant shall stand fast with him. His seed also will I make to endure forever, and his throne as the days of heaven. If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments; if they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments; then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes. Nevertheless [Not any the less. Bless the Lord, O my soul!] my loving-kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. Once have I sworn by my holiness that I will not lie unto David. His seed shall endure forever, and his throne as the sun before me."—Psa. lxxxix. Well may we therefore with David say, "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord forever; with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations."

As further proof that those branches that were to be taken away, cast forth, and be burned, were the brotherhood of Jesus in the flesh of Abraham, I will here quote from the prophecy of Zechariah. The eleventh chapter opens with a prophecy of the destruction of the temple, and the howlings of the rulers of the nation, in strong figurative language. "Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars. Howl, fir tree; for the cedar is fallen; because the mighty are spoiled: howl, O ye oaks of Bashan; for the forest of the vintage is come down. There is a voice of the howling of the shepherds; for their glory is spoiled: a voice of the roaring of young lions; for the pride of Jordan is spoiled." Yet was there among them a remnant according to the election of grace, who should be saved and nourished, who had spoken often one to another, and sighed for the abominations in the land. Of those the Lord said, "And I will feed the flock of slaughter, even you, O poor of the flock." These were the poor in spirit, who received the Messiah, and to whom he said in his sermon on the mount, "Blessed be ye poor; for yours is the kingdom of God. Blessed are ye that hunger now; for ye shall be filled. Blessed are ye that weep now; for ye shall laugh. Blessed are ye when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of man's sake. Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy; for, behold, your reward is great in heaven; for in the like manner did their fathers unto the prophets."—Luke vi. 20-23. "And I took unto me two staves; the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands; and I fed the flock." This is the feeding of the flock of Jesus, who live upon Jesus, the true Bread that came down from heaven, whose flesh was given for their life. He was the real beauty of that typical vine or nation. He was all the beauty that was really found in all the sacrifices and offerings under the law. Those who were spiritual among that nation saw

Jesus in every sacrifice and offering there. This is all the beauty that God ever saw in that worship under the law. When Jesus came in the flesh, and by one offering forever perfected all them that were chosen or sanctified by God the Father in him, there was no longer beauty in those sacrifices which God had ordained among that typical nation. Thus this staff that had upheld that people was taken away—the staff Beauty. The other staff was Bands, which also was Jesus. They were bound together and preserved as a nation until Jesus should come in the flesh, and be rejected by them as a nation, when the brotherhood between him and them should be broken. “He came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name; which were born, not of blood [though in the flesh they might be the children of Abraham], nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.” This Jesus, the Word, “was made of the seed of David according to the flesh,” and therefore was a brother in the flesh to the nation of Israel. He was born under the same law with them, and was circumcised in his flesh. The nation of Israel could not be destroyed until he was come in the flesh. That national people were the church of God on earth until the coming of Jesus in the flesh as the head and life of his church. It was composed of those possessing the faith of their father Abraham, as well as many who possessed not that faith. Their descent from Abraham gave them right to membership in that church of God under the law. Jesus was himself a member with them in that church. But God had ordained that the brotherhood between them should be broken, and that his church should be set up in gospel order, in the regeneration, when a new order of things should appear; when, according to his word by the prophet Malachi, his church should discern between those that had the faith of Abraham, the faith of God, and those who had not that faith. Hence in the organization of the church in her gospel order all those who were united and related to Jesus only in the flesh of Abraham, who possessed not faith in Jesus, were broken off, cast forth, and were no more to be recognized as belonging to the church of God. Thus the Husbandman would take them away. But the apostle tells us that although they were thus broken off because they had not faith, yet God was able to graft them in again if they should afterward be manifested as subjects of faith, by being born of God, and having the life of the true Vine in them. There may be those to-day for whom Jesus died, who had spiritual life given them in Christ Jesus before the world began, who are not yet manifest as the sons of God by having that life implanted in them. If so, they are not yet prepared for membership in the church, nor is it possible for us to yet know them as members of the body for whom Jesus died. There also may be those who have a nominal standing in the church, who have not in them the life of the true Vine, and for whom Jesus did not die; and if so, they are of those of whom Jesus said, “Every plant that my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up.” Such can bring forth only the fruits of the flesh, for they are only fleshly children. When such are cast out from membership in the church they may be gathered by men into their worldly organizations, who, as tares, are gathered into bundles to be burned, or destroyed. Such characters may be willing to be gathered by men, and can feel at home in a worldly organization; but I am slow to believe that a real subject of the grace of God, one who has the life of the true Vine in him, could find a comfortable home in a worldly religious organization, if his course of life should be such that the church of Christ were compelled to cast him forth as unworthy of their church fellowship, according to the command of the apostle. Such are not apt to be gathered by men of the world.

Now, to go back to Zechariah xi., where we find the prophecy of the betrayal of Jesus, the rejection of the faithless Israelites by God, the end of his covenant with them, we hear him saying to them, “I will not feed you: that that dieth, let it die; and that that is to be cut off, let it be cut off; and let the rest eat every one the flesh of another. And I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it asunder, that I might break my covenant which I had made with all the people. And it was broken in that day: and so the poor of the flock that waited upon me knew that it was the word of the Lord. And I said unto them, If ye think good, give me my price; and if not, forbear. So they weighed for my price thirty pieces of silver [the amount that Judas Iscariot received from the chief priests]. And the Lord said unto me, Cast it unto the potter: a goodly price that I was prized at of them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver, and cast them to the potter in the house of the Lord. Then [after the betrayal of Jesus] I cut asunder mine other staff, even Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel.” Thus was the relationship or brotherhood between Jesus (Judah) and the fleshly Israel forever broken and dissolved, when he was rejected and betrayed by them, and God ceased to regard them as his covenant people. They abhorred God, and God abhorred them. “For I will no more pity the inhabitants of the land, saith the Lord: but, lo, I will deliver the men every one into his neighbor’s hand, and into the hand of his king; and they shall smite the land, and out of their hand I will not deliver them.” Truly they were gathered by men and burned. As a nation they were destroyed, and also their beautiful temple burned, which had been honored by the presence of that Savior and Messiah whom they rejected and crucified. How terrible was the fire into which they were cast after God had rejected them. Jesus spoke of it, saying, “For then shall be great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be.”

I want to speak a little about Judah, from whom the tribe bearing that name sprang. He was, among the other sons of Jacob, the subject of prophecy. He is presented as a type of Jesus, the true Vine, out of which grow all the branches. This Vine and branches are one: they cannot be separated. Because the Vine lives, the branches shall live also. “Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise.” Do not the brethren of Jesus, or Judah, praise him? Is he not the object of their praise? They are that people or brotherhood of which God says, “This people have I formed for myself: they shall show forth my praise.” “Thy hand [that is, Judah’s] shall be in the neck of thine enemies.” This signifies the complete subjection of his enemies to him. “Thy father’s children shall bow down before thee;” as the children of the God and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ bow before and worship Jesus, or Judah, and bring forth the royal crown and crown him Lord of all. “Judah is a lion’s whelp: from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up? The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be. Binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass’s colt unto the choice vine, he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes.”—Genesis xlix. 8-11. Isaiah saw him coming from the land of his enemies, and says, “Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah? this that is glorious in his apparel, traveling in the greatness of his strength?” The answer is, “I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save. Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the winefat? I have trodden the winepress alone; and of the people there was none with me: for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in mine heart, and the year of my redeemed is come,” &c.—Isa. lxiii. 1-4.

But, dear sister, I fear I will weary you with a very long letter, so that you will never want me to write to you again. Perhaps what I have already written will not appear clear to your mind; but I have done the best the Lord would let me, and I hope it will be some satisfaction to you. But before I close let me recapitulate. When Jesus spoke the words you have called my attention to he was yet in the flesh and under the law. The branches that were to be broken off, cast forth, gathered and burned, were carnal Jews only, being brethren to Jesus in the flesh. None who are spiritually connected with him who is the true Vine can be broken off. In the eleventh verse he says to his true branches, “These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full.” How could his joy remain in us, and our joy be full, were we to understand him as here teaching a possibility of our being cast forth as branches if we did not walk consistent with our profession as his disciples? We are fruitful when (and only when) he makes us fruitful. From him is our fruit found. Without him we can do nothing. May he make us fruitful, even though it require sore trials; and as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so also shall our consolation in him abound. We send love to you and your companion, our dear brother.

Your brother and companion in tribulation,

ELDER G. BEEBE’S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—As this is “Christmas” day, my mind has been employed a great deal on the cause of our glorious Savior, who was born into the world eighteen hundred and ninety years ago. What a glorious plan of salvation is that which God has wrought through his only begotten Son. No tongue can tell nor pen describe the depth of the wisdom and foreknowledge of the Sovereign of the whole universe. He works, and none can hinder, or say unto him, What does thou? According to God’s own word, he spake all things into existence through his Son; all things that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers. All things were created by him, and for him. Do we believe the Bible to be a record of the word of God, and that he spake by the mouth of his apostles and prophets? If we consider that God was speaking by the mouth of Paul those great mysteries recorded in Col. i. 16, what more can be brought to light? If God has created all things that are in heaven and earth, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, things visible and invisible, what else can the creature conceive of that has been made, outside of all powers and all created things? There are some who do not run the Scriptures from cause to effect. If we do not refer from one portion of Scripture to another, we are liable to cross our minds, and say

FAITH COMES BY HEARING.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I have a great desire to see your views in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on the text in Rom. x. 17. Some Baptists in this section contend that faith depends upon the activity of preachers—that sinners receive faith through the preaching of the gospel; and where there is no preaching there is no faith. They rely upon this text as their principal proof. While I am not able to understand how faith can be both the fruit of the Spirit and the effect of hearing the preaching of the gospel, I do not know that I fully comprehend the lesson which the apostle was teaching in the text cited. I know that you have a great many requests of this kind, probably more than you can comply with; but if you can find time and space you will relieve the mind of one who is greatly troubled over this point. I pray that you may answer this request soon, and oblige your unworthy brother, if one at all.

Our brother rightfully supposes that it is impossible for us to comply with all the applications received for views upon scriptural subjects and texts. The first insuperable barrier is found in the lack of that inspiration which would be required to enable any mortal to understand all that is written in the volume of inspired truth. But aside from this painfully felt insufficiency, it would require more time than we can command, and more space than the columns of our paper afford, to expound everything submitted for our discussion. When it is in our power, it is always a pleasure to us to respond to the requests of our patrons by submitting such views as we have, but always with the express desire that every sentiment be tested by the infallible standard; and everything which is not sustained by that only safe rule should be rejected.

In the chapters preceding the expression to which our attention is called, the Spirit moved Paul to present in unmistakable language a statement of the doctrine of the sovereignty of God in the choosing of his people unto salvation from sin through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. beyond the possibility of mistake or perversion, this truth is established, so that its denial necessarily involves the rejection of the whole testimony of revelation. This is the very foundation upon which the whole doctrine of the gospel is sustained. With this truth settled in the mind of the saint there can be no destruction of his hope in Christ; and without it there is no support for his confidence in that hope. To this important and fundamental fact God has given the seal of his own positive statement, saying, “For I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed.”—Mal. iii. 6. The recognition of this truth forbids the salvation of any sinner being dependant upon his own action either in hearing or believing the preaching of the gospel.

By reference to the record in the Scriptures it will be seen that the absence of mortal preachers was no obstacle in the way of the development of faith in those old servants of God who shine as stars in the gospel firmament forever. It is needless to look outside the testimony written by inspiration to find the refutation of the doctrines and commandments of men, who represent that the faith of the saints is dependent upon the proclamation of the gospel by man. It will hardly be contended that the hearing of any mortal preaching produced the faith by which Abel offered unto God a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain. That eternal word of the Lord which is forever settled in heaven, is the Scripture which preached before the gospel unto Abraham and to all the saints who lived before the time of the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. Until that time no written revelation of divine truth was given to men. Yet the grace of God was displayed in leading his chosen ones by faith to declare the hope of salvation which was in them, and that faith in them was, as it has ever been in subsequent ages, the gift of God, and the fruit of his Spirit, in the chosen vessels of his mercy. By whose preaching was Abram called out of Ur of the Caldees, where he was an idolater among his heathen kindred? Only the Scripture which preached before the gospel unto him, can give the hearing of faith. He is called “the father of all them that believe,” as the consequence of that faith which he had yet being uncircumcised; but there is no scriptural authority to sustain the assumption that he ever heard the voice of a mortal preacher of the gospel of God our Savior. In the case of every saint whose experience is recorded in the Scriptures, the power of God is manifestly displayed in calling each one individually, and in no case was that divine calling ineffectual. The fact that a subject of electing love is naturally dead is no obstacle in the way of his hearing that omnipotent voice whose Author declares that it shall prosper in the thing whereto he sent it. Even in his humiliation as a servant under the law, it was impossible for death to forbid the voice of Jesus to prosper in bringing from the grave the dead Lazarus. Now that his victory is accomplished and he sits upon the throne of infinite sovereignty, it is absurd to suppose that he has less power than when his authority was honored and obeyed by the elements of nature, as well as by devils, and in the dominion of death. When the omnipotence of God is admitted there can be no consistent ground on which to deny his sovereignty in the election and calling of his people. In that admission all the doctrine of unconditional salvation is necessarily conceded. Nothing more can be requisite to secure the final glorification of every sinner whom he has chosen in Christ Jesus, if God has power to secure the fulfillment of his purpose. If the power of God is not sufficient to save his people from their sins, then it is evident there can be no salvation for them unless there could be a power greater than omnipotence. This being absurd, there can be no denial of the doctrine of unconditional salvation without the denial that any sinner can be saved. This is undisguised infidelity. Yet people professing to believe the Scriptures are found contending for some condition to be performed by the sinner whereby the purpose of God is accomplished; and denying the fulfillment of the electing will of God without the consent of the sinner. Such false teachers distort various expressions of Scripture, and claim to find in them authority for their opposition against the doctrine which God has written in the heart of his people, and which is confirmed by the testimony of the written Scriptures. There is no text more evidently wrested from its obvious meaning than is the expression to which our brother calls our attention, when used to sustain the error specified.

By reference to the context it will be seen that the apostle was presenting the very point of doctrine against which all carnal teachers seek to turn this expression. Indeed, so clearly is the doctrine of absolute predestination and personal election asserted and maintained in this epistle that no adversary has ever been able to deny that it is certainly here declared; yet they would detach the first clause of our text, and wrest it to signify that faith comes by hearing the words of some mortal in preaching the gospel. This perversion would not be tolerated in construing any ordinary writing among men. The text includes the refutation of such a construction. Instead of faith coming by hearing the sound of natural words, the text expressly declares the hearing specified is exclusively “By the word of God.” This accords with all the testimony of the record which God has given. Since it is plainly written that faith is the gift of God, and that it is the fruit of the Spirit, it would most assuredly involve a contradiction in the divine record if that faith were dependent upon the sound of the voice of a man whose breath is in his nostrils. It would be well for those Baptists of whom our brother speaks, to try the efficacy of their words in controlling the tempests which desolate the earth. They will confess that the word of God has power to control the warring elements. But if there is nothing more than the voice of a mortal signified by the expression in our text, it is certainly consistent to claim omnipotence for the word of the man who can communicate the hearing of faith by his voice. Surely no one who has the knowledge of God, will claim such life-giving virtue as dwelling in the words which are uttered by the perishing breath of an earthly worm. Every quickened sinner should be able to recognize the joyful sound of the voice of God as infinitely superior to the words of angels or men. While all gospel preaching is the testimony of that living Word by which the dead are raised up, there is certainly great difference between that testimony and the Word of whom that witness is borne. The inspired Scriptures bear witness of Jesus; but the record even as given by the Spirit of truth is not the gracious Savior who gave himself for the sins of his people. The preaching of the gospel proclaims Jesus as the Word of God, by whom alone the dead are raised up; but there is no power in the preaching to communicate life to the dead sinner; because there is no voice but the eternal Word which has power to give life and hearing to the dead. It is certainly absurd to claim that the dead could be profited by preaching which they could not hear. Only such as have been quickened by the Word of God can be benefited by the proclamation of the testimony of Jesus in the preaching or writing of his chosen witnesses. The power to give eternal life to the dead has never been delegated to any created being. Indeed, neither men nor angels have power to give natural life to any creature, nor even to retain the breath of vital air one instant beyond the time appointed to every living thing. The monarch whose scepter rules an empire, is as helpless as the infant pauper when the summons comes requiring his soul. Thus the pride of mortality is buried in contempt before the decree which remands to death all the children of men.

In the reference to the prophetic declaration that “Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved,” the apostle demonstrates the truth that the grace of God is manifested to the Gentiles as well as to the children of Israel; as in the preceding verse he declares that there is no difference between them under the gospel dispensation. The Mosaic dispensation expressly restricted all its rites and privileges to the nation of Israel; and in that covenant there was a complete division established by which all Gentiles were forever denied participation in the blessings bestowed upon that chosen nation. Even in them whom God had called to hope in Christ, the effect of that tradition still remained in their natural mind, so that it astonished them when they saw that God had "also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life."—Acts xi. 18. Against this Jewish prejudice the whole of this argument is directed, as will be manifest from a reading of the context including the preceding and following chapters.

In refuting this traditional error, the apostle shows by the very Scriptures in which the Jews thought they had eternal life, that this extension of divine favor to the Gentiles was in harmony with those prophecies in which the carnal Jews confided. Having cited Isaiah as a witness that the report or preaching of the prophets was not believed by the natural Israelites, he with unerring logic comes to the conclusion expressed in our text. So far is this from justifying the claim that the preaching even of inspired prophets could communicate spiritual life to dead sinners, Paul shows conclusively by the same prophets that while all had heard the report which those servants of God had declared, they had not believed. This fully establishes the truth which is written in our text, that the only hearing by which faith comes is the hearing of the word of God. The fact that the Gentiles had been favored to hear that word was clearly evident in the existence of that faith in them which could come in no other way but by the hearing of the word of God.

In the experience of the saints each is furnished with an infallible criterion by which to try every doctrine which may claim their acceptance. So, when Paul exposed the error into which the churches of Gallatia had fallen, he appealed immediately to the manner in which they themselves received the Spirit. This is always the light by which it is safe for the saints to be guided. Was it by hearing the words of a mortal preacher that the faith of Jesus Christ was communicated to us? If that were the case why did not we receive that faith the first time we heard the gospel proclaimed? Not only before the doctrine of salvation was revealed as precious in our own experience, but often in after years, have we not heard the words of truth proclaimed when there was no sense of that truth felt in our own hearts? The truth is recognized as being according to the divine record, and it is a grief to us that we cannot rejoice in it as in times past, yet there is nothing of its vitality received in our hearts. If the letter of the word could bring faith, it would not be possible that there should be any time when the saint could not find joy and life in hearing or reading that truth. In this is experienced the fact declared in the text. While the saint may indeed be sure that the preaching is comforting to them that love God, yet he finds in it only distress, because he lacks the faith by which to appropriate its sweetness to himself. When thus shut out from comfort in their own souls, if those Baptists cited by our brother have been able to deliver themselves by hearing preaching, or by reading the Scriptures, they are not as helpless as we have found ourselves when passing through darkness. If the inspired psalmist had been able to obtain the faith of God by hearing or reading the words of truth, he would not have cried so frequently to the Lord for deliverance. Since faith is the victory that overcometh the world, with that omnipotent support he could have delivered himself out of all his afflictions and distresses. But in the case of the inspired writers, as well as in that of all the saints in the present times, there is no other source from which their supply of faith can come, but from that one word of God, by which alone they can receive the gift of hearing. Painfully in their daily experience do the disciples of Jesus learn their dependence upon that divine word for the hearing of faith as well as for every good gift and every perfect gift which cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. This abiding principle is given to every subject of divine grace; but it is only as the living power of the word of God is shed abroad in his heart that he knows the victory which he has already received in the unspeakable gift of God. "For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world; and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."—1 John v. 4. It is preposterous to ascribe this divine power to the hearing of the voice of a mere mortal preacher.

It will be necessary for the advocates of the doctrine of faith coming through the words of human preachers, to abandon the Scriptures in defending their position if they can find no clearer support than this text affords. No unprejudiced mind can fail to see that the doctrine which the apostle here sets forth is the same with that which is maintained all through the epistle; and that is the undisguised and full declaration of the sovereign election of God in the salvation of his chosen people in Christ Jesus. Since hearing comes only by the word of God, it is evident that every sinner to whom that word comes must hear it, and equally certain is the effect of that hearing, it must produce that living faith which is the fruit of the Spirit and the gift of God. If the plain record of this epistle does not satisfy any saint of the sovereignty of divine grace in the bestowal of faith upon the subjects of his election, we have no hope that they will be convinced by anything which can be presented by uninspired men.

that the Scriptures contradict themselves. If we draw a conclusion from the Scriptures, it may be right, and it may be wrong; but if we take the Old and the New Testaments, and search them aright, we will find proof somewhere, and in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established. These witnesses are the apostles and prophets, and Jesus Christ himself.

Dear brethren and sisters, let us reason together in love and peace. I know we do not all see eye to eye on all points of the doctrine of God our Savior. We see eye to eye on the plan of salvation; that Christ Jesus alone, by the shedding of his precious blood, atoned for the sins of his people. Every one of the members of his body have received their own gift, and not another's. God said by the mouth of Paul, "And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom, declaring unto you the testimony of God. For I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified." So, dear brethren, I do not want to know anything among you but what God in his mercy sees fit to reveal to me by his grace, which is a great favor to me. I strive to be satisfied with the mite he has been pleased to give me. I do not want to deprive any one of his or her gift, as I have seen some strive to do. Dear brethren, this is all wrong. Let us be found trying to hold up the hands of our brethren; but never encourage an error if you know it. There is a disputed point of doctrine among our brethren, which God's word proves to every one that can see into it. If it could be God's will to reveal it to all, it would be a great blessing bestowed on those who can see God's Bible doctrine; for then they who understand it would not be called heretics. I am very sorry that the weak ones of God's fold are not satisfied for those who are able to bear strong meat to write and preach the absolute God. For the very reason that he created all things, he is an absolute God. Otherwise he could not absolutely have created all things, as is absolutely said of him. He is absolutely of one mind, and absolutely none can turn him. Take your Bible and read its teaching. Brethren, what kind of a God would we have if he could be changed? O think of these things. Would we be any better off than the Arminians if we had a God that could be turned? I think I hear the child of God saying that he does not worship any God but the one that absolutely controls all events. If he were not such a God, something might absolutely happen to take place that God could not absolutely control, and you and I might miss the happiness we anticipate in the future. If we had not an absolute God, what do you think wicked men and devils would do with God's little handfull of brethren? (Christ is our Elder Brother.) Why, dear ones, we would be swept off the face of the earth. O how I do thank God that he does absolutely control all events. I am glad that he is an absolute God. The Lord said unto Job, "Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him? He that reproveth God, let him answer it."—Job. xl. 2. Job surely knew that he could not answer the Lord; so he was ready to lay his hand upon his mouth. Further God said to Job, "Look on every one that is proud, and bring him low; and tread down the wicked in their place. Hide them in the dust together, and bind their faces in secret. Then will I also confess unto thee that thine own right hand can save thee. Behold now behemoth, which I made with thee." What now do we think of God making Satan, with Job? Some dear brethren believe this behemoth and leviathan is some great sea serpent. O, dear brethren, read with the Spirit and with the understanding. Remember the word of God, who said he gave man power over all the beasts of the field, and over the fowls of the air, and over the fishes of the sea, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth. If that be true (which I believe; for it says, "Every kind of beasts, and of birds, and of serpents, and of things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of mankind"), consider what is said by the Almighty of this behemoth. "His bones are as strong pieces of brass: his bones are like bars of iron." Here is something stronger yet to comprehend. "He is the chief of the ways of God." What is a chief? A chief is the highest in office; principal; a leader; commander; head of a clan. If that does not describe Satan, I have no knowledge of what is going on in this sin-polluted world. Then the name of this old serpent is called leviathan. "He maketh the deep to boil like a pot: he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment. He maketh a path to shine after him: one would think the deep to be hoary. Upon earth there is not his like, who is made without fear. He beholdeth all high things: he is a king over all the children of pride."—Job. xli. Dear brethren, take the 40th and 41st chapters of Job, read them carefully and prayerfully, and see what you would make of that Scripture. I do not believe there is anything on earth that has been given such power, except Satan. Some may think it is not instructive to a child of God to write or preach anything about the old serpent, which the apostle calls the devil and Satan. But we have a full right to talk and write about him, because our Savior and his apostles talked of him, and here God himself tells Job that he maketh a path to shine after him, and that he is a king over all the children of pride. No child of a spiritual birth can fail to see the path this king is leading the children of pride in; and being a king over them, they are submissive to his murderous and thievish works. But while his followers are glorying in their high position, the poor, humble saint of God looks on with fear, and shudders, and wonders where God will end the scene. Yet we believe their bounds are set, and beyond them they cannot go. Our trust is in God, who has declared in his word that he will take care of his children. We believe that evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, but that God will bring it all to a close in his own good time. I do believe that God has chosen his heirs in his Son, and before the world was framed. When we think of this absolute God, and of his creating a chief over the children of pride, there is something very mysterious about this high way he was to occupy; for he was to occupy the chief ways of God. He that hath made him could make his sword to approach unto him. We might readily conceive that no man nor any other power can control this wicked serpent, but he that made him. God let Job know this, for he asked Job, "Who hath prevented me, that I should repay him? Whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine." Brethren, that is enough to convince the weakest saint of God that he declared of himself that everything under the whole heaven is his. Don't you believe the wicked serpent was under the heaven, and that none is able to pierce him but he that made him? Job knew nothing of the strength of Satan until God gave him into the hand of Satan to do whatsoever he pleased, except that he should not touch his life. Then God taught him, before he left off talking to him, what power Satan had. Dear brethren and sisters, this may seem strange to some of you, but I hope it is not so to all. I have read of some who, in measure, like Job and myself, realized something of the power of Satan; as did also Peter, after the Savior had said to him, "Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat." So when we are given over to Satan we have no more power over him than we have over the one that made him. God has said, "I have created the waster to destroy." If he had not, we would not desire any better place than this earth. But God, knowing what was best for us, created this destroyer to break our peace, that we should seek a city out of sight, and long for a better country. Then why, dear kindred, do some of you so greatly object to God absolutely controlling all things and all events? For all things are absolutely his, and outside of him there is no limit or space. He fills immensity. Therefore God is not limited. Some say that God is running one part of the world, and Satan is running the other part. Then what part is God running? I imagine some will say, His church. Well, we will admit that. Then if God has all power in heaven and in earth, why could he not just as easily put his children or kingdom on one part of the globe, and Satan and his dominion on the other part, and not have his weak saints to be destroyed, or their peace? We read that no weapon formed against them shall prosper. This chief of the ways of God is not the highway to heaven, but the chief of the ways of unrighteousness. God has made him head over all this wicked clan we see and hear in the earth. This chief is a very mysterious creature. When he had deceived our mother Eve, God said to him, "Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field. Upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life. And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed." I would like to give this woman attention, but it would lengthen this epistle of love too much. This chief of the ways of God is the highest in the ways of the earth; and God controls him, and all events; else God would not have told Job that he made him, with him. Satan is the principal or leader in all wickedness. He is a commander; because God has given him the power to rule over all wickedness; and not only so, but head and leader over a clan. But God says, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." Brethren, we have no need to fear this chief, or king of darkness, because we are shielded with the helmet of salvation; and God being our defense, we have none other to fear.

Dear brethren, I believe it is more in the language you use than in the understanding of God's word, that causes so much difference among you. You all do certainly believe in an absolute God. Do you not believe that God had an only begotten Son, and that he absolutely sent him to these low grounds of sin and sorrow; that by his foreordination and predestination and determinate counsel his only begotten Son was taken, and by wicked hands was crucified and slain? What more wicked act could demons commit than was committed upon the innocent Lamb of God? Dear brethren in Christ, if I had to be separated from those whom I love as I do myself, because of my belief, I would have to live alone. I do not believe this is an unreasonable doctrine, for I firmly believe it is Bible doctrine. I have read of one who was charged with saying that he loved sin as well now as he did before he made any profession of being regenerated. But neither Paul nor I can agree with that. Read what Paul said to the Romans. "For that which I do, I allow not; for what I would, that do I not; but what I hate, that do I. If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law that it is good. Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) there dwelleth no good thing." It seems to me this must be the sentiment of every one that has been born of the Spirit of God. Sin ought to be an abomination to every heaven-born child. God has a purpose for sin in the world. If he had not, he would not have had any of his children here. God is good and perfect in all his works. The longer the world stands, the more crafty the children of the desolate woman become, and wickedness increases. If the Lord did not increase the knowledge of the children of the woman that has a husband, they would never be able to stop the mouths of the gainsayers. "But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so it is now. Nevertheless what saith the Scripture? Cast out the bondwoman and her son; for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir with the son of the free woman. So then, brethren, we are not children of the bondwoman, but of the free." —Gal. iv. 29-31.

CRAMER, ILL., July 24, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN EDITORS:— I feel this morning like penning a little to the dear brethren and sisters, readers of the SIGNS, and especially to the dear brethren and friends I so lately met at the Baltimore Association. What a blessed meeting that was to me, a sitting together in a heavenly place in Christ. How sorry I now feel that our separation came so soon. I hardly realized at the time that we should so soon part with the dear ones, perhaps never again to meet in this vale of sorrow. Since we have returned to our home there is not a day nor night that goes by but I think of that blessed meeting, and of the many loved ones of our heavenly Father's family, who speak that pure language of Canaan. How glad I felt for the privilege of being in the field, and that I could glean after the reapers, so many handfulls of purpose seemed to be dropped for this poor sinner. I desire to glean in no other field; not in hedges nor groves. How glad I am that I have, though unworthy, the fellowship of this blessed people, who know the joyful sound, and have all been taught of the same heavenly Teacher. Is it possible that I, sinful and unworthy as I am, am one of that blessed number? I do not know where to place myself, as the great apostle said of himself that he was less than the least of all saints. When I think of him, and then of those heaven gifted reapers, with all the heavenly gleaners, I see myself so far beneath them all that I am made to wonder what part of that glorious building I belong to, if indeed I belong to it at all. But I believe there is but one and the same feeling among the children of God. They all feel less than the least. This is a sure mark that the Lord has been with them, leading them about by his Spirit, so that they esteem others better than themselves. All are brought to a level. All are hungry and poor, and mourn their poverty. In my flesh dwells no good thing. Paul said he was the chief of sinners. I verily believe there are two kinds of sinners; those that are dead in sin, and love sin, and feel as good as anybody; that they have as good a chance of going to heaven as anybody, and they expect to go there; that they can get ready at anytime; that the door stands wide open. This is taught for the religion of Jesus; but it is a base falsehood, and gives license to licentiousness. But there is another kind of sinners, of the same lump of clay, in whom the Lord in his own time begins a work. Instead of the door being wide open, so that they can go to God at any time, they feel that it is barred, that they are shut in, and they see no way of escape. Their house is on fire, and they try their best to get out. Then they cry from stern necessity. Talk about one in this awful fix sitting down on the stool of do-nothing? He is bound to pray. Human aid cannot reach him. But at an unexpected moment the Lord lifts him out, as a brand from eternal burnings. Now this sinner has had his fill of sin, and henceforth hates sin, and through all his after pilgrimage sin is the worst enemy he has. In him now dwells a living principle. He has eternal life, or Christ in him the hope of glory. That cannot sin. It is just as possible for Christ to sin as for that new and living principle to sin. Then comes the conflict that the world knows nothing of; a warfare; the flesh lusting against the Spirit. These are contrary the one to the other, so that he cannot do the things that he would. His prayer now is, Lord, keep me from sin. He has no desire to sin. And because he finds sin yet in him, a law in his members, warring against the law of his spiritual mind, and bringing him into captivity to the law of sin which is in his members, he cries out in soul trouble, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Some would say, If I am not one of the elect, and cannot do anything to save myself, why need I bother about it? That one is dead in sin if he can there rest; for the living child cannot keep from crying. Realizing his helplessness, he now prays without ceasing; and because he finds so much imperfection in himself, he often becomes very low down in doubt about his election, and often thinks he has no marks of a heaven-born child. He can see the marks in others, and esteems others much better than himself. He says, O that I were like such a one; for they are so spiritually minded, while I am so cold and dead. The Lord has led me into darkness, and not into light. Surely against me is he turned. Dear child of God, if you have been led in this thorny road you are blessed, for Jesus trod this way. You must taste the wormwood and gall. He is in the darkness as well as in the light. The Lord leads all his people, and there is no strange god with them. Jesus trod the wine-press alone. Except we eat his flesh and drink his blood we have no life in us. His flesh is meat and his blood is drink. He is the living bread. He gives us our daily bread and all these trials and conflicts; for he has gone before, and leads us. Then, dear children of the heavenly King, think it not strange concerning the fiery trials that try you. They are all for our good, for the trial of our faith. The more we have of these sore conflicts the more we are drawn out of self-confidence, or confidence in an arm of flesh. I desire to trust him, and I have nowhere else to go. Dear kindred, you may never hear from me again, as I feel my time is short.

Dear brother Jenkins, I have heard many express the comfort they received from that excellent letter you wrote me, which I sent to the SIGNS. It always seems new to me. I have just read the last number of the SIGNS. What a glorious communication that was from Elder Wagner on the subject of election. It is so plain that it seems any one taught of the Lord ought to understand it. The letters and the editorial were so good, I felt they were all choice fruit from the heavenly Master's garner.

Dear brethren, I did not expect to write so much, but my mind has rambled. I do not know that it will be of any use to the household of faith; but I am willing to leave that with you. I shall not take offense if I never see it in print. But if it shall be of any comfort to the least one, God be thanked. I must say to all who may read this, I love you all dearly for the truth's sake; and this we have as an evidence that we have passed from death unto life. Yes, your God is my God. I feel that this is indeed a heavenly love begotten in the heart. Then who shall separate us from this love? Many waters cannot drown it. If God be for us, who can be against us. Fare ye well, dear brethren. May the God of peace be with you. May you so conduct the SIGNS that what appears therein may be to the comfort of God's poor and afflicted people, who mourn and sigh. Live in peace, and pray for the unworthy writer.

E. D. VARNIS.

HENDRICK, Iowa, May 27, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—I see in the SIGNS of May 25th, over the signature of brother H. W. Newton, a statement that he had heard that in portions of Iowa the predestinarians had declared nonfellowship against the nonpredestinarians; and that in Texas it was just the reverse. I wish to say, in defense of what I believe to be the truth, that I think brother Newton has surely been wrongly informed in regard to the brethren of Iowa; for I have been a citizen of Iowa ever since Feb. 4th, 1874, and have spent nearly half my time traveling and trying to preach, and am personally acquainted with the majority of the brethren of our order throughout the state. I know we have precious brethren on both sides, who are in full fellowship, and have the highest regard and esteem for each other; and I believe the brethren and Elders will bear me out in saying that for the past eighteen years the doctrine of predestination has never been brought nor hinted at as a bar of fellowship, by either side, in any of our Regular Predestinarian Baptist Churches throughout the state. There may have been individual spats somewhere, but I feel safe in saying there has been nothing more. Three of our associations have raised objections to corresponding with a certain association, but not on account of the doctrine of predestination. And now, if I have misrepresented, I will thank any of the brethren of any of our associations to correct me, and oblige one who wants to know nothing but the truth.

Dear brethren, as my mind seems to go out on the subject I would like to ask a few questions, for each to answer for themselves. I will abridge all I can. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," with sun, moon and stars, and the whole fullness thereof. Do we believe that God had a purpose in it all, or do we not? If so, was the purpose first, or did it follow? If the purpose was first, was it a predestinated purpose, or not? Again, the planting of the garden, and placing Adam in it, and furnishing man an help meet, and the giving of the law, and the violating of the same, and the casting of the man and woman out, and the placing of cherubim and flaming sword; was there a purpose in it all, or was there not? Was sin mixed with it, or was it not? If so, did God purpose it, or, was sin included in the purpose? Again, "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." Did God have a purpose when he said they shall?—2 Tim. iii. 1. Again, "For God hath put it in their hearts to fulfill his will, and to agree and give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled."—Rev. xvii. 17. Read the chapter, and then answer, Did God have a purpose in putting it in their hearts, and was it a predestinated purpose? Once more, Do we believe there is anything that could possibly take place, transpire or come to pass, in heaven, earth or hell, that is contrary to God's purpose, if he had the power to check or change it? And who dares deny his power? He says, in Revelation i. 9, he is "the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty." There may be many mighties, but can there be more than one Almighty?

From a poor, old sinner, in full fellowship with all orderly walking brethren, whether pro or con on predestination.

R. SPEIRS.

NORA SPRINGS, Iowa, Feb. 21, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS:—Something says to me while reading the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, Write. But I am too unworthy to even think of such a thing, and so have tried to banish the thought from my mind; but the impression still is with me to write of what great things the Lord has done for me. I am now fifty-two years old. In the year 1859, while I was going the downward road, my God called to me. In December, 1858, I went with my father to attend a meeting, he being a minister of the gospel. His text was, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up." During his sermon a bright light appeared before me, with these words, "For why will you die?" Well, I felt condemned, and thought I was going to die. I had my little one on my lap. I could not stay in the meeting-house, fearing some one would detect my feelings. I got up and went out, and thought I would try to banish such thoughts. I cannot describe the agony of mind I suffered. I tried to banish such thoughts, but I grew worse. I thought every day would be my last. I felt that I was a condemned sinner, and that there was no mercy for me. All day long my poor soul was crying for mercy. I felt that I would be eternally lost. My prayers did not seem to rise higher than my voice. After a time there came into the neighborhood a Wesleyan Methodist minister and his wife. They held a protracted meeting, and almost everybody was being converted, while I was groping in darkness and mourning for my sins. I attended the meeting night after night; but the more I went the worse I felt. During those meetings everybody that went forward seemed to be happy in the Lord. One evening when the invitation was given for all to come forward, as I wanted to be prayed for I went forward and knelt down. As soon as I had knelt I felt as though I had done wrong; that I was trying to make people believe I wanted to be good, while I wanted to roll sin under my tongue as a sweet morsel. While those thoughts were running through my mind something said to me, "Arise; all thy sins are freely forgiven." I arose immediately and took my seat. O the joy! I never shall forget it. I was happy in the Lord. When I arose the next morning the sun was shining, and everything I looked at seemed to me to be glistening and praising God. I thought I should always be happy. But it was not long until I was in deep waters again. I wanted to join the church, and I believed the Old Baptists were the only true church. My husband being a Methodist, when I talked to him on the subject he opposed it, and would often say to me that a house divided against itself could not stand. So, as I wanted to be baptized, I joined the Wesleyan Methodists, and was immersed. But ere long I found that I was an odd sheep in that flock. I did not speak the same language they did. I got into trouble. I could not fellowship some of their ways. I left them, and have been a wanderer ever since, having a home in no church. I often feel like I want to be with the church; but I feel so unworthy that I cannot think of offering myself to them. Yet this one thing I do know, that I love the brethren. I love the name of Old School Baptists. I love the SIGNS OF THE TIMES; I find so much good food in it for the inner man. I read so many good experiences there that words fail to express the sweet comfort I receive. I want to say to the dear saints, Write on. It seems to me that if I could write such good letters as some do I would write.

Yours in hope,

E. J. JUDD.

PLEASE BE CAREFUL.

It frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. Or if the paper is being sent in her name and the renewal is sent in her husband's name the same thing is likely to occur. Please be very careful to give the same name in which the paper is already coming, also the post office address at which it is received.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

POETRY.

ISAIAH LX. 8.

"Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?"

WHEN all the doves are home,
And Christ, the Ark, is full;
Where hearts forget to groan,
And sin shines white as wool:

When all the doves are home,
Each who from Pisgah's crest
Hath plucked amid the foam
The olive branch of rest:

When all the doves are home,
And from thy windows look
On valleys whence, with plaintive moan,
Their love-bound flight they took:

Yes, when the doves are home,
Their wings of yellow gold,
Burnished within those pots of clay
Which marred their grace of old:

When, like a cloud at rest,
They brood supremely fair,
Sweet Master, from thy sheltering breast
Shall one be lacking there?

Wilt thou not from that home
Look forth, thy dove to see
Slow fleeing through life's falling gloam,
And reach thy hand to me?

MRS. J. STREET.

BRANTFORD, Ontario, July 30, 1892.

EVENING MEDITATION.

THE twilight falls, the night is near,
I fold my work away,
And kneel to One who bends to hear
The story of the day.

The old, old story, yet I kneel
To tell it at thy call;
And cares grow lighter as I feel
That Jesus knows them all.

Yes, all! The morning and the night,
The joy, the grief, the loss,
The roughen'd path, the sunbeam bright,
The hourly thorn and cross.

Thou knowest all. I lean my head,
My weary eyelids close;
Content and glad awhile to tread
This path, since Jesus knows.

And has he loved me? All my heart
With answering love is stirr'd,
And every anguish'd pain and smart
Finds healing in the word.

ROMANS VII. 18.

THAT I am vile I know full well,
But cannot half my vileness tell;
With shame I call the past to mind,
For all is vile that's left behind.

The present spread before the light
Reveals at once a loathsome sight
Of leprous sores without, within,
That makes me cry, Unclean! unclean!

While some so careless seem to be,
And from all inward pains are free,
My sore runs deep—it finds the heart,
And from me never will depart.

Where shall I go to find relief
But unto him who knows my grief?
He can my shatter'd soul restore—
Grant this, dear Lord; I ask no more.

THOMAS COLE.

ROYALTON, Ohio, Aug. 4, 1892.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MOTE AND THE BEAM.

Matthew vii. 3-5.

AS IF to screen self-convicting conscience, and silence an offended brother, who feels grieved over the errors of an offender, this Scripture has often been quoted, "And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye." To illustrate, a certain Methodist young lady in Michigan, who had fancied herself to be "sanctified," had so conducted herself that her step-mother thought to reprove her. The young woman quite sharply retorted, "Get yourself right with the Lord; get yourself right with the Lord;" no doubt feeling that as she was "right with the Lord" she was above reproach. Akin to this feeling must be that spirit which can harshly retort, Pull the beam out of your own eye before you come to take the mote out of my eye. Let me assure you, dear child of grace, that our blessed Master never intended to give us such instruction, to be thus rudely interpreted as a rule to be followed in the church of God, which is the pillar and ground of the truth.

In order that we may properly understand the meaning of this Scripture we should carefully examine the context, which will inform us that it was spoken in Jesus' memorable sermon on the mount; and that he used the eye as illustrative of one of the tenderest, as also one of the most important, members of the body. It is through the discernment of the eye, whether as a natural optical member, or figuratively, as a spiritual power of discerning things pertaining to the welfare of the saints, that Jesus taught his disciples to "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Among those good works he enumerates their sacrifices, and directs them how to conduct themselves, not only before the world, but before the church also; and he commands them (for every word of Jesus is a word of authority), "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." They are to agree with their adversary quickly, while they are in the way with him. He further told the consequences of their neglect of his holy law for the militant government of Zion; that if they failed to agree with their brother the justly condemned were to be cast into prison, and assured that they should not come out till they had paid the uttermost farthing. Surely nothing here can be taken as a permit to neglect those absolute laws which Jesus has given. While he taught them not to resist evil, this could not refer to any permit to tolerate evil in the church, but rather to avoid retaliatory retribution, and show no spirit of spite toward even an offender in any sphere of life. All that the law of Christ permits is for his disciples to live in peace one with another and with the world, and if a brother in the church fails to so live, and gives unreconciled and irreconcilable offense, even though it should be their right eye, or their most discerning member in the body or church, they are commanded (not merely permitted) to "pluck it out and cast it from" them. There is no safe alternative for the church of Christ to follow. While it is granted that many saints may greatly err, their only remedy before the church is to confess their error, which cannot fail to be a reconciling work when prompted by the Spirit of Christ.

I might mention many evils of my own nature, and daily transgressions against a holy and yet merciful Saviour, so merciful that I humbly hope I feel his blessed promise sealed to my daily experience; and I cannot help feeling indebted to his exalted power, which is able to give me, even me, a daily sinner, the sweetest sense of contrition, and of repentance toward him and his blessed people. If it might be comforting to some poor, tempted soul who was ever beset as I have been with a passionate and profane temper, let me publicly confess one special evil which but few of my most intimate acquaintances and brethren ever knew; and it may be some consolation to realize that there is even one whose haste of temper has prompted many an awful oath. Awful, I say; for I uttered them before I had a hope in Christ, and once in a long time since, amidst the emotions of remorse and of soul-harrowing fears at the terrible sense of guilt that I felt welling up from the depths of an unutterable heart, crying for deliverance from the passion that produced them. I have often thought that Jesus meant me when he recounted the traditional sayings of them of old time, who said, "Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths." The sense here limited by those "of old time" may have been false swearing or perjury; but Jesus relieved the meaning of all its narrowness, and included all meanings, and every other meaning that might be thereafter applied, not only to forswearing, but to swearing at all. This cuts off all caviling power, and binds each child of God to a strict and inexcusable obligation that their experience must coincide with; for if they swear at all by any power above or around them, to affirm or renounce, they cannot but feel at some time the evil of their oath. How important then that we cast the beam out of our eye, so that we may see clearly, not only our own imperfections, preparing us with humility as sinners, but with love as sinners saved—as sinners whom Jesus has given his blessed repentance to, to the acknowledging of our sins. "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins," &c.—1 John i. 9. This confession and repentance can only come through the Spirit, as a fruit, and not the cause of forgiveness; as an evidence of pardoned sins, and not as the reasons for which their sins are pardoned.

Forswearing must include every form of oath that assumes responsibility upon the swearer. I have forsworn, upon the assurances of others, not to divulge the secrets of an order; but I have thus been taught that I ought not to thus base my confidence so upon men that I can so bind myself upon their assurances, for I knew not what was the full purport of the oath until it was taken. However innocent all the relations to that society may have been, I only so far compromised my honor that I had no recourse but to keep the secret, in fulfillment of my oath, however evil those associations may have proved to be; and I was not allowed the decision of my own private judgment as to the true justice or injustice of every part of the order. Thus it must be in all, or there is no need of swearing, or renouncing all right to divulge them. Though I have sworn in passion, I feel not to charge God with folly, although I firmly believe that thus he eternally decreed to discipline me to a knowledge of my need of his blessed grace, also preordained to meet my desperate need of a forgiving Savior.

But let me not entirely forget the eye that has a beam within it. Let us try to look at God's blessed truth in its own true light, with both eyes open, and willing at least to see all the facts and bearings of any case brought before them; for I have learned that half-closed eyes have more beams in them than when opened wide. Try it naturally, and look at the sun, or your lamp, and you will see parallel rays of light that seem to project toward your eyes, and hinder the free vision that would be better seen upon opening your eyes to their full extent. These are the obstructing beams. So, I think, all Christ's commands will be better understood if his grace prepares us to accept in full every law that he has given, however close that law may come to our own condemnation, or to our justification in Christ. Our eye, or perceptive spiritual faculty, must be single, or devoid of double purposes. In all things pertaining to the church of God no worldly motive should be allowed to blur, half-close or becloud the true spiritual vision, nor the light of truth half-screened away for fear of some selfish loss.

Dear saint, can you guess what I mean now by casting out the beam out of thine own eye before endeavoring to pluck the mote out of thy brother's eye? If not, I will try to tell what I do not mean. I do not wish to discourage any of the feeblest ones of all God's people from following Christ because they feel their sins are so large that they cannot be forgiven. I do not mean that there is any difference in the size of sins before God. I do not mean that the church of Christ should discourage one of her feeblest members from bringing charges of grievance against another member, however honorable, wise, or apparently important. In brief, all I think that the Scripture teaches is that every saint should desire to walk in all the ordinances of the Lord's house blamelessly, and with all their sight fully opened to the understanding of the will of the Lord concerning them; willing to follow each law, singly and collectively, alone to his honor, prayerfully and humbly confessing their sins to each other and to the church; and where discipline is needful, to be ever diligent to search the Scriptures for each rule of action; not hastily, harshly, nor in any way treating a brother rudely, but seeking only his good and the good of the church. This being the humble spirit, it will be manifest in its very bearing before the offender and the church; for thus the eyes of the understanding are enlightened, and the eighteenth chapter of Matthew will be ready to give acceptable instruction. The offended brother, possessing that full sight of his own dependence upon grace, cannot go to the offender in madness, but in pity and love, telling him his fault between they two alone; alone before their God, the tryer of the hearts and reins of men. "If he hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother." How needful that it should be "alone;" first of all to the brother that is gained, when all love is answered. What terror has the neglect of this rule caused in many churches. The first rule of envy, haste or hatred has too often been shown; and this little word "alone" has proved all the barrier that lay between the alienated feelings of the injured and the injurer. Some favored friend has joined hand in hand to help settle some case before this "alone" was sought, even before the offender knew that the brother was offended. Dear child of God, never, as you love your brother, as you love your God, as you wish to obey so gracious a Savior, never whisper one word to man nor woman, no, not even to a bosom companion, that you have a grievance against your brother, till you have taken it to him alone. Then, if he is gained, do not whisper even that fact, however joyous it may be to you; for why should the world know, or your brethren know, that the brother ever sinned, except by his own confession? We can never confess for another, nor should we ask for confession beyond the parties immediately concerned; nor can true love delight to see a brother needlessly humbled for our personal satisfaction.

"But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established." Think of that "every word;" for if you have made it a matter of conversation before, where these witnesses did not hear you, and you published abroad the grievance, surely you could not depend upon those two witnesses to constitute, with yourself, the two or three by whom every word should be established; for yourself had used words, perhaps, which you would not wish established in the testimony. Open your eyes, brother, that these beams may disappear from your vision, and that you may see clearly and lovingly to pull the mote out of thy brother's eye. Still forbear to talk, even before those witnesses, until in the very presence of thy trespassing brother; for so only can you establish every word. "If he hear them," they may counsel him, if they deem him blamable. Even then accept joyfully the reconciliation; but if not, "tell it to the church." Never until after the two successive former steps are taken can it be told to the church without the direct involving of disorder in the case. As your eyes are opened to the full blaze of gospel light, pray the blessed Master to keep them open and free from beams or distorting influences that lure you away from the blessed love and laws of Christ. Accept his simple words in simple faith, for they are safe; and every addition thereto cannot but mislead you. I even hesitate to write about them, lest I cast some beam of delusive light to harass you. Let me be content then to merely write some warning words, to show your danger in departing from that law, which never can be improved.

"Tell it to the church," the church of God, after all else has been done that Christ has told you. You need not argue the case more than to state your evidence and produce your witnesses. The church shall "judge angels." It need not be told them in glowing terms what long-suffering you have shown. They can judge of that, if Christ but bless you and them with blessed understanding. If he hear the church, it is needless to explain that the church and he and you are reconciled; for the blessed Spirit must prompt all to rejoice more over one that has returned from straying than over all the rest. But if he will not hear the church, then let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican. Why as a heathen man and a publican? Because that is as you were both once, before grace possessed you. You only feel toward him in doubt, and only recognize him as a natural man; not at liberty to hate even then, but to only treat civilly as a man; showing no malice, nor feeling any, if God forbid. O may his grace smooth our rugged natures by the kindly power of his forgiving Spirit?

"Let him be unto thee" was addressed as instruction to the church present on the mount, and meant all collectively and each individually; thus showing the mutual welfare of all to be inseparably associated with each, so that the blessed rule of Christ ran throughout the body, the church, as his life-blood permeates to the farthest extremity of his frame; and he taught his disciples that if one member suffers each member suffers with it.

There is much that might be said concerning the worldly factions rent by anger, malice, rage and jealousy; but these possess not the spirit of love, and therefore are not of Christ. I have nothing to say of the eternal fate of heathen men and publicans. "That, great God, to thee is known." "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his."

As I have endeavored to show how I understand the text to apply to cases of personal trespass or offense, I desire to call attention to its application to such brethren as feel a spiritual interest in the unity of the faith of the church. There are evidences of great ambition on the part of some to drive, force or scare the saints into the throes of discord, strife or division for personal motives, I fear, and I wish they could see clearly; but I am very sensible of my own ignorance, weakness and unworthiness to try to pull any beam out of their eye. Indeed, that is neither my mission nor desire; for I realize that that is the work of the Spirit only. In order to touch a little on some of the points of disagreement referred to, I desire to connect this thought with one subject which the beams seem to change, magnify or distort, and that is the relation of the spirit to the man. (Let me here request that you, dear brethren Beebe, republish a letter written by that departed old soldier, brother Thomas P. Dudley, under date of December 25th, 1860.) I have no desire to stir up strife, but wish only to call attention to those beams which seem to affect the vision of those who make that subject a base of fellowship; and here let me say that I have never claimed to fully understand all that some brethren mean by their language on this subject, nor have I thought it essential that I should. If the beam in my eye (and there may be not only one, but many) disables me from properly understanding my brother I have the law of love to direct me, either to cast it out by seeking a full exchange of thought, or to bear with him till the mote of irritation is removed. I said that the casting of the beam out of our own eye was only the work of the Spirit; but how can it be the work of the Spirit if we have no spirit? For the things of a man knoweth no man, but the spirit of man that is in him; even so the things of God knoweth no man (the natural man is composed of body and spirit at least, and therefore by the power of both body and spirit he cannot know the things of God), but the Spirit of God. Therefore it is only the Spirit of God that must constitute a very part of the man before he possesses power to discern the things of the Spirit, or to perform any act of spiritual benefit, as casting out a beam, or hindrance to perfect vision. This is surely scriptural, and therefore is experimental with the children of God; and yet there is a mystery in it which involves much perplexity to many in our day as to what constitutes the identity of God's people. I do not claim capacity to understand it all, and yet I feel that God has beautifully cast the rays of light so mildly upon me at times that I could not deny the necessity of the new birth being in some way related to all that constitutes the child of God. Do not understand that I mean that it changes any part nor the whole of the natural or spiritual, nor of the old or the new man; but it is so related to them all as to place into one compound being all the predestinated results of experimental union with saints, the church of God, with Christ and with God, through the uniting bond of spiritual life; yet leaving each in essence unchanged, so that the identity of saints as known on earth is still unchanged in its relation to each constituent essence, and must be addressed really according to the relation he sustains to the thought conveyed in the address. If we speak of Saul of Tarsus before the new birth, we cannot properly deny but that he is the same individual naturally that he was after; but if we address him spiritually we change his name in the same manner as our language now changes names applied to chemical compounds, or to intellectual or religious combinations. We may speak of morality as one existent principle of human law. We may speak of religion as another. The combination is often called religio-moral; but this is too common to call for special impression upon our minds, unless by the Spirit we are led to see a beauty in the change of Saul to Paul, through the custom of the ancients whenever a marked change in the circumstances of life was observed in the character or office of a man. Abram must be called Abraham. Jacob must be called Israel. Daniel must be called Belteshazzar; and yet neither these names, nor any of the acts or offices of their lives, involved a change in the personal essence of any of their identities. What they were before those changes occurred in their lives they were after. God's predestination had marked each for the identical place that each was to fill, and the identical acts, at the identical time, to accomplish the identical purpose in its identical relation to every other purpose in creation, however near or remote.

I have thought it is so in the new birth, in the identity of saints. Their names are recorded in heaven, and were before the world began; therefore their heavenly identity must be named and recognized, as Christ eternally recognizes them. "Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named."—Eph. iii. 15. As saints in heaven and earth are named alike by Christ, and in that sense their names are not changed, we must remember their identity in that relation is not as we see them here, but as "The Lord knoweth them that are his." Here is the great beam, brethren, that is so perplexing the saints to-day. What man is born again? O that the Lord would so clothe us with quietude and trust that we might not strive for the mastery here; and let me ask you, brethren, to try an experiment once more. Go out and look the cloudless sun in the face again. How does it appear to you? The man with fully opened eyes will find that he can look upon it fully as long as he can with eyes half-closed; and why? Because nature draws a curtain over the pupil of the eye (which I have not space to explain), which modifies the light, and yet enables him to see more perfectly without those radiating beams that would have dazzled his half-opened eyes. So it has been with me, at least, and I have felt to apply it to my desire to investigate what my brethren mean when they say that the old man is the same old man he always was, and has never been born again, because "that which is born of the flesh is flesh," and "whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin;" and therefore if the natural or old man were born of God he would be all changed to become like his progenitor, according to the law of God, that everything shall bring forth after its kind. Surely I see no objection to this fact in the relation they put it; but as we must keep up the identity of everything in natural or spiritual existence, and until it changes its essence, we must remember the illustrations gone before, that there is a compound relation of the natural to the spiritual after the new birth, which so combines the use of the names given them that we must still call each person in the Old Testament just in the relation that each actor in those scenes called them. If we represent Belshazzar as speaking of our Daniel we must call him Belteshazzar, and Daniel would recognize himself by either name; so also with like circumstances of Abraham, Jacob, and others.

As we look upon Paul, the apostle, we are prone to esteem him for the earthly complexity that enables him to show himself so much like ourselves; but it is only because of our mutual experiences, that enable us to call him brother. The Lord met him while he was called Saul, on the way to persecute or oppose the subjects of God's grace, brought him low, and humbled him under a sense of his rebellion against God; hence how becoming is the new name given him. From Saul (demanded, ditch, hell; which aptly shows his course and nature) he is named Paul—small, little. How significant is the new title bestowed; and yet it does not change his personality. His identity remains the same; and he gives us repeated evidences from his own lips that although he uses the personal pronoun "I," he uses it in relation (sometimes) to the old man and (sometimes) to the new, and not unfrequently to his compound or (I may say) double being. When he speaks of the old man he must speak of his own experience by which he is enabled to see by faith that he is not to be spiritually recognized among the saints according to his former name, nor to be held as guilty, although the facts of his former guilt are still upon him, and the present evidence of his unchanged nature reminds him of his total dependence upon God, the evidence of his acceptance with Christ being seen only in the wonderful revelations shown to him; and he does not pretend to say "whether in the body or out of the body," but he has often told us of his abhorrence of this body of death, the evil concupiscence that could only originate from a corrupt body, and many warnings from the influence of the old man, which he has three times spoken of, in relation to his exhortations to the saints.

Brethren, are these facts clear to you? Can you not see, then, that there is somewhere or somehow a something about Paul which was not changed from natural to spiritual? Does not the evidence come home to you all also? Can you not see by your own experience that that which is born of God cannot sin? Does not your own experience prove to you that it is just with you as it was with him? Well, but a man must be born again, says one; and unless the man, the same identical man, is born over, or again, there can be no "again" birth. I never knew a brother to deny the relation of the man to the new birth; but whatever apparent contradiction exists between the two parties is only upon the disregard of the perpetuity of man's identity in the sight of God, and the lack of man's capacity to trace that identity in his own sight. If therefore men expect to trace that identity in their own sight they will be as much at bay, left as much in confusion, as our great evolutionists are in their efforts to trace a successive physical development of man down through all types of animal life, until they prove the actual line of selection and succession of organic life down from inorganic to the present type of intellectual being; or like Paul, the "little," when rehearsing what he knew of visions. He says, "I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago (whether in the body, I cannot tell; or whether out of the body, I cannot tell; God knoweth); such an one caught up to the third heaven." Let us consider how sure he was that it was "a man;" and he does not presume to settle the point whether it was a bodily man or a man without a body. He is content to tell what he knew; and it was such a man that he knew, "(whether in the body or out of the body I cannot tell; God knoweth): how that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter." Brethren, if we could only be like "little" Paul, content to tell what we know of our identity, and leave what we cannot see to God, who can see, we would lose many of those perplexing beams that rather distress us than give us any comfort.

We often look to see an object too near the sun, and we cannot see it, but feel disappointed. So it is with us spiritually, I am afraid, and we strive to peer beyond the revelations which God has given us, or has left recorded as his gift of prophets and apostles for our learning; and we gaze so long that our eyes grow weary with our squinting, until the fancied forms of real light are distorted into many beautiful images, and all of them may be only delusive beams at last. Such is sure to be the result of our best efforts in natural research after spiritual wisdom. Such beams must sooner or later be cast out of our eyes, if we be saints; but we must wait for Jesus' special word to us, which will enable us all to see eye to eye and speak the same things. While we are waiting here it becomes us to be content with little things, to suit our little person; nor should we be exalted above measure. O what a beautiful lesson, to each esteem others better than themselves. There are no hurtful beams in the vision of one's own true nature. They always prepare the child of God for suitable christian life and duty. Watchfulness and prayer are essential requisites of the laws of Christ. One may forbid that any should watch over one another for good; but it is an irresistible fruit of the Spirit of Christ. I cannot expect the brethren Beebe to publish this without first examining every thought, watchfully guarding me from the evil of intruding improper thoughts into the SIGNS. It is right that they should; and while I withhold no thought that I fear would be unpopular, I should not be careless as to the watching of every emotion of mind that directs me. Whether in joy or sorrow, hopes or fears, happy smiles or gushing tears, all should be tested as in the crucible of love, and examined under the beamless light of grace, which softens every vision into nothing but the realities of spiritual life. It may sometimes seem severe that a brother should speak one warning word, even though it be spoken in all the mildness of a father's warning or a son's filial pleading; yet it cannot fail to be done, since Christ has not only commanded it, but has put the Spirit in his sons thus to behave toward one another. The only danger there is in it is that we too often feel above receiving it. May God's love so cast out the beams of distorting hate or resentment that each child may prize the spiritual care of one another, and be blessed with the faithful love of the brotherhood.

I might briefly refer to the distorting beam that seems to affect the eye of those who, in mistaken zeal for God, fear that his eternal purposes, which he purposed in himself before the world began, may do him great injustice if he included all sin and all events in that decree. It has been said that Paul did not mean all things in an unlimited sense when he said, "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." It does seem to me that the beam in those brethren's eyes (for there are more than one) must be terribly refracted from a direct line of vision; for Paul wrote in such a manner in that immediate connection that all things in an unlimited sense were included in his declaration. In relation to the "creature," Paul says he was "made subject to vanity;" which must include whatever the creature did or suffered in the vanity to which he was made subject, or he was not subject to it. Now, if subject, he was made so (in the passive sense, as receiving the molding influence of

FEED THE FLOCK OF SLAUGHTER.

WILL brethren Beebe please give their views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on the text Zech. xi. 7? Your compliance will greatly favor a poor sinner who desires, if he knows his own heart, to know the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. Humbly trusting that I am one of the poor of whom the prophet speaks, and that some crumbs of gospel food have fallen from the pulpit and from the pens of the dear saints for me, I am your brother in hope of life in Christ,

REPLY.

"AND I will feed the flock of slaughter, even you, O poor of the flock. And I took unto me two staves; the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands; and I fed the flock."—Zech. xi. 7.

Much gratification as it would afford us to comply with the wishes of all our correspondents who apply for our views of subjects connected with the revelation of the truth of salvation as it is in Christ, it is constantly impressed upon us that there is no value in any efforts which we may make to understand the wonderful mystery of godliness. It is only as the gracious Comforter is pleased to take of the things of Jesus and show them in our own experience, that we can know anything of divine truth. All that can be attained by the researches of reason can no more discover the hidden truth of electing love and predestinating grace than darkness can comprehend light. The same Spirit by whose immediate inspiration all the Scripture is given, must shine in the heart of the saints to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God as therein revealed, and that illumination is always "in the face of Jesus Christ." However plausible may be the exposition of any portion of the written word, it is most assuredly an erroneous view if it does not derive all its shining glory from the face of that only King of righteousness, in whom it pleased the Father that all fullness should dwell. If the effect of such light as we have is to exalt the Lord in our estimation it will not fail to abase ourselves. If we are puffed up with the fancied wisdom acquired by our efforts, it will certainly reduce our appreciation of the infinite glory of our Lord. The more thoroughly our own ignorance is understood by us the more perfectly are we prepared to receive the revelation of the wisdom of God.

"And I will feed the flock of slaughter, even you, O poor of the flock." There can be no mistake in regard to the peculiar mark by which this flock is designated. Not only is it expressly declared concerning this flock that their possessors slay them, and hold themselves not guilty; but "They that sell them say, Blessed be the name of the Lord; for I am rich; and their own shepherds pity them not." Surely there could be no more appropriate name for this distressed flock than that by which they are called in our text. "As it is written, For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter."—Rom. viii. 36. So Paul says, "For I think that God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed unto death; for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men."—1 Cor. iv. 9. The most prominent fact expressed in this clause of our text is the positive assertion of the will of God in the afflictions appointed for his chosen flock. It is not left as an uncertain thing whether the people represented as "the poor of the flock" shall be an afflicted and poor people. They alone of all the families of the earth are so positively appointed to this heritage of suffering that this specification identifies them, and excludes all others from so much as desiring to be partakers in their afflictions. Nature can never wish to be positively set apart for the severe tribulation by which the saints have the witness of their joint inheritance with their glorified Redeemer. But the Spirit gives still closer description of this flock in singling out "even you, O poor of the flock." Not one of those can be included who are rich enough to say, "We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel." Only such as are the poor of that flock of slaughter can claim to be interested in this gracious promise of "the Lord my God." Let the saints not fail to observe that this poverty is an indispensable qualification by which they must read their title to the comforting assurance of the text. It is impossible that one of them should be so poor and so justly condemned that this description should cut him off from hope in the consoling assurance of the word as here written by the Spirit of gospel truth. In addressing this positive promise to the poor of the flock of slaughter, the love of God is displayed so clearly that they must confess that they are not saved by their own merits. The grace of God in Christ Jesus is magnified in the calling of sinners, who "were by nature the children of wrath, even as others," and cleansing them from all sin. Herein is displayed the inconceivable and matchless efficacy of the blood of Jesus Christ. No power short of the omnipotence of Jehovah could remove the guilt of those who were already justly condemned by the holy law of God. But consider the great love wherewith "the flock of slaughter" were loved of God in Christ even when they were dead in sin, that "He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."—2 Cor. v. 21. This provision of grace cannot embrace any others but guilty sinners, since they are the only characters who have need of justification through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Justice never condemned those who were without sin; consequently they could have no need of the righteousness of Christ for their justification. To them the reward is not reckoned of grace, but of debt. If any people stand approved before God by their own obedience to the demands of eternal justice, such characters can never truthfully ascribe their salvation to the redeeming blood of Jesus Christ. All their praises are due to their own works of righteousness. To them the exceeding great and precious promise in our text cannot be addressed. Instead of being the poor of the flock of slaughter, they are rich in the possession of merit sufficient to commend them to the favor of divine justice. The ample provision of food which is abundant in our text can afford no nourishment to such as are rich in self-righteousness. To none but the poor is this gospel preached. So in his first recorded discourse our Lord presents this as the beginning of that wonderful embodiment of his own glorious doctrine, "Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." No others are thus exalted in the judgment of our Lord. The rich are sent empty away. All who trust in their own works for justification are yet in the night of condemnation. They neither have any interest in the salvation which is of God in Christ Jesus, nor have they any desire for such righteousness as is revealed in him. All the riches of divine grace abounds toward the destitute "poor of the flock."

It is the Shepherd of Israel who speaks the comforting words of assurance in our text. He only has the words of eternal life; and the hunger of the poor in spirit can be satisfied with no other bread but that which comes down from God. Jesus is that bread of life. The gracious promise under consideration secures the reception of the food by the flock whom he designs to feed. It is not merely declared that the Lord will provide food for this flock which they may appropriate if it is agreeable to their will. David was inspired to sing the determinate counsel of the will of God in this predestinated purpose for which all things were made. He says, "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool. The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion. Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning; thou hast the dew of thy youth."—Psa. cx. 1-3. In strict accordance with this positive assurance Paul exhorts the saints at Philippi, "Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for IT IS GOD WHICH WORKETH IN YOU BOTH TO WILL AND TO DO OF HIS GOOD PLEASURE." Nothing is left to the contingency of the will of man in this important matter. The same immutable will of God, in which the subjects of his love were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world, has fixed every incident in time, so that every event must be in accordance with his eternal purpose of love and mercy by which he works all things after the counsel of his will.

Finite wisdom would not have chosen the objects of divine love subject to poverty and affliction; but the love of God chose his elect in the very furnace of affliction. This choice was directed by infinite wisdom. Whether the wisdom of this appointment of God can be understood by finite intelligence is not important. The fact that God has so chosen is conclusive evidence that nothing better could have been selected for them in all the range of his boundless dominion. Infinite love guided by perfect wisdom has not erred in choosing the heritage of his children. All the murmurings of reason are forever silenced by the attestation of the great love of God in the gift of his own Son to die for sinners, that they may be reconciled to God through the rich merit of his blood. It is of the highest importance that the saints bear ever in mind the truth that there is no distress through which they are called to pass but that it is chosen for them by that same God who commends his love to them by the unspeakable gift of his Son to die for their redemption. This love has not been attracted by any merit which rendered them deserving of divine favor. It was before sin was committed in the transgression of the commandment in the garden, before the commandment itself was given to man, that the love of God was fixed upon the subjects of his grace. Indeed, it was for the manifestation of this eternal love that the material creation was brought into existence. Every conscious sinner must rejoice that the choice of God is older than time; for certainly nothing which has occurred since the beginning of time could have attracted the favor of that God who loves righteousness. When man was formed of the dust he was pronounced very good. The same approval was given to inanimate nature. Eternal love could not have been by that goodness secured to man more than to the rest of that creation. It will not be claimed that sin brought that infinite love to man.

Then without the eternal election of his people in Christ Jesus there could be no hope for the salvation of a single one of the children of the sinner Adam. It does seem strange that human reason should object to this true doctrine of salvation. Yet none of the guilty rebels against God can with the natural mind love the doctrine of sovereign and unconditional election and predestinating grace. Every one who does rejoice in the truth of salvation exclusively by the will of God, without creature merit, must be led by the Spirit of God; and all who are so led are certainly the sons of God. To them the promise in our text is freely given, and they are the "poor of the flock" who are counted worthy to be killed all the day long for the sake of their crucified Redeemer. They can expect food from no other source but from the Lord their God. For the sake of the man who had brought upon himself death by sin, the Lord cursed the ground, which could not otherwise have been a suitable abode for a sinner; but his love did not choose this polluted earth as the resting place for his beloved children. They are but pilgrims and strangers here, as all their fathers were, and their Leader has given them the promise of tribulation as their portion in the world. But this is not a manifestation of his lack of love to the poor of the flock of slaughter. They often feel to ask, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious? Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?" But in all their trials and doubts his love has never forsaken them. Still is he ever present to feed the flock of slaughter, and to tenderly cherish the poor of the flock. He does not leave them to find their own food from the rich provision given in his inspired testimony in the Scriptures. The poor of the flock would starve if thus thrown upon their own resources. As well might the natural mother give to her helpless babe the key to her store-room, and leave it to prepare and appropriate its own food. The word of promise secures the feeding of every one of the poor of the flock of slaughter, and that without any possibility of their failing to receive the food. There is great significance in the specification of the poor, especially, or, as it is rendered in the margin, "verily the poor." If there is any one title to which the saints can tremblingly cling when all other hope seems to be cut off, it is this peculiar mark of poverty. They often feel that it is presumptuous for them to claim even the name of disciples of Christ. Their hope is often almost perished in the storm of doubts and the condemnation of their own accusing heart. Still they are not too destitute to be poor. With the richest dainties of his own immutable love he is faithful to feed them in their utter desolation of poverty. Not in the way that their own thoughts would devise does the Lord feed his poor.

They are not always delivered from their distresses by the opening of their prison doors, as were Paul and Silas; often their deliverance is in the very den of lions, as with Daniel, or in the furnace, as with the three Hebrews. But the Lord is ever faithful to his promise in feeding the poor of the flock. Since he never slumbers, he has charge of his flock night and day; therefore he can safely assure his afflicted and poor flock that "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord, and their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord." Fed upon such sweet and positive assurances as the word of the Lord affords for the poor, they may well trust in the Lord forever, for in the Lord Jehovah there is everlasting strength.

In regard to the latter clause of the verse, it is clear to our understanding that the prophet was moved to introduce another type to show forth the closing of that typical dispensation, and the removal of the ordinances of Judaism, to make room for the establishment of the gospel dispensation. The two staves are defined in the following verses as signifying the covenants which the Lord hath made with all the people of Israel, and the bond of brotherhood between Judah and Israel. There is a rich field of gospel truth embraced in the type; but at the present we are not prepared to enter upon its discussion.

Trusting that our brother will accept our effort as evidence of a desire to comply with his request, and that the thoughts submitted may be found in harmony with the standard of revealed truth, we leave the subject to the consideration of our readers, and especially of our inquiring brother Teague.

the conditions to which and under which he was made) by some external power. If we say that he was made so by Satan, it was Satan's purpose that the creature should hope; but that would contradict Satan's nature, for Paul is telling about the hope of the creature, or the created man. "We hope," he says; therefore Satan had no purpose, object, design nor plan whatever as the prime cause of his action in the temptation. God himself placed all the creatures that he ever did make just where he wanted them, not making them vain, but subject to, or the recipients of, those laws that led to vanity; subject to a destined change of character, and of consequent action. We, as recipients of the new birth, find that we are now vain; and it follows as the imperative effect of prearranged cause in every relation of life. From Adam, the first creature made, in the sense of the connection, down through genealogy to the present time, there has been nothing originating from created man but vanity; and if God made man subject to vanity, or the inevitable destiny of being to change, we only reap to-day God's purpose, and feel it in the evidences of our being. It works for good to us; not that we delight in sin, but it works a hatred of sin by the purifying influence of the Holy Spirit. The purifying benefit of blood in refineries is not to impart greater volume to the mass of sugar, but it works together, is thoroughly mingled with, and finally is separated from the granulating mass, and carries foreign matter with it out of the sweet and desirable product. So, shall I say, as blood cannot be obtained under existing, God-given, natural laws without slaughter, the child of God was so constituted in his pristine nature that he must experience vanity, with all that constitutes it, see his need of purification, led to hope in Christ, and rejoice in the blood of the everlasting covenant. I am so near-sighted that I cannot see, but feel, that if any one part of the "all things" were left out of God's eternal purpose it would absolutely defeat the whole. I cannot see so clearly as to know any event beforehand; therefore, as I am led by faith to see all the past as so far controlled by God just as he eternally decreed to, I cannot feel safe for the future without feeling the same confidence that all things, both vain and holy, work together for good to them that love God. This makes me dependent upon God for every blessing, even the life that now is, as well as a hope for the life that is to come. The life I live in the flesh is truly vain, sinful, fleeting fast away.

"But O! I long to soar
Above the reach of mortal joys,
That I may love him more."

Dear child of God, if you cannot see just how the Lord can be just and yet control all events as he pleases, please do be content to bear me company; for I cannot claim to see it all, nor can I draw one beam from your eyes. It is God's work alone, through the revelation of his own glory to you and to me. Let us wait, then, and not say, like I heard a scoffer say the other day, "If I were only God, and had his power, I would make a better world of this." Nay, my exhortation is not needed to the lover of God; for we cannot make one hair white nor black, and must submit to know that he is God.

"If devils move 'tis by consent Of him who is omnipotent."

This will answer, but it does not fully state the fact that devils are subject unto him; and if they were not to do his bidding he could eternally annihilate them.

I acknowledge the weakness of thought and expression, the subject is so far above me. May the blessed Master unseal our eyes to see and know

"All we desired or wished below;
And every tongue find sweet employ
In that eternal world of joy."

A. B. BREES.

WOOLFORD, Md., July 30, 1892.

DEAR BROTHERS:—Inclosed you will find two letters, one from our beloved Elder Beebe, the other from our dear Elder George Staton. The last was written in August, after our darling brother Benjamin had passed away. Elder Beebe's was written in December of the same year, after our precious Sally left us, sorrowing most of all that we should see her dear face no more, and never again be blessed with her wise counsel. How well I remember the comfort these dear letters were to my sainted father, like the oil of joy for mourning. Our God is rich in mercy toward all those that fear him and that hope in his love.

Your sister, I hope,

SUSIE L. WOOLFORD.

NEAR NEWARK, Del., August 31, 1871.

DEAR SISTER SALLY:—I thought, when at the station you requested me to write, I would write before now; but part of the time I have been sick, and another portion of the time I have been traveling, attending yearly meetings below, and also the Corresponding Meeting in Virginia; and most of the time I have been so dark, cold and dead, I have felt that I could not write. The first time I heard directly from any of you was a short letter from sister Susie, bringing the sad intelligence of the death of Bennie. O how I did feel for you, and for all the dear family, as well as his dear wife. Sorrow upon sorrow seems to come following in upon me, and at a time when I seem little able to bear it. I do sincerely sympathize with you and all your dear family in your last sad bereavement. I do think I know this, and have been encouraged to hope that I am one of the body of Christ; for I think I do know that when one whom I esteem as a member of the body of Christ suffers, I suffer with it; but O how hard I find it always to say, "Thy will be done." It is all very well when his will is in accordance with ours; but when death comes and takes our loved ones away from earth, and we follow them to the tomb, and know we shall never see them again in this world, our rebellious wills will rise up against his providence, who, as we know, doeth all things well. The almighty power of God alone can subdue us in such an hour. He says, "Peace, be still." "Be still, and know that I am God." When he speaks the storm subsides, and there is a great calm. I hope the dear Lord will subdue the waves of trouble that he has caused to come over you all, in the affliction he has seen fit to send upon you. It is only in the sovereignty and mercy of the Lord that we can find refuge from the storm. We cannot, with our limited knowledge, penetrate the future; but what a mercy it is that our God sees the end from the beginning; and this same mighty Lord has said, "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." But you and I are often ready to say, "If I only knew I were a child of God; if I only knew I loved God." Poor, broken-hearted sinner, stop thy murmurings, and let us ask ourselves the solemn question, Do I desire to love God? I think I hear you, and every child who has been born again, answer, Yes, I cannot deny that; but I do want to love him more and serve him better. I want to be swallowed up in his love, and be reconciled to his holy will in all things.

"I want to eat and drink my fill
Of Canaan's milk and wine;
Let Moses die upon the hill,
And I be wholly thine."

If we can from the heart say this, it is sure and certain evidence that we love God; because he first loved us. "He that loveth is born of God; for God is love." "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." We know we do love the brethren. I do know I love your dear father, and you and your sisters, and every one who bears the image of our Lord Jesus Christ. Though I feel I am less than the least of all saints, and am not worthy of a name or place among them, yet I cannot bear the thought that I must be parted from them. The language of my heart is, "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee. For thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God." Give me the lowest place among you. Let me glean after the reapers of your spiritual Boaz. Let me lay at his feet. Happy shall I be if he shall take notice of me. Though unworthy of the notice of his reapers, yet they sometimes let some handfuls fall for me, and my soul is filled with the precious wheat. A moment of the presence of my dear Redeemer is worth more to me than all the world; and methinks I can afford to endure days and nights of affliction, and suffer bitter years of sorrow, for the hope of seeing his countenance once more smile upon me, and hearing him call me his child.

My dear sister, I hope the cloud that seemed to hang over your pathway when I saw you last has before this time been dispersed by the Sun of righteousness, and that you and all the dear family, notwithstanding your affliction, may be enjoying a refreshing season from the presence of the Lord; but if it tarry wait for it; for he will surely come, and not tarry. There is a blessedness in waiting; and to wait is an evidence of faith.

Mrs. Staton unites with me in love and sympathy for you all. I do want so much to go and see you all, but cannot see when I can spare a Sunday.

Your unworthy brother in hope.

G. W. STATON.

"THE voice said, Cry. And he said, What shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field: the grass withereth, the flower fadeth; because the Spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it; surely the people is grass. The grass withereth, the flower fadeth: but the word of our God shall stand forever."—Isa. xl. 6-8.

My very dear, afflicted, bereaved, heart-stricken and grieving companions in tribulation, how impressing are the inspired words of the prophet which I have copied from the sacred volume. The voice that said, Cry, is the voice of our God, and the same which through John the Baptist was heard in the wilderness of Judea; and the same which in this chapter says, "Comfort ye my people, saith your God;" the still, small voice which in its secret whispering to your bleeding hearts bids you be still, and know that he is God. He wounds, and he makes whole. He kills, and he makes alive. He forms the light, and he creates darkness; he makes peace, and he creates evil; yes, he doeth all these things. David, in deep affliction and bitter anguish of soul, saith, "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it."

"He in the thickest darkness dwells, Performs his will, the cause conceals."
He who has said, "Comfort ye my people," has also given instruction how or with what words. Cry to God's people, "All flesh is grass." Fresh, verdant and lovely in the morning, but soon to be cut down, and wither, and return again to earth. Even the tinted flower that beautifies the field, so very soon to fade, and cease to shed its gushing fragrance through the air. The most lovely objects of our earthly love are transient, as the mellow strains of a song, or the momentary theme of a story told. The days allotted to human existence are few and full of trouble, and they fly swifter than a weaver's shuttle. All that is born of the flesh is flesh; and all flesh is grass. But the word of our God liveth and abideth forever. While our earthly relations are transitory and brief, to be dissolved by death, that relationship which is spiritual is manifest by "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." To be born of the word is to be born of God, born of the Spirit, in which birth a spiritual life is developed, in which brothers and sisters have an incorruptible inheritance, that cannot fade away; because

"These sacred bonds shall never break, Though earth should to her centre shake."
Then let these mortal tabernacles be dissolved and fall; "we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory over death, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

But I designed to try to comfort you in regard to the departure hence of our dear sister Sally. "She is not dead, but sleepeth." The grass has withered; the sweet flower has faded; the flesh has ceased to war against her spirit; the casket is broken; but the immortal spirit lives and reigns in unclouded glory. The shades of earth and the dark veil of flesh shall never more darken her vision of her God and Savior. As a child of earth, she shall never more be known; but born of the resurrection, she shall henceforth be known only as a child of God. She is now no nearer of kin to those she has left on earth than to every other member of the spiritual family of her God. Higher, nobler and more spiritual exalted joys than she ever knew on earth are hers; and when through grace we shall be caught up to the same divine abode, we too shall leave all that is earthly behind; and this mortal shall put on immortality, and this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and death be swallowed up in victory. It is that flesh, that transient grass, in us that now rebels in us, so loath to give her up; that makes it so hard for us to say, Father, thy will be done. From these infirmities she is now entirely free; and do we well to be sorry? Shall we refuse to be comforted? The Spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak. May God grant you strength according to your day, and overrule your deep sorrow to your good and his glory.

I would quickly hasten to visit you in your affliction, but I know

"'Tis God that lifts our comforts high,
Or sinks them in the grave;
He gave, and blessed be his name,
He takes but what he gave."

I have not addressed this letter to any single member of your mourning circle, but design it for you all. I shall hope to hear from you soon, especially as sister Susie, in her last letter, proposed to write again soon. I have written in some haste, and have been interrupted several times, but hope you will be able to read it. I sympathize sincerely with you, and try to pray that God may graciously sustain and comfort you; for he has a balm for every wound, and a cordial for every fear. Most truly your friend and brother,

GILBERT BEEBE.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—According to the request of my dear cousin at Horace, Upshur Co., Texas, I send you the inclosed letter for publication, which contains an account of his passage from death unto life. I hope it will be given to the readers of the SIGNS.

F. L. SMITH.

HORACE, Texas, Aug. 23, 1890.

To F. L. SMITH:—I will now try to give you an account of some of the troubles I have had on account of my sinful self, since I saw you in the year 1882. Such trouble came upon me that I could not shake it off, neither could I get from under it. I felt that I had almost lost my mind. For fear that I would, and also to get rid of my trouble, I decided that I would swallow a large quantity of morphine that I had on hand, and so sleep my life away. I did not much fear eternal torment; as I felt I had always been a very moral boy. I threw down my work and went to the house. As I stepped on the doorsteps, and saw my wife sitting in the hall with our first-born in her lap, I paused and thought, What will become of them? Then something seemed to say to me, And what will become of your soul? This almost made me drop to the ground, and to ache with fear. I turned and went into another room from where I had started, and fell across a bed, where I wept over my sinfulness. It seemed that everything I had ever done of a sinful nature rose before me. I groveled along in this way from the month of May until the second Sunday in September, 1882, feeling that the thread of life would soon be cut, and I be launched into an awful hell. Still I tried to pray, not for justice, but for mercy. Mercy was my cry until I had lost all hope of mercy, and thought that justice would mete out to me my portion, and that hell was my doom. I walked about the yard, lamenting my case, and next found myself walking the floor and singing, "Children of the heavenly King," &c. The light that shined about me I cannot describe; but everything was peace, love and joy, and I felt to rejoice. The burden of sin and guilt was gone, and I enjoyed the smiles of the crucified Savior. I could claim to be an heir of that kingdom that shall break in pieces all other kingdoms. I thought my troubles were forever gone, and that I should ever be enabled to rejoice. But, alas! I am a sinner yet. I remained as one alone for the space of a year, until these words rang in my ears almost day and night, "Go home to thy friends and tell them what great things the Lord hath done for thee." Finding no friends anywhere except among the Primitive Baptists (for all others were enemies to what I believed), I went and told them a portion of what I have here written, and was baptized. But

"Tis seldom I can ever see Myself as I would wish to be;
What I desire I can't attain;
From what I hate I can't refrain."

Yours in hope of eternal life,
N. T. LODEN.

FORT ROBINSON, Neb., Feb. 21, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—We are well pleased with our family paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. We think it defends the truth as it should be done. I do not wish to offend any of the brethren when I say I do not see how an Old School Baptist can say they do not believe in the full predestination of all things; for how could the prophets have prophesied otherwise? Even they could see into the future, and tell what would come to pass. Did they not tell of the coming of John the Baptist and of the Savior just as it came to pass? I think if some of those brethren were placed as we are, isolated from the church and from the dear children of God, they might read their Bible more closely. Then, I think, they would not find any fault with the doctrine of predestination.

The people of our neighborhood all seem to think that man is very powerful, and can help God a great deal. Their preachers say God has done all he is going to do, and the people must do the balance. I ask them if that is the way Paul did, or Cornelius. I have asked them why God placed cherubim and a flaming sword to guard the tree of life, if every man was allowed to walk up and help himself. Then they say that every one that thirsts may come freely and drink of the water of life. But a man must be thirsty before he wants to drink. Jesus said, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him; and I will raise him up at the last day." We do not believe the Arminian doctrine, so we have to content ourselves by reading the Bible and the SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

Yours in hope of eternal life through grace, and not of works,

T. G. HARRIS.

PARR, Ind. Ter., May 17, 1891.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I feel that we could hardly do without the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, for it is a source of great comfort to us. I feel greatly interested in the discussion of the unlimited predestination of all things. I feel if I had to give up that point there would be a broken link in my faith, and I would soon have to give up in despair. But I do not fear that it will ever be defeated by the combined wisdom of the world. I would love to write some for the SIGNS, but I believe it has pleased the Lord to withhold that gift from me; yet I feel to thank his holy name for giving me the Spirit of understanding. I have been trying for two years to learn of the Lord. I believe I am now learning fast. I have learned that I am as a fool, knowing nothing as I ought. I read the able writings in the SIGNS with joy and amazement. I was for eight years among the Missionaries, in Babylon; but when God's time came he showed me that it is not in man to direct his steps. I would love to write what I hope the good Lord has done for my poor soul, and of my travels; but they are too mysterious to write out to my satisfaction. I never knew anything of the Old Baptists until a year ago last fall, and that was by divine providence. I was fully prepared by the Lord for the reception of the truth. I was baptized by our dear brother, Elder A. J. Gilbraith, and was the first one ever baptized in the Chickasaw Nation, Indian Territory, and before any church was constituted. But we have now a church constituted, of over twenty members. We are all in peace, and firmly settled on predestination.

I remain, as ever, your unworthy brother, if one at all,

T. M. BERRY.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I am requested to forward for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES a notice of the decease of two aged pilgrims, and their departure from a world of sin and sorrow to a world of endless rest, viz., Wilson Chambers and Elizabeth Chambers his wife. I regret that I have been furnished with so little of the history of their long and useful lives.

Wilson Chambers was born in North Carolina, Oct. 11th, 1804, and departed this life near the town of Augusta, Hancock Co., Ill., Oct. 5th, 1886, wanting but six days of being eighty-two years of age. He was united in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Ridings, in Tennessee (I think), in July, 1825. Nine children were born to them, seven of whom survive their parents. Brother Chambers united with the Baptist Church of the Primitive order before he was married, and continued a faithful and highly esteemed member with them until his death—more than sixty years. When they came to Illinois (date not known to me) they united with the Providence Church, and continued in her fellowship while they lived, being loved by all the members.

Sister Elizabeth Chambers was born in North Carolina in 1802, and died near Augusta, Ill., Dec. 22d, 1891, in the 90th year of her age. She and her noble consort walked together along life's rugged pathway for more than sixty years. Sister Chambers joined the church where her husband belonged in 1828, and was always held in high esteem as a faithful and devoted member; and in all the relations of life she approached as near perfection, perhaps, as fallen humanity can reach in this vale of tears. Her spiritual sky remained unclouded to the last; and though now dead, her works of faith and labors of love remain.

It was the request of brother Chambers that after the departure of his wife memorial services should be held with the church of which they were members, and the meeting was arranged by the highly respected children and friends for the fifth Sunday in July, and that I and Elder L. E. Frazee should conduct the meeting. A large audience met on that day; and after singing and prayer by Elder Frazee, the writer spoke on the resurrection from 1 Corinthians xv. 51-55, followed briefly by Elder F. Elders B. R. Warren and S. L. Dark were also present, and the latter spoke ably at five o'clock p. m., it being his eighty-fourth birthday. The Lord bless the bereaved friends for Christ's sake.

I. N. VANMETER.

MACOMB, Ill.

Alice D. Findley was born July 1st, 1867, and died March 16th, 1892, aged 24 years, 8 months and 15 days.

She was a dear child, and no one knew her but to love her. She professed a hope in the blessed Savior eight or ten years ago, and joined the Primitive Baptist Church called Tygart's Valley in 1887, at our September meeting, and was baptized by brother E. P. Hart, our pastor. When she came up out of the water I thought I never had seen any one's face shine as did hers; and when I stood by her death-bed I thought of her beautiful face in baptism. O how lonely I am without her! Her sickness was a sad thing to me. She had been to visit her sister, twenty miles from home, and while there was taken with "La Grippe," the day after Christmas. The disease seemed to settle in her head, which caused her to suffer beyond description. She did not dread death, and would often talk to me about dying. She seemed to long for her home in heaven. A few days before her death she prayed her heavenly Father to come and take her home to heaven; and I believe he did. She died without a struggle, and looked pleasant in death. She had been sorely afflicted for several years. Her daily walk and conversation proved that she was a christian. She died at her sister's home, H. A. Taylor, and we brought her home and buried her in the family burying-ground. She was never married. She leaves father and mother, five sisters and three brothers, with many friends.

"Tis finished! the conflict is past,
The heaven-born spirit has fled;
Her wish is accomplished at last,
And now she's entombed with the dead.

"No sickness, no sorrow, no pain,
Shall ever disquiet her now,
Since death to her spirit was gain,
And Christ was her life when below."

A sorely afflicted mother, EMELINE FINDLEY.
TALBOTT'S, Barbour Co., W. Va.

DEPARTED this life on July 12th, 1892, Jeremiah Wood, aged 82 years.

He had been in poor health for several years, and had several hard attacks of "La Grippe." On the first day of July he was taken very bad, and suffered greatly with heart trouble; and on Tuesday morning at three o'clock he quietly passed away without a struggle. We have evidence to believe that he is at rest. While he was sick he said to his son that he longed to be at rest. About one year ago he requested his son to read the second chapter of Ephesians, and to write down the eighth and ninth verses. He was not a member of any church, but it was his greatest delight to hear the Scriptures and other good reading. His wife's father, Elder Hezekiah Stites, was an able Baptist minister. He was a reader of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. He was kindly cared for by his only living son.

His funeral was largely attended on Thursday, July 14th. Elder Curry was present, and read the second chapter of Ephesians, and spoke words of comfort, using for his text the eighth and ninth verses: "For by grace are ye saved," &c. He leaves one son, three grandchildren, four great-grandchildren, one sister, and other relatives and friends, who will miss him.

"Asleep in Jesus! blessed sleep!
From which none ever wake to weep."

DIED—July 28th, 1892, of consumption, Albert Murray Dallison, aged 35 years and 13 days.

On the Sunday previous to his death I was requested to baptize him, which I did, in Baldwin's Run, about forty rods from his widowed mother's house, in Lancaster, Ohio. So great was his desire to be baptized that he reluctantly waited until about four o'clock p. m., that his strength might rally sufficiently to be carried on a cot by loving hands to the baptismal waters, when with scarcely strength to walk I led him to the place of burial in the liquid grave; and after arising from it a new world of joy seemed to burst open to his view. He was assisted to his little cot and carried back to the house, on the way to which his joy seemed to know no bounds; and many tears of joy filled the eyes of those present who understood the language of Canaan. "Surely," said one, in broken accents, "you have baptized a child of God." After returning to the house a few hymns were sung, among them, "O how happy are they," &c. Prayer was then offered by Elder Wm. Fisher, who also preached at his funeral on July 30th. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

Yours in hope,

THOMAS COLE.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

THE SOUL'S TRIUMPH.

O how the thought delights the soul
Redeemed from Satan's dire control,
And cleansed with Jesus' blood,
That thus from sin and death set free,
I may in Christ shout victory,
And triumph in my God.

And art thou safe, O soul of mine?
Art thou in Christ through grace divine?
Hast thou the proof within?
Thanks to my God, the stream of love
Has reached my heart from his above,
And borne away my sin.

In Christ! O how the blissful thought
Buys up the hope his love has wrought
'Midst change and grief and woe!
Were crowns and empires mine to-day
I'd freely give the whole away—
For Christ I'd all forego.

Ere time began the church was bless'd;
For her Jehovah love possess'd
From vast eternity.
Redemption, calling, pardon, peace,
Are streams which flow from ancient grace,
Unmerited and free.

Go, trace salvation from its source;
From God it flows—mark well its course;
The whole his love sets forth.
Love brought the Savior from the skies;
Love quickens, keeps, and glorifies—
O who can speak its worth?

Could blades of grass and leaves of trees,
And every wave and every breeze,
Ten thousand tongues employ;
Could sun and moon and stars essay
To warble out the glorious lay
In universal joy:

E'en were they joined with heavenly choirs
In notes attuned to golden lyres,
The whole would try in vain;
Not winds, nor trees, nor earth, nor sea,
With heaven's bright host in harmony,
Could reach the boundless strain.

O then may I, so weak, so frail,
Attempt that song which all must fail
To sing in worthy lays?
Our glorious God does not despise
The lisping voice and lowly cries
Which babes and sucklings raise.

I'll sing, In Christ I've naught to fear,
If pierced at once with death's dread
spear;
'Tis dipp'd in blood divine.
His aspect may the guilty soul
With terrors and despair appall,
But life through death is mine.

What though a sudden blast descend,
And all the bands of nature rend
Swift as with forked fire;
I take my flight from sin's abode,
A moment brings me to my God,
My soul's supreme desire.

Then watch, my soul, my Lord will come,
And in his arms convey thee home;
Watch thou, and praise, and pray.
With well-trimmed lamp and burning
light,
Wait for thy Lord—earth's passing night
Will bring thee endless day.

CORRESPONDENCE.

STATE ROAD, Del., August, 1892.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—It may be proper and profitable to start a criticism now and then upon some point in the long-established order of the churches; but I have been rather inclined to question the propriety of such criticisms, as they sometimes lead to unpleasant debates and dissensions where all was peace and quiet before. There has occasionally for a number of years been a question raised as to the authority or propriety of the church giving a man license to preach. I speak of it in this way because it is the way in which I find others speaking of it. All the part I have ever taken has been in the way of counseling or assisting churches in regard to some such action. Although I have not felt to be in accord with everything that has been written on this topic, I am not going to discuss it with anybody, but simply offer for the consideration of brethren my own observations and experience.

Some terms used by brother A. B. Brees, and by Elder Beebe in reply to him, are new to me. Probationary licenses, and licenses to preach as a probationary precaution of the church, are terms that have not been used, nor the propriety of their use recognized, in any case that I have known. That authority is vested in the church to preserve order, and to judge of the gifts and qualifications of her own members, will not be disputed. If those brethren who have discussed this subject have never encountered in the churches some unruly and vain talkers, they have fared better than I have done. License is simply liberty. If all have or ought to have liberty to speak in the church meetings without a vote or any special action of the church as they may be impressed, it will certainly follow that if there should be a disposition on the part of some to do much talking, in which there was no profit, there would of necessity be some restriction required. If it were not immediately upon the first organization of the church, it could not have been long until an office was required similar to what we now designate as "Moderator." They were called Elders, in distinction from others who were called Bishops; and it seems that some of them labored in word and doctrine, while others did not. This would seem to show that men might be ordained as Elders who were not preachers. So the apostle speaks of those that rule well. We have to do with things as they are, and that is not always just what should be. Those who would serve the church ought always to be submissive to the judgment of the church; but when some one is resolved to preach, when no one can discover any profitable gift, it becomes necessary for a call to order from some quarter. I have known different times when churches have undertaken to hold meetings in the absence of any preacher, that some one would at once assume the preacher, and go on and occupy all the time, giving no room to others whom all would love to hear, and then no edification nor profitable instruction at all in it. In such cases, I suppose from want of knowing what better to do, or else not being conscious of possessing authority, the meetings have been discontinued and the house locked up. It has been the case sometimes that the brother is otherwise a worthy and zealous member; and this tends to make it more difficult to restrict him, either by the authority of the Moderator or the voice of the church. If any brother shows an aptness to teach, and his speech is seasoned with grace, why should not the church give him liberty, and even encouragement, to exercise his gift? I think the brethren will feel inclined for their own sake to call for the exercise of a gift that tends to instruction and edification. A brother who is diffident, and subject to doubts and misgivings about his ability to profit the brethren, may feel to greatly need some expression on the part of the church of her approval of his efforts in this behalf. If the brethren feel that there is ground for encouragement, I do not know any possible reason why they should not express it. The practice of the churches has generally been to sanction the exercise of a brother's gift at first within the bounds of the church of which he is a member, and afterward, as they feel warranted, extend that liberty, if the brother should feel disposed to travel and visit among other churches, wherever a door should be open to him. This liberty, as I understand it, is subject to recall; and we have had some rather painful experience in regard to the necessity of such precaution. There have been instances where there seemed to be considerable promise in the start, that there was no growth afterward, and the gift, if there were any, waxed dim. I remember hearing an aged and rather distinguished preacher at one time openly denounce the practice of giving license, as it was called, as unscriptural and improper, and that instead thereof the man should be ordained at once. It sounded strange to me, as coming from a man of age and of much experience. Ordaining a man will not confer any gift upon him. It has sometimes destroyed a man's usefulness, and also his comfort, and the comfort of his brethren with him, putting him in a place that he was not able to fill, and subjecting him to the consequent indifference and neglect of his brethren. "He that believeth will not make haste." If the Lord has conferred a gift for usefulness in the church, time will prove it. A gift that God has given for the purpose of profiting his people will not wither nor die out for want of ordination. No harm will be likely to come from a reasonable delay. Let the gift and all the other qualifications be fully proved, and then brethren can act in harmony and confidence, feeling that the Holy Spirit is indeed directing them in what they do. While we see the propriety of all these things in their practical operation in the churches, we are not without full instruction by the apostle in regard to this matter. He informs us that some men's shortcomings are open beforehand, going before to judgment, but in other cases they follow after; and so, after giving a list of qualifications, he enjoins that these must be, and that they must be proved. In order to this he charges in a positive injunction, "Lay hands suddenly on no man." In those cases where a man's defects were open beforehand it is not so likely that ordination to the work of the ministry would be undertaken; but as there are cases where it requires time to develop the shortcomings, sufficient time should be allowed for the proof of all the required qualifications. I think most of our brethren have known instances of what were called ordinations where not only none of those qualifications had been proved, but evidently had been none there to prove. I fail to see how brethren are going to act intelligently and with divine warrant unless there has been opportunity to observe a man's deportment in the church and in his family, and whether there is growth, and a showing that he is a scribe instructed in the things of the kingdom of God, to bring things both new and old out of that treasure.

We are not informed how long those prophets and teachers had been speaking and exercising their gifts in the bounds of the church at Antioch before the Spirit directed the setting apart of two of them to the more enlarged work of the public ministry. I presume that what the Spirit directed then was in perfect accord with what the inspired apostle afterward taught. If the practice of the churches in this respect is to be criticised, let it not be in regard to giving time and opportunity for proof of a man's gifts and qualifications, but rather because of undue haste in some cases. I have not spoken particularly of what is called a written license, or what may be called a copy of the church's action for a person to carry with him. This of course would only be necessary when the brother was minded to travel where he would not be known. The time has been in this country when a day's ride on horseback would take a man beyond his acquaintance, and where if he would mingle with his brethren it would be necessary for him to carry a certificate from the church to which he belonged. If he would be recognized as a minister by them he should have something to show that he had the sanction of his church in this thing. There is such general intercourse and correspondence now among the churches that there is not the same need of credentials to be carried along, nor the same necessity for guarding against imposition. I have, however, known of instances where private members have traveled abroad and represented themselves as authorized by the church to preach, but making such failures at it that it became necessary to write to the home church for an explanation. If the church is willing to recognize a gift as profitable, and to sanction the exercise of it abroad, it is an easy matter to say so, and will not be likely to result in any harm.

I may be understood, then, as being satisfied with the general practice of the churches, both as to propriety and scriptural authority. Any deviation from the landmarks which the fathers have set will be likely to result in disorder and harm rather than good. In the meantime let us pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers into his harvest. The harvest is plenteous and the laborers few, at least in this section of country.

In gospel bonds,

E. RITTENHOUSE.

BLANCO, Texas.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—In the very imperfect sketch I sent you on the subject of election, I was last treating on that part of it considered unconditional. In continuance I will further consider it in reference to some seeming adverse teaching to that of the apostle in the ninth chapter of Romans, as well as other portions of Scripture. And although I feel assured that the piece I sent you is very faulty, yet I cannot promise that this will be less so, as it seems I cannot in writing give a true copy of what is on my mind.

In the close of the apostle's chain of argument in reference to Jacob and Esau he says, "What if God, willing to show his wrath, and to make his power known, endured with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction, and that he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory?" Some hold and contend that God prepared the elect for glory; but the others, or those not embraced in election, fitted themselves for destruction. But the question arises here, When and under what circumstances did the nonelect fit themselves for destruction? We learn from the Bible that God created one man, Adam, and gave him and his race a law, and that he and his race, as represented by him, violated and fell under the curse of the law, and were all alike guilty, and in a state of condemnation; so that if in this the nonelect fitted themselves for destruction, so did the elect. But it is said that the nonelect did by their own obstinacy and willfulness in sin fit themselves for destruction. But this view of it involves the idea that though election is eternal, yet its counterpart, or nonelection, is a thing of time; which is not only inconsistent, but impossible, and contrary to the Scriptures and christian experience; for if election is eternal, and is choosing from among, how, I ask, is it possible for those left, or not embraced in election, to be a thing of time? Nor will the sensible or enlightened sinner admit that it was in view of any goodness, obedience or pliability in him, either foreseen or otherwise, that electing love has fixed upon him as one of its subjects, or he was made to differ from others, or the nonelect. But with the inspired apostle he will feel that he is one of the chief of sinners. It seems clear to my mind that were it possible that those not embraced in election were rejected alone in consequence of their rebellion and their many and grievous sins, the elect would be chosen because of possessing the opposite qualities of goodness and obedience. But we are assured that this view of it is contrary to the whole tenor of the inspired word and christian experience. Again, it is said that God did not fit the nonelect for destruction; for he saw them, it is said, in themselves, both deserving wrath and fitted for the place of torment and the society of fallen angels. But unless it can be shown that the elect in themselves were in a different state from the former, that is, that they were walking in a way of holy obedience, and therefore were chosen to salvation and eternal glory; I say, unless this opposite conduct on the part of the elect be shown, the above statement, and all arguing founded upon it, falls to the ground. But the apostle says the elect Ephesians "were by nature children of wrath, even as others."—Eph. ii. 3. So that in whatever sense, and to the same extent, the one fitted themselves to destruction, so did the others. It therefore follows, and is in perfect accord with the Scriptures, and with the perfections of God, their great Author, that the sole cause of this immense difference is in himself. But it is thought that this view of the subject removes the responsibility of man; for it is said that if we account for sin in a way to excuse man from it, we destroy the need of mercy and grace. Again, it is said, "But if sin in man is a blemish, and something evil and blameworthy, it cannot be from God." Now, it seems that the above view of the subject is erroneous, from many and very grave considerations; for it supposes, first, that if the sinner does not possess perfect freedom of will, so that his acts would be independent of his Creator, he would not be blameable, or that his acts would not be sinful. It also supposes that if the sinner does not possess this liberty of will he is not responsible for his acts, and therefore it would not be right for his Creator to hold him accountable or punish him. It further supposes that there would be no necessity for grace and mercy in the salvation of sinners, as there would be no sinners to save. Again, the idea is involved that finite minds can so grasp the counsels of eternity that they can set up a standard, or provide a rule of right, whereby their Maker should regulate his conduct toward his rebellious creatures, or be liable to the charge of injustice; for if, as stated in the language quoted above, we must not account for sin in a way to excuse man from it, it seems we must adopt and apply a rule of our own, independent of the word, works and glorious character of our Sovereign. Then, I suppose, to account for sin in a way to have man accountable for its commission, we must have him endued with perfect liberty of will; for if his surroundings (of which God is the author) are such that he cannot act otherwise than he does, or he acts from necessity, his acts (according to the above theory) would not be sinful. But if any act independent of God, they are not in line with the Athenians and the apostle; for he said to those Athenians that it is in God we live, and move (or are moved), and have our being.—Acts xvii. 28. And the prophet says, "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself; it is not in man that walketh [or acteth] to direct his steps."—Jer. x. 23. But the theory that I am considering says, It is not in God that the sinner moves, or acts, and the way of man is in himself, or his acts would not be sinful.

There are numerous other texts of Scripture in proof of the point, but these are sufficient. It seems fully implied in the theory I am refuting, that if God surrounds his creatures with such circumstances that they are necessarily led into sin, they are not guilty, nor can their Creator hold them responsible for an act they could not avoid. For they seem to think that the act in that event would not be theirs, but God's, and therefore they are not blameable. But by parity of reasoning they could as easily conclude that if God works in his believing children both to will and to do all those acts of holy obedience, and that without him they can do nothing spiritually good, such acts were not theirs, and therefore they were neither commendable nor praiseworthy for such acts of obedience; and we know that such a view of it would destroy the personal identity or individuality of all God's rational creatures, and would be subversive of the relationship of Creator and creature, and runs counter to the whole tenor of Bible teaching and christian experience, and is altogether incompatible with the infinite perfections and glorious character of our God. For the mature and prayerful consideration of those who suppose they can devise and formulate a plan of government for our Sovereign, in connection with the inspired word, I will call attention to a verse of poetry, as follows:

"Lord, we adore thy vast designs,
The obscure abyss of providence;
Too deep to sound with mortal lines,
Too dark to view with feeble sense."

Again, it seems to be thought by some that if God had anything to do with the entrance and reign of sin in the world it would detract very much from his honor in the displays of his grace and mercy in the salvation of his people; yet they say that sovereignty and goodness belong to him, but not cruelty. Nothing can be more true than this declaration; that is, that God is an absolute Sovereign, and infinite in goodness; and these perfections were as fully possessed by him before he created the world, and formed and placed man upon it, as now; and all the varying dispensations, incidents and events that have or will transpire in time will not affect or cause any change in him; for it is but the operations of divine providence unfolding the counsels of eternity, or a development of the purposes of God relative to all the events of time, both human and divine. How absurd then the suggestion of cruelty in the high and lofty God, who inhabits eternity.

But it is said that God has given us certain ideas of right, justice and goodness; and that when we think of God, or any of his intelligent creatures, we do so with these ideas of goodness; that we cannot look upon God as a good Being unless we have some idea of what goodness is. This clearly implies that we must judge God and his acts by the same rule that we judge our fellow-man and his acts, and so conclude that what would be cruel in man would be cruel in God. For instance, it would be cruel in God to move or cause David to sin against him by numbering Israel and Judah; to send the Chaldeans and Sabeans to carry away the good old patriarch Job's property, and to kill his children, and afflict his person with sore boils; to harden Pharaoh's heart against letting Israel go, and bringing all those heavy and grievous calamities upon him and his people, to make him willing to let Israel go. "And David's heart smote him after that he had numbered the people. And David said unto the Lord, I have sinned greatly in that I have done; and now, I beseech thee, O Lord, take away the iniquity of thy servant; for I have done very foolishly." Job said, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." He said to his wife, "Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" Again, he says, "He [God] is in one mind, and who can turn him? and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth. For he performeth the thing that is appointed for me." Now, if we are to judge of God's character and his sovereign acts (of which the above is a mere sample) by such methods or maxims as apply to men in the moral and social relations of life, or by the ideas that God has given us of right, justice and goodness, then we will readily conclude that those acts relative to David, Job and Pharaoh were cruel or unjust.—2 Sam. xxiv. 1; Gen. ii.; Rom. ix. 17. To which I say, God forbid. And the great apostle Paul by one stroke digs up and casts all such teaching to the four winds, as follows, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments [or decrees], and his ways [or the acting of divine providence] past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor? or who hath first given to [or deserved] him, and it shall be recompensed unto him again? For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things; to whom be glory forever. Amen."

Now, in view of such a sweeping refutation and complete annihilation of the supposition of cruelty or injustice in God in the most complicated exigence to which by his providence he has subjected any of his creatures, and in dealing with them makes his sovereign will his only rule, even to the destruction of nations, including women, children, and beasts of burden; in view of all this, I say, how presumptuous, and even blasphemous, in us creatures of a day, dust and ashes, poor creatures, who in our best estate are altogether vanity, to prescribe rules for our Sovereign by which to regulate his conduct in dealing with his rebellious subjects. It does seem to me that if this inspired apostle had this theory I am reviewing in full view when he penned the language, he would not have more fully covered the case and demolished the theory.

This contains but few of my objections to this teaching; but it is lengthy enough. I may write again on the same subject. This was written in view of my Sovereign's honor.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—To the brethren, sisters and friends who read the SIGNS OF THE TIMES I desire to speak a few words by way of comfort and encouragement. When Moses went out one day and found one of his brethren striving with an Egyptian, he slew the Egyptian. We should always be ready to fight for our brethren. But when Moses went out the next day he found two of his brethren striving together, and said to them, "Ye are brethren." When we see brethren striving, that is, fighting, it hurts us. When we find our dear brethren speaking hard words to each other we feel sorrowful. The followers of our blessed Lord and Master look for hard words and speeches from the enemies of truth; for the blessed Jesus has said, "I have chosen you out of the world; therefore the world hateth you." He also said, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another as I have loved you." When we can see this love manifest among our dear brethren we thank the blessed Lord and take courage. We feel assured that the Lord reveals unto each of his dear children just as much of his blessed word as pleaseth him, and we should be satisfied with the gifts that the Lord gives his church, for they are all needed; not one more nor one less. Those to whom the Lord has revealed a great portion of his word should bear in patience and love with those who are weak. A hard word from any of my dear brethren hurts me more than all the hard speeches of the enemies. Dear children, we are brethren, as sure as we have been born again, and are the generation of Jesus Christ. The Lord's ministers should take heed to themselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost has made them overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. They should remember that they are brethren in Christ Jesus, and the good of the church and the glory of God they should have at heart. Jesus said to Peter, "Lovest thou me more than these?" "Feed my lambs." "Feed my sheep." We are an afflicted and poor people at best, and need comforting, else the Lord would not have said by the prophet, "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God. Cry unto her that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins. The same prophet says, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. This, dear children, is our blessed Lord and Savior, the author and finisher of our faith. The angel said of him, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." Behold the blessed Jesus crowned with thorns. The rugged nails were driven through his blessed hands and feet, the spear pierced his blessed side, and forthwith came blood and water. Dear children, all this our dear Savior bore for our sins. Was ever love like this? Then hear him cry, "It is finished." He fought our battle, and won the victory for every vessel of mercy chosen in him. The sun refused to shine, the rocks were rent, the mountains quaked, when the debt of the generation of Jesus Christ was atoned for. Jesus has a receipt in his blessed hands and feet for the full and complete payment of your sins, dear ones. He said, "A body hast thou prepared me. Yea, I delight to do thy will, O God." This blessed Jesus is the only Savior of poor sinners. This is "the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved."

Dear children, there are many dear faces I never shall see in the flesh, who will be permitted to read this letter, if published. I will say to you, as Joseph said to the butler in the prison, "Think on me when it shall be well with thee."

I have read many precious letters and editorials in the SIGNS; and I thank my dear friends for paying for and sending me the paper. I feel to be a poor old sinner. May the blessed Lord knit our hearts together in love, as the hearts of Jonathan and David were knit, that we may esteem our brethren and sisters better than ourselves.

Yours in hope of eternal life,
JAMES MURPHY.

TOLUCA, Ill., June 2, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Several times I have thought of trying to write a little to the saints scattered abroad, when the time has come to renew my subscription; but I have about as often thought it was only by the flesh I was prompted thus to do; and if it be only the promptings of the flesh it were better for me not to write, for "the flesh profiteth nothing." I feel that in my flesh there dwells no good thing. Unless the Spirit directs I cannot edify. I can only write in a rambling way, as I am weak in mind and body. While it has been the will of our heavenly Father to call from earth many of the dear saints in the near past, yet my unprofitable life is spared, although in a state of ill health. For several months I have been afflicted with spinal disease. This of necessity involves much depression and gloom of mind. I have been in a rather cold and desponding condition. At times the grave has seemed not far away, and I have thought, How can I bear to stand upon its verge without the presence of the dear Savior with me! At one time while thinking thus I was comforted by the prayer of the dear Redeemer when he uttered that memorable prayer, "If it be possible let this cup pass from me." If he in his flesh dreaded death's cold flood, we need not be surprised when we at times feel the flesh to be weak. But it seemed hard for me to say, "Nevertheless not my will, but thine be done." If there is to be an extended time of suffering before me, I have tried to ask for grace to bear it; or if I shall soon be called hence, that I may be made ready and willing to go. I have been made to review my life, to see if I could not find some good thing to merit divine favor; and after utterly failing to find one good deed, I have been brought to acknowledge the language of the poet,

"Nothing in my hand I bring; Simply to thy cross I cling."

It seems to me I have brought no fruit to perfection. I have been made to wonder of late why it is that I feel the strongest fellowship for those who tell of their inability to do good, causing me to have full confidence in them, while I have no confidence in myself for the same feelings, unless it be that we are of those who "worship God in the Spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." I was comforted not long ago by an expression from that very dear brother, Deacon John Fellingham. In telling him of my coldness, and my strong inclination to mind earthly things, he replied, "If you are a child of God you will never be any better." I realize that it is "not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us," and called us; yet much of the time I cannot feel myself included in the election of grace.

I have had a desire to visit the eastern associations; and to forget the things of the world, and to meet those brethren and sisters whom I regard as being more devoted to the cause of the Master than I have been. The SIGNS has never before been so precious to me as it has been for the past few months. In this sense I can say, "It is good for me that I have been afflicted." I have not seen any other paper that suited me quite as well as the SIGNS. Inclosed please find remittance for renewal of my subscription. More than once has the tempter suggested, while writing these scattering thoughts, that I know nothing about spiritual things, and that I am only trying to deceive those who do. And now

EVERY MAN'S WORK TRIED.

"For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; every man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire."—1 Cor. iii. 11-15.

By request of a sister who wishes to be unknown, our attention is called to the subject contained in this portion of the inspired record of divine truth; and as is our custom in treating upon the important theme of that sacred testimony, it is presented in the connection in which it is written by the pen of inspiration. No exposition can be correct unless it is in harmony with all the truth written by those servants of God who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. For this reason it is always safe to let the connection explain the proper meaning of every text.

It will be observed that the work figuratively represented here as building is but the development of that which was designed by the Master in the beginning, when the foundation was laid. Let it not be forgotten that Jesus Christ is that foundation, and that it is expressly said to be impossible that any man should lay any other foundation. No building can be upon this foundation at all unless it is acknowledged that the work of the Redeemer did accomplish all the will of God in saving his people from their sins. It necessarily follows that there is no foundation for any other doctrine but the complete salvation of all that were chosen unto life in Christ Jesus. All such doctrines as represent the everlasting happiness of men as depending upon works or will of their own, must be included among those delusions which arose out of the bottomless pit. Since there is no foundation for any false doctrine, the origin of all error must be bottomless. Even now the sun and the air are darkened by reason of this smoke of the pit, which overshadows all the world. And when the saints become so carnal as to seek light from the smoky fires of reason, they are deceived by the false and flitting meteors which are called "wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." When they are so bewildered as to attempt to lay another foundation, only the Spirit of truth can deliver them from their bondage of corruption. The admonition of our text applies to those who recognize the true foundation, and warns them of the importance of taking heed how they build thereupon. They are not exhorted to be careful to lay their foundation securely. The reason is given in our text, "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." This is regarded as settled in the mind of the saints; now they are to be very particular how they build upon this foundation. It is not to be inferred from this admonition that the saints are commissioned to build upon this foundation by converting unbelievers and getting them to make a profession of believing the doctrine of salvation by the grace of God as it shines in Jesus Christ. That work has never been committed to created beings. The Spirit of truth alone gives to the dead sinner that life which enables him to cry for deliverance from the power of sin. This is the witness which the believer has in himself. However dark and weak he may be in his subsequent experience, he knows no other hope of deliverance but through that grace which was displayed to him first in his translation out of darkness into the marvellous light and liberty of the sons of God. He may often anxiously question his evidence of having received that deliverance; but he can never find comfort in looking for relief from any other source but the infinite grace of God which is revealed in Jesus Christ. However destitute of assurance that his own evidence is genuine, there is no other foundation upon which he can build his hope for final deliverance, or expect the salvation of any lost sinner. In every one who is led by the Spirit of God Jesus Christ is the embodiment of all grace, the only way, the only truth, and the only life, whereby the sinner must be saved.

"Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble." This clause must be considered in the illustration of building, which is presented by the apostle in recording the divine truth shown him by the Spirit. In literal building the valuable and substantial precious stones and metals here specified suggest beauty and durability; while the perishable materials named must be consumed by the fire which is to try every man's work. It is of vital interest to the saints that they should rightly understand how they are to build upon this foundation. They are conscious of their utter inability to build as the carnal worshippers profess to do, by adding to the number of those who worship God in spirit and in truth. With bitter grief they realize that they cannot even render acceptable praises to God in their own hearts; much less can they claim power to inspire that worship in those who are dead in carnal enmity against God. But even if they could convert dead sinners to the love of God, they would then be building upon another foundation, since Jesus Christ could not sustain that work which men had done without his authority. But it is needless to further demonstrate the absurdity of such a construction of the teaching of the word of truth. The experience of every saint revolts at such a perversion of the divine teaching. The fact has been already shown that the only characters who can build upon this foundation must be living subjects of saving grace. Evidently they are not represented as qualified to give to others that eternal life which they could have no power to secure for themselves. They must then build in a different sense from this popularly received notion. In this case, as in every other, it is safe to be guided by the revelation which God has given. Jude says to them that are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called, "But ye, beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost, keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life." There is no building upon this sure foundation in any other way but in the love of God. They in whom this heavenly fruit of the Spirit is manifest must be led by that Spirit of God which produces love as its first fruit. As many as are so led are declared to be the sons of God.

It is absurd to construe the language of this verse as indicating that dead sinners have power to build according to their discretion upon that tried stone, elect, precious, which is laid by the eternal God in his Zion. Reference to the preceding portion of this chapter can leave no question that the admonition in our text is confined to those whom Paul recognizes as his brethren, who were laborers together with him, as God wrought in them; they were God's husbandry, and God's building. In that sense they were themselves with the apostle, and all the inspired servants of God, built as lively stones in the spiritual temple of the Lord, "to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ."—1 Peter ii. 5. It is very inconsistent to suppose that as stones in the building of God they are authorized to build other stones in the temple of which they are themselves made partakers only by the infinite grace of God in Christ Jesus. If such material could be brought in, it could not be said to them, "Yet are God's husbandry, ye are God's building." They would be the husbandry and building of those by whose efforts they had been added to the temple.

The subjects of redeeming grace build upon the foundation of God in Christ Jesus when they walk in implicit obedience to his commandments, thereby testifying that they love him. Such building is fitly represented by the beauty and durability of "gold, silver, precious stones." There is no possibility of their suffering loss in obedience to the holy commandments of the King in Zion. The infinite power of God is the defense of every one who thus trusts in him. As surely as the throne of his own omnipotence endures, every work which he has commanded shall prosper; and they who render obedience to his divine directions are safe under the shelter of the omnipotence and faithfulness of his own truth and immutability.

In contrast with this secure and permanent building is presented an equally appropriate illustration of that course of disobedience which is suggested by natural reason. Since the trial of every man's work is by fire, it is certain that all such combustible material as wood, hay, and stubble, must be consumed by that fire. This is not declared in reference to the final destruction of all enemies against God in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone. It is the fire of divine truth which shall try every man's work. However any work may appear commendable in the light of reason, it must be brought to the test of the infallible word of the Lord. This is his fire which is in Zion, and his furnace which is in Jerusalem, as he says by his prophet, "Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?"—Isa. xxxi. 9; Jer. xxxiii. 29. All such works of the saints as are not authorized by this inspired word of the Lord, recorded by divine direction, must be consumed by the brightness of his coming in his living word; by which he shall judge the world in righteousness. Such is the deceitfulness of sin in the mind of the saints that they are often gratified with the imagined goodness of some work which has been prompted by their natural reason, and they may in their own thoughts claim to be rich in such false imaginations. But the day of trial shall declare it. The same fire which refines the gold, will utterly consume the wood, hay, and stubble. It is of the trial of the work of every man that the apostle is here speaking, and not of the final judgment of the ungodly. As the fire and furnace can be found only in Zion, it must be remembered that this trial affects none but those whose dwelling is in the holy hill of our God. Even in the organized church of Christ, which is the Zion of God, this fire tries every man's work; how severe must be the condemnation resting upon those who defy the holy commandment of our Lord, and yield themselves servants to their own natural reason! Surely they must experience the rod of chastening in a more fearful way than those who in weakness have sought to follow in the ordinances and commandments of the Lord. Those who know nothing of the chastisement of the Lord have not that evidence of his love. "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."

"Every man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is." In the experience of the saints is the clearest illustration of this truth. While all is quietness and comfort with the believer he knows nothing of the real strength of his trust in the grace of God. He may really think that much of his happiness results from some carefulness of his own. But when it is tested by such severe trials as show him his utter weakness, he learns that it is by grace alone that he is saved in his daily conflicts, as well as in the washing away of that sin which first brought him to see himself a lost sinner, already under condemnation and wrath. Thus it is by fire that the day declares of what sort is the work of every man who is brought into this divine judgment.

"If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward." The meaning of this expression is plain when taken in connection with the subject of which the apostle was writing. The work which is authorized by the word of the Lord not only bears the light of his word by which it is judged, or tested; but it stands approved by that word. The more fully such work is examined by this perfect standard the more clearly it is manifest that it is wrought in the saint by the power of God, and that he only works out that which is thus wrought in him by the indwelling of the Holy Ghost. Their reward which is received by that believer whose work shall abide this test in the fire of the word of the Lord, is not some superior favor to be enjoyed in the world of eternal glory. Like all the service of our gracious Lord, the reward in this case is found in keeping the statutes and doing the commandments of our King. No greater reward can be conceived of than the approbation of the law of the Lord, which is received by every saint in obedience to his word. To those who love righteousness and hate iniquity, it is not necessary to offer the bribe of future bliss, nor to threaten with future torment, that they may render obedience to the perfect law of liberty. They desire nothing so much as freedom from the bondage of sin, and all the liberty for which they long is the privilege of being conformed to the glorious likeness of their Lord. The heavenly joy of the answer of a good conscience toward God is more precious to those who have the Spirit of Christ than all the heathenish dreams which carnal worshipers describe as the heaven to which they aspire. The infinite bliss of heaven is in the presence of Jesus, and this is the reward of that saint whose work attests the reigning of the Spirit of Christ in his walk and conversation. "And they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads." This is declared as the appointed portion of the servants of the Lamb in his gospel heaven. This is the reward received in obedience by every one whose work shall abide the trial of the light of his commandments. No such reward can be enjoyed even by the saints so long as they are walking in disobedience.

"If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire." In this clause is the confirmation of our view that the address includes none but the subjects of salvation. Even though the works were burned (of any man included in the company to whom Paul wrote), yet the man himself is not lost. The eternal salvation of his people from their sins by the work of Jesus is so securely perfected that nothing which they can do shall defeat his design, nor is anything left for them to do in securing the benefit of his gracious purpose of redemption. In this text, however, we understand the salvation of the man whose work is burned, to be that salvation which preserves the saints in the fellowship of the church of Christ in her visible organization here in time. In this sense that man whose works are burned by the fire of inspired truth does indeed suffer loss; while he is himself saved in the fellowship of the church. Yet his salvation in the fellowship of the saints is "so as by fire." In the eternal salvation which the saints have in Christ Jesus there is no difference between the subjects of his grace. Each of them is the chief of sinners; and each is saved with an everlasting salvation. Not even the most exemplary apostle or prophet can take any glory to himself in the heaven of eternal bliss. Nor must the thief who went from the cross into paradise, grieve in that ultimate heaven over his evil deeds while in the flesh. There is no room for grief or suffering loss in that holy habitation of our God. The only fire which can enter that everlasting abode of the glorified saints is the holy fire of rapturous love which is the eternal life of God in every subject of electing grace. The carnal idea of degrees in bliss in that final state of the redeemed, is as wholly without divine authority, as is the wildest vagary of heathenism. Indeed, it is borrowed from the darkest realms of Pagan idolatry. Let the saints never forget that it is written for their learning, "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; not of works, lest any man should boast." Grace excludes all claims of merit.

In the SIGNS OF THE TIMES for May 28, and June 4, 1890, our sister may find our views on this subject presented more fully than we can now write. May the abounding grace of our Lord Jesus enable each of his disciples so to walk that God may be glorified in both their bodies and their spirits, which are his.

may I ask to be remembered by all the dear saints, although unworthy of a name or place among the people of God? May the blessing of God attend Zion, for his name and mercy's sake.

Your unworthy and afflicted brother,

C. G. JORDAN.

FAIRBANKS, Ind., April 14, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I thought I would write you a few lines, in order to renew my subscription, as I am getting old, and live so far away from any Old Baptist Church. When I am providentially hindered, and cannot get there, I want to read your paper, in which I find so much Old Baptist doctrine. I find in reading the letters from different ones that the Lord converts sinners there just like he does here. They all have to acknowledge that salvation is of the Lord; that they are saved by grace, through faith in the blood of Christ. Dear brethren and sisters, you are strangers to me in the flesh; but when I read your experiences, how the Lord led you from nature's darkness into his marvelous light, and into the liberty of his dear Son, you do not seem strangers to me in spiritual things. I have never been able to tell the world around me anything about the ground of my spiritual hope, in a way that they can understand it. But this is no marvel, for the natural man cannot understand the work of the Spirit. It works in the deep recesses of the heart, and no one can tell anything about it save him that receiveth it. The Savior compared it to a white stone. I am glad the Lord reserves this work to himself, and does not leave it to the power of sinful men, to choose or refuse. The Savior said he came to seek and to save that which was lost; that he did not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance. If I know anything about regeneration, the Lord quickens the dead sinner into life. He causes them to see and feel their lost and ruined state, in a way they never saw it before. They do not at first know what is the matter with them. They are troubled, but do not know what to do. They will do everything they can think of, to try to obliterate this trouble from their mind; but in spite of all they can do the work goes on until it destroys every particle of unbelief. Then Jesus says unto them, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest to your souls." Then he gives them faith to believe he is their Savior. Love takes full possession of the soul, and casts out all fear of death and hell. Their sins are borne away by the agency of the Holy Spirit, as far from them as the east is from the west. What a change the Lord can make! turning darkness into day. The new-born soul feels like his warfare is over; but, dear child, the Savior has said, "Watch and pray." Pray the Lord to shield from the wicked one.

A great deal has been said on the subject of predestination and election. That is the doctrine I love, as far as I understand it. I see that brethren differ in their views upon the subject. You will all have to acknowledge there are mysteries that no one will ever be able to understand while here in the flesh. You who profess to be Old School Baptists, do not fall out about that. You that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and so fulfill the law of Christ.

Dear brethren Beebe, look over this poor and imperfect letter; and if you see fit to publish it, correct all mistakes. If you think it would crowd out something better, lay it aside.

Your sister in hope of eternal life,

ELIZA A. TRUBLOOD.

SOUTH LOWELL, N. C., April 19, 1891.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—How much I wish I was blessed with the pen of a ready writer, and the ability to express the comfort I have enjoyed in reading the many precious communications from the much loved brethren and sisters who write for the columns of our family paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. Its editors and correspondents contend for the doctrine I believe. While there are brethren in this part of the country who say they cannot reconcile the absolute predestination of God with the Scriptures, it is the only doctrine that upholds and comforts me, for I have it so plainly manifested in my daily experience. When I read the soul-cheering letters of sister Mary Parker, and learn of her great afflictions, also brother Anderson's trials, and the sufferings of poor brother Crask, and the comforting message of old brother Phelps, I feel that I would like to tell them what I am daily and hourly called to pass through. I have been spared, though quite feeble, to reach my sixty-seventh year. I am a widow. My husband lost his life in the service of his country, while I was left to raise my children, with an infant in my arms. I am yet spared to live for and nurse my daughter, the only one I have with me. She has been helpless and afflicted all her life. She is now as helpless as a new born babe, and suffers untold agonies each day, which seems at times more than I can bear. Added to this, my youngest, and a son now twenty-six years old, is also helpless, cannot walk one step, is entirely disabled to work, and has been so from his birth. This leaves me with one only son, as death robbed me of my other son just in the bloom of manhood. On the twelfth day of last December we were visited by a destructive fire, at about three o'clock in the morning, which entirely destroyed my son's whole year's labor, and left us without one morsel of food, as it was all we could do to get out the afflicted ones, and save what little we could out of the bed-room. This was the third time I had been homeless from fire, and twice within two years. I have been asked by a dear brother and pastor if I believed God ordained that I should have all this sad misfortune. My answer was, "I believe he speaks, and it is done; commands, and it stands fast. I believe he has a purpose in it, which I shall know hereafter." While I am almost entirely deprived of meeting with my brethren, the SIGNS contains all the preaching I get, and I often feel that it is enough; for I am oftentimes made to rejoice and shed tears of happiness while reading the communications that speak what I feel and know to be the truth. I cannot ask you to indulge me with the SIGNS yourself, but I would be glad to have it while I am spared here in these low grounds of sorrow. I feel if it were not for my helpless ones, how gladly would I lay my armor by. How I long for that heavenly rest! But I feel as did Job, all my appointed time will I wait.

If you see fit, you may give this a place in the SIGNS; but if not, all will be right.

Your sister in deep afflictions,
SARAH H. GARRARD.

GREENBRIAR, Ark., March 8, 1891.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I will try to tell you of some of the dear Lord's dealings with me. I was about fourteen years of age when, as I hope, the good Lord pardoned my sins. I was raised in a Methodist community, who told me that I would have to work for religion, and I tried to do so; but I found it a mistake. I found it was all the dear Lord's work with poor, sinful me. I was as helpless as a little babe. It was while in this helpless condition that I hope the dear Lord spoke the pardon of my sins. It seemed that a bright light shined around me, and everything seemed new, and I was praising my blessed Lord for what he had done for me, a great sinner, as I felt myself to be. I then thought I would not see any more trouble; but I was mistaken in that. Many doubts and fears rise within me; but there is this one consolation to me, the Scripture says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." If my poor, sinful heart deceives me not, I love God's dear children. I joined the Methodists, but afterwards felt that I had done something wrong. I did not then know anything about the Old, Primitive Baptists, except that they were made fun of, and were called "Old Hard Shells." Then I joined the Missionaries; for I believed baptism to be immersion in water, and I wanted to be baptized. I was satisfied with them for a time. I was married when a little over sixteen years of age. My husband's parents believed the Old Baptist doctrine, and I went with them to hear preaching. The first I knew I was believing that so-called hard doctrine with all my heart. I believed that people preached what the blessed Savior preached while here on earth. I joined the Primitive Baptist Church about eleven years ago, and have been better satisfied with them than any other body. I believe they are the only ones who preach the gospel in its purity. I believe God's people shall all be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of his children. Yet I have many doubts and fears that I am not one of those little ones. If I am a saint, I feel to be the least of all.

If you think this worthy a place in your valuable paper, publish it; and if not, cast it aside, and all will be well with me. If there is one word of comfort in this for any one, give God the praise.

Your sister in hope of eternal life,
ALICE HOWELL.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN A PRECIOUS SAVIOR:—I have been trying to preach Jesus, and also baptizing some of his humble followers, for about twenty years; but on yesterday, Sunday, July 24, 1892, I witnessed such a scene as I never before had seen or heard of. I attended a two days meeting about twenty miles from home, with other brethren. On Sunday one precious brother, whose precious fruits had borne witness for two years that he was born of God, came forward and related what great things the Lord had done for him, and was heartily received by the many brethren and sisters present; and even friends witnessed in their countenances and manners all confidence in him. Naturally he is as fine a man as there is in the state of Kentucky, and is a firm believer in the doctrine of election and predestination. He had been bound in chains and fetters by his father and mother, and also his grandfather; but at last he burst them all asunder, and landed home with his friends, and there was music and dancing. Neither his father, mother nor grandfather would go near the meeting. When the unworthy writer went to baptize him we sent to their house for them, which was only a few hundred yards away; but they would not come, and made light of it, and said we would all go to hell. They are all members of the Old Baptist Church, and belong to one of the churches of our association; but they despise and abuse election, and those who believe it. The brother who was baptized has a wife and four nice children. He is a well to do man, and his character is irrep- roachable.

Dear reader, has the like ever been known before?

W. J. MAY.

HANNIBAL, Mo., Aug. 21, 1892.

DEAR BETHREN BEEBE:—I have received some letters of sympathy from brethren, with an inquiry as to my present condition; and I conclude, for the information of them all, to send you a few lines to that end, if you will give them a place in the SIGNS. The former short letter I sent you was written without a full knowledge of the extent of the injuries I had received. While at the time I did not feel that I was much hurt, it was afterwards found that my right hip bone, the same that had been before paralyzed, had received a fracture, which could not be splintered, and became very sore, causing great pain for me to be moved. I could not turn over in bed, nor be turned by others, but have had to lie on my back altogether, which is painful and tiresome. It has been seven weeks today, and I am just beginning, with good help, to use crutches. How long I will have to linger here I of course know not. I am yet almost entirely helpless; still I hope I may get up again, and meet in the assemblies of the saints, to praise the dear name of our God for his wonderful goodness and mercy to me in this affliction, and all the days of my unprofitable life. With love to all saints, I will have to let this suffice. I am too feeble to write as I would.

As ever, your unworthy brother in a blessed hope,

W. F. KERCHEVAL.

NORA SPRINGS, Iowa, July 11, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I am a few days late this time. I wish to say that I am lonesome without the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I have perused its columns more or less since the year 1834. My father commenced taking it shortly after Elder Gilbert Beebe began its publication. I see no change in its sentiments since that time. If I ever had a hope, I trust I received it in the fall of 1843; but I kept it to myself until Saturday before the first Sunday in —, 1864, when I told it to Mount Pleasant Church, Lafayette County, Wisconsin. I was received by the church, and baptized by Elder A. J. Norton on Sunday following. My path has seemed a crooked one ever since; but that is the way christians travel. Yet I cannot say that my walk is like that of a christian. When I would do good, evil is present with me. So you see there is a warfare. The new man seems to have some influence over the old man, and constrains him to behave a little better. I had a name among the Methodists for twelve years; but I found it took money to purchase what they called free grace. But grace does not come in that way. I will stop.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Corresponding Meeting of Virginia, in session with the Mt. Zion Church, Loudoun County, Virginia, August 17th, 18th and 19th, 1892, to the several churches and associations with which we correspond, sendeth greeting.

BELOVED IN THE LORD:—Another year with its changing scenes has been numbered with the past since it was last our privilege to meet together as an association; and as we recall some of the shifting incidents peculiar to this vale of tears, we are reminded that our God changes not, but is the same yesterday, to-day and forever. "He is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment; a God of truth, and without iniquity, just and right is he." And, as he hath spoken by the mouth of the prophet Isaiah, "Remember the former things of old, for I am God, and there is none else; I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." And again, by the prophet Jeremiah, "But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel: after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord: for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord: for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more." Thus establishing beyond the shadow of a doubt, upon the immutable wills and shalls of the great Jehovah, the entire and complete safety of the church. And as if to affix his seal upon these declarations already made, the Savior while in the flesh, and under the process of redeeming the church from under the law, said to Peter, "And upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Thus precluding forever the evil effects of the fiery darts of the enemy of all righteousness; for "all the promises of God are in him yea, and in him amen, unto the glory of God by us." While these are indeed trying times through which we are passing, and it seems to be a dark night to the church, in which all the beasts of the forest creep forth, we would remember that the Lord doeth all things well; that it is he that makes darkness, and it is night; and that, without ever having seen the light, we would know nothing of this darkness; that the night season is as necessary to the growth of the church in spiritual things, in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, as is the day. And for what are these night seasons, these dark and gloomy times, given? It is all for the "trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ: whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory: receiving the end of your faith, the salvation of your souls." While we feel at times, as we hope, to realize some, at least, of these precious promises in our experience, we cannot by our carnal reason lay hold upon and claim them. But these, together with all the other dealings of God with his people, are revealed to the faith of God's elect. What then is faith? The inspired writer to the Hebrews (xi. 1) says, "Now faith is the substance [margin, ground or confidence] of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Then it is something more than mere belief based upon tradition handed down from generation to generation; for while we are told by the religious world of the present day that there is nothing easier than for us to embrace this faith, we know by heartfelt experience, sanctioned by the Scriptures of divine truth, that such is not the case; for "all men have not faith;" and "without faith it is impossible to please God." And in this same connection the apostle goes on to speak of a number of Old Testament saints, and of their works by faith, and concludes by saying, "And what shall I more say? for the time would fail me to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephthah, of David also, and Samuel, and of the prophets: who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens." And it is this very same faith which actuates the people of God to-day, and causes them to contend for the truth as it is in Jesus. It is a living principle, and underlies all else in the experience of the saints; so that when they feel "troubled on every side, yet not distressed; perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed; always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body." Then that faith, which is the gift of God, leads to or centers in Christ; for without him ye can do nothing; yea, and are nothing; for it was by this same faith that one of old was led to exclaim, "All is vanity, and vexation of spirit." Our trials, our sorrows, our fears, are just as much an evidence of the operation of that faith, as when we are led to realize, as we hope, in our experience, that we have received a full and free pardon of all our sins, through the blood and righteousness of our Lord Jesus Christ, and are made to exclaim with Job, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." While these things are applied in our individual experience, it is thus that the many members are brought together in the one body, into that fellowship which is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. The apostle in his letter to the Ephesians says, "I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love; endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. There is one body, and one spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all." While the church is safe, so far as her standing in that covenant which was ordered in all things and sure is concerned, yet how needful that her members should watch, lest any root of bitterness should spring up, and get them to biting and devouring one another. The apostle Paul in his epistle to the church at Corinth, while exhorting them against the envyings, strifes and divisions that were among them, by some declaring that they were of Paul, and others of Apollos, says, "Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man?" He then declares that, "According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master builder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon. For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." Thus condemning, in no uncertain language, the idea that they should base their hope or confidence upon any other than Christ; for "There is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." The promises of God of which we have before spoken, are all in that same line made to the faith of his people, and are entirely contrary to the process of reasoning of our carnal minds; as Paul declared in his letter to the Corinthians, "And my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit, and of power;" not that which was tangible to their natural senses, and which by human reason or wisdom they could understand and comprehend; and why? He goes on to state in the next verse, "That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." And now, in conclusion, may "The God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen."

Our meetings have been largely attended, the churches have been well represented, and the reports from the churches are favorable, all in peace and love; but there have been no large ingatherings. The preaching has been good. Christ and him crucified has been preached, we hope to the great comfort of the saints.

Our next session is appointed to be held with the Ebenezer Church, Loudoun Co., Va., to commence on Wednesday before the third Sunday in October, 1893, when and where we hope to meet you again.

A. B. FRANCIS, Clerk.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—Another aged and weary saint has gone to rest, viz., Elizabeth H. Epperson, relict of Pedro W. Epperson, whose obituary appeared in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES February 15th, 1891.

Sister Epperson was the daughter of Isham and Elizabeth Dalton, and was born in Albemarle Co., Va., May 6th, 1803, and departed this life near the village of Rio, Knox Co., Ill., Aug. 15th, 1892, aged 89 years, 3 months and 9 days. While an infant the family emigrated to Madison Co., Ky., where at the age of about eighteen years she professed a hope in Christ, united with the Primitive Baptist Church, and was baptized by Elder Samuel Kelley. Wherever she has resided since, for a period of about seventy-four years, she has stood unshaken in the faith, and in sweet fellowship with the people of God. In January, 1824, she was united in marriage with brother Epperson. They lived together in happy wedlock about fifty-six years, and she became the mother of eleven children, seven sons and four daughters. Six sons and three daughters survive their mother. The family resided a few years in Indiana, and in 1836 came to Illinois, locating in the wild prairie in the northwestern quarter of Knox County, where they continued until death, enduring the inconveniences and hardships of pioneer life, and by industry and economy they made a good and comfortable living. After they came to Illinois they joined the Henderson Church, and up to the time of her death she sustained an unblemished character, and was dearly beloved by her brethren. She was an estimable and model lady in all the relations of life. Her last illness was brief, and rather complicated, during which she repeatedly expressed a desire to go home and be at rest; so she gently fell asleep in Jesus in the triumphs of faith.

On the 16th instant, at one o'clock p. m., a large audience met at the old homestead, and I spoke to them from Revelation xiv. 13; after which she was laid to rest until the resurrection, five sons and a grandson being pall-bearers.

MACOMB, Ill.

James T. Neel was born August 18th, 1818, and died November 2d, 1891, aged 73 years, 3 months and 28 days.

He was the father of ten children. His companion, one son and one daughter preceded him to the spirit world. Four sons and four daughters are left to mourn his departure. Father was not a member of the visible church, but we have every reason to believe that he belonged to the invisible church of God; for he was a believer in salvation by grace, and not by works, lest man should boast. We have had many pleasant conversations on the subject of religion. On the day before he died a Lutheran minister visited him, he having belonged to that people in early life. The Lutheran minister prayed for him, and at the conclusion of the prayer father lifted his right hand and pointed to the ceiling, saying, "Do you see that circle of light?" His speech having been impaired for some time, the minister could not understand him; but soon his speech became plain, so that any one could understand him, and he talked, pointing to the circle. I asked him who he saw in the circle. He replied, "I see the chiefest among men." I could not talk for joy. I asked him if he wanted to see his children, and he said he did. They were all called in, and he began to bid them farewell, taking each by the hand, still pointing to and talking about that circle. He died the next day, at 9:15 a. m. His funeral was held in the Methodist church-house at Thornville, Perry Co., Ohio, conducted by the Methodist minister and Elder L. T. Ruffner, of the Old School Baptist Church.

Yours in hope of eternal life,

JOHN T. NEEL.

MILLERSPORT, Ohio.

Elder W. A. Bowden was born in Randolph Co., N. C., and died April 7th, 1892, aged 81 years, 2 months and 11 days.

Brother Bowden was of English and Welsh descent. He moved from his native state to Maury Co., Tenn., in the year 1820, from thence to Graves Co., Ky., in 1831, and from thence to Miller Co., Mo., in 1884, where he resided until his death. He had been confined to the house with an abscess of the lung for about two years.

Brother Bowden was married to Sarah Webb, of Weakley Co., Tenn., on Dec. 25th, 1838. He joined the Primitive Baptist Church at Mt. Zion, Graves Co., Ky., in July, 1835. He was licensed to preach on Dec. 25th, 1836, at the residence of Joel Williams, and preached on the same day from the words, "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?"—Luke xxiv. 26. He was ordained to the full work of the ministry on the fourth Sunday in March, 1837, and served the church at Mt. Zion until he removed to Missouri. He was the first Moderator of Bethel Association, and was afterward elected Clerk, which position he filled successively thirty-four years. He leaves a wife, one daughter, and a number of grandchildren, with the church, to mourn their loss, which is his eternal gain.

Brother Bowden was a very gifted minister of the gospel, kind and tender-hearted, and had a good report of them that were without. May the Lord comfort the widow and fatherless.

My wife, Allie V. Pence, departed this life July 23d, 1892, at her home near Egbert, White Co., Ark.

She was born in the same county in the early part of the year 1861. Her mother died soon after her birth, and the family record was lost during the war. She was the daughter of Richard E. and Allie V. Wortham. We were married on August 24th, 1881. She leaves a husband and three children. O how much we all miss her! The silver cord is loosed, the golden bowl is broken, severing another link in the family chain. She was a kind mother and a loving and dutiful wife, always ready to minister to the wants of her family; but she is gone, and we hope through abounding grace to join her. She died from the effects of the measles, which terminated in an abscess of the liver. She was taken sick on February 6th, and died as stated above. She was not a member of the church, but she experienced a hope in the dear Savior some time before her death, and expressed a desire to follow him in the ordinance of baptism.

"A precious one from us has gone,
A voice we loved is stilled,
A place is vacant in our home
Which never can be filled.

"God in his wisdom has recalled
The boon his love had given;
And though the body molds here,
The soul is safe in heaven."

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HORACE, Texas, Aug. 3, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—Feeling so forcibly my inability to write anything worth its room in our much esteemed SIGNS OF THE TIMES, I have been thinking for some time that I would remain silent, and let all the space be occupied by those who are able to edify and comfort, the people of God. But the very signature to the request for me to write, in a late number of the SIGNS, makes me feel once more to take up my pen to write a few thoughts in connection with the subject submitted. If I did not know what it is to feel to be "a poor sinner," I do not think I should feel a strong enough desire to try to write. Again, I so forcibly realize sometimes that I am "a poor sinner," yea, a vile sinner, that I almost shrink at the thought of trying to speak or write on any part of the Scriptures, feeling that they are too high, too holy and too solemn for such a poor, polluted, sinful creature as I feel myself to be. I was simple enough, when I was first made to rejoice in hope, to believe that I should never be troubled with sin any more. I thought the remainder of my days would be spent in peace, in the praise of Jesus, my heavenly Master; but alas! I soon found that I was not "dead to the love of sin;" but in the flesh I still was prone to wander; and this caused me great trouble, and often made me doubt, weep and cry. Yet by this, I hope, I learned the meaning of the apostle Paul when he said, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am [not was before I received a hope only] chief." It is, no doubt, a consoling thought, whenever thought of by "a poor sinner," that in realizing they are poor sinners, "the chief of sinners," and "If a saint the least of all," that in the fullness of those feelings of sin, poverty, insufficiency, &c., of which the above expressions are but the true indications, to find that they are in fellowship with the inspired apostle, who is the writer of the language that I am asked to write upon. It seems to me that no one could know anything of the meaning and glory of the text unless they had been made to realize, as the apostle did, "In me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing."

The verse upon which I am requested to write reads, "For such an high priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens."—Heb. vii. 26. The subject of the priesthood of our Lord Jesus was that which was under consideration by the apostle; portraying the unchangeability of the same, together with its power and glory, as contrasted with that of the Levitical priesthood. The Mosaic dispensation was one abounding with types and shadows, under which the people of God worshiped in that dispensation. The priest and the sacrifice (both types) pointed forward to the true priest and sacrifice, to wit, Jesus Christ. The high priest under the legal dispensation, "taken from among men, is ordained for men, in things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins."—Heb. v. 1. The high priest entered into the "holiest of all" alone, once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people. The Holy Ghost thus signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing: which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect as pertaining to the conscience; which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation. But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this [the legal covenant or tabernacle under this covenant] building; neither by the blood of goats and calves [as was the case under the legal covenant], but by his own blood, he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us. For if the blood of bulls and of goats and the ashes of a heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who though the eternal Spirit [not through the provisions of the old or legal covenant] offered himself without spot unto God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God."—Heb. ix. 7-14. While the high priest under the legal covenant was made without an oath, Jesus, the high priest under the new covenant, was made with an oath, "by him that said unto him, The Lord sware, and will not repent, thou art a priest forever after the order of Melchisedec."—Heb. vii. 21. The order of Melchisedec's priesthood was, that (in his priesthood) he was "without father, without mother." [None of his ancestors were priests before him, nor were any of his descendants after him.] Thus beautifully typifying the priesthood of our Lord Jesus. "For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood." "Without decent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually." The Levitical priesthood was under a legal covenant, representing national Israel. But Jesus, who was and is the high priest of all that the Father gave him, was and is, and is to continue, the representative of spiritual Israel under the new covenant; new in the order of manifestation; but it was ever with the Father, and of which the old or legal covenant was but a figure. The offering of the high priest under the legal dispensation, when he entered into the holy place, could not extend beyond one year. The offering of Jesus, the high priest under the new covenant, when he "through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot unto God," extends forever, he having obtained eternal redemption for his people. The offering of the high priest under the old covenant was for a time justification only, and never could extend beyond this time world. But the offering of Jesus, the great high priest of the new covenant, secured eternal justification for all embraced in that covenant. Jesus in this "one offering hath forever perfected them that are sanctified."—Heb. x. 14. Those that were given him of his Father. In this one offering was represented every heir of promise, even every one, from the first to the last, that shall ever be brought to know him in the pardon of their sins. They had all become polluted and defiled with sin. They had all sinned and come short of the glory of God. "As it is written, There is none righteous, no, not one; there is none that understandeth; there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way; they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one. Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit; the poison of asps is under their lips; whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. Their feet are swift to shed blood; destruction and misery are in their ways; and the way of peace have they not known: there is no fear of God before their eyes."—Rom. iii. 10-18. This is a correct picture of all the children of the earthly Adam. Even those represented by the great high priest Jesus, "were by nature children of wrath, even as others."—Eph. ii. 3. Hence the frowns of offended justice rested upon them, and the demands of the justice of a sin-avenging God must be satisfied. No offering nor sacrifice taken from among this polluted mass of humanity was sufficient. This was shadowed forth in the fact that under the legal covenant the lamb brought for the trespass offering, and the bullock brought for the sin offering, must be without blemish. The poor sinner who is experimentally brought to realize his true condition is unable at the time to understand how such a vile sinner as he feels himself to be. This is the case because Jesus has not yet been revealed as his Savior, Mediator or Days-man. But when this comes to pass, he can realize something of what was meant by the language, "Wherefore when he cometh into the world, he saith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me: in burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure. Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God." Then surely "such an high priest became us [we who are so vile, so polluted with sin. Surely none but he who was both God and man, both human and divine, would have been qualified to make this offering], who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens." The superiority of this High Priest over the Levitical priesthood is here expressed, "made higher than the heavens." The Levitical priesthood and the offerings under it were imperfect, and therefore had an end. But the priesthood of our great Melchisedec, and the offering made by him, was perfect and has no end; far superior or above the legal heavens. Let us remember that Jesus not only was, but is, and will continue to be, our High Priest. For the apostle says, "Now of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum: we have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens."—Heb. viii.

1. "Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."—Heb. vii. 25. Hear the fatherly admontion and encouragement of the apostle John, "My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous."—1 John ii. 1. What a glorious thing for us, poor sinners, that we have such an High Priest and Advocate, such a glorious King, Husband and Friend. Well may we sing with the poet,

"How sweet the name of Jesus sounds
In a believer's ear;
It soothes his sorrows, heals his wounds,
And drives away his fear.

"It makes the wounded spirit whole,
And calms the troubled breast;
'Tis manna to the hungry soul,
And to the weary rest.

"Dear name, the rock on which I build,
My shield and hiding place,
My never failing treasury, filled
With boundless stores of grace."

"Jesus, my Shepherd, Husband, Friend,
My Prophet, Priest and King,
My Lord, my Life, my Way, my end,
Accept the praise I bring.

"Weak is the effort of my heart,
And cold my warmest thought;
But when I see thee as thou art,
I'll praise thee as I ought.

"Till then, I would thy love proclaim With every fleeting breath;
And may the music of thy name
Refresh my soul in death."

Dear brethren, the above scattering thoughts are submitted to your disposal, hoping that they may be some satisfaction to my unknown inquiring friend, if published. I would be glad if some brother or sister who has more light on the subject would be stirred up to write.

I desire to remain your little brother in hope,

H. B. JONES.

LAMONTE, Mo., July 13, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—If I did not feel so unworthy and poor in spirit, so unprofitable to myself and to the people of God, and if I were blessed with light, there is a text I would love to write upon. I believe I will quote the text, if nothing more. It is recorded in Isaiah lv. 2, and reads, "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not?" I sometimes think I love the truth as much as does any one, and have a faint hope that I am sometimes blessed with a feeble knowledge by experience of the glorious truth left on record for our instruction, if we are indeed and in truth the children of the living God. Of this I have no doubts or fears for my brethren; but alas! how often I am made to doubt, fear and quake for myself. If I could with confidence say that I am one of that blood-washed throng, I would then rejoice in the thought that I should one day meet my dear Savior in peace, and with all the redeemed hosts of heaven forever praise his dear name. But that I cannot say; yet this one thing I can say, I do believe I love those dear people of God called Old Baptists. I love the precious truth they love, which alone glorifies my dear Lord and Savior. While it grows very small and faint at times, I have a little hope that is more to me than all else, which I would not exchange for the world. The text I have quoted requires to be treated in a practical, experimental manner; but I have not the time nor ability to bring out all the precious truth connected with the subject. This, like all other parts of the Scriptures, is greatly abused when handled by the enemies of the truth. These words were addressed to a believing people, and apply as well to us to-day, if we are the church, as they did then; and they will apply to the church through all time; for I verily believe the prophet looked down through the vista of time, and saw what the afflictions of the church should be through all time to come. My Bible teaches me, that what is now has been, and shall be. There is no new thing. The same old enemy is at work, with all the fiendish scheming that he manifested in the beginning; and that scheming is set up in the form of "churches" of various kinds, to suit the taste of the whole idolatrous world; and he counterfeits the truth with such perfect deception, and pushes himself so close to the church, that if it were possible he would deceive the very elect; but that cannot be done; for "thus far shall thou come, and no farther; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." Glorious thought! God has promised that he will never leave himself without a witness, and his believing children are made to trust in his word. We as a believing people to-day believe that the same power that prepared Moses for a leader, and chose, prepared, clothed, fed, protected and led out of Egyptian bondage the children of Israel, so that they lacked nothing in all the forty long years of their wilderness journey, in like manner calls his chosen people from the bondage of sin, and makes them free in his love, and takes off their old tattered rags, and clothes them with the robe of his own righteousness. His arms are ever about them to protect them. He gives them manna by the way. His servants, like Moses of old, feed them with the rich treasures of his truth, as they proclaim salvation by grace alone, yes, free and sovereign grace, which is manna to their hungry souls, and rest to their weary feet. Then "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not?" "Behold, the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear."—Isa. lix. 1. Well do

I remember when my poor heart was almost ready to grasp anything but the truth, yea, even infidelity; yet I verily believed I loved the truth. My father was a Primitive Baptist preacher; and although I was greatly attached to him, and had confidence in his judgment, and had heard him say privately, as well as from the pulpit, that the work of salvation in awakening the dead sinner was of grace alone, and not of any works, yet how impossible it was for me to believe there was not anything of works of the creature connected with it. O my poor soul! how strange it is that we will spend our time and money for that which is not bread, and which satisfieth not. The poor writer has had a bitter experience in that line of sin and rebellion against God. How often have I gone to hear my father and other Old Baptists preach. I knew that as a general thing they were not an educated people; but then they told the story of the cross so plain, so simple, to the comfort and edification of those dear to me now, precious people of God; and they could with so much comfort describe the travel of those poor people, from the time of their first trouble, until sweet deliverance came; also their warfare all along their uneven journey of life. O what a joy! what a feast! what satisfaction! for it was bread to their hungry souls; and it cost no labor, no money, but was all of free grace. Precious thought! Then why spend our money or labor for that which satisfieth not? I began to think on my then present life and futurity very early in life; but always while viewing myself as a great sinner, I would think, as all Arminians do, that I would reform my life and ask God for his mercies, which to my mind were ready for me at any time I might choose to ask for them. If that were true, how oft would the clouds that hover so thickly about me be dispelled; for the Bible would never be a sealed book to me, as it so often is; and in my garden of perfumes no thorns of this world would be allowed to grow, and there would be no humility produced. But God has wisely placed side by side the lily and the bramble, in order to subvert our arrogance, and to humiliate us; and O what a sweet thing humility is! I believe that right there the fruit of the Spirit is produced. O how perfect are God's works, and his ways past finding out! Not my will, but thy will, O God, be done. O the times I never will forget! and here comes the bitter dregs I spoke of farther back, while teaching in the Sunday School, or leading their singing, or presiding at the organ, with my poor sin-sick soul craving something real; craving to see and know that there was a reality in religion, and that it was enjoyable; that it fed the hungry soul; that it manifested itself in love, genuine christian love; so much so that heart responded to heart, and faith to faith. But alas! my poor heart was made to melt down in sorrow, deep, bitter sorrow; for as natural beings I loved those people, and naturally thought if there was a reality in religion they ought to have it. But alas! I never saw any of the fruits, any of those evidences my poor heart craved to see, that there was a reality in religion, and that it was an enjoyable something. But instead, there was nothing but cold formalities, with no exhibition of love; no penitential tears. Sometimes when their minister related a pitiful death-bed scene, and wept more himself than did all the rest, some of their members would be touched for a short time; but that often gave way to cold indifference. Why is it that we will spend money or labor for that which satisfieth not? How soon cold, chilling thoughts of infidelity would set up. For surely, I thought, these are good people, and if there is a reality in religion they ought to have it; but the fruits I fail to see. It may be a good moral thing, but with no reality. Then again they would leave off their soul-saving protracted meetings until they would least interfere with their work. This was a thing I could not understand; for surely a soul was worth more than all this world, and needed saving all the time, if they were the machinery to do it with. And they would covenant to pray for certain individuals at certain times, and the work was not done as they claimed it would be. I thought they ought to pray in secret, and pray always, and that the earnest, faithful prayer was answered; but none of this did I see. Their lessons consisted in the geography and history of the Bible, instead of showing the depravity of poor, sinful man, and the immutability of God, and what the dear Savior had done for his chosen bride, and how the poor, helpless, dependent, needy, ungrateful, unthankful sinner was to be the happy recipient of this glorious free blessing of grace; yes, free and sovereign grace. How much I love that term; for if I have ever been the possessor of, or now have anything, it is all of free grace. Why then spend our labor or money (a thing much required of them), when it satisfieth not? Well do I remember when I would occasionally stray over to the Old Baptist meeting. What a different scene would present itself there. They were a poor and afflicted people, hated of the world. There were not many of them; no fine church-house, no finely carpeted aisles, no special pews, no organ, no gaudy pictures on the walls; a plain, peculiar people, zealous of good works, as I trust. Their songs were of the old kind, full of doctrine, of experience, of the every-day travels of the church of God; and O what joy, what comfort, what love beamed from face to face, as in their plain way they sang. Then their preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power; unto the world foolishness, but unto those peculiar people it was Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God. O what joy, love and peace I saw among those people. Then there was a reality in religion. Then why spend our money at times for that which satisfieth not?

Brethren, when it goes well with you, pray for a poor sinner.

J. A. TEAGUE.

CALHOUN, Mo., March 7, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Although I am not a subscriber to your valuable paper at present, yet occasionally I see a copy of it, and it continues in line with the truth. If you will permit, and God grants me liberty, I will write something in connection with the precious truth advocated in the SIGNS. I realize the fact that I am far behind many, if not all, your correspondents. I have power to understand only so far as the God of all wisdom sees best to reveal to me. While I desire to give all praise and honor to the God of all grace and glory, all that I can say is imperfect, like myself. I have many sorrows and disappointments. If I am one of the number chosen to salvation in eternity, before the creation of time, I have great reason to rejoice. Our eternal God covenanted by Jesus Christ to save all the elect from the just condemnation of the law. The wisdom and grandeur which was displayed in the glorious redemption of fallen man is beyond all human comprehension. No stream can rise higher than its fountain; and man, being of the earth, earthy, his mind while in nature's night cannot rise above earthly things. He knows nothing of our God, who is from everlasting to everlasting. The natural mind hates our God and his attributes with the most bitter hatred. In the evil imagination of man the desire of his wicked heart is to bring God down to his propositions and terms, in order to compromise with the Most High. Men are working to reconcile God's mind, and to appease his wrath. They think their god is so good that his business is to obey every command and demand that their wicked heart and nature may desire. Since the fall of man the devil has taken his abode in the heart of man. Thus man in nature is in antagonism to God. If the will and desire of man were executed, our God would be dethroned, and the devil would be enthroned. Imagine the great wreck that the reverse of all things would bring about. All the distress that has ever befallen man has been from the attempt of man to be more powerful than God created him to be; and so when men attempt to elevate themselves above, or make themselves equal with God, they only show their depravity and develop the wickedness of their nature, without affecting or changing the immutability of God's will, or his predestinated purpose in the least. The wrath of man shall praise God, and the remainder of wrath he shall restrain. Our God is glorified in the condemnation of all for whom Christ did not atone, as well as in the eternal salvation of those who were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world. Everything that occurs in this time world occurs at the exact time and place that God foreknew and declared it should. Our God remains just and holy, regardless of the wickedness of the acts of men, and has a perfect right to declare what man shall and shall not do. There is no power to resist our God in anything; for he is above all power, principalities and dominions. He speaks, and it is done. He decreed from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Our God holds the keys of death and hell. No one has power to enter the sacred courts of high and holy heaven, to alter any record that the Most High God has given of his holiness and power. Yet man in his desperate wickedness is continually trying to supercede God, both in wisdom and power. The way that seemeth right to man, the end thereof is death. There are vessels of wrath fitted to destruction; but all who were chosen in eternity, and redeemed in time by the righteous life and obedient death of their spiritual Head, are showed the wickedness of their nature, by a direct revelation from God. No means or instrumentalities are employed. Also how and when they were atoned for is a revelation from God. God will not give his glory to another, neither his praise to graven images. All whose sins were represented in the death, burial and resurrection of their Lord and Master, as well as all who are not of the redeemed family, must realize the vengeance of our God's wrath, here or hereafter.

My dear brethren Beebe, may you ever be a polished shaft in the quiver of our God. I have groped my way in the dark, yet I will send this for you to dispose of in some way.

I remain, as ever, yours in sore affliction,

NEWTON FEWEL.

HOBART, Ark., Feb. 28 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I am a stranger in the flesh, and sometimes fear I am a stranger to the Spirit also; yet the earnestness manifested in defense of the truth has drawn me to you, and I think I can truthfully say that I love the SIGNS OF THE TIMES for the truth's sake. I have deferred writing to you until the present, because I have not known what to write; but I believe it to be my duty to write, trusting to the Lord to direct my thoughts. I am one of the poorest of God's creatures, so far as the things of this world are concerned; yet I sometimes fear I am proud in spirit. The Bible teaches me to provide things honest in the sight of all men. I cannot pay for the SIGNS now, but will pay when the good Lord enables me. I need all the help I can get to enable me to stand before the enemy of truth; but vain is the help of man. It is said that by strength shall the Lord's house be established. Said Jesus, "Without me ye can do nothing." He is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption. "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation." I understand that the preaching of the gospel is for the establishing of the house of God. I do not believe it is for the building of the house. "And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: but these are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name."—John xx. 30, 31. The same disciple said, "These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God."—1 John v. 13. These signs and wonders did Jesus, and sent forth his servants to establish his house in strength. "For the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness; but unto us which are saved it is the power of God." I believe my God is a God of purpose; and the preaching of the gospel is a part of his purpose. What does he purpose to accomplish by it. "For the perfecting of the saints, for the edifying of the body of Christ." It does not make believers, for this is the work of God. "Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot; who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you, who by him do believe in God, that raised him from the dead, and gave him glory; that your faith and hope might be in God." So we see that the preacher does not make the believer; but he does comfort him, by pointing to Christ Jesus as the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. They are drawn away from trusting in their own righteousness, which they have before been convinced is as filthy rags. But the husbandman that laboreth must first be made partaker of the fruit, which is the gift of the Spirit. To one is given the gift of an apostle, to another teaching, &c.; "but all these worketh that one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will." If man has anything to do, it is as one of old, to sing the song, after God has taken him out of the miry clay, and set his feet upon a rock, and established his goings, and put a new song in his mouth, even praise to God. Not until then can he sing that the Lord has triumphed gloriously over the horse and his rider.

But I will close, as I am not writing what I intended when I began. From a poor sinner, yet not without hope, MEADOWVILLE, W. Va., May 10, 1892.

DEAR BROTHER:—I seat myself to write some of my travels from childhood to the present time, hoping the Lord may direct my pen. It seems that I have seen a great deal of trouble. When I was but a little child my father died, and I was cast out into the world without any one to care for me. I would look at children who had parents to care for them, and think, O if I only had some one to care for me! I went from place to place until I was about eleven years old, and then I went to live with my grandfather, who was an Old School Baptist. There I remained until he died, when I was again left without a home. I would often sit and think of my lonely condition, and it seemed there was no pleasure for me. I thought, O! if I were only a christian I would not care. I thought I would try and be good like other people; but the more I tried to be good the worse I got. I went on in this way until I was married. I thought I might see some satisfaction, but there was none for me. It seemed there was a burden hanging over me that was crushing me to the earth. I would look at people who seemed to be enjoying themselves, and it seemed I could hardly keep from crying out in despair. I went on in this way for some time, when my trouble partly left me, as I hoped, never to return; but I was mistaken, for it returned worse than ever. My health was bad, and it seemed to me I could live but a short time. O my distressed condition! I would have exchanged places with any of the creeping things if I could, for I thought they had no soul to be punished, while I had. It seemed that the sun did not shine aright, and when I walked on the ground it seemed as if it was sinking under me. I thought I was the most miserable being in the world. I would beg the Lord to have mercy on me, but my prayers seemed to do me no good. Some of the Old Baptists came to see me, and I thought

WARS AND FIGHTINGS.

"FROM whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?"—James. iv. 1.

The mystery of godliness is nowhere in the experience of the saints more sensibly realized than in the continual warfare which is waged in every one of the followers of the Prince of peace. From the moment of their first hearing the voice of divine love calling them from the enmity of sin to the love of holiness, they enter upon that conflict from which there is no discharge. On the part of their hope in the salvation which is in Christ Jesus they have the witness of the Spirit of Christ which dwells in them. This evidence cannot be received through any other medium but that faith which is itself the fruit of the Spirit. Reason can no more grasp this testimony than the dead can receive the light of the natural sun. While to faith it is clearly shown that there is nothing but peace and love in the kingdom of Christ, there is nothing seen by reason but strife and contention against the combined powers of the world, and the flesh, and the devil. Those who are led by the Spirit know that there is no enmity in that love which is the first fruit developed in the subjects of grace. When they find that the enmity of their carnal mind still wars in their members, they are ready to conclude that their hope is a delusion, and all that has been felt by them is attributed to the vain imagination of their old natural mind. In everything visible to reason they see confirmation of this judgment, and hence there is no hope for deliverance from the error into which they have fallen by any efforts of their own. When it is the pleasure of the Lord to give them the victory over this suggestion of unbelief they are raised above reason, and by faith they know what God has hidden from the natural mind, that it is by grace they are saved, through faith; and that not of themselves, it is the gift of God. It is this opposition of the testimony of reason against the knowledge given by revelation through faith, by which the warfare is perpetuated in the experience of every believer. Thus the very "peace of God, which passeth all understanding," is inseparable from the experience of the enmity of the carnal mind in those who have that evidence of the life of Christ abiding in them. This war is confined to those who are the children of God, since in all others there is nothing to oppose the testimony of the natural mind.

But while the saints are taught by their daily sufferings to expect this constant warfare in their own hearts, it is much more difficult for them to apprehend the truth that this warfare extends even to their intercourse with those who have the same experience with themselves. Each esteeming others better than self, it is impossible for them to understand how the same evil can be in their brethren by reason of whose oppression they themselves continually groan.

Such is the deceitfulness of sin that the very humility which really produces mourning on account of personal vileness and unworthiness, may be the source of a boasting spirit which would condemn those who seem to lack such evidence as the deluded one verily thinks he can see clearly in himself. Perhaps there is no form of pride more dangerous and deceptive than that which is developed in the saint who is proud of his humility. Such pride will be very intolerant of those who are not conformed to the standard to which the deceived one imagines he has attained; and there is no evil to which he will not feel justified to resort in exhibiting his own superiority over such a delinquent one. Of course, he does not know that he is moved by pride in this wicked war upon his brother. It is very plain in the mind of the deluded servant of fleshly pride that he is moved only by the zeal of God when he would expose the sinfulness of his brother. He verily thinks it is the love of Christ by which his heart is filled with holy indignation against the gross departure of the transgressor; and in the same degree in which he is zealously moved to pronounce condemnation against his brother his own faithfulness is commended in his heart. The self-approval of pride is easily mistaken for that answer of a good conscience toward God which is found in obedience to the commandments of the Lord. But there is one test by which it will always be exposed when the light of divine grace shines upon it. Every step in following Jesus is attended with the feeling of unworthiness, so that the more closely one is walking in the path of righteousness the more intense will be his sense of his own sinfulness; on the other hand, when there has been a formal compliance with outward obedience under the direction of the carnal mind, the effect will always be realized in a selfish feeling of gratified pride. This can never be the fruit of the Spirit of Christ.

In their relation as fellow disciples of Jesus the saints have to encounter trials peculiar to themselves. While each is inclined to excuse as far as possible every error of his own, and to palliate such as he cannot find excuse for, when those very errors are discovered in a brother it is not so easy to exercise leniency in judgment. There may be even a desire to atone for our own sins by exacting closer conformity to the law from those over whom we assume to watch. It will not be surprising if this principle should lead the saints into such mutual recrimination as shall result in wars and fightings among them. The Spirit of Christ never prompts a saint to esteem himself better than his brethren. Even though one be overtaken in a fault, the privilege of restoring such an one in the spirit of meekness, is given to those who are spiritual. Evidently there could be no prospect of the restoration of the erring one by those who were carried away with the same fault. Only those who were spiritual could be free from it. Under the guidance of the Spirit there is no disposition to cut off and destroy one who has been overtaken in a fault. But let it not be forgotten that there is only one way in which there is any hope of restoring such a faulty brother; that one way is in the spirit of meekness. No such spirit as this can be found in all the realm of sinful nature. Well may the saints remember under these circumstances that our Lord has said, "Without me ye can do nothing." Instead of the faulty one being restored by the suggestions of those who are themselves so carnal as to seek by their own devices to reclaim him, the invariable result of such efforts will be to involve those who resort to such means in the same fault which they have sought to remedy. Many instances have been known to witnesses yet in time, where such resorts to carnal devices have aggravated the troubles they were meant to heal. Such has been the case from the apostles' days down to the present. There has never been a time of which there is any record, when there was universal freedom from wars and fightings among the scattered tribes of Israel. These evidences of carnality attest that the saints are yet subject to the corruptions of sinful nature; and it is for the consolation of such as are overtaken in faults that the inspired record contains the faithful account of the experience of the primitive saints who were subject to vanity and sin; for their consolation also there is provision for the restoration of such as are overtaken in faults. If there were no wars and fightings among the saints, as embraced in "the twelve tribes scattered abroad," there would have been no propriety in the question as written in our text. It is not consistent with the principle of love and peace that the disciples of Jesus should be found cherishing strife among themselves, so that there could be any possibility of wars and fightings. Yet the question of James fully signifies that even then there were those terrible exhibitions of sin manifested among the saints whom he addresses as his "beloved brethren." It is certain that these fearful exhibitions of depravity are not recorded for the imitation of the saints in after ages. Neither is it to be understood that such are the effects of the Spirit of Christ in the saints. On the contrary, the very question implies that there is inconsistency between their profession of allegiance to the Prince of peace and the prevalence of wars and fightings among them. Paul says, "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice; and be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."—Eph. iv. 31, 32. This is the fruit of the Spirit in the saints; and in obedience to the gracious principle here expressed they glorify God in their body and in their spirit which are his. In the absence of such marks of the peaceable operation of the Spirit in them the saints are barren and unfruitful. God is glorified in his saints when they work out the grace which is wrought in them by his mighty power. Nothing can show forth his praise except those works of which he is the author and finisher. Thus it is written, "All thy works shall praise thee: and thy saints shall bless thee."—Psa. cxlv. 10. Every action by which the saints render obedience to the commandment of Christ, is wrought in them, both to will and to do, by the holy principle which is Christ in them the hope of glory. Every such work glorifies God. In like manner, every action which is dictated by the natural mind, even though it be professedly designed for good, is sinful and productive of those wars and fightings which disturb the peace of the church of God.

It is one of the peculiarities of the deceitful workings of sin in the mind of the saints that they are never able to discern the motive by which they are prompted in obeying the motions of that evil principle in their own hearts. Even when moved to that hatred of one another, which is the murderous spirit by which Cain slew his brother, the adversary can lead the saint to verily think he is full of the devotion to truth which is the fruit of the Spirit of Christ. The deception is manifested by the effect upon the deceived one. The invariable result of obedience to the Spirit of truth is that the saint is so humbled that he sees nothing but the grace of God in his conformity to the pattern given in the example of the Captain of his salvation; and therefore the more completely he is freed from the domination of carnal emotions the more he feels his own utter nothingness. In this case the grace of God is magnified, and the subject of it has nothing whereof to glory. On the other hand, when a saint is deceived by the false zeal of carnality, there is a secret emotion of pride in the very action in which he feels that he has obeyed the law of Christ. Hypocrisy may deceive others with a false show of humility; but in the inner chamber of his own heart the carnal minded saint will find this abomination of self-satisfied pride rejoicing that he is not as vile as his fellow sinners. In this he says, "I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing." When ruled by this selfish confidence the captivated saint is very intolerant of every one who hesitates to obey the directions which he approves. Not knowing his own poverty, he despises those who are not as rich as he imagines himself. Just in proportion to the darkness and carnality which rules in his own heart is the readiness of the deluded one to condemn those who are less self-righteous than he claims himself to be.

The hateful principle of pride moves the heart of the disciple of Jesus now, as it did the immediate followers whom he called, to seek personal advantages in honors even in the kingdom of ultimate glory. Pharisaic love of the uppermost seats did not expire with the overthrow of the ritual of Judaism. Its poison still rankles in the sinful heart of the saints. Yielding their members servants to its directions, they prove that the end of sin is death. This is illustrated in the personal experience of each individual. It is still important that the saints heed the admonition, "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."—Gal. vi. 7, 8. None but those who are born of the Spirit can be addressed in this solemn caution. No others can sow to the Spirit; and there is no occasion for those who are dead in sin to sow to the flesh. Wherever the saints yield their members servants to sin, there they shall certainly receive the just recompense of their iniquity in the death of all their spiritual joys. This is painfully manifest when carnal wars and fightings prevail among the followers of Christ. They never come from the Spirit of grace. They certainly result from the governing power of the lusts of the flesh which war in the members of the saints. This is clearly taught in the connection of the text under consideration. While the pretext of justification for wars and fightings among the saints is always the maintenance of sound doctrine and righteousness in the church, the statement immediately preceding our text is that "The fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace." It is a very different thing to attempt to effect a compromise between truth and error. Peace is never made by such a carnal device. There is no peace ever made by any other power but the Spirit of truth; it must always be according to the word of the Lord that real peace is made. The first step toward the establishment of this peace among the saints requires the surrender of all the devices of natural wisdom, and submission to the dictates of the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus. This is the seed which is sown in peace, and the lusts of the flesh can have no power to mar the peace which grows from this sowing. But when the lusts which war in the members of the saints are accepted by them as their guide, the terrible effects of those fearful principles are manifest in the wars and fightings which must result. There is a carnal exultation in the gratification of these lusts, which is mistaken by reason for the answer of a good conscience toward God. The only safe guide in judging the genuineness of this emotion is the standard of revealed truth. All that is taught by the Spirit of Christ is sustained by the record which God has given. Anything which lacks this seal is safely rejected by the saints as being a device of the adversary for the destruction of their peace. The wars and fightings which come from the warring lusts in the members of the saints are always such as enlist every selfish principle in their maintenance. It is well to examine this point when called to enter into any contest. When led by the Spirit to "Earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints," there is an humble sense of insufficiency for the solemnly important task. Conscious of the utter weakness which is in themselves when they see the truth of the case, they are prepared with joyful gratitude to ascribe all the glory of victory over error to the omnipotence of the grace of God. So far from claiming to themselves any glory in the victory over falsehood, they sincerely feel that the grace of God is magnified in the very fact of their weakness; as the power of God was revealed in the victory of his servant Gideon, where the enemy was destroyed by the proclamation of "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." There it was evident that it was "Not by might, nor by power; but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." Since there can be no hatred in the divine principle of love, it must necessarily follow that whenever that evil emotion is aroused in the mind of one who claims to contend for the doctrine of Christ, it is conclusive evidence that he is deceived by the adversary so that he has mistaken the angry feeling of his carnal mind for the zeal of God. As grace leads the saint to confess his dependence upon the Spirit of Christ for every principle of righteousness in himself, so that same grace forbids that he should be moved with anger against those who oppose the truth. Hence there can be no wars and fightings but such as come from the carnal lusts of the deceived saints who are involved in them.

MATTHEW XXV. 45, 46.

"THEN shall he answer them, saying, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. And these shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal."—Matt. xxv. 45, 46.

We are told, Matthew xiii. 34, that Jesus "spake unto the multitude in parables, and without a parable spake he not unto them: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, saying, I will open my mouth in parables; I will utter things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world." All the sayings of Jesus are parables "to those that are without." "Without a parable spake he not unto them: and when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples." "And the disciples came and said unto him, Why speakest thou unto them in parables? He answered and said unto them, Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath. Therefore speak I to them in parables; because they seeing see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive," &c. "But blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears for they hear." On another occasion Jesus said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." Some of the parables which were spoken by the Redeemer he also expounded unto his disciples; so there can be no doubt as to the real meaning of such parables. The Redeemer used natural things to illustrate spiritual things. The Lord said by the mouth of the prophet Hosea, "I have also spoken by the prophets, and I have multiplied visions, and used similitudes by the ministry of the prophets." Perhaps everything in nature is a similitude of spiritual things, and were created for that purpose. It was not deemed necessary that every word or expression in the parables uttered by the Redeemer should be illustrated in the explanation of them.

In explaining the parables of the sower, the ten virgins and the talents, the Redeemer has used substantially these words, "For whosoever hath to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath."

—Matt. xiii. 12; Mark iv. 25; Luke viii. 18; Matt. xxv. 29. Clearly two classes of people are presented in these parables, and both were found dwelling in "the kingdom of heaven" as it then was. One class were spiritual; the others were entirely natural. There was the good ground, prepared by the Spirit's work for the reception of the word of truth. All the other conditions of ground named represented those who were strangers to the work of the Spirit, and heard only with the natural ear the words of the gracious Redeemer; who worshiped God according to the letter of the law, with no knowledge of the spirit of that law; while those represented by the good ground worshiped God "in spirit and in truth," and brought forth fruit. When the kingdom of heaven, the kingdom of God, should be taken from the carnal Jews, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof, as Jesus said it should, when addressing "the chief priests and elders of the people," those who had not the Spirit of Christ should have no place in it; the door should be shut against them, and the Redeemer should say to them, "I know you not," as in the parable of the ten virgins. Then many should "come from the east and west, and sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven. But the children of the kingdom shall be cast into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."—Matt. viii. 11, 12. The wise virgins were those who had the Spirit of Christ in them. A work had been wrought in them which had not been wrought in the foolish virgins. Consequently when the Redeemer came, the wise were prepared to receive him, and to enter with him into the marriage chamber, while the foolish were refused admission. It seems strange that any one enlightened by the Spirit of God should suppose that the foolish virgins represent the children of God in disobedience, when Jesus is represented as saying to them, "Verily I say unto you, I know you not." Is it possible that Jesus will ever say to any of his people, "I know you not?" when he has died for them, and says, "I know my sheep," and, "Because I live, ye shall live also." Also he has said to them, "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." But the foolish virgins in the parable are represented as saying, "Lord, Lord, open to us;" and Jesus is represented as answering them, saying, "Verily I say unto you, I know you not."

Those foolish virgins were married to Moses, and Moses was yet alive to them as a husband; consequently they were not known by the Husband of the wise virgins, who were dead to Moses, or the law, and the law dead to them. They were dead to the law by the body of Christ, that they should be married to him who has redeemed them, that they should bring forth fruit unto God.

The foolish virgins were ready and willing to commit spiritual adultery with the Redeemer, but he would not know them. Hear what an inspired apostle of Jesus has said upon this subject. "Know ye not, brethren (for I speak to them that know the law), how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth? For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband. So then if, while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress; but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man. Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ, that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that ye should bring forth fruit unto God."—Rom. vii. 1-4. The only difference between the wise and foolish virgins was that the wise ones had something done for them and in them that the others had not; and the only difference between the Lord's people to-day, and those who are not his people, is in this, that the Lord's people have something done for them and in them that the others have not. The Lord's people "were by nature the children of wrath, even as others," and "all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind."—Eph. ii. It is "God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loveth us, even when we were dead in sins," who has made the difference between his people and the rest of mankind, from among whom his people are chosen. This is sound doctrine, however much or by whomsoever it may be disputed. Those who have received this grace need have no fears, however far from the path of duty they may stray, that the gracious Redeemer and heavenly Lover of their souls will ever turn away his ear from them when they cry unto him for admission to his presence, nor that he will ever say unto them, "I know you not." How sweet and precious are those words of the inspired apostle to the saints, "If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himself."—2 Tim. ii. 13. He cannot deny his saints without denying himself; for they are one with him; bone of his bones, and flesh of his flesh.

"Shall this, O christian, make thee say,
I'll serve my lusts, and sin obey?
Nay, rather thus, My God, to thee
Let all my powers devoted be."

In the parable of the talents these same two classes or characters are identified. The character who had the one talent represents the legalist, whose knowledge extended no farther than the flesh, or the letter of the law, having not the faith of Abraham, who was the father of the fleshly Israel. The seed or children of Abraham according to the flesh were chosen of God to be his typical people, and the service they rendered under the law was by God's command. Hence they were all his servants while performing the service of God under the law. They all had at least one talent. But some of them had more than the one talent, such as the prophets, who had the Spirit of Christ in them, and were like the wise virgins. When the Lord of those servants came in the flesh, those who were favored with more than the one talent, and who saw in all the service under the law a testimony of Jesus, were made glad by his coming, for they looked upon him as the antitype of all the sacrifices that were offered upon the Jewish altars. They were unlike the servant with but one talent, who said in the time of reckoning, "I knew thee, that thou art an hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strewed. And I was afraid, and went and hid thy talent in the earth: lo, there thou hast that is thine." "For they are not all Israel which are of Israel; neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children" of God. "That is, they that are the children of the flesh [of Abraham], these are not the children of God; but the children of the promise are counted for the seed" of Christ, the spiritual Abraham.—Rom. ix. 6-8. How could we understand that the one with the one talent represents a child of God with a gift of the Spirit, for the benefit of the gospel church, without doing violence to what the apostle has said, "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance?"—Rom. xi. 29. Though a child of God may walk after the flesh, and his usefulness in the church be destroyed thereby, yet God does not take his gift from him and give it to another; neither will God ever take from him the gift of eternal life and give it to another. We should be very careful how we interpret the Scriptures. There is perfect harmony in the inspired record.

When the Redeemer came in the flesh to suffer and die for his people, to wash his church from all defilement, and organize his kingdom on earth, none were to be recognized in that kingdom simply because they had Abraham to their father. It was because Jesus refused those who had but the one talent, such as the Scribes and Pharisees, that he was looked upon and treated as an unjust man, and not one sent from God, who had given them the law they were so zealous of. The apostle Paul said they had a zeal of [not for] God, but not according to knowledge; for God had called them as his servants under that law, and their zeal was of him. When Jesus spake to them of the spiritual character of his kingdom, and said, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God," and, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God," they were astonished at his doctrine, and were incensed against him. One of them said, "How can these things be?" The Jew that had but one talent was given to understand that it would not entitle him to membership in the Redeemer's kingdom; and even that one talent was to be taken away from him. In substance the mere natural Jew said to the Redeemer, when demanding baptism and entrance into his kingdom, I bring all that God has given me, and you are certainly unreasonable if you will not receive me upon that into your kingdom. "Lo, there thou hast that is thine." Such were not born again; nor was it necessary that they should be, in order to be a servant of God under the law. While God does not speak any more through the law to the Jews as a nation, and the one talent is taken from them, yet every one who is called by the grace of God, whether a Jew or Gentile according to the flesh, is brought as a servant under the law in his experience, and is made to know that the law is a minister of wrath and condemnation; that all his labor under that law cannot entitle him to salvation, nor entrance into the gospel church. "Ye must be born again" is a truth that every spiritual Jew must be taught. This is a truth that is ignored by carnal religionists of the present day, who, like their prototypes, suppose that all that is necessary in order to be prepared for church membership, and entrance into eternal glory, is to do the best they can, and who blasphemously say that God is unjust if he does not give them all a chance to be saved by their works of righteousness. As the ancient Jews could not see beyond the works of the law, and in the Scriptures thought they had eternal life, as said the Redeemer, so neither can a natural man to-day conceive of salvation without at least some works of his own. Salvation entirely by grace is only believed and rejoiced in by those who have been "born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." The Jew who had more than the one talent, while a servant under the law, received all the benefits that the individual did who possessed but the one talent; and having faith also, he was enabled to see Jesus as the beauty of all the sacrifices, and to rejoice in the assurance that when he should come in the end of that world he would put away the sins of his people by the sacrifice of himself. This view by faith was the blessedness of the people of God under that shadowy dispensation; as David sings in Psalm xxxii. 1, 2, and quoted by the apostle in Rom. iv. 6-8.

A Jew or Gentile may read and commit to memory the entire Scriptures, may be as righteous outwardly as were the Scribes and Pharisees of old; but if that is all they possess, and are basing a hope of eternal felicity upon that, they are doomed to disappointment, unless the God of all grace and salvation shall awake them from their dream, and visit them with his grace, and clothe them with the robe of the Savior's righteousness. Then shall they have abundance indeed.

In the conclusion of the parables of the ten virgins and the talents, the Redeemer says, "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels [ministers or messengers] with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory. And before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats; and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say to them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," &c. If the Redeemer did not mean to set forth in the parables of the ten virgins and the talents the two classes of people dwelling in the kingdom of heaven under the law, and the separation that should take place at the breaking up and dissolution of those legal heavens, why did he conclude with this parable of the sheep and the goats? Not only was there to be a separation between the sheep and the goats dwelling together under the legal heavens, but also a separation between the sheep of Christ and those that are not his sheep among all the nations of the earth, when God should set his King upon his holy hill of Zion, according to that which is written in the second Psalm. That separation is now going on, and will continue until the last vessel of mercy shall hear the voice of the Son of God and live. The sheep of Christ are identified to-day by the marks which are given in the close of the last parable, as are also the goats. The sheep of Christ cannot remember that they have ever done anything to commend them, while the goats are telling how much they have done for Christ and his cause, while they are really haters of Christ, his truth and his people; and the Redeemer is now saying to them, "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." "These shall go away into everlasting punishment." The original word for punishment, as used here, is kolasis—restraint. The word punishment in 2 Cor. ii. 6, is from epitimia—penalty, burden.—See Young's Analytical Concordance. This everlasting fire is that which is spoken of in Malachi, who clearly prophesies of the gospel times, as also Zechariah, and others of the prophets. "Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked; between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not. For, behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud [such as the Pharisees and Scribes], yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch."—Mal. iii. 18; iv. 1. "In that day will I make the governors of Judah [the apostles of Jesus] like and hearth of fire among the wood, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf: and they shall devour all the people round about, on the right hand and on the left."—Zech. xii. 6. "Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord: and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?"—Jer. xxiii. 29.

How clearly is set forth the unity of Christ and his saints in the words of the dear Redeemer, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me." We minister to Jesus when we minister to any of his saints, who are members of his body. We persecute Jesus when we persecute any of the members of his body. Said the Redeemer, "He that received you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me. He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward. And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward."—Matt. x. 40-42. J.

INQUIRIES AFTER TRUTH.

PINSONFORK, Ky., Aug. 8, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEARLY BELOVED FOR THE TRUTH'S SAKE:—It would greatly oblige me to hear through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES an exposition of the text, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live."—John v. 25. My mind is now, and has been at times for about twelve months, troubled about this text, in two particulars. First, is it God's unquickened children who hear the voice of the Son of God? It is the dead that hear. Second, there seems to be a limitation in the clause or phrase, "They that hear shall live." Now, the word "hear" occurs twice in this text; and it seems to me that when it is said, "They that hear shall live," it must mean that they that hearken, take heed, or obey, shall live. It also seems to me that it conveys the idea that not all who hear the voice of the Son of God hearken and obey in order to live. If you, brethren Beebe, or some of your correspondents, will please give your views on this text you will greatly oblige your earnest inquirer after truth,

W. J. MAY.

O! if I could only talk like them. I would look at my husband and little children, and felt as if my heart would break. When I went to my bed at night I wondered if I would ever see another day. I finally gave up all hope. I thought I was in the hand of the Lord, and he could do as he pleased with me. An Old School Baptist minister came to see me, and talked to me, which seemed to give me a little hope that others had felt like me, and my trouble wore away a little. One day I was lying in bed (I could not sit up), and thinking of the Old Baptists. It seemed there was a love in my heart for them that I had never felt before. I was wondering why it was so, when these words came into my mind, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." It seemed that I did love them, and wished to be among them; but I felt very unworthy, they seemed so much better than I was. Still I could say with Ruth, "Entreat me not to leave thee, nor to return from following after thee." I went to the church, was received, and baptized, and thought my troubles were over; but I was mistaken; for I yet find many trials to contend with. My health is bad, and I seldom get to meeting, which is a great trial to me. But the Lord has all power. He can afflict, and he can make well.

ELIZABETH PHILLIPS.

PLEASE BE CAREFUL.

It frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. Or if the paper is being sent in her name and the renewal is sent in her husband's name the same thing is likely to occur. Please be very careful to give the same name in which the paper is already coming, also the post office address at which it is received.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

By request of the bereaved family I write for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES a notice of the death of Nelson Nethaway, who departed this life on the evening of July 5th, 1892, after a long and painful illness, his disease being Bright's disease of the kidneys.

The subject of this notice was born on Schoharie Hill, about the year 1828, therefore being in his sixty-fourth year at the time of his death. He was baptized in the fellowship of the Old School Baptist Church on Schoharie Hill, by Elder Hare, about the year 1849, and to the last remained a firm believer and advocate of the doctrine proclaimed by the aforesaid church. His heart and home were always open to receive any of like precious faith, as many who have enjoyed his hospitality will bear witness. As a citizen of the town in which he lived, its interests and welfare were matters of no small importance with him; and in the public walks of life his counsels were always sought after and respected by all.

At his funeral a large assembly gathered to pay their last respects to his memory, and listened to an able and comforting discourse delivered by Elder John Clark, of Roxbury; after which his remains were laid to rest in the cemetery near Schoharie village. He leaves a widow, who united with the same church six years previous to him, together with five sons and one daughter, to mourn their loss of a kind husband and father.

"Jesus, thy rich consolations
To thy mourning people send;
May we all with faith and patience
Wait for our approaching end."

Yours,

P. S. KINNEY.

SCHOHARIE, N. Y.

DIED—In Loudoun Co., Va., July 5th, 1892, brother Charles E. Powell, aged about 58 years.

Brother Powell was taken violently ill with cholera morbus at the house of Mr. Joel Carruthers, ten or twelve miles from his own home, and after a painful illness of about ten days departed from these scenes of suffering and entered his heavenly rest, we believe. I think he was baptized in the fellowship of the Mount Zion Church by Elder J. L. Purington, during his ministry in the Corresponding Meeting of Virginia. His house was among the first that I visited when I first came to this country, seventeen years ago; and from that time I have been intimate with him, have seen his course both in the church and in the world, and can testify to his orderly walk and conversation in the church, and his righteous and honorable dealings with his fellow-men. His house has been a home for the Baptists, and it seemed a delight for him to minister to their necessities. No lover of the truth knew brother Powell but to love him. His sudden death was a sad shock to his brethren at Mount Zion, where he is especially missed, as well as among the other churches in this vicinity, where he was generally known.

He leaves a wife, two sons and two daughters to grieve for their sad loss, which seems more sad from the fact that he died from home. May the widow's God and husband comfort her, and be a Father to her fatherless children.

Affectionately yours,

J. N. BADGER.

ALDIE, Va., Aug. 29, 1892.

It becomes my solemn duty to record the death of my only sister's only son, at her special request, and send to the dear old SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

Walter Lester Pardew, infant son of Mr. J. H. and Mrs. J. A. Pardew, was born Oct. 1st, 1890, and died June 1st, 1892, aged 1 year and 8 months.

Walter Lester was a fine-looking little boy, and very intelligent for a child of that age. He was so very promising that the fond parents almost idolized him. Their lives seemed to be almost absorbed in his little life, insomuch that when he was taken away from earth to heaven they almost despaired of living any longer.

His funeral was postponed, because the unworthy writer was away on an almost three months' tour of preaching in the west. I feel that I can truly sympathize with the bereaved parents. May God sanctify this dispensation of his providence to the good of the bereaved, is the prayer of your affectionate brother,

WM. R. WELBORN.

STATE ROAD, N. C., Aug. 25, 1892.

She never made a profession of faith, but died in the full triumphs of faith in Christ.

Your brother,

A. B. BRES.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

DEVOTED TO THE OLD SCHOOL BAPTIST CAUSE.

"THE SWORD OF THE LORD AND OF GIDEON."

VOL. 60.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1892.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MAXVILLE, Ark., June 28, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEB'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Having been a reader of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES for many years, and having never offered anything for publication save once, I have concluded to write a short communication, offering some views upon a very deep subject presented in holy writ; not for the purpose of controverting the views of other brethren, but only desiring to present such views as I conceive to accord with the testimony of Jesus as given to his people, "for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." I desire always to be willing to confess my weakness and ignorance pertaining to God and godliness; but believing as I do that the wisdom of the world has never been able to comprehend the things of the Spirit of God, but that they are hidden from the wise and prudent of this world, and revealed unto babes, I venture to write, knowing my imperfection, and remembering that the apostle said, "For now we see through a glass darkly." "For we know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." I do not look for perfection in this world; therefore I never feel offended at my brethren because they hold different views from my own. I know that there are many different views among the brethren, as well as the commentators of the world, in reference to the full import of the doctrine of the Scriptures as given in the beginning of Genesis; but I do not desire to enter into a general discussion of those points of difference, but desire to speak mostly of the subject matter brought to view in the fifteenth verse of the third chapter.

After pronouncing the curse upon the serpent for beguiling our mother Eve, God said, "And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." It has pleased God in teaching his people by his Spirit, that spake through the prophets and holy men of old, as well as in the latter days by his Son and inspired apostles, to use figures, allegories, similes and parables, to lead their minds beyond things that are seen to things that are not seen; to teach them of his greatness, goodness, wisdom, power and mercy, and of the grace given them in Christ Jesus before the world began. The apostle says, "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead." On one occasion, when Jesus had been speaking to the multitude in parables, the disciples came and said unto him, "Why speakest thou unto them in parables? He answered and said unto them, Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; but to them it is not given." If we, in the faith of Jesus, cannot go beyond the literal expressions of the written word of inspiration, we only catch the shadow and miss the substance, or the good things contained therein. Genesis i. 26, 27 reads, "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness, and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them." God tells us that he formed man of the dust of the ground, and that the woman was taken out of the man. In the beginning of the fifth chapter God says, "This is the book of the generations of Adam. In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made he him; male and female created he them; and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created." So I understand that the male and female were both created of the same dust, and both received the same life at the same time, and both are embraced in the one complete Adam. With this view I feel that I can understand the apostle Paul when he says, "For the man is not of the woman; but the woman of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man." So we find that there is a oneness existing with the man and the woman. She is bone of his bones and flesh of his flesh; and this that was formed of the dust of the ground was a figure, a likeness, of him of whom it is said, "All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made."—John i. 3. Paul speaks of the earthly Adam as being a figure. He says, "Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression; who is the figure [in the present tense] of him that was to come." Now, I am led to look after the woman that is typified or prefigured by this woman that is made of the dust of the ground; the woman between whom and the serpent the enmity was put, and which has never been taken away, but still exists. John, while in the Spirit, says, "And there appeared a great wonder in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars. And she being with child cried, travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered." Also, he speaks of a great red dragon being there, to devour her child as soon as it was born. But, glorious news, the stronger than he had come, and had taken away his armor wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils. "And she brought forth a man child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron; and her child was caught up unto God and to his throne. And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days." We cannot have room to write all that is said of this woman, but we find from the record that the enmity still existed with the serpent; for it is further said, "And the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away of the flood." But I must pass on. The Spirit of Christ speaks of the same woman by the prophets, as I conceive. Says one, "Before she travailed she brought forth; before her pain came she was delivered of a man child. Who hath heard such a thing? Who hath seen such things? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day? or shall a nation be born at once? for as soon as Zion travailed she brought forth her children." Another says, "Be in pain, and labor to bring forth, O daughter of Zion, like a woman in travail; for now shalt thou go forth out of the city, and shalt dwell in the field; and thou shalt go even to Babylon; there shalt thou be delivered: there the Lord shall redeem thee from the hand of thine enemies." By another it is said, "And I will sow her unto me in the earth; and I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy; and will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people; and they shall say, Thou art my God." It is said by another, "I have forsaken mine house; I have left mine heritage; I have given the dearly beloved of my soul into the hand of her enemies." And again, "For I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the Lord; because they called thee an outcast, saying, This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after." Though we have found that this woman has fled from the great red dragon, that old serpent, called the devil and Satan, that she has gone out of the city into the field, even to Babylon, into the hand of her enemies, the promise of him that cannot lie has followed, that she shall be redeemed, and delivered from all her enemies, and be healed of all her wounds; and though she has through transgression become defiled, she is made white and clean through the atoning blood of the Lamb, and the washing of regeneration. In all her dangers, trials and afflictions Jesus, her husband, has been with her to save and support her. Says Solomon, "Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved? I raised thee up under the apple tree; there thy mother brought thee forth; there she brought thee forth that bare thee." The Lover says, "My dove, my undefiled, is but one: she is the only one of her mother: she is the choice one of her that bare her." And he speaks by the prophet, saying, "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God: speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins." And again, "Shake thyself from the dust; arise, and sit down, O Jerusalem: loose thyself from the bands of thy neck, O captive daughter of Zion. For thus saith the Lord, Ye have sold yourselves for naught; and ye shall be redeemed without money." He further says, "For thy maker is thine husband; The Lord of hosts is his name; and thy Redeemer the Holy One of Israel; The God of the whole earth shall he be called. For the Lord hath called thee as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, and a wife of youth, when thou wast refused, saith thy God. For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee. In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer." It was the Lord that put enmity between this woman and the serpent. It was the Lord that made her "subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope." Although she was captured by the enemy, or adversary, yet he is her preserver and protector. In weakness he is her strength; in darkness he is her light. He is her righteousness. He hath blotted out all her transgressions and all her sins, and will remember them against her no more forever. "Sing, O ye heavens; for the Lord hath done it. Shout, ye lower parts of the earth; break forth into singing, ye mountains, O forest, and every tree therein; for the Lord hath redeemed Jacob, and glorified himself in Israel."

Dear brethren, I submit the above for your consideration and disposal. Your brother in hope of eternal life,

PINSONFORK, Ky., Aug. 2, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST JESUS:—Brother W. S. Weddington, of White Post, Ky., has requested me to write for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES; but I hesitate to do so, for its columns are richly laden with wholesome doctrine and interesting experiences of brethren and sisters, which strengthen the minds and gladden the hearts of the readers of our highly prized medium of correspondence so that I fear such as I might write would not edify any of God's little ones; but having some little personal acquaintance with brother Weddington, and being confident that he is a sound and consistent Baptist, a young minister of the gospel, and also a reader of the SIGNS, I have concluded to write a few lines and send them to you; and they shall be subject to your correction and disposal. Inasmuch as the brother did not suggest any particular subject or text for me to write about, but left that alone with me, I will quote the words of Paul to Timothy (2 Tim. ii. 15), and offer a few thoughts upon them, hoping it may in part answer the request of our esteemed brother, and not mar the peace nor confuse the mind of any of the household of faith. The text reads thus, "Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." I am well aware that my exposition of this text will come in collision with the popular view of the written word of God; and not only so, but also with the views of some of our precious brethren in the Lord Jesus Christ, who have been drawn into the current with the popular tide, to believe that this precious word of truth is to be divided between the church and the world; between the believer and the unbeliever; which would be giving the children's bread to dogs, which is positively forbidden by the Father of the family and Ruler of the house. I do most assuredly believe that the Scriptures justify the belief that this precious word of truth is to be divided alone with the children of God. The most particular point in it is to divide it rightly with the family of God, the children of our dear Redeemer, in order that they may be blessed in this life with the enjoyment of the religion of Jesus Christ, and thereby escape that death which is the result of disobedience. For "If ye [God's quickened children] live after the flesh, ye shall die," &c. Ye shall die to the spiritual comfort of obedience, and to the enjoyment of the fellowship and sweet communion of the saints. Wherefore, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." "Study to show thyself approved unto God." It is evident that God's servants in the ancient times studied the law, in order to be able to expound it rightly to the congregation, and to cause them to understand the meaning. "So they read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading."—Neh. viii. 8. And David speaks of a character whose "delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither, and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper."—Psa. i. 2, 3. Then it is our bounden duty to study to show ourselves approved unto God, and in all things showing ourselves a pattern of good works, that in all things we may adorn the doctrine of God our Savior, and walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called, with all lowliness of mind, and contrition of soul; and to exhort young men (young ministers) to be sober minded. "In all things showing thyself a pattern of good works; in doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity; sound speech, that cannot be condemned, that he that is of the contrary part [opposite part] may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you." But how often do we witness the painful fact of seeing and hearing young ministers (some old ones are not exempt) who are so given to jesting and boisterous communication that we have good reason to believe they have not heeded the divine injunction in the text, "Study to show thyself approved unto God." Such have not taken heed to their ways. Consequently their good is evil spoken of, the cause is reproached, God is dishonored, and the devil is pleased; for anything, either in matter or manner, of God's servants, that dishonors God and his cause, will please the devil and sicken the heart of the meek and humble follower of the Lamb of God, whose conversation is as becometh the gospel of Christ, and who has diligently studied to show himself approved unto God. "A workman that needeth not to be ashamed." God's servants may at times feel ashamed when they have no occasion to feel so; and sometimes they may so demean themselves that they have great occasion to be ashamed, and yet not feel so. For this cause we should prayerfully study to show ourselves approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed; and in order to do this, we should endeavor to regulate our lives by the word of truth, in matter and manner, conduct and conversation. When our doctrine, faith, practice, conduct and conversation are in harmony with the written word of God, we have no occasion to be ashamed, although we may be sorely persecuted, and have to preach with much contention. There is no occasion for us to abandon the doctrine of God, or yield one inch of gospel ground, in order to show ourselves approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed; but to the contrary, we should earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. Our "doctrine should drop as the rain, our speech distill as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass; because I will publish the name of the Lord."—Deut. xxxii. 2, 3. Now, this text gives us an idea of the manner in which we should publish the name of the Lord. The precious name of the Lord our God is not to be published with harsh, sarcastic language, like torrent rains that beat down and drown out the tender growth ("our vines have tender grapes"); but like the small rain, and the mild and gentle dew; yet showing no corruptness in doctrine. We do not have to deviate from the doctrine of God our Savior in order to publish the name of the Lord, or that the doctrine may drop as the small rain or gentle dew, in order to strengthen and nourish the tender ones, that they may grow thereby. When the doctrine of God is published rightly, it falls into the hearts of the tender plants, the offspring of God, as the small rain or gentle dew. Nevertheless it is doctrine all the same. Hence we should take heed to our ways, and to our manner of address, in publishing the name of the Lord, in ascribing greatness to our God, and preaching salvation by grace. We should not use rough stones, but smooth ones. Although smooth stones are much harder than rough ones, rough ones are generally of sandy particles, while smooth ones are flinty. Soft words turn away wrath; but grievous words stir up anger. It is said of soft words that they will even break the bones. Then it is our special duty to take heed to our ways, to our manner of preaching, our conduct and conversation, both in the pulpit and out of it, at home and abroad, that we may be approved of God, a minister that needeth not to be ashamed. "Rightly dividing the word of truth." The clause "Rightly dividing" implies that the truth may be divided and yet not be done rightly; therefore we should emphasize in our minds that just simply to divide the word of truth is not all that is meant in the text, but it must be rightly done; that is, done in a right or proper manner; so much so that we shall have no need to be ashamed. I am inclined to believe that the main point which should engage our minds in rightly dividing the word of truth is in discriminating between the two covenants, conditional and unconditional; also the two salvations; one a time or common salvation, and the other an eternal salvation. This unconditional covenant is from everlasting to everlasting, ordered in all things and sure, and is the covenant of redemption and salvation by grace, embracing the elect sinners, on whom grace and glory were settled forever in Christ their covenant head. "My mercy will I keep for him for evermore, and my covenant shall stand fast with him."—Psa. lxxxix. 28. This covenant is the fruit of the sovereign love and good will of God. It is everlasting, and embraces and secures forever all spiritual blessings for all the elect vessels of mercy, chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy and without blame before God in love. This Scripture proves plainly that God's children being holy and without blame before God in love, is the result of election, and not the cause of it, as some vainly try to maintain, by distorting the Scriptures, and also saying, "we make our own election."

I am extending this article entirely too far, and have neither time nor space to comment much on the conditional covenant, and the time or common salvation. But inasmuch as the Scriptures teach us that it is our duty to save ourselves (not our souls) "from this untoward [perverse] generation," it is evident that the people whom the apostle commanded to thus save themselves from this perverse and crooked (serpentine) generation, were born of God, and could and ought to save themselves from "this untoward generation;" that is, by practical obedience, by discharging their duty; save themselves by obeying the truth, the gospel of their salvation. On another occasion Paul told the children of God to "work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which worketh [continually] in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." This is our time or common salvation, which each regenerated child of God must by practical obedience work out, as a consequence or effect of God working within. God works within first; then we as obedient children work out by practical obedience our own salvation. "Lord, thou hast wrought all our works in us." May the Lord enable us, each and every one, to take heed unto ourselves and to the doctrine, and to continue in them; "for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself [common salvation] and them that hear [obey] thee."

IS IT RIGHT?

Is it right to encourage or admonish people that have a hope in Christ to be baptized? The foregoing is a question propounded by a precious brother in the north, and he wants an answer through the SIGNS. I will say to the dear brother, Yes, it is right. The one who has a hope is a living subject, born again, a new creature in Christ, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that he should walk in them. We do not admonish any child of God to an orderly walk and a godly conversation in order to make him a child, but because he is already a child. "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." That character in whom God works "to will and to do" is admonished to work. Paul told Titus that they that believe in God should be careful to maintain good works. The believer is born of God, and is a child.—See 1 John v. 1. "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God." "If ye love me, keep my commandments." "He that loveth is born of God." It is the child of God that is admonished to obedience. It is just as much my duty to tell church members to live a dishonest life as long as you can, stay away from your meetings as long as you can, for the Lord will make you do right when he wants you to do so, as to tell a poor trembling saint to stay away from the church as long as he can. We should not admonish any child of God to disobedience. Tell him to wait till the Lord's time? It is impossible for one to come before the Lord's time, for all the time is the Lord's. Whenever one gives me an evidence that he is a believer, and "created in Christ Jesus," I tell him he should obey. Why? Paul tells the Ephesians (ii. 10) that they should walk in these good works. Baptism is a good work. Then new creatures in Christ should be baptized. Believers in God should be baptized, because believers should "be careful to maintain good works."—Titus iii. 8. We should strengthen the weak hands and confirm the feeble knees by comforting that poor, little saint who fears he is not a christian, and admonish him to be baptized. On the day of Pentecost they were pricked in their hearts, and cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Peter did not say, Stay away till the Lord's time, or as long as you can, for God will make you come when he wants you.

No; but Peter said, "Repent, and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for [because of] the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost."—Acts ii 38. Peter said these inquiring souls should be baptized, and they should receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. Then, if a poor inquiring soul comes to me and asks what to do, after receiving an evidence that he is a christian, I admonish him, as Peter did, to be baptized. If I follow the apostolic instruction I must tell all poor, helpless, inquiring children of God to be baptized. It is evidently the duty of every child of God to be baptized. When Philip and the eunuch came to a certain water, the eunuch said, "See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?" And Philip said, "If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest." And he said, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." And Philip baptized him. Here was an inquirer after truth, and a child of God. Philip did not tell him to stay away from the church as long as he could, nor even wait till a conference meeting on Saturday. When Ananias went to Saul, he did not say, Do not be baptized until the Lord's time; he will chastise you enough to make you go when he wants you to come; for it will not do to pull the fruit till it gets ripe, &c. No, but he said, "Why tarriest thou? Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins," &c. Then if Ananias gave such admonition, surely it is our duty to give such to-day. Peter said, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord."—Acts x. 47, 48. The jailer was baptized the same night. Lydia was immediately baptized. When one is brought to have a humble hope in Jesus, and feels to be poor and needy, he cannot be baptized too quickly. You cannot find any of the subjects here enumerated that felt fit to be baptized. All felt to be unworthy. Unworthiness is no plea for our disobedience. I commenced serving a church about six years ago that had not received a member in about seven years. The congregation had gone down, the house was in a dilapidated condition, and the advice of the ministry was, "Stay away as long as you can; God will make you come at his time, or when he wants you to come." When I commenced serving the church I advised every poor, little, hobbling saint who loved God's people, and wanted to live with them, to come home to their friends, and follow Jesus, and not stay away on account of unworthiness, for I felt that way myself. I soon baptized seven at one meeting, and have baptized between forty and fifty into that church. The house is repaired, and we have immense congregations every meeting. There is much material around there now that I believe will soon come to us. Many that have come dated their experience from twenty to sixty years back. They have stayed away to feel fit to come, but never felt that way. Paul said, "Knowing the terror of the Lord, we persuade men." This is evidently persuading God's children to live in obedience. I would persuade every disobedient child to live in obedience, if I could, whether he is a member or not. The admonitions are to the living, to work because of life, and not to get life. There is such an intense desire in the christian to live right, and follow Jesus, it makes it a delight to him to do the will of God; hence he that is "willing and obedient shall eat of the good of the land." It seems that such preaching is encouraging God's people to live in disobedience, when we tell them to stay away as long as they can. Jesus says, "Go home to thy friends, and tell them what great things the Lord hath done for thee," &c. Jesus told the apostles to teach them to observe all things whatsoever he hath commanded. Then we should teach every poor one who has a humble hope in Christ to follow Jesus in baptism, and he will find rest to his wearied soul: to go home to his friends (the church), and tell them what the Lord hath done for them. I do not think we can encourage a child of God too much to obedience. A brother told me of a section where there were about five believers in our doctrine, who had a hope, outside of the church, to one inside the church. The brethren are so fearful that some will get in before the Lord's time, that they almost have the door barred against the little, bleating lambs. We should beware of extremes. I would be glad to see every lover of truth, who loves the Lord and desires to follow him, living in obedience. Every poor, hungry, thirsting little child, who loves our Lord, and desires to follow him in his footsteps, but is remaining outside, waiting to feel fit, and to get rid of sin, I would admonish to come to the church, and live with the dear people of God, and they will find a rest in obedience. None of us know that we are christians. We all feel unfit; feel to be sinners: filled with unbelief and sin; are made to ask, Would a child of God be so sinful, and have such evil thoughts and wicked desires? God's people are all such as mourn on the account of sin, and hate sin. If you feel to be all unholy, all unclean, it is an evidence that you are a child of God. Those who feel to be poor and needy, and the chief of sinners, I love to see come to the church. You should not forsake the assembling of yourselves together, as the manner of some is. You should live an honest truthful life. The Bible is full of admonitions to the saints; and if we were letting our light shine, and hunting and fishing for the little ones as we should, walking as children of light, we would see the church a delightful place, and many of the little lambs would come to us and find rest. The ministry are fishers and hunters; and the fisher and hunter should not frighten the game, and try to keep from catching it; but he should catch all he can. It is living game that we hunt for. Let us ever be ready to speak a word of comfort to the little ones, and encourage them to obedience. It is our duty to encourage God's people to be baptized, because the apostles have so taught us; and as baptism is a righteous act, it becomes us to fulfill all righteousness. Baptism is a good work. They that believe in God should be careful to maintain good works, and should walk in them. Baptism is a commandment. "If ye love me, keep my commandments." May we walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called, in all lowliness and meekness, forbearing one another in love, endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

I am very feeble, and have written very scattering; but I hope the brother will carefully and prayerfully examine what I have written, and if I am wrong show me wherein, as I want nothing but the truth. Your poor, little brother in affliction,

LEE HANCKS.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I do not desire to appear presumptuous, or over desirous to appear in print with my productions, to the exclusion of more instructive matter; but from day to day I see and hear that which reminds me of the uninterrupted progress of the development of the man of sin and the mark of the beast. This man of sin undoubtedly is first brought to our view in the garden of Eden; then in Cain, as made manifest in the slaying of his brother, upon whom was placed a mark; and by close observation all along down the steps of time we are enabled to see the development of this same man of sin and his mark. Time would fail me to speak of all his workings in all the dispensations of time; but for my purpose I will have to notice the Pagan beast, the great red dragon, in the days of Christ, the time for the more perfect development of this man of sin, by the coming of that "true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." For the light maketh manifest. So the good seed, being sown in the field, the Jewish world, by the sower (Matt. xiii.), and the fruiting time having come, the tares are manifest among the wheat. The tares have their center in the dragon, as the embodiment of the prince of the power of the air, whose praise is not of God, but of men. Brethren,

TREASURE IN HEAVEN.

"For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."—Matt. vi. 21.

Whatever may be thought of other portions of the inspired Scriptures, it is certain that nothing said by our Lord in the discourse wherein this text is recorded was spoken to any others except his own chosen disciples. In the introduction of this wonderful lesson of instruction it is said that Jesus seeing the multitudes, went up into a mountain; "and when he was set, his disciples came unto him; and he opened his mouth, and taught them." There was special design in his withdrawing them from the multitudes; not that there was a possibility that others might be profited by the instruction given to his disciples, but that it might be evident that the multitudes could not receive the doctrine which was adapted exclusively to those who were led by divine love to follow the Redeemer. While the wisdom and righteousness of his instructions are clearly seen even by reason, there is no natural state of organized society to which the principles taught in this perfect sermon can be applicable. It must be remembered that the kingdom of Jesus is not of this world; and the precepts of his holiness cannot be adapted to the government of an earthly nation of carnal minded sinners. Obedience in outward form to the literal injunctions of Jesus can no more fulfill them in the spirit than the picture of bread can satisfy the appetite of a hungry man. Only that service which is rendered in love can be accepted in the sight of God. The natural heart of a sinner cannot love righteousness, because it is already polluted by sin. All the mind of man is carnal; and "The carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." Certainly there could be no righteous service rendered by that mind. Jesus says, "God is a Spirit; and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." It is impossible that this acceptable service should be rendered by any others but those in whom God is pleased to work both the will and the doing of those things which are well pleasing in his sight. To those who are led by the Spirit of God to hunger and thirst after righteousness, there is nothing in the law of Christ but what is their delight. They need not the promise of a reward for obedience, for there is no possible reward which can compare with the blessedness realized in the keeping of the statutes of the Lord. The fear of future punishment is not the motive prompting that obedience which is acceptable in the sight of the Lord; for there is no fear in that perfect love which casteth out fear. The very desire for a reward gives unmistakable evidence that the service rendered is not itself delightful to the servant. It necessarily follows that if one is working for an expected reward, God has not worked in him to will and to do of his good pleasure. The true disciples of Jesus are drawn by the power of the love of holiness to follow in the steps marked out by the example given in his humble obedience. There can be no mistake in the case of any saint, because the most secret thoughts and desires of his heart are open to the judgment of that Spirit of Christ which dwells in them that love him. "For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do."—Heb. iv. 12, 13. Since they are never hidden from the presence of their Judge, the day of his judgment is ever present with them. They have not to wait untold ages for the close of time before their justification shall be revealed. In his infinite grace our Redeemer has already brought forth judgment unto victory over sin and death; and in that judgment is secured the victory of every one for whom he laid down his life. That treasure in heaven is as completely secured unto every vessel of mercy as it is to their glorified Lord. Nothing can either add to that divine inheritance, or take away from it, in the case of one of them who were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love. Therefore it is evident that the saints are not directed to lay up in heaven that eternal inheritance which was never subject to their disposal. Of that treasure the inspired testimony says, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time."—1 Peter i. 3-5. Certainly this is not the treasure which the disciples are commanded to lay up in heaven; for of this eternal heritage Jesus declares that it is prepared for the saints from the foundation of the world.—Matt. xxv. 34. No created being ever could have laid up anything in that kingdom of ultimate glory; since Jesus himself prayed for no more than the glory that he had with the Father before the world was. If nothing was added to that eternal heritage of glory by the infinite work of Jesus, it is presumptuous blasphemy to claim that any work of finite sinners could improve upon its perfection. Since the treasure of eternal life and infinite holiness is secured to every saint by the finished work of Christ, none of his disciples could lay it up either upon earth or in heaven. Neither could that treasure be stolen by the thieves which break through and steal earthly treasures. Therefore it cannot be correctly understood that the disciples were instructed to lay up that treasure either on earth or in heaven. The instruction given by our Lord to his followers recognized them as already called out of the world to be the recipients of all the inconceivable riches of glory prepared for them that love God. Yet it was needful that they should be instructed how they were to pass the time of their sojourning in this earthly wilderness. In this sermon of our Lord he taught them the necessity of righteousness exceeding that of the Scribes and Pharisees in order that they might enter into the kingdom of heaven. As having been called by grace to follow Jesus in the way of truth, they were already manifest as members of the kingdom of heaven. But it was needful for them to hear and obey the instruction of their Lord in order to their present enjoyment of the answer of a good conscience toward God. In obedience to the commandments of their Lord they were to walk as children of light, thereby receiving experimentally the witness that they were righteous. This was the way in which they were to lay up treasures in heaven. This is illustrated in the experience of the saints individually, as also in the recorded experience of the inspired servants of our Lord. The record in the epistle to the Hebrews presents many examples of this treasure in heaven, by which the saints there mentioned obtained such blessings in the heaven of divine approval as could not be found in all the favor this earth could afford. When the saint is walking in the Spirit he obeys this admonition in laying up treasure in heaven, as is proved in the joy felt in the sweet approval of the Lord in his own heart. On the other hand, when walking after the dictates of the flesh, with intense bitterness does the living child of God mourn his condition as being shut out from that heaven of the favor of the Redeemer. Can any earthly joy compensate for the absence of this blessed consciousness of the favor of God? There is fullness of joy in the presence of the Lord, and at his right hand there are pleasures forevermore; and these are the portion of the saints in their sojourn in time, when they are walking in obedience to the perfect law of liberty as it is written in the heart of every one who is led by his Spirit. The alluring vanities of earth can never satisfy the longing desire of that soul which hungers after that bread of life which is given alone by the King of saints. In the attainment of the best attraction which the world affords there is a depth of disappointment and sorrow, which may well be designated as the moth and rust corrupting, and as thieves breaking through and stealing all the satisfaction anticipated from the allurements by which the saint was overcome.

The treasures of the saints include everything in which they take delight. The wealth and honors of this world are very tempting to the selfish aspirations of the carnal mind; but the saints cannot afford to accept them as their treasures. The Lord does not say that there is merely danger of loss to the saint whose treasure is upon earth. It is positively stated that these spoilers certainly destroy the treasures which he has laid up here. Whatever may be selected as our cherished treasure upon earth, whether of things material, or of sentiments and theories, all are included under this withering declaration of our Lord. There can be no exception in favor of the most plausible doctrines and commandments of men, nor the most valuable gems of material wealth. Together they must all perish with the using, for "the fashion of this world passeth away." In consideration of this fact, Paul makes the strong appeal to the saints, "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth. For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God."—Col. iii. 1-3. Observe particularly that the apostle limits this exhortation to such as are already risen with Christ, so that it cannot be construed as designed to instruct dead sinners how they may attain to that resurrection. So, in every admonition and instruction given by inspiration there is nothing designed for the benefit of any others but those who are manifest as the children of God. The purpose of all Scripture is "that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."—2 Tim. iii. 17. The treasures which afford true riches in the consolation of the gospel of peace can neither be received nor desired by any others except such as are risen with Christ. They only can feel the destitution which causes them to hunger and thirst after righteousness; and to them exclusively belongs the assurance that they shall be filled. This peculiar longing for that righteousness which is seen in Christ Jesus identifies those who are led by the Spirit of God, and it is to them treasure above comparison with created wealth in the assurance that they are indeed the sons of God. There is no possibility that this mark should ever be counterfeited. Carnal enmity can have no desire to imitate the perfection of this divine love of holiness. Neither can the best morality of man compare with the perfect righteousness of God as revealed in Christ Jesus for the justification of his chosen people. This treasure is laid up in heaven in the individual experience of the saints when they are walking in the footsteps of their Lord in keeping his commandments. There is no heaven in the experience of them that love God but the blessedness of the approval of their Lord. They have their treasure laid up in this heaven when they attest their love by walking in all the ordinances of their Lord blamelessly. This obedience can be rendered only in that love which is the fruit of the Spirit in them who are born of God. It is effectually hidden from all others, so that they cannot even desire to find it.

For the comfort of the afflicted and poor people of God our text affords assurance to every one of them. Often they are so reduced that they fear to claim that they have this treasure in heaven; but it is not a question with them where their heart is in its most fervent desires. They know that if they have no genuine hope in the salvation of God in Christ Jesus, their heart is certainly filled with the most earnest longing that they might be blessed with the unspeakable riches of this treasure in the heaven of divine grace. It may be they mourn the absence of evidence to warrant their claim to such inestimable treasure, and standing afar off, they worship the Lord in confessing his power, while they dare not claim a hope in his grace; but there is rich treasure for all such poor and destitute ones in the word of truth which declares that "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." It is not by fixing their heart in heaven that they secured treasure there; but the fact that their heart is in heaven, that they have that hunger and thirst after righteousness, affords unmistakable evidence that their treasure is there. This is the abiding witness which cannot be taken from the subjects of redeeming love. However much their own reason may suggest evidence against their hope, this earnest longing for conformity to the righteousness of God still gives assurance that they have the treasure for which they long. None have their heart thus drawn to the love of holiness but those who have that divine treasure in the heaven of the love of God in Christ Jesus. It is because their treasure is in this heaven that their heart is drawn out in that fervent desire for perfect conformity to the holiness of God. There is no clearer evidence of the sealing of the Spirit of grace than the poverty of spirit which can only cry unto God for grace to help in the ever-present time of need.

these things are for the comfort and consolation of the little ones, since they often question their right to the tree of life. How shall these things give us comfort? some one may ask. Much every way; because all those that wander after this beast worship the creature and not the Creator, and is antichrist. John to the seven churches presents this same prince as the seven-headed and ten-horned beast that rose up out of the sea; for the dragon gave him his seat and power and great authority. This beast is by Bible Baptists recognized as the papal beast, that changed times and laws, speaking great swelling words of vanity; and the dragon and the beast are both worshiped in one. But we have not long to wait for another manifestation of the same prince, the man of sin, for all along he has been presented as the embodiment of barbarism; first a dragon, then a beast like a leopard, which is said to be peculiarly fond of human blood, and his feet as of a bear, which prefigures his power to tear and rend in pieces, when found in connection with the mouth of a lion, the king of beasts. But the prince is becoming more civilized, as well as religious; for he now appears as a lamb, with two horns; admitted, I believe, to represent power. But mark, he speaks as a dragon; and he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, &c. Now, brethren, does history, either sacred or profane, give us any account of a time when there was more religion (so called) than at present? or was there ever a time when religion and education ruled the world as it does now? By these two horns every element of nature is brought into the service of this prince. Mark the magnificent donations of money as endowments of religious institutions of learning, as also large gifts by governments and individuals to the common schools and the colleges, for the training of the youth. Now, some may ask, Is this to develop the mark of the beast? Certainly so. Let us see. Now we know that though there are legions of sects, denominations and creeds, they all (with barely one exception) have their common points of agreement. Note the Sunday and other religious schools, together with the various societies, orders and other appliances for the building up of the churches; ignoring the power of God and the atonement; they all being, as it were, supplanted by the power of human learning. Now these all have the mark of the beast, either in the right hand or in the forehead; and there is but one thing lacking to fully manifest this mark so that all may see it as such, and that is the giving of life to the image of the first beast by the marriage of "church" and state. There appears to me now, so far as our own government is concerned, to be a system of concubinage existing between church and state, seeing that there is a statute (in some of the states at least) making the first day of the week a sabbath of rest, in which there shall be no servile work or labor performed, except that of necessity or "charity." Now, dear brethren, do you not see this mark of distinction between those that worship God and those that worship the beast? Now let us glance at those that worship God—those whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life from the foundation of the world. First, they are not reckoned with the nations of the earth; and, second, they have no confidence in the flesh, but worship God in the spirit; and on the account of the light in them they see the corruptions of the flesh, and feel their inability to serve God as is due on their part. But blessed be God, he has given them a white stone; and in that stone is written a new name, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it.—Rev. ii. 17. But there are other distinguishing marks by which they may at least be assured in their own hearts. Yes, they are poor in spirit, and they mourn; they are meek, and they do hunger and thirst after righteousness; and they are merciful, pure in heart, and hence are peacemakers, and shall be called the children of God; and they shall be persecuted for righteousness' sake, and theirs is the kingdom of heaven. We could give many more of these marks, but the length of this article forbids its extension.

Brethren, these thoughts are submitted to you. I am, as ever, in hope, though unworthy,

A. H. HAGANS.

COTTONWOOD POINT, Mo., July 25, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—VERY KIND FRIENDS:—I will again pen a few thoughts, not to be heard of man, nor to appear important. I have many ups and downs, and almost always seem to be in the hour of midnight. It appears to me at times that I will never again claim I know anything of pardoning and redeeming love, but will wander off in some secluded spot and remain silent. In the last three years I have tried to leave my country and flee to some place where I might be easy and free from darkness; but wherever I go I find the same power, the same God, the same Lord over all, both Jew and Gentile. I find that he resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the poor. What consoling words are these. Our earthly friends may forget and forsake us, but he will not. He gives sweet and precious words of condolence to his poor while traveling through this world of persecution. These words have consoled me for years, "He giveth grace to the poor." In the flesh we cannot see the beauty of holiness; but our righteousness is in Jesus. I once thought that time would make me fit and meet for the Master's use. But day by day I see I become more sinful, and to-day I am the same old sinner I was in the year 1862. Yet I trust I have been made to drink of that spiritual Rock, and learned obedience by the things I have suffered. It is sweet to think that Christ suffered those things, and entered into glory. Some said he was a gluttonous man, a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. He was rejected by the world. Many people mistake the truth, and substitute the carnal fancy of some one, or the advice of some one, instead of supplicating the throne of divine grace. Dear ones, when we lack knowledge where shall we find the fountain-head but in Jesus? He reigns in heaven, and gives grace to the poor. It is far better to enjoy the smiles of God's countenance than be wrangling with our brethren. It is better to suffer for well doing than for evil doing. The self-righteous Pharisee felt proud because he was not like the humble publican, who went down to his house rather justified, because he had been humbled by the mighty hand of God. Methinks I can see that poor publican praising God from his heart. Here is another illustration of grace, God manifest in the children of men, who worship God in the spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh. How wonderful are God's works among the children of men. How we should praise him. How much it cost Christ, even shame and reproach, to accomplish that salvation we so dearly love, and which the prophets foretold. They spoke of his poverty, which is ours. Think how he was born, in a manger, having nowhere to lay his head. Have you ever been with the babe of Bethlehem there, with no home, no friends, and rejected by his own? Why was it? Because he was not born according to the wisdom of men, who had supposed he would rule a literal king. But God had said that he should reign in righteousness and rule in judgment; and he does reign in the hearts of his people, who are made to know that he resists the proud, but gives grace to the poor. Have we been with him in the garden, and on the waves of Galilee, and on the rugged tree? "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?" He to-day is where we long and sigh to enter. O how precious is his name to-day, when we can realize by grace divine that he arose for our justification. Then we are justified freely by his grace. When trials come they are only to try our faith, and we should bear them for Jesus' sake. I remember that once a brother, I hope, took great pride in trying to destroy me, and I then thought I would get revenge; but something told me that he should bear his own burden, and for me to let him alone, for God would repay him. Since that time the brother has been a precious friend to me. I do believe that God gave me the spirit of prayer to pray for him. He has since felt that it is not profitable to worship with men-pleasers. My chief desire is that I may be kept humble, and not try to hurt the feelings of any poor saint. How much trouble I have seen, and how many lonely hours I have been called to pass through. A few days ago Jesus applied the words to me, "Your sadness shall be turned into joy, and your days will end in consolation." I assure you I have been enjoying some of the sweet communion and divine favor of my Master. How much beauty I see in God's will being done. None can reply against God. Our sufferings are for our own good and God's glory. Men frequently think they are doing God service, when they are only manifesting the desires of the flesh. I have seen people claiming to be humble followers of the meek and quiet Lamb, while they were trying to destroy one for whom he died. We should bear each other's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. Is it true that the body of Christ has lost the gift of healing? Well might Paul exclaim, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." How careful we should be that we offend not one of those little ones for whom Christ died. May God keep me from all harm, and when my troubles here are ended may I be prepared to enter into joy, where no fear is, but perfect love abounds.

BIGBEE VALLEY, Miss., March 18, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I feel under many obligations to you for sending the SIGNS OF THE TIMES to me, which I take delight in reading. It is a great consolation for me to hear from the children of God, who are surrounded with so much confusion. I say, Look unto Jesus, all ye ends of the earth, and be saved; for fearful times are upon us, and worse times coming. I want to write a few lines and tell what the Lord has done for me. He has taken me up out of the miry clay, and put a new song in my mouth, even praise to his name, which I am permitted this day to sing. I have lived forty-two years in the church, and never before had so much trouble as I have had here of late. Why it is so I cannot tell, unless it be that we are worshipping the creature more than the Creator.

I was born in Wake County, N. C., on September 30th, 1830. On July 9th, 1843, I was standing by my brother, who was dying. That was a day I shall long remember, when I heard a voice that cut in my poor heart, saying, "You are born to die." I looked around, but no one was near me at that time, and I did not know what it meant. Then there was another voice, saying, "You are a sinner." The next day I walked off by myself to a secret place, and there I asked the good Lord to show me where I was a sinner. He led me along in his own way for about thirteen months, when he showed me my sins. Then I could see a world of sin that I had committed in my poor heart. But O what joy I did have when the heavy burden was rolled back from my heart. There was rejoicing within which cannot be told by my tongue. I was made to shout for joy. I was very happy for a few days, and then trouble commenced with me, which has followed me up to this day. I have doubts and fears all the time; but that small voice which spake to me, saying, "Look up; I will bless you," has followed me all the way through, from the 17th of August, 1849, to this day. And I have been looking up, for I see nothing good when I look down. I read in the Scriptures that the earth was cursed for man's sake. I have often thought I would quit going to the church I belong to, for I feel too unworthy to be called a brother. All my brothers of my father's family have long since gone to their long home. My father moved to Pickens County, Alabama, in the year 1832, and I am near the old homestead yet. My sisters also have gone to their long home, and I am the only one contending for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints, of my mother's family. I am alone, one by myself. But I can say, The storms may come and beat, but nothing will be able to drive me from the old landmarks; for the Savior says, "Because I live, ye shall live also." It is also said that we are strangers here in the world, but seek a city whose builder is God; a city set on a hill, whose light cannot be hid. I am made glad when I sometimes see the spire of that city, by the eye of faith, which is more to me than all this world's riches. I sometimes see the sun go down when I wish I could go down with it; for I have nothing here to stay for. My children are all gone. My loving companion, who is near and dear to me in the flesh, has a jewel that was given to her years ago, which has carried her along for forty years. Although I have been by her side forty-two years to-day, I see no difference in her walk and conversation. When I talk of heavenly things she is with me. The church of my membership is about twenty-three miles distant. I am paralyzed in my arm and at times cannot work any.

Brethren Beebe, I send you two dollars for the SIGNS, although I wrote you to stop it as I could not pay for it. Receive this as a token of love from a heart which is devoted to the cause of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Yours in the Lord Jesus Christ,
C. NANCE.

LEAD HILL, Ark., Aug. 21, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—As I am at home to-day and feel lonely, I am impressed to write a few thoughts for the consideration of the readers of the SIGNS, provided you think proper to publish them. I feel my inability to write anything to the comfort or edification of any of God's children, which often keeps me from writing for the SIGNS. I would not wish these few lines published to the exclusion of better matter.

I now desire to write or speak of some of the parables recorded in the thirteenth chapter of Matthew. In doing so I will have to differ from the views of brother Joseph Broders as presented in the SIGNS for August third, present volume; and in so doing I wish it understood that it is a friendly difference. I hope to be able to write in the spirit of love, and not for the sake of controversy. I wish to call attention to two of the parables.

"Behold, a sower went forth to sow;" and when he had sowed, the seed fell on different kinds of ground, or places, and brought forth fruit in different quantities. I understand this sowing to be the work of the preacher, and the seed to be the word of God, or the gospel. The preacher has nothing to do with preparing the ground. He is commanded to sow in the morning, and to withhold not his hand in the evening. When that seed brings forth fruit it is not children, but a crop of good works, or obedience to the commands of Jesus. Hence the difference in the amounts; some thirty, some sixty, and some a hundredfold. We can see this difference among the children of God. Some are more obedient to the commands of the Savior, and show forth more good works, or fruit.

I understand the parable of the wheat and the tares to be altogether different, and intended to teach a different lesson. Notice, in this parable the kingdom of heaven is like unto it. The sower of the good seed is the Son of man, or the Son of God. The seed are children; and when the fruit is produced, or matured, or brought forth, they are christians. The preacher man has not the power to sow the seed to produce that kind of fruit. Brother Broders seems to think we were all tares in nature. Tares never make wheat. Notice, a different sower sowed the tares. "The tares are the children of the wicked one: the enemy that sowed them is the devil." The crop or fruit will, of course, be wicked people, doing the works or lusts of their father, the devil.

Brethren, I have been trying, in my weak and bungling way, to preach Jesus, the way, the truth and the life, for seven or eight years. I never expected my preaching to make children, or christians; but I desire it to stir up the pure minds of those children sowed by the Son of man, and cause them to obey the commands of Jesus, and bring forth fruit, some at least thirtyfold. I sometimes hope I have seen some evidence of that desire, some evidence of fruit. This is all the kind of fruit I expect or look for. If I could be made to believe that the preaching of the gospel would add even one to that happy number of the redeemed, and that I am a gospel preacher, I think I would spend every hour of my life in trying to preach; and if I thought that one might suffer the torments of hell on account of my not doing my duty in preaching, I would fear to be idle any moment of my life. But I am happy to know that the eternal happiness of no poor soul depends upon the puny arm of man, but upon the glorious merits of Jesus, who doeth all things well, and who doeth his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth.

I will close this poor scribble by exhorting all God's children to good works.

Yours to serve in gospel bonds,
WM. J. CASEY.

BRANDSVILLE, Mo., July 20, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I did not think I would write any more to you; but since I have read so many kind letters from the brethren and sisters, telling of their ups and downs, and of the hope they have in God, it makes me rejoice in the honor and glory of God. He has spared my life to the present time, for a purpose best known unto himself. I was raised by Old School Baptists, and heard them preach until I was eleven years old. We moved from Christian County, Missouri, to Oregon County, same state, in the year 1859, where we found none but Methodist preachers. I thought it was the strangest preaching I had ever heard. I would say to my mother and father, "Why don't they preach? You say they are preachers." They would say, "That is their style of preaching." Thus things went on until the year 1865, when I was married to G. N. Low. In the year 1886 a Baptist protracted meeting was held about five miles from us. My husband and I attended the meeting. I had been feeling terribly bad, and did not know what to think. I felt condemned in the sight of God, but did not know what I had done that was so terrible. Then I thought of the Scripture, "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." I went time and again by myself to pray; but something told me there was no use to pray, for hell was my portion. If I ever prayed from my heart, I then tried to pray; for Jesus had said, "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." Also he said, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him; and I will rise him up at the last day." I went to hear preaching that night, but felt so condemned that I felt like I could not face the preacher. I sat away back, and shook like a leaf. When the call was made for mourners I was the first one up to be prayed for, and the first thing I knew I was talking. By an eye of faith I saw the heavens opened. My burden was gone. I felt like the psalmist said, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." The next day I felt like I was adopted into the heavenly family, made an heir of God, and a joint heir with Christ; that I was numbered with that chosen race, the elect, that Christ died for. I told the church so little, I do not see how they could receive me; but they received me and my husband, and we were baptized. I was turned loose, and everything appeared lovely. I thought I always would be happy; but ah, what a sad mistake. The devil tries to deceive the very elect; and he would, if it were possible. But God is rich in mercy, and loved us even when we were dead in sins. I lived in that church about two years, when they went from United Baptists to Missionaries. Then I was torn up. I prayed to God for help, and an Old School Baptist minister came and organized a church. My father and mother and myself joined that church. My church is about eighteen miles from me, and I am not able to attend often. My husband is not in any church, but I think he will join with me soon.

But I must stop. This is not half of what I would like to write. If you think this worthy a place in the SIGNS, please publish it; but if not, lay it aside.

Your poor, old, unworthy sister, if one at all,

POLLY ANN LOW.

ROME, Pa., July 8, 1892.

DEAR BROTHER DURAND:—O how my heart goes out in sympathy for those dear ones who are deprived of hearing the gospel preached, and are not blessed with the great privilege of reading our precious paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. To me it is precious. Although I live nearly within sight of three church buildings, I am deprived of hearing anything in this town that is any comfort to my poor, hungry soul. I would be miserable indeed if it were not for the Bible and the SIGNS. What precious reading I do find, and am often led to say, Bless the Lord, O my soul, for the privilege of reading these precious truths. I have been greatly afflicted with weak eyes all summer, and have not been able to go to Vaughan Hill. There it was I heard the last sermon, which was such a feast to my soul, at the two days meeting after our association. My heart was comforted in the thought that there is a remnant left according to the election of grace, who have not bowed to the image of Baal, and who believe and preach salvation wholly of grace; not partly of works of weak man. I must say, All glory to Jesus. If I am ever saved it will be all through the merits of the dear Savior; not through any good works of my own. I feel to thank him and adore his great goodness in granting me, a weak worm of the dust, a home with the dear people of my heart, always so much loved. I could not find rest among any other people; but there is sweet rest when we get home among our loved ones, those who give God all the glory. O how many years I wandered, having no certain dwelling place, wishing and thinking that perhaps the good Lord would in his own time grant me a home with the people I so much loved for the truth they proclaimed. But I always shad doubts and fears, for I never had the bright experience that some have who write for our dear paper. Yet I do believe the dear Lord taught me in my youthful days my dependence on him for mercy; that salvation is wholly of the Lord; that his children were all chosen in him before the foundation of the world, and not one can be lost, nor one added to. O how safe a keeping! But I so many times ask, Am I one of his children? If I am, I shall surely be kept, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time. This is my home and my comfort at times. I do feel to praise God for his goodness to me all through my life; for his goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life, and I hope to dwell in the house of the Lord forever. I want to tell you what a good visit I had at sister Orshalt's the first of June. It was good indeed to meet with one that understood my language, and I trust I could understand hers. I am not blessed with such a privilege in this town. I have many dear friends in other denominations, but I cannot say I have that love for them which I have for my own dear kindred in Christ. How my heart goes out in love to those I never saw in the flesh, when I read their rich communications in our family paper. I feel like embracing them in my arms, and saying, I do love you for the truth you teach.

These lines are from a weak sister, if one at all. With much love to yourself and companion and sister Bessie,

SARAH HORTON.

FREMONT, Neb., July 1, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BROTHERS:—Inclosed you will find two dollars, which is for the renewal of my subscription of the SIGNS. I am almost ashamed to send at so late a date as this, and hope you will excuse me, and believe me that it is not because I do not appreciate your paper, for I really do, and look for it eagerly each week. In renewing my subscription in former times I have been led to write something in addition for publication; and I have this time made several attempts, which is one cause for my being so late in sending the money; but I have felt so dissatisfied with what I have written that I have at last concluded I will never again attempt to write for our paper. Others can do so with much more profit. What I am led to write generally is only an exposure of ignorance, weakness and sinfulness. So faithless and unbelieving must one like me appear in the eyes of those who are pure in heart, it certainly must be that they are weary of hearing my complaints; and I yet have no pleasant, soul-cheering news. It is the one sad story, a poor, miserable creature at the best, trying to do good, while evil is continually with me; hoping only in the goodness and mercy of God, who guides me in the trying hour. I do trust it is he who keeps me back from presumptuous sins. O! I have so much to be thankful for, more than I am able to write, or my mind to comprehend. How thankful we should be that there is none can come between us and our soul's salvation. The world may rob us of our peace and rest, which is so often the case with me. Who could be so merciful to our unrighteousness as he who remembers that we are but dust, and who knows the desires of the heart, as well as the weakness and infirmities of the flesh? But I will close at once, or my mind my lead me on to considerable length; and should I do so, this would no doubt share the same fate as the others which I have written. I often think of you all at our home church, and wish I might be worthy a place among you; yet I cannot but feel that I am in the right place, and that God will supply all I deserve. May he give grace equal to our day, is my earnest, sincere prayer, and keep us in the way of life everlasting, for his great name's sake.

Your most unworthy, yet hopeful sister,

ABBIE CODDINGTON.

LOGAN, Ohio, July 31, 1892.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS:—Having just perused all the writings in the last number of the SIGNS, and finding them all good and wholesome food, nourishing to the weak, faint-hearted and weary ones by the way, or rather on the way to Zion's hill, who are seeking a city out of sight, a house not made with hands, entirely independent of sin, the flesh and the devil, or concerns pertaining only to fleeting time and sense, I feel a desire to say a few cheering words to those who are seeking rest and finding none. Trust in the Lord, and stay upon his holy word. Although we often find ourselves sinking in deep waters of sorrow, or passing through fiery trials, with sore temptations, which are to be overcome by faith in Christ alone, we shall be enabled to conquer our enemies one by one, until the last enemy, which is death, shall be conquered and slain. Then, and not until then, shall we triumph in him over death, hell and the grave, and forever sing his power to save. He is able to save unto the uttermost all whom he calls out of nature's darkness into his marvelous light, which is concealed from natural sight. By searching we cannot find out God, yet he is revealed to every one of his chosen, who feel their dependence on him, who only is able to sustain them. I would like to state how bad I felt when the bank in Logan closed its doors, containing all that I had received as my portion of my father's (N. P. Rhodes) estate. These soul-cheering words comforted and sustained me then, "Trust in the Lord." Only four words, yet containing more to me than a book of long sermons. Truly the Spirit helpeth our infirmities. I feel a sympathy for that poor orphan boy who wrote in the SIGNS. May we remember that our heavenly Father is our never-failing friend, and will timely aid extend.

I am well pleased with the editorial reply to our esteemed brother, A. B. Brees.

In trust,

M. J. BREHM.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—At the residence of her son, Judson Nethaway, near Braman's Corners, Schenectady Co., N. Y., Olive Palmatier, in the 86th year of her age.

The subject of this notice was born in the town of Cobleskill (near Howe's Cave), N. Y., in the year 1806, her maiden name being Olive Patrick. She was baptized in the fellowship of the Old School Baptist Church on Schoharie Hill, by Elder Hare, May 14th, 1843, remaining a member of the Schoharie Church until called away from earth to join the church triumphant.

The funeral services were conducted by Elder Balas Bundy, who spoke words of comfort to the relatives and friends of the departed who had gathered to pay their last respects to one who had long outlived the time allotted to man. The text chosen for the occasion was, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course," &c. The funeral was held in the meeting-house at Bramansville, near the place of her birth; after which her remains were laid to rest in the cemetery near by. Sister Palmatier leaves four children by her first marriage, two sons and two daughters, her first husband's name being Thomas Nethaway.

P. S. KINNEY.

SCHOHARIE, N. Y., Sept. 5, 1892.

SISTER Susan T. Huggins departed this life July 2d, 1892. She was born Nov. 13th, 1831. She was the oldest daughter of Wm. and Susan Garrett, and was married to R. F. Huggins in 1848. She professed a hope in Christ in 1857, joined the Old School Baptist Church, and lived a devoted member until her death. She was a strong believer in the absolute predestination of all things. Her afflictions were great, though she bore them with patience, oftentimes saying that she was willing to bear them until it was God's pleasure to call her home. She leaves a husband, three children and a host of friends to mourn their loss. The church will greatly miss her, as she was devoted to the cause; and her conversation was in heaven, from whence we look for our Lord Jesus Christ.

The writer was called upon to preach at the funeral; but she seemed so near to me, having lived my christian life with her in the same church for twenty years, that I could say but little, except to exhort others to follow her good works.

W. L. WAGNER.

LONE ELM, Ark., Sept. 1, 1892.

Mrs. Catherine Elizabeth Harding died Jan. 23d, 1892, of apoplexy.

She was born in Virginia, Jan. 27th, 1825, and consequently was sixty-seven years old, lacking four days. She thought she could not get along without the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, through which we get about all the preaching that does any good.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

POETRY.

HE TROD THE WINE-PRESS ALONE.

In the dusk of our sorrowful hours,
The time of our trouble and tears,
With frost at the heart of the flowers,
And blight on the bloom of the years,
Like the mother-voice tenderly hushing
The sound of the sob and the moan,
We hear when the anguish is crushing,
"He trod in the wine-press alone."

How sudden soe'er the disaster,
Or heavy the hand that may smite,
We are yet in the grace of the Master—
We never are out of his sight.
Though the winnowing winds of temptation

May forth from all quarters be blown,
We are sure of the coming salvation—
The Lord will remember his own.

From him, in the night of his trial,
Both heaven and earth fled away;
His boldest had only denial,
His dearest had only dismay.
With a cloud o'er the face of the Father
He entered the anguish unknown;
But we, though our sorrows may gather,
Shall never endure them alone.

We bend in the human, frail fashion,
And sway beneath the weight of the rod,
But swift in its blessed compassion
Still hastens the help of our God.
And the sigh of the spirit faint-hearted
Goes up in a song to the throne;
Such strength in its need is imparted—
"He trod in the wine-press alone."

And therefore he knows to the utmost
The pangs that a mortal can bear;
No saint hath a pain that the Master
Refuses to heal or to share.
And the cries that ascend to the loving,
Who bowed him for us to atone,
Are hushed at the gentle reproving,
"He trod in the wine-press alone."

M. E. SANGSTER.

JESUS' LOVE.

WHEN in carnal ways I wandered,
Bound by Satan's chain of sin,
Jesus, by the Holy Spirit,
Made me feel his power within.

Gave me joy for every sorrow,
Changed my darkness into day;
Then in mercy forth did lead me
In the straight and narrow way.

In his grace now lies my triumph,
In his strength I firmly stand;
Guided are my weary footsteps
By his righteous, powerful hand.

If in Achor's vale I wander,
Trouble threatens ne'er to cease;
In my poor heart, tried and tempted,
Jesus comes, and whispers peace.

When all earthly friends desert me,
Then my thoughts are turn'd above;
And though Satan's powers oppose me,
Jesus comes and whispers love.

Glorious thought! to be a subject
Of that love, so grand, divine;
Love which ne'er will have an ending,
Whose beginning knows no time.

BENJAMIN COX.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS.

OUR Lord said, "There was a certain rich man, which was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day."—Luke xvi. 19. This, as well as all other parables spoken by our Lord, was left on record for the instruction of the saints in spiritual things, and hence commands their attention and close and careful investigation. Though God's people may differ in their views as to what is taught in this parable, as well as what is taught in many other portions of sacred truth, yet that is no reason why they should cease to look into the glorious things left on record for their learning. Our Lord said, "There was a certain rich man." This language is definite. "A certain rich man;" and he was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day. His apparel and the luxuries with which his table abounded are described. His clothing was purple, a compound of red and blue; a representation of the blood that was shed in the temple service. The purple and fine linen prefigured the righteousness under the law; not that righteousness which is by faith in the Son of God. John says, "To her [the bride, the Lamb's wife] was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen clean and white; for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints."—Rev. xix. 8. This rich man was clothed in purple and fine linen, and the bride is arrayed in clean and white linen. This presents the contrast between the righteousness under the law, and the righteousness which is by faith. The former pointed to the blood that was shed in the temple service, which was only a shadow of good things to come; while the latter pointed away to the great offering made by our Lord, by which he brought in everlasting righteousness to his people. They washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. But the rich man fared sumptuously every day. He was fed and sustained every day by all things that pertained to the law. That law was holy, the commandment holy, just, and good, and to it he looked for all his spiritual strength and sustenance. When the high priest went into the holy of holies with blood to make an offering for the sins of the people, national Israel (who is prefigured by the rich man) saw him with natural eyes; saw the high priest in his priestly robes, and heard the sound of the golden bells with natural ears. This was his food spiritually. But so far as the eternal salvation of national Israel was concerned, these offerings which were only figurative did not make the comers thereunto perfect. But those offerings accomplished as much for national Israel as is accomplished in this day by natural religionists, who are claiming to be evangelizing the world by means and money. But our Lord said, "And there was a certain beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at his gate, full of sores, and desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table. Moreover the dogs came and licked his sores."—Luke xvi. 20, 21. At the time our Lord appeared on the earth mankind was divided into two great classes of nationalities, the Jews and the Gentiles. These two are represented in this parable; the Jews, or national Israel, by the rich man; and the Gentiles by the beggar. Surely a greater contrast could not be shown than that which is represented by this parable. The rich man, with all which earth could bestow upon him, represented the Jews with all their pharisaical pride, all their law religion, and all their reliance on earthly things. They even dressed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day. When our Lord appeared, and they were told by John the Baptist to "behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world, he was impure in their eyes, and they charged that he was a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber. Their carnal wisdom and their selfish pride built in their estimation a wall around them, which in their vanity they believed to be a sufficient protection against all evils of the wicked one. Hence, they needed not the help of the then humbled but now exalted Lamb, and said, "Away with him; crucify him." But the poor beggar is presented to show the contrast. He was laid at the gate of the rich man, full of sores, and desired to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table. At the time prefigured by this parable the Gentile world, religiously speaking, was in greater commotion perhaps than at any other period since the beginning of time. Pagan Rome was then at the zenith of her glory. She had conquered the nations round about her, and at each succeeding conquest had taken to Rome the idols of the conquered nations, until a vast building at the great capital was filled with the idol gods of the conquered nationalities. Those idols being but stocks and stones, without life, and all differing from each other in their forms, shapes, and materials of which they were composed, led to the thought by many that there was nothing in them. A great void was then created in the religious world. To fill that void a kind of deism arose in the minds of men, and a fearful thought that the vast universe was but the result of chance. Then the idea found no lodgment in the minds of men that there was one great, all-wise, creative and overruling power, which worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. Then surely the Gentiles, the people of pagan Rome, were poor, had nothing spiritually; yea, and they were full of sores. Pagan Rome had carried her conquering power over Europe, Asia and Africa; and the trophies of her victories, the idol gods, having been set up at Rome, were great and festering sores upon the body politic. The gods of no two of these conquered nationalities being alike, produced confusion, strife and discord. These were their sores, and they were licked by dogs. The Gentiles were called dogs, and the chief among them were the philosophers of Rome and Greece. They, by their vain philosophy, were continually trying to produce harmony out of that fearful mass of infidelity, that awful religious chaos that floated over so large a part of the world at that time. But that vain philosophy did not heal the sores. Infidelity can never be made to harmonize with truth; hence these sores grew worse and worse, till Lazarus died. Having followed him to his death, let us turn to the rich man; and we learn that he also died, and was buried. Lazarus died, but the rich man died and was buried. When a man is buried his earthly visibility ceases. So the visibility of national Israel ceased when Jerusalem was destroyed, the temple torn down, and the Jews carried off into slavery. Then was fulfilled the prophetic language of old Jacob in blessing Judah, "The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, till Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be." After he had come and fulfilled the law, their house was left unto them desolate. How wonderfully full of meaning is the word "desolate," as used by our Lord, when we learn that Titus carried on the war against the Jews for several months with great vigor. The walls of the temple were undermined and fell, not leaving one stone on another. The houses of the city were demolished, and the city plowed up. This was done by the soldiers in search of gold. O how desolate that great city must have then appeared, when the work of desolation was completed. The national Israel was buried, and no resurrecting hand has ever reached them. As a nationality the Jews have never been known since. Then surely they were buried. But being driven from their city, their temple destroyed, to which they had looked with pride, and to which they (who did not see the spirituality of the temple service, nor the great and glorious things to which the service pointed) had looked in idolatrous worship, they in that condition were in torments, deprived of all their earthly goods, led away from their great city into slavery, and separated and scattered among the Romans, who were their oppressors. But Lazarus was laid at the rich man's gate; not inside the gate. The Gentiles could not enter the Jewish fold, but at that date were at the gates of Jerusalem; yea, had external control of the city; but that control did not give them the right to engage in the temple service. That right belonged alone to those who, in this parable, are represented by the rich man. The law of offerings was alone given to Israel, and the offerings under the law pointed away to the coming of our Lord, and the wonderful work he would accomplish when he came to earth. Israel was proud of the temple, and all the services therein, and rested in carnal security upon those things; and being natural, the things of the Spirit were natural to them. Hence they did not look through these offerings, and by faith behold the great antitype, the glorious Son of God, coming into his temple; coming to make that one great offering by which his people were forever perfected. But when that service ceased, that temple destroyed, and the great city plowed up, that rich man (who prefigured national Israel) was buried; "and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off, and Lazarus in his bosom." Those prefigured by the rich man had no faith in the glorious Son of God, and hence were not the children of faithful Abraham. Our Lord said, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold [the Jews]: them also I must bring; and there shall be one fold, and one Shepherd." The Gentiles must now be brought in. All the prophecies foretelling their delivery from idolatry, even down to that of old Simeon, must be fulfilled. Yes, they must be brought into Abraham's bosom. He was called the father of the faithful, and his bosom is the church of the Lord Jesus Christ, the home of the redeemed. Into that church Israel saw the Gentiles taken; saw Lazarus in Abraham's bosom. This intensified their hatred towards the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, and led to their aiding pagan Rome in the awful persecutions of the church till all the twelve disciples were put to death. But Israel must now share the awful fate which awaited her, must be driven out of Jerusalem, made captives and slaves, and in deep agony in hell, which means a place of torment, saw the Gentiles enjoying the rich feast of spiritual things. Seeing the safety of Lazarus, the rich man called upon Abraham to send Lazarus to dip his finger in the water and cool his tongue. Mark you, he did not ask to be removed or delivered from that place of torment. He did not ask to go to Lazarus. The Jews, as a people, have never recognized the church of the Lord Jesus Christ, nor asked admission into it. But they have sought the aid and protection of the church against the awful persecutions which have been meted out to them. Their cry has been, "Send Lazarus, that he may dip the tips of his fingers in water, and cool our tongue."

Let it be remembered that the true church has never engaged in persecution, and hence to that church have the persecuted Jews fled for protection. But Abraham said, "Son, remember that thou in thy life-time received thy good things, and Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented." He uses the word "son" in addressing the rich man. By the use of that word he shows clearly that it was his descendants (national Israel) of whom he was speaking. He was their natural father. "Remember that thou in thy life-time received thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things." The good things here mentioned were all things that pertained to the legal dispensation. They (the Jews) were God's chosen people, and they were blessed above all the nations of the earth. The goodly land, was given them. They were delivered from bondage. The Red Sea opened and delivered them from Pharaoh. They were fed for forty years in the wilderness. Jordan opened, and they crossed into the promised land dry shod. Jericho fell, and the nations were driven out; and more than all, they had the law and the prophets given them, with all the wonderful things prefigured by that, law to enlighten the spiritually minded children of Abraham. Surely they had in all that long and shadowy dispensation their good things. But Lazarus had his evil things. The Gentiles through all that time had their evil things. They were deeply immersed in the most loathsome idolatry, without a single ray of light pointing to or emanating from the great Fountain of light, life and glory. This world was their home, their glory and their all; and this earth was cursed for man's sake. Their idols, yea, and their all, rested on and sprang from that on which the awful curse of God rested. Then, without a doubt, they had their evil things. But now, in this glorious gospel dispensation, the Gentiles are comforted. Yes, they are brought into Abraham's bosom, into the glorious fold of God, there to drink of that fountain the streams whereof make glad the city of God, to eat of that heavenly manna which cometh down from the throne of God, and to sing the glorious song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying, "Great and marvelous are thy works, Lord God Almighty: just and true are thy ways, thou king of saints."

Our Lord said, "Besides all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed, so that they that would pass from hence to you cannot, neither can they pass to us that would come from thence." The apostle says, "Without faith it is impossible to please him; for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." The Jews, as a nation, did not believe God; did not believe that our Lord was the promised Messiah; and without that belief it was impossible for them to come to him. Then this unbelief was that great gulf. The Jew can never pass that gulf, unless made spiritually alive; unless given that faith which works by love, which enables him to behold the glorious Son of God in all his unchanging perfections. Then he ceases to belong to that class represented in that parable by the rich man. None can cross the gulf of unbelief. But to God's regenerated sons and daughters that gulf is removed when that faith is given them. It is the gift of God, a spiritual gift, and has never been given to or received by any who were not quickened and made spiritually alive, and thus prepared by divine and sovereign grace to offer to the Lord an offering in righteousness. The rich man said, "I pray thee, father, that thou wouldest send him [Lazarus] to my father's house; for I have five brethren; that he may testify unto them, lest they also come unto this place of torment." What is meant by the words "five brethren," I know not; but it is evident that when our Lord appeared on earth a very large portion of Israel had gone into idolatry, and were not carried away into slavery. Not being thus involved, they did not suffer, and were not in that place of torment, as were those who lost their all in the overthrow of Jerusalem. The words "father's house," without doubt points to the house of Israel, and the "five brethren" to a part of that house. Abraham saith unto him, "They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them." None heard Moses and the prophets except the Jews. The law and the prophets were given exclusively to the children of Israel; and when Abraham said, "They have Moses and the prophets," he certainly did not refer to any except the descendants of the twelve patriarchs. They, to whom the rich man wanted the message sent, were his brethren, but not involved in the overthrow of Jerusalem, and were not suffering as those who were led away captives.

They (the five brethren) were in idolatry, and it was far better that they remained, than to avow again the religion of their fathers, and thus endanger their liberties, and be involved in the torments of that hell into which the captives taken at Jerusalem were involved. They were idolatrous Jews, and would not hear Moses and the prophets. If they had, they would neither have remained in idolatry nor Judaism, but would have accepted the glorious Son of God as the true Messiah, and would have gone to dwell with Lazarus in Abraham's bosom, the church of the Lord Jesus Christ. The law and the prophets all pointed to the coming of our Lord, and those that believed the great spiritual truths taught and prefigured by them, did not remain in idolatry nor Judaism, but were followers of our Redeemer. But the rich man still pressed his suit, and said, "Nay, father Abraham; but if one went unto them from the dead, they would repent." Lazarus was dead to his idolatry, but was alive in Christ; for he was in the bosom of the father of the faithful. If he had gone and testified to them, his testimony would have been of Jesus, and he was hated by both Jews and idolaters, and therefore they would not be persuaded though one arose from the dead. Christ had risen from the dead, had ascended up on high, had sent forth his apostles to proclaim the everlasting gospel, to tell of his wonderful works, and his more than wonderful condescension and suffering in that body that was prepared for him, and his glorious and everlasting triumph over death and the grave; all because of his everlasting love for his people. Yet they believed him not. The Jews and idolaters believed him not; because the carnal mind is enmity against God, not subject to his law, neither indeed can be. The Jews said, "Away with him," because they, like all of Adam's race, naturally were of the earth, earthy, and looked for and desired a temporal prince to rule over them. They did not desire the reign of the "Prince of Peace." They did not see in him that King who should reign in righteousness. Nay, they had not that faith by which they were enabled to see the King in his beauty, and behold the land that is very far off. None could see the kingdom of heaven till they were born again. That birth must precede their visible admission into Abraham's bosom, the church of the true and living God.

It has been suggested that there are some omissions and errors in the above commentary on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. No doubt those suggestions are correct. Nothing has ever emanated from the pen of the feeble writer of that commentary which was not indelibly marked by imperfection. But perhaps a clearer view of what is taught by that parable may be reached by further investigation of its sacred truths. Our Lord said, "There was a certain beggar named Lazarus, which was laid at his [the rich man's] gate, full of sores, and desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table." It is evident that our Lord used natural things to present great spiritual truths. By that parable our Lord presents prophetically the end of the legal dispensation, the dispersion of the Jews, and the breaking down of the partition wall between Jew and Gentile. The time was then near at hand when all those great and wonderful things would be accomplished. Day by day, as our Lord went forth proclaiming the wonderful things that must be accomplished in connection with the setting up of his gospel kingdom on the earth, he foretold many things presented by the parable. But his disciples did not then comprehend those great truths. When he said, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd," they did not understand that he was then teaching that the Gentiles must be brought in. Yet evidently that was the great truth that he was there leaving on record.

Old Simeon prophetically declared that the mission of the Lord to earth was a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of Israel. The Gentiles for ages and centuries had been groping in the darkness and gloom of pagan idolatry; but the day was now dawning when that darkness should be dispelled by the rising of the glorious Sun of righteousness in the gospel heavens. The time was at hand when Lazarus should be comforted. If the history of that period of the world, as given to us, is to be believed, both Jews and Gentiles were looking with deep and anxious solicitude for the happening of some great and wonderful event; some event that would revolutionize the political affairs of the world; and God's people among the Gentiles believed that it would reach further than temporal things; hence they desired to be fed by the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. Our Lord was presenting great spiritual truths, and the figure that he uses of "the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table," presents this great truth, that the prophecies and the offerings in the temple service pointed the minds of those who were ing of our glorious Lord, and the setting up of his kingdom upon the earth; not the setting up a Jewish kingdom, but of that kingdom in which all, both Jew and Gentile, were one in Christ Jesus. It is evident that pagan Rome was then looking for the happening of some event connected with the Jews that might endanger the stability of the empire. This led to the destruction of the male children, hoping thereby to destroy him whose advent to the earth was proclaimed to the shepherds who watched their flocks by night; proclaimed to those humble shepherds by a convoy of angels from the fairer worlds on high.

Herod, fearing that he whose advent was thus made known, would put down Roman power, caused that wicked and fearful persecution; hence he was not fed by the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. But there were other Gentiles that desired to be so fed. Cornelius was a devout man, and one that feared God, with all his house; which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God always. He was a Gentile, and an officer of the Roman government; a centurian, which was commander of a company of one hundred men. He was not an idolater, but feared God, and prayed always. Then he was not in the Jewish fold; yet he had given to him the spirit of prayer and supplication, which enabled him to desire to know the spiritual things which Peter was enabled by grace divine to make known to him. In the sermon which Peter preached to Cornelius and his household, he said, "To him [Jesus] give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins." The law and the prophets all bore witness of Jesus, and they were given to the Jews; but all who are spiritually minded are instructed, edified and built up by the great spiritual truths presented and prefigured by them. Yea, they desired to be fed by the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. Cornelius desired thus to be fed; and under the instruction of an angel he sent for Peter, that he might feed, instruct and edify him in things pertaining to the kingdom of God. So it was in that day, and so it is in this day, God's regenerated sons and daughters all desire to be fed by the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table; great spiritual truths presented in the law and the prophets; all, all of which point away to the coming of our glorious Lord upon that greatest of all missions, his mission to the earth, in which he redeemed his people from sin and all its awful consequences, and secured to them the right and power to sing the glorious song of the redeemed in time and eternity. Then surely they desired to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table.

Our glorious Lord in his sermon to the two mourning disciples as they journeyed from Jerusalem to Emmaus, said, "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory? And beginning at Moses, and in all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself."—Luke xxiv. 26, 27. He, in that sermon, fed those two disciples with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. "And they said to one another, Did not our heart burn within us while he talked with us by the way, and while he opened to us the Scriptures?" He began at Moses and the prophets, and expounded the Scriptures concerning himself. The rich feast then enjoyed by those two disciples made them say, "Did not our heart burn within us while he talked with us by the way?" And have you, dear saints, when the faithful servants of your glorious Lord has been expounded to you the glorious Scriptures, not often been made to say, with those dear disciples, "Did not our heart burn within us, while he talked with us by the way?" When the glorious gospel is preached, God's dear people are edified and comforted by the presence and power of their glorious Lord. He said in the great commission, "Lo, I am with you always." He is with his dear servants when they are proclaiming the everlasting gospel, and showing from the law and the prophets his glorious mission to earth, and that all things prefigured by the law and foretold by the prophets were met and fulfilled by our Lord when he came to earth, even the fulfillment of those prophecies which foretold the bringing in the Gentiles, and the glorious union of the spiritual Jews and Gentiles in Abraham's bosom, the church of our Lord Jesus Christ.

O how you are comforted, dear saints, when you by grace divine are enabled to behold the beauty, glory and grandeur of the great plan of salvation presented to your faith by the two witnesses, the Old and the New Testament, a plan fixed in the eternal wisdom, and consummated in time by our glorious Redeemer. Without the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table, the things foretold by the prophets and prefigured by the law, you would have but one witness, the New Testament. But adored he his holy name, he has not left his saints without the two witnesses. He said, "In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established." Many of his dear saints, like the humble writer of these rambling thoughts, are standing on the verge of eternity, and looking and listening to the testimony of those two witnesses. This testimony enables them by faith, like Abraham, to look for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. Many of them are poor and afflicted; yet, for their comfort, the prophet Zephaniah says, "I [the Lord] will also leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord."—Zephaniah iii. 12. The psalmist says, "The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants, and none of them that trust in him shall be desolate."—Psa. xxxiv. 22. Again, "They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth forever. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is around about his people from henceforth, even forever."—Psa. cxxv. 1, 2.

What wonderful things our ever-to-be-adored Lord hath done for his people! Their redemption is secured in him. They are kept amidst all the revolutions and mutations of earthly things. They are fitted by the quickening power of his Spirit to look into and investigate the great and wonderful things presented to his saints by the two witnesses, the Old and the New Testaments; the Old presenting in types, shadows and prophecies, the things which must come to pass in setting up the gospel kingdom. These are the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. How rich and luscious they are to the dear saints when they are hungering and thirsting after righteousness. It is then they are spiritually minded, and are enabled by the Spirit's power to have some faint view of the character of that God who is infinite in all his wonderful attributes. That view of him causes them to cry out with one anciently, "There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, who rideth upon the heaven in thy help, and in his excellency on the sky." O how the hearts of the saints well up in praise, adoration and thanksgiving to their Lord, when they are blessed with hearing ears and understanding hearts, and enabled to hear and understand the testimony of those two witnesses; one saying, "Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in: behold, he shall come, saith the Lord of hosts."—Malachi iii. 1. The other saying, "And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Savior, which is Christ the Lord."—Luke ii. 10, 11. How precious, how delightful, is that crumb from the prophet Malachi to the Gentile saint. It emanated from on high; for it was declared by the Lord of hosts. Its fulfillment is recorded by the evangelist Luke. That record comes also from on high. It is, "Unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Savior, which is Christ the Lord." These two witnesses bring to us, from the fairer worlds on high, the glorious news of the coming of our Lord. Then what infinite wisdom is displayed by our Lord in that parable. It contains in its wonderful teachings a vast

"AND the lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely: for the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light. And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations."—Luke xvi. 8, 9.

These two verses, which are specified by our inquiring brother, are included in the parable of the unjust steward, which was spoken by our Lord for the instruction of his disciples, in connection with several others recorded in this and the preceding chapters. It should always be observed that in every parable the whole statement is designed to present some one particular truth. Whatever other points of doctrine may be included with that central principle are to be regarded only in the relation which they bear to the presentation of the point designed to be illustrated by the parable. Much of the teaching of our Lord was spoken in parables, so that even his disciples were moved to ask of him for an explanation why he spoke to the multitude in parables. "He answered and said unto them, Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath. Therefore speak I to them in parables; because they seeing see not; and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive: for this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them."—Matt. xiii. 11-15. This is conclusive evidence of the purpose for which it pleased God that so large a portion of divine truth is concealed under the form of parables and dark sayings. It will be observed that this answer of Jesus is a perfect refutation of the popular theory that it is the desire of the Redeemer of Israel that everybody should be converted to the belief of the truth. His own positive declaration in the case excludes all the suggestions of reason in the matter. Not only does Jesus thus declare this design in the use of parables, but he expressly poured forth his thanks to his Father, because it seemed good in his sight to hide these things from the wise and prudent, and to reveal them unto babes."—Matt. xi. 25, 26. It cannot be too carefully considered, therefore, that in every case where Jesus resorted to this style of communication with his disciples he taught them such truth as no research of natural intelligence could ever discover. Hence, not even the saints can by searching find out the signification of any parable given by inspiration of God. Much less can those who are dead in sin attain to such understanding by all the study of which they are capable. The Spirit of truth, even the Comforter, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him, has the exclusive power to take of the testimony of Jesus in the inspired record, and show it unto the chosen subjects of his grace. Thus it is proved in the experience of all who are taught of God that their whole salvation is according to the sovereign will of God, and that without any merit in themselves by which they might claim to be worthy to receive such infinite mercy and favor. Indeed the whole conflict which tries the saints in their earthly sojourn, is the result of the failure of their reason to comprehend the wonderful mercy and favor revealed to them through the power of faith; and their doubts are built upon that darkness in which God has hid from reason the knowledge of his grace.

"And the Lord commended the unjust steward, because he had done wisely." The lord here spoken of is the "certain rich man" mentioned in the first verse of this chapter. While he commended the wisdom of his dishonest and unfaithful servant, it is evident that he did not approve his dishonestly. Only his wisdom or cunning was the subject of commendation. Knowing that he was about to lose control of his master's riches which were then at his disposal, he was wise in making friends of his lord's debtors by reducing their obligations, as stated in the parable. It is this wisdom by which he secured a refuge for himself when his own resources should fail, to which the attention of the disciples was directed. They were not taught to imitate the dishonesty of this unfaithful steward. It was only his judicious management which was presented for their consideration. In the case of those immediate followers of our Lord this lesson was of a practical importance. They were soon to be driven out of their earthly homes and to lose all their worldly possessions in the overthrow of their city and nation. Instead of exciting the enmity of their neighbors among the Gentiles and Samaritans, as was the universal practice of the proud Jews, they were to learn from the wisdom of this unjust steward, and use their present advantages to cultivate the favor of those who might be in a condition to render them assistance when their calamity should come upon them. In thus conciliating those who were not to be involved in the destruction which was coming upon the Jews, those disciples would be exercising the wisdom which was commended in the unjust steward. It will be observed that there was no commendation of the dishonesty of the steward; but it was in consequence of that very principle that he was removed from the charge of his master's goods. There can be no direction to the disciples by which they would be authorized to copy his dishonesty. On the contrary, they are expressly enjoined to "Provide things honest in the sight of all men." A little reflection will show the folly of devoting their efforts to the accumulation of treasures in their own possession. The overthrow of their national existence would rob them of all such wealth, and leave them helplessly destitute. Then it would not be in their power to do anything for their own relief; and so their folly would be manifest. On the other hand, while they yet had the advantages of their national standing, and could control their possessions of worldly riches, wisdom would suggest such use of their resources as should secure the favor of those Gentiles and Samaritans who were not to be involved in the ruin which should come upon Jerusalem. The Lord plainly declared the dreadful desolation to which that nation was devoted, and gave to his disciples the sign, upon seeing which they were to leave the doomed and desolate city, and were to flee into the mountains, and that in such haste as to forbid their coming down from the housetop, or returning from the field, to take anything out of the house, or even to take their clothes. Under such circumstances both the folly of those who had provided treasures of their own, and the wisdom of those who had anticipated the evil day, would be clearly manifested. It was but a very short time until this was literally shown in the terrible destruction of this city and nation of the Jews. There could be no parable used in which this ruin could be too strongly represented. The steward whose office was taken away from him presents a very helpless condition, since he could not dig, and was ashamed to beg; but the proud and insolent Jews were left still more deplorably helpless than he. Having exasperated their victors by their violent and unreasonable arrogance, they could hope for no favor from them in their calamity, while they were utterly powerless to deliver themselves from the distresses which overwhelmed them. Then the wisdom of making friends of those whom the Jews had always despised was apparent, since there could be no relief from any other source. It is only of this wisdom that the parable is designed to teach the disciples.

"For the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light." This statement of fact is equally applicable in all times and places. Even among the subjects of saving grace it is very rare that one who is devoted to the contemplation of spiritual things is successful in the management of worldly business. The service of God is not to be combined with the service of mammon. There are doubtless in all ages individual cases in which worldly riches are committed to the care of some of the saints. This was exemplified in the cases of Abraham, David, Solomon, and others, who are set forth as patterns in the Scriptures. But the general principle stated in our text is exemplified in the temporal poverty of most of those whom God has blessed with the spirit of devotion to the things of his kingdom of divine grace. Very frequently their lack of financial ability is apparent even in the management of the little matters necessary to their possession of a house in which to hold the meetings of the church. In all such matters the children of this world have the advantage of being in their element, and the world is favorable to its own. Their highest motive is the love of self, and therefore they have nothing to divert their attention from that wisdom which pertains to their generation. The children of light are called away from the devotion to earthly things which results in the cultivation of such wisdom as pertains to the generation of this world. There is enough of carnal selfishness in every sinner who is born of the Spirit, so that he will not need exhortation to give attention to the attractions of earthly treasures. It is not in this particular that the parable instructs the saints. The part of wisdom is to observe the fleeting character of all temporal treasures, and remembering the admonition of our Lord, "But seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." The children of this world do manifest that wisdom which belongs to their generation, in giving their attention to the things which are of most importance to them. In this they show an example worthy the observation of the children of light. It is certainly very inconsistent for the saints to set their affection on things on the earth. Everything pertaining to time must perish with the using; therefore the saints are not wise in looking to the attractions of earth for comfort. Knowing the vanity of all such happiness as can be afforded by this world, even the wisdom of natural reason would direct the saints to regard all temporal treasures as unworthy of comparison with the enduring riches of righteousness and heavenly peace, to the inheritance of which they are called by the grace of God in Christ Jesus.

It should not be overlooked that in our text the Lord expressly declares that the superior wisdom of the children of this world is confined to things "in their generation." "The wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy." This wisdom is not to be measured by comparison with that wisdom which is specified in the text. None but the children of light can be possessed of this heavenly wisdom. The children of this world cannot so much as know that this perfect revelation of God is in existence. It is as far above the grasp of the natural mind as the heaven of eternal glory is above the comprehension of finite creatures. Since this is not the rest appointed for the saints, it is not the will of their Father in heaven that they should be adapted to the polluted soil where they only sojourn as pilgrims and strangers. The wisdom bestowed upon the children of light is that knowledge of God which is life eternal. It seals every one to whom it is given as an heir of that immortality which is in Christ Jesus. None ever attain to this divine wisdom but by that revelation which is according to the will of God exclusively.

"And I say unto you, Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations." In its primary application to those disciples to whom this parable was spoken, we have already given our understanding of the sense in which this instruction was to be fulfilled by them. That is, they were to make such use of their superior advantages as should secure for them the friendship of their Gentile surrounding nations; so that, when their earthly homes were desolated the favors bestowed by them should be repaid by those Gentiles giving them a place of sojourning among those whom they had thus conciliated. The word "everlasting," as applied to those habitations into which they should be received, must be understood as limited in its meaning to those earthly abodes which were not destroyed with their own habitations. So the word is frequently used in the Scriptures where its meaning is evidently confined to the endurance of the things to which it is applied. The land of Canaan was given to Abraham and his seed "for an everlasting possession;" yet that gift certainly was confined to the duration of the covenant of which the promise was a part.—See Gen. xvii. 7, 8. There can be no friends made of the mammon of unrighteousness, who can receive the saints into habitations which are everlasting in the sense of that unending existence which is the peculiar attribute of the eternal God. But there was a sense in which the disciples addressed might use the resources then at their disposal to secure the friendship of those who were not to be involved in the ruin of Jerusalem. So it is the part of wisdom in the saints even now to make such use of their earthly treasures, whether of possession or advantages, that they may secure the favor of those with whom they are associated. There is no earthly position so secure that there is assurance of its perpetuity. Especially to the saints is it important that they remember that everything of this world is fleeting. "The fashion of this world passeth away." Not only their material possessions are soon to be relinquished, but their very breath is only a temporary loan. Soon they must leave this mortal state, and wealth and honors must be forgotten. Not even the purest treasures of natural affection can survive that last change to which all mortals are hastening. Hence, true wisdom admonishes the saints to pass the time of their sojourning here in the fear of the Lord.

As we understand this instruction of our Lord, it is to the same purport with that solemn admonition of Paul, "But this I say, brethren, the time is short; it remaineth that both they that have wives be as though they had none; and they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoice, as though they rejoiced not; and they that buy as though they possessed not; and they that use this world, as not abusing it; for the fashion of this world passeth away."—1 Cor. vii. 29-31. Therefore, "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men."—Rom. xii. 18.

A true appreciation of the perishing character of all that is esteemed desirable in this world will expose the error of the saints placing their affections upon either the wealth or honors which are so soon to be swept away by the resistless power of time. While they must give attention to these things as needful for their present use, they display wisdom in remembering that they have here no permanent abode. So Paul says, "But godliness with contentment is great gain. For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain that we can carry nothing out. And having food and raiment let us be therewith content. But they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil; which while some coveted after, they have erred [that is, have been seduced] from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows."—1 Tim. vi. 6-10. This can refer to none but the subjects of saving grace, since they only have the faith, and no others can err from it. May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ save his saints from falling into this grievous snare.

KELLY'S CORNERS, N. Y., Sept., 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN:—We have been favored with another annual meeting of our Association, and with the privilege of greeting our dear kindred in Christ Jesus, our loving Lord, our Judge, our Lawgiver and Savior, who alone will save us. In all our pilgrimage we shall prove that it is through much tribulation we must enter the kingdom of God. Says the apostle, "Though now for a season, if needs be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations." In the world we shall have tribulation. We find that all the consolation we have had has been in faith's view of the promise of the Father, our unchanging and faithful God, concerning the kingdom of his dear Son. I would stir up the pure minds of the brethren by reminding them of the things they already know. Says the apostle, "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage."—Gal. v. 1. The knowledge of freedom in Christ is our only hope. We cease from own works, and rest in the work of righteousness performed by the Captain of our salvation, "who his own self bear our sins in his own body on the tree; that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness: by whose stripes ye were healed. For ye were as sheep going astray, but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls."—1 Peter ii. 24, 25. Thus our attention is called to the bringing in of an everlasting righteousness. "Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness, and thy law is the truth."—Psa. cxix. 142. The law put in the heart and written in the mind reveals the fullness of the efficacious and gracious work of Christ Jesus, our glorious peace and blessedness; for "Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord, that delighteth greatly in his commandments. His seed shall be mighty upon earth." "The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance." It is thus we view the salvation of God through our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, past, present and to come, all complete in him; for it pleased the Father that in him should all fullness dwell, and that he should be head over all to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all. He has by his sufferings, death and resurrection become the end of the law for righteousness; that is, he has satisfied all its requirements, as the Mediator, and set the guilty free from the just demands which the holy law of God held against them, who were chosen in him before the foundation of the world. So Paul wrote to the church at Ephesus, to comfort, strengthen and confirm them. "Grace to you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." So we of to-day can in the same blessed name declare all the joys of the saints. They were the recipients of all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ, according as they were chosen in him before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love. According to the promise of life in Christ, and his foreknowledge of the sins of his chosen people, they were predestinated to be conformed to or bear his image. Therefore the riches of mercy must abound, because of the love he had for them, even while dead in sin; and their freedom must be known as alone in him. If the Son make them free, they are free indeed. And being made free by the blood of the cross, through the knowledge of his work and power in the heart, the child of God is called to liberty, and to exercise his freedom in crying, Abba, Father, to extol the name of God, to walk in his holy commandments, to stand fast by faith in word and practice, walking in all the ordinances of the Lord blamelessly. When established in the truth, which Jesus is to them, there is a willingness to endure hardness as good soldiers, and to fight the good fight of faith. In this warfare, in which the weapons are not carnal, they find that many are the afflictions of the righteous; and as they are tried as in a furnace, their ability to stand fast is shown them, in a manner that gives the Captain of their salvation all the glory. They glory only in the Lord, who is their strength and righteousness, and stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made them free. The children of God often see and feel the mercy and goodness of their covenant-keeping God in their liberty which they have in Christ Jesus, which many would privily spy out and despoil them of. They enjoy it according to the word of God, wherein they prove every weapon formed against them unavailing, and every tongue powerless to injure them, as they are builded together in the truth, and separated unto the gospel of God's dear Son; in whom they have redemption through his blood, and are enabled to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made them free. Realizing this liberty to be the work of Jesus on their behalf, the children of God are enabled to use their liberty to his name's honor and glory, instead of an occasion to the flesh. Thus they prove what is the acceptable will of their heavenly Father, who has delivered them from the yoke of bondage of which the apostle speaks, and against which he warns them as an entanglement. To illustrate, we often see the innocent fly unwittingly caught in the spider's web. Immediately the active creature that has spread the net darts out to secure his prey, well knowing by its instinct that the entanglement will be sufficient, as the web is kept about the fly, and its own struggling will produce its death. The tempter's power over our weak faith, when conferring with flesh and blood about the duty of a christian to satisfy the demands of the law, instead of relying on the power of faith, through the blood of Jesus Christ, which cleanses from all sin, often leads to entanglement of such a nature that the enemy of all righteousness keeps the web about us, and our own struggling will sooner or later produce death to all our church privileges and Christlike ardor. The Lord only can deliver such an one from his captivated or entangled condition. We understand the people of God to be a family of kings and priests to God, being delivered out of the kingdom of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son. Though by nature children of wrath, even as others, the rich mercy of God is manifest in its display of life and grace in the sinner's heart. There is a holy calling, a heavenly consecration, a translation from darkness into the marvelous light and liberty of the sons of God, to enjoy their portion as joint heirs, in the earnest which is given them in their experience of this heavenly ministration, whereby they cry, Abba, Father. Walking in Jesus' commandments, they realize the truth of the declaration, "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." May we be found standing fast in the liberty wherewith our gracious Redeemer hath made us free, trusting all to his powerful hand, constantly and willingly bearing his easy yoke and light burden, learning alone of him, who has said, "My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews." In this world we shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, for Jesus has overcome the world, and we shall overcome through him. Amen.

OTEGO, Otsego Co., N. Y.

DEAR KINDRED IN CHRIST:—The following precious letter, written by our dear sister Shephard, seems too good to be laid aside. While reading it my mind was very much stirred up by way of remembrance: also to answer it through the SIGNS, and add a few lines for myself, if it may be published. I hope sister Shephard will forgive me for copying her letter, that it may be used for the living subjects of God's grace. It is through the mercy of my kind heavenly Father that I am still among the living, both natural and spiritual.

I know I am among the former, and sometimes have an assurance that I have been born of the Spirit of God, because of the love which so often goes out toward that poor and afflicted people whose God is the Lord, and who are everywhere spoken against. It pleased the great I Am to choose them out of all nations, kindreds and tongues, and to set them among princes, even in the house of David. What did we know concerning our natural birth? No more than of our spiritual birth. It seems so wonderful to feel God's wondrous power and love to save a poor, lost and wretched sinner, such as I am; and then to know that in this body of sin and death there dwells no good thing. Yet we are trying much of the time to make it presentable to the holy and just God. The children of God labor hard to do that, even from their youth up; but vain is the help of man. I desire to be saved from trying to enter into the secret things of the Lord. I am satisfied with what holy men of old were inspired to write for our learning, and what our dear Savior taught his apostles. They were bold defenders of the truth, which is for our learning. I do believe I wish Mount Zion well, and that I may be a meek and lowly follower of the Lamb is my chief desire. May the God of rich and reigning grace be with the dear editors, to guide and direct them in wisdom's ways, and richly pour out his abundant blessings on all who contribute to the columns of our dear old paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. We continue to live in peace, and fare well on gospel food from the gospel storehouse.

As ever, your sister,

C. L. FRENCH.

AUGUST 13, 1892.

DEAR SISTER FRENCH:—I many times feel that the time to answer a letter is when I first receive it; and if I felt it were possible to answer such a precious, instructive, spiritual letter as yours, I would not dread trying. But I feel that you are possessed of a charitable heart; therefore you will cover my weakness with charity. I do feel to tell you that it was so good I could not remain silent. I almost always think of your blessed meetings, and hope I feel it from my heart when I say, I long to be in that quiet and restful place. I hope I did feel that to be so while there. It seemed to me we were shut in from the world, with no one to molest or make us afraid. Yes, I do believe you are the flock that Jesus feeds, and that feeling of rest is much felt by you in your sweet meetings. I hope it gave me a feeling of gratitude when you wrote of the good tidings from Utica. My heart was melted to tears when I read it. Now our dear brother Bundy will go with a light heart, for the Lord in his own time and way has favored Zion, and she shall blossom like the rose. It is pleasant to have some one to talk to you who loves the truth; for what is there to talk of but this great and wonderful matter, salvation by grace? But could you know my heart as I do, you could not say that I know things as you do. I felt while reading your precious letter that I knew nothing. When you spoke of the text that brother Bundy read, Rev. xiv. 6, 7, especially the great things represented by the angel, how I did wish you were here. I fear so many times I have no true light given me in his holy word. O that I may feel to say,

"Lord, let not groundless fears destroy
The mercies now possessed;
I'll praise for mercies I enjoy,
And trust for all the rest."

I do hope my desire is heartfelt when I say that I do want to meet with you again at your meetings. It keeps me alive to these things to hear others tell of their joys and sorrows, the strong the same as the feeble. I do not know how I should live without the SIGNS, as it is such a comfort to me. No people seem to me like that little happy group at Otego. I do believe I love them. O yes, we must have trials, to let us know that this world is not our home. I need not tell you how I want to see you all. These silent whispers must suffice. I hope I have not written things I do not know. I am sure you know them, and that you wrote in the Spirit to me. No thanks to the flesh, for no good comes out of that.

With much love to all the dear ones, yourself and brother French not forgotten, I am, as ever, your loving sister in hope, ADELIA SHEPHARD.

OPELIKA, Ala., Aug. 25, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—By request of several who seem to be greatly interested in the SIGNS, and desire so much that I should continue to write, I submit this. We know that we can neither write nor speak profitably without Jesus; for he said, "Without me ye can do nothing." In our experience we are made to say, "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it. Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." And one of old said, "What do we here without thee?" "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me."

We are struck with wonder at the manner of Peter, James and John, who were "ignorant and unlearned men," who in the temple declared the wonderful works of God; and the people, when they perceived that they were ignorant and unlearned men, took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus. This is the secret of our success and ability to do each other good, and to glorify our God, by pen or speech. We are sure that we ought to do all things for the glory of God, whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do. When we give a reproof, that is also for the glory of God. Instruction also is for the same purpose. Our writing should be done with a view to instruct, encourage and build up the children of our Father which is in heaven. Christ is our theme; for we find in him all the treasures of wisdom, knowledge and righteousness. Through, by and from him we are supplied with every needed grace and comfort; for John says he is "full of grace and truth. And of his fullness have all we received, and grace for grace." As I think of the subject, how broad, and long, and deep, and high, is the grace of our God. How effective is that grace. It is like the leaven hid in three measures of meal, until all was leavened. It is silent in its work, and invisible; yet it is effective, working in us mightily, overcoming in its effects, until we are brought to see the weakness and emptiness of man, and the fullness of Christ; until we see the weakness of men, and the almighty power of Christ Jesus our Lord; the wickedness of our nature, and the true righteousness of Jesus our Lord. Who will ever be able to write or speak of the wonderful fullness of that matchless grace of God? Does grace work? Paul said, "I labored more abundantly than they all; yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me." Then as we look at the wonderful deeds done by Paul, his self-sacrifices which he made for the elect's sake, it was grace working in him. If we ask what it was that distinguished this eminent man of God, we shall be bound to say that grace did it. God gave the grace. Then who maketh us to differ? God makes the difference; for the same grace that wrought in Paul also wrought in Peter, James and John. The Lord was with Paul, as well as with Peter, James and John. The secret was that the Lord was there. And now, when we do anything for the good of the church and the glory of God, rest assured the Lord is in it. He worketh in his people to will and to do of his own good pleasure. Then if we feel that we need grace, why not go to the throne of grace? Paul so admonishes. "Let us come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need." This grace is all in all. Paul said to Titus, "For the grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world." So we see the effect of grace in the heart. Grace means Christ in us the hope of glory. Grace carries the idea of faith, life, and every gift which God has bestowed upon us, by Christ Jesus his Son. Hence the breadth, the length, the height and depth of this unsearchable wisdom of our God, who worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure, teaching us every lesson we need to know in time, who have been brought into the school of Christ; for thus by grace we are brought, subject to Jesus, the great Teacher of Israel, even the true Israel of our God. This grace teaches kindness, charity and meekness. What Christ was in this world, this grace dwelling in the heart teaches us to follow; who made himself of no reputation, and took on him the form of a servant, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. God grant us this grace, that we may walk worthy of the high calling of our God.

Yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

HEBRON, Ill.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I do not send this for publication, but to give you some idea of the days of darkness and distress I spoke of in my experience, written a year ago this past winter, feeling at the time that I could not write as I would like about it.

Soon after being baptized, great darkness seemed to settle down upon me. I was tempted with the most blasphemous thoughts against that blessed Savior I had thought I loved so well. The precious promises contained in God's holy word, which once I had thought were mine, were now taken from me, and instead thereof such Scripture as the following was all that I could claim as mine: "For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again to repentance, seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame." I think I have since then been made to see that the Lord's hand was leading me through this fiery trial, teaching me that my strength was utter weakness. "Who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." "Whomsoever the Son makes free shall be free indeed." I was again made to rejoice, I trust, in him who doeth all things well.

I was married on Dec. 20th, 1849. My husband was not a professor of religion at the time, neither was he an opposer. After a few years it pleased the Lord to show him his lost condition as a sinner, and revealed himself to him as his Savior, while our eldest, a little boy of four and one-half years, lay a corpse in the house. He attended the covenant meeting the next Saturday, and there expressed his desire to follow the Savior in the ordinances of his house, which was granted, and (with three others) was baptized the next day. He lived a little over seven years a humble and devoted christian, and died Oct. 16th, 1854, in the hope of a blessed immortality beyond the grave. My mother and myself were taking the SIGNS OF THE TIMES and the "Southern Baptist Messenger" while living in Massachusetts, between thirty and forty years ago. We came west in the spring of 1862. My mother's father, James Greene, commenced taking the SIGNS, I think, at the first of its publication, and continued until his death, which occurred in April, 1842. My aunt, F. L. Bagg, took it afterward, until a few weeks before her death, which occurred April 22, 1888, she being the last of the family. The many years I have been taking the SIGNS, I am fully convinced, the doctrine it advocates is in accordance with the teaching of the Bible. The editorials and the many communications that have been written on portions of Scripture, have been to me truly edifying and instructive. We read, "The anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you; but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him." The SIGNS comes to me regularly. I do not feel willing to do without it. I cannot go to meeting, and if I did I would not hear the preaching that is food for me. I am not able to go around the house without crutches. My health is very poor. I cannot say it is better than a year ago. Some of this was written quite a while ago. I then thought you would think it weakness in me to send it. As it is, I will send it, hoping you will throw over it the mantle of charity. You will know more of the trials I passed through in the early part of my christian experience, if indeed I have any. I cannot see that I grow better as years pass by; but I find that when I would do good, evil is present with me. If saved it is all of grace. Yes,

"Grace all the work shall crown
Through everlasting days;
It lays in heaven the topmost stone,
And well deserves the praise."

M. L. PETTIBONE.

INQUIRIES AFTER TRUTH.

WILL brother Wm. J. Casey, of Lead Hill, Ark., be so kind as to give through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES his views on Ephesians ii. 3, especially the last clause of the verse, and oblige a poor sinner? The passage reads as follows: "Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind; and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others."

Affectionately,

JOSEPH BRODERS.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—July 16th, 1892, brother James Cudworth, of Mainesburgh, Tioga Co., Pa.

The deceased was born August 17th, 1826; was married on May 30th, 1849, to Miss Lydia Jane Whitaker; was baptized (with his wife) by Elder Eli Gitchell, in June, 1858, and remained a firm, truth-loving Baptist until his death. He was well-versed in the Scriptures, and never willing to yield one point of gospel truth to please the world. His membership was with the Cherry Flats Church, and had been for many years. The loss will be greatly felt by the little church, as well as by the family.

He leaves a widow, sister Cudworth, and three children: Mrs. Julia L. Dewitt, Mrs. Virginia L. Parkhurst and James C. Cudworth. If it is God's will, may our dear afflicted sister and children realize the presence of his reconciling countenance in this dark and trying hour of affliction, is the desire of the unworthy writer, who was well acquainted with the deceased and his wife. His disease was creeping paralysis, beginning in his feet more than a year ago, and working up to his brain. Though a great sufferer, he bore his sufferings with much patience, never swerving from the truth that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose.

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm."

WAVERLY, Lackawanna Co., Pa.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—In compliance with the request of the afflicted family I now forward for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES a notice of the death of John H. Blackwell, who departed this life Sept. 2d, 1892, aged 18 years and 7 days.

Connected with the death of this young man there are circumstances which are not only wonderful, but of great interest to his relatives and dear friends; for he was a youth of unblemished character, and was much respected by all who knew him. About two years ago he stated to his dear mother, and I think some other members of the family, that when he was eighteen years old he would die. The dear family tried to turn his mind away from such a thought, but he told them that he desired to die at that time, and did not wish to live any longer; and he went so far as to say that he prayed that such might be the case. Last winter, while away from home attending school, he was taken sick, and returned home from school. In a few days he seemed so much better that he went back to school again, but soon had to come home; and it became evident to the dear family that he was very sick. A physician was called, and medicine was ordered, which was given according to directions, and sometimes it would appear to give temporary relief; but the deep-seated disease could not be removed. All the time, and when suffering very much, not a murmuring word was uttered by him; and he would bear his bodily pain with so much resignation that it caused wonder and great surprise, not only in his own family, but to his numerous friends. It was supposed that the disease called "La Grippe" was the real cause of his disease, which became much complicated before his death, so that all medical skill failed; and as he became weaker he manifested no desire to be restored to health, but wished to die. Hemorrhages soon commenced, and he discharged much blood, soon causing him to be very weak; and for a number of months he had to sit nearly all the time in a chair, not being so that he could lie down. One night, several weeks before he died, he told his dear mother that the twenty-third Psalm had been applied to him with so much comfort, especially the words, "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters." It was no uncommon thing for him in the night to openly pray to his God, but was never heard to pray to be restored to health. On the contrary, he desired to depart from this life, which caused his friends great amazement, as he was a young man of such great promise, and taken away before the sun of life had arisen to the meridian; but it showed the power of reigning grace. A very short time before his death I visited him, and then he told me that he wanted to go. Said I, "John, are you afraid to die?" He readily replied, "No;" but he was afraid that he was not prepared. To this I answered, "John, if you feel that way it is an evidence that you are prepared, for hypocrites do not talk that way." This reply brought a cheerful look or expression on his countenance; and it certainly was wonderful to see such resignation, and when his dissolution was so near. The dear family, in the death of the loved child and brother, have their cup of joy and sorrow mingled; joy that he was prepared for the great change, and sorrow to have him taken from them to return no more. He has left a dear father, an affectionate mother, three brothers and four sisters; but their loss is his eternal gain.

His funeral was very numerously attended on the 4th instant, and his favorite hymn, No. 1276, Beebe's Collection, was read; also, No. 1257 was read and sung. The text used upon the sad occasion was Psalm xxiii. 1-4.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

POETRY.

'NEATH THE SHADOW O' HIS WING.

"He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty."—Psalm xci. 1.

Sae cozily I nestle doon
Aneath his ootspread wings;
Nae place on earth is hauf sae dear,
Sic peace an' rest it brings.
A shadow frae the scorching heat,
A shelter frae the blast,
Whaur I can coorie doon an' hide
Till a' the storm is past.
Sae come an' rest you here awhile,
Your cares a' frae ye fling;
There's naught to fear gin ye abide
In the shadow o' his wing.

The downie feathers o' his wing
Sae softly roun' me fa',
I dinna feel the bitin' frost,
Nor heed the drivin' snow;
For safely in my hidin' place,
Sae coothe an' sae warm,
The powers o' darkness strive in vain
To hurt me or alarm.

Wi' dowie heart an' weary feet,
Boo'd doon wi' cank'rin' care,
I trudg'd along a dreary road,
An' maist sunk in despair.
But noo; thick clouds may gather roun',
An' a' in darkness hide—
Nae evil thing hae I to fear
Sae lang as here I bide.

Destruction sair, wi' reckless han',
On ilka side I've seen;
But frae the wily fowler's snare
I hae delivered been.
Sae noo to him wha reigns aboon
Wi' grateful heart I sing;
May he ay be my dwelling-place,
An' hide me 'neath his wing.

CORRESPONDENCE.

STATE ROAD, N. C., Sept. 12, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I have this day copied two letters from sister Creel, and will send them to you for publication, as I believe they would be read with interest by the readers of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, being from that far off and isolated country. Please publish them, and oblige all concerned.

I am as ever, your unworthy brother in hope of a better life,

WM. R. WELBORN.

HEALDTON, Chickasaw Nation, }
Ind. Ter., May 4, 1892. }

ELDER WM. R. WELBORN—DEAR BROTHER IN CHRIST:—My mind is impressed to write to you, and has been ever since I read your book, which was a great pleasure to me. How can you doubt with such evidence? We are strangers in the flesh, but I hope and trust we are brother and sister in the spiritual kingdom of Jesus. I believe our names are written in the Lamb's book of life, and that we were remembered in the covenant that God made with and for his chosen before the world began. Therefore we are eternally saved. O bless the Lord. I believe in election, the free grace of God, and the predestination of all things whatsoever come to pass, creative or otherwise. I believe God created all things for a purpose, and that they will fill the very purpose that he created them for. The God of heaven and all the earth created all things for himself; for he is the sovereign Ruler of all worlds, having all power in heaven and in earth. All the powers that be are ordained of him. Thanks be to his holy name, he so rules that nothing can hurt his children without his will.

Your book told my experience and travel of mind so well that I was made to greatly rejoice, and felt to praise God. It was alone my feeling of unworthiness that caused me to put off writing to you, and now I do not feel that I can write anything that will be any comfort to you. I believe God's children are bound together with the chains of the everlasting love of God. I want to tell you how long it was before I found the true church of Christ. I first joined the so-called Missionary Baptist Church, in the year 1875, on the seventh day of September. I thought it all the Baptist Church there was in the world. But when I got there I was walled up. I was called a Hard Shell. I did not know what they believed. I met brother Swinford in 1889. He was the first Primitive Baptist I ever talked with. O what comfort it was to me to hear him talk on the subject of the predestination of all things. He talked just what I believed. I tried to believe what the Missionaries believed, but could not. In the year 1890 I heard brother Gilbreath preach the gospel as it is in Christ Jesus, for the first time. O what glorious news it was to me. O how I wanted to praise the Lord. For several days I went on praising God; for it seemed to me that everything was praising him for his goodness to me. I felt like using the language of Ruth, "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God." To hear the gospel of our salvation preached, after we have lived in Babylon for fifteen years, and never got a crumb in all that time, only as it was given directly from our blessed Savior's hand, is a feast indeed. But I believe I found the church just at the appointed time of the Father. I now live close to brother and sister Swinford, and O what a comfort it is to me to be with them and talk with them of the goodness of God. We have a church of six members here, and all seem to be in full fellowship with each other. Brethren Gilbreath and Hudspath preach for us the unsearchable riches of Christ, and my soul is filled with joy when they preach. It seems to me I can see all the saints of God standing before the throne of God, praising him who has redeemed them, saved, cleansed and washed them in his own blood, and called them with an holy calling, not according to their works but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given them in Christ Jesus before the world began. Yes, brother Welborn, if I am saved with an everlasting salvation it is by free grace alone. If we were chosen in Christ Jesus before time, we will by and by bask in his eternal love beyond this vale of tears, and shall not want, but shall ever be happy; for he is our Savior, Priest and King. It seems to me at times that I can hardly hope, I get so low down in the valley, and the waves almost cover me, and I am made to cry out, "Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner." Then I feel so unworthy that when I meet my brethren and sisters I do not feel worthy to even kneel at their feet. I do wish I could hear you preach. If I were able I would send you money to come here. I have written this, I hope, in love. I would write more, but fear I will not comfort you by anything I have written or might write. I would like to read one letter from you privately, as I have read in the SIGNS. I am taking that paper, which I read every week, and would like to read more of your writings in it. Please, dear brother, pray for me, one who feels to be the least of all saints, if a saint at all. I hope to meet you and all the saints in the mansions of eternal bliss. May the saving grace of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ rest and dwell with you henceforth and forever. May you live long on the earth, and ever be ready and able to preach Christ and him crucified, that many of the saints may be comforted, is my prayer.

NANCY CREEL.

HEALDTON, Ind. Ter., Aug. 18, 1892.

ELDER WM. R. WELBORN—DEAR BROTHER IN THE LORD:—I have received your kind letter, which was a great comfort to me. It found me in the valley of doubts and fears, where I am most of the time; but your kind letter was such a feast to my soul of the good things of the kingdom that I was lifted up, and on eagle wings I did fly. "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name." What a joy, it was to me to think I was worthy to receive a letter from a child of God. When I wrote that letter to you I read it over and over before I sent it, and my mind was so impressed that I could not forbear sending it. Since I have received your reply, and learned what a round my letter had taken before reaching you, O how I was rejoiced to think the blessed Lord had so directed my feeble message to you. My education is very limited; but I do not believe a child of God has to have the education of this world, which man gives, in order to know the love of God; for God says that all his children shall be taught of him, and not of man. When we are taught of the Lord, he fills our hearts with the Canaan language, and gives our tongues utterance. Our mouths are filled with proper words to speak. When my mind goes back to my first experience, and I can realize how the blessed Lord did lead me along in paths I had not known, O how I rejoice, and say, How can I doubt any more? O what ups and downs I have. I find that when I would do good, evil is present with me. The things I would do, I do not; and the things I would not do, them I do. Yes, dear brother, I endure many persecutions on account of what I believe. But the Savior says, "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake." Again, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." Whosoever trusteth in the Lord shall live. The more I am persecuted the stronger is my belief in the doctrine of absolute predestination. Who can believe in the Savior without believing the predestination of all things? The first thing I ever believed was that God is the sovereign Ruler over all things. That was when I was in deep trouble about my soul's salvation; when I was without hope in the world, I had a little Testament, but O how I wanted a complete Bible; for all I read in the Testament condemned me. I wanted to read the whole Bible, to see if all condemned me. Many words were given me by my blessed Lord that I had never read.

"For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse." With this I began to look at the visible creation; and I said, Surely there is a God, who created all things, and that for himself. Then I said, He is a God of might, and surely he had a purpose in all things. Then great fear and trembling came upon me, and I could not see how God could be just and the justifier of such a wretch as I was. After I had joined the Missionaries I bought a Bible, and began to read it, and found, from the first word of Genesis to the last in Revelation, the predestination of God. When I saw how God could be just and save such a wretch as I was, then I could appreciate this doctrine. I saw that God alone must lead us in the way of true holiness, and in the path of judgment, and cause those he had made to love him to inherit substance. He has promised to fill their treasure. Yes, he fills our hearts with love. "For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name: I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me." I am the Lord, and there is none else, there is no God beside me." "I the Lord speak righteousness, I declare things that are right." "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance?" Again, he says, "As I have purposed, so shall it come to pass," &c. All the vessels of mercy are complete in Christ; for he is their Surety, and keeps them by his power; and when he shall have gathered them all home in glory, they will sing that new song, "Thou art worthy," &c. Yes, I believe with all my heart and strength that the God of heaven absolutely predestinated all things to come to pass that do come to pass. He fills immensity. If anything takes place contrary to his purpose, he is not absolutely God. I have believed this ever since the year 1833.

I will close by asking you to read my letter closely, and if it is not written in accordance with the Scriptures please tell me so; for if I know myself I want to know the truth as it is in Christ Jesus. If you think my letters worthy a place in our paper you may have them published. I never read a religious book or paper, aside from the Bible, until last year. I am taking the SIGNS OF THE TIMES this year. All the members of our little church take it, so far as I know. Please excuse my errors. Love to you and your little family. Remember me in your prayers. I feel to be the least of all. I am your humble sister in hope of eternal life,

NANCY CREEL.

HORACE, Texas, Aug. 26, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I have permission to send you the inclosed letter from our dear brother Chick, bearing on the subject of the spiritual birth, to be published in the SIGNS if you see proper. I think some of your readers would read it with interest, and perhaps with profit. The subject is a sublime one, and one, when rightly understood, abounding with pleasant and profitable meditation by those taught of God. When searching the Scriptures for the truth on this or any other subject we should never read with a mere view to carry a point or sustain a former position, nor to oppose the position of some one else. The birth is used as a figure of that work of the Holy Spirit which delivers from bondage, and manifests the subjects of God's electing love as such in this world. Sons and daughters of Adam's race are those predestinated unto the adoption of children, chosen in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world, elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, &c. Such were given spiritual life in Jesus Christ before the foundation of the world.—Eph. i. 3. They were all given natural life in the first Adam. The same character then is by natural relation a child of an earthly Adam, and by a natural birth is manifested as such; and by heavenly relationship is a child of God, and by a spiritual birth is manifested as such. The spiritual life given them in Christ Jesus, and manifested in them in time, is not the child, as some conclude, but is the life of the child. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief." "His name shall be called Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." Not the spirits or souls of his people, but "his people." Sinners are the subjects of sanctification by God the Father, preserved in Jesus Christ, and called by the Holy Spirit.

Yours in hope,

H. B. JONES.

REISTERSTOWN, Md., July 12, 1892.

ELDER H. B. JONES—MY DEAR BROTHER IN CHRIST:—Your last kind favor has been by me for some time. I enjoyed it when it came, and I have enjoyed reading it again to-day. So far as I can see, we do not differ in the least with regard to the subjects of which you wrote. It seems to me sometimes that besides spiritual life we need a little sanctified common sense in reading and interpreting the Scriptures. It is never right to isolate any given verse or sentence from the rest and dwell upon its especial language. It is not right to isolate even a chapter or a book from all the rest and conform ourselves to it. Most of those who have some theory to uphold do this; not purposely, I suppose, but yet they do it. I know of no case where this has been done more than when discussing the new birth or the warfare. One other thing we should guard against, viz., taking figurative expressions literally, or literal expressions figuratively. Many figurative expressions have, in discussing this theme of the new birth, been used as though they were literal. Moreover, it is hard to meet arguments based upon such a use of the Scriptures as amounts to a mere play upon words, or a perversion of them. I have always felt very suspicious of any theory that would seem even to deny salvation for sinners, of which the new birth is a part. The only being in all the universe that needs salvation is the sinner. It is the sinner that cannot see the kingdom except he be born again. The Lord said, "Except a man be born again." He did not say "the new man" nor "the old man," but simply "a man." This is the man that was made upright, but has sought out many inventions. By this new birth of God there is given to the man a new nature, which is of God; for we are "partakers of the divine nature." It is not this divine nature by itself that is born of God, or called a child of God; neither are we called children of God separate from this divine nature. But when we are made partakers of the divine nature we are said to be born again, or born from above; and we being now partakers of the divine nature, are called children of God. Not the sinner alone, nor the divine nature alone, is a child of God; but in the child of God we find both the sinner and the divine nature, and neither without the other is a child of God. In the one man dwell two opposing and enduring forces. Neither of them is the man himself, but they dwell in the man. The one the man is told to put off; the other the man is told to put on. One is called the new man, the spirit, the law in the mind; the other is called the old man, the flesh, the law in our members. We, men, redeemed sinners, are told to put on the one and to put off the other. These two powers strive within us, so that we cannot do the good that we would. Before we were born again, born of this divine nature, we had no warfare within, because we had but one controlling spirit. The old man, the flesh, reigned supreme without a rival, and his house and his goods were at peace; but now the Spirit of life in Christ, the new man, has come in, and at once in us is a warfare. But, thanks be to God, we shall finally be redeemed from the old man of sin, and the law of holiness shall at last reign in us a victor forever. The old man is not saved, but we shall be saved from the old man. The new man is not saved; but the new man reigns in the christian, and redeems him from the dominion of the old man. It is neither the old man nor the new man that is born again, but the man or woman in whom these two principles abide.

Thus I have tried to comply with your request to say a few things about the new birth. I have not covered the ground, but have tried to suggest a few leading thoughts as they have been presented to my mind for years past. If any of these things do not command your approval frankly say so, and I shall not quarrel with you. I hope all jars upon this matter may cease among all our brethren north and south ere long, that we may all see eye to eye, and walk together in peace.

I remain, as ever, your brother in a precious hope,

F. A. CHICK.

CENTER VILLAGE, Ohio.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I send you the inclosed letter for publication in the SIGNS, but submit the case, of course, to your better judgment. With much love to you and all that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

Yours to serve in the afflictions of the gospel,

L. B. HANOVER.

MARENGO, Ohio, Sept. 6, 1891.

ELDER L. B. HANOVER—DEAR SIR:—It seems I cannot refrain from writing to you this beautiful Sunday morning. Father and mother have gone to meeting. It is Elder Thomas' appointment, and I am left at home with a weeping heart. I never before went to any one with my trouble, but I feel if you were here this morning, I could tell you all the conversation you had with me when I last visited at your home. It has been with me night and day ever since. My heart was a heart of stone, cold, O! so cold that day that I could not say a word. It seemed so easy for you to talk, and it did my doubting soul good; for it seemed you were reading my very thoughts, and telling them better than I could. But if you could have seen my deceitful, wicked heart as I could see it myself, surely you could not have talked so. I cannot remember a time when I did not have a regard for sacred things, and desired to be better than I was. I would be troubled often, and I wondered if I were to die what would become of me. I would read the Bible, but could not understand it. Then I would think I was too young; that it was not intended for me to know it. I had great respect for people that belonged to the church, and thought they were good people; and it greatly troubled me because my father and mother did not belong to the church. I then desired to be a christian myself, and so went about to set my house in order. I went to meeting, read the Bible, practiced evening prayer, and tried to do just as near right as I knew how; but I did not succeed very well. When I went to meeting I heard the doctrine that salvation is of the Lord, and that he saved his people according to his own purpose and grace; that they were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world, &c. Also, if we loved the Lord we should obey the order and commands of his house; for he has said, "If ye love me, keep my commandments." How can any say they love him, and do not the things he commands? Poor, ignorant wretch that I was, I once more turned to the sacred word to know his commands. It was here that I learned I was condemned before the law; for "by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified." It is "not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us," &c. O wicked wretch, unclean, undone! I now saw and felt that in myself I could do nothing. I felt, and do feel to this day, if I am lost I can do nothing to merit God's salvation; but if I am saved, it must be through the mercy of an all-wise God. I try to drive these troublesome thoughts from me, but I cannot. It is a feeling, a spirit, that worketh in me, which I have no control over. Today I feel to be without hope or God in the world. O! dear Elder, what must I do?

"Like one alone I seem to be;
O! is there any one like me?"

This one thing I do know, there is a people that I love; but I am not worthy of their love or notice. My mind is with them, and I love to meet with them. When I think of the love I have for the brethren, I think of a visitation meeting I attended two years ago, at Rocky Fork Church. Elders Curry, McGlade, J. Smith and L. E. Thomas were all there. It seems strange that I have no remembrance of any of them preaching except Elder McGlade. It was on Sunday evening. He read the 88th Psalm, and I think he selected the first clause of the third verse, "My soul is full of troubles." When he got thus far he hesitated, saying the text expressed his feelings; that he was in darkness, did not feel like talking at all, and unless the Lord lifted the vail of darkness his attempt to speak would be in vain. By-and-by it seemed to me his prayer was answered. I believe the Lord was with him, he spoke with such power and feeling. Words came faster than he could speak them. Perhaps it was only in me, but such a sermon I never had heard. It pierced my very soul. It seemed that every word was for me. I do not think I ever had my feelings told so plainly. My heart was full, and I wept bitterly, for it seemed that he was reading my death sentence. How long he preached I know not, for when I next realized he and Elder Curry were singing that beautiful hymn, "A poor sinner like me," &c. This was the sweetest singing I ever had heard. It filled my poor soul with joy, and love for God and his people. I was carried above on the wings of his love, and the angels seemed to be singing his praises. It was a heaven below. My eyes were a fountain of tears, and my heart was filled with God's praises for saving a sinner like me. Surely it was not an earthly scene. Words fail to express what I then felt and realized. After the meeting Elder McGlade came to me and said that when I returned home he wanted me to go forward in the discharge of my duty and obey the Lord. O! dear Elder, what a feeling entered my heart. I was a stranger, and I wondered why he spoke to me thus. But, like the advice of many others, I could not, cannot accept it. I am too unworthy, too unfit. It would be acting the hypocrite for me to join any church, and so long as I feel this way I feel I cannot, although I love the brethren. I am interested in their welfare, and love to see them in peace and fellowship. I think they are Christ's true followers. I believe God has a people that he is able to save, whether they have ever joined the visible church or not. "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast." There is only one thing that can make me happy, and that is to entertain a hope that when through with the trials in this low ground of sorrow I will be at rest.

"Tis a point I long to know,
Oft it causes anxious thought,
Do I love the Lord or no?
Am I his, or am I not?"

O that these doubts might all remove, that I might feel his pardoning love. I know I am prone to ill. O may his power subdue my will. I feel reconciled to leave all with God. He is just. His will be done, not mine.

Elder Hanover, I beg your pardon for writing. I know not why I have written; but it seems that ever since your were here last June I have been impressed to write to you. I have now imparted to you something I never did to any one else; yet I have been talked to time and again. I have been speechless as it were. I shun them. Then when by myself I think I will tell them all next time. You seemed so sure that I was a fit subject for the church, and I felt you were deceived. I cannot rest until I have told you the truth. I know when you have read this you will acknowledge that you were wrong in your advice. I am sincere in this. O may I be brought in that strait and narrow way. I ask an interest in your prayers. I am your sincere friend,

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Inclosed you will find two dollars for that ever blessed medium of correspondence, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. You will please set up my date to the time it pays to. While it is true that times are hard, and money is hard to get, yet I do not want to be without the SIGNS. It comes to me laden with the rich blessings of our heavenly Father. I like the SIGNS better than any religious paper I ever saw. While the doctrine set forth therein has many enemies, yet we should thank God and take courage, knowing that our God has said, "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment, thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord; and their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord." May you, dear brethren, long be spared to wield the sword of the Lord and of Gideon. Excuse me for not remitting sooner. If you can find room in one corner of the SIGNS, you may publish this as a token to the brethren of my high appreciation of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. According to my experience and understanding of the word of God, it speaks the pure language of Canaan. Yours in hope,

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS:—I wish I did, but I do not, feel worthy to say dear brethren. I feel very much cast down. It seems to me that the great I Am, heaven and rest are very far away; yes, gone forever. I wish it were with me now as in the days of old, when the glorious light of Jesus was flowing in my soul. But alas! for me there seems to be no rest. Although I know I justly deserve such a state of mind, I am so rebellious and self-willed. I fear that I have missed the substance and caught at the shadow instead. If indeed I have been born again, and tasted of the heavenly gift, and the powers of the world to come, why am I thus? Why is my every thought and action wicked continually? For the last six months my inward cry has been, "Lord, restore unto me the joy of thy salvation?"

Well, I sat down to write for the renewal of my subscription; but I felt so depressed in spirit that I wanted to unburden myself to some of God's humble poor, who probably have passed through some such trials, and been at times shrouded in darkness as I have been, and am yet. I hope and feel that you will understand my case, and will pardon me for intruding on your time. I remain a halting, trembling sinner, MESSRS. EDITORS:—Please correct the error that I made in the notice of the death of Olive Palmatier, and published in the SIGNS of last week. At the funeral the speaker was Elder John Clark, instead of Elder Balas Bundy, as I gave it in the notice.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Maine Old School Baptist Conference, in session with the North Berwick Old School Baptist Church, in North Berwick, York Co., Maine, Sept. 2nd, 3rd and 4th, 1892, sends greeting to the associations and churches with whom we correspond.

DEAR BRETHREN:—When the Lord Jesus was about to leave his sorrowing disciples he said, "In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." And shall we be afraid of a world already conquered? The almighty Victor, within view of his crown, turns to his faint and weary soldiers and bids them take courage. They are not fighting their way through untried enemies. The God-man Mediator knows their sorrows. The way to heaven is consecrated by his foot-prints. Every thorn that wounds them has wounded him before. Every cross they can bear he has borne before. Every tear they shed he has shed before.

Brethren, are you ready to faint under your tribulations? Is it a seducing world, a wandering, wayward heart? Consider him that endured. Listen to your adorable Redeemer, stooping from his throne, and saying, "I have overcome the world." He came forth unscathed from its snares, with the same heavenly weapon he bids you wield. Three times did he repel the tempter, saying, "It is written." Is it some crushing trial or overwhelming grief? He is acquainted with grief. He, the mighty Vine, knows the minutest fibers of sorrow in the branches. When the pruning knife touches them it touches him. He has gone through every class in our wilderness school. He brings his people into untried and perplexing places, that they may seek out the guiding pillar and prize its radiance. He puts them on the darkening waves, that they may follow the guiding light hung out astern from the only bark of pure and unsullied humanity that was ever proof against the storm. Be assured there is disguised love in all he does. He who knows us infinitely better than we know ourselves, often puts a thorn in our nest, to drive us to the wing, that we may not be grovelers always. It is upon the smooth ice we slip. The rough path is the safest for the feet. The tearless and undimmed eye is not to be coveted here. That is reserved for heaven. Who can tell what muffled and disguised "needs be" there may lurk under these world tribulations? His true spiritual seed are often planted deep in the soil. They have to make their way through a load of sorrow, before they reach the surface; but their roots are thereby the firmer and deeper struck. He often leads his people still, as he led them of old, to a high mountain apart; but it is a high mountain, above the

THE LEGION CAST OUT.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR FRIENDS:—Will you kindly give me through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, or by private letter, a few general remarks on Mark v. 2-20, especially verses 2-7? I do not understand anything about the meaning of those tombs spoken of, and the character having his dwelling among the tombs. I ask this favor rather hesitatingly, as it is my first request of an editor or editors. Should you reply, please withhold my name. Very truly yours, * * *

R E P L Y .

"And when he was come out of the ship, immediately there met him out of the tombs a man with an unclean spirit, who had his dwelling among the tombs; and no man could bind him, no, not with chains; because that he had been often bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been plucked asunder by him, and the fetters broken in pieces; neither could any man tame him. And always, night and day, he was in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones. But when he saw Jesus afar off, he ran and worshiped him, and cried with a loud voice, and said, What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God? I adjure thee by God, that thou torment me not."—Mark v. 2-7.

Our friend is assured that the delay in responding to his request has not been designed by us; but so numerous are the accumulated inquiries submitted by our correspondents, it is impossible for us to be as prompt in answering them as would be desirable. In addition to this impossibility of compliance with every request for our views, a more serious obstacle arises from the very limited understanding of the things of the kingdom which has been given to us. Our friend will therefore receive our remarks only as expressing such light as we have, and carefully compare them with the infallible standard of revealed truth as recorded by the pen of inspiration. Only that which bears the seal of divine authority is worthy of acceptance.

It is needless to assert the divine character of this Jesus, whom even the legion of devils recognized as having unlimited control over them. The whole testimony of the sacred Scriptures bears witness of him as being the embodiment of the invisible God. In the dawn of recorded revelation he is presented as the omnipotent Word by which all created things were called into being. There is no case mentioned in which he was disappointed in affecting his purpose. Even when "Being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross," his authority was never questioned by the elements of nature; neither dared all the powers of darkness delay obedience to his will. The immediately preceding context records his silencing the tempest by the majesty of his voice. It is humiliating to the pride of man that he is less able to comprehend the character of his Creator than are the inanimate winds and waters, and that he is more stubbornly rebellious than the devils of the bottomless pit. There is no case on record where a devil hesitated to obey the commandment of our Lord. Sinful man alone exalts himself in his vain imagination above all that is called God.

In the miraculous manifestation of his sovereignty by our Lord on which our friend desires our views, there was certainly no room to question the appointment of God that every incident must be exactly as it came to pass. It was not merely to excite the wonder of those who witnessed this incident that Jesus came over the sea into the country of the Gadarenes. As when he needs must go through Samaria, on another occasion, he would exhibit his care for his afflicted and poor people by going to meet this chosen vessel of his grace. The fact that he had his dwelling among the tombs rendered him a very striking representative of all the subjects of redeeming grace. In no other place has Jesus found any of his people. While the statement given is doubtless a literal account of what was done on the occasion, yet there is deep significance in the circumstances as left on record for our learning. Every conscious sinner has his dwelling "among the tombs" until he is blessed with the manifestation of Jesus as his deliverer. He finds no vessel of his mercy in any other place but where he found Jacob, "in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness." This is not only the condition of enmity and death where all men are by their natural relation to a sinning Adam, but when quickened by the light of eternal life shining in their heart they are always found wandering in a vain search through the wilderness of legal bondage, seeking rest in works of obedience to be rendered by themselves, from which they hope to attain to righteousness in the sight of God. In this hopeless state of utter ruin, what is said of the man in our text is well suited to describe all who look to the law for justification. They dwell among the tombs, since "As many as are of the works of the law are under the curse; for it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them." This curse is death, and tombs are the dwellings appointed for the dead. Neither can any fetters restrain the madness of such as are roving among these tombs, seeking life among the dead. It is not written how long this man had been afflicted with the unclean spirit; but it is evident that he had been subjected to the efforts of incompetent physicians, who had vainly tried to tame him. All their chains and fetters had been useless. "And always, night and day, he was in the mountains, and in the tombs, crying, and cutting himself with stones." To the natural mind this is only an account of the ravings of a maniac. But when the light of the Spirit of truth shines in the heart of a sinner, he reads his own experience in every specification. His dwelling is with the dead; no chains can bind him; the strongest resolutions which can be formed are powerless to restrain the madness of sin by which he is controlled; always, night and day, he is crying, and cutting himself with the stony demands of that law by which is the knowledge of sin. There is no voice but the omnipotent word of the Lord which can deliver the raving madman from the bondage of delusion under which he seeks for justification by the works of the law. Even after they have been delivered from this cruel servitude of legal works, the saints are often deceived by their carnal mind so that they look to that house of the dead for evidences of the life of Christ dwelling in them. The law cannot give one word of consolation to the sinner who resorts to it. By the law is the knowledge of sin; and as many as are of the works of the law are subjects of condemnation.

When the conscious sinner sees Jesus afar off, he has no understanding of his gracious character, although he does indeed worship him in the confession of his holiness and purity. Having no knowledge of God except that which is revealed in his holy law, he can conceive of no other purpose for which the divine perfection can be manifested in Jesus but to visit upon him the terrible vengeance of that justice which consigns him to death. It is worthy of the consideration of every troubled sinner that there is no such thing as worshiping Jesus without confessing his divinity. "Wherefore I give you to understand, that no man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed; and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost."—1 Cor. xii. 3. Without the personal experience of this revelation of the Spirit it is impossible that any sinner should have a knowledge of the glorious perfection which is in Jesus as the Savior of his people from their sins. Ignorance of this essential truth is the darkness which forbids the idolatrous worshippers of the world ever to attain to the knowledge of God, which is life eternal. Since God has purposely hid this vital secret from the wise and prudent, every humanly devised system of religion is exposed when brought to this test. Even to common reason this exhibits the falsehood of those doctrines and commandments of men which represent that God has done all in his power to save every sinner, and now anxiously solicits the consent of those sinners that he may bring them into his glorious presence. Certainly

Jesus is not the Lord if he has less power than those sinners whom he has tried to save. Hence, it is manifest that those who teach such things do not say that Jesus is the Lord. But when the first view of Jesus is given to the sinner, his holiness is seen, and he is indeed a great way from the polluted one who feels his vileness. He sees Jesus as the embodiment of holiness, while he knows himself as a justly condemned sinner. In this sight of Jesus he "afar off," yet he is recognized as worthy of divine worship; and the quickened sinner at once confesses his infinite superiority by worshiping him. This does not consist in mere forms and words which have been learned from religious teachers. The only true worship is that which is rendered in spirit and in truth as it is wrought in the subject of salvation by the power of God. None ever have that view of Jesus as the Lord without feeling themselves guilty and vile in his sight. When this revelation was shown to Isaiah he immediately said, "Woe is me! for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell among a people of unclean lips; for mine eyes have seen the king, the Lord of hosts."—Isa. vi. 5. Under the same experience of the perfection of the Lord Job exclaims, "Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer thee? I will lay mine hand upon my mouth. Once have I spoken, yea, twice; but I will proceed no further." Such confession of sin, and ascription of all power and perfection to the Lord, constitute the worship of God which is in spirit and in truth. It can be rendered only by those who have seen an end of all perfection in themselves, all their righteousnesses being exposed as filthy rags in the light of divine holiness. Instead of claiming worthiness to approach the holy God, they feel that there can be nothing but condemnation awarded them by the decree of infinite justice. Therefore the revelation of the divine presence is a source of terror to them. The most they can dare to ask of the righteous Judge is that they may not be visited with immediate torment. To every subject of redeeming grace it is a wonderful mystery how God can be just, and yet be merciful to the unrighteousness of such a guilty rebel as he is made to see himself. It is not upon the ground of his own righteousness that such a sinner can hope for acceptance in the sight of God. Only when Jesus comes where the condemned sinner is, and is revealed as being made sin for him, can the fullness of joy be afforded by his presence. Then being delivered from the power of the unclean spirit, and clothed in the perfect robe of that righteousness of Christ which exceeds the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, the justified sinner feels the glorious liberty of the sons of God. No sinner ever was moved by his carnal mind to desire conformity to the holiness of God.

Wherever that desire exists it is certain that the Spirit of Christ dwells in the sinner by whom it is felt. Surely there can be no such pure emotion produced by the enmity of the carnal mind. That corrupt fountain cannot send forth the pure stream of such hunger and thirst after righteousness. Carnal selfishness would take occasion to continue in sin if it could be assured that salvation is not dependent upon the works of the sinner. This manifests that sin is the element of such as still take pleasure in it. Those who have been made free from its dominion by the grace of God, while they feel the motions of sin working in them, yet long for deliverance from its oppression. This clearly marks the difference between them and all those who are still in the state of death in sin, which is the condition of all who have not the Spirit of Christ. Only by the grace of God can any sinner be made to hate his own life because of the sin by which it is defiled. While the selfishness of nature may desire to escape the punishment due to sin, and to enjoy the bliss of eternal happiness, nothing but the love of God can produce the desire for freedom from sin in the present experience of the sinner who feels it is as a hated burden. There is no more sure evidence that one of the children of Adam is born from above, than the fact that he cannot live, as he earnestly desires to do, free from the dominion of sin. The devils which afflicted this dweller among the tombs had no desire to dwell in the presence of Jesus; but while they recognized his power and confessed their subjection to his will, they chose their abode in the great heard of unclean swine. It is not explained by what authority the swine were kept in that country, since the Jews were prohibited from eating swine's flesh, and they were the symbol of abomination under the ceremonial law; but it is an exhibition of the universal dominion of God, that even the evil spirits and the unclean swine were made subservient to the display of the power of that grace which was in Christ Jesus. The devils could do no more than express their terror at the coming of the Son of the most high God; and the swine must be at hand for them to beg the liberty to destroy. But it is clear that the glorious purpose of the Lord was the deliverance of the man from the power of those devils, and that this gracious purpose was accomplished.

In the case of this subject of divine mercy and grace there is an example of the manner of the gathering of all the saints by the power of our Redeemer. Instead of making an effort to draw near to God, as is directed by all systems of will-worship, so long as he was controlled by the legion this sufferer's only wish was to escape from the presence of that holy God. His dwelling among the tombs was preferable to the consciousness of that divine holiness which shines in the face of Jesus Christ. Therefore under that evil control he besought the Lord that he would not torment him. It should be observed that the very same presence of the Lord which is the heaven of his reconciled saints, is the most intolerable torment of all his enemies, whether men or devils. By nature all men hate the light of the presence of God. Therefore it is unmistakable evidence of the possession of the Spirit of Christ when any man can rejoice in that presence, and mourn the hiding of his face. It is recorded of this man that after he was released from the power of the legion he prayed Jesus that he might be with him. Nothing more desirable than this can be conceived of by the ransomed sinner who has been delivered from his sins by the grace of God. By this mark is identified every subject of redemption. None who are yet under the control of natural enmity against God can ever have the desire to be with Jesus. Neither chains of law nor fetters of good resolutions can bind the natural mind so that its enmity against God shall be restrained. All such fetters are broken in pieces, and such chains are plucked asunder. He madly persists in dwelling among the tombs where the dead are his companions.

There is bitter irony in the record of the prayer of the fellow-countrymen of this man when he had been delivered by the power of Jesus. Instead of rejoicing that such a sufferer was healed, they seemed to have thought of nothing but the loss of those swine. "And they began to pray him to depart out of their coasts." So much more value has the vile swine, in the estimation of reason, than the afflicted and poor sinner whom Jesus had delivered from the bondage of the legion. Doubtless the keeping of swine was a source of profit to those who were so anxious for Jesus to depart out of their coasts. There was no money in the deliverance of the oppressed man; but the swine might have been sold to the Gentiles for large profit. Can it be that this is written for application to anybody in after ages? Is there a possibility that such covetousness should ever rule in the mind of any subject of divine grace, that his own gain of worldly treasures or honors should be a higher consideration with him than the declaration of the glory of God in the salvation of a sinner from his sins? May there be some of the chosen vessels of salvation who say by their conduct that they would have preferred that those swine should have been saved for market, rather than that the legion should have been cast out of the man? Of course, when presented in this form, there can be but one answer to these questions. But if the love of God rules in the heart of one who hopes in the grace of God for salvation, is it consistent that he should allow his natural reason to interpose objections to his rendering implicit and immediate obedience to the commandment of his Lord by following him? Every compliance with the suggestions of the natural mind is a practical indorsement of the prayer of those swine-raisers mentioned in the subject under consideration. We sincerely trust that our inquiring friend is not condemning himself by such an unwise course of consultation with his fleshly mind.

world. And better still, he who himself hath overcome the world leadeth them there, and speaketh unto them these comforting words, "Fear not, little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." The music of the Shepherd's voice again, and how tender. A little flock, but a beloved flock, and soon to be a glorified flock, safe in the fold, secure within the kingdom. That kingdom is the believer's by an irreversible and inalienable charter-right. "I appoint unto you," says Jesus, "a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me." It is as sure as everlasting love and almighty power can make it. Satan, the great foe of the kingdom, must first pluck the crown from the brow upon the throne, before he can weaken or impair this sure word of promise. If it pleased the Lord to bruise the shepherd, it will surely please him to make happy the purchased flock. If he smote his fellow when the sheep were scattered, surely it will rejoice him for the shepherd's sake to turn his hand upon the little ones. Brethren, think of this. "It is your Father's good pleasure." Let the melody of the Shepherd's reed fall gently on your ear. "It is your Father's good pleasure." He has given you the best proof that it is his. In order to purchase that kingdom he died for you. "As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered, so [says God] will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day." "Fear not [then]; little flock," though yours for awhile should be the bleak mountain and sterile waste, seeking your way Zionward. It may be with torn fleeces and bleeding feet. "It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish." "He is faithful that promised." "The Lord will give grace and glory."

Dear brethren, well may we exclaim, O happy day when this toilsome warfare will all be ended, Jordan crossed, Canaan entered, the legion of enemies of the wilderness no longer dreaded, sorrow, sighing, death, and worse of all, sin, no more, either to be felt or feared. Here is the terminating link in the golden chain of the everlasting covenant. It began with grace, it ends with glory. It began with sovereign grace in a by-past eternity, and no link will be wanting till the ransomed spirit be presented before the throne.

"Now to the God of victory
Immortal thanks be paid,
Who makes us conquerors when we die,
Through Christ, our living Head."

Dear brethren, since sending your our last epistle of love and fellowship our beloved pastor, Elder Wm. Quint, who has labored with us faithfully for more than forty-two years, has been removed from us by the hand of death; but while we mourn our loss, and feel sad and lonely, we rejoice that in his last hours the grave was divested of all its terrors, and he longed to go away and be at rest. His last enemy is now conquered, his last tear shed, his last sigh of sorrow, pain and suffering is now over, and in peaceful and unclouded bliss he has been enabled to sing, "O death, where, is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Welcome, vanquished foe. To die is gain. And while we are as sheep without a shepherd, our trust is in God. He makes no mistakes. The righteous Judge of all the earth doth justly. O for a faith amid frowning providences to say, "I know that thy judgments are right," and relying in the dark to exclaim, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." O the blessedness of thus lying passive in the hands of God, and saying, Undertake thou for me; dwelling with holy gratitude on past mercies and interpositions; taking these as pledges of future faithfulness and love; hearing a voice behind us, amid life's manifold perplexities, exclaiming, "This is the way; walk ye in it." Though there has been much to create sadness in our meeting, yet we have been favored with peace and comfort, and some have been helped to rejoice in the Lord. The preaching has been of Christ and him crucified, the ever blessed and only Savior of sinners. Many have felt that it was good to meet in Jesus' name.

Our next meeting is appointed to be held at North Berwick, Maine, to begin on Friday before the first Monday in September, 1893. We hope many of you will come and see us then.

The Roxbury Old School or Primitive Baptist Association, in session with the First Roxbury Church, Delaware Co., N. Y., Sept. 7th and 8th, 1892, to the several churches in our fellowship, sends christian salutation.

DEARLY BELOVED BROTHERS:—Through the goodness of a covenant-keeping God we have been preserved through another year, and now are permitted to meet together in an associate capacity, to hear from each other, and talk of our spiritual travel in this world of sin and sorrow. We will present a few thoughts, the Lord willing, on the subject of redemption, based on the words recorded in 1 Peter i. 18, 19. "Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot."

This language was addressed to certain characters that were scattered abroad, who were of like precious faith, called "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." This language will apply to the same characters to-day, as well as to those who were addressed at that time. That which the apostle says "ye know," cannot be taught in the schools of men. It must be taught by the one Teacher, who teaches as never man taught. This teaching begins by imparting to them the knowledge that they are sinners by nature, without God and without hope in the world, and that without the saving grace and mercy of God extended to them they must be forever lost. When it pleases the Lord to reveal unto us Jesus as the way, the truth and the life, we then begin to have some knowledge of the way of life and salvation through the crucified and risen Savior; for him hath God exalted with his right hand, a Prince and Savior, to give repentance unto Israel and the forgiveness of sins. The prophet Isaiah calls them sheep, saying, "All we [all the elect] like sheep have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." The Savior also says, "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold [Jewish fold]; them also I must bring [Jews and Gentiles], and they shall hear my voice; and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd." We find that Christ being the elect of God, these sheep were chosen in him before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love. As there could be no redemption without the shedding of blood, and as the sacrifices and offerings under the law could not make the comers there to perfect, Jesus says, "Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me, to do thy will, O God." This brings to view the precious doctrine of election, predestination, and the purpose of God in the salvation of his people; for all things written in the law and the prophets concerning Jesus must be fulfilled. It is written, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given," &c. In the fullness of time he is manifested in the world, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law. "Unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord." Let us follow him from his birth to his baptism by his servant John. From there let us go with him to the mount of Olives, when the time drew near for him to lay down his life. "Being in an agony, he prayed more earnestly; and his sweat was, as it were, great drops of blood falling to the ground." Was all this for the sins of his people?

"'Twas you, my sins, my cruel sins,
His chief tormenters were."

The apostle says, "He was made sin for us, who knew no sin." Thus we find that he laid down his life for the sins and transgression of his people; and on the cross he cried, "It is finished," yielded up his spirit, and came under the power of death. It was here he poured out his precious blood, showing that the redemption of his people was sealed with his own blood; so we can truly say, There is salvation in no other name but that of Jesus. But then were his disciples sad. He was laid in the tomb. But on the third, the appointed morning the news was heralded abroad that he was risen. "He is risen; he is not here. Behold the place where they laid him." All those to-day who are led by the Spirit of God, and made to believe in the finished work of the Redeemer, when met together to worship God in spirit and in truth, and feel the love of God shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, find it a pleasant meeting. In conclusion we will say, May brotherly love continue with us as an association, in the future as in the past.

WILLIAM BALLARD, Clerk.

The Licking Association of Particular Baptists, now in session with the church at Little Flock, Anderson Co., Ky., to the churches of which she is composed, sendeth love in the Lord.

DEAR BRETHREN:—In addressing to you this our annual letter we feel that our desire is not simply to comply with a custom, but we hope we are actuated by a fervent love to God and one another, and a prayerful desire for the peace and welfare of the Zion of our God. With that object in view, we only would write those things that make for peace, and those things wherewith one may edify another. None but the living in Jerusalem can be benefited by such things, for none others are able to comprehend them, and they must have them applied by the Spirit of God; for it is declared that "the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God."—1 Cor. ii. 11. Hence we must conclude that the children of God can know nothing except those things that have been revealed to them by that Spirit that takes of the things of God and shows them unto them. We understand that those children are the redeemed sons and daughters of Adam, who have been redeemed out of every nation, kindred, tongue and people, and are made kings and priests unto God, by the power of that Spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead; who have been born again, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God. They are those who are by nature children of wrath, even as others, but who have been quickened together with Christ, and made to sit together in heavenly places. They are those of whom the Master spoke when he declared that he had been given power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father had given him; that this is life eternal, that they might know God, and Jesus Christ whom he had sent. It is this life given to a poor lost sinner that makes known to him his true condition as such; that convinces of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, and prepares him to hear and receive the sweet message of Jesus when he speaks to his troubled soul, saying, "Thy sins, though many, are all forgiven thee." These children have peculiar characteristics. They are sinners, who in their standing in the earthly Adam are under the curse of the holy law of God, devoid of any ability to extricate themselves; are without hope, and without God in the world; but who, because of the love wherewith they were loved of God, even when dead in sins, have been redeemed by the precious blood of Jesus; and, having been redeemed, are made acquainted with their lost condition, by the revelation of God, in that he has shined in their hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ; who have by the same power been enabled to hope in his mercy, through the precious blood of Jesus; as it is written, "Because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father."—Gal. iv. 6. They are now convinced of two things; first, their condition as poor, helpless sinners, and of the power and efficacy of the finished work of God in the salvation of his chosen people. They still have a carnal mind, which is enmity to God, and which oftentimes leads them in by and forbidden paths. But they (these same ones) have also the mind of Christ within them. Hence the warfare; the flesh lusting against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh, so that they cannot do the things they would. This truth is attested by the daily experience of every subject of grace. This knowledge comes by revelation; and just here we will say, that so long as the dear children of God are content to rest on and trust alone in what their heavenly Father has been pleased to reveal in them, there will be no room for strife or contention. He fashioneth their hearts alike, and teacheth them the same truth. God's ways are ways of peace. All his paths are paths of peace. But the many admonitions in the Scriptures of divine truth, and our own experience, teach us how prone to go astray are the saints of God in their pilgrimage here below. Now, dear brethren, what was written aforetime was written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope, and we do well to take earnest heed to them. Being called out of darkness, and translated into the light and liberty of the sons of God, we are commanded to walk as children of God; to so let our light shine, that others seeing our good works may glorify our Father in heaven. The blessed Master has said, "Ye are my disciples indeed if you do whatsoever I command you." Having loved you with an everlasting love, redeemed you by his blood, called you by his grace, enabled you to hope in his mercy, he is your King, your Judge, your Lawgiver, and commands you to follow him; that you walk worthy of the vocation wherewith you are called; that you adorn the doctrine of God your Savior by a pious walk and godly conversation; that you love God supremely, and each other sincerely. O what a debt of love and gratitude we owe our dear Redeemer, and how willing we should feel to obey his every command. His commandments are not grievous, but joyous. He has said, "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love." The apostle declares, "Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." While he speaks so tenderly to his obedient children, in sweet assurances of love and care in all their pathway, in joy, in sorrow, in trials and temptations, knowing their weakness, he also admonishes them, and tells them of the painful fruits of disobedience, saying, "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live."—Rom. viii. 13. How often in our experience has this truth been brought home to us; living after the flesh, following the dictates of the carnal mind, the traditions of men; some saying they are of Paul, some of Apollos, some of Cephas, and some of Christ; bringing upon ourselves darkness, gloom, and sore chastenings. Have we hatred toward our brother? Are our hearts filled with envy and malice toward any of God's people? Is there a spirit of strife or contention within you? Then you are living after the flesh, and must die; for your God is as faithful in visiting you with his chastening rod in disobedience, as in fulfilling his promises of peace and joy to those that walk uprightly. The children of God need not be deceived as to the spirit that moves them. The fruit of the Spirit being love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, patience, &c.; while the fruits of the flesh are hatred, malice, strife and everything that tends to confusion. Try the spirits, whether they be of God. How full the joy we feel when our churches are all in peace, walking in love and fellowship, keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and letting brotherly love continue.

"When each can feel a brother's sigh,
And with him bear a part;
When sorrow flows from eye to eye,
And joy from heart to heart."

Love is the golden chain that binds our hearts in christian fellowship; for we are assured that love is of God, and they that love are born of God. May we ever be found thus walking, is our prayer for Jesus' sake.

The Pocatolico Primitive Baptist Association, in session with the Hope-well Church, to the several churches of which she is composed, being of like precious faith.

DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD JESUS:—Inasmuch as you will expect a Circular Letter to accompany your Minutes, for the edifying of the saints of God, we are constrained to pen a few thoughts, and sincerely hope and trust we may be led by his unerring Spirit while we attempt to speak of his goodness and mercy. We know of no subject or portion of God's holy word that could be more edifying to the dear saints of God than the language of our dear Lord and Savior to his apostles, just preceding his crucifixion, which may be found in John xv. 9, and reads thus, "As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: continue ye in my love." He then told them, "If ye keep my commandments ye shall abide in my love, even as I have kept my Father's commandments and abide in his love." Our Savior tells us, "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me."—John xiv. 21. This language of our Savior most beautifully and strikingly harmonizes with the following Scripture, "For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth."—Rom. x. 4. We are told that God is love; and as the Son and the Father are one, and love is the fulfilling of the law, we are compelled to conclude that "By grace ye are saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God."—Eph. ii. 5. Again, "Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ."—John i. 17. Then, dear brethren, where are our works? We are prone to wander into sin, and then we drift into doubts and fears, and grope in darkness; and when we look for comfort and light it can nowhere be found, except in the life-giving power of our dear Redeemer. When that still small voice breaks forth with love and mercy in the burdened soul, it causes the clouds of mist and gloom to pass away, and we are made to exclaim, as did Jonah, "Salvation is of the Lord." Now, brethren, God worketh in you to will and to do of his own good pleasure. Let us see what the fruit of the Spirit is, which is manifested for our comfort and welfare. "Love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." And this is all the fruit we need; for "against such there is no law."—Gal. v. 22, 23. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God."

No wonder Solomon said, "I am sick of love." We cannot better describe the striking fullness of God's love than by quoting the language of David, "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul. The testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple. The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart. The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes. The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring forever. The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb. Moreover by them is thy servant warned, and in keeping of them there is great reward." What a fullness is here discovered in the love of God. What wonderful beauty there is in its consolation. We are informed that it is strong as death.—Song viii. 6. It passes the love of women. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." We are made to realize God's love shed abroad in our hearts, and are made to love one another. We are made to trust in our dear Redeemer through that faith that works by love.

Now, dear brethren, the quotations we have made are for your consideration. Let us take heed to the admonitions of the apostles. "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." "And let us consider one another, to provoke unto love and to good works. Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another; and so much the more as ye see the day approaching."

Brethren, one of our chief delights on earth is found when the brethren and sisters meet together, and set together in heavenly places, and talk of the goodness of God. By this our love to our dear Lord is made manifest, and that we love one another, and continue in his love. The candle that is lit and put under a bushel does not shed forth much light. Jesus says, "If the light that is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness."

Now unto the King eternal, the all-wise God, be glory and honor forever. Amen.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Roxbury Old School or Primitive Baptist Association, in session with the First Old School Baptist Church of Roxbury, Delaware Co., N. Y., Sept. 7th and 8th, 1892, to the associations and corresponding meetings with which we correspond, sends christian salutation.

BELOVED BRETHREN:—Another year has passed away, and we are still receiving manifold mercies at the hand of our covenant-keeping

God. We are reminded again of our duty and privilege to thus address you, to reciprocate in some measure in this epistle for your messages and messengers, which have come to us laden with love in the Lord. We greet one another as the called in one hope of our calling, being, as we trust, all of the one body, or branches of the true Vine, having no other motive in view than to glorify God in our bodies and spirits which are his. The present occasion brings us under great obligations to the Father of lights, from whom descends every good and perfect gift. The several churches which compose this association are well represented; and though there has been no great ingathering, they are strong in the Lord, and blessed with that peace which the world cannot give. Our meeting has been harmonious, and the communication and preaching edifying; and seeing it is so with us, we desire a continuance of your correspondence and of your messengers when we again meet, which, if the Lord so wills, will be with the Andes Church, Union Grove, Delaware Co., N. Y., on the first Wednesday and Thursday in September, 1893, commencing at ten o'clock a. m.

BELOVED BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—Again we have enjoyed the privilege of meeting in the capacity of an association. We have listened to the joyful proclamation of the gospel as presented by the apostles and prophets, salvation by grace, by able ministers of our faith and order. Each has spoken with power, to the comfort of those that have eyes to see and ears to hear. We desire a continuance of your correspondence and fellowship.

The next session of our association is appointed to be held with Mt. Gilead Church, to begin on Friday before the second Saturday in September, 1893, when and where we hope to meet and greet your messengers in the fellowship of the Spirit.

It frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. Or if the paper is being sent in her name and the renewal is sent in her husband's name the same thing is likely to occur. Please be very careful to give the same name in which the paper is already coming, also the post office address at which it is received.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Mrs. Ellie E. McCarver, wife of Moore McCarver, was born Sept. 28th, 1867, and died Feb. 12th, 1892.

She was a kind and loving wife, an affectionate mother, and a kind and obedient daughter. Those who knew her best loved her most. She never made a public profession, but I believe from what she said to me the last time she was at home that she was a child of grace. She leaves a kind husband, and a little girl three years old. Her little babe, Nathaniel M., aged one year, died thirty-eight hours after his mother. They were buried in the same grave. This is the second time that I have been called upon to give up two at a time. I have had to give up two husbands, four children and one little grandchild. I sometimes find myself murmuring that I have more trouble than any one else, but I know that is wrong; for what God wills is best, and I try to be resigned to his will.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

POETRY.

CENTENNIAL HYMN.

The following verses were sung at the one hundredth anniversary of the opening of the Brookfield meeting-house, Orange Co., N. Y., Sept. 1st, 1892.

AIR—"Bonny Doon."

ALONE upon the hill it stands,
Where it was reared so long ago
By pioneers who tilled the lands,
Those sons of toil of ninety-two.
Though winds have blown these many years,
And storms have beat and shook its frame,
The old house stands with towering spire,
A monument of olden time.
The people came from miles around
To worship in this ancient place,
Where Lathrop did the word expound,
Inspired by faith in sovereign grace.
And here bold Caton did proclaim God's everlasting truth and love;
The wonder "Sweet," Ball sang the same,
And Conklin bade them look above.
This old-time meeting-house and grounds
Could they but speak might volumes tell;
Those time-stained walls did oft resound
With songs of praise or funeral knell.
But they who sang or mourned their dead
In days gone by are heard no more;
While others worship in their stead,
From time to time as they of yore.
Though many years have come and gone,
That pulpit stands with Bible crowned;
The flight of time keeps rolling on—
Those by-gone days will ne'er return.
Blow, blow ye winds, bend low, ye trees,
Ye poplars tall of Lombardy;
Bear the sweet vesper on the breeze,
Praise God, the all-wise Deity.

C. D. W.

GOD WILL TAKE CARE OF YOU.

God will take care of you, be not afraid;
He's your Protector through sunshine and shade.
Tenderly watching and keeping his own,
He will not leave you to wander alone.
God will take care of you through all the day,
Guiding your footsteps, leading the way;
He is your Shepherd, the only true Guide, Leading his children where still waters glide.
God will take care of you, long as you live,
Granting you blessings no other can give.
O what a mercy to have such a Friend,
And all eternity with him to spend!

HUMILITY.

THE bird that soars on brightest wing
Builds on the ground her lowly nest;
And she that doth most sweetly sing
Sings in the shade when all things rest
In lark and nightingale we see
What honor hath Humility.
When Mary chose the better part
She meekly sat at Jesus' feet;
And Lydia's godly-open'd heart
Was made for God's own temple meet.
Fairest and best adorn'd is she Whose clothing is Humility.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MACOMB, Ill., June 1, 1892.

ELDER S. H. DURAND—DEAR BROTHER IN CHRIST:—If you have light, please write through the SIGNS on Luke xi. 24-26, and oblige me and others.

I. N. VANMETER.

DEAR BROTHER VANMETER:—For many years I have answered such requests as yours only by private letter, except in a few instances where the impression of the subject remained with me. I have the subject you have suggested upon my mind now, and will occupy the little leisure I now have in trying to express my thoughts upon it; but I feel that it would be much more suitable for you to write about it to me.

The text reads, "When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he walketh through dry places, seeking rest; and finding none, he saith, I will return unto my house whence I came out. And when he cometh, he findeth it swept and garnished. Then goeth he, and taketh to him seven other spirits more wicked than himself; and they enter in, and dwell there: and the last state of that man is worse than the first."

The Savior had just manifested his gracious power by casting out a devil. Some of them who stood by expressed the malignant enmity of the carnal mind against the doctrine of God's sovereign power unto salvation by saying, "He casteth out devils through Beelzebub the chief of the devils." Jesus clearly showed the impossibility of this, and then said, "When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace: but when a stronger than he shall come upon him, and overcome him, he taketh from him all his armor wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils. He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me scattereth." Here he has clearly presented himself as the Stronger, as having "power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as the Father hath given him."—John xvii. 2. By this parable he has shown also the subjection of the flesh to the Spirit. The strong man is bound.—Matt. xii. 29. He is not cast out. He is the same strong man, just as vile in his nature, just as little to be trusted as before; but he is bound, and his goods are spoiled, so that he cannot do the evil that he would like to do. The kingdom of God is now within that house; the reigning power of his grace is felt there. The subject of this wonderful work, the poor sinner, who has felt the terrible and blighting power of the strong man, and who now feels at times the sweet, gracious, subduing power of the Stronger, is sometimes made to rest and rejoice in this controlling power of the dear Savior; but again is in great perplexity, tossed between hope and fear, apprehensive lest, if the strong man ever has been bound, he will get loose again and destroy all hopes of final deliverance.

The parable which immediately follows appears to contrast natural religion, the voluntary work of the creature, with the sovereign power of grace, as taught in the absolute control of the Stronger over the strong man, so that the poor, helpless sinner may clearly see which is his experience. Here the unclean spirit voluntarily goes out of a man. There has been no battle, no victory, no defeat, no casting out. The man has decided to reform. There is a turning from this or that openly wicked course of conduct. Some more powerful motive has caused fleshly lusts and appetites, or intellectual enjoyments, to lose their control over him. He has been made to fear punishment for his crimes, or has had his selfish desires awakened for the imaginary pleasures of an imaginary heaven, which he is made to believe will be given as a reward for what he may do that is good, and refrain from doing that which is evil; or he may have such a strong desire for the admiration of people who highly esteem religion that all that is necessary to win that admiration becomes a pleasure to him.

The unclean spirit finds no rest outside of a man. It is only as manifested in the mortal flesh of the people of God that the Spirit of Christ can be known in this world, with all his glorious power and goodness and love; and the spirit of evil, the unclean spirit, can only be seen or known as it works its wicked will through men. There is its only place of rest, of gratifying its hellish propensities. This appears to be taught in the peculiar expression, "He walketh through dry places, seeking rest." Outside of this chosen field of the devil, the heart of man, which "is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked," he finds only dry places, no place to cultivate and sow with seeds of evil, no field in which to display his wicked nature.

The going out of this unclean spirit appears also to show his depth of wicked wiles in withdrawing for a season from a certain line of temptations, in order to display greater evil in some other direction, and by strong delusions lead the deceived wretch still farther away from the kingdom of heaven, and make him sevenfold more the child of hell than before.

When the unclean spirit returns to the house from which he went out he finds it empty, "swept and garnished." Sometimes it seems difficult to decide concerning one who makes a profession as to whether he has had an experience of grace or not. Certainly, we have to acknowledge, there has been a great change in this man. He was a notorious infidel, perhaps, profane, dissipated, given to acts of wickedness. Now he believes, prays, has forsaken his evil ways, appears humble, is found studying the Scriptures, is diligent in the services of the church. He professes also to believe in salvation by grace, and acknowledges that the Lord has done all the work. He may talk much of experience, and have clear views of the doctrine of grace; and yet the dear people of God, without distrusting the genuineness of his professions, find something lacking. They cannot get a feeling of sweet fellowship. There is no oneness felt, no "at home" feeling. They do not find themselves "sitting down together" with him, as they do with others, and yet cannot say at times but that the fault is with themselves; for certainly there has been a great change in him, and he talks so confidently of his present hope, and has such assurance, and is so good.

Ah, there is the difficulty. The house is swept. How long you have been trying to sweep your heart; but at every attempt the dust of sin would rise and nearly smother out all hope. You tried to obey the command to "wash your heart from wickedness," but you could never do it. You forsook your evil ways, if you had been given to outbreaching sins, but that did not help you at all in this respect, although you felt thankful to the Lord for taking you away from those evil ways which you now hate; but instead of seeing anything in that whereof to boast, you feared all the more at times that you were but a hypocrite. But somehow, at some time, you never could tell exactly how nor when, you felt a sweet sense of pardon and peace, a deliverance from sin, a fullness of love and praise and joy, and a wonderful hope. Since then the Lord has been your hope, and at times you have been enabled to rejoice in him; but you have found that you still have a vain, deceitful heart, full of sin and evil, which you can never sweep out, and you have never been able to do one thing in which you could boast. You have been thankful that you have been led in paths of obedience, and have been powerfully held by the dear Savior, when otherwise you feel sure that you would have destroyed yourself; but you have no good works of your own to speak of. No wonder you cannot feel at home with this man, for he has swept out his heart, and keeps it swept out; and not only that, but it is garnished with many works of his that appear to him very good and praiseworthy. You do not feel that he has such troubles as you have on account of sinfulness and a depraved nature. It seems to you that he must be better than you are, not so troubled by evil thoughts and unbelief. You cannot look to him for sympathy. Not only is he not troubled as you are on account of sin, but his joys appear different. Your joys appear as a surprise to you. You can see no good reason for them in yourself. They are unexpected. While you are looking for expressions of deserved wrath from a holy God, you are surprised by manifestations of love that passeth knowledge, and peace that passeth all understanding, and joy that is inexpressible. On the contrary, when the unclean spirit has gone out of a man voluntarily, giving him a chance to sweep out his heart, and garnish himself with meritorious works, his joy is a reasonable result. He rejoices in what he has done. The good works of the natural man are the foundation of his hope and the cause of his joy.

But while this house out of which the unclean spirit is gone is swept and garnished, it is empty: Christ is not there. He is in his people the hope of glory. In him is all their comfort and joy. When they cannot realize his presence they are lonely and wretched, for they have only their own miserable depravity to contemplate; but when he is pleased to manifest himself in them, what peace and comfort they feel in his love. His word is then sweeter to them than honey and the honeycomb. "His mouth is most sweet; his love is better than wine." The natural man knows nothing of such an experience as this, and cares nothing for it. The house is empty. Only self and selfish desires are there. It is not the presence of the Savior, as the supreme object of his love, that he desires and longs for and rejoices in, but some reward, some exaltation of self, something to gratify pride, ambition, carnal desire.

The unclean spirit comes back at his own will and finds no hindrance, no other occupant of the house, no

Stronger being to keep him out nor to bind him. Then he goes and takes seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they dwell there. The number seven appears in the Scriptures to represent perfection, whether of good or evil; and the most perfect device of the unclean spirit to attain perfection in the manifestation of wickedness is to get a man to fancy that he has cleaned his heart from wickedness, and has done some things that the Lord admires, and then fill him with the spirit of false religion. Spiritual wickedness is the most perfect of all wickedness. Nowhere is there such vile hypocrisy, such bitter hatred of the truth, such malignant persecution of the Lord's people, as in the Pharisee, and the proselyte which the Pharisees have made.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I find the above, which was written some time during the summer. I believe I laid it aside as unsatisfactory, as I have done often. I now send it, without addition or revision, for you to publish if you see fit. It is very incomplete, and very imperfectly expressed; but it is what I believe concerning the text, and I submit it to brother Vanmeter and all others who may read it.

Your brother in the hope of the gospel,

SILAS H. DURAND.

SOUTHAMPTON, Pa., Sept. 19, 1892.

JOHN VIII. 31, 32.

"THEN said Jesus to those Jews which believed on him, If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

While the Savior was on earth preaching the gospel of the kingdom, seeking and saving those which were lost, he never sought to make proselytes, or to persuade any one to become his disciple and follow him, by concealing the difficulties of the way and the trials they would have to pass through for his name's sake. He did not represent the way as a smooth, easy, broad way, in which they might travel with pleasure; but he plainly told all who expressed a willingness to follow him that it was a strait and narrow way, a trying path, leading through much tribulation, temptation, a crucifying of the flesh with the affections and lusts. Nor did he suffer any to deceive themselves with a false hope or vain belief that they were his friends and followers, when he saw insincerity, dissimulation or hypocrisy in their hearts.

From the reading of this chapter it appears that many of those carnal Jews with whom he conversed "believed on him" (verse 30); but from their words and actions it appears that the work of faith was not wrought in them by the Spirit of God; that they believed not with the heart unto righteousness; and so it was not saving faith, the faith of God's elect. For when Jesus told them what would be the effect and fruit of true faith, in the words of the text, "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free," they answered him, "We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free?" They could not bear the idea of their being in bondage. It touched the pride of their hearts, and raised the enmity of their minds; and the conclusion of the whole conversation was that Jesus declared them children of the wicked one. "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do." For telling them this plain truth, "They took up stones to cast at him; but Jesus hid himself, and went out of the temple, going through the midst of them, and so passed by."

Thus it is proved that a man may have a historical or theoretical faith in Christ, and yet have no grace in the heart, and remain under the power of Satan, and die in his sins. Instead of flattering these empty, pretended believers, and buoying them up with vain hopes, our Lord faithfully and plainly told the real state of their case. "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed." Here is the test of discipleship. It is evident from the very manner of expression, "If ye continue in my word," that Jesus did not intend to hold forth continuance in his word as a condition, but as a test of discipleship; that their continuing in his word would not make them his disciples, but would make it manifest that they were such; for their continuing in his word would not bring them into the household of faith and make them true believers; as though now they were carnal, alienated from the life of God, but if they would continue to profess their belief they would by virtue of it be changed into grace, or by their exertion and perseverance they would "get religion." No. Their continuance in his word was not to be the condition of their discipleship, but the test of it; for as "the truth" was the subject of conversation between them and Christ, their not continuing in his word would make it manifest that they were not his disciples indeed. Thus Jesus foresaw that instead of their continuing to profess belief in him, they would deny him and seek to stone him.

This word "continue" points to some previous reception of the truth, or to a work begun and carried on in the heart; that the word of Christ in which they are to continue must in some degree have been impressed upon their consciences, and sealed with power upon their hearts, before they could "continue" in it. When the word of truth is thus ingrafted in the heart by the Spirit, it produces certain effects, such as Jesus has pointed out. He compares it to leaven. It does not lay there still, lifeless and inoperative, without producing any effect. Old things pass away, and all things become new. "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever." Jesus also compares it to seed cast into the ground, which does not lie dead, but undergoes a certain process. Light, warmth and moisture combine to cause a root to grow downward and a sprout upward. Thus it is with the word sown in the heart. The light, heat and moisture of the Spirit cause it to grow both ways—downward and upward. Humility roots downward in the soul, and the profession of faith sprouts upward, manifesting itself. "First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." "And the remnant that is escaped of the house of Judah shall again take root downward, and bear fruit upward." This is the difference between receiving the word in the letter and receiving it in the power of the Spirit. "Receive with meekness the ingrafted word, which is able to save your souls." In grafting fruit-trees a wound or incision is first made in the stock, and the graft is then inserted into it, which grows both into and out of it. The word of Jesus does not lie lifeless and inactive in the recipient of it; but the heart being wounded and opened by the power and work of the Spirit, forms a receptacle for the word of life, causing a bringing forth of fruit unto holiness and eternal life. Wherever the word of Christ thus grows into and out of the heart, the subject will continue in it. He will not renounce his faith nor lose it; because he shall be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. He may sink into deep troubles of soul, may be buried in the cares of the world for a time, and appear dead, dark and cold for a season, but yet the life of the Spirit remains in him. Being once quickened into spiritual life, he shall never perish; for Jesus has declared, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." Therefore he must needs continue in his word; because he who has begun the good work will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ.

"Then are ye my disciples indeed." Our Savior seems to lay great stress on the word "indeed;" thereby intimating that there may be a discipleship which is not in reality. In this expression our Savior pronounced a solemn sentence, "Then are ye my disciples indeed;" hereby giving us to understand that many who were said to believe on him did not in reality believe with the heart unto the saving of the soul, and consequently were not his "disciples indeed."

A disciple of Jesus in spirit and in truth is one who is made so by the power of the Spirit. When he was on earth he personally called them unto him, as we read, "And he goeth up into a mountain, and calleth unto him whom he would; and they came unto him." All who are his disciples indeed are effectually called by his Spirit, speaking with power to their hearts; and these may be known by certain marks. One mark is devotedness to his service, which the very name disciple implies; for the moment he called his disciples they forsook all and followed him, devoting themselves to his service. Thomas spoke what they all felt in their hearts, when he said, "Let us also go to Jerusalem, that we may die with him;" feeling such an attachment to him that neither life nor death could separate them. If we do not follow him, and walk as he walked, being taught, led and governed by him, we lack the one essential mark of discipleship, and are like Israel of old, of whom it was said, "Their heart is divided; now shall they be found faulty."—Hosea x. 2.

When Matthew was called, he left the receipt of customs; Peter and Andrew left their nets; James and John left their ship and their father, and followed the Savior. As the disciples of Jesus, we are required to come out from the world, and be separated from all corrupt and dead professors. A proud professor cannot walk in fellowship with the lowly Jesus. A worldly minded professor can have no fellowship with him who was not of this world. A hypocrite cannot have communion with him in whom there was no guile. "The disciple must be as his Master, and the servant as his Lord.—Mat. x. 25.

"Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." The truth here spoken of comprehends all that God has revealed in his word. Jesus himself is the way, the truth and the life. Everything connected with the work, blood, love, grace and glory of the Lord Jesus Christ, as revealed in the Scriptures for the instruction and comfort of his people, shall be known, at least so much as is needful and profitable. Of this gospel truth Jesus promises to give his true disciples a saving knowledge. "Ye shall know the truth," not only in the letter, but in the spirit and power of it. They shall know it by experience. They shall know their own ignorance, darkness and helplessness. They often walk in darkness. This ignorance which God's people feel, this darkness of mind under which they often groan, and the very clouds that hang over their path, are blessed of the Lord to teach them that they cannot instruct or guide themselves into the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. Thus they are led to cry unto the Lord to apply his truth with power to their hearts. And when it pleases the Lord to enlighten their minds, and to anoint their eyes with eye-salve, then they see and know experimentally the truth, which makes them free.

"And the truth shall make you free." This implies that by nature

we are slaves and bondmen, the servants of sin, Satan and the world. Only so far as the Lord brings us out of this bondage do we come in any measure into spiritual freedom. This liberty of the sons of God, although a glorious liberty, is not perfect in all respects in this time state, while they sojourn in this wilderness of sin and sorrow. The fullness is reserved for them in the world to come. Here they are not freed from Satan's temptations and assaults, but are subject to his artful devices and molestations. Here they are not freed from afflictions; for what son is there whom the Father chasteneth not? If ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons. But they are free from the law and its curse, and from the dominion of sin; for the apostle assures us, "Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace."—Rom. vi. 14. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made them free from the law of sin and death. For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in them, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.—Rom. viii. 1-4. They are not yet freed from mortality; but this mortal shall put on immortality, and this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."—1 Cor. xv. 54-58.

Brethren Beebe, the forgoing is the substance of a discourse delivered some time ago, and is forwarded to you for publication in the SIGNS, hoping it will be of interest to the readers of our family paper.

PARABLE OF THE TALENTS.

Matthew xxv. 14.

THERE is a striking similarity and apparent unity of purpose in this parable and that recorded in Luke xix. 12, of the parable of the ten pounds, though evidently spoken in different language, in the hearing of partly different witnesses. In both, treasures are entrusted to the care of servants, in different quantities, in like circumstances, apparently all being servants, not sons, in the one point of their likeness to each other, but each manifesting a different capacity from the others;

as well as showing the wisdom of the lord of those servants in selecting the proper one for each measure of trust confided to him. Had that lord bestowed those gifts in a reverse order, it would not have answered the point of illustration designed by our Savior, to show his disciples the lesson intended. Jesus always chose appropriate lessons, as presented in parables, as well as in every other mode of illustration; and we should bear this in mind. The lord called three servants to him, previous to departing on his journey and divided to them his goods, to every man according to his "several ability." Let us first notice this fact, and the lesson implied. I cannot but think that this lord knew those "several abilities" before he made the division to them, and the result was not unexpected. His goods were safe, whatever those abilities implied; for they were eventually returned to him. This thought leads me to conclude, as I hope the Lord has also taught me in other wonderful lessons, that Christ here referred to his universal lordship, and that he perfectly knew and had planned every step in his kingdom, both in providence and in grace. He was here in the world, and in the midst of the citizens of the world, and all were created by him and for him; therefore all were subject to him, their own enmity notwithstanding.—John i. 3; Col. i. 16. In this sense all men are his servants, and receive their one talent in and of the world, and he by right claims and uses each and every one of them when and where it pleases him; but he is not wholly of the world, only as he took part of flesh and blood. In his divinity he is "God with us." He came from the bosom of his Father, yet parting from no part of his measure. "For in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily."—Col. ii. 9; i. 19; John iii. 34. Jesus used this parable not by guess, but by knowledge; foreshadowing his departure from his disciples in particular, and from the people in general. These three servants are selected by him from actual incidents of life; as I understand every parable to be a real, as well as an illustrative fact, and were designed to show his unerring wisdom, and at the same time give his disciples fore-glances of his will, and to prepare them for recollections that must prove the correctness of their faith in him. He came into the world that he had made, walked in the midst of a wicked and perverse generation, just like the grumbling one talented man he had selected to illustrate their character. They were of the world; all they had was in the world; they buried it there, and at death returned it again to him, whom they said they know; but they knew him not; they comprehended him not.—John i. 5-11. He came to his own, and his own received him not. This one talented man will comprehend every natural man in the possession of every natural gift of God, whether he possesses physical, intellectual or natural religious gifts; for every religion, whether stoical, scientific, pagan or Jewish, belongs only to the world; but God had always had use for them all; and whatever deceptive influence they have wielded over the minds of worldly men, it has been under the divine disposal. "If a prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel."—Ezek. xiv. 9; 1 Kings xxii. 23. This one talented servant also fitly illustrates the nature of the carnal mind, which even the elect have in common with all men. Paul says to the saints, "To be carnally minded is death;" and he prays to be delivered from this body of death. Thus proving by his and their experience that they have a carnal mind, just like every other natural man. This leads me to speak of the second talent added, making two talents, the second of which none but the elect receive, and that is given according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith.—Romans xii. 3. The two talented man was as profitable in proportion to his gift or talents as the five talented servant was; therefore there was no mistake in the bestowal of any of them; each servant filled the measure of his gift; and there was no discrepancy in the parable by which we might be led to suppose that God ever gave a wrong gift to his people, either in nature or in grace. He not only made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth, but hath set the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation. But most wonderful of all, he did choose his spiritual family as sons, not merely as servants alone, in Christ before the world began; thus making this second talent to represent the addition of eternal life, to life already given in time; and this comfort is bestowed as the evidences of the new birth show forth the praise of God. "But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man [of the generation of Jesus Christ] to profit with all."—1 Cor. vii. 7. This one manifestation, this one grace given, is as sure to bring forth fruit as it is sure that God gave it. "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain."—John xv. 16. To apply this parable all to the ministry, as though God made some mistake in placing his servants in positions that they were not quite prepared for, and were not able to fill, is not where the Lord has shown me it belongs; for I cannot conceive how he could make such a failure in his arrangements. It would seem to reflect that his choice of servants was

LIFE IN HEARING.

"VERILY, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live."—John v. 25.

In his note on page 287, current volume of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, W. J. May requests our exposition of this portion of the doctrine of our Lord.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you." In his discourse for the instruction of his disciples, Jesus never taught them anything of trivial importance. It is not to be understood that he designed to intimate that any other portion of his words was untrue or of minor consequence; but knowing the infirmity of those to whom this important truth was addressed he kindly emphasized his words by way of assisting them in realizing the importance of that essential point of doctrine which he here taught them. The word which is translated in this verse by our word "verily," is the same word which in other portions of the Scriptures is transferred without translation, and which is one of the names by which our Lord is himself designated, "Amen." No scientific research can explain why this word is so often used in the teaching of Jesus; in the experience of the subjects of his grace is found the only reason for the solemn form of assurance by which this particular declaration is confirmed. If the gospel were merely offered for the acceptance or rejection of natural minds, as is universally taught by the advocates of conditional salvation, there would be no occasion for such confirmation of the assertion of the unlimited sovereignty of the voice of the Son of God. In this case, as in that cited in Hebrews, is displayed the gracious will of God to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, which is confirmed by an oath.—Heb. vi. 17, 18. The truth of God is not rendered more sure by this confirmation; but its proclamation is more clearly shown to the heirs of promise. They are included in the specification "I say unto you." This assurance does not interest any but those who are called by his grace to that knowledge of God which is eternal life. To them it is a heavenly revelation of his tender solicitude for their consolation, that he is thus mindful of their weakness and their need of perpetual support against the temptations and accusations of unbelief in their own hearts, and the cruel assaults of their adversary the devil. To them this wonderful truth is of vital power to sustain their fainting hope in his salvation. That Word of the Lord which is the life-giving power of God unto the salvation of sinners who are dead, is the unfailing refuge and support of every one whose hope is in Jesus. To such the sweet comfort of this divine truth can never be expressed. Let the Jews still require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom; they who are called, whether by nature Jews or Greeks, know him only as their salvation whose voice is omnipotent, and whose power is manifest in quickening whom he will. Unto all such Christ Jesus is of God made "Wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption; that, according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." Much confusion arises in reading the inspired record from failure to observe the characters to whom the language written is addressed. The same words have a very different signification when spoken to living children of God who are alone able to hear spiritual truth, from that which is expressed by them when spoken to those who are enemies and haters of the truth of the gospel of God our Savior. Therefore it is essentially important to observe this specific address. Only he that heareth the word of Jesus can receive the life which is confined to him that is specified in the verse preceding our text. It is of no interest to any one except those living children.

"The hour is coming, and now is." Naturally there can be no such thing as that an hour which "now is," should still be "coming." The hour which is present is passing away, and must be forever gone, instead of coming in the future. But our divine Redeemer did not come into the world to teach natural things. His name was declared before his birth as signifying the work which was given him to accomplish. The angel said to Joseph, "Thou shalt call his name JESUS, for he shall save his people from their sins." The chosen subjects of that salvation were by nature the children of wrath even as others. In common with all the children of Adam, they were dead in trespasses and sins. When their Savior was revealed as God manifest in the flesh he did not come to keep them from being lost; he said himself, "The Son of man is come to save that which was lost."—Matt. xviii. 11. No created being could perform such a marvelous work; the most that reason can claim for the saviors whom it can comprehend, is that they should provide means to keep sinners from being lost. This is the essential principle in which all false religion is agreed, from the first preacher of man's ability, in the garden of Eden, down to the most fashionable teacher of worldly religion in the present age. None of them talk of salvation from sin; they teach only the escape of the best of sinners from the punishment due to them as transgressors of the rigorous law of Moses. This is represented as subject to their own choice, and dependent upon their compliance with conditions offered as grounds for their deliverance from the justice of that holy commandment. In such systems there can be no grace displayed, since every sinner who complies with the conditions offered is rightfully entitled to receive all the reward for compliance. This would make the whole salvation of all who were delivered from condemnation the just reward of their own action in meeting the condition proposed. To the Israelites under the law of Sinai such a conditional covenant was given and in its observance they were blessed with temporal favors. But not even in compliance with all the provisions of that holy commandment of God was there any promise of a single blessing beyond this earthly state of existence. To the obedient Israelite that law gave nothing but protection in the enjoyment of natural prosperity and favors. That dispensation must continue until in the fulfillment of every precept of the law it should pass away. Jesus only was the holy One of whom Moses wrote in every prophetic declaration of the execution of all the requirements of that law of which he was the minister. No other man ever did or ever can satisfy the demand of that law which is spiritual; while every child of Adam is carnal, and already sold under sin.—Rom. vii. 14. While in his eternal Godhead our Lord did indeed manifest his present power in causing the dead to hear his life-giving voice, in his humiliation he was himself a servant under that law which he must fulfill in order that he might take it out of the way, before the glory of his gospel kingdom could be revealed. Although he was then learning obedience by the things which he suffered, even then he caused the dead to hear his voice, and gave unto them the eternal life which was in himself. There never was a time when our Lord did not call his chosen people, and deliver them from the power of sin and death by his omnipotent grace. His divine power is not restricted to times or places. His grace was revealed in Abel as freely as in calling his immediate disciples when he was manifest in the flesh with them. There never was a saint, in any condition or time, but that Jesus was with him even in the depth of his affliction and guilt. Time does not limit him. Yet in the revelation of the gracious purpose of God in the salvation of his people, he has established the order of temporal dispensations; first, the patriarchal; then the legal; and last, the gospel day, which is in our text called the coming hour. In this hour is revealed the divine glory of our exalted Redeemer, as having conquered death and hell, and by the one offering of himself "perfected forever them that are sanctified." In himself this victorious hour is ever present, while in the manifestation of it to created beings it was when he spoke the words here written, yet "coming" in the future. Not until he had made an end of sins by the suffering of death, did that hour come in its manifestation. After his resurrection he said, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." This is certainly in his character as the Mediator and Redeemer of his chosen people. In his omnipotent Godhead no power could be given unto him.

"When the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God." Whether it be understood as referring to those who are dead in sin, as are all the children of men, or as signifying the calling from literal death of those who have passed away from this earthly existence, the voice of the Son of God is the only authority which can secure the obedience of those who are called. In the sense in which we understand the Lord as speaking in this text he declares the quickening efficacy of his word in translating the chosen subjects of his grace from the power of darkness into the kingdom of the dear Son of God. Being by nature the children of wrath even as others, they are certainly in that sense, as the children of the sinning Adam, utterly dead. Not even before the handwriting of ordinances had been literally blotted out by the blood of Jesus, could there have been a vessel of divine mercy called by grace except as the voice of the Son of God was heard in that irresistible calling. No other word can penetrate the darkness of death. The mystery of this eternal majesty of the Son of God can never be explained to the comprehension of finite intelligence. The fact must be received as the revelation given "through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead." To every one who can receive this truth it is an unmistakable assurance that the Spirit of Christ dwells in that one as the eternal life which Jesus gives to his sheep. So Paul says, "No man speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed; and no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost."—1 Cor. xii. 3. In no case can there be an exception to this definite decision which has been left on record for the learning of the saints. The whole family of Adam must be included in one or the other of these two descriptions. Every one who denies the complete salvation from sin of every one for whom Jesus died, certainly calls Jesus accursed; since his failure to save his people from their sins necessarily implies that he did not satisfy divine justice. And since he was made a curse for his people, if the curse is not removed from all for whom he gave himself a ransom it must still rest upon him. When presented in this form, perhaps no subject of grace would utter so glaring a denial of the power of Jesus in accomplishing all that he came into the world to do. But the devices of the tempter are so deceptive that under his strong temptations they may be so far deceived as to doubt his victory over their sins, and thereby become involved in the necessary conclusion that he is himself yet under the curse which he has failed to remove from his people. Whenever this suggestion is presented to the saints it is certain that it is not the Spirit of God by whom it is originated. In this there is comfort for the tempted one. But it should also be borne in mind that none can ascribe sovereignty to Jesus as the Savior of sinners but by the Holy Ghost. Then it necessarily follows that no sinner is able to trust in him for salvation unless by the Holy Ghost he is made to call him the Lord in whom all power is vested. So Jesus is worshiped in the cry of the lost sinner who looks to him for salvation. None ever did thus call on the name of the Lord without receiving the deliverance which is the gracious answer of that call. Hearing the life-giving voice of the Son of God is the only source from which such calling can originate. Since the dead know not anything, there can be no inclination to call on the name of the Lord until life is given by his gracious word.

Since the words which Jesus speaks are spirit and life, it is evident that none hear his voice without receiving that life. In that sense it will not be doubted that the word of the Lord always prosper in the thing whereto he sends it. While it is true that the word "hear" is in many portions of the Scriptures used to signify obedience, yet in the text it has appeared to our understanding that the same individuals who are made to hear the voice of the Son of God, are in every instance quickened by that word into eternal life which Jesus gives to those who were dead before they heard his word. This is the miracle of grace. It is absurd to suppose that the dead can have any power to choose whether they will hear the living word. They are made alive by the Spirit before they know anything. Their first consciousness reveals the justice of God in their condemnation. The voice of the Son of God was never heard in supplication to gain the favor of the dead sinner. There is no separation between that word and the life which is communicated by it. The voice of the Son of God has never failed to be heard by any dead sinner to whom it was addressed. A dying thief, a bloody Manasseh, and a raging Saul breathing slaughter, can no more resist this almighty voice than could the infant Samuel or Jeremiah, or the unborn John the Baptist.

"And they that hear shall live." It will be clear to those who are able to understand the truth of this word of Jesus, that there can be no room for failure in this wonderful announcement. There is no intimation that the opportunity of living will be submitted to the dead, and the result will be according to their choice. It is asserted with equally positive certainty that they shall live as that they shall hear. In this infallible decree of our God is the strong consolation of the gospel of his grace. If there had been but one exception left on record, there never was and never could be a saint who would feel that any other sinner except himself could be that exception. The gospel itself would thus be deprived of its heavenly glory. It is a common form of emphatic designation by which the living hearers of the voice of the Son of God are here specified. None can possibly be included among these living ones but those who hear that voice which causes the dead to live. Evidently the only will which selects those who hear this lifegiving voice must be the will of him who speaks. Clearly it is the Son of God alone who calls his own sheep by name, and leads them out of the prison house of death.

The Lord in this text is not inculcating that obedience to his commandments which is the practical life of those who love him. He proclaims that gracious provision of the gospel by which sinners are called from death to life; and the wonderful truth is accompanied with the assurance that there shall be no failure in a single case. Every one who is called with that holy calling shall hear; and every one who hears shall live. This verse appears to be a more emphatic reiteration of that which is declared in the preceding verse. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." If there could be any possibility of misconstruing the language in one of these verses separately, that possibility is destroyed by taking the two verses together as they are recorded by the pen of inspiration.

Having submitted briefly such views as we have been favored with, we unite with our earnest inquirer in soliciting the views of some of our correspondents upon this deeply interesting subject. In this case, as in all that we write or speak concerning the unsearchable mystery of godliness, we sincerely desire that it shall be received by our readers only so far as it is consistent with the inspired record.

ROMANS I. 20.

This epistle, like all the communications of the Spirit, is for the exclusive benefit of the saints. What the Spirit saith, it saith to the churches; and so it is written at the close of the messages to each of the seven churches of Asia, "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." The apostle Paul addresses this letter

"To all that be at Rome, beloved of God, called (to be) saints." He longed to see them, that he might impart unto them some spiritual gift, to the end they might be established; "that is," he says, "that I might be comforted together with you by the mutual faith both of you and me." He acknowledged himself a debtor to the saints, whether Jews or Gentiles; and so, as much as in him was, he was ready to preach the gospel to them. He was not a law preacher, but a gospel preacher. He tells the saints at Galatia, that the law is not of faith, but is a system of works. "And the law is not of faith; but, The man that doeth them shall live in them." But the gospel is a system of faith, resting on the promise of God, and the work of Jesus Christ, and not on the works or faithfulness of the creature. Thus the apostle often uses the word "faith" when speaking of the gospel, in distinction from the law. So he says, "But before faith came [that is, before the gospel came] we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith [or gospel] which should afterwards be revealed."—Gal. iii. 23. The apostle was not ashamed of this gospel, because it is the power of God, and not the power of men. None who receive it shall ever be ashamed or confounded, for it is salvation, and that of God, whose works are all perfect. This gospel, or system of faith (for faith always embraces the promise of God), unlike the law, reveals life and salvation. The law, which is not of faith, reveals and works death. It reveals the righteousness of God in the condemnation of a sinner. By the deeds of the law no flesh shall be justified in the sight of God; for by the law is the knowledge of sin.—Rom. iii. 20. But the apostle says of the gospel, "Therein is the righteousness of God revealed, from faith to faith." Not from the faith of one man to the faith of another man; nor from one degree of faith to another degree of faith in men; but the gospel, which is called faith, is revealed to the faith of those who are born of the Spirit, and have that faith as a fruit of the Spirit. None have ever heard and rejoiced in that gospel until they were in possession of that faith. The revelation is never made to their carnal mind or sense. This is clearly the meaning of the apostle. The gospel reveals to the saints the righteousness of God in Christ Jesus, whereby they are enabled to see what they never saw before, how God can be just, and the justifier of an ungodly sinner. What a wonderful gospel is this! "Now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Christ Jesus unto all and upon all them that believe; for there is no difference," whether they be Jews or Gentiles.—Rom. iii. 21, 22. "As is written, The just shall live by faith," or by this gospel of the grace of God, and not by their own works, or the works of the law; for there is no life found in the law; but it is found to be a ministration of death. The saints can find no life or comfort in it; only condemnation. As the just who are freely justified by the grace of God, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, they only live or find comfort and liberty in the gospel. "In hope of eternal life, which God, who cannot lie, promised before the world began." When the saints in their experience are brought into the bondage of the law by false teachers, or otherwise, there is no comfort, or life, or liberty, felt in their soul until this system of faith, or the gospel, is revealed to their faith. Thus the revelation is "from faith to faith." God has ordained that his justified people shall live only by this faith. They can find life or comfort in no other system. If they live or walk after the flesh they die.

The quotation of the apostle, "The just shall live by faith," is from the prophecy of Habakkuk. This prophet and child of God was in the flesh, in a fleshly frame of mind, and blind for the time as to the truth of God's predestination and purpose respecting evil, and therefore was out of the faith; for no one can be in the faith while blind to and denying the absolute sovereignty of God over all beings and all events. God's predestination of all things is so fully and clearly declared in the Scriptures that men nor devils shall ever be able to disprove it, although both try to do so. How little of reverence and godly fear was manifest in the words of this prophet as he comes before God in his blindness and fleshly mindedness. Could we recognize his utterances as prayer? Hear him. "O Lord, how long shall I cry, and thou wilt not hear? even cry out unto thee of violence, and thou wilt not save. Why dost thou shew me iniquity, and cause me to behold grievance? for spoiling and violence are before me, and there are that raise up strife and contention. Therefore the law is slacked, and judgment doth not go forth; for the wicked doth compass about the righteous; therefore wrong judgment proceedeth." But when the Lord opened the understanding of the prophet, and brought him into the faith, teaching him that all that wickedness and violence was embraced in the purpose of God, and yet God was pure and holy, the prophet, being converted from his error, like Peter, is made to utter words of truth for the comfort of God's people throughout all succeeding time. "Art thou not from everlasting, O Lord, my God, mine holy One? We shall not die. O Lord, thou hast ordained them for judgment; and, O mighty God, thou hast established them for correction." "The just shall live by his faith" in that almighty God who not only knew, but also declared the end from the beginning, saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Even the most wicked and diabolical act ever committed by men, of which we have a record in the Scriptures, by inspiration of God is declared to be according to God's predeterminate counsel. "But those things, which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled." "For of a truth, against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel, were gathered together, for to do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done."—Acts iii. 18; iv. 27, 28. These Scriptures will never become "threadbare" to those who are in the faith, and whose only hope and trust, in the midst of all the wickedness and abominations in the world, is in that God who "has made all (things) for himself, yea, even the wicked for the day of evil." Says the prophet Habakkuk, "I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower, and will watch to see what he will say unto me, and what I shall answer when I am reproved. And the Lord answered me, and said, Write the vision, and make it plain upon tables, that he may run that readeth it. For the vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie; though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry. Behold, his [the wicked, the proud, the scoffer] soul which is lifted up is not upright in him; but the just shall live by his faith."

The apostle then declares, "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men who hold the truth in unrighteousness; because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them." First, the apostle declares here that the wrath of God is a revelation from heaven. Without a revelation from heaven no one can know that wrath. It is not revealed to-day to men in the absence of God's law written in the heart. Nothing can be known of the wrath of God aside from his law, and none but his people have or know that law. It is a new covenant blessing, "I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts."—Jer. xxxi. 33; Heb. viii. 10. There is a vast difference between the fear of hell and torment, which natural men sometimes experience, and the wrath of God, which is revealed in the experience of the Lord's people, who have his law in their hearts. The apostle says, "When the Gentiles, which have not the law [for unto Jews alone "were committed the oracles of God"], do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves; which shew the work of the law written in their hearts," &c. These must be children of God, as none others have the law of God written in the heart. Unto them the wrath of God is revealed, and this wrath they shall feel when holding the truth in unrighteousness. Certainly none but children of God can hold the truth, either in righteousness or unrighteousness. Can a man hold that which he has not? Certainly not. It would be holding the truth in unrighteousness if a child of God should say, "All wickedness is embraced in the purpose of God; therefore I am not accountable for my ungodly and unrighteous conduct;" and, in the Lord's time, such child of God would be made to experience that of which the apostle speaks in the epistle to the Hebrews, "A certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries;" but not devour the child of God, in whom are the adversaries. A child of God cannot walk after the flesh without eventually experiencing the rod of God's chastisement upon him. He cannot plead ignorance, "Because that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shewed it unto them;" for he has put his law in their inward parts. The wrath of God is revealed to every subject of grace against all their ungodliness and unrighteousness. The apostle has named a catalogue of sins which men have been guilty of, and adds, "Who, knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them." Child of God, read the catalogue, and answer the apostle's question, "What then? are we better than they?" The apostle himself answers his question thus, "No, in no wise." While we may not be left to manifest these corrupt principles, yet are they within our flesh. Peter did not seem to understand that sin dwelt in him, although chosen to be an apostle of the Lord Jesus. He did not suppose he could ever be guilty of cursing and swearing falsely; yet he did so. Did he afterward justify himself in his ungodly and unrighteous conduct? No indeed. The Lord looked on him, and he went out and wept bitterly. He was without excuse, although the Savior had positively declared that he should do as he did. The truth is, there is no length in sin to which the subjects of God's grace may not run, unless restrained by the grace and power of God. Says the apostle, "But we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth against them which commit such things. And thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God? Or despisest thou the riches of his goodness and forbearance and long-suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? But after thy hardness and impenitent heart treasurest up unto thyself wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render to every man according to his deeds." The apostle is certainly speaking of the people of God, for he was not an apostle or teacher to any others; and he has said, "What have I to do to judge them that are without?" "To them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life" will be rendered to them; for "he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting." But unto them [of the saints] that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish," shall be rendered by God, whether they be Jew or Gentile; "for there is no respect of persons with God." "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God," as every ungodly and unrighteous one among God's people shall find.

The things of God, the things of the Spirit, the things of God's kingdom, are invisible, eternal things. "The things that are seen are temporal, but the things that are not seen are eternal." These invisible things of God from the creation of the world, wonderful to tell, have been clearly seen by the creatures of God, as God has been pleased to reveal them unto his people, who are created things. From the days of Abel, if not from the days of Adam and Eve, these invisible things of God have been clearly seen, for God has shewed them unto them. They could not be excused in walking in an ungodly and unrighteous manner, for God had shown things to them which he had not shown to others. In a sense the gospel was preached before the coming of Christ, and even before the giving of the law from Sinai. The gospel was preached unto Abraham. The apostle, speaking of those saints, says, "For this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the Spirit."

The apostle does not say that the invisible things of God are understood through the things that are made. We do not understand him to teach that the invisible things of God, his eternal power and Godhead, are understood through the things he has created, such as the sun, moon, stars, trees, &c. God's people are made to see such created things as types of spiritual things. The revelation of God is not made to them in that way, but through the law written in their hearts. However much any may have studied the things of God in natural creation, and imagined they have "looked up through nature to nature's God," yet when called by the grace of God, as was Saul of Tarsus, they confess their former ignorance of him, as did he, saying, "Who art thou, Lord?" Saul had been brought up and trained in such a manner that he was familiar with the letter of the law; yet it had not given him a knowledge of God. The invisible things of God

he was totally ignorant of. He knew nothing of the wrath of God, which the apostle speaks of, until the law of God was written in his inward parts. Thus it is with everyone who has been given an understanding of the "eternal power and Godhead." By the law written in the heart is the knowledge of sin; and where there is this knowledge of sin there is the knowledge of the "eternal power and Godhead," so that they are without excuse.

We have briefly stated our understanding of the apostle's words, and submit what we have written to the readers of the SIGNS, hoping they will accept what we have written only so far as it is found to be in harmony with the inspired record and the experience of the people of God. J.

MEMORIALS.

(By the Lexington Association.)

WHEREAS, Since the last session of our association our God has seen fit to remove from our number by death three of our dearly beloved brethren, who for many years have been faithful ministers of the New Testament, and beloved and honored pastors among our churches, viz., Elders Isaac Hewitt, David Earl and I. B. Whitcomb, we desire to record upon our Minutes an expression of our sorrow in this triple bereavement, and a tribute of love and respect to their memory.

We feel indeed to be sorely bereaved, and are sad that we shall see their faces no more on earth. We doubt not that our loss is their eternal gain, and desire to comfort one another with this most blessed assurance. We shall deeply miss them at our meetings, our homes, and in all the order of the church; but we would remember that the God of Israel still lives and reigns, and is able to raise up others to go in and out before us. Jesus, the chief Shepherd, is still near, though the undershepherds fail and lie down in death. Their labors are ended, and they have entered into rest. We remain yet a little longer to toil and suffer. May God ever comfort and keep us by his grace. We desire to tender an expression of our deep sympathy with the bereaved families of our departed brethren. May God be their stay and portion forever; and may we all be helped to say, The will of the Lord be done.

not wisely made; but we need not fear the result of his choice, nor the failure of his purpose for each saint to fill. How comforting this thought is to the feeble lambs of God with but two talents. They cannot help seeing them both by faith, for they have not only the promise of the life that now is, but of that which is to come. While distressed on account of sin, there is a sure token that eternal life is theirs; and as sure as they hunger and thirst after righteousness, that sure this second talent is theirs, and the added profit in trade or exchange of holy thought that each saint enjoys is sure to follow. None but the one talented or natural man can fail, ultimately, in this God-given investment. The quickened soul is as sure of his increase of holy joy as it is sure that God is eternal. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be." And have you eternal life? This natural life may apparently perish; but the very grave must give up its dead. This mortal shall put on immortality. "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord harkened and heard it; and a book of remembrance was written before him, for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels, and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him." "Then shall ye return, and discern between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not."—Mal. iii. 16-18. Here is a key to the fact that God's children are servants as well; and Jesus humbled himself as a servant, was obedient unto death, and after death rose again, and appeared unto his disciples, blessing every one whom he had then chosen to reveal himself to (more than five hundred brethren at one time, and a few scattered ones at others); thus proving his abundant power to take full oversight of his people, even after death, and to instruct them individually and collectively as to the place that each should fill in his holy service. Having briefly hinted at the application of the parable to the one talented servant, and to the two talented one, I would refer to Paul's beautiful application of the services of the church at Rome (xii. chapter), and request each saint to read and see if he can see any place where the Lord made any mistake in placing all the members in the body, since they were only to prove what was that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God."—See latter clause of verse 2. Space forbids recounting all that is presented to my mind relative to the five talents. All I hoped to do at the first was to try to call attention to the parable, to show how blessedly wonderful God's gift of grace can fill his holy mission. Let me only say, in conclusion, that as sure as the blessed Master bestows eternal life, that sure the soul is safe for heaven, and consequent purity from sin; and the one with five talents may only serve his brethren while here in various ways; but, as God gives him grace, he will not say, like the one talented or worldly minded man, that he has served the Lord in vain.

May the blessed Master bestow more grace on us all; for only as grace abounds can love and joy and peace and holy obedience abound.

As ever, in love,

DEAR BROTHERS BEEBE:—Inclosed you will find two dollars to pay for the dear old SIGNS. As has been said by others, I cannot do without it very well, I prize it so highly. I feel more anxious about it every Thursday than any other portion of my mail matter. Its theme has been, and is, all honor to God, and debasing poor creature man. It is by far the best religious paper I have ever seen. My dear father and I have taken it over forty years, and I expect to take it all along, even though it should get to be double the price it is now. I hope the dear brethren will continue to write, as their able communications are a great comfort to your numerous readers, especially, I believe, to those who are isolated from hearing the word preached, either by distance, or old age, or other causes. In reading over the number for August 31st, my attention was drawn to an article written by sister S. Garrard. O how my heart went out in sympathy for her, as she spoke of her troubles in the loss of her dear husband, and the difficulties she was called to undergo; also of her helpless children. O that the dear Lord would look in much mercy upon her, and give her strength sufficient for her day, is my sincere desire for his dear name's sake.

Your brother, I hope,

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Lexington Old School Baptist Association, to the several churches of which she is composed.

DEAR BROTHERS AND SISTERS—Who love our Lord Jesus Christ, and regard him as the faithful Husband of his bride, namely, his church, his elect, chosen in him, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love, and that through the sanctification of the Spirit unto the belief of the truth; also, as the one who rose from the dead as the first fruits of them that slept, and will be finally glorified in the complete salvation of every member of his body.

In this our annual Circular Letter our desire is to dwell to some extent on the subject of the resurrection of the dead. In view of this purpose we will call your attention to the following inspired language, recorded in 1 Corinthians xv. 13, 14: "If there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen: and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain."

Many are somewhat skeptical concerning the resurrection of the bodies of the saints, for the reason, perhaps, that they fail to comprehend the attributes of the Deity, the God who raises them, and therefore imagine it an impossibility. Ages have passed away since the body of Abel has returned to its mother dust. The thousands of passing years from that time to this have consigned millions to their sleeping graves, a part of many in the eastern world, another part in the western, a far distant land, besides many deep in the ocean's bed; all of whom have left no trace of a particle of the sacred seed of life visible to human understanding, but to the contrary. The most intelligent and profound minds during all the ages which have passed have discovered nothing visible to their mortal eyes, nor comprehensible to their understanding. All is silent, undisturbed even by the quaking earth or peals of thunder. There is nothing but lifeless dust. Accordingly, say they, there is no resurrection of the dead; and if so, then is Christ not risen, and our preaching is vain. But, brethren, be not deceived. "Evil communications corrupt good manners. Awake to righteousness, and sin not; for some have not the knowledge of God." Christ is risen, and has become the first fruits of them that slept. Death has no more dominion over him. He has suffered in the flesh, made his soul an offering for sin, to the complete satisfaction of the law's demands. Joseph's new tomb can hold him no longer than until the third day. He rises, comes forth, meets his disciples, and salutes them, saying, "All hail." "All power in heaven and on earth is given into my hands." Paul says (Romans vi. 9), "Death hath no more dominion over him." Also of the saints, that they should reckon themselves dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God. Here we remark that his disciples, his bride, or the church, the members of his mystical body, are to be regarded as simultaneous with him in his suffering, death and resurrection; and as he is the first fruits, they will necessarily rise from the dead, awake in his likeness, and be satisfied.

Some will say, How are the dead raised, and with what body do they come? The apostle Paul's reply is, "Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened, except it die: and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain: but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body." "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." So this vile body is changed, and fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body.

In our opinion it is a matter of mere speculation whether or not this vile body is changed before it comes forth from its dusty bed. If raised before, it would be the same as those who are alive and remain until the coming of our Lord. All will be changed. "Behold, I show you a mystery: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound [God himself shall sound it], and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." "Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." Christ is glorified in the complete sanctification of his saints. "Thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." So let it be.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Lexington Old School Baptist Association, in session with the Schoharie Church, Schoharie Co., N. Y., to the several associations and meetings with which we correspond, and to the household of faith where these lines may come, sends christian love.

DEAR BROTHERS:—Another year has passed, and we as individuals and as an association are still in the land of the living, which fact constrains us to acknowledge the goodness and mercy of the Lord; for we can surely say, with Paul, that it is by the grace of God that we are what we are. Our session has been blessed, we feel, by the presence of the son of peace, and also by the coming of a goodly number of richly laden servants of our God, which we feel to bless our God for, and take courage. Although there seem to be some questions of order that we do not see our way clear, in regard to corresponding with some we formerly were connected with, we would say to them, Let brotherly love continue. Let not our prayers be hindered for each other. Send your servants among us; we will not stone them. We will send them away in peace. We feel to say, O that the Lord would bring again Zion, and make them like them that dream.

Our next session is appointed to be held with the Lexington Church, Greene Co., N. Y., where we hope to receive your messengers and messages of love, with also the Prince of peace.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

N. L. Kirk passed away on the 30th of August, 1892. He met with an accident on the 22d of August, while tearing down an old bridge at Felton, Santa Cruz Co., California. I think he joined the Old School Baptists when he was twenty-one years old. His heart had always been with them. He received much comfort and pleasure from the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. He was a dear, faithful husband, a fond and loving father, and a follower of Christ. His last words were, "Blessed Jesus!" He was willing and ready to meet his God, and told us that it was all well. He loved Christ with all his heart. His word was as good as his bond.

He was born in Cecil Co., Md., and was the son of Elisha E. and Rebecca Kirk. He was forty-three years old. His death has been a great loss to his wife and three daughters; but we know that our loss is his gain. We bow our heads in submission, and say, Thy will, O God, be done.

I am his lonely widow,

CARRIE F. KIRK.

ALAMEDA, Cal., Sept. 19, 1892.

SISTER Mary Dicken Conner fell asleep August 18th, 1892, after many years of patient suffering. She was a believer in Jesus, one of whom he said, "He that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." In her life she was not ashamed to confess Christ before men; and we have the evidence that he was not ashamed to confess her before his Father and all his holy angels.

Sister Conner was an exemplary christian woman, and a faithful member of the Old School Baptist Church since 1868. During all the days of her affliction she was never heard to murmur; and her last hours were hours of peace and holy resignation. She passed away as one falling into a peaceful sleep, as one who is weary sinks into the sweetness of rest. Only two children are left to mourn her departure and cherish her memory: Mrs. Clore, of Hebron, Ky., a member of the church at Mt. Pleasant, and Mrs. Casey, of Richmond, Va. She was born September 29th, 1814.

"Calm on the bosom of her God

Her spirit resteth now;
E'en while with ours her footsteps trod
His seal was on her brow.

"Dust to its narrow house beneath,
Soul to its place on high;
They that have seen her look in death
No more may fear to die."

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

POETRY.

DIVINE SYMPATHY.

Yes, Jesus wept! O why should he thus grieve?
His grief was real, this we must believe.
'Twas real sorrow caused those tears to start;
'Twas real compassion moved his tender heart.
Yes, Jesus wept! O may that sacred word
Sweet consolation to our hearts afford;
And while we pass through sorrow, grief
and care,
Be comforted to find our Lord was there.
And has he changed? Does he no longer care
For his dear children, nor their sorrow
share?
Did I say share? He kindly takes the whole,
And bids them on him all their sorrows roll.
How sweet to know, though now upon his throne,
He wears a body such as we shall own!
A great High Priest, who can our sufferings feel:
Who sympathizes with his children still.
He knows the power of our old subtle foe;
He knows the force with which temptations blow;
He knows the constant perils we are in;
He knows the strength we need to conquer sin.
What though afflictions now our spirits toss!
What though of all things we shall suffer loss!
No real evil can our souls betide
If Jesus but our trembling spirits guide.
If he but guide we shall be safe indeed;
The strongest foe shall not our course impede.
The fiercest storm shall yield an inward calm
If we by faith can view him at the helm.
But O, alas! how oft are we like those Who were with him when that fierce storm arose,
And Jesus slept amid the stormy scene,
And yet controlling all by power unseen.
His eyelids his disciples sorely tried;
Worn out with fruitless toil, at last they cried,
"Lord, save us, or we perish!" He awoke;
To wind and waves those powerful words
he spoke:
"Peace, peace; be still!" and all was hushed and calm.
Dear Savior, may we still thy voice discern,
Till we, supported by thy strength alone, Shall reach that land where sorrow is unknown.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DILLEY, Oregon.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS:—The following was written after attending the Siloam Association, which convened with the church called Cedar Creek, situated in Clackamas County, Oregon, June 29th, 1892.
To the children of the most high God who are scattered throughout the length and the breadth of this vale of sin and sorrow, I would send christian salutation. Out of the fullness of my heart I must speak, and tell my people that I have been made to dwell in heavenly places, and to feel that God is all in all. O that I might express in language not to be mistaken my feelings, which are exultant, yet not boastful nor puffed up. Being weighed down with many cares, I had not thought it possible for me to attend our association this year, and tried to reconcile myself in the thought that duty plainly said I must stay at home; but as the time for holding meeting drew nigh the desire to attend grew to be so great that my heart felt ready to burst, and I could neither eat nor sleep well. At times tears would relieve me for a little time, and I would think reason had gained the mastery; but it would not be long until I felt as desirous to go as ever, and would often catch myself planning for us to attend, and leave the result with the Lord. I finally told my husband that it seemed as though I must go; and it seemed to me that life or death depended on his answer.
He told me that he had been thinking a great deal about it, and that I could as well go as not, and he would stay and take care of the children and our affairs, as he had attended last year. But no, that would not do; both must go, or I should stay at home. Immediately it seemed possible, and even easy, for us to arrange to go. But I must not make this tedious. We went, traveling more than forty miles with a horse and buggy, much of the road going over a succession of hills and ravines, and extremely rocky, while the heat was quite oppressive. Weary in body, we arrived at the place of entertainment on Thursday evening.
Even before we had stopped I recognized familiar faces among the groups gathered here and there, chatting pleasantly, and greeting each new arrival with beaming countenances. Among those I first recognized was the bowed form and hoary head of our much esteemed old brother and minister in the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, Elder John Stipp. Once more I was permitted to take by the hand the dear old soldier, who twenty-one years ago led me down into the watery grave, together with a dear sister whom I have not seen for many years. A few years later the same dear old brother united in marriage myself and my beloved companion, J. K.

Boyd. We joined the groups in turn, finding many pleasant surprises, and meeting many that I had never seen in the flesh. What a glorious time that was; and every one seemed prepared to feast on heavenly things, and to recognize in each other a kindred spirit. The preaching brethren present were Elders John Stipp, of Clackamas Co., W. S. Matthews, of Polk Co., V.
J. Turnage, of Yam Hill Co., Silas
Williams, of Linn Co., David Lilley, of Washington Co., Daniel Bridges, of Linn Co., brethren G. R. Gerard, of Linn Co., J. A. Grafton, of Multnomah Co., Amos Horner, of Clackamas Co., and Wm. J. Hess, of Goldendale, Washington.

O what preaching! No note of discord found lodgment there, but Jesus and him crucified was the theme of one and all. The image of our Savior seemed visible in the face of every brother and sister present.
What a hollow mockery all else seemed! Not one preached the works of the creature, but with one accord pointed to Jesus as the Redeemer, the Prince of peace. O what love was manifest throughout the entire meeting! We felt that Jesus was there; and we looked forward with dread to the time when we must separate, and return to the toils and vexations of this life. For a time the old or fleshly man was lost sight of under the divine influence felt by all. The Lord of lords and King of kings reigned supreme,
and the world looked on and mocked.
The worldlings even laughed aloud in derision at a set of "ignorant old fogy people," who could receive such hard things as gospel truth, shake hands, embrace and weep, because their hearts were full. But we cared not, and pitied their unbelief, knowing that they knew not what they did. We sang,

"I'm not ashamed to own my Lord,
Nor to defend his cause," &c.

Drawing our strength from our heavenly Father, without stint, we fed on the sincere milk of the word.
While in associate capacity, with one accord they denounced all worldly institutions as unsuited to the degree of God's people, and pernicious to the peace and welfare of our churches.

After each sermon a good old song was sung, every word seeming to have added meaning and to give new strength. With what zest we could sing,

"How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord,
Is laid for your faith in his excellent
word!
What more can he say than to you he hath said,
You who unto Jesus for refuge have fled?"

Not one of the dear saints could say anything in behalf of himself, but gloried in the thought that the love of the Father had saved his children;
yes, saved them with an everlasting salvation. O, my friends, my undying friends, do you understand me?
for it is the language of my heart.
Is it the language of a heaven-born child or not? It is all I know, and it has seemed sufficient. I have thought with great joy that I knew my people, but, alas! I am deceived, and am deceiving others, what a dreadful thought. But I cannot yet give way to doubts and fears, for I am still feasting to some extent on the blessed truth which the Father sent to his hungry children. I almost feel that I can never doubt so much again. O that Jesus might stay with us, for his presence disperses our gloom. This foretaste of heaven is sweeter and more precious than all the treasures of earth; and though all the world point the finger of scorn at us we are rich, in that we have an inheritance that fadeth not away, eternal in the heavens. Being assured that we have an Advocate with the Father, we ought with much patience to endure all manner of persecutions while in this time state, believing that afflictions are good for us, though grievous to bear. No, dear little children, we do not want to get entangled or wrapped up in the things of this world, for we have tried it just enough to know that it is not edifying to our souls nor to each other. We are told that God's grace is sufficient for us, and we know that it is. Did we not hunger, and he filled us? Did we lack anything? O no; we were content. He made us to seek after him, and we found him, even in a waste, howling wilderness; and his banner over us was love. There was no backbiting there, no jealousies, to mar the peace that pervaded the camp of the children of God. A dear brother once told me of a dream that opened his eyes to many things heretofore dark. He thought he saw a black, filthy pool of water, completely covered with a stiff, murky scum; and while he was wondering what it meant he saw faces pure and lovely, the filth having no effect at all upon them. While the filthy water was exceedingly obnoxious, the faces had all the loveliness of saints, which they represented; while the black, filthy pool was the fleshly nature, which is not born of incorruptible seed, and knows nothing of God nor godly things, but revels in that which is antagonistic to spiritual things. It struck me that here was something for me to think of; and I often do, when ready to take a brother or sister to task in my own heart. I love to think of it in connection with myself, and to feel that the many shortcomings and imperfections of my flesh will not contaminate the Spirit which dwells within. It is a glorious thought indeed, and one that should cheer and encourage in the time of despair, that the holy child of God cannot sin, being in fellowship with God. Then, seeing it is so, how easy it should be to reconcile all our difficulties with one another. None but God can take away the hard and stony heart, and give us one that can feel and understand these things. So long as we are cold and unfeeling we cannot enjoy the smiles of his face; but let him show his face and our troubles are forgotten, and we feast as "the wise and prudent" can never feast. Let us pray that he keep us from getting into this cold, indifferent condition again. There is no love there. We have tried it. His face was hid for a long time, we grew skeptical of each other, even of our brethren, and almost forgot that a heavenly relationship existed. The cares of this world crowded around thick and fast, and we had not time even to read a chapter in the Bible. We could not think about it if we did. We had worked hard all day, and we must rest at night, else we could not work to-morrow.

You see, brethren, I have been there, and groveled in darkness a long time. Is it any wonder that I rejoice in the light? I have often wished that we dwelt in caves, and fed on the fowls of the air and the fishes of the sea, that we might have more time to talk of our Father's kingdom. But I suppose that cares would still accumulate, for we have the promise, "In the world ye shall have tribulation." But be of good cheer, for ye are not of this world. O blessed thought, that we are not of this world. We look forward with an eye of faith to that place prepared for all the saints, when trouble in this life shall be swept away, and every eye shall be dried. Songs of praise pure and harmonious shall be sung, giving all honor and praise triumphant to the Father and the Son. There congregations shall never break up, and sabbaths never end.

Yours in the faith of God's elect,
MRS. J. K. BOYD.

SOUTHAMPTON, Pa., Sept. 11, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Will your please publish the inclosed letters from dear sister Attie A. Curtis? It seems that she has been much afflicted, and been made to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. It seems the Lord has been pleased to speak peace to her troubled soul, and there was a great calm. I was very much comforted in reading her letters, as I have been very low down of late.

Your sister in bonds of love,
R. F. HART.

BATH, Maine, Aug. 6, 1892.

MRS. R. F. HART—MY DEAR SISTER:—Your welcome letter came last evening, and it is with pleasure I take my pen to speak of many things to you, my dear sister, who have so kindly written me. I enjoyed a letter you wrote for the SIGNS, and thought I would write to you; but knowing myself so well, I did not have the courage. I asked our dear sister Bessie about you, and she wrote me loving words of you, and said you were not well and strong. I think I could sympathize with you, as it is now over twenty-one years since my health failed. No one thought I could live but a short time when first taken sick; but the Lord has spared my life all these many years, and filled them with so many blessings, I cannot thank and praise him enough. I have tried to write and speak of his goodness to me all the days of my life, and I often feel that I have told so little I have not touched the depth of it. There has been a good deal in my heart, both of joy and sorrow, which can never be expressed. The last five years I have gained in health, and was so much better last winter I hoped I should soon be able to meet the loved ones during cold weather. Then "La Grippe" made me a visit, and all spring and summer until the hot wave came I was feeling poorly. Now I am able to work some hours without resting, and hope to gain again. Last Saturday I had the privilege of going to North Berwick, and heard Elder Keene preach three sermons Sunday, and enjoyed every one of them. He preached Jesus Christ and him crucified. That is what I love to hear, love to sing, and love to talk about. I can speak of Jesus as the Savior of his people, and their perfect safety, no matter how far down in the depths I may be. The blessed assurance abides with me that his people are saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation; and the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, "The Lord knoweth them that are his." O yes, dear sister, not a doubt comes into my mind concerning this "seal," "The Lord knoweth them that are his." What causes me anxious thought is, Am I one of the chosen vessels of mercy? The Lord has blessed me richly, in leading me into the green pastures and beside the still waters, so my cup runneth over. It is twenty years this month since I was buried in baptism, and they have passed very quickly, quietly and peacefully, with the exception of four years, when I went down, down into the deep waters, and saw the works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep. My soul was melted because of trouble. But my cry was unto the Lord, for there was no other to help me. He did bring me out of my distress, made the storm a calm, so the waves thereof were still. I was glad because the waves were quiet, and he did bring me to my desired haven. "O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" The last two years I have felt so much as I did when the evidence of sins forgiven and love to the brethren was shed abroad in my heart. Jesus has been my joy and my song all the day long. It has been sweet and joyful to tell my brethren what great things he has done for me. These words at times seem to be in my heart, "I will declare thy name unto my brethren. In the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee." I have no desire to sing the Lord's praise in the world; but I do desire, more than I can express, to sing his praise to those I love so well in the truth. I have been led in such a plain path. I know I cannot sing one note of praise unless God puts the new song into my mouth. I shall always find it new, and every time it will be "praise unto God." My dear sister, I know I am vile, sinful, and no good thing can be found dwelling in my flesh. I know the sorrow felt in the soul when all this spiritual joy is taken away, and "all is dark, and vain, and wild." I can say, I am glad I know this, for it makes me realize more fully that this sweet joy and peace does not spring from the flesh. It is the fruit of the Spirit. I am very glad you have written to me, and I hope this letter will not make you wish to never hear from me again. I have loved dear sister Bessie's name even before I was brought into the church, and I have taken more comfort than I can ever tell in writing to her the last two years. She has been so kind to allow me to write when I felt like it, and her letters to me have contained many precious things. I hope it will be the Lord's will for us to meet face to face. I have enjoyed writing this letter to you, because you have been in my mind, and I have talked with you. I know it will not seem, when I look it over, as my thoughts and feelings have been while writing. If I could write better I would; but if I try again it will be no better than this. My parents enjoyed your letter with me. I hope you will write again soon, so I can enjoy another talk with you about the precious things of the kingdom of God. May God make us meek and lowly, is the desire of your unworthy sister.

Love to all the saints whom you meet.

BATH, Maine, Sept. 8, 1892.

MRS. R. J. HART—DEAR SISTER:—A letter from sister Bessie this morning tells me you wish to have my letter to you published in the SIGNS. I cannot remember what I wrote to you that should make you have such a wish; but I would not dare tell you that you must not send it to the brethren Beebe; for if there is anything in it which you think will be of interest to the children of God, you have my consent, given cheerfully and willingly. I know the Lord must have directed my thoughts and pen, and all the praise is his. In and of myself I am nothing, less than nothing, and vanity. If I wrote anything like exalting the creature, I know brethren Beebe will not allow it a place in the SIGNS. I have full confidence in their judgment. I have been led in a way I knew not, and if I am not wholly deceived, I desire to be found ever speaking and writing of what the Lord has done for me. There is a name which is more precious to me than gold, silver, precious stones, or anything this world can give. Jesus is the name I love to have exalted, and I rejoice with joy unspeakable when the Lord leads my mind into the truth and makes me know that it pleased the Father that all fullness should dwell in Jesus. Then I see my worthiness, righteousness, redemption, wisdom and sanctification. I do not know of anything else I need. A finished salvation causes me to sing of Jesus all the day long. I suppose you will be surprised at the coming of this letter, but I could not write to any one else until I obeyed the impression. I must close, although I like to talk with you, even if we are strangers in the flesh. The love of God in our hearts has brought us very near each other. In love and fellowship your sister, ATTIE A. CURTIS.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—VERY DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—I desire a little space in your columns once more, having been requested by some of our dear kindred in Christ to write for publication. I will express such thoughts as may occur to my mind. Just eleven years ago to-day I took up my cross and followed our dear Savior into the liquid stream. I was baptized by my dear uncle, and our beloved brother, Elder Wm. Grafton, in Harford Co., Maryland. To-day finds me far away from the place of both my natural and spiritual birth. "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." These two principles are as opposite as any two can be; and while to be carnally (or fleshly) minded is death, to be spiritually minded is joy and peace. The fruits of these are just as much in opposition as the principles themselves; therefore "they that are in the flesh cannot please God." For "the carnal mind is enmity against God; for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." Therefore Paul could say, "I find a law in my members [flesh], warring against the law of my mind [spirit], and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, which is in my members;" by reason of which he was made to cry out, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" None but the living children of God ever did or ever will know anything of this experience of the apostle. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing." "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." For "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of [natural] man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit." Then in vain do men try to search out the mysteries of the kingdom, since they are hid from the wise and the prudent, and revealed unto babes. A host of other Scriptures might be produced to prove the doctrine of salvation by grace. "You hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and in sins," &c. How beautiful it is when we are enabled by the grace of God to stand still and see the salvation of the Lord. A man might as well go to the grave yard and preach to the dead there to turn to God and live, as to preach to sinners dead in sins to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. This also is the work of the Lord, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent. A great deal is being said by the Arminian world of to-day about believing in the Lord Jesus. O how little importance they attach to the word believe. The flesh is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. Let us take the child from the cradle, and follow it through all its Sunday school teaching, and all of its fond parental training, and what have we but a body of flesh instructed in the mere letter of the word? No man can call Jesus Lord, save by the Holy Ghost. Then to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, to believe he is the Son of the living God, requires nothing less than the revelation of Christ himself. For no man knoweth the Son, save the Father; and no man knoweth the Father, save the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him. When Peter was asked by our Savior, "whom do men say that I am?" his answer went to show that while men truly believed that he was some notable man, they were of divers opinions; some saying he was one of the prophets, and some another. But when Peter was asked, "Whom do ye say that I am?" he could answer (by the Holy Ghost), "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Then comes the precious language of our dear Lord and Master, "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jonah; for flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." In the beginning of this letter I quoted, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." These, I say, are contrary the one to the other. Thus the great conflict that is continually going on with the poor tempted child of God, who has received the spirit of truth, which the world cannot receive. The promise to all such is, that in the world they shall (not may) have tribulation; but in Jesus they shall (not may) have peace. But be of good cheer, for Jesus has overcome the world. Then happy are we if we suffer with him; for if we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him, and thus be brought off more than conquerors through him that loved us. "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." "That which is born of the flesh is flesh," and consequently knows nothing of the many crosses and afflictions that you, dear saint, are called to pass through. They that are born of the Spirit know that in them, that is, in their flesh, there dwells no good thing. While they that are only born of the flesh have no good thing dwelling in the flesh, yet they are without any knowledge of this fact. On the contrary, they are continually boasting of the good deeds they can and are doing to help God save themselves and others also. The apostle Paul gives the true condition of all of Adam's race, and says that we, including himself, are no better (by nature) than they. He says, "There is none righteous, no, not one; there is none that understandeth; there is none that seeketh after God. They are all gone out of the way; they are together become unprofitable. There is none that doeth good, no, not one. Their throat is an open sepulchre; with their tongues they have used deceit. The poison of asps is under their lips, whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. Their feet are swiftness to shed blood. Destruction and misery are in their ways, and the way of peace they have not known. There is no fear of God before their eyes."—Rom. iii. 10-18. Such is the condition of "that which is born of the flesh." A horrid picture indeed when the light of God's eternal truth shines in the heart and gives the knowledge of the glory of God as revealed in the face of Jesus Christ. O what a contrast! Is it any wonder Paul should say, "We know the law is spiritual; but I am carnal, sold under sin?" I say, is it any wonder, when such a sink of sin presents itself, as the human heart really is, which is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked? It is when we have such a glimpse as this that we can say with the poet,

"And if my soul were sent to hell, Thy righteous law approves it well."
O then, dear saints, let us rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh, for "it is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing." "They that are in the flesh cannot please God." O no; there is no fear of God before their eyes; and there is none that understandeth; yet Job could say, "The fear of the Lord is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding," without which it is impossible to please God. But, blessed be God our Savior, "as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

"A few more rolling suns at most Will land you on that heavenly coast,
Where you shall sing the song of grace,
And see your glorious hiding-place."

It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but when we see him, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. O rapturous thought! no more to groan, or weep, or sigh; for there our glorious Lord will wipe all tears from our eyes, and sorrow and sighing shall be no more. This vile body will be changed, and made like unto his glorious body. Yes, dear saints, we hope for nothing less, and who could hope for more?

"Your harps, ye trembling saints, Down from the willows take;
Loud to the praise of Christ our Lord Bid every string awake."

"Though in a foreign land,
We are not far from home;
And nearer to our home above
We every moment come."

Dear brethren, I have written the above in much affliction of both body and mind. I am a constant sufferer. I am only delivered from one fiery trial to enter into another. I am trying to discharge the duty the church has laid upon me, with such ability as the good Lord gives me, and try to speak from eight to ten times a month at different places. There are only a handful of followers of the meek and lowly Jesus in these parts, but so far I know all are at peace in the Siloam Association. We have precious meetings monthly at the several churches, for which we desire to feel thankful to the great God of Jacob. With love in the Lord to all who love our Lord Jesus Christ, I am a poor sinner saved by grace, and your brother in hope of eternal life,

MACOMB, Ill., Sept. 14, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I forward you for publication in the SIGNS extracts from letters from Mrs. Belle Henman, of Orrsburg, Mo., to her father, Deacon Isaac Holeman, of Avon, Ill. Her full maiden name was Alice Bellzona Holeman, and she was baptized by Elder B. F. Querry, in the fellowship of New Hope Church, in October, 1889, together with five other females, three of whom were daughters of the writer. On December 25, 1889, I solemnized the marriage rite between her and Mr. Charles Henman, and they are now in Missouri.

I hope you will publish the following.

I. N. VANMETER.

DEAR FATHER:—I will try to write a few lines, in answer to your most gladly received letter. I was very glad as I ever am, to hear from home. * * * A week ago last Sunday was our meeting, a very good meeting. Elder Roe was present, and preached both before and after noon. I enjoyed his preaching. It was their communion day, and, father, it is the first time I have partaken since the day I was baptized. O! it was a solemn occasion to me. I was made to see the blessed Savior hanging on the cross, and to see the blood flowing from his wounds, and myself such a miserable, sinful creature. Am I worthy of touching his broken body and shed blood? And as my sins rose up before me, I almost shrank from touching it.

Emma said in her letter that brother Querry is to be with you next meeting. How I would love to be there. Give him my christian love, and tell him I would love to see him, and shall never forget him, or the day he led me down to the watery grave, O what a solemn, glorious time! And I realized the fulness of God's love. "What wonderous love is this, O my soul!"

Father, as I have commenced thus, I will try in my feeble way to write a little of my experience. I have many doubts as to whether it is a true christian experience, it seems such a poor one to me. Ever since I have been old enough to know anything, I knew a person to become a christian must have some change of heart; but I never realized what a poor, helpless, sinful mortal I was until the day mother went forward and was received into the church. When she was received a voice said to me so plainly, "Your mother has gone where you cannot follow." O what anguish filled my soul! I burst out weeping, not for mother (she was safe), but for poor, lost, unworthy me. I left the meeting-house in a cloud of darkness that seemed to dull the brightness of the sun. This was in June, 1885. From that time I seemed like a wanderer in the dark wilderness. Each day seemed to grow darker and darker, and I was friendless. I felt like everybody hated me. Every body seemed to be my enemy. Poor, miserable, sinful, despised me, who could have any love or friendship for such a creature? I saw myself so corrupt, so vile, that I did not expect the least friendship from any one. I remained in this condition, the darkness growing more and more dense, and myself more miserable and despised. I would cry unto God for mercy, and try to pray, but O! there was no mercy for such as I. I went to stay a few months

THE GIFT OF LOVE.

"FOR God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved."—John iii. 16, 17.

Although this subject has been repeatedly discussed in our columns, both by our correspondents and editorially, requests are received from time to time, for views in regard to the meaning designed by our Lord in uttering this statement of the object for which he was sent into the world. It is not with the expectation of presenting the matter more clearly than it has already been expressed, nor of startling our readers with new light upon it, that we again endeavour to write in compliance with the wishes of those who have asked for our views on the true construction of this teaching of Jesus. However it may expose the falsehood of our most cherished theories, it must be admitted that this teaching of our Lord is the truth of God. Therefore it is of the utmost importance to rightly understand what is taught in this expression of Jesus. There can be no benefit resulting to any one from misconstruing this or any portion of the inspired record. O! that every disciple of our Redeemer could rightly discriminate between the truth as it is in Christ Jesus and the doctrines and commandments of men! It would relieve them of much anxiety, and dispel many doubts and unbelieving fears. Under the guidance of the Spirit of truth, may it be our privilege to examine this text in connection with the wonderful teaching of Jesus, of which it is a part.

It the first verse of our text is declared the cause for which the Son of man must be lifted up, as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness. The occasion when the type was manifested in the wilderness was when the Lord sent fiery serpents to destroy the murmuring Israelites. Then much people of Israel died from the bite of those serpents. But every one who was bitten, when he beheld the serpent of brass was delivered from death. That serpent was lifted up by Moses at the commandment of the Lord; and its erection was not suggested by any of the learning which Moses had been taught in Egypt. It was by this type that the crucified Savior was shown through faith to the subjects of salvation under that shadowy dispensation. The serpent in the type was the image of those deadly enemies by whom death was visited upon the rebellious Israelites. So the Son of man was made sin for the deliverance of his spiritual Israel from the power of sin, which in a more terribly fatal sense had bitten every one whom Jesus came to redeem from death, and to ransom them from the power of the grave. That event in the wilderness did not cause the suffering of Christ; it was only ordered that the brazen serpent should be thus lifted up, in order that it might fitly represent the manner of death to which Jesus must be subjected. Reason would never have devised such an expression of that great love with which God loved his chosen people even when they were dead in sin. Such infinite grace cannot be comprehended by the mind of man even when it is plainly declared in the revealed testimony of Jesus. However much the vileness and pollution of the conscious rebel against divine holiness, may cause him to doubt the reality of the interest he claims in the love of God, no question can ever be raised in regard to the reality of the love with which the perfect Son of God is loved by the eternal Father. The infinite fullness of that love is attested by the subjection of all the angels under him. Nothing in all the creation of God is exempted from the commandment to worship the only begotten Son. The stormy tempest and the rolling seas obeyed his word even when in his humiliation he learned obedience by the things which he suffered. In the hour and power of darkness, at his word more than twelve legions of angels were subject to his call. But the same inconceivable love which put all things under him, was manifested in appointing that he should be made sin for the salvation of his people from their sins. "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up." The object for which this appointment of God is designed is stated to be "That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." It would display the height of folly in a finite creature to make such a vast sacrifice for the accomplishment of a desired end, without the certainty of attaining the result for which it was made. Yet mortals are subject to disappointment in all their undertakings, because of their limited wisdom and power. These infirmities do not interfere with the execution of the design of God. Since he declares the end from the beginning, there can be no failure of the fulfillment of his eternal purpose. No other motive is revealed as moving God in the matter of saving his chosen people, except that which is stated by the inspired Paul, "But God who is rich in mercy, FOR HIS GREAT LOVE wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ, (by grace ye are saved;) and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, that in the ages to come he might show the exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus."—Eph. ii. 4-7. This "great love" being eternal, it cannot be dependent upon any attraction in the object of it, as is the case with all natural love. On the contrary, it is for the manifestation of this infinite perfection of his own holiness that all the universe was brought into existence. "For by him (the "dear Son" of the "invisible God") were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by him and for him; and he is before all things, and by him all things consist."—Col. i. 16, 17. Having declared the only way of salvation from sin by the sacrifice of himself, Jesus presents in our text the principle upon which God had ordained this living way.

"For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Even sound natural reason cannot construe this language as authorizing the doctrine of conditional salvation. Either the purpose of God in this wonderful gift was accomplished; or, it was not. If his design was the salvation of the whole natural world, then there is no possibility that one sinner is saved without the salvation of every one of the same whole world. The gift of his Son was effectual in the case of all, or it failed in the case of all for whom he was given. It is absurd to claim that the price paid for a hundred sheep bought some of them, while it was not sufficient to buy them all. But the inspired record plainly declares that some sinners are "Set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire."—Jude 7. As this was written two thousand years after the destruction of the cities spoken of, it could not simply signify the manner in which they were overthrown. Certainly, they were not saved from perishing by the gift of the Son of God. But if the natural world was the object of that love of God which was attested in the gift of his Son, the failure of that gift to prevent the perishing of those sinners, would necessarily include the failure to save any others. But the world for whom Jesus gave himself a ransom, have everlasting salvation in him. When he was about to be slain he prayed for the sanctification of those whom he had kept, all of whom were given him of his Father. He expressly declared, "I pray for them; I pray not for the world, but for them which thou hast given me; for they are thine." Instead of including all the world in this gift of the Father to our Redeemer, the testimony of revelation describes them as "a very small remnant." This is the same which is designated as a "remnant according to the election of grace."—Isa. i. 9; Rom. xi. 5. It cannot be that God loved the world of those against whom he has indignation forever.—Mal. i. 4. Neither did he give his only begotten Son that Edom and Babylon should not perish, but have everlasting life. The same judgment of divine righteousness by which the Redeemer is justified, includes with him all for whom he gave himself a ransom. In him every one of them is judged, and in him they are condemned, or in him they are approved by the holy law of God. It was not needful that Jesus should come under the law for the condemnation of sinners; the whole family of Adam was under condemnation from the instant when sin entered into the world by the first transgression. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin."—Rom. v. 12. Since all the family of Adam was in him when he transgressed the commandment of his Creator, it necessarily follows that the guilt of that sinful act rests upon all his children. Every child of Adam must inherit what the parent possessed. Sin brought him under the power of death; and he could leave to his children nothing but death as their heritage in him. Wherever death reigns it is certain that sin is its sting. Where there is no sin there can be no death. Hence Paul cites the universal reign of death from Adam to Moses as conclusive demonstration that the first transgression was the sin of all the race of man. It cannot be in the natural character of man that God loved the world, for God does not love sin. That love embraces nothing less holy than the God in whom it originates. No pollution can be the object of that love which is in itself the very purity of God. Herein is the mystery of godliness, which can never be understood by reason, neither can it be known except by the revelation which is shown to the faith of the children of God. The subjects of divine grace were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world, that they should be holy and without blame before him in love. This was not for any worth or merit in themselves; for they were by nature the children of wrath even as others. The sovereign will of God was not influenced by anything which might occur in time, since it was for the manifestation of this great love that all the material creation was brought into existence. Only in his own immutable will can be revealed the fountain of this great love. There is no tracing its beginning, since it is older than time.

Revelation goes no further than the eternal counsel of the will of God in showing the origin of his electing love. It has never been changed either in its nature or in the object on which it is fixed. In the beginning the love of God chose all the members of the body of the Redeemer that they should be holy and without blame before him in love. This is the world which he loved so that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. There is no scriptural authority for the idea that the love of God was ever fixed upon any of the material creation which was made by his power. All the things which were made are alike the product of his creative word; and his care in providence is as much over the most insignificant worm as over the loftiest angel in the heaven of glory. Since all things were made alike for his own purpose, there can be no atom so minute but that he has appointed the precise point for it to occupy; and since all power is his, there can be nothing to resist his sovereign pleasure in working all things after the counsel of his own will. The manner in which he loved the world is shown by the amazing gift of his only begotten Son; and that gift certainly was not bestowed in vain. The love of God never was centered upon any other object but his dear Son; and the world was loved only as it was seen by infinite wisdom as embraced in Christ Jesus who is head over all to the church, which is his body and the fullness of him that filleth all in all.—Eph. i. 23. The sin of this world whom God loved was taken away by the Lamb of God, as declared by John the Baptist.—John i. 29. Well might the inspired apostle say, "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God! therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not."—1 John iii. 1. Evidently the world which knows not the saints, is not the same world which God so loved that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." The same word "world" is used in the Scriptures as designating the natural creation, the race of man, and the whole election of divine grace. The connection always determines in which sense it is to be understood. The following verse specifies the world to which our Lord referred in this declaration of the love of God.

"For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved." Necessarily this purpose of God must have been accomplished, since both the wisdom and the power are in him. Nothing less than undisguised atheism can deny that "Our God is in the heavens; he hath done whatsoever he hath pleased."—Psalm cxv. 3. It is vain to argue with any opposer of this truth, since the blindness which cannot see the plain testimony of inspiration cannot be enlightened by any arguments of mortals. To the believer in Jesus it is clear that the work which the Son of God was sent to do was finished by him. If there was any defect in that service which he was sent to render, not only has there never been any sinner saved, but he is himself still under the power of death. Such blasphemy is too manifestly absurd for consideration. But there is no middle ground between the flat denial of the fulfillment of the purpose of God, as declared in our text, and the confession that the world specified is completely saved through him who came to save that which was lost. However it may be doubted by the saint whether he is included in that world which is saved through the Son of God, there is no uncertainty about the accomplishment of all that God designed by the suffering and death of his Son. The next sentence immediately following our text definitely explains who it is that God sent his Son to save. "He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God. And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." The fact that those who believe are not condemned is not the result of their believing; but their believing is conclusive testimony that they have received the gift of the Holy Ghost, by which they have the indwelling witness of that living faith, which is "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."—Heb. xi. 1. Believing is the result of evidence; and in no case can it depend upon the will of the believer. Even in regard to natural things it is impossible to believe without satisfactory proof; and when that proof is presented to the mind it is impossible to refrain from believing. This truth being recognized, the connection is manifest between this teaching of Jesus and the announcement in the preceding context, in which he says, "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." The natural birth cannot develop that holy faith by which alone it is possible to believe in the only begotten Son of God. Only such as "were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God," can bear this peculiar mark. The world of them who believe, is that new creation of which God declared by the prophet, "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth." And Peter says, "We, according to his promise look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." This is that "world to come," of which the witnesses of gospel truth speak in all their testimony of salvation by grace. The love of God embraces all his chosen people in Christ Jesus as constituting this new creation; and that same eternal love which is revealed in the unspeakable gift of his Son, has chosen every one of his members in him. They are sealed with the holy Spirit of promise, and that sure seal secures their final salvation from the bondage of corruption under which they now groan. This world is saved both temporally and eternally alone through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, the only begotten Son of God.

REVELATION II. 17.

ELD. BENTON JENKINS—DEAR BROTHER:—Will you please give your views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on Rev. ii. 17, and oblige a sister?

"He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it."

The subject of this address is the church in Pergamos. The speaker is Jesus Christ, who is "the faithful witness, the first begotten of the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth;" who "hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; who "hath the sharp sword with two edges;" for "out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations."

We understand the seven churches of Asia to represent the varied phases of the church of Jesus Christ throughout the gospel dispensation. While there are seven distinct messages to the seven churches, yet there are certain things said to all of them. First, "I know thy works." Second, "Him that overcometh." Third, "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." It is a comforting thought that the Lord knows all about his people; that his eye is ever upon them; that he knows all their trials and persecutions; that he is never deceived, but knows all their works; that he knows how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished. As many as he loves, he rebukes and chastens. It is as true of them as of their Head, "The enemy shall not exact upon him, nor the son of wickedness afflict him."—Psa. lxxxix. 22. Death nor hell can do no more than what God has determined. He has ordained all their tribulation and sorrows, and he knows when it is best to deliver them out of them all. When he opens, none can shut; and when he shuts, none can open. This God is the God they adore, who is faithful, and will not suffer them to be tried above that they are able; for as their day, so shall their strength be.

The words, "Him that overcometh," indicate that the saints in every age of the gospel dispensation are in a state of conflict, having enemies within as well as without. Even though the fires of persecution from without are not kindled against them, yet they find a continual conflict within, a warfare, the flesh lusting against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh, which are contrary the one to the other, so that they cannot do the things that they would. What pen or tongue can fully describe the fierceness of that conflict which at times is felt in the breast of the christian, who would do the will of God, and walk worthy of his vocation, but finds himself often out of the way, and in possession of a carnal mind, which is enmity against God, not subject to his law, neither indeed can be? But trying as this conflict is, it identifies them as the people of God, as the followers of Jesus, and companions of those who through faith and patience inherit the promises. The apostle says, "Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." What are all the persecutions from enemies without, in comparison with the persecution which the christian encounters from those enemies which dwell in his flesh? But cheer up, ye tried and persecuted children, for you are safe in the hand of him whom the seas obey, and all your conflicts will soon end in everlasting rest, in that eternal port where storms shall never come.

"He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches;" for what the Spirit saith, it saith unto the churches; none others have an ear to hear the communications of the Spirit. Jesus said to the carnal Jews, "Why do ye not understand my speech? even because ye cannot hear my word. Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do." If any have an ear to hear the communications of the Spirit to the churches of the saints, if the character and words of Jesus are precious and sweet to them, it is incontestible evidence that the Spirit speaks to them, and dwells in them, and has sealed them as the members of Jesus. The privilege of all such is to eat the children's bread, and to follow the Lamb whithersoever he has led the way. What the Spirit saith to the churches is nothing more or less than what it saith in the experience of the individual members of the body of Jesus. Jesus says to all such, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." How many there are to-day standing without the fold, earnestly desiring the fellowship and companionship of the gospel church, yet fearing to ask for admission there, lest they may be deceived in regard to their real standing before God and their hope in his mercy. But that very feeling of fear and trembling is evidence of the indwelling Spirit. Such do not desire to do the lusts of the devil, but long for holiness, for conformity to the likeness of the Savior, to hear his voice, and to walk as he walked. There is no question about the condition and standing of such as hunger and thirst after righteousness, and have an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. The Spirit and the bride say to all such, "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord; why standest thou without?"

Although this church in Pergamos was dwelling where Satan's seat was, and was subjected to the bitter persecution of her enemies, yet she still held fast the name of her gracious and loving Redeemer, and would not deny the faith, "even in those days wherein Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth." Like their blessed Master, they were despised and rejected by worldly religionists, and treated with the utmost indignity and contempt, and some of them put to death. But none of these things moved them, neither counted they their own lives dear unto them. They doubtless rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer shame and reproach for the dear Redeemer's sake. From time to time the earth has been drenched with the flood of the followers of the Lamb of God, even by the hands of those who have claimed to be the "defenders of the faith" of Jesus Christ, the Prince of peace, who said to Pilate, "My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews; but now is my kingdom not from hence." The true church, the pillar and ground of the truth, has never taken the sword of man to defend their faith, nor persecuted their enemies. The saints have ever been like lambs in the midst of wolves, preferring to suffer death rather than take up carnal weapons to defend their persons or their principles. Alas! what mankind are capable of when under the power and influence of carnal religion. Alas! what has sin done, to make men such monsters of cruelty, a curse to one another instead of a blessing. The dear Redeemer never used anything that had even the appearance of force or violence, except on one occasion; and that was to drive wicked men out of the temple of God, and not to drive them to a profession of discipleship.

Notwithstanding the commendation of this church by the Redeemer, for standing fast in the time of trial and persecution, yet he said he had a few things against her. How faithful is the dear Redeemer in pointing out the short-comings and rebuking his people for their sins. Those who are truly our friends, and love us, will tell us our faults for our own good; and if we are in a proper spirit we will appreciate their faithfulness. The wise man has said, "Open rebuke is better than secret love. Faithful are the wounds of a friend; but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful." The dear Redeemer rebukes his people in faithfulness and love, and then kisses them with the kisses of his mouth. "His mouth is most sweet; yea, he is altogether lovely. This is my beloved, and this is my friend, O daughters of Jerusalem." "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth; for thy love is better than wine." After withering under the rebukes of our Beloved, how sweet are those kisses of his mouth, those sweet words of his lips, "Thou art mine." "Whom I love I rebuke and chasten."

Alas! how seldom, if ever, is the church of Christ found walking in perfect gospel order. "How few, alas! approved and clear." The written history of the churches of Galatia proves to us that a gospel church may wander very far from the truth, become bewitched by legal teachers, and yet be regarded as a gospel church in disorder. What a serious heresy was embraced by those churches of Galatia, who ignored the Redeemer and his atonement, and accepted the heresy of the Judaizing teachers among them, saying that they could not be saved except they were circumcised and kept the law of Moses. Yet the apostle called them his brethren, and in love and faithfulness labored to restore them; and his labors were not in vain.

The Redeemer charges the church at Pergamos with holding the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication. "So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which thing I hate. Repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of my mouth."

Balaam had been dead fully fifteen hundred years, but his doctrine was found in this gospel church, and may be found at times yet, even in the churches of the saints. It is not our purpose to discuss the real character of Balaam, as to whether he had any real knowledge of God. It is said by inspiration that he loved the wages of unrighteousness; and it is not difficult to-day to find those who are like him in this respect, and possibly among the Lord's people, judging from the conduct of some who are called Baptists. All his power seemed to consist in magic and cursing. It is said that the Hebrews believed Balaam knew the true God, and was a true prophet, but was corrupted by avarice. The apostle Paul tells us that some of the saints, through avarice, or the love of money, which is the root of all evil, have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition." Balaam advised Balak to seduce the Israelites to transgress against Jehovah, with the holiness of whose nature Balaam at least seems to have been acquainted. There is certainly something peculiar in the account of Balaam's divinations. "When he saw that it pleased the Lord to bless Israel, he went not, as at other times, to seek for enchantments."—Num. xxix. 1. It would appear that he pretended to intercourse with spiritual existences, who furnished him with supernatural intelligence, and who therefore could perform extraordinary feats of destruction. What he could not effect against Israel by force, he accomplished by fraud. This pretence to supernatural powers has had professors and followers in every age, down to the present time, and some of the Lord's people have been led away by them. The Israelites who were betrayed by Balaam were slain by their brethren who continued unperverted; and Balaam, the author of it, was involved in the slaughter of the Midianites. "And Israel abode in Shittim, and the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab. And they called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods; and the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods. And Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor, and the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel," &c.—Num. xxv. 1-3. When the churches of the saints join with and partake with the daughters of spiritual Babylon, and eat of those things which are sacrificed to their numerous idols, they are then guilty of spiritual fornication.

"So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitans, which thing I hate." It is said in profane history that the Nicolaitans allowed a community of wives, and made no distinction between ordinary meats and those offered to idols; also, they taught that lewdness and idolatrous sacrifices were lawful; that they might still be believers in Jesus, though they eat of things offered to idols. This kind of doctrine would naturally lead astray those who wished to gratify their carnal propensities. This doctrine was hateful to the Redeemer then, as it is now, and to all those who love righteousness and hate iniquity. "Repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of my mouth." The church, with her ministry, those who have an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches, are admonished to have no fellowship with such ungodly doctrines and characters. If after due course of labor those who walk disorderly cannot be reclaimed, they should be put away from the church. The church at Ephesus was told to repent, or else her candlestick would be removed out of his place.

"To him that overcometh" all the abominable doctrines named, withstands all the temptations, and continues steadfast in the faith, contending for the faith and order of the church of God, certain gracious promises are given. First, the Redeemer will give him to eat of the hidden manna. He shall enjoy sweet communion with the heavenly Lover. He shall eat of that bread which came down from heaven, of which if a man eat he shall never die. He shall know what is the answer of a good conscience toward God. He shall live by faith upon the Son of God, eating his flesh and drinking his blood. The reference is to that manna which at the command of God to Moses was put in a pot, and laid up before the Lord, of which we have a record in Exodus xvi. 32-35. "And Moses said, This is the thing which the Lord commandeth, Fill an omer of it to be kept for your generations, that they may see the bread wherewith I have fed you in the wilderness, when I brought you forth from the land of Egypt. And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a pot, and put an omer full of manna therein, and lay it up before the Lord, to be kept for your generations. As the Lord commanded Moses, so Aaron laid it up before the testimony, to be kept. And the children of Israel did eat manna forty years, until they came to a land inhabited." The inspired writer of the epistle to the Hebrews makes mention of this hidden manna, as among the typical things that were hidden within the vail of the temple.—Heb. ix. 4. This is one of the things, in the antitype, into which the hope of the saints enters. "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entered into that within the vail."—Heb. vi. 19. As the children of Israel were fed and sustained throughout all their wilderness journey by the manna which God rained down upon them, so those who overcome the temptations and trials, and the lusts of their flesh, have the promise of their gracious Redeemer that they shall be sustained and nourished through all their wilderness journey with spiritual food, and shall walk in the light of the countenance of their God.

"And will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." It is probable that there is in this an allusion to a custom among the ancients of giving a white stone to such as conquered in the Grecian games; also to the giving of a white stone to such as were acquitted in judgment. It was therefore an emblem of innocence and victory. In a spiritual sense it would denote that the saints to whom it is given shall be blessed with the manifest favor of the dear Redeemer, and shall feel that they have the tokens of his approval, as being free from those things which Jesus says he hates. Having the gift of Jesus, who is a white, a pure, a holy, a living, a tried and precious stone, they have all they can desire. While Jesus is a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense to certain characters, who know him not, to his beloved saints he is precious, the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely. Whatever else they might have given to them, without him they could not be satisfied and happy. To dwell in his manifest presence is heaven, fullness of joy, to his saints. One of them has sung, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee. My flesh and my heart faileth; but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion forever."—Psa. lxxiii. 25, 26. Having Jesus, we have the tokens of justification and eternal victory. Truly he is a white stone; and in him is a name written which no one can possibly know until by faith they have received him as the end of the law for righteousness; as the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of peace; for in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and all his members are complete in him.

"Jesus, my God, I know his name,
His name is all my trust;
Nor will he put my soul to shame,
Nor let my hope be lost."

"A new name." Doubtless there is in this expression an allusion to a custom almost as old as the world. It was the manner of kings and princes to give new names to those who held offices under them, particularly when they first attracted their notice and were taken into their employ; and when, subsequently, they were elevated to some new station, and crowned with additional honors. Pharaoh changed the name of Joseph to Zaphnath-paaneah, when he set him over all the land of Egypt. Another Pharaoh changed the name of Eliakim to Jehoiakim, when he elevated him. The Redeemer also gave new names to certain of his apostles. "Simon, son of Jona, thou shalt be called Cephas, which is by interpretation, A stone." "And James, the son of Zebedee, and John the brother of James, he surnamed them Boanerges, which is, The sons of thunder." But how shall we speak of the new name given to our gracious Redeemer? for a greater than Joseph or Eliakim is here. "Wherefore God hath also highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow; of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." "Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they." "And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS AND LORD OF LORDS." Whatever be the name of the great Redeemer, it covers all the redeemed family, as the name of the bride in marriage is covered by the name of the bridegroom. Thus we see that a new name given was a token of distinction and honor. How blessed is the condition of those who overcome the world, the flesh and the devil, having the seal of God upon them and in them, owned and indorsed by the dear Savior, and distinguished from all such as have the mark of the beast, or his image, or the number of his name. These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, and are without fault before the throne of God. As the new name in the white stone declares the finished work and perfect triumph of the Stone that God has laid in Zion for a foundation, who has gone up with a shout of victory, so shall all for whom he gave his life a ransom in like manner overcome, and sit with him in his throne.

"Such is the conqueror's reward,
Prepared and promised by the Lord;
Let him that hath the ear of faith
Attend to what the Spirit saith."

We submit the above thoughts to our anonymous correspondent, in the hope that they may be blessed of the Lord to her comfort, as well as to our readers generally with grandfather, and while there it seemed to be my duty to repeat the Lord's prayer every night; and I thanked God for watching over me through the day. But all this seemed to do my poor, lost soul no good; still it seemed I must repeat the Lord's prayer. I don't know just how long I kept this up, but one night in December I knelt by the side of my bed before retiring, to implore God once more to be merciful to me, a sinner, and to set my feet in the right way, and to show me the way of truth and righteousness; and, as usual, I repeated the Lord's prayer. I felt I had no friend on earth or in heaven. The darkness had got so thick I could not see. Before I had done imploring mercy, a light burst forth, making the heavens brighter than the noonday sun. I saw it plainly. It looked like a large star, many times, larger than the sun. I stopped and looked, and a voice said, "Arise." I got up, and my sins were all gone; the darkness disappeared. Everything seemed so bright in the midst of natural darkness, and a peace came over me that I never felt before. When I awoke in the morning everything was praising God and rejoicing. It was a new world to me. Old things had passed away. But I kept very still, and never let any one know my condition. After awhile I began to doubt. Had I received a change or not. Father, you know when I came home, when I went to meeting it seemed so different. I could understand the Scriptures better when they were expounded in the pulpit by the dear saints of God. Well, I went on having doubts and fears, and felt like it was my duty to be baptized; but what! To think of poor, sinful me going to the church and asking them to receive such a creature among the saints to be one of their number! I could not until that day, when sisters Susie V. and Mary Shields went forward. I felt like I ought to go too; but I was not ready, and was not fit. Something kept drawing, it seemed, toward the church. One voice would say, "Go;" the other, "You will deceive yourself, and most of all the church;" and that I could not do. I thought I would say something to sister Hills, and ask her advice; but a voice said, "No, I will stay away; I don't have to join unless I want to." But after I got to meeting and took my seat I found out different. The wind was blowing and howling through the windows, and a voice from the wind cried out to me all through the service, "Go, go, go, do your duty." At last, just before I went, it cried louder than ever. I felt if I did not go the house would fall on me, and I would perish. That settled the case. I had to go or die.

Well, father, I must conclude, as the children have waked. I hope you will forgive this poor scribble, as I have written in great haste. This is not worth reading, now that it is written; but it has relieved my mind. Father, I wish you would write some about the Bible to me. It would do me so much good. We could not send for the SIGNS this year, and I miss it so much. I have made so many blunders, I am ashamed of this. I hope you and mother will think a little of me at you meetings. I would love to be remembered by the brethren and sisters of the church, but do not feel worthy. I would love to see them all, and be with them, and my heart goes out to them in christian love every meeting.

Your most unworthy daughter,
BELLE.

BATAVIA, N. Y., Sept. 12, 1892.

DEAR BETHREN BEEBE:—I have often noticed that writers for the SIGNS frequently express themselves as not being able to find words to convey their thoughts. This, it seems to me, does not seem very strange, from the fact that many of the wonderful things in the spiritual kingdom of Christ cannot be expressed in the language of this world. Paul said, "I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago (whether in the body I cannot tell; or whether out of the body I cannot tell; God knoweth); how that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter." In the margin we read, "possible," for the word "lawful." It seems very plain that it was not possible for Paul to utter those "unspeakable words" which he heard in paradise. So I have thought it is for a similar reason that the children of God fail to express the love of God which they have felt in their hearts. I have been surprised, at times, to find that I could not express in words what seemed so clear in my experience. When the Spirit of God reveals to us that which "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him," in seems so easy to tell it to others, or write it to some brother; but when we make the attempt we fail to find words which rightly express the wonders and glories of the salvation which Christ has wrought out for his people. The things of the Spirit of God are spiritually discerned; and if we fail to receive the Spirit to reveal them to us, the Scriptures become a sealed book to us. The words, although they still have their natural meaning, fail to give us any spiritual comfort or instruction. I have been surprised when listening to a minister who has been evidently preaching in the spirit, at the wonderful gift which God has given to men in preaching the gospel of his salvation. It seems sometimes, when spiritual things are revealed through his ministers, that the children of God can go even beyond the mere words of the preacher, and read, as it were, "between the lines" the wonders of his grace and the power of his love. It then seems to matter very little whether these words are clothed in grammatical language or not. The eloquence of the speaker has nothing to do in giving the hungry soul the hidden manna. These things are spiritually discerned. It is not then surprising that the children of God fail to express the love of God which they have received and enjoyed. I recently had a letter from brother H. B. Elliott, in which he writes, "I would continue these few lines longer, but do not seem to express my feelings;" and yet his whole letter shows clearly that he has experienced the joys of salvation, and a personal interest in the redemption which is in Christ Jesus. But it would be useless for me to try to tell what the children of God receive and enjoy. It is beyond my feeble power to express, or my pen to describe. Others, far more able, have tried to express in words the spiritual joy in the finished salvation which Christ has wrought out for his people; but many have not been able to satisfy themselves in writing or speaking of it. We read in Matthew, "His name shall be called Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." In John we read, where Christ's prayer is recorded, "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." There can be no doubt, therefore, about the salvation of the people of God. It is a finished work; and Christ prayed, "Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou has given me." Now, when one has the assurance of a personal interest in such a salvation, can he find words to express his joy? But we have reason to thank God that we can enjoy the love of God, which is hidden from the world. We can be thankful also that we can express to others something of the mysteries of this love, so that we can have sweet fellowship with our brethren. God has given wonderful gifts to some of his children, for the profit of his church. Paul says of himself, "Wherefore I was made a minister, according to the gift of the grace of God given unto me by the effectual working of his power. Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; and to make all (men) see what is the fellowship of the mystery, which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God." These gifts should be highly prized by the church, as also the gift of a "ready writer." But, as I expressed myself to a precious brother in a letter a short time ago, I have never yet written any letter to my brethren, or to the SIGNS, with which I was entirely satisfied.

Yours in fellowship,

B. F. HAMILTON.

TO OUR DELINQUENTS.

IT IS a long time since anything has appeared in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES under the above caption; consequently a large number of our subscribers have become forgetful of their delinquency. Every one can tell just how his or her account stands by looking at the date next to their name on the printed slip pasted either on the margin of their paper or on the wrapper containing it. This date denotes when the subscription expired. Will our subscribers please each one look at their date, and all who find it in arrears send us a remittance, as we need the money to meet our heavy expenses? If you find you are a few months in arrears, and are not able to send the money now, but expect to be soon, do not order your paper discontinued, as we would prefer to carry the account for any reasonable length of time than to lose your patronage altogether.

MARRIAGES.

ON October 5th, 1892, by Elder Benton Jenkins, at the residence of the bride's mother, Mr. Henry Wollenhaupt and Miss Mary C. Jordan, all of Middletown, N. Y.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—At his residence in Uniontown, Bourbon Co., Kansas, on Tuesday, Sept. 13th, 1892, after a short illness of typhoid fever, Elder Thomas Jobe.

The deceased was born in Page Co., Va., Oct. 28th, 1849, and moved with his parents to Hancock Co., Ill., when four years old, and from there to Allen Co., Kansas, in 1870. He was united in marriage to Miss Laura Cummings in 1876, and removed in 1882 to Bourbon County, of which he was a continuous resident until called to reap the reward of the just and righteous. In 1873 he joined the Old School Baptist Church, entering soon afterward its ministry. He was widely known among its members in all parts of the United States, and had a short time before his death completed an able literary production in one of the standard publications of that church, having been appointed this year's valedictorian. As a man he was universally esteemed and respected by all who knew him, and had won the affections of a large number of friends, who feel that the loss cannot be retrieved.

The funeral services were held in the M. P. church-house at Uniontown, conducted by Elder Jones, of Drywood, and the earthly remains were laid to rest in the Drywood cemetery, twelve miles south of Fort Scott. The bereaved wife and relatives have the sympathy of a large number of friends.

Dear brethren Beebe, the above notice appeared in the Bronson Pilot, of this county. Yours in sorrow,

M. B. WEEDON.

FORT SCOTT, Kansas, Oct. 2, 1892.

ORDINATIONS.

THE Regular Primitive Baptist Church of Jesus Christ called Luckiamute, in Polk County, Oregon, being met at her monthly meeting on Saturday before the fourth Sunday in September, 1892, with a council of ordained helps from her sister churches, whom she had called together with the view (if deemed expedient) of ordaining two of her brethren to the work of the gospel ministry, to wit, J. M. LAWRENCE and A. J. JOHNSON, after due examination of both of them, and finding all things satisfactory, proceeded with the ordination.

The presbytery was composed of Elders Wm. S. Matthews, Vincent J. Turnidge and Silas Williams; also Deacons David Parker and Edward Loat.

Having organized by appointing Elder W. S. Matthews Moderator, and Edward Loat Clerk, proceeded in the following order:

Prayer by Elder Silas Williams.
Laying on of hands by the presbytery.
Charge by Elder Vincent J. Turnidge.
The right hand of fellowship was then given to both of the now ordained ministers by the presbytery, and by all the brethren and sisters present, while singing one of Zion's songs.

Thus were these dear brethren set apart to the special service of the Lord, and credential papers given them to that effect by this church.

VINCENT J. TURNIDGE.

ASSOCIATIONAL.

THE Salisbury Old School or Primitive Baptist Association will hold her session for 1892 with the Nassaongo Church, six miles southeast of Salisbury, commencing on Wednesday, October 19th, and continuing the two following days. We extend a cordial invitation to all lovers of truth, especially ministering brethren.

Those coming from the north and south will take the trains arriving at Salisbury about two o'clock on Tuesday, as the trains pass at that place. The depot of the Baltimore & Eastern Shore Road will be attended to on that day also. It would afford satisfaction to the friends if those who contemplate coming would drop a card to D. J. Staton, at Salisbury, Md. Then they would know when they were prepared for the occasion.

We are hoping for a pleasant and profitable season; and it will be such if our gathering together is in the name of the Lord.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

POETRY.

NOT SINAI, BUT CALVARY.

Nor to the mount of Sinai now—
Mercy in vain is look'd for there;
At Jesus' throne of grace I bow,
And seek his face by humble prayer.

Not to the fire—that awful sight;
Not to the trumpet's solemn sound,
Which did the prophet Moses fright,
And made the people tremble round.

But to the blood of Calvary sweet,
The blood that once atoned for sin;
To the besprinkled mercy-seat,
Where guilty sinners pardon win.

Gladly I come to Zion's hill,
The city of the God of grace;
The mount that God doth visit still,
That sacred spot, that holy place.

Poor sinner, dost thou guilty stand
Before a sin-avenging God?
See Jesus there, at his right hand,
Pleading his merits and his blood.

Fear not! he will not cast thee out;
The soul that doth toward him move
Is drawn by love, without a doubt,
And shall redeeming mercy prove.

HOMEWARD BOUND.

ONE eve, when all was hushed and still,
I musing leaned o'er my window-sill,
When my ear caught up a distant sound,
The burden of which seemed "Homeward bound."

I listened, listened, but all in vain,
To catch some words of the low, sweet strain;
I could only hear borne along with the sound
The joyous refrain, "We're homeward bound."

"We're homeward bound! we're homeward bound!"
O where can words dear as these be found
To the heart of the mariner far at sea,
Who longs with the loved on the land to be?

"We're homeward bound!" What words of cheer
To the weary, the sad and the suffering here!
They seem to say, when earth's ties are riven,
There's rest and home for the weary in heaven.

"We're homeward bound!" To those who weep
O'er the grass-grown graves where loved ones sleep,
How doubly sweet must be the sound Of the joyful words, "We're homeward bound!"

"We're homeward bound!" O words how meet
To weary souls with way-worn feet,
Bound for the home where waiting stands
A glorious house not made with hands.

"We're homeward bound!" To the dying saint,
When the eye grows dim and the pulse grows faint,
How dear are the words as he sinks to rest,
Falling sweetly asleep on Jesus' breast.

CORRESPONDENCE.

REISTERSTOWN, Md., Oct. 3, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—My mind has been led very often of late to contemplate the workings of that mind which is of the flesh in the believer, and also the many warnings against it which are recorded in the Scriptures; and this evening I feel like writing out a few reflections for the SIGNS in reference to this matter. We hear it said by inspiration that "great is the mystery of godliness." This is a truth which by christian experience is deeply impressed upon our hearts. But there is also another mystery, which by the same experience we find to be very great also, and that is "the mystery of iniquity;" and the child of God does not have to look outside of his own heart to become aware of this mystery. The old man of sin is not expelled from his heart; and while held in chains, so that he cannot exercise dominion over the believer, he yet makes his presence felt in every way, and causes a continual warfare within. All that is true of unregenerate men, so far as indwelling sin is concerned, is equally true of the believer. But the believer is aware of his evil heart, and abhors himself therefor, and daily repents in sackcloth and ashes, and desires to be free from the body of this death, and looks to Jesus as his only refuge and hope.

It is sorrowfully true that the seeds of all the ills that grow are sown in the nature of each one of us; and the evil that is in a child of God is the same kind of evil that is in an unbeliever. It is truly a vast change to a man to become a believer in Jesus; but this work reveals to him the hitherto hidden evils of his heart, and shows him that by nature he is a child of wrath, even as others. Thus such an one cannot boast over any other, but must count himself the chief of sinners, and extol sovereign mercy alone for his salvation. On the one hand the deceitful heart shows its depravity and slavery to every lust and sin, by all manner of outbreaking sins, like murders, thefts, lyings, falseswearings, jealousies, whisperings, talebearings, hatreds, emulations, blasphemies, and such like; and on the other hand the same heart shows its desperate wickedness and deceitfulness, by becoming full of Pharisaic religion, and by making loud professions of godliness, and by despising others who have in any way departed from what their false piety enjoins. All manner of sin is reprov'd and condemned in the word of God; but if one thing is more sternly denounced than another, it is that false righteousness which is based upon mere forms, which tithes mint, anise and cummin, and neglects at the same time judgment, mercy and faith.—See Matt. xxiii. 23.

This language of our Savior to which I have just referred has been in my mind for several weeks past, and it is of this language that I wish especially to write. It is true this language was spoken to the Pharisees and scribes more than eighteen centuries ago, and was intended as a rebuke to them. But of what use is this language, and whom does it fit to-day? should be our inquiry. If we still carry about with us the same self-righteous nature that they had, and that we all by nature had, surely this language may be a warning to us, as well as to them. It will do us but little good to read this language if we are firmly convinced that it applied to that generation only, and that all the interest which we can possibly have in it is the curiosity of a relic-hunter, who stores up relics of the past, by which our progress in excellence may be known. If we read any part of the Scriptures thus, we make a great mistake, and forfeit the riches which they contain for us who read them. No! the Scriptures written in all the past were written for our learning, and they contain lessons for us to-day, if we be enlightened by the Holy Spirit to read and understand them aright. This language of our Savior, addressed to men under the control of the pharisaic spirit then, also fits the same spirit wherever its workings are seen. And if this spirit shows itself in a child of God, by this language he also is rebuked and warned. A spirit of pharisaic pride is as much to be condemned in a believer as when found anywhere else; and when led by the Spirit of Christ our prayer will be, "O Lord, search me, and know me; try my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me; and lead me in the way everlasting." If we believe all these rebukes began and ended with men who lived in the days of Jesus' flesh, we might as well cease caring about them; but if we can see that we also are possessed of the same carnal nature and evil tendencies, then shall we find a living interest in these solemn, awful reproofs and admonitions.

With this somewhat long preface, let us look at the Savior's words, "Ye tithe mint, anise and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith." This is a spirit that grasps at the form of godliness, while it misses the power thereof. It was all right to pay all the tithes which the law of God demanded of them, but it was all wrong to pass by the essential things, judgment, mercy and faith. The first is easy to do, because by it the natural pride of the human heart may be fed, and human righteousness exalted. The second is hard, because to follow it requires the crucifixion of all creature glory, and the entire abasement of self; and man by nature would rather exalt himself than be abased. The words "judgment, mercy and faith" here have the force of what we understand by justice, mercy and integrity, or good faith. Thus in paying tithes, saying prayers, and zeal for the name of God, and for outward forms of worship, they were very exact; but in their dealings with their fellow-men they regarded neither equity, kindness nor honesty. The same thing is declared again by our Savior when he said of the same class of religionists, "Ye rob [or devour] widow's houses, and for a pretense make long prayers." This has been the tendency of the human heart in all ages. The prophets denounced the people in their day, accusing them of fasting for strife and debate. Men will fast to the Lord, and at the same time strive against their fellows for the glory, riches, honor and fame of this world, and imagine that they are better than the man who walks quietly, humbly, gently and honestly with his fellow-men, but who yet does not observe so carefully the outward forms of religion. They trust in themselves that they are righteous, and despise others; and this is just as true down in this nineteenth century as it was in the first years of the christian era. Men are exceeding slow to learn that what the Lord requires is to deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God. This the Pharisee never does. This only the broken-hearted penitent can do.

But is it possible that such a self-righteous, vain-glorious, oppressive spirit can manifest itself in a child of God? Can one who is a believer and a disciple be so led away by the dictates of the flesh that he can neglect justice, mercy and equity, while at the same time he is very full of zeal for the lesser matters, the form of godliness? If we yet carry about with us a carnal nature, if indeed the body is dead because of sin, we may well believe that it may be so; and therefore it may be well for us all to examine ourselves, and prove our own selves, whether we be controlled by the flesh or by the Spirit. I believe that we are all liable to put the lesser things foremost, and to lay aside the matters of greatest moment. Mercy, love, pity and forbearance may be sorely wounded and cast out, while we exact the last farthing due to some form of what we are pleased to call gospel order. The letter of the law of Zion may be strictly adhered to, while at the same time the demons of envy, hatred and jealousy may be raging in our hearts, and the gracious plants of love, peace, charity and pity may be scorched and drooping both in our hearts and in the church. My observation has been that oftener than otherwise when we have been the greatest sticklers for some form of order, the devil has slipped in at the back door, and let loose in our souls all the evil passions that flesh is heir to. We exact strict tithes of form and outward order, while we despise him who seems to us to have failed in the form of godliness. If it be wrong not to pay the appointed tithe of mint, anise and cummin, how vast must be the sin of driving out mercy with revenge, of supplanting kindness, love and forbearance with hatred, enmity and strife? A departure from the outward order of God's house is to be deplored; but how much more ought we to deplore harshness, fault-finding, censoriousness, bitter, sneering words, and the breaking of fellowship with those for whom Christ died. It is one thing to tell a brother of his fault, and it is quite another thing to withdraw our fellowship from him because he fails to see wherein he has erred. As a husband may see faults, and grievous ones, too, in the wife of his bosom, but notwithstanding all is bound to love and cherish her, and must not think of putting her away for every cause; so we may see grievous faults in our brethren, but yet must make but few things a cause for a declaration of nonfellowship. Our God bore with Israel long, saying that he hated putting away; and he bears with us long, and does not put us away. Even so let us be long-suffering. If we can bear the infirmities of the weak, we shall show that we indeed are strong. But when we cannot bear such things with long-suffering, we prove that we are weak. It is not a proof of strength to denounce an erring brother bitterly and strongly, and to cast him out from our presence; but it is a proof of strength when we can see him err, and pity and love him still, and pray and strive for his restoration to the right way.

How often we know not what manner of spirit we are of. The disciples moved by what they supposed was a zeal for the Master, once asked if they should command fire to come down from heaven and destroy a certain city which had refused to receive him. Human nature in men is always ready to hurl the thunderbolts of heaven against those who differ from them. What unhollowed passions have been gratified by bulls of excommunication, by acts of exclusion, and by anathemas uttered against their opponents! Satanic passions in men vainly suppose that heaven will prostitute its powers to do their revengeful will. And Jesus rebuked this false and fleshly zeal in his disciples with the words of solemn warning, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of." That city had rejected Jesus, it was true; but this spirit of vengeance in them was also as much at enmity with Jesus as was the act of the city in rejecting him. Even so in our thoughts and our dealings with those who seem to us to be rejecting Christ in some of the order of his house, it is well for us to take heed to our spirit, lest it be a false zeal, born of the spirit of revenge rather than love to God and a desire to save our brother.

We are all Pharisees by nature, and only the grace of God can keep this spirit in control, and prevent us from acting it out in all our walk and labor in the house of God. If our brother walks disorderly we must not indeed follow him or walk with him in his disorder; but this is not saying that we shall refuse to call him brother, or to walk with him in the church. We are not to say, Thou art in disorder, therefore we will have no more to do with thee. This is the way of the Pharisee. To withdraw from a brother who walks disorderly is simply to stay just where we have been all the time, and not to go with him in his course. If my brother naturally will run away from home, to withdraw from him means that I just stay at home, and urge him to do likewise, or to return if he has already departed, and welcome him when he does return. Any other course partakes of Pharisaical pride, as is set forth by the elder brother in the parable of the "prodigal son." The spirit that would turn a cold shoulder to an erring brother, and shove him out in the cold, is well-nigh infinitely worse than the errors of which he may have been guilty. Surely no brethren or churches to-day are walking in any greater disorder, either in faith or practice, than did some of the apostolic churches. Yet while the apostles warned and rebuked them, they did not intimate any withdrawal of fellowship, except in one or two very aggravated instances. Surely we are not called upon to be any more exact than the apostles themselves, who had the mind of Christ. Perhaps unwittingly we also may strain at a gnat and swallow a camel.

I often have thought that if we could see the results of our tithing the small matters so exactly, to the neglect of the weightier matters, we should often pause in our course. If to tithe mint, anise and cummin be to sacrifice love, peace, good will and fellowship, then let the mint, anise and cummin go. I mean that if to carry out some outward form of order means to break the peace of whole churches, and make the noise and confusion of war to abound, then in God's name sacrifice the lesser for the greater; for love and peace and fellowship are dearer in the sight of God than any letter of form can be; for he says to us all, "Go ye, and learn what this meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice." If, for instance, to set aside a member from our number is likely to offend many, and breed strife all around, any church had far better bear a little longer with that one than cause war in all her borders. It is well to let some things alone till God shall heal them, or till he shall cut out the sore. We need not think it strange that our brethren of other churches do not see things as we see them; and if they should not see that our reasons for our course are good ones, we need not think it strange or unbrotherly either. But let us in such cases wait, and still walk in love and fellowship; for we may be sure that God will bring it all to the light, when both they and we shall perhaps see that both were partly right and partly wrong, while both desired with all the heart to do right.

It has long seemed to me that an earnest zeal for truth and right may exist in perfect harmony with all long-suffering and brotherly forbearance; and brotherly kindness is infinitely better than any zeal for any form, however right that form may be. Let us try to have the order right, then, but by all means have fervent charity among ourselves. If strict adherence to some forms be needful, and should be relentlessly carried out, it would disrupt all our associations and churches, and we should have a hundred parties all over our country. If one church drops correspondence with another church, it is well to remember that we cannot expect all our sister churches to do the same; and in many cases to insist upon it would result in disrupting a hundred churches and a score of associations. Let us bear a lesser evil, rather than provoke a greater one. Love and peace and forbearance are better than an adherence to any form, if such adherence is going to result in strife, debate and alienation. It is well to tithe mint, anise and cummin; but it is better to seek for peace and mercy and edification.

I leave these thoughts. May they do good, and not harm. I remain your brother in a precious hope,

F. A. CHICK.

REFLECTIONS.

ALL attempted explanations of the mysterious ways of God are vain. They only produce in the mind of the natural man more opposition to the truth, more reasons for their disbelief of it, and in the mind of a child of God confusion. These mysteries cannot be explained. The preaching of the gospel is not for that purpose. God's way is in the sea, his pathway in the deep waters, and therefore his footsteps are not known. His purposes and their fulfillment are declared in the Scriptures, but not explained. In all the sweet declarations of his word and work, which comfort and quiet the troubled hearts of his little children, there will, there must, always appear to them unsearchable mysteries, visions which stretch away in our spiritual horizon far beyond the utmost reach of our sight; glimpses, glorious and comforting glimpses, of ways that are past finding out. In the still waters of the soul-refreshing truth, by which the Lord leads his flock, there will appear to their enraptured view unfathomable depths; and above the green pastures, where he makes them to lie down in gospel content under the beams of the Sun of righteousness, there must appear infinite heights, of which they can see only just enough to know that they are unsearchable. But these unfathomable depths and unsearchable heights and immeasurable breadths and lengths of the infinite wisdom of God do not disturb the faith of the Lord's people, nor excite their curiosity, and stimulate an ambition to find out those mysteries. Their effect is rather to cause a deeper and more solemn reverence in the heart for God, and a more confiding trust in him, and to bring an experience of sweeter rest in his infinite love and boundless wisdom and power.

That preaching in which everything is sought to be explained and made clear to the finite understanding is of but little if any use to the people of God, who can never understand the mystery of their own experience, but who are comforted and made to rejoice when that experience is witnessed to in the preaching of the gospel, and thus confirmed as the work of God.

"The hidden wisdom which God ordained before the world unto" the glory of his people was spoken by the apostles "in a mystery;" and it is still spoken by all the servants of God unto his people "in a mystery."—1 Cor. ii. 7. It is a glorious mystery, full of comfort and joy to the humble believer, but which will never cease to be a mystery till mortality shall be swallowed up of life.

We shall ever try in vain to make the thoughts and ways of God appear consistent with the thoughts and ways of man.—Isa. lv. 8, 9. There is not, as some suppose, any essential distinction between right and wrong aside from the word and command of God. His precepts are right because they are his, and for no other reason. He has never given to men any rule by which to decide what is right in them but his own commands to them; and he has never given to any being any rule by which to decide what is right in himself but his own word declaring his work. Whatever he has done it was infinitely right and infinitely wise that he should do. The Lord, being angry with Israel, moved David against them to say, Go number Israel and Judah. Afterward he caused David to see and confess that he had sinned in doing so, and to humbly bow to the Lord, and submit himself and his people to the punishment he felt that he justly deserved.—2 Sam. xxiv. 1. Shall we make reply against God in this, when David submitted humbly, or shall we say it cannot be so, because we in our vanity suppose we are acquainted with some essential rule of right that the Lord would have violated in doing so? Then we must criticise all his works, and accuse him for making venomous and vicious beasts, and for causing poisonous plants to grow out of the earth with those that are good for food.

Godliness and iniquity are both declared to be mysteries, and the wisdom of God is to be displayed in both. In the love of God which he sheds abroad in the hearts of his people is all their holiness. Why he did not cause all the race of Adam to experience that love is a mystery never to be understood by created intelligence, and for which no proper reason can ever be given except the one given by him who was meek and lowly in heart: "Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight."—Matt. xi. 26.

The understanding by which we know the Son of God is not that which we have by nature, but it is an understanding which he himself has given us in the gift of salvation and eternal life. It is an experience; for if we know him that is true, "we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life."—1 John v. 20. This understanding or experience does not depend upon the measure of natural wisdom or learning or intellectual power. Its power and results are equally seen by the spiritual eye in the child and the man; in the feeble-minded and the man of strong mental powers.

Life is always the moving power. The life that the Lord's people now live in the flesh, as his people, they do not live by virtue of any power belonging to them in their natural creation, for there is no power in that life to lead them in paths of righteousness; but it is a life they live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved them, and gave himself for them. That is a sinless life. They could not live any other life before God, who "is of purer eyes than to behold evil, and cannot look upon iniquity." "Christ is our life." "For me to live is Christ." In him we stand holy and without blame before

God in love. Every thought that is pure, every feeling that is holy, every motion that is right, is from that divine life. From the first experience of that life in the sinner, through all the strange and wonderful journey, the conflicts, the victories of faith, the obedience in heart and walk, to the last crowning experience of perfect conformity to his own glorious image, all the power is from the dear Savior. Not a particle of the power that caused one spiritual movement is from ourselves, nor from any other source than Jesus. He is our life, and unto him belong the power and the glory.

The power of the life of God felt in the soul is love. By the experience of that love going out to his children we know that we have passed from death unto life. We do not come into a knowledge of Jesus by study and searching, but by growing. We "grow up into him in all things, which is the Head, even Christ." The soil in which we are rooted to cause that growth is love.—Eph. iii. 17. Being rooted and grounded in love, we are enabled to comprehend its breadths and lengths and depths and heights. That love of Christ which we thus come to know is a love that passeth knowledge. We feel it, and rejoice in it, and rest in it. In the perfect experience of this love of Christ which passeth knowledge the poor sinner is "filled with all the fullness of God." This love that so satisfies the soul is forever beyond our knowledge in its infinite heights and unfathomable depths and limitless breadths and lengths; and yet how perfectly satisfying it is to every one that feels it, old and young, rich and poor, learned and unlearned. How contented it makes one feel, whatever his present lot may be, and whatever his condition; and one of the greatest wonders of that love is its binding power. It is "the bond of perfectness."—Col. iii. 14. It binds together those who by nature were antagonistic to each other, and hated one another. When one feels that love he desires to "put it on," to give it expression in his words and actions. It is the most beautiful clothing one can possibly wear; and when one has "put on charity" it has a marvelous effect upon the appearance to him of all who love the Lord. It so transforms them in his view that he cannot see any defect in them that will mar or interrupt his love and kindness to them. It covers from his sight a multitude of faults in them. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God." That same love shed abroad in the hearts of his people here on earth is just as wonderful in them. It loses none of its marvelous character. It is there only, in their own hearts, that they see and feel its power and glory. It is ever the same—pure, holy, unselfish; coming from God, and ever returning to him.

SILAS H. DURAND.

SOUTHAMPTON, Pa., Oct. 2, 1892.

ARGENTINE, Kansas, Sept. 30, 1892.

ELDER BENTON JENKINS—MY DEAR BROTHER IN CHRIST:—It seems almost impossible that I should be favored with the blessed privilege of claiming such a near relationship, but I feel that we are made near, by the blood of Christ. What a wonderful power it has! It can give life, cleanse, purify and bind together so thoroughly that none can kill, polute or tear assunder that which is united by that crimson flood. I cannot express to you, dear brother (but doubtless you can understand), how my heart warmed and swelled nearly to bursting when I once more stood among my precious kindred in Christ, in my own little church-home, where I had enjoyed so many happy hours years ago. It was there I spent my childhood naturally and spiritually. It was there I was married both naturally and spiritually; and it was there I felt I must forever dwell; but that, it seems, is not to be. We enjoyed our short visit so very much, and your welcome to us was so cordial and kind, that it nearly broke my heart to think I must again leave you all and return to this little lonely corner of the earth, and wonder why it must be that I am denied the blessed privilege of dwelling among those I so dearly love. But we are told that no good thing will the Lord withhold from those who fear him. So I conclude (if I am his) he withholds this privilege because he considers it is not good for me; just as a kind parent who has a feeble child, thinks it not good for him to have rich food; and taking him kindly by the hand leads him away from the well-filled table, and away from among his brothers and sisters (who are well and strong, and can enjoy it without harm) and takes him away by himself, and gives him something nourishing and strengthening, telling him, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." I think this must be my case. I am a sort of weak, sickly, stumbling one, and it is not good for me to enjoy what my stronger brethren and sister feed upon; but I am allowed some sweet meals; and one dear brother and sister (my husband and one lady friend) are permitted to be with me; and having my heavenly Parent ever by my side, I surely should not complain, for others have less than that. Perhaps I learn to love him more. I have so often wished to write to you, but was afraid to trespass on your time, or that of any other Elder, as I know you must be flooded with letters, and have little time to spend with such as mine; but if I were granted the freedom of expression with which many of the dear kindred are blessed, I am afraid I should venture occasionally to intrude upon your patience. But, I think the poor widow of old had but a mite, and she gave it all. She did not withhold it because it was so small; and why should I be afraid to give the little I possess? If I have anything, it is not mine to hide and keep, but mine to use for the good of my Father's little ones. What I have is theirs, and theirs is mine, and we are his. All are one, and the same body.

After leaving Middletown we visited Philadelphia, and called upon brother Coulter and sister Barnsley. There we received the same kind and hearty welcome, which only God's people know how to give. They were strangers to us in the flesh, but O! so nearly and dearly related in the Spirit; for my Father is their Father, and my God their God. They made us so much at home that when Elder White (whom we heard preach while there, and who learned that we came from Kansas) remarked, "You are a long way from home," I started as if waked from a pleasant dream, and replied, "It is true; yet we feel more at home here than in Kansas." Many miles from home in body, but perfectly at home in spirit. What is so sweet as this pure christian love, which is indeed born of God? It is so unlike a natural and earthly love. It is so true, so deep, so sincere and lasting. I told an Episcopalian friend of mine of our calling upon them, and she smiled and said, "Why, how strange for you to call on them when you had never seen them before." I answered that I guessed they did not consider it so. I pitied her in her innocent ignorance. How little the world knows of the secret of the Lord, which is only with those who know and fear him; and if we have that knowledge, what a depth of gratitude we should feel. Surely (whether we are deceived or not) this I know, we are very, very different from the rest of the world, a peculiar people, and possess a treasure which the world can never give, attain or destroy. There is a warm affection and a tenderness of feeling among God's little ones, unknown to the outer world. While in Middletown a lady, speaking of our denomination, remarked, "I've heard it said they are so kind, good and affectionate to one another." I replied, "Well, they try to be; they should be." I think now I see the meaning of the command, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." And this can only be done when he shines in us, and then we cannot hide the good work; for he works in us, and others cannot fail to see the effect. So it is. The eyes of the world are as ready to detect our short-comings. Should we not be very careful? When quite a young girl, before I made a profession of religion, a gentleman with whom we boarded bought something for his table, and all hands remarked upon its poor quality. Well, said he, laughing, "it ought to be good; it is Old School Baptist. I bought it of Mr.—, and he told me it was good. If I had know it was not good, I certainly should not have

THE VICTORY OF FAITH.

"For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world; and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."—1 John v. 4.

To those who are conscious of their own sinfulness, who earnestly desire to be delivered from the power of guilt, it is of the most serious interest to know whether they are truly partakers in the righteousness of Jesus Christ, by which sinners are made holy and without blame before God in love. In comparison with this question all earthly considerations sink into insignificance. Since man by transgression of the commandment of his Maker brought sin and death upon himself and all his race, no real joy can be attained by any works of his own; because the curse of death has blighted every earthly source of comfort. Neither by the labor of his hands nor by the researches of mental toil can the sinner release himself from the just condemnation which has already passed upon him. The first ray of divine light which shines in his heart shows him that he is a condemned criminal whose sentence is recorded in the revelation of the wrath of God. The entrance of this word of light shows the lost condition of the subject of divine teaching. He then for the first time realizes the irresistible power of that awful sentence by which death is decreed against the sinner. Confessing the justice of his condemnation, he now prays in spirit and in truth for that mercy which seems beyond the reach of hope. Indeed, it is not by the natural mind that this prayer is dictated. It is given by the Spirit of truth, which helpeth the infirmities of the saints, making intercession for them with groanings which cannot be uttered by their faltering tongues. This is the beginning of that experience of warfare in himself, which is characteristic of those who are led by the Spirit of God. The natural mind can never comprehend how the infinite holiness of God can be displayed in the salvation of sinners who are enemies against God by wicked works; yet the riches of divine grace appear in the revelation through faith of the righteousness of Christ, by which the sins of all his redeemed people are blotted out, and they are made holy and without blame before God in love. Until this delivering grace is shown to the quickened sinner there can be nothing but condemnation resting upon him. This forbids the hope of life and acceptance in the sight of God. The natural mind cannot receive the testimony of faith; because it has no capacity to comprehend spiritual things. This is the occasion of the unceasing conflict between the flesh and the Spirit of truth in every believer.

The development of the light of life in the subject of saving grace is only manifested through the faith which is the fruit of the Spirit; since the natural mind cannot receive this spiritual testimony it can know only the condemnation which has been visited upon all men as sinners. This cannot be reconciled to the glorious hope given by the revelation of the righteousness of God in Christ Jesus, since God has hidden from the sight of carnal intelligence that inconceivable wisdom by which the righteousness of all the saints is from eternity treasured in the Son of God, who is by divine appointment "The head over all (things) to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all."—Eph. i. 22, 23. There being no other way of life and peace for the guilty transgressors of the law of God, it is not strange that reason fails to accept the conclusion which is given by revelation through the faith which is hidden from the natural mind. The written record of the Scriptures is to reason only a literal testimony of things which have taken place in time. Only as the Spirit of truth, the Comforter, takes of the things of Jesus therein written, and shows it unto the subjects of electing love, can the truth of the inspired Scriptures be known even to the saints. Being experimentally taught of God, every saint is a qualified witness of that truth, because it has been personally made known in the experience of each of them. They do not believe the truth because it is in the Scriptures, but they know the truth experimentally, and therefore believe the scriptural record of it.

In the first deliverance of every sinner from the burden of his guilt and condemnation, Christ Jesus is manifested to him as his only Savior; yet it is in failure to remember this first principle of the doctrine of salvation by grace that the saints are continually robbed of their rest in believing the truth. Three unsleeping adversaries are arrayed against the comfort of hope in every believer in Jesus. The world, the flesh and the devil never cease their assaults; and there is no way of escaping the conflict which results from these efforts of the enemy to subvert the faith of those who hope in the salvation revealed in Jesus. In no other way does the tempter more seriously disturb the peace of the weak believer than by directing him to seek in himself an assurance of the genuineness of his hope in the salvation of God. It seems consistent that there should be some tangible evidence in himself to which he might refer for the satisfaction of his unbelieving doubts. Failing to find such testimony in his natural heart, and all his actions and thoughts bearing witness against his possession of the seal of the Spirit of holiness, he is driven to confess that he has no abiding witness in himself to confirm his hope. Were there no stronger support than the evidence of things which are seen, his hope would be lost; but the omnipotence of that faith which is the gift of God is still underneath him as the everlasting arm of the Lord; and while his flesh and heart have failed, yet the Lord takes him up out of the miry clay and horrible pit of despair. The accusations of unbelief and sin are silenced by the much more abounding grace of that God who has chosen his people in Christ Jesus that they should be holy and without blame before him in love.

"For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world." The world in this expression includes every power that is in opposition against the perfect peace of them who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope which is set before the saints in Christ Jesus. But it should be observed that the very fact that the world is overcome, necessarily implies that there must be a conflict. The whole experience of the subjects of divine love is represented throughout the Scriptures as an unceasing struggle between the powers of darkness on the one hand, and on the other the grace of God, which is constantly revealed in bringing salvation. To those who never felt to sink in deep mire where there is no standing, there may be no occasion for any salvation but that final deliverance secured to all the redeemed in the eternal life which Jesus gives to all his sheep. But to those who are called to endure unceasing tribulations and a great fight of afflictions, there is necessity for continual prayer for deliverance from the evils and temptations which beset them. They are not strong enough to repel the fiery darts of the devil, nor wise enough to avoid the snares and devices of the wicked. Hence, when the tempter refers to such assurances as this in our text, it seems plausible that they should acknowledge they are cut off by them. They know they have no power to overcome the world; but that they are often overcome by its opposition and deceived by its snares. Then it is readily suggested by their unbelief that this is conclusive evidence that they are not "born of God." Then again, it is written, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." With what cruel power these expressions are applied by the adversary in afflicting the poor child who has fallen under the power of temptation, and whose conscience is a swift witness in his condemnation! He feels that the world has overcome him, and the evil of his own vile heart condemns him. Then how can he claim to hope in that salvation which is manifest in delivering its subjects from the dominion of sin? The things which are seen always bear testimony against the hope of the saints. But the grace of God is their present help in the hour of trouble. To sustain those who are overwhelmed in this cruel temptation it is left on record that "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save SINNERS, OF WHOM I AM CHIEF."—1 Tim. i. 15. For the comfort of just such conscious sinners as feel in themselves the law of sin working, and who have constantly to grieve over the evils which still pollute their natural hearts, the Spirit moved Paul to record this confession of his own daily experience of the sinfulness which dwelt in his own natural mind. Only those who are born of God can know the fellowship of the apostle in this confession of sin, which still worked in him, even after he had been in the apostleship for more than twenty years, causing him to cry for deliverance from the body of this death, and to confess himself still chief of sinners. It is not as seen by natural reason that the victory is attained by those in whom dwells the omnipotent power of divine grace. This will be manifest from the record of inspiration. To human view Abel was overcome by the malice of Cain. The ancient saints, who suffered the loss of all earthly treasures and were finally murdered for their devotion to the faith, seemed to have been overcome; but it was the glory of Christ which shone in their triumphant release from earthly conflicts. They were favored to partake the sufferings of their Lord, and to be glorified with him. So with the apostles and the primitive disciples of Jesus. They were enabled to rejoice that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for the dear name of their Redeemer. But above all, and more inconceivably glorious than all others, is the example of the Captain of our salvation. "Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. For consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds."—Heb. xii. 1-3. In all the cases left for our learning the wickedness of man appeared to triumph, and the righteous were appointed unto death. But our Lord passed through death for the destruction of him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and triumphed gloriously in his death. That victory he gives to all his chosen disciples. Thus through faith they all are conquerors even though they are favored of God to seal their testimony with their vital blood. While looking at the temporal things which are seen by natural reason, the suffering and dying followers of Jesus appear to be overcome by the power of death; but by the faith of the Son of God they see the crown of righteousness and everlasting joy, which the Lord the righteous Judge shall give at that day when he shall call them home. Encouraged by this lively hope, and sustained by this living faith, not only do they overcome the enemies which beset their way here in the form of outward trials, but they triumph over their inward foes, which war in their own members. This is the unspeakable gift of God in Christ Jesus. They must mourn their own utter helplessness, before they are prepared to rejoice in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, which brings salvation unto them in the very moment of their extreme need. Only by the faith of their Redeemer can they receive the joyful assurance of this divine deliverance. It is hidden by the express will of God so that it cannot be seen or known by all the efforts of natural intelligence. By faith they who are born of God overcome their own carnal enmity against God, as well as all outward opposition against the revelation of divine grace in their salvation from sin.

"And this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." To the natural understanding it seems that this declaration of the power of faith would imply that those who are in possession of this fruit of the Spirit would be able to carry out their every wish. But such is not the experience of the saints, neither is it according to the record of inspiration. The saints whose election of God is clearly assured, the sons of God who as morning stars shouted for joy in the revelation of the grace of God in Christ Jesus, were like their Lord in being despised and rejected of men. From the murdered Abel down to the close of the record of inspiration, the faithful are found to be an afflicted and poor people. They must trust in the name of the Lord, because they can trust nowhere else. They have seen an end of all perfection in everything which is esteemed meritorious in the sight of men. The works which the world claims to be righteous before God, can deserve the approval of divine justice no more than the deeds which men abhor. The best obedience which men can render to the holy law of God must still bear the stain of a sinner's touch. No such righteousness can command the approval of that God who requires truth in the inward parts. When this secret of the Lord is revealed to the conscious sinner, it shows him his hopeless condemnation. Knowing that God is infinitely holy, he cannot understand how he can be saved from the condemnation which his sin has brought upon him. Not merely the material world of his outward actions is found condemning the transgressor of the divine law;

there is an unfathomed depth of corruption hidden in his deceitful and desperately wicked heart. From that horrible pit of vileness he can find no ground of acceptance in the presence of God. Clouds and darkness are so thickly gathered about him that he keenly feels their awful gloom. If he would look upward, the holiness of God frowns upon his iniquities; and underneath him roll the billows of fiery vengeance due to his guilt. Reason shrinks back appalled and horrified by the contemplation of the dreadful doom to which he is appointed by the inflexible decree of divine justice. Can there be any deliverance from this deep world of ruin and despair? The great question of Job is now of vital interest to the guilty sinner, "How should man be just with God?" Not all the treasures which are valued in the world can atone for one sin. In vain would he appease the wrath of the law by bringing all the gold of Ophir, or the cattle of a thousand hills. To him is reserved only the blackness of everlasting condemnation. From this dreadful world of gloom and despair no created arm can deliver the lost sinner. Here is displayed the victory that overcometh the world. Where there is no way in the wilderness of everlasting misery and hopeless death, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ reveals through faith in his name the life and liberty of the sons of God, which is freely given to the sinner by the electing love of God. In this amazing display of eternal love the victory of faith is complete. Neither the powers of darkness from beneath, nor the thunders of condemnation from the legal heaven above, shall prevail against the omnipotence of this abiding fruit of the Spirit of God. It is "our faith." It is ours by the gift of that God who chose his people in Christ before the world was. It is not for any goodness in ourselves that we have received this manifestation of divine favor. It is exclusively "For his great love wherewith he loved us even when we were dead in sins," that he has given this faith to all who are born of God. The very assurance that this victory overcometh the world implies the fact that the world is in opposition against its manifestation. Every suggestion of fear and unbelief is included in the world which is overcome by this victory of faith. These trials must be felt by the saints, but they shall never prevail against the divinely appointed victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.

bought it; but I took his word for it. What do you think of that? He is one of your Old School Baptist brothers." My poor mother tried to excuse it as best she could, but there were the facts, and what could she do? I remember how it grieved me, and even now I cannot forget the incident, for it seemed to leave a scar upon the cause I loved. We cannot be too careful. Such things may prove a stumbling-block to some little, feeble one about to enter the banqueting house. There is another thing, dear Elder, which has been on my mind for years, ever since I first joined the church; it is this, We are told that "Neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God."—1 Cor. vi. 9, 10. Does this mean that they shall not be counted as members of the visible church? If not, then I am mistaken, for I have thought it did mean so. Please explain to me if I am wrong. I do not ask you to answer this imperfect scribble, but should you find a spare moment in which to write a few lines to me, I shall deem it a great favor, and never forget your brotherly kindness. Please give our united love to our little church, reserving an abundant supply for yourself and sister Jenkins.

I remain the same unworthy sister,
ADELA JONES.

AS OUR dear sister Jones says that if she has anything, it is not hers to hide and keep, but hers to use for the good of her Father's little ones, of course she will not object to the publication of her good letter in the "family paper." There is much food for reflection in what she has written, and calculated to stir up the pure minds of the household of God. The apostle Peter thought it meet (that is, suitable and proper) as long as he was in the flesh to stir up the pure minds of the saints, by putting them in remembrance of those things which they already knew. Would to God that all the saints were like minded. Where is the saint that does not know that if he lives after the flesh he shall die? There can be no inheritance (or enjoyment) of the kingdom of God, which is a spiritual kingdom, by those of the saints who are fornicators, idolaters, adulterers, thieves, revilers, covetous, extortioners or drunkards. The apostle wrote to the church not to keep company with such characters, but to put them away. "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly." From the days of the apostles there have been those among the saints who have been more mindful of the world and the flesh than of the things of the kingdom of God. Paul said, "For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ: whose end is destruction [as to their life and standing in the church, and spiritual comfort and communion], whose God is their belly, and whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things." How much weeping there is to-day among the saints because of the ungodly walk of some who are called brethren, and who doubtless have experienced the grace of God. As our sister says, such are often a stumbling-block to the little, feeble ones of the kingdom, and a reproach to the profession they have made.

"O that the Lord would guide my ways
To keep his statutes still;
O that my God would grant me grace
To know and do his will."

BENTON JENKINS.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Sept. 1, 1892.

ELDER WM. L. BEEBE—MY DEAR BROTHER:—Your very kind letter was received in due time, and should have been replied to at once, but various reasons have prevented me from giving it prompt attention. Your letter was, in effect, just about the reply I expected from you. You would have comforted me more had you rebuked or reproved me, instead of viewing the matter so leniently. When I wrote to you, there was in my heart a feeling that I wanted to hurt you, by convincing you of the truth of my repeated statement that I am not worthy of a name with the Old Baptists, and that they made a mistake when they admitted me to their privileges. But no, just like the rest of the Old Baptists, you practically tell me you do not believe what I say, and that my experience is an evidence of a work of grace in me. It provokes me at times to feel that the brethren question my assertions. The worse I feel, it seems to me, the better they like it; and though they never say outright they don't believe me, still they act it; for they would have nothing to do with me if they knew me as I know myself. I have been in much trouble of mind lately as to whether I have had any experience at all in spiritual things. In times past I have thought I had, but I see now I have not yet learned the first letter of the pure language promised by God to that afflicted and poor people who trust in him. In my ignorance I have been wonderfully wise, and I feel that I can never hold up my head again for having dared so often to write or talk to some of God's children of their inheritance; a subject of which I know nothing. The ignorance I am in overwhelms me, and it seems to grow denser day by day. After all the privileges I have been permitted to enjoy, it will hardly seem possible to you that I could be such a diligent disciple of Arminianism as I must confess to having been. Until recently I have been looking for a Messiah with a temporal kingdom. Like the Jews, I have been requiring signs; forgetting, or rather not knowing, that "the kingdom of God cometh not with observation;" always saying, "Lo here! or, lo there," and not looking for the kingdom of God within me. This truth first came to me when Elder Badger last preached here; and the relief I experienced I cannot describe. I never knew how heavy the burden of error was to me till it was removed, and I never knew as I know now how utterly ignorant and foolish I am. All these years have I been suffering in vain, looking and hoping to be made perfect and free in Christ by the law. All this time I have been in bondage to the law, not knowing that such a word as duty is not written in the hearts of God's dear people; but that it is privilege, blessed privilege, to fulfill his law; that it is not the spirit of fear, "but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind," that is given them. And yet, my dear brother, strange to say, with this clear understanding, I experience a deep sense of loss. As these grave-clothes of superstition are removed, it leaves me more than ever naked and alone. As legal doctrine, in which I have had such confident faith, is stripped from me, it leaves me hardly daring even to hope that I am not altogether deceived. I looked back over the past six years, and in remembering how almost everything I had confidence in has perished, I wonder where it will all end. May not the time come when I shall lose all that is left me, even the faint hope I have that the Lord hath regarded me in mercy and loving-kindness for his name's sake. Yet notwithstanding all this doubt, notwithstanding all the misery I suffer, if I am deceived, if I have been given a strong delusion that I may believe a lie, I hope I shall never know it. Though I am undeserving of the least of God's mercies, and well deserving of eternal banishment from his presence, the thought of ever losing all hope in his tender mercy fills my soul with awful misery. If you have ever experienced this thought, you know something of my conception of hell. There are landmarks, however, in my experience, that bid me still hope on, when I have felt myself sinking to greater depths in that bottomless pit, and am in utter helplessness made, like Peter, to cry out, "Lord, save, or I perish," he has saved and made me to sing, "I will trust and not be afraid; for the Lord is my strength and my song; he also is become my salvation."

I have just read this letter over as far as I have gone, and it impresses me as very contradictory; but as that is just what I am, I will let it go. It is incomprehensible, like myself; and if you can understand either it or me, you are a wise man.

Not long ago I foolishly allowed myself to be drawn into an argument with a Methodist, concerning the significance of baptism. During its progress I incidentally remarked that it was the very essence of superstition to ascribe a virtue to an outward form, unaccompanied by any disposition that can render it significant, and that it represented the ordinances of Jesus as no better than magical spells. The following Sunday he told his congregation of it, and described it as the utterance of a raving crazy Baptist. Lately I have thought he, perhaps, had not gone far from the truth after all, for I am the most inconsistent and contradictory mortal that ever lived. Yet, if God will but established in my heart his kingdom, which is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, I am content to be entirely crazy as far as the world is concerned.

From what I have written in this letter, please do not conclude that I think I am freed from the law working in me. Far from it. I did once hope that the Jew and Greek in me would die some time, but that hope has died instead. I do not have to go away from home to berate Arminianism; I carry it round with me, and have not yet learned all its delusions. When I am entirely freed from it I will write and tell you all about it; that is, if I am on earth. In early youth I was taught that in me there was a natural tendency to evil, or a strong evil bias in my nature; but until a few years ago I never knew what a tendency to evil there was. The good I was taught to believe there was in every one, along with this evil bias, I have failed to find in my nature. The Word of God has, I hope, effectually settled that foolish delusion, for it has revealed to me that "every imagination of the thoughts of his heart is only evil continually." "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it?" "There is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God." "They are all gone out of the way; they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one." So I am utterly without merit in the sight of God; and if I have been made to know the joyful sound of the gospel, it is by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. Trusting in his covenant of grace, I know that God will not forsake his people, and I also feel certain that they cannot forsake him.

A little while ago I suggested the thought that I may some time utterly lose all hope of being embraced in this covenant, but down in my heart I do not believe it possible. We know that Christ by his intercession did keep Peter's faith from utterly failing; for he said, "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." And his intercessions are for all that believe on his name. In Jeremiah we find an explicit promise, and solemn covenant, in which God engages to preserve his people from falling: "And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good." This seems to be a very full promise, and a covenant in all things well ordered and sure; but this is not all: he immediately adds, "and I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me." And this seems to be implied when he promised, "I will put my laws in their minds, and write them in their hearts." Ah, no, if the good Shepherd has given unto us eternal life, we shall never perish, nor shall any pluck us out of his hand. I can never doubt the doctrine of the saints' perseverance. And even though I be deceived in hoping I have been "chosen in Christ out of the world," the feeling of my heart shall always be, "Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency?"

Unworthily yours,

JOHN McCONNELL.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Sept. 29, 1892.

MY DEAR BROTHER JENKINS:—I thought a little while ago I had many things to say to you; but since I have set down and addressed you the door of my utterance seems completely closed. I wonder why it is; and it comes to my mind that perhaps I want to give you the best, the very best of that which I possess. And as I go out to search among my flocks and herds, that I may select something very choice for your delectation, to my great surprise I find I have "nothing save one little awe lamb;" that I am a poor man. But this that I have is more to me than the vast array of carnal riches I once possessed; even more to me than my natural existence; and so I find I have but one theme upon which to talk to you. Although that which we possess and continue to hope for in this life is the heritage of the poor and afflicted people of a kingdom which is not of this world, yet it is a rich possession, broader than time, deeper than the earth, reaching even to the throne of God's wondrous grace. The broad fields and verdant streams of the inheritance of the saints cannot be viewed by natural vision; and because I know that, and can see naught in myself but what is natural, therefore I am fearing and doubting all the time; fearing, because I cannot present myself in all my vileness before the King of glory; and doubting, because, although I know I have hope, yet it seems so far off and so dim. I remember that the Bridegroom said to the bride, "Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee." This applies to the church of Christ as cleansed by the one great offering, pure and spotless in his righteousness. Now if the hope that I hope I have is Christ in me the hope of glory, then truly I am a part of the material that goes to make and to perfect that building of God which is "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone. And I believe I know that all the material of that building is so secure and invulnerable (in Christ) that all the powers of hell cannot prevail against it. Then, if my hope is "a good hope through grace," why does the darkness cover me as a thick cloud? Why are my feet clogged, and the thoughts of my mind as a rudderless ship, tossed hither and thither on the waves of doubt and despair? Still I am encouraged that I do not give up, and go on hoping, even against hope; and sometimes I can realize that the warfare, which is a continuous struggle within me, is because of the two opposing principles of grace and sin, being present and abounding; and in proportion as sin abounds in my mortal flesh; so also does grace much more abound to the glory of God and to my salvation. Lately I have wondered if the doubts I am all too willing to entertain ever amount to a denial of Christ; and when such a conviction broke in upon me I was sore distressed. I think I can see how my flesh denies him all the time; yet it is declared that devils believe and tremble. But having, as I hope, the mind of Christ, have I fallen so low, gone so far astray, become so mean, so degraded, so ungrateful, as to deny him who has taken me from the dung hill and set me among princes? It is a horrible thought, yet it stares me in the face. Why, the beasts of the fields, the trees of the wood, and all created things, praise the Lord and acknowledge his divine hand of power and majesty, by acting in obedience to the several laws under which they have been placed, except me. While evidently he has been more gracious to me than all the world beside, and although it sinks me into the lowest hell, at the same time it exalts my gracious Lord; it makes his love to far surpass my dwarfed and limited comprehension.

9:20. P. M.—It has been several hours since I was called away from this writing, and now I feel glad. Something has either gone from me, or else something has come to me. I feel to be drawn by the tenderest of ties to the bosom of Jesus. He is now my King, and I his willing subject. I know of no circumstance by which I felt the clouds withdraw, but at once my soul said, "I am happy." I visited dear old brother Thomas this afternoon, 87 years old, with an experience of about 60 years, and he talked to me the pure and simple language of Canaan. His whole being, as well as his talk, was as a child, waiting trustingly and patiently for the glad summons, "Come home." Perhaps my visit to him has wrought within me this glad surprise. No matter now about the source. If it came out of the frozen north, it is Jesus. He is the "Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the valley." He is mine, and I am his. Perhaps he has looked upon me as he did on Peter after he had denied him. The bitter tears that Peter shed were the opening of the flood-gates of his heart, out of which poured bitterness of soul, making room for the "oil of joy," which was so soon to pour in at the appearance of his risen Lord. "After the rain comes sunshine;" and also the rainbow, to remind us that the covenant of promise is the covenant of grace fulfilled and completed in the atoning blood of Christ. "After the darkness comes light," by which our own vileness and depravity is made manifest, and by which we see Jesus as the author and finisher of our faith. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." I think much of the sweetness of our joy is because we have reached it by reason of tribulation. Jacob toiled and suffered for many years ere he received the blessing by which he could be called Israel. The psalmist must needs cry out of the very depths of despair, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Why art thou so far from helping me?" before he could stand upon the summit of the mountain of God's holiness, and in the full gladness of his heart say, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." So I believe every child of Jehovah must taste sorrow, eat the wormwood and the gall, pass through the valley of the shadow of death, suffer conflicts and persecution, in order that they may enter into that rest which remaineth to the people of God. I know that I am weakness itself, and shrink from every impending or seeming trial; that of myself I can do nothing at all; but I hope I know also that God will make every one of his subjects willing in the day of his power; for it is his power by which we stand, and not any of ours.

Now, my dear brother, I hoped I might in this letter express to you my appreciation of the many expressions and acts of kindness you have shown me in the past; but, as usual, the whole letter is made up of self, self, self. I really did hope to do better.

Your loving brother,

B. F. COULTER.

CHENEY, Neb., Sept. 22, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—If such a poor, unworthy worm of the dust may thus address you. It is with a deep feeling sense of my weakness that I attempt to write a few lines, trusting that God will control my thoughts, that what I may write may be to the honor and glory of God. While reading the SIGNS of September 7th I noticed a short piece written by brother W. J. May, of Pinsonfork, Kentucky, who wishes your views on the precious words of Jesus recorded John v. 25, and reads thus, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live." Now, dear brethren Beebe, it would be a great comfort to me to see your views on that portion of holy writ, and I hope you will write upon it, as brother May seems to be troubled about this text. While reading brother May's comments upon it I felt a strong desire to write to him, and give him my thoughts upon it, poor and weak as they are, with your permission and better judgment.

Brother May will remember that those precious words fell from the lips of him who spake as never man spake. His words are spirit, and they are life. When he speaks he speaks of his own and to his own. He was expounding to his disciples the great plan of salvation, how the dead should hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that heard should live. Brother May asks, "Is it God's unquickened children who hear the voice of the Son of God?" It undoubtedly is. They were dead in trespasses and in sins; and Paul says that they "were by nature the children of wrath, even as others. But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ (by grace are ye saved), and hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus."—Eph. ii. 4-6. Again, Jesus speaks of a people that believed not, and tells the reason why they did not believe. "But ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep, as I said unto you. My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life: and they shall never perish, neither shall any (man) pluck them out of my hand. My Father, which gave them me, is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand."—John x. 26-29. These, with many other Scriptures, bear testimony to the truth of the precious words of Jesus. Brother May says, "It is the dead that hear." Yes, the dead hear. "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God." Brother May says that the word "hear" occurs twice in this text; and it seems to him that when it is said, "They that hear shall live," it must mean that they that hearken, take heed, or obey, shall live. It also seems to brother May that it conveys the idea that not all who hear the voice of the Son of God hearken and obey in order to live. Now, my dearly beloved brethren, is this a true interpretation of those precious words which fell from the lips of the dear Savior when he was speaking of the heirs of promise, speaking of those whose names were written in the Lamb's book of life from the foundation of the world? They alone should hear; for unto them, and them alone, it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God. All power is given into Jesus' hands, both in heaven and in earth. Yes, he "hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." Jesus says, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him." When the life-giving power of Jesus' voice speaks to the dead sinner, who is dead in trespasses and sins, he hears the voice; for he feels the sting of sin, and is made to see himself the chief of sinners. He is made to cry out, "Lord, have mercy on me, a sinner." He has a burden now that he never had before. He is made to weep and mourn on account of sin, and to cry for mercy. Yes, he is made willing to seek the secret spot in the forest or the lonely grove, to pour out his cries and his humble prayers to God for deliverance. Yes, he is made even to feel that it is a sin for him to take the name of Jesus between his sin-polluted lips. But what can he do? The very breathing of his soul is prayer for mercy. Do not say that that child will not hearken or take heed, when he is now made to feel that it is only because of the mercy of God that the earth does not open and swallow him up. Thus he goes mourning and weeping, begging for mercy, until the last hope of mercy is taken from him, and he is made to see his just condemnation, even the justice of God in cutting him off from the face of the earth, and casting him down to the lower regions of darkness and despair. He now realizes what it is to be without hope and without God in the world. Nothing but a heavy burden of guilt and just condemnation rests upon his heart. But the blessed Savior does not leave him there; but in an unexpected moment his burden is gone, his sorrow is turned into joy, and he is made to see Jesus as his Mediator between God and him; how Jesus has taken his sins upon himself, and borne them in his own body on the cross. Yes, he is taken up out of the mire and clay, and placed upon a rock; and a new song is put in his mouth, even praise to God's holy name. He is now made to rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

These, dear brethren, are a few of my thoughts upon those precious words of Jesus. He has declared that of all the Father hath given him he will lose none, but will raise them up at the last day. I am persuaded to believe that all who hear the voice of the Son of God shall live, and none but the chosen vessels of mercy do hear; and that it is not to make them children, but because they are children, that God sends his Spirit into their hearts, crying, Abba, Father.

With these few scattering thoughts I will close, believing that Jesus is able to save all whom he paid the ransom for, and that they shall never perish; but when done with dull mortality Jesus will take them home to dwell with him in the realms of eternal bliss, there to join the hosts that are gone before in the ascriptions of praise, glory and honor to Father, Son and ever-blessed Spirit, in a world that shall never end.

Your brother in hope,

JOSEPH BRUCE.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Ida B. Truitt fell asleep in Jesus August 26th, 1892. She was the daughter of Benton and Pronetta West. She was born May 11th, 1866, and united in marriage to Sylvanus T. Truitt in the year 1889. In the year 1891 was born unto them a boy, which was a joy to both the father and mother; but that joy was soon to be turned into sadness as the mother lay at the point of death. Death stepped in and took away the babe. When they told her that little Harry was dead, and for her to bear it the best she could, she said, "I know all about it. I knew when the breath left him; but I cannot help it. The Lord will help me to bear it, for he has been with me all through my sickness." Seeing that the family was troubled about her she said, "Don't you be troubled any about me; for if it is the Lord's will for me to get well I shall, and if not it is all right. I am not scared at all." She was not a member of the church, but the way she talked during her sickness gave us to believe that she was a child of God. A few moments before the breath left her she said to her husband, "Do the best you can. I am going home to my babe." All was done for her that a good physician, a loving mother and a kind husband could do. We miss them much in their home, but we believe that our loss is their gain; and though they can never come to us, we hope to meet them where parting will be no more, and where the weary will be forever at rest.

The remains were carried to the family burying-ground and placed in the cold and silent grave to await the resurrection morn. O how sad to turn away and say, Farewell for awhile. But we sorrow not as those who have no hope, for we believe that they are at rest with their Savior.

"Asleep in Jesus! blessed sleep!
From which none ever wake to weep!
A calm and undisturbed repose,
Unbroken by the last of foes.

"Asleep in Jesus! O how sweet
To be for such a slumber meet!
With holy confidence to sing
That death has lost its cruel sting."

ONE WHO LOVED THEM.

DIED—At her home in Olive, Ulster Co., N. Y., Emily Everett Winchell, on August 8th, 1892, aged 51 years.

She was left a widow eleven years ago this fall, with four small children, who still live to mourn their loss of a kind mother. Her sickness was of short duration, only three days, being prostrated by heat and extreme weakness. The subject of this notice was by profession a Methodist in her younger days; but when it pleased the Lord to show her that she was a sinner by nature and practice, she lost all confidence in her profession, and in his own time the Lord revealed himself to her as her Savior. Then she could say that it was not by works of righteousness which she had done. She sought a home among the Old Baptists, coming to the church of Olive & Hurley on the third Saturday in July, 1888, and was baptized the following day by Elder J. D. Hubbell. She always afterward took great delight in meeting with her brethren. Being a good singer, she is much missed in the church.

A discourse was delivered on the occasion by Elder Hubbell, using for a text Psalm cxxiv. 8: "Our help is in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth."

J. V. WINCHELL.

OLIVE, N. Y., Oct. 10, 1892.

DIED—In Limestone Co., Texas, Aug. 24th, 1892, of consumption, Mrs. Middiann Crist, wife of Daniel Crist, aged 73 years.

Mrs. Crist joined the Primitive Baptist Church in 1874, and was baptized by Elder Hoge. She was a devoted Old Baptist, relying wholly upon the merits of the crucified and risen Savior for life and salvation. Verily has a mother in Israel gone; but we mourn not as those who have no hope, for we believe that our loss is her gain.

Elder G. B. Williams spoke to the sorrowing relatives and friends from Revelation xiv. 13; after which she was laid to rest in the Mt. Antioch cemetery, there to await the resurrection morn.

A FRIEND.

OCTOBER 7, 1892.

Mrs. Kezia Cooper died Oct. 3d, 1892. She would have been ninety-two years of age on the 28th of this month. Although she had been with us these many years, we were loath to give her up. The rivers of peace rolled over our souls when we neared the parting hour—joy and sorrow intermingled. Her last words were, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." She did not suffer in the body more than a week. Thanks to the dear Lord for this blessed hope, which is like an anchor, holding us safe in life or death.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW HOLLAND, Ohio, Sept. 29, 1892.

DEAR BROTHERS BEEBE:—Will you allow me once more, before the cold weather comes upon us, bringing as it usually does unusual pain and suffering to my feeble, diseased body, to intrude upon the pages and readers of the SIGNS? I wish to send you for insertion in the SIGNS the little poem which you will please find inclosed, entitled, "Homeward Bound," written by our dear sister Abbie G. Clark, of Sanford, Maine. What a fitting title, "Homeward Bound." With what restfulness and meaning the word is fraught. Sick of self and of sin, weary, O! so weary, with the burden, the sorrow and the bitter trials of this tempest-tossed life, with what eagerness and tender longing do we sometimes look forward to the blessed time when we shall find ourselves at home and at rest. Very long and toilsome do we often find this homeward bound journey, and tired and footsore do we become, when, like the Israelites of old, we wander into by and forbidden paths, and our wayward feet take many a backward slip. But as surely as we live we are bound on this journey; and if we have an interest in the blood-bought inheritance of our Redeemer God we will surely reach the desired haven, and find home and rest and peace at last for evermore.

This is a lovely day in Autumn. I am left alone in the house, and my heart feels sad, and a deep sense of loneliness steals over me. In at my open windows glide the golden rays of the September sunlight, filling my room with a flood of warmth and light, and covering the carpet and wall with softly subdued shadows, whose exquisite figures and delightful blendings no touch of the artist's brush could reproduce or imitate. From the public school buildings across the way floats the sound of many young voices, chanting a familiar school song. The dear little birds amid the thick foliage of the near surrounding trees with joyous melody seem to proclaim the blessed truth that God is ever good. Everything without seems full of God-given joy and beauty and life; and nature, although she has put off her bright robes of spring, her glittering garments and bright-hued garlands of midsummer, is clothed in beauty still, and in each of her four seasons speaks ever of the goodness and mercy, the long-suffering and goodness of our covenant-keeping God.

How many weary years have I sat here upon my couch of pain, just as I do to-day, looking out upon the same scenes into the beautiful busy world, of which I am a part, and yet of whose doings and struggles I can take no part. How glad I would be to put a shoulder to the great revolving wheel of life and pursue any honest vocation whereby I might earn a comfortable living; but alas! I can only sit here and look on; and suffer with what patience the dear Lord is pleased to give me. Little change do the years and days and months make in the monotony of my shut-in life. The swollen, heavy body becomes a little more enlarged and helpless; the dropsical dripping more constant and copious; the terrible sores more raw and painful; the weariness and languor and weakness more pronounced perhaps; but the weary years and days, and nights of weariness and pain, go on just the same; and when the dear voice of my heavenly Father will call, "Child, come home," none but the wisdom which is infinite can tell. O the sorrow, the trial, the heavy burdens that weigh me down, how could I endure them one hour were it not for that given strength which is made perfect through weakness? How very mysterious to us are the ways of divine providence. Since I began writing I have looked out at my windows to see a large funeral procession with slow and solemn tread pass by, wending its way to our beautiful city of the dead, to deposit the remains of a young man just in the prime of his bright, vigorous, happy manhood, who, with many others in this vicinity during the past two weeks, has fallen a prey to typhoid fever. Before him lay a bright, happy future, filled, no doubt, with the hopes and aspirations, the reaching out after all the enjoyments of this transitory life, so enticing and desirable to youth. But, like the beautiful flowers, his manhood, his youth, with all his earthly hopes, are cut off. The flower has faded, and the glory thereof has all passed away, and the places that knew him once will know him no more forever. How strange that the Lord sees fit to remove the strong, the healthy, the youthful and useful in this life, whilst a life such as mine is allowed to go on, notwithstanding its seeming uselessness. It is all beyond the understanding and comprehension of the finite mind. How it quiets all my murmurings, my troubled questionings, to know that our lives are all held within the wisdom and control of the wise and holy and infinite God, who is "too wise to err, too good to be unkind," and who rules all things after the counsel of his own will. O for a sweet and quiet resignation to his holy will, and the possession of that perfect love which casteth out all fear.

Notwithstanding the beautiful autumn weather, with its beautiful light and shade, its lovely shadows and tints, its balmy air and cooling breezes, which relieves me somewhat of the terrible oppression for breath I endured during the heat of summer, notwithstanding this glad golden sunshine reminds me constantly of the love of God which shines through and over us all, I feel greatly depressed in spirit. A heavy cloud obscures the view of the Sun of righteousness, whose healing balm alone can supply my spiritual hunger and need. My Martha-like spirit also has filled me with much natural anxiety and dread, and I have indeed been anxious and troubled about many things. How utterly I loathe and despise myself for my lack of faith and calm belief and trust in the promises of God and the sure mercies of David. How often does the declaration of the dear apostle Paul come before me, "The sorrow of the world worketh death." I firmly believe when we give way to the sorrow and vexations of the troublous things of this life, it is at the time as great a detriment to our spiritual advancement, our faith and trust in Christ, as is the giving way and indulging in the allurements and vanities of the world; and it fills one with about as much self-loathing and guilt. The psalmist says, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee." O! if one could in this life, amid all its trials, its painful scenes, and sad and changeful vicissitudes, have the mind stayed on this immovable mountain of strength, this compassionate Savior, this Friend very pitiful and of tender mercy, how peaceful and smooth would be life's rough and storm-clouded sea. I sometimes think the child of God is often brought into a state of great worldly sorrow, and surrounded by a chain of troublous circumstances, in order to bring them more humbly to the feet of Jesus, and cause them to lay the unbearable burden upon the one great Burden-bearer, in whom alone we can find help and solace. "I am the true Vine," saith Jesus, "and my Father is the Husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." He taketh away the branch that beareth not fruit. So those who do not show by their walk that they love and serve the living God, who are "not troubled as other men," who bring no fruit meet for repentance, who have no part with the living, fruitful branches, are taken away. These are not purged; only the fruit-bearing branches. When our physicians find a patient sick, with their system full of poisonous matter, he gives them a purgative, in order to remove all poison and foreign substances. It is useless to give a milk and sugar pill, a honeyed portion, that would not touch the case; but a bitter, nauseous remedy is given, which makes the patient sick indeed before the cure is effected. So with the balm in Gilead, the great Physician there. From the crown of the head even to the feet the sinner is full of bruises and putrefying sores; and the wormwood and the gall is given; the patient becomes dead, even in sin, before the balm is given and the holy Physician quickens the patient dead in trespasses and in sins to newness of life. Then it is the new song bursts from the patient's lips, even praise to God, who has cured his soul and enabled him to walk in newness of life. "Every branch that beareth fruit he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit."—John xv. 2. This passage of Scripture, and indeed the entire chapter, has of late held much sweetness for me, and been fraught with much spiritual beauty and comfort. Jesus says, "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me." O! to be able to abide in the safe and cooling protecting branches of this delightful Vine. Not like the vine that grew over Jonah only to wither and die when the first heat of the golden rays of the sun kissed its tender, spreading branches. Not like the poor, puny earthly props and hopes and reliances to which we often tenderly and foolishly cling, only to see them wither and die and become a heap of dead ashes, around which regretful memories alone can cling; but a Rock of safety, a peaceful abode, a safe, peaceful harbor where we may rest forever from the angry, rushing torrent without. O! what an abiding place for the weary mariner rocked upon the rough sea of sorrow, where the weary and heavy laden may indeed find external rest under the spreading, cooling branches of this blessed Vine, this precious protecting wing of the Almighty,

But I must not intrude farther upon the patience of my dear kindred, nor the space of the SIGNS. Among my mail yesterday was a letter from a dear sister in a far distant state, who said her landlady, a Catholic, said, "Any one who believes the things Mary Parker writes has a demon in their heart." It grieved me at first, and I thought I would not send this imperfect letter to the SIGNS; but I remembered that it was said of dear Jesus, "He hath a devil, and is mad;" and I thought so long as my own dear people do not tell me this I will write, if I have strength. O! pray for me, dear friends, and may God lead us all in paths of righteousness for his dear name's sake, is my prayer.

In deep affliction and trial your sister, I hope,

MARY PARKER.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN GOSPEL AFFECTIONS:—I have recently learned that the enemies of truth have furnished some of our dear brethren with another old, rusty cudgel, called FATALISM, to fight the glorious and precious Bible doctrine with, especially the predestination of all things. Now, if what the enemies of truth, and also some of the good brethren, are calling fatalism, and making a great bugbear of it, is not the doctrine of the Bible, the doctrine that the Primitive Baptists believe and preach, I have failed to understand them. Fatalism means inevitable; necessity; unavoidable; final lot; the destiny that presides over all worlds, beings and things. It is an undeniable fact that God either has appointed and decreed the destiny of all worlds, beings and things, or he has not; one or the other. This none will deny. Hence, if God has so appointed the destiny of all things, all things must act to or in harmony with the appointed end, and cannot do otherwise. You can call it fate, fatalism, or what you please. It is nothing more nor less than God's divine and eternal arrangement of the vast universe, which he of his own sovereign will and pleasure created. Who advised eternal deity how and when to make a world, or how to govern and control it, and the creatures which he was pleased to create? or who advised him to make a world at all? Who (none) hath been his counsellor? or who hath first (God is first and last) given to him? "For their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves beings judges. For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah; their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter; their wine is [not as] the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps."—Deut. xxxii. 31-33. Mark the following question, and let the enemies say yes or no. "Is not this laid up in store with me [God], and sealed up among my [God's] treasures?"—Deut. xxxii. 34. Inasmuch then as the enemies themselves are judges, what will they say to the above text, or how shall they answer the question? was not the "poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps, sealed up in the eternal purpose of God? If not, how came they developed in time? Who opened the way for them to get here? "I the Lord do all these things." There is a time to, and a purpose for, all things, both good and bad. I know that to our blind reason and natural mind these things are perplexing at times, or even at all times; while faith, which is the gift of God, lays hold of things within the veil, and, Job-like, looks beyond Satan, beyond chance, and says, "Shall we received good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil also?" Some of the Lord's dear servants seem to be afraid to preach the doctrine of absolute predestination, for fear of making God the author of sin. Now, my dear brethren, a word of consolation to you. "Be ye reconciled to God." We need not be afraid of making God the author of sin. God cannot be made the author of sin. We cannot make God do anything. Let us come to the front, and not shun to declare all the counsel of God. The plain Bible phrases, predestinated, determined, appointed, decreed, finished, perfect, settled, fixed and done, all mean what some are calling fatalism; that is, that "God doeth [perpetually] according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth," &c.—Dan. iv. 35. The word "doeth" denotes continuation, perpetually, momentarily; and in the text above quoted the clause "He doeth according to his will," proves to a demonstration that there never was, nor ever will be, so much as one moment but the eternal God doeth his will in the heaven above and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou? We know that all things are thus ordained in the world of providence, and are invariable in their operation, and always act to an appointed end; so much so that the very hairs of our head are all numbered, and not a sparrow falls to the ground without the Lord's care or purpose. Then, if all worlds, beings and things have not an appointed end, doubtless they are left to chance and peradventures; and it would sound strange to me to hear any one say that anything was left to go at random, even the smallest atom; and much more strange to hear an Old School or Primitive Baptist say so. Hence, we are driven to the conclusion that if nothing at all is left to chance, all must have an appointed end; and if all things have an appointed end, or inevitable destiny, a sovereign God, who is the only Potentate, Lord of lords and King of kings, an all-wise Creator, Preserver, Controller and Disposer of all things made the appointment. And the Lord our God is so infinitely righteous and just, both in his nature and in all his proceedings with his creatures, that he cannot do wrong, and so infinitely wise that he cannot be mistaken, and is immutable. Therefore he cannot change. Hence, it follows that God is a God of purpose, and that all his purposes are eternal purposes; for there is no succession of time with God, to whose infinite knowledge all past, all present, and all future, is one eternal now; for with the Lord one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. God's foreknowledge saw it all, and his predestinating power fixed the special lot of all worlds, beings and things, which he in wisdom created for his own purpose and glory. Therefore he directs all the forces, controls all the laws, and manages all the affairs of the entire universe, which he has created. This foreknowledge and predestinating control the enemies of truth, together with some precious brethren, are calling fatalism. I heard a good and very precious brother say, a short time since, "I believe in predestination, but I do not believe in fatalism." It does seem to me that is as much as to say, I do not believe in the all-wise decrees and eternal arrangement of an all-wise and all-powerful God, who has declared the end from the beginning, and whose counsel will stand forever; whose dominion is from everlasting to everlasting, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth. The word dominion means having independent possession and right to govern. Where is the individual but believes that God has independent possession of and right to govern all his creatures? Inasmuch then as God has independent possession of and right to govern all worlds, beings and things, we conclude that the Scriptures are plain and to the point that he doeth his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand or prevent his will. Even the wrath of man shall praise the Lord. The remainder of wrath (the wrath of devils) will he (God) restrain. Our national and state laws are made to restrain the wicked, and to protect the good and law abiding; and when the laws cannot and do not restrain the wicked outlaws, the good and law abiding cannot be protected. So also if God did not control all the actions of wicked men and devils, how could he protect his children? "Behold, I send you forth as lambs in the midst of wolves." O how defenseless in themselves are poor, innocent lambs among the ravenous beasts of mountains. But, "fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." All power in heaven and in earth is his. "My glory I will not give to another, neither my praise to graven images."

Now, my dear brethren Beebe, I have suggested these few thoughts as they have presented themselves to me, for your consideration, correction and disposal. It is passing strange to me to see good and able brethren so easily scared, even startled, at the rattling of these old, rusty cudgels that have been used, and are in use now, against the truth of God. But "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment [now is the day of judgment that tongues or doctrines arise], thou shalt condemn," (with the word) &c. O may the Lord so rule in our hearts that our eyes may not be lofty, nor our hearts haughty, neither exercised in things too high for us; but that we may ever be found at the feet of our dear Redeemer, who washed us in his own blood, and made us kings and and priests unto our God, and we shall reign forever and ever.

Yours in defense of Bible truth,
W. J. MAY.

OPELIKA, Ala., Oct. 6, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I will offer a few thoughts on the passage of Scripture found in the prophesy of Isaiah, "Whom shall he teach knowledge? and whom shall he make to understand doctrine? Them that are weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts."—Isa. xxviii. 9. This text has a double interrogative, and a final declarative sentence, which answers the question asked. If the Bible was a book of interrogations, how metaphysical and mysterious it would be; but God in mercy has asked questions which we could never answer, and in mercy he has answered them for us. This text of Scripture is a little volume infolded, and I am aware that in one short article I can only bring out a few features of the text, which I hope may be of some benefit to some humble child of grace. We know that all characters taught must be susceptible of being taught; and in the answer here, we observe a babe, one who has first access to the breasts. They are always born before they nurse. So a birth must precede teaching. It is not one dead in sins and trespasses that is taught. It is not one in the kingdom of darkness. It is not one of the devil's duped idiots. It is a child; one really born; one really translated out of the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of God's own Son; one quickened into life; born again, of incorruptible seed, by the word of God; a new creature; one alive from the dead; one who has become as a little child. Then it is clearly taught that it is not one without, but one within the kingdom of grace. Paul taught in harmony with this thought when he wrote to the church at Corinth, "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."—1 Cor. ii. 14. There is line upon line, and precept upon precept, teaching the certainty of this truth of our God. Then, having settled the question of the necessity of the manifestation of the child, before teaching begins, we will now consider the great Teacher, and what is taught. God is the Teacher; and it is written, "All thy children [which are the children of Zion, the Jerusalem which is from above, and the mother of us all] shall be taught of the Lord." These are her children, and also the children of God, manifested here in the earth, as the seed. What is now taught these children is the question of the text. The answer first is knowledge. How ignorant is a new-born babe. They are alive, but know nothing, except that they live. They open their eyes to light, and doubtless joy in that light and life which is in them. They draw substance from the mother, and feed upon the milk, until a certain time; and they are taught. God teaches them, first, that they are weak, helpless, and are but dust and ashes before him, the eternal God of heaven and earth. They tremble in his presence, and stand in awe because of him, in great humility of soul; and God speaks to them; his own character is impressed upon them, and they learn early the knowledge that he is God, and besides him there is none else; that he is the Sovereign over earth and sea, over heaven and hell, and all deep places; that he does his sovereign will, and that his sovereign pleasure is the rule of his conduct; and hence they have the evidence of eternal life in them; for "this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom he hath sent." He is the God of Abraham and of Isaac, the God of Elijah and of Daniel; the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; the living God. The knowledge of life and of salvation, of sin and of death, is of him. For God puts his laws in their minds, and writes them in their hearts. The knowledge of the law of sin and death is in the mind of his children daily; the nature of sin, in its effects, which works death, which they are reminded of, having been taught of God. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus is also taught them; a lesson they have learned by heart, in heart, and know they are not under the law of sin and death, but are made free from the same; and they are under grace, and are taught by grace all the lessons needed in this life. "For the grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us [the children under consideration] that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, right-

ously and godly in this present world."—Titus ii. The knowledge of salvation is in Christ; hence the necessity of knowing him, whom to know is life eternal. Hence Peter tells them to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of the truth as it is in our Lord Jesus Christ. Jesus also said, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Learning and being taught the knowledge of salvation, we are in the high school of learning. It is a school indeed. We may well call it the "Old School," the original, primitive school; and like the old wine, when we have drank it, we do not want the new; for we say, The old is better. It is here we learn the language of Zion and of Canaan, a language that never changes nor becomes corrupted; a pure tongue and a true language that never needs progress, nor can it be improved upon. Paul was taught it, and could speak it so clearly that all the children can receive it and appreciate it; for he learned it at the fountain head, and said he neither received it of man, neither was he taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.—Gal. i. How does God teach knowledge? We answer, By faith, and the revelation of the Spirit of God. That is the anointing which teaches us all things. Daniel was under the same teacher, which enabled him to tell the king's dream, and to read the hand-writing on the wall; and he declared that the secret of his ability to read and interpret was nothing in him, more than any other man; but there was a God in heaven that revealed secrets. He received his knowledge from God, and gave God the credit for it. When Paul received this light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ, he could truly say, "Yea, doubtless and I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ; the righteousness which is of God by faith."—Phil. iii. 9. The excellency of this knowledge is known to all the heirs of promise, and is superior to all other knowledge. It comes by faith and revelation, the sure way of communication, the way of God, which abides and fades not away. It is put in the mind, and written in the heart; indelibly written, not with pen and ink, but with the Spirit of the living God. How much is embraced in this subject now becomes manifest; and, as a brother remarked in preaching, the more he plowed the bigger the field got, and he would then stick his plow and try and plow again in the same field.

I will say the same; for while I have but faintly touched on the first part of the text, I want to write about understanding doctrine, and what doctrine is meat; also the milk passages, and the meat of the world, and other things that now occur to my mind; but having been sick the last few days, and now convalescing, I will close for the present, hoping if it is the will of God to write again concerning the doctrine, order, practice and discipline of the house and family of God.

Yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

OZARK, Ala., Sept., 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN:—A brother in the north requested my views on secret societies, and a statement of my objections to them.

1st. They are worldly institutions, and made up of the world. God's people should be separate from the world. "Ye are not of the world." "Greater is he that is in you than he that is in the world." "And all the world wondered after the beast." Does not all the world wonder after the various secret societies to-day? Then it must be a part of the beast.

2d. Their doctrines and commandments are of men. "Touch not, taste not, handle not; which all are to perish with the using, after the doctrines and commandments of men."

3d. To belong to a secret society you must be unequally yoked together with unbelievers, which is positively forbidden by Paul.—2 Cor. vi. 14-18. "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? and what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? and what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? For ye are the temple of the living God." "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord; and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you." In those institutions men of every profession belong, and also the most profane of the world. Hence when you fellowship those institutions you are in fellowship with all the daughters of anti-christ and the world.

4th. They have religious services in their meetings, at burials, &c., and the most profane will offer prayer, which is an abomination in the sight of God.

5th. I object to them because it is a distrust of God and a denial of the faith of God's elect to condescend to such. The love of God shed abroad in the heart causes the children of God to live better and nobler lives, and to love each other. We should discharge our duty to each other, and we have all that we can ask for in the church. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Jesus does not tell us to seek a secret society for protection. Says one, "I join this society, pay my money there, and get it to care for my family when I am dead." What a god you are trusting in! one that you have to feed and clothe while you live, to enable him to care for your family. Do you have so little confidence in God? We are dependent upon the Lord temporally and spiritually; and the same God that takes care of you will provide for your wife and children. Sarepta's widow did not have to join a secret society to get the Lord to sustain her; neither Elijah, nor any of the ancient saints. David says, "I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." How then can a child of God distrust him enough to join such a society? We should have no god before the true God. I am not afraid to trust my wife in the hands of that God who controls all things and upholds all things by the word of his power; for he will never leave nor forsake us.

6th. I object to secret societies because they are unscriptural; and as the Scriptures perfectly and thoroughly furnish the man of God unto all good works, these societies not being in the Bible we conclude they are evil, and the child of God does not need them. As the Scriptures are a thorough furnisher, we need no more.

7th. We should have too much esteem for the cause of Christ and the fellowship of our brethren to join a man-made institution, which brings confusion into the church. We should be willing to sacrifice all these things for the welfare of Zion and for the love of the church, since Christ sacrificed his own life for us. I could not condescend to join a man-made society while I belong to the greatest institution upon the earth, the church.

8th. Another objection is, you cannot be a member of the church, a true follower of Christ, and belong to a secret society. The word church means called out; and when we belong to these things we are not called out from the world.

9th. Another objection is, we cannot belong to a secret society, and be a friend to it, without being God's enemy. All will admit that secret societies, Sunday Schools, &c., are of the world; and "he that is a friend of the world is an enemy to God." The Old Baptists will not fellowship secret societies, because we do not want the church filled with God's enemies.

10th. It is not a plant planted by our heavenly Father, and shall be rooted up. "Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up." The Baptists of this country many years ago passed nonfellowship resolutions, which read about as follows: "We

"He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me. He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward. And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward."—Matt. x. 40-42.

In compliance with a request received some months since from an esteemed brother in Pennsylvania, asking our views on the last verse quoted above, we submit the following remarks. The verse specified by our inquiring brother is so closely connected with the preceding verses that it would do violence to the subject to detach any single expression from them. By reference to the preceding portion of this chapter it will be seen that the Lord Jesus was giving to his chosen apostles a solemn charge for their guidance in the work to which he had appointed them. The text under consideration is the close of that charge. It is important to observe this fact in the application of the words to which our attention is called. Primarily, all that is written in this chapter has its application to the inspired apostles. Sent forth as sheep in the midst of wolves, they were not allowed to make any effort to protect themselves against the malice of their persecutors. When they should be delivered up to governors and kings, they were not even at liberty to take thought what they should say in their own defense. This would have been very discouraging to them but for the revelation accompanying the command, "For it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you." They were prepared by special inspiration to manifest the power of God in sustaining them under the persecutions and cruel wrath of the enemies of that truth which they were ordained to proclaim. That wicked spirit which had called their divine Master Beelzebub, would certainly spare no efforts to afflict them whom he had sent to proclaim his word. Yet they were commanded not to fear them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul. Certainly they needed the supporting power of God to enable them to obey this commission which they received from their Lord. The record in the Acts witnesses how well this assuring word of their Lord was fulfilled in their deliverance from the wrath of men, and in their irresistible words of testimony to the truth as they had received it by the Spirit which was given them of God. But with all this strength so freely given them, they were assured of the severe tribulation which they must encounter in the fulfillment of the work to which they were appointed by their Lord. Called to be set as stars in the gospel firmament, they must partake of the sufferings of Christ to a depth beyond what nature could endure. The grace of God alone could sustain them in their great fight of afflictions. They could only reign with their Lord experimentally through the fellowship of his sufferings. In walking as children of the light they must follow Jesus through the afflictions which oppressed him in his humiliation. They could only choose this path of tribulation as they were led by the Spirit of Christ. The natural man with the love of self directing his choice, could never desire to endure the loss of all things for the enjoyment of the presence of Jesus. Yet this is just what the Lord assured his followers should be their portion in following him. But to encourage them in their deep afflictions he gave them the promise of his presence to uphold them in every time of trial. So perfectly are they identified with him, that "In all their afflictions he was afflicted; and the angel of his presence saved them." This ever present protection of their Lord is very strongly declared in the words of our text.

"He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me." In this first journey of the apostles this word of the Lord was literally fulfilled. Being sent by his authority, all that was done to them was done to him by whose commandment they went forth preaching the gospel of his kingdom. And further, they spoke only the things which were taught them by his Spirit; so that the doctrine was not their own except as it was given them of their Lord; therefore they could not be received without receiving him that sent them. Since Jesus came to do the will of him that sent him, he could only be received as the fullness of the Godhead was received in him. Thus was the divine authority of the apostolic ministry established upon the solid basis of the will of the eternal God.

But the rich consolation of the gospel is ministered to every subject of electing love in that each of them is qualified to receive the apostles as embodying the testimony of divine truth. This is the conclusive witness of the seal of the Spirit in every case. None can receive the truth of inspiration unless the Spirit of Christ has revealed that truth in them by the faith of the Son of God. Every one, therefore, who rejoices in the revelation of salvation from sin by the grace of God which is in Christ

Jesus, has this indisputable witness in himself whereby it is certain that he is led by the Spirit of God, and is identified as one of the sons of God. Then, it is of the utmost importance to each one who hopes for salvation in Christ, to know whether he bears this mark by which they are sealed who have that knowledge of God which is eternal life. The question is not whether you are worthy to claim an interest in the blood of Jesus Christ. Do you receive the testimony of the apostles as the truth of God? If not, in what is your hope for salvation founded? But if you do receive the inspired testimony of the apostles, you thereby receive the Redeemer, and the Father, by whose will he was sent to save that which was lost. Our Lord says, "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."—John xvii. 3. This knowledge is in every one who knows and receives the truth as written by the inspired apostles. Without receiving the Father and the Son whom he hath sent, there can be no confession that the apostles are the inspired witnesses of the truth which God by his Spirit moved them to preach and to write. There can be no separation between the doctrine of complete salvation from sin by the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, and the truth of the existence of that God who has given the revelation by his Spirit. Only he that receiveth the apostles in their testimony to the truth, can receive the truth that God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.—Heb. xi. 6.

"He that receiveth a prophet in the name of a prophet shall receive a prophet's reward; and he that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward." There is no authority in this divine teaching for that blind acceptance of every deceiver, which the world calls universal charity. The reward of the saint who receives a prophet or a righteous man, is the reward of those whom he receives. This is most clearly illustrated by the experience of the subjects of grace in their individual intercourse with the people of God. When the hungry and thirsty saint has been brought into the depth of desolation and loneliness, he is prepared to receive a prophet in the name of a prophet. Then the prophet of the Lord comes to him in the power of his God, and he is gladly received in the name of that glorious Messenger of the Covenant, in whom his people delight. In that holy communion which is then enjoyed, the saint who receives this prophet does indeed receive the reward of heavenly joy which is the reward of the prophet whom he is favored to receive. Only when he is received by living faith in the name of a prophet do the saints receive this reward. When doubt and unbelief forbid his being thus received, there is no reward to the faithless saint.

The same truth is applicable in the intercourse of the saints one with another. It is only when the hearer is prepared to receive the gospel as proclaimed by an apostle, or minister, in the same spirit by which it is spoken, that the hearer receives the word in the mutual fellowship which brings divine joy as its reward. This is the same reward in the prophet or preacher, and in the hearer, who receives the testimony of the servant of the Lord.

"And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward." There is in this declaration a wonderful evidence of the loving care of our gracious Lord for the peace of his dear followers in their earthly sojourn; and this special solicitude is manifested and left on record for the encouragement of such as may feel that they are not receiving the comforts provided for them who are the objects of divine love. The language of inspiration is very definite both in describing the character to whom this fraternal kindness shall be shown, and in specifying the action which shall certainly bring the appointed reward. The little ones so graciously protected by the guardian care of our Lord are more fully identified as those which believe in Jesus. In the sense of the gospel use of the word there are no little ones except such as are made little by that divine teaching which leads them to believe in him as the only Savior of his people from their sins. Every such little one is manifestly a disciple of our Lord, who was made sin for us. He was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich. The abundant riches of Christ are freely bestowed upon every one whom he has brought to see the utter destitution in which he is when judged by his own merits. The effect of this manifestation of his own poverty is always to produce that hunger and thirst after righteousness by which the sovereign Judge has described them who are blessed. To those who are thus made to feel their helpless condition as dying of thirst, the only relief is in that supply which can satisfy his longing. This is written in the words of inspired wisdom. "As cold waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country."—Prov. xxv. 25. None can bring to the thirsty soul this cup of cold water unless the good news has been given him from the only Fountain of living waters. And none can even wish for this heavenly drink until by the Spirit of Christ he has been made alive from the death of condemnation in sin. When such a thirsty character can find no comfort in his own righteousness, he is that poor and needy one whom the Lord will hear even when his tongue fails from the intensity of his thirst.—Isa. xli 17. Since their thirst can be satisfied with nothing but that living water which Jesus gives, it is certain that the refreshing cup can be given to the thirsty one by none but those who are qualified for administering it by the grace of God. Thus all the glory is due to our Lord both from the suffering one who has been comforted and from the messenger who has been favored to administer to that little one's relief.

There is deep significance in the specification "only in the name of a disciple." Even though one of the saints is relieved from material suffering by the ministration of one who has no fellowship with his faith in Christ Jesus, such service does not bring to the benefactor the reward to which our Lord refers in this text. However his natural conscience may commend his action as showing pity for the sufferings of his fellow men, there is no receiving of the reward of divine consolation unless the motive prompting the service is that fellowship of the Spirit by which the sufferer is recognized as a disciple, a member of the body of Christ. Then the truth is felt which was declared by the Lord Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."—Acts xx. 35. In giving comfort to one who is recognized in the fellowship of Jesus as a disciple, there is the experience of the high privilege of ministering to our Lord himself, as he says, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."—Matt. xxv. 40. There can be no greater reward received by any saint in this state of existence than the approving smile of the Lord Jesus, as it is received in administering to the comfort of his afflicted and poor people in their tribulations here in time. This is felt by the disciples of Christ in the act of giving service to those whom the Spirit has marked as his disciples in the fellowship of his sufferings.

Neither the reward nor the chastening of the subjects of salvation can affect their eternal life in Christ Jesus. The grace of God has perfectly assured the everlasting happiness of all for whom Jesus died. Neither anything they do, nor anything they suffer, can change the result in which is secured the deliverance of all that were given him by the Father; and they must be with him in that eternal glory which he had with the Father before the world was. This is determined both by the will of the Savior and by the eternal purpose of the Father. He says, "This is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day. His own will is also recorded. "Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me; for thou lovedst me before the foundation of the world."—John vi. 39; xvii. 24. Both the commendation and the reproof spoken concerning the saints are applicable alone to their present subjection to the body of this death. Here they must reap what they have sown. If they sow to the flesh they shall of the flesh reap corruption. If they sow to the Spirit they shall of the Spirit reap live everlasting. This was written to the churches of Galatia, whom Paul recognized as brethren and as his little children. Certainly they were not taught of God to rely upon any works of their own for acceptance in Christ Jesus. Only their present experience of the fruit of their doings could be dependent upon their works. In this sense the saints are admonished to "Let brotherly love continue." Thus walking in the Spirit, they will be as in the primitive age, when "The multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul; neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common."—Acts iv. 32. No natural affection can compare with this divine love in which the saints are perfectly united when they walk in the Spirit. Such kindness is only produced by the power of grace reigning in the heart, and causing each one who is governed by it to esteem others better than himself. This is that practical exhibition of divine love reigning in the saints, whereby they not only show to others that they have been with Jesus, but in it each one is enabled to confirm his own trust in the grace of God. It must be observed that it is only in this fervent charity among ourselves that our own confidence is manifested. This is in accord with the exhortation, "My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth. And hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him."—1 John iii. 18, 19. In the exercise of fervent charity among ourselves it is not needful that we should profess a regard for each other which is not real; but that we yield obedience to the principle of fervent love, which is always the fruit of the Spirit of grace in those who are led by it. There can be no real love of God in one who has no love for those in whom the Spirit of God dwells. And the fact that love is drawn out to those who bear the image of Jesus, proves beyond question that the Spirit of Christ dwells in that one who feels such attraction. This assurance is the practical reward that is received by the saints in the mutual manifestation of that perfect love which unites those who have obtained like precious faith with the apostles and followers of our Lord Jesus. It is not like a natural reward which is received for service rendered; but in the keeping of the statutes of our King there is great reward. Love is the fulfilling of this royal law of liberty; and every one who is governed by that fruit of the Spirit is sure to receive the abundant reward of the answer of a good conscience toward God in every expression of fervent charity toward the subjects of divine grace. The comfort ministered to one of these little ones is richly bestowed upon every one who brings such joy to the afflicted one.

AGENTS WANTED.

A FULL OUTFIT FREE.

WE are desirous of establishing agencies throughout the whole country for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES; therefore we have decided to offer liberal inducements to our brethren and friends to act as our agents in procuring new subscribers, collecting, &c., for the paper. No person will be received as an agent who is not a paid-up subscriber. As we wish to have this system in full working order by the first of next year, we request those desiring to receive an agency to inform us as early as possible.

PLEASE BE CAREFUL.

It frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. Or if the paper is being sent in her name and the renewal is sent in her husband's name the same thing is likely to occur. Please be very careful to give the same name in which the paper is already coming, also the post office address at which it is received.

will not hold in fellowship any church or member who holds in fellowship or tolerates any of the following: Sunday Schools, Theological Schools, Bible or Tract Societies, Missionary Boards, Temperance Societies, Odd Fellows, Masons, or any other society, secret or otherwise, that does now exist, or may hereafter exist, founded on the wisdom of men." Many say they would come to us if we would receive them and let them remain members of their fraternities. We do not want any such. If one loves a secret society better than the Old Baptists, he is not yet fit to live in the church. I want to see one willing to lay down alien baptism, secret societies, and everything, for the sake of the church. I do not want those Babylonish garments brought in among the Old Baptists. Whenever one of our members here joins a secret society we immediately exclude them from our fellowship, unless they quit it and make the proper acknowledgements. Baptists should have a strict discipline, for it keeps the church in a healthy condition. I have had the privilege of baptizing a number who had belonged to the Masons, but they have always been willing to give them up for the sake of the church. They know how corrupt it is, since they have been given grace to see the corruption of it. See Hassell's Church History, pages 706, 733, 737, 742, 831, 889, 902, 903, 908. I do hope Primitive Baptists will never so distrust their God and dishonor their high profession as to join such societies. Should there be any who have departed and married one of these daughters of antichrist, I trust they may return. Let us follow the meek and lowly Savior. Primitive Baptists are one family, and should labor to keep all such things out of Zion.

Yours in affliction,

GARNETT, Kansas, Sept. 5, 1892.

DEAR AND MUCH ESTEEMED BROTHER AND SISTER HUBBELL:— I feel that words would be very inadequate were I even to try to tell you of the warm welcome your most excellent letter found within my heart. None but those who, like dear mother and myself, have not the blessed privilege of meeting and communing face to face and heart to heart with those we love and esteem as the children of the heavenly King, can tell what a comfort it is to receive communications from those we hold near and dear for the truth's sake, whose hearts speak the same spiritual language, and who feel that in and of themselves they are poor and needy, having no righteousness of their own to boast of, but rely alone on the finished work of the crucified and risen Savior, who left his glorious throne on high, and took upon him the form of sinful flesh, suffered, bled and died, that just such poor, helpless sinners as you and I might live; for he came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

I think this is the week for our association. How much I would enjoy being with you. How different will be the preaching from the current religion of the day, where man is doing so much to help God convert the world to Christ. They say they believe in free grace, and yet believe it all depends on the creature whether he will be saved or not. They kindle a fire, and warm themselves by the sparks thereof. Surely their rock is not as our Rock. Yet many of God's saved children are among them. Sometimes I meet one that I can take comfort in talking with upon the subject of experience; yet they are so bound down by the works of the creature and the traditions of men that they seem to be always learning, but never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. I always feel sorry for them, and I really think they feel sorry for poor me. It was not a great while ago that a lady with whom I was conversing told me she could not see how any one as conversant with the Scriptures as I was, and as well informed on other subjects, could be so narrow-minded. And it was all because I said, in answer to a question, that I had never felt to pray for the conversion of the world. She thought if the Old School Baptists believed as I did they must be a very narrow and selfish sect. I told her we were broad enough to take in every redeemed child of God, and that included every needy and weary sinner; that those who were rich and full, in and of themselves, did not need the prayers of such a poor worm of the dust as I am. So you see it is not all smooth sailing with me, as far as this world is concerned. But thanks be to the Father's love and care, what the world says does not worry me. My chief desire is to be found in the strait and narrow path that leadeth unto Jesus, who is the chiefest among ten thousand; that my soul may be staid upon my God, who is my rock and refuge in the day of trouble, my covert from the storm, and my only hope of salvation in this life, or in the life to come; neither do I desire any other; for well I know that nothing but free and sovereign grace and an omnipotent arm could save such a sinner as poor me. O how I do love to hear his dear name exalted above every name. It has been his blessed will to keep me very near him of late; and although surrounded by outward turmoil, my heart has been filled with a peace and love this world can neither give nor take away. In and of myself I am the same poor, wayward mortal I ever have been. Most fully do I realize my weakness and my dependence upon him from whom must come every good and perfect gift; with whom is no variableness nor shadow of turning; for he is in one mind, and none can turn him; and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth.

My health has been real good all summer, much better than usual, until the past month. I think I will be better soon. If not, God will give me grace equal to my day. I feel that I have so much to be thankful for; I have so little to bear in comparison with some of God's little ones. It makes me feel very unworthy of all the many mercies the Lord daily bestows upon me. Surely God is good. Last evening, while my sister and niece were gone to their place of worship, I read sister Garrard's short letter in the SIGNS, in which she speaks of the many trials and sorrows she had been called to endure. Surely, I thought, nothing but the everlasting arm of the Father's love could sustain her faith under such trials. While reading it I could but wonder and adore him for his goodness' sake, and for his wonderful works to the children of men. I was also much edified and instructed in reading the editorial on "Every man's work shall be tried." It seems to me the SIGNS grow better every year. O how I would miss it if deprived of it. I read brother Alva Bogart's letter to my brother-in-law, in which he wrote the sad news of sister Emma Winchel's death. It was very sad to us; but it was no doubt a sweet and blessed rest for her. Thus one by one God calls his children home, and their mortal remains are laid in the silent tomb, to await the glad summons of the resurrection morn. O haste the glad day. May God comfort those who remain, with this blessed hope, and be a father to the dear orphan children.

No, dear brother, I was not even vexed when I saw in the SIGNS my last letter to you; but I must confess that I could not see where the goodness came in. To me it looked very lame, as are all the productions from my pen. But I was willing to leave it to your better judgment, knowing that God can make use of the least of his flock.

With much love to you and yours,
your sister,
SARAH VAN VELSAN.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Maine Old School Baptist Association, to the churches whose messengers we are.

DEAR BRETHREN:—We will begin our annual epistle in the use of the words of an inspired apostle of our Lord Jesus Christ, in his epistle to the Ephesians, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ, according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love; having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved. In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace; wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence; having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together in one all things, both which are in heaven and which are in earth, even in him. In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." And now, brethren, with what wisdom God has given us, we will speak of some things in connection with this will which the apostle here speaks of. In his letter to the Romans he says, "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." We find these words of Jesus recorded in John vi. 37-40, in which is brought to view some of the gifts of God to his Son: "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day. And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day." In the seventeenth chapter of John it is recorded, "These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee; as thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him." "I have glorified thee on the earth; I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." Jesus said, John x. 27-30, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me; and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand. My Father which give them me is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand. I and my Father are one." We might go on making quotations of Scripture in which the gifts of God are recorded. We will mention one other, and we feel inclined to write some of our thoughts in connection therewith. In Luke xii. 32 we find these words recorded, "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." This flock has been known as a little flock in all ages of the world; an afflicted and poor people; for they are chosen in the furnace of affliction. God's children ever have been, and always will be, a little flock, compared with the nations of this world. It is not up with the world in devising ways and means to find out God, nor in worshipping idols, which are the imaginations of the carnal mind. The world does not worship that God whose gifts and calling are without repentance, and who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. Their god is a kind of secondary being, who cannot work unless they are willing. He is not the God of this little flock, who can work, and none can hinder; who has declared the end from the beginning, saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." The world will eat their own bread, and wear their own apparel, but desire to be called by the name of Christ, to take away their reproach. It was not to such characters that Jesus spake when he said, "Fear not, little flock." At one time he said, "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight." If it was not to the wise and prudent that Jesus spoke, we conclude it was to those babes spoken of in this last quotation; those who are of a humble and contrite spirit; those who fear God, and who think upon his name; those who trust in him who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance, and taketh up the isles as a very little thing. These babes look upon him who is their all and in all; for in Jesus Christ are all their riches; and at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

"For it is your Father's good pleasure." What consolation is this to the tried, tempted and way-worn pilgrim in this world of trial and sorrow, to hear the voice of the Son of God proclaiming, "It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." In natural things if we do anything that is pleasant, or that we delight in doing, we say we do it with pleasure; but if we prefix the word good, we have it expressed in a higher degree. And here Jesus says, "It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Dear brethren, you do not merit this kingdom by what you have done, or can do, or will do; for it is God's gift; and his gifts are without repentance, and through our Lord Jesus Christ. It is not that he will give it to you if you accomplish certain things necessary to gain his favor, such as turning from sin, giving your hearts to God, falling in with the overtures of mercy, accepting the plan of salvation, &c. It is a gift, free and unmerited. If justice had been dealt out to us according to our works, we would have been banished with an everlasting destruction from the presence of God and the glory of his power. But, blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began, it was his good pleasure to give you the kingdom in eternity, before the world was made. Well may we rejoice that we are in the hand of a just and holy God; for he will not forsake this little flock, but will keep it by his power, through faith unto salvation. It is not by the will of man, nor the will of the flesh, but by the will of God that we are brought from darkness to light, and to the knowledge of his beloved Son, and to the assembly of an innumerable company of angels. The flesh profiteth nothing. It is the Spirit of life from God the Father, through his dear Son Jesus Christ, who is both Lord and Christ; who came to this sin-defiled world, took on him the seed of Abraham, and was made in all points like unto his brethren, yet without sin, that he might make an acceptable sacrifice for his people. It was said unto Joseph by the angel, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." And Jesus said, "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." Hence he says, "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." The heathen may rage, and Satan may oppose with all his power; but this good pleasure of the Father is sealed with blood; not of beasts slain on Jewish altars, but with the precious blood of the Son of God, whose soul was poured out unto death for his bride, his elect, his chosen, and now his redeemed.

Finally, brethren, in concluding this letter we will use some of the language of the same apostle that we quoted from in the introduction, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? As it is written, For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter. Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us. For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."—Rom. viii. 35-39.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Maine Old School Baptist Association, convened with the Bowdoinham Church, at Bowdoinham, Maine, Sept. 9th, 10th & 11th, 1892, to the meetings, associations and churches with which she corresponds; grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

DEAR BRETHREN:—By the goodness and mercy of God we have been permitted to meet in association, according to the appointment, and to sit together in communion and fellowship. We trust we have been comforted by the faithful testimony of our God, who hath saved us with so great a salvation. We have had but one visiting minister in attendance at our meeting, namely, brother F. A. Chick, who came to us in the fullness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ, preaching Jesus as declared in the Scriptures, to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness; but unto them who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God. Your messengers and messages have been gladly received; and if you can still bear with us, we desire a continuance of your correspondence.

Our next meeting will be held, the Lord willing, with the Whitefield Church, commencing on Friday before the second Monday in September, 1893, and continue three days, when and where we hope to be remembered by you, and to receive your messengers among us.

PLEASE DO NOT.

OUR subscribers are especially requested not to pay their subscriptions for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES to Postmasters to forward to us, as they generally deduct twenty or twenty-five per cent. from the amount and send us the balance, retaining the discount as their commission, and often sending what they do remit in postage stamps. We also caution our patrons against "Newspaper Agencies," as they deduct a like commission. It is a very simple matter for a subscriber to get a post-office money order or a postal note, inclose it in a letter, and direct it to us, or to put the money in the letter and have it registered; but where several are sending from the same office it is well to choose one of the number to send for all at the one time. Therefore we have advertised, under the caption of "Agents Wanted," for brethren and friends to act as our agents.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

BROTHER James Black departed this life June 2d, 1892, and was buried on the 5th. He was a brother in good standing with the Particular Covenanted Baptist Church of Ontario, Canada, having been baptized by the late Elder T. McColl, Oct. 21st, 1861. He was married to Miss Sarah McBrayen in 1856. He left two daughters and six sons, two daughters being dead. He was the son of John and Flora Black, who were members of the same church. The father has been dead some years. Our sister and her family, and also his aged mother, have our sincere sympathy in their sore bereavement; but the Lord giveth and taketh away, and blessed be the name of the Lord. There are also four sisters and one brother left to mourn their loss.

Our brother left full directions concerning his funeral, selecting several portions of Scripture to be read, and also what to sing, which was all carried out. The writer spoke from one of the portions at his residence to the relatives and friends assembled.

WM. POLLARD.

SISTER Sarah Wood died at her son's residence in Surry Co., N. C., near Venable, on Oct. 3d, 1892, aged 70 years and 6 months.

She was born April 15th, 1822, joined the Primitive Baptist Church at Cody's Creek, Surry Co., N. C., in January, 1866, and was baptized by Elder Nathan Alberty, in Snow Creek, in February following, having to break the ice in order to the performing of the baptism. She was a faithful and upright member of the Primitive or Old School Baptist Church of Jesus Christ for more than twenty-six years. She was married to Mr. Henry Wood when very young, and bore him seven children (four boys and three girls), all yet living. Two of her sons are worthy members of the Old School Baptist Church, the unworthy writer having baptized them. At sister Wood's request the writer was sent for, and tried to speak words of comfort to the weeping children, grandchildren and neighbors on Oct. 4th, 1892.

I feel that we had a good meeting, by being enabled by the divine Spirit to look beyond the grave, and to throw death away. Sister Wood is at rest with Jesus. Amen.

STATE ROAD, N. C., Oct. 11, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—By request of the parents I forward a notice of the death of Delila A. Casey Slape.

The subject of this notice was born March 11th, 1873, and died Sept. 27th, 1892, being 19 years, 6 months and 16 days old. She was the daughter of my oldest brother, Jesse N. Casey, and the wife of Thomas Slape. She left a little babe about eight months old. Her disease was typhoid fever. She was confined to her bed about three weeks, and suffered a great deal, but bore all her sickness and pain with christian fortitude, never murmuring, but all the time submissive; and for several days she seemed desirous to go home, being perfectly willing and anxious to die. She talked a great deal for several days, and at times would ask them to sing; and then she would say,

"If you won't sing I will sing myself." Then she would sing as long as her strength would admit; and even after she was so weak that she could not speak so as to be understood she could be heard singing certain tunes, and appeared very happy most of the time during her illness. She left all the evidence that could be wished that she was dying in the full triumphs of a living faith. She was a member of the Missionary Baptist Church. She has left her husband, father, mother, two brothers and two sisters, together with many other relatives and friends, to mourn; but we mourn not as those who have no hope, for we are satisfied that our loss is her eternal gain. She was carried to a small country graveyard in the neighborhood, in Blythe township, and the unworthy uncle and writer tried to speak some words of comfort, and to implore the blessings of God on the bereaved; after which her remains were laid in the grave to await the trump of God, when all the dear children of God will come forth and meet him in the air, and ever be with him.

May this sad dispensation of God's providence be overruled to the good of all the bereaved friends, and may it rebound to the glory of God, is the prayer of the unworthy writer.

WM. J. CASEY.

LEAD HILL, Ark., Oct. 16, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—Please publish in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES the death of sister M. Julia Harris, who departed this life Oct. 4th, 1892, in the 83d year of her age.

Sister Harris was born Jan. 29th, 1810, and in the early part of her life was a member of the Methodist Protestant Church. Her associations among friends who were Old Baptists led her to attend their meetings, where she heard the gospel preached different from what she heard in the society to which she then belonged, causing her mind to become deeply exercised in the way of salvation by grace, and not by the works of the law, as taught in the church of which she was a member. In this condition Christ was revealed to her as the way of salvation, and the only atonement that could wash away her sins. She now forsook her former associations with the Methodists, and became a regular attendant at the meetings of the Baptists, opening the door of her house to them to hold their meetings. Her husband also, Walter Harris, manifested true friendship to the Old Baptists, and took great interest in their meetings; and although he died without making a public profession, yet he showed by his kindness and love toward the Old Baptists that he was a sinner saved by grace.

Sister Harris, after the death of her husband, followed the Old Baptists; and in October, 1867, she came before the church in Alexandria, confessing her weakness to satisfy a violated law by her own works in the flesh, putting her trust alone in the blood and righteousness of Christ as the atonement for her sins. The church gladly received her, and she was baptized in the fellowship of the church by Elder Wm. J. Purington, in October, 1867, where she remained a worthy member until she has been called to the church triumphant. Truly the church has lost a mother in Israel, and a sister they dearly loved. Her request was that I should attend her funeral service. I visited her often during her last sickness, and always found her strong in the faith. Her desire was often expressed that the time of her departure would come quickly. She desired to depart and be with Christ, which she considered far better. In some fainting spells which she had she seemed absent from the body; and when revived she felt sorry that it was her lot to return to the old body of flesh again, to suffer in the flesh.

Her funeral was largely attended by members, relatives and friends, who were loath to part with her; but we know that our loss is her gain.

JOSEPH BRODERS.

Elder John Plum died Sept. 16th, 1892, at his home near Hannahsville, Tucker Co., W. Va., in his 70th year.

Brother Plum was born in Monongalia Co., W. Va. He joined the Eden Church, I think, with his dear wife, thirty-eight years ago, and they were baptized by Elder Herbert Cool. He had been preaching about thirty-six years. His disease was dropsy of the heart, with which he had been afflicted for several years, suffering a great deal, and the last twelve months was confined to his home nearly all the time; but he bore his affliction with great patience. His dear wife was kind to him. His son-in-law, brother S. T. Fisher, and his daughter Lizzie, lived with brother Plum and waited upon him. I visited him just a few days before his departure, and found him very poorly, but strong in the faith. I tried to preach for him; and the next day, after I left, he said that he could do now forty days. This was a word he would often use when he heard preaching that suited him.

Brother Plum was one that surely fought a good fight, one that surely kept the faith, one that surely was born of the Spirit, one that I never heard shun to declare the whole counsel of God, and one that surely was determined to know nothing among the people save Jesus Christ and him crucified. His theme seemed to be salvation by rich, free and sovereign grace. He surely was a father in Israel. He often came to our meetings, and would visit the writer of this notice in his afflictions, and always had a word of comfort. O how I miss his kind words, together with his dear wife and children, and the Salem Church, where his membership was. He had the pastoral care of the Salem Church. Our churches and our association will miss the sweet counsel, the sound preaching, the kind letters, and his sweet company; but we hope that our loss is his eternal joy. Our brethren in the ministry are dropping off one by one. May we be well prepared to go when we the summons hear.

Our dear brother Plum was strong in the doctrine of election, predestination and foreordination, believing that all who were chosen in Christ Jesus, all who were predestinated unto eternal life, Jesus paid the full redemption price for, and cried, "It is finished!" The blessed Lord has said that he will be a Father to the fatherless and the widow's God.

The writer preached at his burial to a large congregation of friends, using for a text 2 Timothy iv. 7, 8. The hymns used were Nos. 1257, 1256 and 1252, Beebe's Collection.

JAMES MURPHY.

MONTROSE, W. Va.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS:—Please publish in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES the death of our much-esteemed and well-beloved brother, Elder Wm. J. Wheeler, of Salem, Sugar Creek Church, Sangamon Co., Ill. Elder Wheeler was born Feb. 21st, 1835, in Princeton, Gibson Co., Ind. He remained there until he was twelve years old, when he moved with his father (Dr. John Wheeler) to Wayne Co., Ill., where he remained until he was seventeen years old, when he came to Sangamon Co., Ill. In 1856 he was married to Miss Harriet Sanders, and to them were born eleven children, only two of whom remain, with the widow, to mourn their great loss, nine children having gone before him. Elder Wheeler joined the church of Christ called Horse Creek, in July, 1855, was ordained to the full work of the gospel ministry June 20th, 1874, and was truly a good man and an able minister. He was a beautiful singer, and altogether one of the most useful preachers in Illinois. Many of the true saints will long remember his sweet songs of Zion, and his clear, soft voice as he preached Christ Jesus the only way of life eternal. But that voice is now still in death, nevertheless to sound a warning note of the enemy, nor encourage the saints here on earth, but awaits the second coming of our blessed Redeemer, when he with all the blood-bought millions will awake to sing the song of Moses and the Lamb with immortal tongues forever and ever.

Brother Wheeler's disease was cancer on the neck and face, and no tongue can tell the suffering he endured, the one on his neck eating away all the under jaw, so that his tongue would drop out on his neck; yet he bore it with great patience. He was here in Springfield all the fore part of the summer, and I visited him every day when I was at home. He talked much to me, was perfectly reconciled to go, and gave directions about his funeral and everything; so that when he was about to depart, and good sister Harriet asked him if he had any requests to make, he wrote (for it was several weeks before he died that he could not talk) that he had left all with me. A few months before he died his mother, eighty-two years old, was buried from his home. I asked him if this seemed like home. He said, "No, this is not home; but I shall soon be home." Yet he lingered beyond the expectation of everybody, and retained his mind until the evening of September 23d, when after several hours of intense suffering he quietly closed his eyes in death.

On Sunday, at the Horse Creek Church, there assembled one of the largest congregations of people that I ever saw at a funeral, when the writer tried to address them from the words, "For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing." The body was afterward laid to rest in the Horse Creek cemetery, beside the nine little graves of his children. We sorrow not as those who have no hope; for we believe that Jesus died, and that all who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

ELECTION.

ELECTION is a truth divine,
As absolute as free;
Works ne'er can make the blessing mine,
'Tis God's own wise decree.
Before Jehovah built the skies,
Or earth, or seas, or sun,
He chose a people for his praise,
And gave them to the Son.
Eternal was the choice of God,
A sovereign act indeed;
And Jesus, the incarnate Word, Secures the chosen seed.
A world of endless bliss and day
Hangs on his firm decree;
Nor can the sinner justly say,
He ought to favor me.
Blush, mortals, blush, if blush you can,
Who call his ways unjust;
And you who love his sovereign name,
Of sovereign mercies boast.

JESUS MY TRUST.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—
Inclosed please find a beautiful hymn written by Louisa Henrietta Electress, of Brandenburgh, Russia. She was born in 1627, and died in 1667. She being dead, yet speaketh. I think it would not disgrace our family paper, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, if published. I verily believe that she was taught in the school of Christ, or she could not compose such a sentimental hymn. Surely the sentiments are truth, for they ascribe all the power, honor and glory to Jesus for the hope of salvation in him, and of a blessed immortality beyond the grave. If published, I think it will be read with comfort by every believer in Christ who takes the SIGNS.

JOSEPH BRUCE.

CHENEY, Neb., Sept. 26, 1892.

JESUS, on whom my soul relies,
To whom it now for safety flies,
Can I not trust myself with thee,
When death's long night seems dark to me?

Christ is risen, and I shall rise,
I shall behold him with my eyes;
For he, the living, glorious Head,
Leaves not his members with the dead.

Safety in Christ my Lord I've found,
To him by faith and love I'm bound;
Not death itself the bands can sever
That bind my soul to him forever.

My body, that must turn to dust,
To him forever I will trust;
I know that it will rise again,
Will soar above, with Christ will reign.

The seed in weakness here is sown,
A glorious body there 'twill own;
The mortal flesh that slumbering lies,
Immortal from the grave will rise.

Rejoice, believers, and be glad;
Not yours to be cast down and sad.
If ye must die, 'tis but to rise
And dwell with Christ above the skies.

Yet of his joys would ye partake,
And in your Savior's likeness wake;
The longing heart must go before,
The soul whilst here its Lord adore.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GHEENT, Ky., Oct. 5, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—While attending the Licking Association in September last sister Theobald, of Scott Co., Ky., requested me to write some thoughts for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on Romans xii.
1, which is in these words, "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service."

The apostle closes the preceding chapter with these solemn words,
"For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory forever. Amen." To his great and wonderful name is due from both terrestrial and celestial beings all glory. The creation of all things, both animate and inanimate, is the workmanship of his hands, and he created them for his own glory.
"All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made." When we look upon the vast works of creation, and behold all yielding strict obedience to his laws, and then turn our thoughts to vain man, and behold him alone refusing to give unto God the glory due unto his name, we can appropriately turn to the language used by the apostle in that text, "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God." How strong and forcible is this language. The word "beseech" is a much stronger word in our language than the word "request." It conveys the idea of supplication; and the use of that word shows the zeal for the glory of God that filled the mind and heart of the apostle. In the eleven preceding chapters of that epistle he had presented to the saints at Rome the wondrous display of the power, wisdom, mercy and love of God toward them, in having redeemed them from the curse of the law, chosen them in Christ Jesus, made them heirs of God to the heavenly inheritance of the saints, and in the great work of regeneration revealed himself in them the hope of glory.
He could in addressing them appropriately use the word "therefore," and say, "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God." There would have been no need of that earnest supplication to the saints at Rome if they had never from the date of their entrance into the spiritual kingdom of our God failed to present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God. The apostle when speaking of himself in this epistle says, "For the good that I would, I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do." This, dear saints, is the experience of all who by the mercies of God have been made to know their lost and ruined condition by reason of sin. Then how wonderfully appropriate is this earnest exhortation given to the saints at Rome, which as fully applies to those now living on the earth as it did to those to whom it was first addressed. All realize that when they would do good, evil is present with them. Then all realize that it is their reasonable service to present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy unto God. But in the constant warfare in which all the dear saints are engaged they are often made in deep sorrow to say, "In me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing." Then comes most fervently welling up from the depths of their souls the prayer that he would grant them according to the riches of his glory to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man;

yes, might in the inner man, that they might be able to resist the power of the wicked one. Peter, when he denied his Lord, needed that might.
Paul, when he said, "When I would do good, evil is present with me," realized the great need of being strengthened by might in the inner man; and the saints at Galatia greatly needed that might when the apostle charged them with being divided, and told them that some were for Paul, some for Apollos, some for Cephas, and some for Christ.
So, dear saints, do all God's dear people, while clothed with mortality, need that might given to them by the Spirit, and need to be kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation—that salvation which alone can be found in our glorious Redeemer.
The apostle, when addressing the saints at Rome, had been led by the Spirit, and enabled to know the deep corruption of the flesh, and to realize and know that the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and to realize that in that great warfare the saints have often reached points in their earthly pilgrimage at which they felt themselves unable and unfit to present their bodies a living sacrifice to God. Peter realized it when he went out and wept bitterly. Paul realized it when he said, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"

You, dear saints, realize it daily when overshadowed by the darkness and gloom of earth. Then how appropriate that earnest exhortation to the saints at Rome, and all the exhortations with which that twelfth chapter abounds. The apostle says to them, It is your reasonable service to present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God. He had said to them, "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Here he gave them the glorious assurance that their mortal bodies would be made alive again, would be called from the dark caverns of the tomb in the likeness of their glorious risen Lord. Then surely it was a reasonable service that they, while in their earthly pilgrimage, should present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God; but the exhortation is that they should present their bodies a "living sacrifice." It will be remembered that under the law when beasts were offered on the altar they were first slain; but the apostle uses the words, "a living sacrifice." Without that word "living" the saints might have looked to the temple service, and reached the conclusion that as they were admonished to offer their bodies a sacrifice, the sacrifice would not be acceptable unless they were slain, as were the sacrifices under the law; hence the apostle uses the words, "a living sacrifice," in contradistinction from the sacrifices under the law. Many of the saints at Rome, if not all, were Gentiles, and they in their Pagan idolatry offered themselves and their children as sacrifices to their idol gods; but those saints at Rome were exhorted not to adopt the rule of the Jewish law, nor that rule adopted by their fathers, who were steeped in carnal ignorance, but they were solemnly exhorted to present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which was their reasonable service. But perhaps some will inquire why it was called a reasonable service. The answer to that question is, "You hath he quicken, who were dead in trespasses and sins." Being made alive in Christ, they must no longer look to the offerings under the law, nor to the sacrifices offered by idolaters;
but now they must in all their offerings and sacrifices look to Christ,

their living head, and their offerings must be a living sacrifice. The apostle says to the church at Corinth, "What! know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's." They had been bought with a price, even the precious blood of Christ; therefore they were his both body and spirit. Having been bought by so great a price, and they having been born of the Spirit, their body is the temple of that Spirit; but their body is not the Spirit, or it could never die. The wages of sin is death; and death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, and still reigns over the mortal bodies of all the saints. But God in his infinite wisdom and unchanging mercy has chosen to make the body of his saints a fit temple for the Holy Ghost. That body is not made spiritual. If it were so made it could never die. The Spirit cannot die; but the body, having come from the first Adam, can and must die. But the death to which the bodies of the saints are subjected is not an eternal death; if so, the glorious resurrection of our Lord would have secured nothing to his redeemed. But the redemption that is in Christ Jesus is perfect. By his suffering and death he redeemed his people from the curse of the law, which was death; and by his resurrection he redeemed their bodies from the grave. Then with what joy they meditate on the language of the apostle, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." The victory is a complete one. It reaches the whole man, body, soul and spirit, and fits him for the joys of the redeemed throughout the endless cycles of eternity. Then surely the apostle was right in beseeching his brethren to present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God; and beholding, as they did, the wondrous mercy and grace of our God made so completely manifest in their redemption, surely it was their reasonable service to present their bodies a living sacrifice to God.

In that twelfth chapter the apostle exhorts his brethren to "Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good." All those exhortations are addressed to the saints, and predicated on the eternal love and mercy of our God; but when the dear saints become carnally minded they enter a state of death. They become dead to the joys of salvation—dead and blind to the beauties of the great and ever-glorious plan of salvation through their dear Redeemer. Their prayer then is, "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation, and uphold me with thy free Spirit." "O Lord, open thou my lips, and my mouth shall show forth thy praise." David realized the constant need of the presence of his Lord. He was made to know that without his all-pervading presence he could not enjoy the beauties and glories of his salvation. Without that presence he could not behold him as the Lord our righteousness, the Lord our Redeemer. How entirely dependent was that ancient servant of the Lord most high when he prayed to the Lord not only to restore unto him the joy of his salvation, but also to open his lips. In that condition he surely was not able to present his body a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable with God. Then in darkness, gloom and mourning his cry was, "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation." The saints in their earthly pilgrimage are often made to mourn the absence of their Lord, and to adopt the language of the psalmist, "Will the Lord cast off forever? and will he be favorable no more? Is his mercy clean gone forever? Doth his promise fail forevermore? Hath God forgotten to be gracious? Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?" Then they are made to know their entire dependence on their Lord for all things, even the power to open their lips in praise to his holy name. But O what joys are theirs when he reveals himself to them, and opens their lips to praise him; but in that praise they go supplicating his holy name, saying, "Open to me the gates of righteousness: I will praise the Lord." "Sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praise in the congregation of the saints." It is then they can present their bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God. Their bodies are acceptable to him, for he hath redeemed them from the power and dominion of the grave; and when he calls them from the pale nations of the dead they will come in glorious immortality. Then this mortal will have put on immortality. Then surely while clad in mortality it is their reasonable service to present their bodies a living sacrifice, acceptable to God; and their prayer should ever be for grace to do his will, and give unto the Lord the glory due to his name.

If the foregoing is published, sister Theobald and all the dear saints who may read it will please accept it as a token of my fellowship and love for them. While at that association sister Ashbourn, of Clark Co., Ky., requested me to write for publication in the SIGNS some thoughts on Ruth iii. 12, 13; but that dear aged sister will please excuse me. She must look to abler pens than mine, and learn from them who it was that was nearer of kin to Ruth than Boaz. Will some able brother take up and write for the SIGNS upon the right of the nearest of kin to redeem, as presented in Leviticus xxv., and show to the little ones what is pre-figured by the law of redemption?

I invite the attention of the editors of the SIGNS to that subject as given in the law and in the book of Ruth, and subscribe myself affectionately yours,

DEAR BETHREN BEEBE:—If you think proper, publish these letters I send you. I think they will be of interest to the lovers of truth. "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children." God grant to give Zion peace in all her borders, for Jesus' sake.

Your sinful brother in hope,

KELLY'S CORNERS, N. Y., Mar. 11, 1892.

ELDER D. MARVIN VAIL—DEAR BROTHER IN THE LORD:—It was with a degree of heavenly pleasure that I received your kind letter.

"Sweet bond, that unites all the children of peace;
And thrice precious Jesus, whose love cannot cease."

If I am not mistaken, I feel that my soul prefers Jerusalem above my chief joy. Since the Lord gave me the knowledge of his salvation in the forgiveness of all my sins, my heart has been drawn forth to all of like precious faith who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. I believe, dear brother, it is thus with you; and I am sure if we in truth love the church of Christ it will not be in word, but in deed and in truth. It is my comfort, as well as yours, that the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. I want the Lord to graciously reign in me, that his power and wondrous love might ever constrain me to walk to the honor of his exalted name. I find a law in my members, the law of sin, which of myself I cannot subdue. I do not mean washing the outside of the cup or platter, nor whitewashing sepulchre, but the heart. This fleshly heart of mine is in truth deceitful above all things and desperately wicked. We know the plague of our own hearts, dear brother, and many are the sighs that are pressed forth from us because of the sinfulness that is in our flesh; but we have unspeakable consolation in that wonderful hope given us by the Holy Ghost in the blood and righteousness of our Lord Jesus Christ. "Unto you that believe he is precious." Yes, indeed. I find as the days and years roll by that I am a very needy one, constantly needing support and nourishment from the Bridegroom of our souls. He nourisheth and cherisheth the church. So many conflicts, so many trials, so many sorrows, are encountered in the pathway, that unless our Beloved appears, and acts the kind part of that Friend that sticketh closer than a brother, we should utterly sink by the way, overwhelmed in our miseries. Is it not a miracle of amazing grace that, notwithstanding our forgetfulness, ingratitude and sinfulness, and our utter worth-lessness, the Lord our Redeemer sticketh close to us—to you, my brother, and to me? O that we could love and praise his name, and glorify him in our body and spirit, which are his. He covers our head in each storm. He is with us in six troubles, and in seven he does not forsake us. He says, "I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands, and thy walls are continually before me." Yet in our infirmity we have sometimes said, "My way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God."

Some months ago my soul was in this predicament. I was as one immersed in troubles. I sank in deep waters; and as days and weeks passed by, and I continued in this overwhelming distress of soul, I feared that I should never more know any joy or comfort while in this world. But when my spirit was overwhelmed, thou, O my God, knewest my path. Truly he giveth power unto the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength. During a period of about nine months I endured daily such distresses in my soul that I cannot portray them; but though often the Lord covered himself as with a cloud, and day and night his hand was heavy upon me, yet was I enabled to feel and say, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." Amidst all my trials and woes whom could I trust? Not myself. O no; I am too fickle, so sinful, that I have no confidence in the flesh. Could I trust in my fellow-creatures, in princes? O no; I found no refuge, no retreat, no comfort, no stay, no deliverance in any. I was both driven and drawn, and my heart clave to the Lord. I showed before him my trouble night and day. Did he abhor a vile sinner like me? Did he spurn such a sinner away? Did he utterly cast me off? O no. Often and often I cried, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." There is a set time to favor Zion; so in the appointed time it pleased the Lord to turn my captivity. I have found that Scripture true, that "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; they shall walk, and not faint."—Isaiah xl. 31. Surely "It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord."—Lam. iii. 26. It is an unspeakable blessing to be casting all our care upon him who careth for us. I feel ashamed that I should ever have an unbelieving thought concerning the love and grace of our God. Does not

"His love in time past forbid us to think He will leave us at last in trouble to sink?"

"Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?"—Rom. viii. 35. The Lord our God rests in his love. He changes not; therefore we are not consumed.

It is kind of you in desiring my welfare and inquiring how I do. I believe this is the same spirit that moved Paul when he said unto Barnabas, "Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do."—Acts xv. 36. Your love and fellowship in the gospel is and has been (especially when I was in such trouble) a consolation to my heart.—Phil. 7. May I ever so walk in the truth that I may enjoy your fellowship and companionship in Christ Jesus. May the Lord graciously be with you and bless you in your ministry, to the edifying and comforting of Christ's body, the church.

I am, I hope, your brother in hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began,

FRED. W. KEENE.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., April 19, 1892.

DEAR BROTHER VAIL:—Your kind and welcome letter arrived in due season, and I hope we appreciated the kindness in you in writing to one such as I. I have every evidence within myself that if ever there was a time of singing of birds with me it has vanished, and that I have been left alone. Like poor Jonah, I did enjoy the shade of the gourd; but, alas for me! the worm (my flesh) has taken hold at the root of the matter, and I have felt the full effect of the rays of the fierce-beating sun upon my unprotected head, until I go mourning all my days, with my head bowed down like the bulrush, seemingly without a hope, having only caught the shadow and missed the substance. I have been made to feel, I believe, that there are worse things in this life than the dissolution of the body, so-called death; for I have sincerely felt in my mind that I did not care to live, such were the terrible straits that I have been subject to because of the stubborn sinfulness of this deceitful and desperately wicked heart of mine. I am so ignorant of anything good, so little do I see or understand, that I am extremely loath to attempt to write or speak concerning the state of my mind; but there came to my mind this morning, while at my occupation, a little comfort, and a few thoughts seemed to cross this dull, dead, senseless heart of mine, and almost before I knew it I found that I was resting under the shadow of a great Rock. "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." I knew by bitter experience that I had felt the pangs of hell; that I had been in the bottomless pit; that the sea-weeds had been wrapped around my head; that I had been in the mire and clay, where no standing was; and I had not been able to comprehend that the everlasting arms were underneath me. I could not feel that it was necessary that I should feel the rod, that I should be beaten with many stripes, so that I should be made willing in the day of his power to lean upon the dear, precious staff, which is Jesus; but now I feel some comfort in resting in the shadow, and feeling willing to say, "Thy will be done." I know now that it is necessary that there should be winter, ice and snow, that there should be bitter, blighting frost, causing the ground to be all broken up, cracking it open, so that the rays of the Sun of righteousness may shine in and penetrate to every portion of my heart. I know now that summer heat must come, and burn and destroy sometimes the little hope, as it were, that I have, so that I may understand who it is that can cause me to rest in the shadow; so that I can know for myself, and not for another, some of the heights and depths of the mysteries of the glorious mercy and loving-kindness of this precious Savior of ours. O what a wonder that I am not consumed altogether! What wonderful mercy is this! for it is only through his long-suffering and tender mercies that the sons of Jacob are not consumed. Why am I not cut down and destroyed, like the barren fig tree? No fruit year after year; why cumbereth it the ground? Nothing but leaves; nothing but leaves. But it seems that I am spared, a monument of his amazing grace and tender mercy. I would say, O that it could be different with me! O that I could dwell in thy tabernacle forever! O that I might be kept from myself! which is the worst enemy I have.

"Amazing grace! how sweet the sound
That saved a wretch like me!
Who once was lost, but now is found;
Was blind, but now can see."

These are a few thoughts that have run in my mind while attending to my duties; and if you will accept them as an answer to your letter, please bear in mind that it is all I have to write, and is the best I can do, which is nothing but filthy rags in the sight of him who searcheth the heart. Write to me again when you feel so inclined. I always love to hear from you, and to see you face to face. We are all well, and all join, I know, in the full sense, in bonds of love and fellowship to you and yours.

Yours unworthily,

E. B. WALTON.

PATSBURG, Ala., Sept. 19, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—BELOVED BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—I again feel a desire to speak to some of the dear saints of our God, through our blessed medium of correspondence, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I have been much comforted and edified from reading the able communications and editorials of the SIGNS, and feel this morning my weakness and ignorance to such an extent that it almost seems like presumption for me to attempt to write comforting words to any of the Lord's children. But while the children of God have many doubts and fears, troubles and trials, while in this thorny maze, they have a rich, almighty Friend. "The Lord is high above all nations, and his glory above the heavens. Who is like unto the Lord our God, who dwelleth on high?" "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill, that he may set him with princes, even with the princes of his people. He maketh the barren woman to keep house, and to be a joyful mother of children. Praise ye the Lord."—Psa. cxiii. "When Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a people of strange language, Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion. The sea saw it, and fled; Jordan was driven back; the mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs. Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the God of Jacob; which turned the rock into a standing water, the flint into a fountain of waters."—Psa. cxiv. But, saints of God, "Our God is in the heavens; he hath done whatsoever he hath pleased." I wish to say to the dear, afflicted, temptest-tossed children of God, that our God is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. There is no variability nor shadow of turning about him. He is above influence, not swerved by the acts of poor, puny man, whose breath is in his nostrils. God does not need the adoration of angels to increase his glory, nor are the wicked acts of men and devils detractive therefrom. He is perfect in knowledge; for we learn that naked and open are all things before the eyes of him with whom we have to do. He knows all our afflictions, all our troubles, trials and temptations without and within. Many are the afflictions of the righteous; but God delivereth them out of them all. He is perfect in love. If, dear children, your minds can conceive of a time when there was no God, then may you conceive of a time when there was not love for the children of God. He loves his children with an everlasting love, and by loving-kindness he draws them. So I conclude that there never was a time that he did not love his people, and consequently there never was a time that the church did not exist in the mind and purpose of the eternal God. I believe in a spiritual or covenant relationship of Christ and his church, which in the mind and purpose of God has ever existed, and in that respect is as old as God; and in that respect it is an eternal vital unity of Christ and his church. Not that we actually existed there as we do here; only in the mind and purpose of God. Whatever is the mind of the Lord to-day, was his mind in eternity; and his purpose to-day was his purpose in eternity. What he loves to-day, he loved then, and what he hates to-day, he hated then. His love for Jacob and hatred for Esau was at the same time, neither being based upon the acts of the creature. So we conclude that in the mind and purpose of the eternal

God everything (good, bad or indifferent) existed, together with all the acts of all his creatures, from the angels around his dazzling throne, to the little ant that crawls in the dust of the earth. And whatsoever was in his mind or purpose, that must come to pass at the time appointed by the Lord. Now, if there is a deed so wicked, or an act so vile, that it was not embraced in his foreknowledge, then may you make me believe that something might or has occurred contrary to his eternal purpose; but until then I shall continue to believe that everything takes place according to the eternal purpose of God, whether it be the obedience of his children, or the wicked acts of men and devils; and that all of it works together for good to them that love the Lord, to them who are the called according to his purpose. I am made to realize afresh seemingly this morning that the goodness and mercy of God have followed me all along through my past life, and I am this morning a spared monument of his amazing mercy. My seemingly unprofitable life is spared for a purpose known to God, and to him only. I am comparatively a young man. I was born December 12th, 1859. On Saturday before the third Sunday in January, 1888, I made my first attempt to preach the unsearchable riches of Jesus Christ. In June, 1889, I was set apart to the work of the ministry by the laying on of hands, and since that time have been hobbling along, serving from one to four churches. But I sometimes feel that I am nearing my long, eternal home; that I will soon be done with this troublesome world. I have been afflicted with paralysis all my life on one side. I have a wife and six children to support, besides the care of churches; but I feel sometimes that I want to spend the remnant of my days, whether many or few, in the praise of my God. My hope sometimes seems sufficient if I were called to die; but sometimes it seems so little I think I will throw it away. I travel in darkness a great deal. Occasionally I have a ray of light, I trust, and then I am exalted on eagle's wings, rise above my troubles, and hope to reach the skies. Dear children, is it thus with you, or am I one alone in this desert land? Dear saints of God who read these lines, remember me and mine when it goes well with you. Many times those that are nearest and dearest to me by the ties of nature are left alone while I go in my weakness to speak of the goodness of God to his children. Remember your ministers who labor in word and doctrine. The poor minister has many afflictions to undergo; but my prayer to God is that he will keep me humble, and at the feet of my brethren, and that when the trying hour of death shall come I may be given grace sufficient to say that my Jesus has done all things well.

AFFLICTIONS OF THE RIGHTEOUS.

"MANY are the afflictions of the righteous; but the Lord delivereth him out of them all. He keepeth all his bones; not one of them is broken."—Psalm xxxiv. 19, 20.

Those who know the grace of God in the forgiveness of their sins can see in their own experience the incontrovertible evidence of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures. Nothing less than perfect omnipotence could have enabled the ancient servants of God to record with such exactness the secret thoughts and hidden sorrows of the subjects of salvation who are now enduring those trials which are so accurately described in the language of the prophets and apostles. Nothing less than infinite wisdom could have chosen the favored subjects of eternal love to suffer tribulation in the world, while their perplexity is increased by the apparent comfort of those who are proud of their own merits, and who glory in their enmity against the doctrine of God our Savior. Yet even this is clearly written by the inspired psalmist. In the seventy-third psalm the contrast is drawn more accurately than any of the tried ones in our times have been able to present it. The Holy Ghost moved this sweet singer of Israel to tell the experience of every saint more concisely than any of them could find language to express it for himself. This is conclusive in establishing their confidence that the Lord directed the pen of every one who thus wrote the things which they are prepared to attest as shown to them personally. Thus every one of them is perfectly qualified to be a witness of the glory of God in saving his people from their sins. They can say confidently, "Truly God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart." Their only anxiety is in regard to their personal interest in the good which the Lord has spoken concerning Israel. "But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped; for I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked." Then that prosperity is described and the proud blasphemy of those who are thus pampered adds to the distress of the trembling saint. His reason sees all this as evidence that he has cleansed his heart in vain, and washed his hands in innocency. But it is not to be understood that in this expression the tried one claims to have righteousness and innocency in himself. These divine perfections are found only in the sinless Redeemer of all his chosen people. None of them can trust in any other innocency but that which is in Jesus. It is the question of the reality of their experience of the cleansing power of the blood of Jesus, by which every fearful saint is troubled. If they have really received that assurance of the forgiveness of their sins, they cannot understand why they are subjected to the trials by which they are continually oppressed. Reason suggests that all their afflictions are witnesses against the genuineness of their hope in the righteousness and grace of the crucified Savior. So far is this from the true significance of these deep trials that the very opposite fact is established by them. None ever suffer such tribulation but those who are led by the Spirit of truth to follow in the footsteps of Jesus. Finite intelligence cannot grasp the infinite wisdom in which it pleased God to manifest his goodness to his chosen ones through the depth of sufferings to which they are subjected. Therefore they cannot walk by the sight of their own natural understanding, nor can they choose the way in which they should go. They must be led by the Spirit, by which alone they are enabled to be followers of God as dear children. Guided by the light of life, they cannot follow their own natural inclination. The selfishness of nature never would choose to suffer afflictions. It is impossible that the natural mind should rise above the influence of carnal selfishness. Only as led by the Spirit and governed by the faith of the Son of God can any sinner desire to be free from sin, which desire is that hunger and thirst after righteousness which identifies those whom our Lord declares already blessed. No sooner can the desire to be holy arise from the natural mind than the perfection of holiness can be attained by the works of the flesh.

"Many are the afflictions of the righteous; but the Lord delivereth him out of them all." The character particularly described in these words of truth is necessarily to be carefully considered in ascertaining to whom belong the exclusive marks and peculiar comforts declared in this text. By the express authority of the sovereign Judge of all the earth it is recorded that "There is none righteous, no, not one." Yet the Lord moved the psalmist to write this declaration, and in many other portions of the infallible testimony there is assurance that there is a people whom God himself pronounces righteous. Since it cannot be that the judgment of the God of all truth should be erroneous, both these passages must be accepted as containing the truth of revelation. The only difficulty in seeing their harmony results from the darkness of our own benighted minds. As seen in their earthly relation, the judgment of God is just and true in pronouncing all the children of Adam guilty and polluted by sin. This is the dreadful decision as written in the inspired revelation given before the destruction by the flood. "And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." This verdict has never been recalled nor modified. Under such terrible judgment the subjects of electing love were by nature the children of wrath even as others. And after they are manifested as redeemed from death and justified by the grace of our Lord Jesus, they still have to groan under the bondage of corruption so long as they remain in the body of this death. Thus in their earthly nature they are made continually to realize their own vileness and subjection to the power of sin; from whose oppression they are compelled to cry unto God for deliverance. So Paul says after he had been many years laboring as an apostle of Jesus Christ, "I find then a law, that when I would do good, evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, which is in my members. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin."—Rom. vii. 21-25. It is manifest that in this declaration Paul uses the word "flesh" in the sense in which it was defined by our Lord in talking to Nicodemus. He says, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." All that is included in the natural birth is natural, including body, soul and spirit. The whole natural man is called "the flesh" in distinction from that "mind" which is Christ in the saint, the hope of glory. The very same Paul who with the flesh serves the law of sin, is the man who with the mind (of Christ) serves the law of God. The opposition of these two principles in the one saint causes unceasing warfare. There can be no hope of deliverance from this deadly conflict until the victory shall be given by their triumphant Captain in the final release of each of his ransomed followers. While in themselves they are all servants of sin as children of a sinful Adam, in their spiritual relation to God in Christ Jesus they are holy and without blame before God in love. In this character as born of the Spirit they constantly aspire to that perfect righteousness which is in their divine Head. Feeling the burden of the vanity to which they are still subject in their earthly nature, they are oppressed with the tyranny of sin. This produces that bitter groaning which was faintly typified in the cry of the natural Israelites under the cruel bondage of Egypt. Such afflictions are known to none but the true born children of God. They are the righteous, unto whom it is given to know the fellowship of the sufferings of Christ. No created arm can bring them deliverance from these afflictions. It is in these afflictions that they read the assurance of their interest in the eternal glory of their Lord. "It is a faithful saying: For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with him; if we deny him, he also will deny us; if we believe not, yet he abideth faithful; he cannot deny himself."—2 Tim. ii. 11-13. It is a sweet and precious truth that our God makes the very darkness of his saints afford them light, and their sorrows are made joy to them by the gracious touch of his omnipotent hand. Their afflictions are their most unquestionable witnesses that they are the subjects of eternal love. When called to walk in darkness they often question the reality of remembered joyful seasons. They greatly fear that such experiences were merely imaginary; but they cannot doubt the bitter agony which has left its impress in their very inmost existence. In this wonderful love and mercy our God has given this dark valley of Achor (trouble) for a door of hope to his afflicted ones. And further he has promised, saying of his chosen Zion, "And she shall sing there [in this valley of trouble], as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt."—Hos. ii. 15. If any claim to be the chosen people of God, and yet know nothing of this valley of trouble, they lack that witness which is borne only by the fellowship of sufferings. There are doubtless those saints who have not yet been led into the wilderness of temptation, and who know nothing of the cruel suggestions of unbelief; but such are not yet settled in the strength of that experience of faith by which they are taught of the Spirit to walk even in thick darkness, trusting in the Lord, and staying upon their God. In following Jesus there is not any very long period without encountering the fiery trials which are to try the faith of the saints. Since our divine Leader was tempted in all points like as we are, none can follow him in the constant enjoyment of that full assurance which banishes all doubts and fears. It is still true that the portion of the people of God in the world is affliction and tribulation.

While it is the common lot of all men to endure certain forms of suffering, there is a peculiar depth of affliction which is known only to those who are called of God to be the followers of Jesus. Outward circumstances have no power to alleviate these afflictions; neither do they result from temporal distresses. With every earthly comfort and luxury at hand, the subject of this deep suffering is poor and needy. Surrounded by all that natural desires can crave, this affliction is still the all-absorbing thought which oppresses the tried one. There is no relief from such heartfelt distress in any created power. If it were a merely earthly grief, then time might wear it away, or some consolation might be found in the gratification of selfish desires. Even in the very same outward condition, the child of grace experiences affliction unknown to those who are at home in this world. The captive Israelites wept beside the river of Babylon, while their oppressors felt no longing for the land of Canaan, for which their prisoners were filled with the most intense homesickness. This marked the difference between the captives and their tyrants. So, the experience of afflictions identifies the sufferers as followers of their suffering Redeemer. It is by this mark that the Spirit of Christ seals every one of the vessels of mercy. In this fellowship of suffering they are favored of God to bear the image of their suffering Savior. There is no comfort provided in the word of inspiration for any who are not afflicted. Only such as mourn are blessed in the sweet assurance that they shall be comforted. Therefore it has pleased the Lord to set this mark upon those who are made righteous in Christ Jesus with that perfect holiness which exceeds the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees. No efforts of the deceitful heart of man can counterfeit this heavenly seal. Carnal enmity cannot even wish to be made a partaker of the many afflictions which identify the subjects of that election in Christ Jesus by which they are made righteous in the sight of eternal justice. It is to the children of grace that Paul writes, "For unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake; having the same conflict which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me."—Phil. i. 29, 30. The whole inspired testimony gives consolation to none but the subjects of affliction.

"He keepeth all his bones; not one of them is broken." In its application to our Lord Jesus, this was literally true as recorded John xix. 36. It seemed to finite minds that there was no other reason for the soldiers leaving his legs unbroken, but the fact that they saw that he was dead already. But the Spirit moved John to write, "For these things were done, that the Scriptures should be fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken." There was not power enough in earth and hell to violate this word of the Lord. This will readily be confessed by every one who has been made to see Jesus as the Savior of his people from their sins. The power of God secured the bones of Jesus, and restrained the wrath of man. But there is personal assurance in this inspired testimony for the encouragement of every believer in the grace which is manifested in Christ Jesus. The literal circumstance only presents the absolute certainty of the keeping of all his bones in his relation as head over all things to his church, which is his body, and the fullness of him who filleth all in all. Paul says, speaking concerning Christ and the church, "He that loveth his wife loveth himself. For no man ever yet hated his own flesh; but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church; for we are members of his body, of his flesh and of his bones."—Eph. v. 28-30. This vital unity of the Lord Jesus with every member of his body, as clearly stated in this and many other passages of inspired truth, is the ground on which the sacrifice of Jesus was satisfactory to infinite justice on the behalf of every one of his people. They are the body of which he is the life. No substitute could be accepted by justice for that life of the sinner which the broken law demanded. There could have been no salvation from sin but for the provision of infinite wisdom whereby the life of his chosen people was hidden in Christ. When sin had brought condemnation and death upon the body of the gracious Redeemer, justice could be satisfied only by the surrender of the life of the sinner. To meet this inflexible demand it was necessary that Jesus should be made a curse for the guilty members of his body, that they might be made the righteousness of God in him. This is the sure salvation which God provided for the justification of all his chosen vessels of mercy. They are not saved from punishment in their sins; but that wonderful deliverance which is revealed in Jesus is the perfect cleansing of every subject of his grace, so that they are holy and without blame before God in love. In this glorious way of truth it is the special care of God by which every member of the body of Christ is preserved from death and from that sin which is the sting of death. The bones of Jesus, including all the election of grace, are thus kept in all the afflictions to which he as their Righteousness was subjected. Neither did this unsleeping watchfulness of our God cease to keep these bones of Jesus when he was made an offering for them, and when he poured out his soul unto death. The same God of peace that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, still keeps his smallest and most unworthy member, not for any merit found in the subject of that grace, but for the fulfillment of that same everlasting covenant by the blood of which Jesus was himself saved from death.

There is peculiar force in the record that "He keepeth all his bones; not one of them is broken." If it were written in the sacred oracles that one little bone might possibly be severed from the glorious body of Jesus, and just that least member might be lost, there would not be one saint in all the redeemed family whose hope could overcome that terrible barrier. Every one would sink in despair; for under the guidance of that Spirit which moves them each to esteem others better than himself, each would feel that he was that one who should finally be lost. But the truth of God secures that not one bone of our Redeemer is broken. Kept by the power of God, they are beyond the possibility of being broken from the sacred body of their Lord.

AGENTS WANTED.

A FULL OUTFIT FREE.

WE are desirous of establishing agencies throughout the whole country for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES; therefore we have decided to offer liberal inducements to our brethren and friends to act as our agents in procuring new subscribers, collecting, &c., for the paper. No person will be received as an agent who is not a paid-up subscriber. All such who wish to assist us will, upon informing us of their willingness to officiate in this capacity, receive our special terms to agents, and, if accepted, will receive an outfit free, and full instructions how to proceed. As we wish to have this system in full working order by the first of next year, we request those desiring to receive an agency to inform us as early as possible.

PLEASE DO NOT.

OUR subscribers are especially requested not to pay their subscriptions for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES to Postmasters to forward to us, as they generally deduct twenty or twenty-five per cent. from the amount and send us the balance, retaining the discount as their commission, and often sending what they do remit in postage stamps. We also caution our patrons against "Newspaper Agencies," as they deduct a like commission. It is a very simple matter for a subscriber to get a post-office money order or a postal note, inclose it in a letter, and direct it to us, or to put the money in the letter and have it registered; but where several are sending from the same office it is well to choose one of the number to send for all at the one time. Therefore we have advertised, under the caption of "Agents Wanted," for brethren and friends to act as our agents.

PLEASE BE CAREFUL.

It frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. Or if the paper is being sent in her name and the renewal is sent in her husband's name the same thing is likely to occur. Please be very careful to give the same name in which the paper is already coming, also the post office address at which it is received.

"Whom shall he make to understand doctrine?"—Isa. xxviii. 9.

When I last wrote on teaching knowledge, I decided, if the Lord would, I would try and bring out a few thoughts on this part of the subject. It seems from the text that God teaches some things, and makes his people understand some things; which brings to mind the text where he said concerning Jacob, "He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields; and he made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock."—Deut. xxxii. 13. God says his people shall be a willing people in the day of his power. He makes them willing, for he works in them "both to will and to do of his good pleasure." Paul said that God enlightened the eyes of their understanding. Paul also testified that when he was a child he spake as a child; he thought as a child; he understood as a child; but when he became a man he put away childish things. God makes us to know the height and depth. Abraham, after the trial that God brought him through, declared that in the mount of the Lord it should be seen, for the Lord Jehovah would provide. He then was made to understand that God could and would provide. Jacob, in the bitterness of his soul, wept over Joseph as dead, and grieved over the wickedness of his sons; but in the finale God made him understand that he was God, that he controlled envy, directed speculators, and made men dream, and controlled the passions of prominent men's wives, and bound and unbound his chosen, and raised them from death to life, and from the dung-hill to a throne; and when Jacob was brought through all the trials he was made to understand doctrine, and to say, "It is enough;" that he was but a worm of the dust, but God Jehovah was mighty, and that the Lord's hand was in it all, but he saw it not. Job could shake hands with Jacob and with Abraham, being brought through the trials in his own case; and after his trials, and the Lord answered him out of the whirlwind, Job could truly say, "Behold, I am vile: what shall I answer thee? I will lay my hand upon my mouth. Once have I spoken; but I will not answer; yea, twice; but I will proceed no further."—Job. xl. 4-6. Second answer, "I know that thou canst do everything, and that no thought can be withholden from thee. Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge? Therefore have I uttered that I understood not; things too wonderful me, which I knew not. Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak; I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me. I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee; wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes."—Job. xlii. 2-6. When the Lord called Moses, and showed him the burning bush, Moses was astonished, because it was something above nature; something, so far as he could see, that was contrary to nature. Thus does God show us and makes us understand that he is above the powers which he created, and controls and directs and orders all things, and makes them at all times and in all places subserve the end for which he has designed their existence. We are thus drawn from the breasts, and weaned from the milk, and made to see things as the almighty acts of the eternal Sovereign of earth, hell and heaven. Time and space forbid me to particularize here; but when God would make a heathen king understand doctrine, it must be through the wicked conspiracies of his own subjects. When he had built an image to be worshiped on the plain, and Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego would not fall down and worship his image, he had those men cast into the fire; and he was made to see the fourth man with them, and was made to say, "There is no God like the God of Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego." Hence God made him understand doctrine; the doctrine of God's almighty power and sovereign character; and it was under trials, and the loss of subjects in his own kingdom, to wit, those who cast the children into the fire. God also made the same king to understand doctrine when he was turned out to grass as an ox, until seven years passed over him; and when he was restored, see how he confesses, as others do who have learned the same lesson in a different way, but all of God's own appointment. "And I blessed the Most High, and I praised and honored him that liveth forever; whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom is from generation to generation; and all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing; and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" "Now I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise and extol and honor the King of heaven, all whose works are truth, and his ways judgment; and those that walk in pride he is able to abase."—Daniel iv. 34, 35, 37. We see from this that a heathen king confesses the same as an instructed saint of God. Paul, in his testimony to the church at Rome, sets forth the same doctrine, showing he is taught the same thing. He says, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor?" We say with Moses, Job, Abraham, Jacob, Nebuchadnezzar, Paul, and all the apostles of Christ, with all the prophets, Yea, Lord. Thus it is through trials and afflictions that we are made to say, "Yea, Lord." But we cannot say so until God makes us understand it; then we can say nothing else. The doctrine of God's absolute rule and government of all things in heaven, earth and hell is but partially understood; and in some places it is not only questioned, but absolutely denied, but not by those who are really made to understand doctrine; those whom God has made to suck oil out of the flinty rock of his absolute purpose respecting men, angels and devils. It is said that in the canyons of Colorado you can look up and see stars in the daytime; but we are incredulous until we are carried there and see for ourselves. So until God has carried us down into his canyons in spiritual life, and into the deep trials, we can believe it only in part. Then, when God has led us into darkness, and brought us forth, we learn exactly what God designs to teach us. God says he will bring the blind by a way they knew not, and in paths they have not known; that he will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. God strips his people; and as is his pleasure, he deals with them for their good and his glory. We can never get it out of books, but must get it from God, and be taught and made to understand it amid great afflictions and adversities, trials and temptations. But God does not fail. When he undertakes for us, he will carry us through, and teach us things we understood not.

Brethren Beeble, I have but partially touched upon the subject; it is broad and deep. Do as you see fit with this. If there is anything in this that will cause any of God's children to meditate on the Lord, his ways and his goodness, and lead them to wonder and praise the name of the great Redeemer, the Rock, of our salvation, and stand in awe at the remembrance of God's majesty and almighty power, I shall be glad and rejoice in him, who has enabled me to engage their attention thus for a few moments; and to the praise of the God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Daniel and Elijah, and to Jesus, the King of kings and Lord of lords, be all our songs and all our writings, is my humble desire, for Jesus' sake.

Yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

JUSTUS, Pa., Oct. 5, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—The inclosed letter from sister Holcombe was handed to me by Elder Vail, to read at our last covenant meeting. "The little flock" to whom the letter is addressed, not wishing to keep such good things to themselves, have asked me to send it to you for publication in the SIGNS, subject, of course, to your better judgment.

Your unworthy brother,

G. W. GOODRICH.

TRENTON, N. J., Sept. 29, 1892.

TO THE LITTLE FLOCK AT JUSTUS, PA.—DEAR KINDRED AND FRIENDS:—Had I the time at present to write to all separately who asked me to do so, I presume I should write the same in substance to each one; hence I have concluded to address you all as one, having you all in mind, and I hope in heart also. I would like to tell you how very pleasant to me is the remembrance of my recent visit among you, and also to thank you for your kindness and charity towards such an unworthy stranger. I very much enjoyed visiting with you in your own homes, and I believe the very essence of that enjoyment is in the fact that one heart and one mind has been given us, each one groaning under the bondage of sin, yet rejoicing in hope of deliverance therefrom. How meaningless to the worldly-wise must be the expression, "As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing;" but how plain to him that understandeth; and how quickly such characters recognize and embrace in sweetest fellowship each other; and this implies relationship, not only to each other, but to the man of sorrows who himself bore our sins in his own body on the tree of the cross; and I do hope and trust that it was this blessed relationship that drew my heart out to you in love akin to that expressed by Ruth of olden time, "Entreat me not to leave thee," &c. This is all a mystery to me; yet it is my life, my all, though oft assailed by serious questioning thoughts. For some time past (though tossed about by worldly cares and crosses) my mountain has seemed to stand strong. When I was with you, and one of your number at all your meetings, I think I saw how beautiful for situation is Mount Zion; and I felt satisfied with the goodness of God's house; it seemed such a restful place, such a precious resort. I was glad to meet your visiting preachers at your two days meeting. Elder Bundy I have known for several years. In his cheerful countenance and hearty greetings we seem to hear him say, Children, the Lord has given me something exceedingly good, and I cannot rest until I tell you all about it. I want you to share it with me. Elder Bogardus I had met but once before. He, too, tells the old, old story in such simple language that the living cannot but understand. O how I longed for the broken heart and contrite Spirit which he manifested! but I could not then mourn over my sins, for they were buried, or I was blinded, God knoweth which. Though I could say at all the meetings, "It is good to be here," yet the first Sunday in September, when your pastor preached from Solomon's Song v. 1-3, is a day that I shall long remember. If he did not then prove the vital unity of Christ and the church, I am sure it has never been done. That was one of the times that I could say,

"My willing soul would stay
In such a frame as this."

When about finishing his remarks, I thought of the words,

"A solemn reverence checks our songs,
And praise sits silent on our tongues."

I really wished he would close the meeting without singing; but when brother Russel gave out the hymn, "He hates to put away," it seemed a continuation of that "Song of sublime adoration and praise" to which we had been listening, and I felt like having it go on and on; for

"I was loth to leave the place Where Jesus showed his smiling face."

Truly

"Not the fair palaces
To which the great resort,
Are once to be compared with this,
Where Jesus holds his court."

I see that I have written only of the things that caused me rejoicing and gladness of heart; but without the least effort I call to mind times when I was made ashamed of myself, especially at your covenant meeting, where you were free to speak of your hopes and fears, your down-sittings and your uprisings. Well do I remember that in my intercourse with you my words or speech were not always with grace, seasoned with salt. I have just cause for regret, and I might call it a chronic regret; for strange to tell, I do not learn wisdom by past experience; but I vow, and straight my vows forget, or disregard them, and then repeat those very vows. I may already have weared you, and must close. I hope you may all be able to meet together on Saturday and Sunday, and that a greater than Solomon may meet with you.

In the fellowship of the Spirit, your sister, I hope,

R. A. HOLCOMBE.

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Salisbury Association of Old School Predestinarian Baptists, in session with the Church at Nassaongo, Wicomico Co., Md., Oct. 19th, 20th and 21st, 1892, to the several churches composing her body, sendeth love in the Lord.

DEARLY BELOVED:—According to long established custom with associations of our order, we again, having been favored of the Lord to meet once more in an associate capacity, will address you in the way of a Circular Letter; and it may not be unprofitable for us to examine into the motives and objects of these letters. The association does not exercise any authority whatever over the churches, neither legislative, executive or judicial; being, in fact, but the creature of the churches, and designed only for correspondence, and mutual comfort and edification, and a medium of intercourse and interchange of views and experiences; the forming, renewing and maintaining of acquaintance; the preaching of the word, and hearing of the word preached; resulting in a closer communion, a drawing of the bonds of sweet fellowship and love closer and more binding, manifestly growing together, and partaking together of the rich and wonderful bounties provided by our heavenly Father, who has prepared for his children a "feast of fat things, of wines upon the lees; of fat things full of marrow, and of wines upon the lees well refined." But it is not convenient for all the members of the various churches composing an association to meet at the place appointed; consequently they send messengers; and that all may partake, to some extent at least, of the precious things ministered, a letter is prepared and sent in this way, with the minutes of the meetings, so that each one may have at least a small portion.

The end of the gospel ministry is to comfort, encourage, instruct and edify the church, which is composed of believers in the Lord Jesus. The apostle says, "When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men." "And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ; till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ; that we henceforth be no more children tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive; but speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ; from whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love."—Ephesians iv. 8, 11-16. Here then we have a clear presentation by the pen of inspiration of, first, the gifts our Lord himself has given unto men; second, their object and design; and third, results to be accomplished. The gifts, apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers; and these he gave unto men. They are called out, prepared and qualified unto the work to be wrought by them. "No man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron." He gives to every man "according as his work shall be," to the prophet, the spirit of prophecy; to the apostle, the spirit and power of apostleship, &c.; each being fully prepared by that gift bestowed by him who ascended up on high, and not needing to be indoctrinated in the schools of men. No man can tell God's ministers what to preach, or what not to preach. They must preach the preaching God has bidden them, and minister only with that ability. These gifts differ according to the measure of faith given to each, but all work to the same end; all "for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ;" resulting eventually in the bringing of them all "in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ."

There is no place in all this for the inventions and devices of men; no intimation of the use of means and instrumentalities; all being God's work from beginning to end. God works in men by his Spirit to do his will, working in them that which is well pleasing in his sight; working in both him who speaks and those that hear; for the preparations of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, are both of the Lord, and all results in the edifying of the body, upon the principle of the body of a man, working by all his members to the comfort and well-being of the whole. Under the figure of feeding, we have presented the work of the ministry; that is, to minister of the provision that the Lord has made for his saints. Jesus said to Peter, as an apostle and under shepherd, "Feed my lamb," "Feed my sheep." And Peter faithfully committed his charge to those who come after him.—1 Peter v. 1-3. "The elders which are among you I exhort, who also am an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed: feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock." The minister does not have to provide the food, but it is ready to his hand, is indeed in his heart, and by revelation he is given an understanding. The Son of God is revealed in him, and he preaches him. "We preach Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness; but unto them that are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God." This is the food, the "fat things full of marrow, the wines upon the lees well-refined." Jesus said, John vi. 51, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever; and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world;" and, "he that eateth me, even he shall live by me." "This is the bread which came down from heaven; not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead; he that eateth of this bread shall live forever."—John vi. 58. This then is to feed the sheep, to preach Christ, showing him in all his vital unity with his people, with the evidences of a work in the hearts of the subjects, by which they are identified, and by which they are assured. And this is the comfort of the saints; nor will anything less than this comfort them. They inquire, again and again, "Am I his, or am I not?" Then to assure them that they are his, by proving that his word applies to them, is to feed them; thus comforting and edifying them, and building them up in the faith. The results are, the drawing of the saints closer together in the sweet bonds of gospel fellowship and love. John says, "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." And they are found of him in peace. "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen."—Heb. xiii. 20, 21.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Salisbury Old School or Predestinarian Baptist Association, in session with the church at Nassaongo, Wicomico Co., Md., October 19th, 20th and 21st, 1892, to the associations with which she corresponds, sends christian salutation.

BELOVED BRETHREN:—We send you this our annual letter of correspondence, as an acknowledgement of christian love and fellowship. Our meeting has been largely attended, although the churches were not as fully represented as we desired; but we trust that, taking all things together, it will leave us something profitable for meditation in the coming future. Your ministers have been gladly received, and truly they were sent of God; for they seemed to be filled with the fullness of the gospel of Christ, declaring that salvation is in and through none other than the Lord Jesus Christ.

Good news comes up from all the churches. While the Lord has not been pleased to add many to their number, they all are traveling together in peace. No inroads have been made upon them by Judaizers or false brethren. We think that the peace of Zion is an indication of health and strength.

We desire a continuance of your correspondence. We have appointed our next session to be held with the church at Indiantown, Wicomico Co., Md., to commence on Wednesday after the third Sunday in October, 1893.

MARRIAGES.

Oct. 19th, 1892, by Elder D. M. Vail, at the residence of the bride's parents, in Tompkins Co., N. Y., Mr. George H. Beard, of the city of New York, and Miss Bertha Bogardus, of Tompkins Co., N. Y.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—Oct. 22d, 1892, Miss Odessa M. Avery, daughter of Mr. Delos L. and Jennie Avery, of Atlanta, formerly Blood's, Steuben Co., N. Y.

She was born in Naples, N. Y., Feb. 2d, 1870, and would have been twenty-three years old on her next birthday. She had been subject to lung and heart difficulty by spells for two or three years, but seemed much better of late, and had engaged to teach this coming winter; but God had not so designed. At the time of her death she was at a neighbor's, where a company of young people had gathered, when she was suddenly taken with severe pain in the back, with a feeling of suffocation. The friends sent immediately for her parents and a physician. Her parents arrived while she was yet suffering. Her father took her in his arms to try to ease her back. She laid her head upon his shoulder, saying, "Help me die! help me die!" and expired. How sudden and mysterious! Truly God moves in a mysterious way. How deep the sorrow of our dear sister, her companion and friends. "Oda" was of a bright, cheerful disposition, loved by all who were privileged to make her acquaintance, and truly a lady in every sense. She will be greatly missed by father, mother, sisters and friends generally. She was not a professor of religion, but left good evidence that she was born of God. She acknowledged to the writer two months before her death that she had a hope in God's mercy, and loved the Old School Baptists and the doctrine preached by them, and did not care to hear any other preaching. But Oda is no more. God has taken her to himself. May God give the mourning friends great grace in this and every trial, for Jesus' sake.

The writer of this notice spoke on the occasion of the funeral to a large and attentive congregation in the Baptist meeting-house in Naples; after which her body was laid quietly away in the cemetery near the meeting-house.

ALSO,

DIED—August 24th, 1892, sister Elizabeth A. Slauson, wife of the late Nathan Slauson, aged 79 years.

She died at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. Hattie Wood, in Waverly, N. Y., who with her husband and friends did all that loving hands could do to comfort her in her old age. Her natural mind had been badly impaired for many years, and therefore she was a great and constant care. She leaves three sons and two daughters: Daniel Slauson, Decatur Slauson and Elizabeth Tuthill, of the city of New York, and Andrew Slauson and Hattie Wood, of Waverly, N. Y. May each and all feel to say, "The will of the Lord be done."

She was baptized in Middletown, N. Y., by the late Elder Gilbert Beebe, in 1838, and removed her membership to the Waverly Old School Baptist Church soon afterward, where she remained a consistent member in full fellowship until her death. Though her mind was thus affected, she could converse upon the subject of christian experience with perfect clearness most of the time. She loved her brethren much, and enjoyed having their society; but she is gone to rest with her dear Savior and Redeemer, where sickness, sorrow, pain and death are felt and feared no more.

The writer of this notice addressed a large congregation on the occasion of the funeral; after which the remains were laid away in the Forest Home Cemetery.

D. M. VAIL.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—By request of the sorely afflicted family I send for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES the following notice of the death of Mr. Edgar D. Carlile, son of Mr. Theodore and our lamented and beloved sister Martha J. Carlile, of London Tract, Chester Co., Pa.

His death occurred on the 18th of August last, under the following distressing circumstances: He was hauling manure from his barn-yard to a field intended for seeding to wheat, using a team of four horses, one of which was a colt but partially broken. While returning from the field with the empty wagon, on going down a steep hill near the barn, his team became unmanageable and ran away. He was on the ground, and ran alongside of his team, trying to get them under control, for about two hundred yards. Upon turning a sharp corner in the road, near the sexton's house at London Tract, he was thrown violently to the ground, and when taken up was found to be speechless. He lived about an hour and a half after being taken into the sexton's house. No one witnessed the fall, though it was but a few minutes until help reached him; but he was beyond the aid of mortals.

Mr. Carlile was the only son of his father, two brothers having died a few years ago, one in infancy and the other a young man. One sister and a heart-broken father, with an uncle and aunt, are left to mourn; but I feel to say to them, Sorrow not as those who have no hope. Although Mr. Carlile never made a profession of religion, his exemplary character, and readiness to serve the Lord's people, and attentiveness to the preaching of the word, lead us to hope that he was a child of grace. He was thirty-two years old on the 14th of last April; just in the prime and vigor of manhood, an honest, industrious, upright young man, one whom the community could ill afford to lose. I am sure that the many brethren and friends who have for many years partaken of the kind hospitality of this dear, afflicted family feel to extend a hearty sympathy to them in this time of sore trial. May the God of all grace bestow grace and strength suited to their need, and enable them to say, with poor old Job, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

A. B. FRANCIS.

ORDINATIONS.

MONTROSE, W. Va.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I wish you to publish in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES the ordination of our dear brother, STEPHEN MURPHY, who went to Kansas about seven years ago, located or took up land in Thomas County, and came back the next fall and called for a letter from the Leading Creek Church, where his membership was. Finding no regular Baptist Church there, he wrote back to me and the church, telling us the situation of his mind, and we verily believed that the blessed Lord had called him to preach the gospel; so the church gave him liberty to preach where and when the Lord opened the way. He began preaching, and this fall came to visit us, and we surely were satisfied that the Lord had called him to preach. At a three days' meeting, which commenced last Friday, the church thought it her duty to have him ordained; and on the last day of our meeting we called the Elders present as a presbytery to attend to the ordination of our brother, and they proceeded as follows:

Elder J. S. Corder opened the services at nine o'clock by using hymn No. 1097, Beebe's Collection, and prayer.

After full satisfaction as to doctrine, faith and practice, the brother knelt down, and the presbytery with him.

Ordination prayer by Elder J. E. Garner.

Laying on of hands by the presbytery. Charge by Elder S. D. Lewis.

Right hand of fellowship by the brethren.

This dear brother will return in a few days, the Lord willing, to his home in Thomas County, Kansas. He is a son of Elder D. P. Murphy, and a brother to James Murphy, the pastor and Moderator of the Leading Creek Church. Stephen Murphy is a member in good standing with our church. The Baptists are requested to write to him at Rexford, Kansas.

Written by his brother, the pastor and Moderator of the Leading Creek Church of Predestinarian Baptists.

JAMES MURPHY.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BRANTFORD, Ont., Aug. 18, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN EDITORS:—Again I venture on your clemency. Inclosed are two experimental letters from sisters in the faith of God's elect, I truly believe. The first received was the first intimation that anything I had written for the SIGNS had been owned by the Master in comforting one of his children. Those who have tasted the sweetness of an acknowledgement that a crumb of heavenly bread has been guided through their unworthy hands, will understand my feelings. The second letter is from a daughter of Elder Wm. Knifton, of Bala, Muskoka, and a member of his little church there. It came to me through the care of Mr. John Leitch, of Brantford, who much desires its publication. The letter will speak for itself; but of the friend who brought it I want to speak. He is a sincere lover of grace doctrine, and the one man in Brantford who has upheld the purity of Old School Baptist faith for years. This I remember as a fact before I myself knew aught about them. So far as I know, he has not yet been enabled to read his title clear and openly acknowledge the same, which, it is my heart's desire, if it be the Father's will, he may be led to do.

Yours in the cause,

MRS. J. STREET.

MARCH 13, 1892.

MRS. J. STREET—DEAR SISTER IN CHRIST:—"Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God." The personal application of this gospel message to my soul, which I believe was God's holy seal to my entrance into the church of God, given by his Spirit at the time of my baptism, binds me by its blessed tie to all who have experienced like precious faith. Though a stranger in the flesh, yet kindred in Christ; and I trust that my letter in reply to yours in the SIGNS of March 2nd needs no other excuse for the liberty I take in addressing you. To say that I was pleased, does not express my satisfaction and joy in reading your "Songs and Sorrow." Never in the SIGNS, and seldom elsewhere, have I read an experience that so nearly touched my own. How my soul rejoiced and went out to you in spiritual fellowship as I traced in gospel language the complete and finished work of Christ in your heart. Not your work or your life, but his work, his life. Not our natural hearts improved or made better, but a new, living principle within. Not some good without, striking inward, but a new life within, working out. I am often questioned thus, "Can you always feel the evidence and joy that you are saved? Have you the constant assurance of faith? Are you not often bowed down by your sense of unworthiness and proneness to sin? For a long time I walked beneath the sombre shadows of these doubts and fears, with an up and down experience. I weighed myself, and kept my eye on the flesh, noting its imperfections, measuring myself by the standard of other experiences. But glorious dawn when my heavenly Father revealed himself to my tempest-tossed soul! What wondrous love! what mercy! what a gift! that of our Immanuel, our Redeemer. I saw the significance of God's promise to his children. My soul was filled with rejoicing, and my lips with praise. I was filled with the fullness of God. I was not to live by feelings, for they are not to be trusted, but by faith; and to doubt his promises and the finished work was to dishonor God. O blessed provision! that we are not to center or measure God's faithfulness and gifts to us by how we feel, but by what Christ has done for us. And as for assurance, as I feel certain of my earthly parents' love, how much more can I rest assured of my heavenly Father's love? How can I doubt it? It is pleasant to feel; yet, "blessed are they that see not, yet believe," is applicable along this line. My own unworthiness and sinful heart had claimed my gaze and darkened my spiritual heavens, and were ever coming between me and my Savior. Never can I forget that moment when filled with sorrow, I was brought to see Jesus within; and the Spirit showed me that not on myself, but on Jesus, I was to look; that Jesus was within; his work, his righteousness, his life. "Ye are complete in him." O heavenly message! O glorious benediction from God's altar! It poured into my soul in refreshing streams. The fountains of the deep were broken up. Looking up, away and out of myself, I saw wherein my confidence and experience were anchored, to something more stable than this unreliable Adamic nature. It was all in a nutshell in Colossians ii. 10, "And ye are complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power." He had blotted out my transgressions; they were nailed to the cross. It is the adversary whose business it is to drag between us and the light our imperfect nature, our natural self, and shut from view the glory of gospel light and liberty. We are bidden not to give place to the devil. Yet how all this time I had looked more on what he told me of myself, and not to Jesus' complete work. Our earthly nature cannot, and never will be, righteous or good. Satan would turn on us the battery of his darts, keeping our eye on ourselves or feelings, that we may be blinded to the life that is hid with Christ in God. How precious is the testimony of John, witnessing the positiveness of salvation, and testifying of those things whereof we know.—1 John iv. 21. In the hour of trial, the time of temptation, we are to "wait on the Lord," and, though seeing not, yet believe. I, too, have had my battles regarding faith and presumption. Others, not understanding my experience, have called me to task; but "as ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him." I must travel the path of my experience. One cannot live for another. It was at a time when I was stripped of earthly isms, when the creeds of men crumbled beneath the weight of gospel truth, and I cried unto the Lord to be led by his Spirit, and not by man's wisdom. Then it was the holy book became a new book to me, and the promises of God were more than the traditions of men. Thus step by step he who guides into all truth has marked the way of my earthly pilgrimage. By his grace, belief lays hold of the promises. Trust or confidence keeps hold, and faith rests in them, and I am bidden to walk in newness of life, and not in the oldness of the letter. Christ abiding within is the source of all our joy and gladness. Our anthems of praise have their beginning and end in him. In him we are free. By grace we are saved. Jesus is our Friend, our elder Brother. God is our Father. I can say, Abba, Father, and praise his name for the inwrought experience which gladdens my soul with the knowledge that he is my Father. "Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God." What an inheritance is ours!

Trusting that I have not wearied you, and that I may hear from you, if it is your pleasure, I am yours in christian bonds,

R. C. P.

BALA, Muskoka, July 17, 1892.

MRS. J. STREET—DEAR FRIEND:—When I was wishing you good by in Brantford you made me promise to write to you, which I most certainly have not been forward to do, the reason of the delay being severe affliction of body, which you have doubtless heard of, so that it need not be detailed in this. I am still in a very weak state, the two dreadful operations I underwent proving to be almost too much for me; but I trust it has only been a chastening from our heavenly Father, to purge away more of my dross, and to make me say from my heart, It is well for me that I was afflicted. If so it will prove to me that I am a legitimate child, though a very self-willed and disobedient one. But thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift, which I believe is the faith of God's elect, by which all the saints of old triumphed over all opposition, counting it all joy that they were allowed to suffer for Christ's sake. When I consider what they underwent, and were willing to endure, I feel ashamed of myself, to think what a coward I am, and how I shrink from the thought of even natural death, which to the christian is, I believe (as Elder Durand says), only a change of existence, and such a grand change as the heart of man cannot conceive of. Of late I have traveled very much in the dark; but as every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, in that very way darkness is good for us, since it is a creature of God. But every creature is not pleasant to us; for darkness often causes us to stumble, which is, to say the very least, unpleasant, and sometimes painful; and this has been the case with me lately. What reason we have to be thankful that although we at times wander so far from God, through unbelief and weakness of the flesh, yet he is still watching over us, managing all our affairs, just the same as when we realize his presence and hear his still small voice saying, "It is I; be not afraid." "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." "When thou passeth through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." Since God has seen fit to give to his elect such exceeding great and precious promises, the love of Christ constrains them to declare their allegiance to him, and to confess their faults one to another, which to the natural man is very distasteful, and altogether unnecessary, thinking, as he does, so much of the opinion of his fellow-creatures, but which to us, who have been made to hate this present evil world with all its alluring vanities, is a very small thing indeed; knowing, as thank God we do, it is to our own Maker we either stand or fall; knowing also that if God be for us none can be against us to succeed.

You will see by the heading of this letter that we are in Muskoka, the doctors declaring it to be the best place for me to come for my health. We have come a great deal earlier than in previous summers. I cannot say that I feel much better at present, it being quite an effort for me to walk from one room to another, on account of pain and weakness. But worse than all is the state of my nervous system, it being so shattered by the use or abuse of opiates given to me during my sickness, the pain being so intense, and causing me to roll about, which was considered to be very dangerous for me. The remedy however has proved to be nearly as bad as the disease.

Father has a copy of Elder Durand's "Meditations on portions of the word," and I about devour it. I can compare it to nothing but a looking-glass to me, as it contains so much of my experience; only he possesses a more godly sorrow for sin than I do; although I am continually begging for it, and believe I shall have it in God's own time. At all events there are always a few crumbs for me in every piece, and I take them as from the Master's table. The apostle John says, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." I often take comfort from those very words, especially when reading the many communications through the columns of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES; for I always feel that they are truly the brethren, and that brotherly love continues with them, and that I feel it toward them, and all of like precious faith. My cry continually is, "Lord, increase my faith." "Save, Lord, or I perish." "Say unto my soul, I am thy salvation." "Feed me with food convenient for me." "Keep me from hypocrisy." "Lead me to the rock that is higher than I." And so I go on between hope and fear all the time. Is it so with you? or are you always on the top of the mount? I have been there before now; but now I have to say with poor Job, "O that it were with me as in days past." But I trust God will grant me as good an end as he did to Israel, and then all will be well.

Your true friend and, I hope, sister in Jesus,

SUSIE P. MAY.

TRIALS OF A POOR SINNER.

I HAVE been requested by a number to write out some of my experience, but feeling so unworthy, and fearing that it would not be of interest, I have desisted till I received a request from Delaware. I will now comply, in much weakness.

I was born in Pittsylvania Co., Va., June 13th, 1862. My mother and father were not members of any profession, but both were moral, and taught morality to their children. My mother's folks were Methodists, and father's were inclined to the Old Baptists. I was the youngest of twelve children, of whom seven survive. My father was a very poor man, and was badly afflicted for years, and died before I was eight years old, of consumption. When he died he did not have a coat nor hat to wear. He knew much of the privations of life. The spring he died (1869) we bought a side of meat, which lasted us till late in the fall, when we sold our cow to get bread. I knew what it was to suffer hunger and barrenness of clothes, as I was going on fourteen before I ever had a new hat. After my father died, mother broke up house-keeping, and my lot was cast with wicked men. I went to live with my brother, who was a very wicked man, and a drunkard, and, in fact, an infidel. He used to get drunk and abuse me awfully. He would whip me scandalously with the whip he drove his mules with. On one occasion he struck me with a fence-rail, and I thought he was going to kill me; but I was afraid to speak, as he was really dangerous when he was angry or drunk. His house was a great place for parties and wicked company to assemble. He made money, but he treated me very cruelly. I wore the old clothes he threw away, and have had to tie them on me with strings and bark. I had no privilege of going to school. I never went through a spelling-book or any kind of reader in school. I studied at home, and learned the most of what little I know.

From my earliest recollection I had very serious impressions about death and my future destiny, while I believed that I could save myself at will; that if I would love God he would love me. I had a nature and will to do wrong, and would often mourn and sigh over my wretched heart, which was a sink of sin. I would often secrete myself, and fall on my knees, and implore the mercies of God upon me; yet I did not feel to be a very great sinner; for I was praying and doing good, as I thought, in order to escape an endless punishment and keep from being lost. I did not have decent clothes, and could not go to meeting; hence I learned to play cards, and would get in the woods with negro boys and play cards all day on Sundays, and at night would get down by my bedside and repeat the words,

"Now I lay me down to sleep;
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;

If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take."

Then I could lie down and feel perfectly calm, feeling that the Lord would hear my prayer. Sometimes I could go for weeks, and even months, and have but little concern about my future destiny. But I felt from my earliest recollection that if I should die I would not be prepared to meet God in peace, and that there was a preparation that I must make; yet I would meet with my associates, and spend the day in sin and all manner of evil sports, and enjoy it. At night the thought would come, What are such pleasures worth? They are only momentary; and now this day has passed in mirth, and I am without a hope in Christ. O! if I had a hope in Christ, that would afford me more solid comfort than to possess the world. In the fall of 1875 I was living with a very wicked man, who was a very bad drunkard, and treated me very cruelly. I attended a Missionary revival nights, and got greatly frightened over their fearful stories. I began in earnest to get religion, and got to feeling calm and self-righteous, and would not sing anything but good, old, sacred hymns, and was very cautious about every act of my life; yet there was something that seemed to tell me my heart was not right in the sight of God. I tried to live as righteous as a Pharisee could for some time. But I went among my former associates, and returned to my evil practices, as bad as ever, till the spring of 1876. Several of my family went to Bland County, Va., in Dry Fork valley, which was a wilderness country, only about five families living within a distance of seventeen miles. I now thought I would try to keep house. Mother and I could get no house to live in, and so I cleaned out a little log stable, and split slabs for a floor, and we lived in it that year. I had to work about and get a little bread as best I could for us to eat. For weeks we had neither bread nor meat, and lived on Irish potatoes. The privations of life up to this period pen cannot describe. I thought, I am now come to this poor wilderness country, without food or raiment, almost, and may soon die; and if I should die, I know I shall be forever lost. I looked back over my past life, and it had all been spent in sin and rebellion against God. My poor heart that summer (1876) would ache from day to day over my sins, longing to have a little hope in Jesus. I had been working to keep from being lost, but now I saw I was already lost. In September I dreamed that time was at an end, and the good Shepherd, to wit, Jesus, separated all the human family, and put the righteous upon the right hand, and the wicked upon the left. I was cast off with the wicked, and went down into a low valley, in the midst of which was a dark and horrible pit, in which I should soon be plunged forever and ever. Yonder I saw the elect of God marching the streets of the New Jerusalem, praising God. But, O my soul! I was lost forever, without hope and without God in the world. I thought if I could only have one moment I would spend it in serving God; but it was too late to pray or to ask God for mercy. I awoke, and how thankful I was that it was not a reality; but I felt that it soon would be with me; that this was to show me that I should die, and be banished from God's presence. I was in awful trouble till the last of April, 1877, when about four o'clock, on the fifth Sunday, I saw that my heart was black, vile and deceitful, and was a corrupt mass, and nothing but corruption could proceed from it. I thought my life was drawing to a close, and I was not prepared to die, and what could I do? I went to a secluded spot, and fell on my knees, in prayer to God for mercy to be delivered from the awful burden of sin which was pressing me down as a mighty mountain. But I went away feeling no better. I resorted to that spot for two long months, thinking it might be that rest would come after a while; but I grew no better, but got worse and worse. At night I would watch the sun go behind the western horizon, thinking it would be the last time that I should be permitted to behold it. I would often go over Huck Horn mountain to visit my sister on Wolf Creek, Va., and while ascending the mountain I would often become so burdened that my strength would give away, and I would fall on my knees and beg for mercy. I would arise and go a few steps farther, and fall again, importuning God for deliverance; but no rest could I find; all was dark before me, and nothing but endless banishment from the presence of God would satisfy the awful demands against me. I would often fall upon the earth in as humble a posture as I knew how, and would even bury my face in the dust, seeking rest; but none could I find. I was afraid to sleep, for fear I would never wake again. I knew it was just for me to be forever lost, but I wanted mercy. I felt that justice had bolted mercy's door. I sought secluded places to pray. I tried to spell and read the Bible as best I could, for relief, but none could I find. There was an intense desire in my very soul for peace, and to be a follower of Jesus. I felt that I had sinned away the day of grace, and thought, O that I never had been born! that I could exchange my condition with the brute creation, or the crawling worm. All nature seemed gloomy. This expression was continually in my mind,

"Here's my heart, O take and seal it, Sea! it for thy courts above."

I saw that I had no strength, and was justly condemned, and now, if saved, it must be mercy, and if damned it must be just. After being brought to the utmost extremity of my power, the earth was shrouded in darkness and awful gloom, and I was too sinful to remain on earth, and my strength began to fail. O my soul! my soul! I must now be cut off, and be forever banished from the Lord. O the anguish of a poor criminal at the bar, crying for mercy, while death is just. I started to go to the woods to pray once more before I closed my eyes in death, but felt it was no use, for I had tried in every way I knew how. While on my way my strength failed, and I began to sink. I cried unto the Lord in extreme agony of soul, "God, be merciful to me, a poor, lost and ruined sinner." That burden was soon removed, all nature seemed lovely, and my very soul was filled with praise to God. I felt like I was in a new world. I could not find language to give vent to my feelings; yet I did not know this was an experience, but thought this was to show me that I would be a christian after a while. A shower of rain came on, and I went to an old house to keep dry. While there it occurred to me thus, You are clothed with the righteousness of Christ, as with a garment. I was clad with very ragged clothes, and it also was presented to my mind that the clothes were not fit for me to wear. Then I had a view of the church of Christ, standing separate from the world; but I did not think there was any church on earth. Soon this feeling was gone, and I yet felt to be a sinner. I had evil thoughts, and a depraved nature, which was not what I wanted it to be. I became burdened with the duty of baptism; but O I thought, I am not fit. I did not know who to get to baptize me, even if I were fit. I went to the different meetings, but there was no comfort in their preaching for me. Alas! the trouble grew so heavy that I could hardly bear it; and I ran away, begging my way, and went to West Virginia, among strangers. I was only sixteen years old, and was very timid; but I was seeking rest. After traveling quite a distance, I came to a river, and did not have money to pay my ferryage; so I stopped, and hired to a man. Soon the Old Baptists had a meeting in the neighborhood, and I went, and felt that I knew every Old Baptist there. Three preachers preached, and it seemed that it was all for me. Right there I was satisfied about the church; for I knew that they were God's people, and I loved them better than any other people on earth. I thought, O that I could be numbered among that blessed family. I would be the happiest subject on earth if I could only be the least among them. I spent the next week in prayer to God that I might have a brighter evidence of my hope, if this was indeed a hope. On the next Sunday (Oct. 7th, 1877) I walked twenty-two miles to get to hear this dear people again; and when I heard them my soul was filled to overflowing, and my eyes were melted into tears. After the preaching I went forward, feeling to be a poor sinner, and unfit for the lowest seat among them. I was received, and then felt another trouble. I did not have clothes to be baptized in. I only had one poor suit of clothes, which I wore every day; but I thought about how poor Jesus became for me, and I was made willing to be baptized with the clothes I had on, and let them dry upon me. Another trouble was, I had never staid with an Old Baptist in my life, and I thought I would have to pay for staying all night when I went to be baptized; and I did not have the money to pay. I left home on Saturday morning, Oct. 13th, 1877, and a Methodist let me have clothes to be baptized in. I went to New River Church, in West Virginia, and spent the night with Elder J. C. Hubbard, the first Primitive Baptist I ever staid under the roof with. I did not need money to pay for staying, for I was at home. On the next morning I was baptized, and left a burden that I have never felt since. That was one of the happiest days of my life. I have never regretted being baptized, but many times I have felt unworthy, and have been made to mourn over my wretched heart. Since my lot was cast with God's dear people I have had many sore trials. My mother told me that the Old Baptists were the meanest people in the world, and seemed to turn against me. But, bless the Lord, I had the pleasure of baptizing her three years ago, in her 77th year. She is almost helpless, and cannot live long; but she loves the truth. While she is poor, helpless, and her mind gone, I had rather she would be blessed with a sweet hope in Jesus than to have ten thousand worlds. I was so glad that my life was spared to find this dear people, that I wanted mother to move to West Virginia. I went after her, and while camping on Blue Stone River the water rose in the night and destroyed what little we had. I was forced to abandon the idea of keeping house, and mother went to live with her married children. I had to expose myself so much in my raising, and go so thinly clad, that my health gave way when I was about twenty years old, and I have not been able to perform any manual labor since, and but few hours have I been clear of pain. I was married when I was twenty-four years old, and for the first time since I was eight years old did I have a humble spot that I could call home. I have had a hard and rugged road to travel, but God has blessed me with a faithful and healthy companion, who has been truly a help meet to me. I feel to-day that were I deprived of a home among the Old Baptists I would not want to live any longer. The sweetest enjoyment of my life is the sweet comfort I have among the saints. I have traveled a great deal among rich and poor, but when I find those who love the Lord I feel at home among them; for God's people are all one family, all being taught of God, and the hearts of all being fashioned alike. I feel that my stay on earth will be short; but I can say that the Lord is good, and his watchful care has been over me all my life. What shall I render unto him for all his benefits toward me? Pray for me, dear brethren and sisters, that I may be kept contending for the faith, and may ever be enabled to preach Jesus as the way, the truth and the life. I have only hinted at a few things connected with my early experience, by request. I cannot find language to express it.

OPELIKA, Ala., Aug. 23, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I have just written sister Price a letter, and the reading of her article in the last SIGNS has led me to write a few things touching the same subject upon which she has written. There is one clause in her letter that I have thought a great deal about, and that is about writting or preaching about the devil. I am satisfied that if sister Price's views are correct the devil is a creature of God; and if indeed he is, may we not spend some time profitably thinking and writing about him? not in praise of him, nor to honor him, but in exposing his wiles and his craftiness. May we not be profited by shunning his guile and subtilty? for he is as a roaring lion, walking up and down the earth, seeking whom he may devour. We know that a vulture eats carrion, and is a filthy bird; yet, for the health of the people, are they not needed? There is a fine imposed in some towns for killing a buzzard. Then are they not needed, and are they not useful? Although they are not made to put in parlors, may they not be of use about slaughter-pens and elsewhere? Although the refined lady with a beautiful cheek scorns the bird as filthy (which is true), yet does not that bird in his office conduce in a measure to the bloom on the beautiful cheek? It is even so. If we will lay aside prejudice, and see the Lord in the entirety of creation, we shall with wonder admire the wisdom and mercy and justice of God in all he does; for we are plainly taught that he has "created the waster to destroy." The opposites in creation should make us wonder and become astonished at the wisdom of our God. Positives and negatives are also clearly discovered, and there is nothing in all the realm of creation but what serves a purpose of our God; and if indeed the devil has come from nowhere, and is by no means accounted for, he is a mystery sure enough; for he is manifest here and elsewhere. If indeed God made him, with Job, as has been cited, he was surely made for a purpose. Now, if one asks what purpose the Lord had, I will answer, that many such things are with him, and he gives no account of any of his matters. He does not answer vain man, whose breath is in his nostrils, who is but a creature of a day. Man in his presumption would judge the God of heaven, and make him account for what he has done. I am satisfied that all our God does is just and right, for that is what he does, and his purpose is commensurate with his wisdom and his power. But I find in my own experience that this opposition to God's doings had to be burned out of me by the fire of revelation, and then I could see in a clear light his eternal, sovereign character as the eternal God. No question was then left in me, but a solemn declaration like Job's, "I know thou canst do everything, and that no thought is withholden from thee." Since then I have not been troubled with the question in my mind about God being the author of sin, but it is the sin that is in me that bothers me. "I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing." I find this daily. Why it is, and what the end of it all will be, I know not; but my hope in Christ, which God gave me, enables me to look for deliverance from this state. I know that day succeeds night, and vice versa; that stars are seen by night, which could never be seen by day. I know that darkness is needful for man and beast, and for flowers and fruits. How they could be developed without both I have not yet learned; but some, who would seem to judge the Almighty, may be able to tell us. We know the devil can do no more than God our Father sees fit. We know he cannot touch the life of God's children; but he can worry whom he cannot devour. Paul admonishes us to beware lest he get an advantage of us. He is wiley, cunning and crafty, and would catch us with guile; hence we are warned to watch. He plays in the flesh, and suggests evil to us; and if we are not exceedingly careful we will say something that will cause us trouble. He seeks to divide, and to cause confusion and strife in the church; hence how needful that we should know something of his wiles, and resist him, and he will flee from us. He approaches us in every imaginable way; and if he cannot get us to do one thing, he will try another. If our writings tend to warn and make us watchful, it will do us good; and we should try to comfort and strengthen each other, and do the will of our Father which is in heaven. May God enable us to be as wise as serpents, and as harmless as doves, is my desire to all those who love the truth of our God, the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Yours in hope,

W. LIVELY.

SPIRITUAL MANNA.

"THIS is that bread which came down from heaven; not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead; he that eateth of this bread shall live forever."—John vi. 58.

In all the records concerning the dealings of the Lord with the chosen nation of Israel there is nothing which does not in some way represent the experience of the followers of Jesus, who are the spiritual Israel. Aside from this typical significance, the history of the natural descendants of Abraham can be of no deeper interest to us than the traditions of other nations of that period. But when it is the pleasure of God by his Spirit to reveal the testimony of Jesus in any incident of the account given of his providence in establishing and preserving that favored nation, there is a glorious attraction found in contemplating that revelation in all its fullness. Certainly there could be no correct type of the afflicted and poor people of God without the representation of their wanderings and their sore trials. From the very first presentation of the natural Israel there is a continuous picture of the severe distresses resulting from their rebellion and forgetfulness of their allegiance to that God from whom they received every temporal blessing. Under the covenant given them from Sinai they brought upon themselves heavy calamities as the just chastening for their continual departures from the law to which they had pledged their allegiance. Justice often very manifestly required that they should suffer from the blasting of their harvests, from the ravages of pestilence, and from the oppression of their enemies. These visitations of divine condemnation appeared to indicate that the Lord had become their enemy, and that his mercies were forever taken away from them. Yet throughout their generations up to the coming of the promised Messiah the peculiar favor of the Lord was shown in maintaining them as a nation, and in restoring them from the captivity into which their wickedness had sold them. It is important to observe that the covenant which God had given to Abraham was no less binding when the Israelites were idolatrous and sinful than when they were obedient to its precepts. Their transgressions could not break their relationship to Abraham. Nor was there any provision in that covenant by which the Lord had said that he would reject them from his special care even in such transgression as should bring upon them his dreadful chastenings. On the contrary, throughout all their most abominable iniquity the visitation of his chastening attested the remembrance of his covenant in which they were chosen as his peculiar people. So he says to them, "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities."—Amos iii. 2. This should afford encouragement to those who are ready to sink under chastisement. No surer evidence can be given to confirm their hope in the salvation of God than that he is faithful to rebuke and chasten them in every transgression against him.

It will be remembered by those who are familiar with the book of Genesis, that when the Lord gave his promise to Abraham he assured him that his seed should sojourn in a strange land and be afflicted four hundred years. There can be no question that this was determined in the purpose of God even before the knowledge of it was communicated to Abraham. The announcement of this affliction was included in the promise that they should after that suffering come out with great substance. It cannot be understood that there was any less certainty of the distress than of the final joy. It is profitable to the saints to rest in the confidence that this gives evidence of the electing love of God as being not less manifest in the suffering of the deepest tribulation than in the enjoyment of the most confident assurance and the most joyful and comfortable surroundings. In the provision which God has made for his chosen people in Christ Jesus, his love is the same in the appointment of the darkest seasons as in the manifestation of the strongest assurances. He displays that love no less in the bestowal of trials and sufferings than in the endearing joys and happiness, which causes the saints often to count their severest afflictions light in view of the great love of our God.

When the appointed afflictions of the seed of Abraham had been fulfilled in the house of their captivity, they were made to cry out of the depth of distress, and their groaning was heard by their God. He came down for their deliverance, and with a high hand he brought them out of Egypt. Neither the wrath of man, as embodied in the madness of Pharaoh, nor the laws of nature, as illustrated in the intervening waters of the Red sea, could protract their afflictions one hour beyond the time in the promise specified. Neither was it needful to call upon the powers of earth for assistance in breaking the yoke of their oppressors. When Moses was sent to demand of Pharaoh the release of the chosen nation, he was not armed with the authority of an earthly monarch; yet he went not as a suppliant to the king, but in the majesty of that God whose messenger he was, he commanded that the oppressors should let their bondmen go. It was not possible that this commandment should be obeyed until all the plagues appointed should have been poured out upon the nation of Egypt. Therefore the heart of Pharaoh was hardened that he refused to let Israel go, until the plagues were fulfilled upon them. As often as Pharaoh yielded his consent the Lord again hardened his heart, and he recalled the decree which had been extorted from him under the judgment of divine indignation. In this way the purpose of God was brought to pass, that Israel should be thrust out of the house of bondage with no claim to the glory of that wonderful victory by which they were delivered. Herein is the most accurate type of the deliverance of the saints of God from the bondage of sin. Utterly helpless in their slavery, their fetters are only felt more galling when they seek for release; but when the arm of the Lord brings them deliverance they are constrained to confess that all their praises are due to the sovereign favor of the Lord their God. It should be specially observed that the power of God brought to this nation of bondmen such a triumphant release that they were not simply enabled to escape from their oppressors, as if they were defrauding their masters of services due them; but their tyrants were glad to thrust them out even with the treasures which they had lent them. The purpose of God in this spoiling of Egypt is manifest when the hosts of Pharaoh pursued the people whom they had thrust out; for it was in this way that they were appointed to the destruction to which they marched in following Israel into the Red sea. So in the experience of the subjects of divine grace, it is not that they are merely saved from the consequences of their sins, as if they were still under the guilt of their transgressions. By the power of God they are made free from the pollution and guilt of their sins, so that divine justice is magnified in their salvation, not less than infinite mercy and forgiving love. All the sins which had oppressed them are forever buried in the antitypical Red sea of the blood of Jesus Christ, which cleanses all his ransomed people from all sin.

In tracing the type it will be seen that after this great deliverance the chosen nation wandered in the wilderness forty years before entering the land which God had given them in his promise to Abraham. In this weary journey they passed through deep afflictions, and often were found murmuring and fretting against God. Their first complaint was at the wilderness of Sin, where they murmured for want of bread. This well represents the perpetual ground of repining with the followers of Jesus. Reason calls for such nourishment as the natural man is able to receive; and finding nothing of this support to lean upon, the next thought is a complaint that there is no evidence of the reality of that hope which is the only salvation of those who are called to follow the Savior. Even when they are favored with such clear revelation of the grace of God as silences the opposition of reason, the witness of the Spirit can be received only through the medium of that faith of the operation of God, which the natural man has no power to receive. As well might the naturally blind be required to receive the testimony of light, as the powers of the natural man to grasp the testimony of that faith which is the fruit of the Spirit. So it is in the understanding of the types of the legal dispensation. While reason sees in the wanderings of the nation of Israel only a succession of rebellious outbreaks against the commandments of their God, to faith it is revealed that no wickedness of that people could have been omitted without marring the typical representation of the experience of the true disciples of Jesus. It is the trouble of each one who is led by the Spirit of God that he finds another law in his members warring against the law of his mind, and bringing him into captivity to the law of sin which is in his members. The continual strife between the love of holiness and the sinful mind renders every saint a witness to the faithfulness of the type presented in the history of that rebellious people. So far as their path is traced in that wilderness journey, it is the way which is attested by the common trials of the saints; and even where they were led through all those weary years which are not detailed in the record given for our learning, there is a shadowy indication of the unknown way through which every saint is guided in his earthly pilgrimage. Certainly there is nothing in all the dealings of God with that chosen natural seed, but that is shown by the Spirit as the testimony of Jesus. But it can only be correctly known by the saints as the Comforter shall take of the things of Jesus and show it unto each one of the children of Zion in his individual instruction. Not even the most favored subject of divine teaching can find out anything of the great mystery of godliness by all the efforts of which the natural mind is capable. It is so effectually hidden from the comprehension of carnal reason that it is "unsearchable." Not only is it impossible that it should be discovered by searching, but it is not in the power of finite minds to even search for it. However earnestly the tried saint may desire to find some evidence in himself to support his hope in the grace of God, the only result of all his investigation will always be the confirmation of his doubts, and the increase of his anxiety lest his hope is merely a delusion.

Under such fiery trials, the saints learn the need of that prayer by which they are authorized to ask of their Father for the gift of that bread which came down from heaven.

As was typified in the manna given to the natural Israel, this food must be ministered unto them daily by the Spirit of truth. It is not enough that they have once learned their dependence upon divine grace; so long as they remain in the body of this death they have need of the same instruction in every trial. Neither the mind nor the memory of the natural man can receive the witness of the Spirit of truth. Nothing less than the abiding presence of Jesus can strengthen one of his little ones to stand against the opposition of all the things which are tangible to natural intelligence. While the world is arrayed with the enemy of all righteousness, against the hope of every saint, the most effective enemies are found by each believer in this earthly house of our tabernacle. By this experience they are taught the need of that daily supply of strength from God by which they are made conquerors over all the assaults of unbelief and sin. It is in this way that they learn the need of that strength which can only result from eating the true Bread of life. The literal manna, which was given to national Israel in the wilderness, was not capable of imparting even natural life to the dead. It was of no value to any but the hungry wanderer. Not even the Israelite could find any nourishment in it unless he was possessed of natural life, and was hungry for natural food. In the application of the type the same truth must be observed. The true Israelite in spirit is made alive by the power of the life-giving Word of God before he can so much as hunger for the true bread of which the manna in the wilderness was but the typical representation. This fact is consistent with the announcement by our Lord, "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled."—Matt. v. 6. This does not signify that the blessing is promised as a reward for their hunger and thirst, but that the condition in which they are found proves that the blessing rests upon them. No sinner ever bore this mark of conscious need of righteousness until it was manifested by the blessing of God. The same blessing by which the desire is produced, always secures the supply of that true bread of life which shall fill every one who is blessed with such hunger and thirst. It is not merely provided in a storehouse, and left for the hungry to take it out at their will; the same divine love which made the provision, also furnishes the Holy Spirit to take and minister it to every hungry one. Thus their blessed condition is made manifest.

When our Lord presents himself as that bread which came down from heaven, it is evident that he does not teach his disciples that they are to literally eat his flesh and drink his blood. Neither is it the natural life of his disciples which is by thus eating to be continued forever. Certainly none live forever but those whom Jesus designates as his sheep. These are they who being dead yet hear his voice and live. Unto them he gives eternal life, and they shall never perish. No others can hear his voice, and do his commandments. It is not consistent with the plain language of Jesus as here recorded to represent it as an appeal to men designed to prevail upon them to eat of this bread. It is clearly the distinctive mark which discriminates between those who are led by the Spirit of God and such as are still trusting in their own works for acceptance in the sight of God. Only such as love righteousness can be included as those who eat the flesh of the Son of man, who is the embodiment of all righteousness. "This is that bread which came down from heaven." No justifying righteousness could ever originate in this sin-cursed earth. Only as it is revealed from heaven in the Lord Jesus can this divine food be found. The natural mind of the saints is ever seeking for perfection in compliance with the demands of the law of divine justice; and because it is not possible to find righteousness in himself the conscious sinner is ready to perish in despair. In this experience he is made a witness of the truth which our Lord expresses in our text. He can satisfy his longing desire for conformity to the holiness of God in no other way but in feasting by faith upon the broken body and shed blood of the crucified Redeemer. When he is enabled thus to eat and drink, he is raised above the law of sin and death, being justified freely by the grace of God in Christ Jesus from all things from which he could not be justified by the law of Moses. So long as any hope remains in the heart of a sinner that he can attain to righteousness by his own works, it is impossible that he should eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood. Thus none are ever able to claim that they have chosen this living bread by their own wisdom. The power of God is requisite for the revelation of this heavenly appetite in any sinner. There is no clearer mark by which the subjects of electing love are sealed than this hunger and thirst after righteousness. Carnal selfishness may desire to escape hell, and to secure everlasting bliss; but only by the indwelling Spirit of Christ can any sinner long for freedom from the power of sin, and feast upon the perfect righteousness which is revealed alone in Christ Jesus. Every one who has this desire for conformity to divine holiness is born of God; and can feed upon no other food but the flesh and blood of Jesus. Nothing else can satisfy his appetite for perfect righteousness. Since Christ himself dwells in every one who has this seal of his Spirit, it is assuredly true that every individual who bears this mark must live forever; as Jesus says, "Because I live, ye shall live also." This strong consolation belongs to all who can find no support in any other food but the flesh and blood of the Son of man. This is the true bread of life, which came down from heaven, of which the manna in the wilderness was but the shadow.

THE ONLY TRUE GROUND OF REJOICING.

A SERMON BY JOHN KERSHAW, OF LONDON, ENGLAND.

"THE poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel."—Isaiah xxix. 19.

There are two things, as leading principles, in our text that I want, by the help of the Lord, to call your attention to. The first is to say a little of "the poor among men;" and, secondly, to show that they "shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel."

I. In the first place, then, let us notice "the poor among men" that are here spoken of by the prophet. In a doctrinal point of view they are the very characters that the apostle Peter dedicates his epistles to—to the scattered strangers; and he gives them the honored and honorable appellation of "elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father."

The doctrine of God's election is clearly revealed in the sacred Scriptures. Everlasting electing love is the spring and fountain of every blessing of grace and salvation. As, for instance, if you and I feelingly and experimentally know our spiritual poverty and destitution, our knowledge of it has for its origin God's covenant love and covenant mercy. But upon this I shall not dwell now.

"The poor among men" intended by the words of the text are "the redeemed of the Lord," those who are redeemed by the precious blood of the Lord Jesus Christ from sin, the curse of the law, and the pit of destruction. God's election and Christ's redemption are coupled and bound up together. All that Jehovah the Father loved he gave into the hand of Christ, their covenant Head. Christ in the covenant became their Bond, their Surety, and their Mediator; and, in the fullness of time, according to covenant engagements, he came forward, appeared in our nature, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem his church and people from under the curse of the law, being made a curse for them.

But we observe, in the next place, that the objects of the Father's love and the purchase of Christ's blood cannot be told, only as God the Holy Ghost makes them manifest. The Lord's people, in their Adam-fall state, are no better than the rest of the world. They all have had their conversation among their ungodly neighbors in time past in the lusts of their flesh and of the mind, and have by nature the same wrathful dispositions as others.

Now here I pause; and I say to you and myself, Let us look back to how we were living when the Lord arrested us in our consciences. It has done me good many a time to look back; and I have often viewed with astonishment and wonder the riches of God's grace that made me to differ from what I once was, and from my sinful companions that surrounded me. It is by the grace of God that we are what we are as christians and believers; we have nothing but what we have received from the Lord, and all the glory from first to last redounds to him alone. The saint of God that knows these things feels a something rising up from the very bottom of his heart which says, "Not unto us, not unto us, O Lord, but unto thy name give glory." My friends, keep your minds fixed upon two points; and the two points are these: one is that God's religion in the soul of a poor sinner always lays that sinner low; and the other is that God's religion in the sinner's soul always lifts the Lord Jesus Christ very high. A good old gracious friend of mine in the north, whom I had for many years, who was a great blessing to me when I first entered the ministry, and who performed many good things for me as an instrument in God's hand, used to say, "There are two points which you can never push too far in preaching; and these are to lay the sinner low in the dust of abasement, and exalt the riches of God's grace in the salvation of the soul."

But to return. We were remarking that none can tell who the Lord's people are till God the Spirit makes them manifest. The Lord knows who they are: "Having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his." "Yes," say some, "he knows when they begin to turn to him; then, when they accept the offers and proffers of salvation and take hold of his grace, he knows them then." My friends, that is not God's way of working. He knows his sheep before he gives them manifestly eternal life; he says, "My sheep hear my voice, and I give unto them eternal life." In God's religion life is the first thing given. The poor sinner is dead in trespasses and sins. The Lord Jesus Christ is a "quickening Spirit;" and he has power over all flesh, to give eternal life to as many as the Father gave him. In regeneration the Holy Spirit makes no mistake. As a Spirit of knowledge he knows who the covenant people are; and when the set time to favor Zion comes he arrests them in the conscience. Saul was one of these vessels of mercy, and Zaccheus also was a monument of grace; therefore at the appointed moment the Lord the Spirit quickened them into spiritual life. There are not any, whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life, but what the blessed Spirit either has or will in due time regenerate and begin the good work of grace in their precious souls, and carry it on in the face of every opposition from within and from without, from sin, men and devils. It is a good doctrine, my friends. Where God begins the work he will surely carry it on and finish it, till at last he lands the soul safe in immortal glory. He does not give the poor sinner a stock of grace to live on and cultivate. No, no; it is God's grace that cultivates the poor sinner, and not the poor sinner that cultivates the grace of God.

But now, my friends we will come more into the experimental part of the text. The "poor among men" are those that feel their spiritual poverty and destitution. A man may be a nobleman, and possess immense wealth; yea, he may be a king, wear a crown on his head, and wield a sceptre in his hand, and yet be one of "the poor among men." For instance, David, the king of Israel, was one of "the poor among men," in a spiritual point of view. And every one of you, my friends, who feels his spiritual poverty and destitution, the Holy Ghost has found room in your very heart and soul for the language of the man after God's own heart: "But I am poor and needy; yet the Lord thinketh upon me;" "But I am poor and sorrowful; let thy salvation, O God, set me upon high." And, I am a poor, mourning, sorrowful, sighing, groaning, weak, vile, helpless and worthless worm, is a description of the feelings of David, and of every one of the Lord's quickened family, "the poor among men," who "shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel." A man may be as poor as poverty can make him, in a literal point of view, and yet be very proud and high-minded in himself. It is a great blessing, my friends, feelingly and experimentally to know our poverty and destitution before God. "Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

Now these are the characters that God has a special regard to: "Thus saith the Lord, To this man will I look, even to him that is poor, and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word." The first term that God here makes use of suits me well—"to him that is poor." I very generally feel my poverty and destitution, and cannot join in with those that say they are rich, increased in goods, and have need of nothing; for I feel by daily experience that I am wretched, miserable, poor, blind and naked. It is a mercy to know this, my friends. The Pharisee did not know it; but the poor publican did, and groaned before God on account of it. But, then, in reference to the next term, I mostly feel my lack of it—"contrite spirit." Now, instead of having generally a humble and contrite spirit, a broken-down, feeling heart before the Lord, I am mourning and crying over a hard and barren heart, and a stubborn mind, beseeching the Lord to take away this stony heart and give me a heart of flesh—a feeling heart. I am sighing and mourning because of a corrupt heart, unclean thoughts, and vain, foolish imaginations, which make me cry out, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." Well, my friends, be it so. If you have the feelings I have described, you are the very characters who stand in need of what God has promised to give—a new heart, a right spirit, and a tender conscience. But the Lord will be inquired of by the house of Israel that he may do these things for them. They have feelings of deep necessity, and they cry to the Lord that he would hear their prayers and regard their cry. The Lord hears a humble spirit before a spirit of presumption; and though such may have many fears and tremblings, yet they shall be brought to rejoice with trembling.

Do you not see, then, that God has a special regard to these "poor among men," these spiritually poor, who feel their inward poverty before the Lord? The psalmist speaks on the subject thus, "He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and will not despise their prayer." The destitute then are such as have nothing of their own; those who feel themselves only a mass of sin, weakness and helplessness before the Lord. And these are the characters, my friends. The Lord strips them of all the imaginary goodness they once thought they had; he empties them of all this, brings down their high looks and breaks their rocky hearts; and thus he makes the poor soul feel his weakness, that he cannot save himself nor do that which is alone the work of the Lord the Spirit. And thus these really "poor among men" feel the importance of the Lord's own words, "Without me ye can do nothing." Now Paul was one of these "poor among men." He felt he could do nothing by his own power or ability, but he could do all things by the power of Christ strengthening him.

II. But, secondly. "The poor among men," the destitute, the weak, the helpless, the lost and the undone, "shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel." Indeed, my friends, they have nothing else to rejoice in. "The poor among men," God's spiritually poor people, cannot rejoice in the world or the things of it; there is nothing in it that will do them good; nor indeed can they be satisfied with anything short of the rich treasure which is treasured up in the Lord of life and glory. Thus it is that the truly poverty-stricken, bankrupt, undone sinner, and Jesus Christ in his glorious salvation, rich treasure and inexhaustible fullness meet so blessedly together, the one being so adapted to the other. A full sinner and a full Savior will not do together at all; but an empty sinner and a full Savior; a filthy, vile and polluted sinner, and the efficacious blood of Christ to cleanse it away; a naked and undone sinner, and the robe of Christ's justifying righteousness; a weak and helpless worm, and the power of the mighty God of Jacob to keep, support and hold him up; these things blessedly harmonize together. And this is God's way of working. "The poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel;" for they cannot rejoice either in themselves or in the world. "Finally, my brethren," says Paul, "rejoice in the Lord;" and God takes very good care that Christ alone shall be the ground and basis of all their joy and consolation. Instead of "the poor among men" rejoicing and triumphing in themselves, the more they are led to see what dwells and lurks within, the more they are brought to groan and cry out to the Lord under the burden of it. Looking to ourselves will bring us nothing but sighing and sorrowing. "We that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened." "For in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing." No; all the goodness is in the Holy One of Israel. Paul understood these things well; and he explains in the seventh chapter of Romans in a heartfelt way what every one of "the poor among men," spoken of in our text, knows something about. He says, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" This is the inward feeling of every one of the Lord's saints concerning themselves. There is no rejoicing in our wretchedness, nor any triumphing in our sinfulness and vileness. Whatever some men may say, who brand us with rejoicing in our corruptions and wretched feelings, they do not do us justice; for, instead of rejoicing in my weakness and infirmities, my very soul is mourning and sorrowing because of these things before God; so that my cry is, "Dear Lord, hold and keep me up, preserve me from evil, be thou my guide and keeper all through the wilderness, and land me at last safely in glory, where I shall praise thee forevermore."

"The poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel." It is Christ alone that is the christian's rejoicing. Paul speaks of it thus: "We are the circumcision, which worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh." This is the way God circumcises the hearts of his people with the circumcision of Christ, made without hands, which cuts them off from all hope of saving themselves; and by the circumcising knife of his law he stops their mouth from all boastings, and brings them in guilty and condemned. The Holy Ghost leads them away from self to a precious Jesus. He leads to a discovery of Christ in all his covenant characters and shows how he took their case into his hands before all worlds. He opens up to them the glories of Christ in his incarnation; he shows them that it "is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." So that this is the ground of their rejoicing, that Jesus Christ is an able, willing, glorious, and an all-sufficient Savior.

"The poor among men" rejoice in a finished salvation, all of grace; not a salvation party accomplished by Christ and the rest made up by the sinner. A gospel of this kind will not save "the poor among men." I tried for months at saving myself in this way; and when I missed it here, and missed it there, I tried it again, for I was determined to hit it. I could see no way of salvation only by being good; therefore I resolved to be good. But with all my trying and tugging I felt myself to be getting weaker and weaker, and further and further off from God, till I was afraid at last that I should surely sink under the terrors of God in a broken law in the waves of damnation, if there were no other way of salvation than my own. I wanted now something more than my good doings. O, my friends, it is dreadful work thus to sink in the horrible pit and the miry clay! But, however painful, it is profitable. The more sick we are made of ourselves, the more we are brought to feel our own weakness and inability, the more will be our joy and rejoicing in Christ Jesus, the Holy One of Israel.

"The poor among men," then, rejoice that salvation is finished; that sin is forever put away by the sacrifice of Jesus; that law and justice are satisfied; that everlasting righteousness is wrought out and brought in; that the world is overcome; that death and hell are conquered; for

"Hell and our sins resist our course,
But hell and sin are vanquish'd foes;
Our Jesus nail'd them to the cross,
And sang the triumph when he rose."

Thus, as the believer is enable to look away from self by faith to a precious Christ, to see Christ in the triumphs of his cross, Christ in the power of his resurrection, Christ in the power of his ascension, for the God of salvation is "gone up with a shout;" as the Holy Spirit leads "the poor among men" by faith to the place where Christ, the forerunner, has for us entered, there is a spring of joy and gladness rising up in the soul, which has a precious Christ and a finished salvation at the bottom of it. O what sweetness and consolation there is to the heart when Christ is thus realized, believed in, and triumphed in!

The Lord Jesus Christ in our text is called "the Holy One of Israel;" and this he is experimentally felt to be by all God's spiritual Israel. But I shall not detain you to-night in reference to "Israel" by defining the term particularly. But, whether Jew or Gentile, if we are of the true circumcision we are made to know that there is no holiness in ourselves, but that it is all in a precious Jesus. Christ is our covenant Head, Christ is our beauty and glory, and Christ is our all in all.

"The poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel;" for he is their holiness. They cannot produce it in themselves. What holiness can you find in your heart? The words of Hart have come into my mind with overwhelming power many times; for I find that I have the daily feelings of them in my soul:

"That we're unholy needs no proof,
We sorely feel the fall;
But Christ has holiness enough
To sanctify us all."

Let him but make that holiness manifest in thy soul, poor sinner, and thou wilt rejoice "in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." Christ is the Holy One of his spiritual Israel. We have no holiness in ourselves. Paul had none; yet the dear child of God is ready to say, "O that I were as Paul! He was indeed a vessel of mercy. O that I felt as Paul felt!" Do you not feel as Paul felt? He says, "When I would do good, evil is present with me." Do you not find that he describes your feelings in Romans vii.? If you do, you know that there is no purity nor holiness in your hearts by nature. I make two very broad assertions, but I will stand fast to them. There is not one particle nor grain of true holiness in the whole world but what comes from Christ, the Holy One of Israel; and there is not one grain of holiness amongst the "spirits of just men made perfect," now before the throne, but what has emanated from a precious Christ, the Holy One of Israel. As all natural light is from the sun, so all spiritual holiness is from Christ, the Holy One of Israel.

The Lord Jesus Christ is the Holy One of Israel, whether we speak of him in his complex character or as God. He is holy in all his attributes and in all his operations; so much so that he is said to be "glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders," both in "the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth." They that appear before him are said to veil their faces, exclaiming with holy admiration, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts!"

If we look at the human nature of our Lord Jesus Christ he is the Holy One of Israel; for though he was "made of a woman, made under the law," partaking of the nature of the woman, yet he was not of a sinful nature. Here is a part of the mystery: "Great is the mystery of godliness!" How he could be made of a woman, partake of the nature of the woman, and that woman a fallen creature like the rest of mankind, and yet be holy himself, is a mystery; but so it is. The angel said to her, "That holy thing which shall be born of thee [not that impure thing, but that holy thing] shall be called the Son of God." He was "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens." He was the immaculate Jesus, the "Lamb without blemish and without spot, whom God verily foreordained;" so that in his complex character as God-man he is the perfection of beauty, purity and holiness, so much so that the divine Father, in viewing his person and all that appertained to him, exclaimed, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

He is "the Holy One of Israel" also, not only in the constitution of his person, but in all the thoughts of his heart, in all the expressions of his lips, and in all the actions of his life. Nothing but holiness and purity ever centred in him or flowed from him; so that he is the Holy One of Israel in the strictest sense of the word. He is now enthroned in glory, inhabiting the praises of his Israel above. He is the Holy One of Israel in the realms of bliss; and, as I said before, all the holiness and purity of the redeemed come from him—they owe it all to him. In him they exult and glory, and cast their crowns at his blessed feet, while they sing "the song of Moses and the Lamb."

"The poor among men," then, shall rejoice in this precious Christ, the Holy One of Israel. We can find no holiness in ourselves; but Jesus Christ has a holiness which is made over to us. I know I am on ground which many of our professedly pious religionists do not like. The very sound of "imputed holiness" they abhor and detest; they are for having a holiness in themselves. Indeed, my friends, I was in this hole for many years. There was one text which I was always hitting at. It was this, "That we should be holy and without blame before him in love." I maintained that I was chosen of God to be holy in myself; that I was to grow in grace till I became holy and unblamable before God. I aimed at this year after year, but could never attain to it. Instead of attaining to holiness and unblamableness, I saw myself to be more and more unholy, to be blamable in this and blamable in that; and though my outward walk and conversation were such that my brethren could not blame nor the world lay hold of, my conscience was always accusing and blaming me. I was groaning and mourning about, as a poor, guilty wretch; and I believe if I live to be fourscore years old it will be the same. So that there is no holiness in us as sinners, in which we can stand unblamable before God, but what is in Christ. Blessed be God, we have a holiness and unblamableness in the Lord Jesus Christ, in which we stand before him holy as Christ is holy, and pure as Christ is pure. What does the church say? There are two words; they are very broad, but very firm. Speaking of herself as she is in herself, she says, "Black;" speaking of herself as she viewed herself in Christ by the eye of living faith, she says, "Comely," through "the comeliness which thou hast put upon me." Again, black "as the tents of Kedar;" white "as the curtains of Solomon." The Lord, addressing the church as she is in Christ, says, "Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee."

"And lest the shadow of a spot
Should on my soul be found,
He took the robe the Savior wrought
And cast it all around."

So that Christ is the Holy One of Israel, and the holiness of his people Israel; and it is only as they stand in him that they are holy and unblamable before a just and righteous God in love. If any man were to tell me that he was holy and unblamable before God in any other way than in Christ, I should know that it was not true, and the Bible would prove it; for it says, "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." Man in his best estate is vanity; what then must he be in his worst? What does the church say? "We are all as an unclean thing; and our iniquities, like the wind, have carried us away." But as the church is viewed in Christ, it is said, "He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob."

The Lord enable us, then, to trust alone in a precious Christ, and not to attempt to cleanse ourselves from our defilement; we might as well attempt to wash a blackamoor white as to effect it. But in the Lord Jesus Christ there is righteousness to justify us; in the Lord Jesus Christ there is efficacious blood to cleanse us; in the Lord Jesus Christ there is holiness to sanctify us; and in him there is everything that we can stand in need of. Thus there is great ground for "the poor among men" to rejoice in "the Holy One of Israel," and in him alone.

"Well," say some, "but is there not a holy and divine nature communicated from God to his people?" Yes, there is; and that is a great blessing indeed. Christ has taken our nature into union with his divine nature; and in that nature he has bled and died for us, sin being condemned in his flesh. In that nature he has been made a curse for us, and wrought out and brought in an everlasting righteousness; and this is imputed to us. He now appears in the presence of his Father; and as sure as he lives to represent us and plead our cause before the throne, so, in the set time to favor us, in the hour of regeneration, he implants within us a holy principle, a new nature, a meek and quiet spirit—the new man of the heart, the new man of grace, which is of the very nature of the Lord in respect to holiness. But what is the result or effect of this? Does the Lord communicate to us this holy and divine nature to renovate or change our old Adam nature into holiness, purity and perfection? Some will have it so. They say that a new nature is so communicated that it changes our old nature, and the whole lump becomes gradually holy and pure; and this is what they call "progressive sanctification," getting better and better every day, being more pure and more holy as they advance in years, till at last they become free from sin, when God takes them to glory, like a shock of corn fully ripe is gathered into the garner. But is it so with you, my friends? Are you getting better and holier as you grow older? I am at a point about it in my own experience. The old man of sin is still the old man of sin, "corrupt according to his deceitful lusts;" and he will still be the old man of sin while we are in these bodies, for "the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh." It is only as the Lord enables us to wield the weapons of our spiritual warfare that we shall raise the song of triumph, and tread upon the necks of our enemies.—2 Cor. x. 5.

When the Lord appears in the conscience, bringing light and gladness, it is a day-season to our souls; but when we come into a night of darkness in our experience we feel that we are nothing but vile, guilty and miserable wretches. But, blessed be the Lord, our holiness is in "the Holy One of Israel."

"And the poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel." Now mark, my friends, in our text we have one of God's shalls. It does not say that the poor among men shall have an offer and proffer of salvation; and then, if they accept it, and their faith lays hold of it, they shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel. No, no; there would be no rejoicing on such grounds as these. If there were anything to be done by me I am sure I could not do it; for I am so helpless, weak and feeble in spiritual things that I can neither exert faith nor lay hold of any promise whatever; and when I am in the dark I can only grope about, and feel as blind and as stupid as a fool. How are we to rejoice, then, in the Holy One of Israel? Why, when the Holy Spirit puts faith into our hearts, and the Word of God lays hold of us, then our faith lays hold of the Word of God; and this is the best way, my friends. The poor child of God is brought to feel that he cannot embrace salvation when he will, nor enjoy it when he pleases. Our springs of comfort are all in the Lord; and it is only when he works in us by his blessed Spirit that we feel joy and gladness. He says, "The poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel;" and what God says shall be must be. Neither sin, men nor devils can turn one of God's shalls or wills upside down. His shalls and wills are as firm as his throne; and as surely as he says, "The poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel," so certainly will it be. The Lord will come and pay the poor sinner a visit; and when he comes into the heart, and sheds abroad his love there by the Holy Spirit (O, my friends, have you ever felt it?), there is joy unspeakable and full of glory. I have felt it, and I want to feel more of it; it is so sweet and blessed, and makes the heart so joyful. When the Lord is thus graciously pleased to come, and by the efficacy of his blood to purge our conscience, and speak peace and pardon to it by saying to us, "Son or daughter, thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven thee," then joy will spring up in the soul more than in the heart of the man whose corn and wine are increased.

It is a great source of comfort and joy that the Holy One of Israel is a Friend that loveth at all times, and that sticketh closer than a brother. The Lord does not change, as you and I do. There are no ups and downs, colds and hots, with him. No; Jesus Christ, the Holy One of Israel (and really it does my soul good to think of it, even before I speak it), is the same yesterday, today and forever. Let us feel as we may, the Holy One of Israel, who hath loved us from the beginning, will love us to the end. Blessed be his name, he will take care of us, watch over us for good, hold us up in life, and at last land us safely in glory, where we shall shout his praise forevermore!

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Ward Mann died Sept. 15th, 1892, at his home, aged 62 years, 7 months and 15 days.

He was stricken with paralysis at the age of sixteen, the lower part of his body and limbs being without feeling. He was confined to his bed forty-six years, and shut out from the busy world that surrounded him. He was a citizen of Monroe Co., W. Va. He was possessed of good natural intellect, and all who knew him loved him. Just at the close of day, at twilight, he breathed his last, to live with the redeemed of God forever, where there is no sickness, pain nor death. His last sickness continued one month, and he never complained. He possessed that humility which characterizes a true believer in Christ. He was strong in the faith, and a constant reader of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES for more than twenty years. He did not think he had a bright evidence of a spiritual birth, as he could not tell the exact date of that birth; but he loved the people of God, and loved godly conversation. His mind was taken up with the things beyond this world. Our sister said to him in his last hours, "Ward, do you want anything?" He replied, "Yes, I want you to help me praise the Lord for his goodness. There has been a passage of Scripture on my mind all night. 'Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name.'" I told him all along that he would have dying grace given him, and I am satisfied it was so. About two hours before he died I think I saw unmistakable evidence of it. While in the agonies of death a lovely smile came on his face, and I was well satisfied then that he felt underneath him the almighty arm.

Ward was not a member of the organized church, but all who knew him were fully satisfied that he had passed from death unto life. He had talked of going before the church and being buried with Christ in baptism; but I told him that the Lord did not require of him a thing that was next to impossible to be done; that the baptism of the Holy Ghost was the essential part. He was a firm believer in election and predestination. He said, "I am sure that all my afflictions and sufferings are for my good." He died from disease of the spine, with which he had suffered for ten years. It grew gradually worse, and finally was disconnected at the lower part, a great sore eating through to his inward parts. The Lord knows how, and when, and what kind of afflictions to put upon us, and we must submit to his righteous will.

Thus four of our father's family are gone to the spirit land, our father and mother, a dear sister (who was snatched away suddenly, leaving three small children to battle along as best they could), and now our dearly beloved brother Ward. With all our other sad bereavements, our oldest son died of typhoid fever away from home, leaving a wife and two children. He had made no public profession of his faith, but told his two brothers that his time of departure was near at hand. He was brought home and interred in the family burying-ground.

Three brothers and two sisters of our father's family are left to mourn our loss of departed friends; also a great number of relatives and friends.

JOHN MANN.

GREENVILLE, W. Va.

Miss Lucretia Ella Adams died Oct. 26th, 1892, at Elkin, N. C. She was the oldest daughter of brother Joshua and sister Jane Adams, and was born Oct. 10th, 1869. She had been a great sufferer for a long time, but bore her suffering with the greatest patience, and died with a smile on her face, and in the full triumphs of faith in Jesus.

I was called upon by her father to conduct the burial services, and tried to speak words of comfort to the weeping relatives and friends at her grave, in the public burying-ground at State Road, on the 27th of October, 1892.

Thus in the bloom of life death takes the human race, as well as when they are ripe in age and ready for the grave. What a glorious thing it is to feel that Jesus is our friend; and if we are called upon by death we will trust the mighty God.

ALSO,

Mrs. Tenny Whoser (colored) was forty-three years of age when she was called upon to go over the river of death. She gave a relation of a good hope in Christ Jesus before the little church at Rock Spring, Surry Co., N. C., in the spring of 1881, was joyfully received, and was baptized in Mitchell's River, near its mouth, by the unworthy writer. She lived a most worthy member of the Old Baptist Church until she died. Few have been as faithful as sister Whoser.

Her funeral was preached by the unworthy writer at the Mt. Pleasant Missionary Baptist Church-house at State Road, N. C., to the largest gathering of people that I ever saw on such an occasion, on the third Sunday in October, 1892. She left a husband and three children to mourn her loss to them; but their loss is her eternal gain.

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

POETRY.

THE SOUL'S TRIUMPH IN GOD.

O how the thought delights the soul
Redeemed from Satan's dire control,
And cleansed with Jesus' blood,
That thus from sin and death set free,
I may in Christ shout victory,
And triumph in my God.

And art thou safe, O soul of mine?
Art thou in Christ through grace divine?
Hast thou the proof within?
Thanks to my God, the stream of love
Has reached my heart from his above,
And borne away my sin.

In Christ! O how the blissful thought
Buys up the hope his love has wrought
'Midst change, and grief, and woe!
Were crowns and empires mine to-day
I'd freely give the whole away,
For Christ I'd all forego.

Ere time began the church was blessed;
For her Jehovah love possessed
From vast eternity.
Redemption, calling, pardon, peace,
Are streams which flow from ancient
grace,
Unmerited and free.

Go, trace salvation from its source;
From God it flows—mark well its course;
The whole his love sets forth.
Love brought the Savior from the skies,
Love quickens, keeps, and glorifies;
O who can speak its worth?

Could blades of grass and leaves of trees,
And every wave and every breeze,
Ten thousand tongues employ;
Could sun and moon and stars essay
To warble out the glorious lay
In universal joy;

E'en were they joined with heavenly
choirs
In notes attuned to golden lyres,
The whole would try in vain;
Not winds, nor trees, nor earth, nor seas,
With heaven's bright host in harmony,
Could reach the boundless strain.

O then may I, so weak, so frail,
Attempt that song which all must fail
To sing in worthy lays?
Our glorious God does not despise
The lisping voice and lowly cries
Which babes and sucklings raise.

I'll sing, In Christ I've naught to fear
If pierced at once with death's dread
spear;
'Tis dipp'd in blood divine.
His aspect may the guilty soul
With terrors and despair appall;
But life through death is mine.

What though a sudden blast descend,
And all the bands of nature rend,
Swift as with forked fire;
I take my flight from sin's abode,
A moment brings me to my God,
My soul's supreme desire.

Then watch, my soul, my Lord will come,
And in his arms convey thee home;
Watch thou, and praise, and pray.
With well-trimmed lamp and burning
light,
Wait for thy Lord; earth's passing night
Will bring thee endless day.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HORACE, Texas, Feb. 1, 1892.

ELDER D. M. VAIL—BELOVED BROTHER IN THE LORD:—I received your very welcome letter in due time, and its contents were perused with comfort and pleasure. I will now try to pen you a few lines by way of answer. If I know my heart, I can truly fellowship you in your feelings of ignorance, nothingness, &c., as expressed in your letter; for I have to travel the same path much of my time. I am much of my time in the "Slough of Despond." Sometimes it is caused by a feeling sense of the inbred corruptions of my heart, and the rebelliousness of my nature. My ingratitude, my proneness to wander from the paths of rectitude, I freely (though with shameness of face) confess. I sometimes grow very despondent in consideration of the opposition to the truth of God's word among our own people. (I freely acknowledge that I am a murmurer and complainer at times.) Perhaps there is not as much opposition to the doctrine of unlimited predestination in any other state in the union, among those bearing the name of Primitive Baptists, as in the state of Texas. Within the last year a paper has been started, the main feature of which is opposition to this doctrine, which is assailed by both editors and correspondents, by reason and ridicule, and from every other standpoint that has ever previously been occupied by an Arminian world. In the first number the editor comes out in language like this, "The Scriptures nowhere teach it (the predestination of all things); and to say that they do is to contradict God, and to give the lie to his holy and divine attributes," &c. Another writer, from another state, says, "I cannot believe that any man nor woman has any spiritual convictions of the truth of the doctrine. It is mere theory with them," &c. Another ridicules it in about this way, "Why should a preacher become somewhat offended because he is not invited into a pulpit because of his being an absolute predestinarian, since God has predestinated it all? But I suppose he would say that it was also predestinated that he should be offended," &c. These quotations are written from memory, but I have not missed the substance. The day seems gloomy indeed for Zion when any of her children can so trifle with this truth of the word of God, so plainly set forth in the Scriptures. From what I can learn the doctrine is already made a test of fellowship by several churches in western Texas. In consideration of these things I am sometimes constrained to cry out in language like that of the prophet Jeremiah, "For the hurt of the daughter of my people I am hurt." Not many weeks ago, while in a despondent frame of mind, in consideration of the troubles of poor and afflicted Zion, and trying to pray the Lord to show me the right way, if I had been wrong, or to show me if I had been to any extent the cause of trouble among his people, that I might acknowledge my error and forsake every false way, or if he had taught me the truth to confirm me in that truth, I was seized with a strong inclination of mind to get my Testament and read some. It so happened (?) that I opened at the place where it reads, "Wherefore also it is contained in the Scripture, Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded. Unto you therefore which believe he is precious: but unto them which be disobedient, the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner, and a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offense, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient: whereunto also they were appointed. But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light."—1 Peter ii. 6-9. I wish I could pen down my feelings and thoughts at this time; but I know I cannot. I had read it many times before, but had never seen all in it that I was enabled to see at this time. I saw that Jesus was laid in Zion (the church) the chief corner stone, by the hand of God the Father alone; precious indeed only to them who are by the power of God called out of darkness into his marvelous light, they being chosen, appointed or predestinated by the same omnipotent hand to that end, in time to be born again, not of blood, nor of the will of man, but of God. On the other hand, he was by the same power made "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offense, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient: whereunto also they were appointed." What right have I (or any other man) to call in question the work of the almighty God in appointing them to this disobeence? Surely it is the height of presumption so to do. I have been asked the question, "Why should God chastise his people for the sins that he has predestinated they should do?" This is the substance of the question often asked by those who are presumptuous enough to cavil with the word of God. The reason given by our Master why these things were hidden from the wise and the prudent, "Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight," has always been answer enough for me as to why God has done anything. All brethren that I have ever talked with on the subject claim to believe that Israel was the chosen people of God, and in his (God's) choice of them he utterly rejected all other nations; also, that they were a typical or representative people; typical of spiritual Israel; and surely the Scriptures teach this; also, that they were often stiff-necked and rebellious, and their disobedience was appointed. These are scriptural facts that cannot be successfully denied. Another plain fact is that those Israelites were held accountable, under law to God, and were punished for their sins, which they performed as lovingly and freely as though God had no purpose in it. If all this were so true in the type, why not so in the antitype? The apostle Paul recognized that that which he found in himself, which caused him so much trouble, was the gift of God, and was for his good; for on one occasion we hear him using language like this, "Lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to me [it was not by accident nor by chance, nor the gift of the devil, either] a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure." He further says that he prayed the Lord thrice that it might depart from him; but he was informed of the Lord, "My grace is sufficient for thee." If it were needful for the apostle Paul to have this messenger of Satan to buffet him, so that he be kept humble, and made to acknowledge the necessity of the reigning grace of God to keep him humble (the proper sphere for every child of God), is it not also necessary for every child of grace? Who that has experienced a hope of salvation by grace does not pray at times that this proneness to sin and to wander from the God they so dearly love, which they feel is indeed "a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan," might be removed? Every such one is occasionally reminded, "My grace is sufficient for thee." I think, my brother, that you realize something of this thorn in the flesh when you say, with the poet,

"When I turn my eyes within All is dark, and vain, and wild."

I have no doubt that you have often realized that the grace of God was sufficient in every trial. Remember that this thorn in the flesh, this messenger of Satan, in the apostle, was the gift of God, and was to keep him humble, or from being exalted above measure. Is it not so with us? If we could always move along smoothly, could always do the things that we esteem good, and have no inclination to do the things that with us are evil, could we not soon boast of our ability to stand alone, and feel no need of the grace of God to keep us humble? Thus we would soon be exalted above measure. We have no reason to believe that those who are not taught of God have this thorn in the flesh to contend with. It was slanderously reported of this apostle, so he informs us, that he said, "Let us do evil, that good may come." (So we need not be surprised that slanderous reports of the position of the advocates of truth be circulated to this day.) But he says, "God forbid [that we should so teach]; for how shall we that are dead to sin live any longer therein?" It is impossible then for the child of God to live in sin; for the same apostle says again, "For if ye live after the flesh ye shall die." To sin is to "live after the flesh;" and the subject of grace is not living (in the enjoyment of spiritual life) when he is following the dictates of a fleshly mind. He says again, "But if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." The child of God has (I understand) both a fleshly and a spiritual mind, the one antagonistic to the other. The one is received in his earthly birth, and the other in his spiritual birth. Once he was entirely subject to and carried about by this fleshly mind, fulfilling the desires of the mind and of the flesh; but now, in this spiritual birth, this "strong man" is made subject to the stronger man. The one is set over against the other, so that there is a continual warfare; and the end is so ordered of the Lord that all his redeemed shall come out "more than conquerors [not by their works, but] through him that hath loved them, and given himself for them." Thus I believe that the very effect of sin in God's people is a punishment for that sin. Both the cause and the effect are ordered of the Lord. It is written, "For if we sin willfully, after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins [the penalty must be paid, which is chastisement, the remorse of conscience, a consequence of the sin], but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries." "He that despised Moses' law died without mercy under two or three witnesses: of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace?" The above shows clearly to my mind that God's people do sin, and sin willfully; and this produces in them "a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation," the effect of which is to destroy the adversaries. Thus God is able and does turn all their sins (and that according to his eternal purpose) to their good and to his own glory. At the same time, in that nature which characterizes them as the children of the Most High they abhor sin in all its forms, and cannot sin. "For whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his [God's] seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God." When he sees in himself (his Adamic, carnal nature) such proneness to sin and rebellion, he is often made to feel the force of the language of the apostle Paul, and to adopt it as his own, "For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh), dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not. For the good that I would, I do not: but the evil which I would not, that I do. Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. [Sin is condemned in the flesh.—Rom. viii. 3.] I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man: but I see another law [I would ask, From whence came this law? Is it of God, men or devils?] in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"

As before quoted, the apostle says that he prayed thrice that the cause of this wretchedness might be removed; but it was said to him, "My grace is sufficient for thee." Then is not that grace sufficient for every one of us? Yes, my brother, I thank God that I believe it is. I believe, from the testimony given above, besides much more like it in the Scriptures, that it is impossible for the children of God, while in the spirit of service to him, to love or to admire sin; and, as before said, they cannot live in it. "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." Again, he hath called us out of darkness into his marvelous light, that we should show forth his praises. Then if one who is truly a child of grace follows after the dictates of his fleshly mind for a time (and no matter how far; the farther, the greater the manifestation of the power and grace of God in bringing him back; at the same time, the greater is his suffering under the chastening rod), God's power and grace are sufficient to bring him back, to the acknowledging of the same; and thus again he shows forth his praises. Now the heaven-born subject earnestly desires to be better, to walk nearer his heavenly Master; and those desires do not originate from his earthly nature, but are the very essence of that nature which he has received in his spiritual birth. It was God (who created all things for himself, and whose pleasure all things will accomplish in the end) who gave us both our natural existence and earthly nature, and our spiritual life and nature. If he had desired, or it had been his will, that we should have been different from what we are, he certainly had the power to make us so; and if he desired that we be better than what we are, his desire or will failed of accomplishment, and the devil has his wish and will; for we know that it is his wish or will that the whole world be given to his service.

I will now close this lengthy letter. In writing I have attempted to follow the thoughts as they came into my mind, and for the satisfaction of the same. If you should discover anything in this contrary to the teachings of the word of God I hope you will take the trouble to point it out; and may the Lord deliver us both, together with all his little ones, from every false way, which he has granted me faith to believe that in his own good time he will do.

I am, as ever, your little brother in hope of an honorable discharge from this glorious work,

H. B. JONES.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Oct. 4, 1892.

DEAR BROTHER VAIL:—Since I last wrote to you it has been on my mind many times to write again. The impression, however, has not yet resulted in a letter; and now, with my mind apparently a blank, so far as what I shall write about is concerned, and with little inclination to write at all, I shall indorse my usual contradictory style.

I have been told by some that writing letters is a task to them, and they excuse their delinquencies in this particular that way. I will attribute the same reason for your neglect to answer my letter, and not to what is probably the true reason, that there was not sense enough in it to discover anything to reply to. Sometimes I think it is a good thing that I receive so few replies from Old Baptists. Perhaps it is a good thing for them; for if I received much encouragement I might make myself a nuisance to them. Again, I think that, being a peculiar people, zealous of good works, they simply manifest their zeal in thus silently rebuking my unsolicited and presumptuous epistles. Often after reading the published experience of some poor, miserable sinner, an irresistible desire overcomes me to shake hands with him on paper; but the aforesaid miserable sinner rarely wastes ink on me by replying. One effusion of mine is usually sufficient to comfort them in the thought that there is a greater sinner yet alive than themselves, and very sensibly they manifest a desire to keep out of worse company, in silence.

Not so very long ago you assured me of fellowship; and if you are any better now than you were then, your growth in goodness has been so recent that you cannot entirely have forgotten how it is to be a helpless and almost hopeless sinner like I am; so I will keep you on my corresponding list yet awhile longer. When you get enough say so, and I will let up on you.

Have you ever tried to be good? I have been trying desperately hard for a long time, more particularly in the last few months than ever before; but I have made an awful mess of it. I have been trying to live righteously, soberly and godly for this present world; trying to live under the old covenant of works, "This do, and thou shalt live;" forgetting that this law was for man as God made him, perfect; and to man in this condition, and in this only, it was a law that could give life.—Gal. iii. 21. I ought to know, and never forget, that according to the letter of the law there remains no hope for me before God, for I am a transgressor of it from my birth; and of mercy to transgressors the law knows absolutely nothing. A few years ago I thought I knew a great deal about the workings of this law in me. I imagined I could infallibly detect "do and live" principles, but I knew nothing about it; and I have come to the conclusion that I know less now than I did then. When I review past experiences I am tempted to doubt that I ever had a lively hope of interest in the promises of the better covenant. After seasons of what I had fondly hoped and believed were heavenly places in Christ Jesus, I have discovered evidences of law to be much of the substance of my comfort. This revelation of Arminianism in me occurs so often that I am tempted to doubt every evidence that should comfort me in hoping that I am a child of grace, for I fear that later on perhaps I shall see some legal assurance in the hope that comforts me.

I heard a good brother once say that Arminianism was something which the children of God knew all about, and it was their own fault because they stumbled over it. It occurred to me that he was getting a fall himself when he uttered it. Well, I am different. I do not stumble over what I see; it is what I do not see that I am fearful of. I derive no comfort from what I know to be legal; and when I am made to see that some of the peace I at times experience has in it an element of law, it makes me view with suspicion other experiences that I have taken comfort in.

What troubles me sorely is unbelief. I hear Scripture expounded, testifying of Christ in the christian's experience, and I can assent to it all. At times a view of certain Scripture comes to me, which brethren tell me is spiritually discerned, because realized in the saints' experience. I think I see sometimes that the very exercises I experience are prophesied to the children of God; that the very doubts I have are evidences of christian warfare. Then why does not all this comfort me, if I believe it? or is all this exercise of mind simply theory? In this very doubt and question I think I can see the working of the law in me, requiring a sign. The manner of experience I look for and want is the sign I shall never experience in the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ; but the lack of it is an affliction nevertheless.

This pilgrimage of the Lord's dear people is a most mysterious and inexplicable one. The question with me is not, Will God keep his everlasting covenant of peace with Israel? but, Am I of that number chosen in Christ out of the world? I do not know. I can only hope that his mercy and loving-kindness embrace me in the person of his well-beloved Son; for only in him, as the Mediator of the better covenant, is there mercy and justification for me. While I confess to frequent doubts and misgivings that I am personally interested in this salvation of the Lord, yet I must confess to an experience of joy that salvation is of the Lord alone, and that it was predestinated before the world began.

My heart sinks within me when I hear brethren, who ought to know better, trying to circumscribe God's omnipotence with theories of "permissive decrees," and like senseless chatter. I have read, listened to, and talked with some of the ablest exponents of such doctrines, and in it all I have never yet distinguished even plausibility. When tried by Scripture, its apostles are revealed as having been given the spirit of imbecility, and not that of a sound mind. Our God needs no apologizing for. To them that are in Christ Jesus he has given the spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind; and that spirit cannot ascribe to him more honor than it does in acknowledging that the whole plan of what was, is and will be was forever present to his mind. It matters not how trifling the object, if it has or had existence, if it were possible of conception to the divine mind, then it was decreed. The things that may be are the things which God hath willed to be, and they comprehend everything that can be known. Everything that is to exist is decreed by God, and derives its futurity from his decree; and it is foreseen because it is decreed. My understanding is not elastic enough to establish a distinction between God's foreknowledge, God's decree, and God's predestination; for I can see no difference. No man knows better than I the deceitfulness of this desperately wicked heart of mine; and with shame I confess that it has in times past deceived me into believing for a time that fancies similar to this "permissive decree" nonsense did more fully praise the infinite perfection of our God. O how ignorant I am of the workings of divine wisdom! If I am not deceived, the sole desire of my heart is to have the mind of Christ dwell in me, and walk worthy of the vocation wherewith I hope I am called. Feeling thus, how much more miserable I would be if there could be in any sense a jot or tittle abridgement of the soul-cheering doctrine of God's absolute predestination of all things. Qualify it in any particular, and there is no hope for me. If God, who is rich in mercy, has predestinated me "to be conformed to the image of his Son," it is to the praise of the glory of his grace. If I am not of that number whose righteousness is the Lord, then it is good in his sight, and is to the praise of his justice. "I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: * * * and do count them but dung, that I may win Christ, and be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith: that I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death; if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead."

There is much comfort and assurance in the promise of our covenant-keeping God to his people, "I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God;" but I am often made to complain, "Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled." "Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy holy Spirit from me." The interrupted sense of God's favor is the chief source of my sorrow. It is an affliction that falls heavily upon my soul, to be called to walk in darkness. It seems to me that this affliction could be borne when God has seemingly withdrawn himself if I might call God my God; but the bitterness of it is that all interest in him seems to be gone with him. With the psalmist, "My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?" That forty-second Psalm is frequently my experience. After all, brother, what we are called to endure here, though grievous to be borne during their infliction, are but light and momentary afflictions when viewed in relation to the glorious inheritance they are the goal of. With what a wonderful salvation we are saved in Christ Jesus our Lord. All our hope, all our salvation, is in Christ alone, the Mediator of the new covenant; "a better covenant, established upon better promises," which God has made his people. "For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: and they shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest. For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." It is all "I will" and "they shall;" not an "if" or condition in it.

I will not weary you longer. You know more of this subject than I do; and my only excuse for dwelling on it is that I love it, I hope, and the whole matter of it, which is grace. If I know the joyful sound of the gospel, it is by grace I am saved; and that not of myself: it is the gift of God. Unworthily,

JOHN MCCONNELL.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Sept. 9, 1892.

MY DEAR BROTHER VAIL:—If the love of God constraineth us to speak often one to another, I am inclined to think we ought not put lightly away the impressions we have from time to time in regard to writing to our brethren whom we love for Jesus' sake. It appears to me to be as much a duty laid upon us to obey the impressions which rest sweetly upon our minds, as any other christian duty. If not, of what value or import is the impression? Surely the Spirit of truth does not operate upon the minds and hearts of his people in vain. On the other hand I do not think it is especially valuable to the saints to write to each other merely from a sense of duty, to fulfill an obligation in gratifying a fleshly desire. I do not say such a course is not commendable, for it is highly so; but I am speaking especially of the soul-comfort of the saints. I might quote the words of the apostle, "All things are lawful unto me; but all things are not expedient." I am speaking, my brother, from my own experience; and this letter to you will serve as a good illustration. I sat down at this writing for the express purpose of writing to a very dear brother, from whom I received a letter some months ago, which still remains unanswered. I felt ashamed of myself for not answering it sooner. But with no other incentive than a plain natural obligation, as I sat with pen in hand, ready to begin, your face came between me and my anticipated letter. In thought and mind I began to talk to you of the sweet and precious things of our Father's household. My soul went out to you in special love. It was as though your great eyes were looking into mine, and that you were literally smiling upon me. I count such times, brother Vail, as in the presence of the Prince of peace, he presenting you as the present object of my correspondence. Could I have written then to my brother to whom I owed a simple duty? No; I could not. When Jesus commands his followers to go, they always obey. If I am a follower of the lowly Nazarene, he has commanded me to write to you this night; not in accents loud and terrible, but sweetly and softly he has brought you into my mind and heart by the subtle influence of a mutual and heavenly love. With the poet I feel to sing,

"Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in christian love."

The whole of the pilgrimage journey of the child of Jehovah is in a mystery. But O what a delicious mystery it is! We walk by the faith of the Son of God, and not by the natural vision. Faith has an eye keener than the eye of the vulture, and it gives us to behold the beauty of the Lord. It shows us the brightness of his glory, and his majesty, "as an army with banners." Faith carries us to the cross on Calvary, whereupon all our sins were laid upon Jesus, to be blotted out forever in his blood which freely flowed for all his people; and while there, faith does not only show us a literal scene that took place eighteen hundred years ago, but right in our own experience. I stand the guilty wretch who cried, "Away with him!" "crucify him! crucify him!" What a dreadful thing it is to contemplate, that it was I that crucified the Lord of glory. It was I that denied him. Yes, and it was I that betrayed him. And, behold, how he has avenged my wicked, bloody deeds, with the great love wherewith he has ever loved me. When I denied him, he smiled upon me, illuminating my soul with the light of his countenance; and then O how bitterly I wept! And when I would spurn him from me, how gently did he draw me to him with the cords of his sweet love, embrace me with his great, strong arms, so securely, and carry me in his bosom. Then how black as the tents of Kedar was I, and made "comely" in and through his perfect righteousness. And is it not wonderful that Jesus can and does say to me, to me of all mankind, "Thou art all fair, my love, there is no spot in thee?" Sometimes when that astounding truth comes to me I receive it with the utmost incredulity, or rather not receive it, but cast it from me as a thing belonging not to me, but to the Lord's anointed ones, of whom I cannot surely be. While at other times it comes to me with superabundant sweetness and assurance, searching the delicate tendrils of my glad soul, distilling its fragrant odors, which ascend to the great white throne with echoing voices of joy and rapture in anthems of praise and adoration to the God of all the earth. I think I realize sometimes, by my own complex make-up, that in every child of God there exist two great mysteries, "as

CONVERTING THE SINNER.

"BRETHREN, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him; let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins."—James v. 19, 20.

In compliance with the wishes of several of our patrons, it is our purpose, if the Lord will, to present such views as may be expressed in a brief article concerning the true meaning of the text here quoted. This will involve some reference to the whole epistle of which these words are the conclusion. It will be seen by reference to the commencement of the epistle that it is addressed by the inspired servant of God to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, whom he recognizes as his brethren in the faith of the gospel of the grace of God. This is further defined in the letter as "the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ." It should be observed that throughout the whole epistle those who are addressed are constantly recognized as brethren of the inspired writer. Thus he is himself included as one of the same family with all to whom he writes. This cannot refer to the fleshly tribes of Israel, since those addressed as in possession of that faith must include none but such as have received the Spirit of Christ, from which alone that faith can be produced. It is very important that these essential facts should be considered in applying the truth written here, lest we should be guilty of wresting the Scriptures to our own destruction. Natural reason can discern the inconsistency of taking what is written to the chosen saints of God, who are specially described by their peculiar characteristics, and applying it to those who bear no resemblance to the characters thus specified. Yet so perverted is the understanding of the carnal mind that the instruction and admonitions so carefully guarded by the Spirit as being restricted to the saints, are applied to the world of mankind as sinners against the holy commandments of God. Indeed, so utterly blind is human wisdom that many professed religious teachers have thought this whole letter of James to be in conflict with the doctrine of the gospel as written by Paul. Such absurd notions result from the failure to observe the restriction of the language of James as it is plainly limited to the subjects of divine grace, who constitute the only tribes bearing the marks by which the apostle defines those to whom he writes this epistle. Such misapplication of the writings of men would not be tolerated in any earthly court. If a lawyer should attempt to prove the title of his client to recognition under a will in which that client was not named at all, he would not be allowed to apply to his client what was therein written of the appointed heirs. Should he persist in thus wresting the record any judge would punish him for contempt of court. Yet upon exactly such willful perversion of the plain letter of the Scriptures is built every false doctrine which is taught in the Babel of antichristian religion.

"Brethren." Not one of the tribes addressed is left out of this endearing relationship. No departure from the path of obedience could break the tie of fraternity. The most rebellious and polluted brother retains that birthright family bond of unity even in all his wanderings. On the other hand, no circumspect deportment nor fervent prayers can produce that vital kindred. Naturally this is too manifest for argument. If one should propose to secure this place in a family by performing service for that purpose, it would be regarded as conclusive evidence of his insanity. Nor can it be justly charged that one is selfish because he cannot recognize any fraternal relationship with those who are not born of the same parentage with himself. It is too clear for discussion that vital kindred can never be attained in any other way but by birth. Then, it is certain that those to whom James addressed all this epistle must be such as are of the same parentage with himself. To confine it to his natural kindred would exclude all Gentiles from participation in the things herein written. But it cannot belong to the natural Israelites, because they have not the mark of faith in Christ Jesus. It must therefore be restricted in its application to those sinners who are born of the Spirit of God, and who are thus made children of that one spiritual family of which Jesus is the head and life. There can be none but sinners of the natural family of the earthly Adam, to whom the grace of God is revealed in washing them in the blood of his Son Jesus Christ. Such sinners are made holy and without blame before God in love by the justifying righteousness of their Redeemer. Being born again of this incorruptible seed by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever, all the election of grace are brethren in that unity of the Spirit which is closer and more enduring than any earthly kindred can be. Such are the brethren to whom the instruction and admonition of this epistle are addressed. Certainly they must owe their character as brethren to the will of God, of which they were born. So John says, "He came unto his own [the natural Israel], and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name; which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."—John i. 11-13. This is the birth in which the brotherhood of the true spiritual Israel is manifested.

"If any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him." Let this restriction be borne in mind in the application of this text. It is not said, "If any natural man err from the truth," but the language is as definite as words can make it. The erring one is included as one of those brethren who are so carefully described. While the principle of truth is in the heart of every one whom the apostle recognizes as a brother in the sense of our text, it is only as they are led by the Spirit of truth in their walk and conversation that they glorify God by rendering obedience to that holy direction. God is honored in the daily life of his saints when they seek no other law for their guidance but that precept and example which he has revealed in Christ Jesus. In following him they must walk in the truth; and in departing from his example they do err from the truth. In the limitation of this admonition to his brethren the apostle shows that none can err from the truth but those who have the truth revealed in them. Those who are dead in sin do not err from the truth, because they have no knowledge of the truth. They who have received the truth by the revelation of Christ in them the hope of glory, and are manifest as brethren of the apostles and all the saints, do err from the truth whenever they depend upon the suggestions of reason, and look to their own works for justification before God. They deny their confidence in the truth of God when they seek to be justified by their own works. If they are not converted by the manifestation of the true light in their hearts, they must experience the death of all comfort; for there is no possibility that they should ever by their own works find acceptance in the sight of infinite justice. They also err from the truth when they are deceived by the suggestion of the tempter who would beguile them into the presumptuous sin of willful departure from the commandments of their Lord. The deceitful argument is presented that since salvation is by grace exclusively, it is as well to continue in sin that grace may abound. The supporting grace of God alone is able to give the victory over this artful temptation. Left to their own strength, every saint would err from the truth under this delusion of the adversary. The Captain of our salvation repelled the assault in the right way, by obeying the law of holiness, and refusing to yield to unbelief by tempting the Lord his God. But the feeble disciples are sometimes subjected to the power of temptation, and left to learn their own weakness by yielding to such deceptive arguments, by which they are led to err from the truth. Such victims of the devices of Satan are captivated by him, and they cannot deliver themselves out of the snare. They are then fit subjects for the relief which is found in being converted from the bondage of error into the liberty of the belief of the truth. This conversion does not result from the superior strength or wisdom of the brother by whom the sinner is converted. Not even an inspired apostle was able to stand in his own power against the very frailty which he had condemned in a fellow apostle. This was illustrated in the case of Paul who withstood Peter at Antioch because he dissembled in the presence of those who came from James, and yet Paul himself dissembled soon afterward when he went up to Jerusalem. Accordingly, the direction is left on record, "Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual, restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted."—Gal. vi. 1. By restoring the erring brother in the spirit of meekness the one who is not led by the flesh into that same error shows himself to be "spiritual" so far as that fault is concerned. In this way the obedient saint converts the erring one; and as it is expressed by our Lord, he has gained his brother. Certainly there is no intimation in the inspired record that the salvation of dead sinners may be secured by the efforts of any created beings. In our text the erring one is not less a brother than the one by whom he is converted. It is absurd to suppose that either of them is destitute of life. The letter was not written for the instruction of any but those who were living subjects of the grace of God. As such they are definitely described throughout the whole epistle. It is not less a perversion of the text to misapply it to those to whom it was not written, then to change the testimony by which the Holy Ghost moved James to bear witness to the truth.

"Let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins." It is not a fair construction of this verse which would detach it from the connection in which it is placed, and understand it as contradicting the whole volume of that record of divine revelation which is written by the pen of inspiration. It is manifest that the Holy Ghost moved James to write in this letter some of the severest reproofs to the brethren addressed which are to be found in the whole book of inspiration. No question of their application to the saints can be entertained consistently with the plain words which are employed. Even in this chapter the terrible denunciation of the characters called "rich men" must find its application among those "twelve tribes," to whom the letter is written. Many other portions of the faithful record agree with this denunciation of them who are rich in the treasures which are valued in the estimation of men.

It is not merely the treasures of gold and silver in which it is possible for the saints to be rich. Many of the most exemplary characters who shine in the volume of divine truth were possessed of much of the wealth of this world. But David was "poor and needy" with all the treasures of the kingdom of Israel at his disposal. Gold cannot relieve that poverty in spirit which identifies the people who are blessed of Jesus. So they may be involved under the denunciation here pronounced upon "rich men," even though they are not possessed of any earthly treasures. Every subject of divine grace is a rich man in the sense of this reproof whenever he is trusting in any merit of his own as commending him in the sight of God. In this self-confidence he is a sinner against that law of righteousness which ascribes all the glory of salvation exclusively to our Lord Jesus. The effect of this sinful principle ruling in the heart of a disciple of Christ is always to prompt him to condemn and despise those in whom he sees no such merits as he imagines to be in himself. So long as he continues under the control of this spirit of fleshly confidence he is a "rich man" in the sense of this reproof. As such, he is a sinner who errs from the truth. The only way in which such a sinner can be converted from the error of his way, is by bringing him to remember the way in which the Lord has brought him out of the depth of condemnation, and blotted out his sins. When he realizes his infinite obligation to the grace of God for every manifestation of his redeeming love, he will be converted from that self-confidence in which he was trusting as a "rich man." No better illustration of this truth can be presented than that which is written in this chapter which closes with our text.

The sinner is not regarded as a transgressor of the law of Moses, nor yet as one dead under the condemnation which came upon all men in the original transgression of Adam; from the condemnation of all such laws the twelve tribes of spiritual Israel are redeemed by the one offering of our Lord Jesus. They are now no more under the law in that death which rests upon as many as are of the works of the law. They are under the law of the kingdom of God in Christ Jesus, which is the love of holiness. This heavenly law is perfect in that it contains no death. The condemnation of all other laws brings hopeless death upon the guilty; but this law brings sweet assurance of the love of God even in the rod of chastening which attests the love and mercy of the Lord abounding toward the most rebellious of his children. "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not? But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons."—Heb. xii. 6-8. In their present experience these chastenings are felt as death to the enjoyment of comfort in the answer of a good conscience toward God; but in the heavenly kingdom of our Redeemer there is no death in the sense of the final rejection of those whom God has called out of the darkness of guilt and translated into that kingdom. It is from the experience of that fearful chastening that the transgressor of the law of our King is saved by being converted from the error of his way. It is palpably absurd to understand that it is in the power of any of the saints to save others from that eternal death from which they are themselves saved only by the infinite grace of God. But it is clearly seen in every case where a brother has erred from the truth, that when he has been converted (that is, reclaimed) from the error of his way, he is saved from that experimental death which results from disobedience to the law of the Lord Jesus. None but the subjects of electing love can either suffer the death here referred to, or be saved from it. So, also, the hiding of a multitude of sins, as here declared, is not the concealing of wickedness from the all-discerning eye of infinite justice, as if it were possible to shield the guilty from the punishment justly due to his sin. There can be no hiding of sins from divine judgment; since "All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do."—Heb. iv. 13. The converting of the erring brother from the error of his way shall hide a multitude of sins from being exposed to the light by actual transgression of the commandments of our King in outward deportment. Since nothing can be hidden from the knowledge of God it cannot be that it is intended to teach that sins are hidden from him; but no sin is manifested in the sight of created beings unless it is developed by actual transgression. If there be an evil design in the heart of a brother, either for the injury of another, or for the resentment of an injury received, certainly the execution of that carnal design would expose the sinful principle in which it originated; and its consequence would be the aggravation of the same evil principle in the brother assailed. Thus a multitude of sins would be manifested as the consequence of the error of the first sinner against the law of love. If one convert the first brother from the error of his way, and bring him to obey the law of Christ in the case, all the multitude of resulting sins are thereby hidden from exposure to the judgment of the church. This is seen in every case where the law of divine love is obeyed in reclaiming an erring brother from the error of his way. There is no error in the way of Christ. All errors among the saints belong to their own ways.

it were the company of two armies;" the mystery of godliness and the mystery of iniquity; the one continually antagonistic to the other. Then is it any wonder, dear brother, that "we are troubled on every side?" The elements of death and darkness are warring against the elements of life and light. How could anything be more contradictory, or more directly opposite? The light which we have is the life of Jesus, which is the light of faith, and by which we see the enormity of sin, that has brought all our fleshy nature into death's darkness. This is why I am often encouraged to go on, hoping that a good work has been begun in me, to wit, the work of grace in my heart; because I know I possess something now that I did not have before; a knowledge of my lost and ruined condition in a state of nature. I know this; and "whereas I was blind, now I see." And this sight is the sight of faith; and faith is God's free gift.

Well now, my dear brother, if I have only succeeded in tiring you, I have at least, I think, realized the answer of a good conscience in obeying and following the dictates of my mind. I feel that you will kindly bear with me in my weakness and ignorance. To-morrow your meeting begins at Abbington. How I would love to be with you. I hope you will have a time of rejoicing and of refreshing from the Lord, who alone can bind up the broken hearted and comfort the mourner. We are all as well as usual. We all join in love to yourself and family.

Your unworthy brother,

KETTERMAN, Mo., Oct. 10, 1892.

THE subject of redemption has been on my mind for some time, and several inquiries have arisen in regard to the subjects of this redemption. One of them is, What is redeemed? I have been trying to find from Scripture the previous condition of the redeemed of the Lord, that is, if we may consider such a thing as pre-existence before a state or condition that needs redemption from; but I have failed to find anything like satisfactory evidence to show that the Lord's people before bonds were in the same state or condition as after they were redeemed from bonds. To my mind there is a difference between God's redemption and that found among men. We may own a property; it may be free from any encumbrance; we hold a good and perfect title to it; it is for our own use exclusively; but it may be mortgaged, or a lien placed upon it; then it is under bonds. We only have the sole right to redeem it, because we hold the original title. In the course of time we redeem it by paying the price of redemption, and it again reverts to us; but it is the same property as it was before it became alienated. It is no greater nor grander, unless it may be prized as better because of our extra effort to redeem it; but the property is not enhanced in value intrinsically. It is simply brought back to us as it was before by being bought back, or redeemed. In the above respect can we compare the redemption of the Lord with it? I think not. That there was a life or vitality of the Lord's people existing before time, scriptural proof is sufficient; but we cannot think that it had the fullness or the kind of glory that shall attend the ransomed of the Lord when the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. The victory over sin and death shall add greatly to the Lord's people. Sin makes great inroads, and misery and destruction are marked in every line and indentation that Satan places upon the poor and afflicted people; and that which appears will be their annihilation is but the developing and manifesting of them as kings and priests unto their God. Sin, through Satan's power, instead of thwarting God's purpose, is turned to good account, and redounds to the glory of God through Christ in his complete victory over sin. Christ Jesus has the right of redemption, because of the choice made in him before the foundation of the world. They are "sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called." The Redeemer owns the old, original and just title to everything included in that covenant which is ordered in all things and sure. He says, "They are mine." Again, he has the right to redeem them because he is their near kinsman.—See Lev. xxv.; Ruth ii. 3, 4. "For the right of redemption is thine to buy it."—Jere. xxxii. 7. He is closely related to his people, being their elder Brother, Husband and Head. They are flesh of his flesh and bone of his bones. He is their life; and as sure as he lives, just so sure shall they live also. The Redeemer, the Mighty One of Jacob, has power to redeem. "The year of my redeemed is come. And I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered that there was none to uphold: therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me; and my fury it upheld me."—Isa. lxiii. "For their Redeemer is mighty; he shall plead their cause with thee."—Prov. xxiii. "As for our Redeemer, the Lord of hosts is his name, the Holy One of Israel."—Isa. xlvii. 4. "And all flesh shall know that I the Lord am thy Savior and thy Redeemer, the Mighty One of Jacob."—Isa. xlix. 26. "Is my hand shortened at all, that it cannot redeem? or have I no power to deliver? behold, at my rebuke I dry up the sea, I make the rivers a wilderness."—Isa. l. 2. Jesus says that he has power over all flesh, to give eternal life to as many as the Father giveth him. There are very many proofs in the sacred record of Christ's power to redeem; and that he has fully satisfied all the demands of justice in behalf of his people, in paying the ransom price, is also clearly established. In his love and in his pity he redeemed them; and he carried and bear them all the days of old. The price of redemption was greater than earth or all the world could produce. It was a heavenly price, the blood of the Lord, the blood of the only begotten Son of God, whose name should be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. "The church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood."—Acts xx. 28. "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."—1 John i. 7. "In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins."—Col. i. 14. "In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace."—Eph. i. 7. From the foregoing we see that sinners are "not redeemed with corruptible things," but "with the precious blood of Christ." "By his own blood he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us."—Heb. ix. 12. "Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood."—Rev. i. 5. From the foregoing we see that the Lord has redeemed his people, because he only had the right and power to redeem; and the ransom price (his blood) could come from no source but from the Head.

What are his people redeemed from, and to whom? We will notice first that they are redeemed from death and the power of the grave. The sting of death is sin; but Christ has taken away the sting of death, that is, sin; so death hath not dominion over them, nor the grave power over them; for "I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from mine eyes."—Hosea xiii. 14. Not only are they redeemed from death, but from that which produces death—sin. Sin is the transgression of the law; so when the law is violated in the slightest degree the curse is upon them. But it is written, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us."—Gal. iii. 13. "To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons."—Gal. iv. 5. We believe with the apostle that Jesus destroyed him who had power over death, that is, the devil, and forever delivered his people from his power. "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good: for his mercy endureth forever. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy."—Psalm cvii. "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave: for he shall receive me."—Psalm xlix. 15. They are redeemed to God. "For thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation."—Rev. v. 9. "Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."—Titus ii. 14. "And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord."—Isa. lix. 20. "No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon, it shall not be found there; but the redeemed shall walk there: and the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."—Isa. xxxv. 9, 10. The individual experience of the saint shall not be complete without the crowning work of redemption, which is "the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory." "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." For "even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." If this body were of heavenly origin it would need no redemption, and we would lose the idea of the resurrection from the dead. I think the apostle has reference to this vile body in 1 Corinthians xv., and that the pronoun "it" stands for both the natural and the spiritual body. "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption: it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power: it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." It is also said that he shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body. Then shall the north give up, and the south cannot keep back. "That in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him."

CIRCULAR LETTERS.

The Juniata Primitive Baptist Association, in session with the Fairview Church, Fulton Co., Pa., Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, Oct. 12th, 13th and 14th, 1892, to the churches of which she is composed.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—We feel to love you for the truth's sake. "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God."—Isa. xl. 1. This Scripture is the foundation for a few thoughts. In the first place let us notice who are the people of God. They are all that the Father hath loved with an everlasting love, before the world began. "For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call."—Acts ii. 39. We understand that the address is alone to the children of God, and not to the whole world, as some affirm. We will say to this people, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." Then "speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned." Tell her that unto her a child is born, unto her a son is given, whose name is Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Tell her that the angel said to Joseph, "Fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife." "She shall bring forth a son, and thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." This is the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved; Jesus, the babe of Bethlehem, the only begotten of the Father. We declare unto you that the debt of the bride is paid. Dear ones, when the sins of every vessel of mercy, every heir of glory, every one of the fallen race of Adam that the Father gave to the Son, were met, and the law was fulfilled, their debt was paid. Dear brethren, think how Jesus had to suffer for all our sins, else we were lost forever. Jesus says, "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt." This was the time that the fountain was opened to the house of David for sin and uncleanness. Jesus was crowned with a crown of thorns, the rugged nails were driven through his innocent hands and feet, the spear pierced his blessed side, and forthwith came blood and water. O! think of all this that Jesus, the blessed Jesus, bore when he satisfied the law for his people, and cried, "It is finished." "Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not; but a body hast thou prepared me." Again, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God." The sun refused to shine, the mountains quaked, the rocks were rent, when Jesus paid the debt of his people.

He trod the wine-press alone. He needs no help in saving sinners. He says, "I am the good Shepherd; the good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." He also says, "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." This same Jesus was buried, and on the third day arose, triumphant over death, hell and the grave. This was all done for us, alone by the author and finisher of our faith. The apostle Peter says, and also God's children to this day, and as long as there is one remaining on earth, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away; reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time." Where is the life of the child of grace? It is hid with Christ in God, out of the reach of all enemies. Dear ones, who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation? There is no power able to separate the body of Christ from its Head. Dear ministering brethren, the charge to Timothy we will give to you all, "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom; preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine." "That we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus." May the Lord enable you all to meet together in his holy name, and in all your meetings, may you be enabled to say, It is good to be here. May we be guided by his holy Spirit, and our association be well supplied with truthful brethren. May it be the will of the blessed Lord to raise up laborers in his vineyard; for the Lord's harvest is great, and the laborers are few. We pray the Lord to guide us into all truth, that our meetings may be to the comfort of God's dear people. "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God." Our association has been a very pleasant one, well attended by visiting brethren and able preachers, for which we feel to praise God and take courage. Farewell.

The Mount Pleasant Association of Regular Baptists, now in session with the Cane Run Church of Regular Baptists, at Turners, Henry Co., Ky., the 2d, 3d and 4th days of September, 1892, to the churches composing her body, sendeth greeting and christian salutations in the Lord.

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN IN THE BLESSED LORD OUR SAVIOR:—Another year has passed and been numbered with the things that were, bringing with it many changes, sorrows, bereavements and sore disappointments to many of us, as well as some precious seasons of comfort, gladness and religious enjoyments, since it was our privilege, according to our time-honored custom, to address you this our annual epistle or Circular of fellowship, love and admonition.

For a subject or starting point upon which to begin this letter we invite your attention and prayerful consideration to the following portion of holy writ, which you will find recorded in 2 Timothy i. 9, and reads as follows; "Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." In the verse preceding our text the apostle exhorts Timothy thus, "Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner; but be thou a partaker of the afflictions of the gospel according to the power of God." From which context we learn, in the first place, that our salvation spoken of in the text is according to the power of God. The text teaches us that our salvation is full and complete and finished. "Who hath;" not may, or will if we will let him; but "Who hath saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began."

Dear brethren, what a comfort it is to us poor and afflicted people, whose only trust is in the Lord, to be assured that our salvation is according to the power of our God, who is so all-powerful that he speaks, and it is done; commands, and it stands fast; declaring the end from the beginning, the things from ancient times not yet done, saying, "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." How greatly does it gladden our hearts, and O how our souls should overflow with gratitude and love to him, our great, all-powerful and wonderful Savior, God, who hath not only thus, according to his power, saved us, but also called us with a holy calling; and that, too, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world was.

When we consider that because of our miserable and lost state as the fallen sons and daughters of Adam, who by transgression fell under the just and righteous sentence of God's holy law, bringing the curses of that holy law down upon our guilty heads (for it is written, "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them"), we feel that we ought to rejoice and be glad exceedingly, that we are saved by the power of God, through Jesus our only Savior, and through the riches of his mercy, the greatness of his love, and the all-sufficiency of his grace as treasured in Jesus; and this, too, according to his own eternal purpose, which was purposed in Jesus Christ our Savior before the world began. And may we not break forth in the deep and wonderful language of the apostle, and say, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" Then it is a fact or truth beyond dispute that salvation is of the Lord from first to last, without the aid of any human agency. Jesus our Savior stood alone while paying the redemption price of his people; for he trod the wine-press of the wrath of God alone, and of the people there were none to help; "Therefore mine own arm brought salvation unto me." Yes, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for he shall save his people from their sins." Did he save them? Did he come to earth to do or accomplish a specific work, or only to make the way of his salvation possible? Let him speak. "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me; and this is the Father's will that sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." Then in view of these consoling truths, let the poet speak in accents sweet and true of the love of Christ that passeth all knowledge:

"O for such love let rocks and hills
Their lasting silence break,
And all harmonious human tongues
Their Savior's praises speak."

Dearly beloved brethren composing our body, scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land, in view of this precious doctrine of God's salvation of us, his people, in Christ Jesus our Lord, what manner of people ought we to be in all holy conversation, looking for and hastening unto the coming of our Lord, and watching thereunto in prayer? Let us heed the admonitions of the holy Scriptures given to us by inspiration of God that we might be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works; and to these good works let us ever be found careful in maintaining them; for these things are good and profitable unto men.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you now and ever. Amen.

MARRIAGES.

At the residence of the bride's brother, near Melbourne, Ontario, by Elder Wm. Pollard, on Wednesday, Oct. 26th, 1892, Mr. Charles Prentice and Miss Eliza Errett, both of Melbourne, Ontario.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Our dear brother, Bryne G. Ganer, fell asleep in Jesus, as we hope, on Oct. 24th, 1892, in the 61st year of his age.

His disease was diphtheria. He had gotten better, and took his team and hauled some on Friday and Saturday, and on Sunday night was taken very bad. On Monday evening I was sent for, and at eleven o'clock he passed away, like a child falling asleep, without moving hand or foot. He leaves a wife and seven children (five sons and two daughters), with the Leading Creek Church, to mourn their loss.

Brother Ganer was strong in the faith. Salvation by grace was his theme. Often have I seen the tears run down his cheeks while I and others were proclaiming Jesus and him crucified, the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved. He will be greatly missed by our church and his dear family. We believe he was a child of God, and that our loss is his eternal gain. His wife and children have the sincere prayers of the writer of this notice, that they may be prepared to meet death as strong in the faith as did the father.

On the 26th I spoke to a large congregation of friends and neighbors, using as a text John xix. 30. The body of our dear departed brother was laid away to rest in our grave-yard, to await the voice of the Archangel, when he will come to take his children home. Bless his holy name, those that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

DIED—On July 14th, 1892, our dear daughter, Josephine Wood.

She suffered about four months, and passed away in the triumphs of faith. She was born in Alabama, moved to this state in early life, and was married to Moses Wood, who preceded her to the tomb one year. Josie, as we called her, united with the Primitive Baptist Church in early life, and lived a faithful christian until her death. She leaves five children, her father and mother, brothers and sisters, with many friends, to miss her here. We believe she sleeps in Jesus with the blessed.

"Dearest daughter, thou hast left us,
And our loss we deeply feel;
But 'tis God that has bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal."

MARY E. McDONALD.
CAMDEN, Ark., Oct. 28, 1892.

Herman Laws, son of W. L. and Cornelia Laws, died at their home in Wicomico Co., Md., Aug. 8th, 1892, aged 21 years and 23 days.

He was a young man of most estimable character, very much beloved in his home and by his many friends. He had become established in a good business, and his prospects of success in a worldly point of view appeared excellent; but the Lord's purpose concerning him was different, and he was taken in the morning of his life from this world, there appears reason to believe, to a world of eternal joy.

After a year's absence in his business he returned home on Saturday, July 16th, for a birthday visit. His mother noticed a peculiar tenderness in his manner, and a different look in his eyes from what she had ever seen before. It was also remarked afterward by others of the family. He went away again on Monday, looking as well as ever. On the 27th he was brought home sick with typhoid fever, and died on the 8th of August. His mother, who is a member of the church at Indiantown, had very peculiar exercises concerning him during the year that he was away; and often a death scene would be in her mind, and it would always be he. It was a great trouble to her, but she could not put it away. Concerning his sickness I will quote a little from a letter she has written me:

"At first I did not think he was so sick. He never uttered a murmur nor complaint of any kind. My calmness and composure during all his sufferings I know must have been given me by a higher power than man. I asked God to give me strength to go to my son as long as he needed me without tears in my eyes, and talk to him without a quiver in my voice. My request was granted. I went in and out until a few minutes before the last. I could not stay any longer. The last he said to me was, 'Mother, kiss me.' His father staid by him until it was all over. He put his arms around him, took hold of his hand, and said, 'My God! my God!' and I believe it came from his heart. It was a sound that did not come from the lips only. I cannot tell you any more; but O! my heart is almost broken. I never can get over it. We laid him away on the 10th day of August. Elder Poulson was here. I do not remember the Scriptures he read, nor but one of the hymns: 'Keep silence, all created things.' Before this trouble took place I was so cold and lifeless that I did not care to read the Bible nor the SIGNS. The Bible was a sealed book. I could not see any beauty in it. I do not know why it was so; but I have been brought to see things so differently. The Scriptures and hymn book seem new to me, and especially the twenty-second and twenty-fourth Psalms. The desire of my heart was, 'Lord, have mercy upon me, such a sinner.' It was all I could say. He has shown me his mercy; and sometimes he says, 'Peace; be still!' But the murmuring will come back. Why was it so? I loved my boy so much."

These expressions of our dear sister's feelings will reach the hearts of many mourning ones, and I think it right to quote them. May the rich and powerful consolations of the gospel be experienced by the mourning father and mother in this and other deep and sore afflictions, and by the dear brothers and sisters.

SILAS H. DURAND.
SOUTHAMPTON, Pa.

"HEAR my prayer, O Lord, and give ear unto my cry; hold not thy peace at my tears: for I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were. O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more."—Psalm xxxix. 12, 13.

By request of the afflicted family I send for publication in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES a notice of the departure of Mrs. Sarah Rowland, in the 51st year of her age.

Sister Rowland was a member of the church at Rock Springs. She was baptized in fellowship with that church in September, 1869, by the writer of this notice, where she lived in the fellowship and confidence of the brethren until her discharge was received from the conflict and warfare which here annoys the weary pilgrim. Her illness was continued for the space of eighteen months, and at intervals was painful. During her illness she seemed to be dying daily to the things of this world, and especially toward the close she expressed a desire to depart. Our sister was a firm believer, and rather an able defender of the doctrine of God her Savior. She seemed especially clear in the doctrine on which she loved to dwell. But she is gone, leaving a husband, two sons and two daughters, whose devotion and care over their declining mother was unceasing by day and by night.

After some remarks by the writer, at the residence at Liberty Grove, Md., her remains were interred at Rock Springs. We feel sure that the afflicted husband and family have the sympathy of those who know them. May the blessing of divine grace rest upon them.

WM. GRAFTON.
FOREST HILL, Md.

OUR beloved brother, John J. Norman, departed this life in the year 1891, aged 61 years.

He was born in Duplin Co., N. C., and moved with his parents to Alabama when small, and was raised in Butler County. He was married to Mary Sheppard, near the old homestead, where he lived and raised his family. He united with the Cool Spring Primitive Baptist Church in early life, and was baptized by Elder Wm. Findley. He lived with them a worthy member, and was liberated to exercise his gift in the year 1887. He contended earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints.

He leaves a wife and five children, with the church and many friends, to mourn their loss. His disease was dropsy. He is gone to reap the reward of the faithful.

E. W. NORMAN.

BEARDEN, Ark., Oct. 15, 1892.

BROTHER Wm. L. Workman, a faithful member of the Little Creek Church, Sussex Co., Del., died at his home in Wicomico Co., Md., July 27th, 1892, aged 65 years, 11 months and 13 days.

Brother Workman was baptized by Elder E. Rittenhouse, Sept. 19th, 1881. As a tribute to his memory I quote from a letter from Elder Rittenhouse to a son of brother Workman: "I have no further knowledge of your father to communicate except his faithfulness as a member of the church, not only always attending when he possibly could, but manifesting so much enjoyment in the worship, and in the companionship and fellowship of the saints. He was an Israelite indeed, in whom there was no guile."

He leaves a widow to mourn his absence, to whom he was married August 26th, 1847. Eight children were given them. Two are dead, and six remain to mourn the departure of their affectionate father. One of the sons (brother G. J. Workman) is a worthy member of the Forest Grove Church. Brother Workman was a patient sufferer from the lingering, torturing effects of cancer in the face and eye. Sustained by grace, and the hope of a blessed immortality beyond the grave, he endured his suffering without murmur or complaint, only expressing a longing desire to go home and be at rest. His favorite reading was the experience of Job and the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I was with him, and witnessed his patient suffering; and while I tried to speak comfortably to him, I felt to be admonished by his example.

At his funeral I tried to speak consoling words to the bereaved ones and a respectful company of friends from the appropriate words of Job xiv. 14: "If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come."

W. W. MEREDITH.

On the 28th day of October, 1892, Scott Armsworth, of Cerro Gordo, Ill., quietly fell asleep in Jesus in the full assurance of faith. Like a father in Israel, or a soldier at rest, he seemed to lie in the beautiful casket in which they had laid him.

Brother Armsworth was born Sept. 9th, 1806, in Hardy Co., Va. He was married to Miss Charity Ater, in Ross Co., Ohio, April 14th, 1840, and to them were born six children, five of whom are dead. They united with the Baptist Church in September, 1848, and he was ordained a Deacon June 26th, 1849. His age was 86 years, 1 month and 19 days. His funeral occurred on Sunday following, and was attended by a very large concourse of people, made up of brethren, kindred, neighbors and friends. The remains were taken to the meeting place of the Concord Church, Piatt Co., Ill., where the writer tried to address the vast assembly from the words, "If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come." Afterward the dear old body was laid to rest in the old church-yard among his friends.

"Uncle Scotty," as he was familiarly called, will be greatly missed among us, as he was a man of strong mind, very clear in the Scriptures, sound in faith, discipline and practice. He was a reader of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and had taken that paper nearly from its beginning, and was in full accord with its teachings. A good and great man in Israel has fallen, and we feel to humbly submit to the will of him who works all things after the counsel of his own will.

ALSO,

JUDGE John White died on Thursday, Oct. 27th, 1892, at his late residence in Christian Co., Ill., aged 64 years.

He was born in Tennessee, and came to this county with his parents in 1842. He married Miss Elizabeth Hackett in 1850, and they settled on a farm in Christian Co., Ill. Brother White had been Sheriff, and later Judge, of Christian County, and at the time of his death was President of the Pawnee Railroad. He also left a good, dear wife, with three children (two sons and one daughter), to mourn their loss; but they realize that their loss is his eternal gain.

Judge White was not a member of any church here, but was a good man, and a reader of and believer in the doctrine set forth in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. He was a good citizen, a tender husband and kind father, and was all that it took to make a good man. He had been afflicted a long time with a complication of diseases, but his last was paralysis, and was almost painless. I talked much with the Judge in the last few years of his life. His great delight was in a full, free and finished salvation through Jesus our Lord. He was perfectly reconciled to die or to live, as his Lord saw fit. He could give as clear an evidence of a work of grace as almost any one. He was always ready to attend his meetings, and was able and willing financially to do his part in keeping up meetings and helping the poor. The community attested their high esteem for him in coming out en masse to his funeral at the Horse Creek Church. I tried to speak to them from the words of Paul, "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." The body was then taken to its resting place in the cemetery near the church, where Elder Lockhart read the last service, and amid many tears Judge White was buried. Thus we laid to rest one of God's noblemen, to await the resurrection of the body at the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

REISTERSTOWN, Md., Nov. 8, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—A short time since I received a request by letter, postmarked Athol, Md., from one whose name is given as "A Poor Sinner," to write through the SIGNS upon Psalm cxxxvii. 1-4. If I knew the name of the writer I would reply privately; but as I do not I will try to write for the SIGNS as requested. I desire both in preaching and writing to address none others than poor sinners, for I am sure that to none others will any word of truth come with power.

The text referred to reads as follows: "By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof. For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song; and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion. How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?"

It is evident that this was not a psalm of David, because it describes the condition of Israel during the seventy years' bondage in Babylon, which was not until long after the times of David. It was evidently written by some member of the captivity (perhaps Ezra or Nehemiah) who loved and longed for their former home in their native land. I have often thought, when meditating upon the Psalms, and calling up their expressions of joy or sadness, hope or fear, doubt or trust, how much light and force would be thrown upon their meaning could we always know under just what circumstances they were written. Of some of them we are told what were the providential circumstances which gave occasion for their composition by David and the others who wrote them; but of many we do not know the time nor reason of their utterance. God's ways in providence and grace are equal. He appoints all our steps in providence as well as in grace; and they, with each one of us, are made to fit the one to the other all our journey through. From my own life in the past I can say that my deepest spiritual experiences of sorrow or joy, hope or fear, self-abasement or exaltation in God, have often been connected with some peculiar circumstances in my natural life. So I believe it has always been with all who have ever known the Lord. We know the occasion of this Psalm by the very words of the Psalm itself. In the history of national Israel it could relate to but one time or occasion, and that, as said before, was the seventy years' bondage in Babylon. Out of that time of bondage grew up spiritual experiences among some, which they were inspired to record for the learning and comfort of many who should come after them. This whole time of captivity to them was a type of that which is spiritual; and their feelings and expressions while in that bondage set forth the experience of the people of God under circumstances in their travel which are similar to this captivity of Israel in Babylon.

In my mind I have always associated this one hundred and thirty-seventh Psalm with the one hundred and twenty-sixth, wherein their joy in deliverance from this bondage, and in restoration to their own land, is set forth. The one is full of sorrow, reproach and shame, while the other is full of joy and exultation. How many of the Lord's dear people have found the words of these two Psalms just suited to their feelings, and have been comforted perhaps by the mournful words of the one more than by the exulting words of the other. I have sometimes thought that the fellowship of sorrow has more comfort in it than the fellowship of joy. I doubt not that then Israel's tears and mourning drew them nearer together than their joy and laughter ever could. Thus much more is said in the New Testament concerning the fellowship of Christ's sufferings than about the oneness of the joy; and as the night precedes the day, or the evening precedes the morning, in the narrative of the creation, so the fellowship of sorrow must precede the fellowship of the joy. The watchman said the night cometh, and also the morning; but the night is first. So we have the two Psalms, one full of grief and one full of joy; but the captivity was before the deliverance. I know not why those who arranged the Psalms in our Bibles did not place the one hundred and thirty-seventh before the one hundred and twenty-sixth, even as its date must have been earlier; but in any event one thing is true, viz., that no words of our invention can express our feelings half so well as do the words of these two Psalms at times.

But what was the cause of this captivity? Why were this people whom God loved and had chosen as his own heritage in bondage? Was it because God had become their enemy? Had he ceased to love them? Had he forgotten them? Had he given them up to destruction? No; none of these things were true. He had not given them up to destruction; he had not forgotten them; he had not ceased to love them. On the contrary, this very bondage was a witness that he loved them still. Why then were they in bondage? There is but one answer—they had sinned. They had forgotten God. They had not kept his sabbaths. The sabbatic years had been wholly disregarded; and now God said that the land should have its appointed rest. Sin was the cause of their captivity, but yet they were the people of God still. Surely nothing can show the sovereign choice and grace of God more than do his dealings with this people. He did not choose them because they were more numerous or mightier or better than other people. On the contrary, he himself said of them that they were the most stiff-necked and rebellious of all people. He chose them out from other nations and loved them freely just because he would do so; and having chosen and loved them when they were strangers to God and stubborn in rebellion, he kept right on loving them, though they often most grievously erred and departed from him. He was their God and they were his people still; and in their sins he dealt with them as with children, and not as slaves or enemies. Now if God so chose and loved and dealt with that national people, how much surer it is that he will not turn away from his spiritual people, whom he loves and has chosen, no matter how grievously they have erred from his ways. This David declared in Psalm lxxxix. 30-37, which I will not quote for want of space. There God declares that if his people transgress he will chastise them, but that he will still love them and hold them fast, and that he will not alter his covenant toward them. I surely need not add to this the statement of the truth that if servants through fear are driven into outward service and obedience, much more is it sure that the free-born children will first love God, which is obedience itself, and then strive to serve him and obey him, not in the oldness of the letter, but in newness of spirit. God has put into the hearts of his children a willing mind to serve him; and he sees that mind in them, and encourages them and disciplines them, to the end that this mind may triumph over the flesh and rule in them. So when his righteous hand smites them it is an excellent oil, which binds up the sores and wounds which sin has made, rather than bruises them. He consumes the sins, but he heals the sinner. Israel is Israel still, and as a prince has power with God and men, and prevails; and so the tribes of Israel in Babylon were the tribes of the Lord still. One lesson it would be well for us to draw from this. If our brother sins, he is our brother still. Yea, even though for his sins he be transported into Babylon, he is none the less our brother; and as God loves him still, so ought we.

We learn another lesson from the words of this sorrowful Psalm. The child of God, though he sins, and is in bondage therefor, cannot forget the past. His proper home is Zion. He can never be at home elsewhere. In the days of his prosperity he forgot the Lord his God, but God never forgot him; and now in the time of his trouble he remembers God. When he dwelt in Zion he might not have appreciated his home and his privileges as he should; but now his soul turns to them with a great longing. This is not the language of one who has never had a home in Jerusalem or Judea, but of a transgressor and wanderer, who in bondage remembers his home, and is homesick for a sight of it once more. In the New Testament the parable of the prodigal son sets forth the same truth. In his poverty and disgrace he is represented as longing for home. Israel, though in Babylon, were not of Babylon. They had no home there. The city was beautiful, and the country powerful; it was full of palaces of gold and silver, and of merchandise. But all this was not for them nor they for it. Their home was Zion. No other place ever could be their home. They remembered Zion; yea, they wept when they remembered Zion. To them there were no hills like those of Zion. Horeb and Carmel—in all Babylon there were no hills comparable to these. They longed for home. Better home in poverty and want than Babylon with riches and pleasure. More to them now would be the poverty of Judea than all the riches of Babylon. Thus to-day in the most erring child of God there abide thoughts and desires and longings which no event can destroy, and which none of the inhabitants of the Babel of this world can ever know or understand. To be asleep and lie down among the dead is a fearful thing; but yet the man who sleeps is not dead. For a child of God to be captive to the powers of darkness is a fearful thing; but yet he is a child of God still, and in his heart are stirring God-given impulses and longings which will not be satisfied with all the riches or treasures of the world. God sees his heart and knows his longings, and does not turn a deaf ear to his mournful cry. At such an hour he confesses, "I have sinned, and deserve my captivity; but let thy mercy, O Lord, come even unto me, and save me yet again in my own land."

But why can they not love this Babylon, so rich and great? What does it lack that any should desire to depart from it? What is Jerusalem compared with it for size, for riches, for power or glory? "Ah," the captive says, "I am a captive here, and Jerusalem is my home." My home! What heavenly meaning in those two words, especially to the captive! There are the graves of his fathers, there are the scenes of his happy youth, and, dearest of all, there God was wont to meet him, and it was his privilege to worship in the temple. He could say, "My sins have cut me off from these my privileges, but yet I can be satisfied nowhere else in all the world." Some poor soul may read this who once had a home among the people of God, but who, having erred, is to-day without. If so, I know that such can bear witness that this great Babylon is not their home, that they are not and cannot be at rest, and that they have no home but Zion.

How can such an one sing any of the songs of Zion in this time of bondage? If the lips utter words the heart does not sing. If the inhabitants of this great Babylon say, "Sing, and be mirthful," even though they speak with a desire to cheer such an one, they can only feel the power of the words, "How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?" Singing is the evidence of gladness; and how can they be glad? Their harps are hung upon the willows; how can their listless hands, which hang down with sorrow, strike those strings again?

But they shall sing again. When the Lord shall turn their captivity, then shall their mouth be filled with laughter and their tongue with singing. The harps will be strung and tuned again; but those strains of melody and singing shall fill Zion's streets, and only Zion's children shall hear them. Then shall they be at home again, and the days of their mourning shall be ended. If any are captive now, God grant them speedy deliverance, and grant them songs instead of tears.

I leave these hasty thoughts. I trust they may comfort some one.

I remain your brother in the hope of the gospel,

LOTTA GROVE, Pa., Oct. 19, 1892.

ELDER J. D. HUBBELL—DEAR FRIEND IN HOPE OF ETERNAL LIFE:—I feel impressed this beautiful morning to write a few thoughts to you. I shall not be able to express the joy and comfort I received in meeting you at the Juniata Association. I have had a desire ever since I saw your name in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES to meet you, and to hear you expound those wonderful truths which the natural mind knows nothing about, because they are spiritually discerned. I must say to you that your preaching was to me as wells of water in a desert land. It was as a table bountifully set before me. I could drink, as it were, from those streams which flowed from your lips, to the satisfaction and comfort of my poor soul. It was a feast to me then, and has been ever since I came home, although I do not belong to the visible church, and have always felt too unworthy. I feel that I would be a burden to such good people as the Old School Baptists seem to be; yet I do sometimes have a hope that I belong to the body of Christ, and this Scripture gives me a great deal of comfort, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." I do feel that I love that people with a love which the world knows nothing about. It matters not where you may meet one of those little, weak, trembling ones, that love is the same; and you need not ask them what they believe in regard to the doctrine of God, as their conversation will tell you that they believe in an immutable God, one who changes not. They show by their talk and conversation that they all have been taught in the same school and by the same Teacher, "our Father." It is such a comfort to me to talk about the wonderful works and wisdom of Almighty God, that knowledge which the carnal mind knows nothing about. God's ways are unsearchable. No man can teach another the wisdom of God; neither can schools of divinity teach it. It is beyond the comprehension of mortal man. "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" "He plants his footsteps in the deep," and who can track him? He brings his people by a way they know not. How true this is with every subject of grace after being born of the Spirit. Whilst they were dead in sin they vainly thought they must do something for which God would be under obligations to save them because of their good works. But when they become dead to sin, then they realize that they have been brought by a way which they least expected. At least it was so with me. When I was trying to serve God by the law, after the Arminian mode of worship, which can never be acceptable in the sight of the sovereign God, this Scripture came very forcibly to me, "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth. Those Arminians who say they believe in Christ do not; because they believe in the works of the creature, and worship in modes and forms which do not set forth Christ as the end of the law. Christ came not to destroy the law and the prophets, but that the law and the prophets by and through him might be fulfilled. Again, by the deeds of the law no flesh can glory in the sight of God. Abraham's works were good, but he had not whereof to glory before God. It was the faith he had in God that was counted for righteousness. "By grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." "Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began." God is in one mind, and none can turn him. He works all things after the counsel of his own will. God has saved his people by the gift of his Son, with an everlasting salvation. They are already saved. It is in the past tense. Not will save, as the world has it. God does not say, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling," and leave us there, but says, "It is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." So the creature can take no honor to himself in that, as it is God who does the work. There can be no working out until there is a working in by the Holy Ghost. We are only a part of God's workmanship; and may he not do as he pleases with that which he has created? We are in the sight of God only as a drop of the bucket; as nothing; yea, less than nothing; and at our best estate we are altogether vanity. Now, since we have such an account as this of man, given by Almighty God, who can presumptuously dictate against the great Jehovah in dealing out his free grace in an unconditional or sovereign way? I am persuaded that it is not for works of righteousness which I have done, but according to his mercy he saved me, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost. O my soul! let all thy powers unite in praising the eternal God for so great a salvation. Great God, fill me with thy blessed self, and may it ever be my highest ambition to be nothing, and to magnify thine infinitely adorable name.

I must close. I have not written what I intended when I commenced. I have written as my mind has been led. Do with this as you deem best. So many want me to write to them, and I being busily engaged in teaching school, I thought I would write a few thoughts to you, and you could have the same published in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, after you have inspected it, and if you deem it worthy. You will please give your views on Amos vi. 1, through the medium of the SIGNS. Please write me a good long letter.

Yours in hope of eternal life

KELLY'S CORNERS, N. Y., Oct. 29, 1892.

DEAR FRIEND ALLISON WIBLE:—Your welcome letter came duly to hand, and I am heartily glad you have been given strength to express your heartfelt interest in the love of God as manifested through our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ; and I also hope to hear soon that you have proved your faith by working out your own salvation, in obedience to his command, as he has wrought it in your heart. "If ye love me, keep my commandments." He also tells you that the path of duty is the path of safety; also, in keeping his commands there is great reward, which is not the promise of heaven, but of rest unto your soul. Your expressions regarding myself make me feel very unworthy, as I sense the goodness of God to a poor, sinful worm, as I hope I know myself to be, having nothing of my own, barely hoping in God's abounding mercy. Much of my time I am in darkness, so ignorant and blind that I feel truly unfit for christian company, much less to attempt to speak in the name of the Lord, to comfort his afflicted and poor people. So I know he has all the glory; for he speaks and sends by whom he will, and the time and place are all in his appointment. He works all things after the counsel of his own will, as the eternal and unchangeable God, who has declared the end from the beginning. It is for the good of his chosen and called people that all things work together for good; and all is proved in them by his love shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto them.

I was much interested in the conversation of yourself and wife, and the meeting at Fairview will be long remembered by me as an oasis in the desert of this life. Now, while I am writing you, and for publication, I wish to say to all who may be interested, that through the goodness of God to me, a poor, sinful creature, I returned safely home, and found my family well. I wish to praise God, from whom all blessings flow, and also thank my dear brethren and friends for their many acts of kindness to me, and their manifested love and fellowship, not only while at the Juniata Association, but also at the Salisbury, and intermediate points, until I bade brother E. B. Walton, of Philadelphia, farewell at his place of business on Monday morning, Oct. 24th. I felt comfortable in mind and body, both in speaking and hearing. I believe it was of the Lord I was impressed to go to the Juniata Association. Although I had no expectation of going to New Valley and Elder White's home, my visit there among the friends was very comforting and pleasant.

I take the liberty, dear brethren editors, of writing to this dear friend to the Old School Baptists, and established believer in Jesus Christ our loving Lord, through your columns, as he requests my views on a passage of Scripture found in Amos vi. 1, which reads thus: "Woe to them that are at ease in Zion, and trust in the mountain of Samaria, which are named chief of the nations, to whom the house of Israel came." I am fully conscious that I shall not harm the Scriptures of truth. I shall come short of doing justice to this important truth, which had its fulfillment with the people spoken to then, and also has it fulfillment in the visible church under the gospel dispensation; for the law which came by Moses was given to the nation of Israel only. The Lord spake against them for their transgressions, as the whole family which he brought out of Egypt, saying, "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore will I punish you for your iniquities." While they should have no God besides him, the only true and living God, as there was none other that could save or do them good, how could they walk with him unless they were agreed, or trusted wholly in him, from whom must come all their help, ever realizing that a departure from his commands would bring punishment upon them or their children? So when he visited them for their sins, and their fearful forebodings were realized, they should recognize his hand, and know that the evils of their way were the cause, whether by death or captivity from the destroying angel or armies of other nations. He is a just God and a Savior, remembering mercy to a thousand generations, and his word cannot fail of fulfillment as it has gone out of his mouth. Yet he does nothing in influencing man to evil, or in taking vengeance as a man on his fellows. He revealeth his secret to his servants, who prophesy the things certain to come to pass; so that the good things promised this chosen national people while trusting in him alone, and heeding his law, did not make them his people; neither were they any the less his chosen people while distrusting or disobeying him, but in it they did show their unwillingness to walk with him as a people. Yet in all the way of Israel, good, bad or indifferent, we must ever remember that their covenant God was too wise to err, and too good to be unkind, and designed it all as it was; for if it had been otherwise, the great lesson read out in their distrust and disobedience would lack so much of his heavenly will being set forth in the Scriptures of truth. But I am not designing in this expression to make a point of God's will in evil things as fixed beforehand, to excuse, as some say, the sinner from his fault; for the gist of my aim is to show, if possible, the will of our God as supreme, while the transgressor is abased, and prophecy is fulfilled, and our God is exalted in all his pleasure;

as over all the works of his hand. No skeptic, though he be a child of grace, will be able to tell the reason why things are as they are in providence or grace. None can tell what will be, for none can tell when it shall be; because to every purpose of our God there is a time and judgment. Therefore the misery of man is great upon him, for there is not a just man upon earth that doeth good and sinneth not. But the God of Jacob, whom he hath redeemed, and Israel his elect, is in one mind, and none can turn him. While he uses the evil nation to punish his people, he also avenges himself of them. Whatever he does is right, because he is right or righteous himself. His word being disregarded, he is right in calling the transgressor to account. Vengeance belongeth unto God, and none but his chosen people can fully realize what a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God; for it is by terrible things in righteousness he answers them; and as they are exercised by his dealings with them they tremble at his word, and ask for the old paths, in which they have been led to the city of habitation; while those who are at ease in Zion, trusting in the mountain of Samaria, and forgetting their deliverance from the hand of the enemy, put away the evil day, and cause the seat of violence to come near. They lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches. They eat the lambs out of the flock and calves out of the midst of the stall. They invent to themselves instruments of music, and drink wine in bowls, &c.; but they are not grieved for the afflictions of Joseph. They shall go with the first that go captive, and the banquet of them that stretched themselves shall be removed. For the day of the Lord is darkness, and not light, until lamentation shall be experienced, and a cry go forth from all that are at ease in Zion; for the Lord will be inquired of by the house of Israel, to do for them; thus proving the word of the Lord by the prophets. "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another; and the Lord hearkened and heard it; and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name." None such can be at ease; but they shall speak of his kingdom and talk of his power; loving his law in the inward parts; having none in heaven but God, and desiring none on earth but him; for he only can deliver. So in the type we may see the people to whom the Lord has spoken by the prophets and of whom he has spoken as at ease in Zion, and to whom the word in the law came, who were under its curse, from which the yearly sacrifice could not recover. But our Redeemer coming under the law, as justice required a satisfactory offering, condemned sin in the flesh; and in order to reach Gentiles as well as Jews, all were concluded in sin, that God might have mercy upon all that were chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world, both Jew and Gentile. The Jew with circumcision as a sign or seal of the promise, and trusting only in the letter, becomes the uncircumcision; while the Gentile, believing in God, becomes the circumcision. Yet neither circumcision nor uncircumcision availeth anything, but a new creature; for the law is fulfilled. Christ is at the right hand of God. His kingdom has come, and his will is done in earth as it is in heaven. He has established the judgment day, and has been and still is gathering his people. They are coming from the east, west, north and south, as sons from far, and as daughters from the ends of the earth, sitting down in the kingdom of God with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. They all come up through great tribulation, and all from their own individual exercises know something of the redemption price, their Savior's blood. Of them it is said, "Ye were sometime darkness; but now are ye light in the Lord." As blind, they are brought by a way they knew not. Ye are not come to mount Sinai, but to mount Zion. Ye are made free in the redemption in Christ Jesus. Ye are called to liberty, yet not to use that liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love to serve one another; to live together as the heirs of the grace of life; to be fellow-helpers of each other's joy; to endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ; to fight manfully the good fight of faith; to earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. In all this they are an afflicted and poor people, each having their own peculiar trials, coming through tribulation into the kingdom. While all have felt joy in believing, and peace in obeying the commands of Jesus, even rest to their souls, yet they cannot be at ease in Zion, or careless as to her way and their own interest in her, without feeling the woe set forth in the type; for the same fearful dealings of the Lord with his chosen people Israel point to the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth. The law of life and death to Israel, as they obeyed or disobeyed, is significant to believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, in their walk in the church; not affecting their eternal life interest in him, but presenting them in their action and life interest, wherein all must undergo refining and purifying, for the trial of their faith, to be made acquainted with their Head and Husband, Jesus Christ, whom to know is life eternal. Tribulation works patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope makes not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us. He that looketh into the perfect law of liberty, being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the word, that man shall be blessed in his deed. Being the recipient of faith, which is the fruit of the Spirit, and adding virtue, knowledge, temperance, &c., the adding and abounding show the fruitfulness in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. But he that lacketh these things has forgotten that he was purged from his old sins.

To them that are at ease in Zion, under the gospel dispensation, or in the church of God, a famine must come sooner or later, to bring them to an end of their wits; not a famine of bread, but a famine of the hearing of the word. There is no greater sign of ease in Zion than to see a sleepiness, with a sickly look on the face, and a careless manner in regard to church privileges, when to stay away is easier than to go. The easy and many excuses all bespeak their ease, or careless condition regarding the Zion they have professed to love in former days. The prominence of these is in all the departments shown. Instead of being early and often at the place appointed for worship, to meet and greet the preacher, and the brethren, and bear their share of the burdens, there is slackness all around. If wealthy, there is a fear of waste; if poor, a knowledge of want. The inequality of ability gives Satan the opportunity to suggest their differences as excusable. Though sound in the faith, they may be all at ease in Zion, without excuse before God, trusting in some Samaritan mountain, or first-fruits, instead of manifesting their willingness to bear the burdens of their brethren. This is a disease that affects preachers also at times, so that they are not excusable. Whoever it does affect, it shows all the ill effects; so that instead of letting brotherly love continue, and each abounding in the work of the Lord, in labors of love, whole churches are disturbed, or the visibility destroyed by being spewed out. Hence the woe to them that are at ease in Zion, whether it be an individual or a church. The chastenings of the Lord will continue to come upon his chosen and called people. And if ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons. When chastened for our disobedience, what fearfulness we experience, as our conscience accuses us, and we know it is just in him; and once more we look toward his holy temple, acknowledging that salvation is only of the Lord.

I have written this imperfect letter for friend Wible, and for all our kindred in Christ, and also send his sweet letter for publication.

THE BOND OF PERFECTNESS.

"AND above all these things put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness."—Col. iii. 14.

The special care of our Lord for the present comfort of his redeemed people is shown in the gift of inspired instruction suited to their need under every possible condition in which they can be situated in their subjection to the vanity of this earthly state. Not only is the doctrine of the gospel clearly defined in the record of infallible truth, but there is explicit direction for the deportment of those who love righteousness, and feel the burden of the law of sin in their flesh. It is worthy of serious consideration that much of the New Testament is devoted to the instruction of the saints with reference to their practical conduct toward each other and toward them who are not made manifest as believers in the Lord Jesus Christ. When it is observed that the same Spirit dwells in every saint, by whose direction the law of life was written in the Scriptures, the importance of self-examination is manifest. This investigation is not to discover evidences of merit in themselves, nor yet to produce works which will entitle them to claim a reward; it is needful to settle them in the assurance that they are in the faith. Only that experience which agrees with the example of the apostles and primitive saints, can be accepted as truly bearing witness that the subject of it is a disciple of Jesus. However approved in the sight of carnal reason may be the evidences presented in any case, without the seal of divine authority nothing can bear witness that a sinner is quickened by the life of Christ in him the hope of glory. This seal cannot be seen by the natural man, since it is discerned alone by that faith which is the fruit of the Spirit. For this cause there can never be an agreement between the carnal mind and the mind of Christ in the believer. While by faith he positively can claim this conclusive evidence, saying, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren;" yet reason finds an easy way to account for that love on natural grounds. Indeed, it is sometimes difficult for the bewildered saint to conceive how he could refrain from loving those in whom he sees so much to attract his love. It would save the saints much anxiety if they could always know that the attractions which draw their love to those who bear the image of Jesus can only be seen by the revelation of that same Spirit which evidently dwells in those to whom that love goes out. This truth makes it as certain that the life of Christ dwells in the one who loves its manifestation as in the one in whom it is seen and loved. Thus they are shown to be animated by the same one life and one heart. When they are led by this holy principle of divine love the saints must esteem others better than themselves, since they clearly see Christ in their brethren, while in themselves they mourn the corruption of an evil heart of unbelief. None but those who are born of the Spirit can mourn under the burden of a sinful heart; and none can be led by the Spirit of God without encountering this cross. This is so entirely different from my natural feeling that it is not possible that the sinful and polluted heart of man should even desire to counterfeit it. Although the Lord brings his people by a solitary way which they have not known, yet they cannot withhold their love from every one who is brought in the same way. And while none of them can satisfactorily describe the wonders of that unknown way, they have no difficulty in recognizing the first expression of another one who has passed over the hidden road. Thus the fellowship of the saints is not dependent upon the will of those who are attracted and united by it, but that holy principle of fraternal love governs those in whom it dwells. There is no possibility that the enmity of the carnal mind should ever produce so much as a desire to love holiness, much less could the strong affections of a brother's heart originate in the hateful nature of a sinner. "Love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God."

In the connection in which our text is recorded the apostle was inspired to earnestly exhort and admonish the saints not only to refrain from the ritual of legal ordinances as delivered by Moses, but also, to set their affections on things above, not on things on the earth; and the reason assigned is "For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God." Such an entire change of condition was wrought in them that they had need of all the instruction given by their Lord, that they might walk worthy of the vocation wherewith they were called of God. In admonishing the saints, the apostle does not leave it to be understood that he is giving directions to dead sinners by the observance of which they might secure life. The appeal with which this chapter begins, is based upon the fact they were already risen with Christ above the law with all its condemnation, which had been demonstrated in the preceding chapter. In consideration of this settled truth, they are called to a consistent walk and conversation as children of the light. The Lord gave this as the conclusive manifestation of their being his disciples. "A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. By this shall all know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."—John xiii. 34, 35. No other test can give this assurance. The experience of every saint is shown by this test to be the operation of the Spirit of Christ in each of them, producing this heavenly fruit of the Spirit as the witness abiding in them. The adversary often seeks to withdraw their attention from this divinely approved evidence, and demands of them the fruit of the Spirit in their actual walk and conversation. Failing to find their evidence thus tangible to the natural mind they are ready to sink into despair. But they cannot deprive themselves of this seal of the Spirit which marks them as children of God. Even though they must relinquish all hope for themselves under the dark temptation, they yet sincerely and earnestly love those in whom they see the likeness of the gracious Redeemer. No conscious vileness in themselves can forbid this heavenly grace to be felt in their most gloomy times of darkness. And although they cannot then realize the fact, there is unquestionable assurance that every one is born of God who has this principle of love shed abroad in his heart. There is no possibility that it should ever be found in a sinner who still abides in death.

The effect of this full confirmation of the hope of the saints is not to encourage them in sin and rebellion against the commandments of their Lord; but the more fully they are convinced of the genuineness of that manifestation of grace which they have received, the more earnestly they long to be free from the bondage of sin, that they may be conformed to the perfect example of the holy Captain of their salvation. There is no indication of the love of righteousness in one who needs to be driven by fear, or bribed by rewards, to refrain from sin in his practical life. To every one who is led by the Spirit of God there is great reward in keeping the commandments of the Lord.—Psalm xix. 7-11. Careful examination of the exhortations and admonitions left on record for the instruction of the saints, and observation of the connection in which each of them is written, will show that nothing is laid upon the believer as a duty required of him. Under the gospel dispensation, the perfect law of liberty is put in the heart of every one who loves the King of righteousness. In this way is fulfilled the declaration of the Lord to our Redeemer, as written in the one hundred and tenth psalm, "The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion; rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. THY PEOPLE SHALL BE WILLING in the day of thy power in the beauties of holiness; from the womb of the morning thou hast the dew of thy youth." In recognition of this glorious peculiarity of the government of the Prince of peace, Paul exhorts the saints, saying, "Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his own good pleasure."—Phil. ii. 12, 13. Having the mind of Christ wrought by the Holy Spirit in the midst of each of them, his people can have no greater privilege than that which is granted them in keeping his commandments. Their most ecstatic joy is found in loving him and those in whom his image is recognized; and this love is the fruit of the Spirit, and is the fulfilling of the law.—Gal. v. 22; Rom. xiii. 10. Whatever bitterness of grief may oppress the saint under a sense of personal vileness, this holy principle is the abiding witness which attests the truth of his being led by the Spirit as a Son of God. The very hunger and thirst after righteousness, which is manifested in mourning over conscious sinfulness, bears unmistakable and conclusive evidence that the blessing of the righteous Judge abides upon the longing and fainting one.

For the strengthening and encouragement of the afflicted and poor people who are called to walk in his narrow pathway, the inspired servants of our Lord were moved by the Holy Ghost to leave on record in the Scriptures the perfect law of liberty; which is by the same divine power written in the heart of every one of them. By the testimony of these two witnesses the truth of every precept is established. If the instruction and admonition given in the connection of our text there is nothing presented for the observance of the saints but what they have the most earnest desire to do. Indeed, it is the greatest grief of every one who loves the holiness of God as it is revealed in Christ Jesus, that they are not able to do those very things which are so clearly manifest as the fruit of the Spirit in the dear Savior. When led by the Spirit the sincere desire of their heart is to put off all the works of the flesh in their walk and conversation, and to put on, "As the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering; forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel (or, complaint) against any; even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye." This is the desire to do good, but they are constantly reminded of their weakness by the lack of ability to perform it. It is not the fulfillment of this divine direction when we are willing to forgive those who show themselves worthy of our forbearance. No sinner who has been experimentally made to feel the forgiving grace of Christ can ever forget that it was not for any merit in himself that he received that gift of infinite love and mercy. This is the pattern for every saint to copy. Yet there is no possibility that it may be acceptably followed by the performance of any formal action. An outward show of kindness may be prompted by the most detestable covetousness in the heart. God is not mocked by any outward appearances. He judges the inmost thoughts and feelings. In his sight he that hateth his brother is a murderer, although his hand has never been stained with blood. Knowing all our sin and pollution, and while we were yet enemies against him by wicked works, for his own great love he reconciled us in the body of his flesh through death, to present us holy and unblameable and unreprouvable in his sight. If he had never forgiven us until we showed ourselves worthy of his favor, no sinner would ever have known the sweetness of his grace. Can we claim to be followers of him while we demand full satisfaction of an offending brother? This admonition is in harmony with the manner of prayer which Jesus taught to his disciples. If we hold resentment in our hearts against one who has trespassed against us, how shall we dare to ask of God that he "forgive our debts as we forgive our debtors?" Our Lord explained this petition when he taught it. "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you; but if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive your trespasses." No saint can experience the forgiving mercy of God in blotting out his iniquities while cherishing resentment against his brother. He must continually feel the awful reproof of Jesus abiding upon him, "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, (my brethren), ye did it not to me."—Matt. xxv. 45. This fearful judgment is realized in the present experience of the carnally minded saint; it is not deferred until the end of time.

It is very essential to the proper understanding of the things of the Spirit of truth, that the distinction be observed between the law of a carnal commandment, whose precepts could be observed in the letter, and that perfect law of liberty, by which the saints are made to worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, while they have no confidence in the flesh. No formal compliance with the literal requirements of any law can bring to the saint the answer of a good conscience toward God; "God is a Spirit; and they that worship him must worship (him) in spirit and in truth."—John iv. 24. Hence it is plain that the most diligent attention to the observance of all the admonitions and exhortations written in the Scriptures can avail nothing for the perfecting of the saints, unless the motive from which such obedience springs is that divine fruit of the Spirit which is by inspiration denominated "charity." It is also called "love." Neither of these terms however can be understood in their commonly received sense as applied to natural and earthly motives and passions. In our text, while it is given precedence above all the things embraced in the context, it is especially defined as being "the bond of perfectness." In the high and holy significance which is here attached to this fruit of the Spirit of God, there is nothing less pure than the Spirit of truth which can either produce this charity, or be the object embraced by it. The effect which is produced by this spiritual power is felt and known by those in whom it is revealed; but they can no more control its motion, or direct its action, than they can tell whence cometh and whither goeth the tempestuous wind. Has there ever been a saint who could refrain from loving every one in whom the Spirit of Christ was seen? It may be that the grace of God has been displayed in bringing a bitter enemy to the knowledge of his lost condition; yet so soon as the assurance of the Spirit is given, "Behold, he prayeth!" he is an enemy no longer. When the Lord had given this evidence to Ananias, it was not needful that he should make an effort to perform the duty of loving the man of whom he had been in terror before. Immediately it was his sweetest privilege to go to his persecutor and hail him as "Brother Saul!" When this heavenly love is in control of the saints there can be no wars and fightings among them. The cunning adversary may insinuate the poison of selfish pride in the mind of the saint who is conscious of no transgression in his outward deportment. Sometimes the most exemplary in their own deportment are the most intolerant toward those whose weakness has betrayed them into sin; but such are not fulfilling the perfect law of charity. Their action tends to rend and scatter the saints, rather than to bind them together. It should not be forgotten that this divine charity is "the bond of perfectness." By this gracious tie the saints are united in one body, and in one spirit, even as they are called in one hope of their calling. So complete is the unity of the Spirit where this bond of perfectness prevails that no root of bitterness can spring up to trouble them. Each of them is then not only willing but anxious to bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. Under the guidance of this holy charity there can never arise any strife or jealousies; because it moves each one to esteem others better than himself, and to seek not his own, but every one his brother's advantage and edification. This perfect bond is well called "the bond of perfectness." It is something stronger than a bond which requires perfection. It is emphatically and exclusively "the bond of perfectness." There is none besides this one.

is nothing to which I can reply, only to say yea, and amen, and this I do with all my heart; and, like the little child, when asked by its mother, "And now what do you say to the gentleman for giving you the candy?" it put out its hand toward the giver, and cried, "More." I, too, ask for more of those letters, which you know so well how to write. When we parted, as you took my hand you asked, "When are you going to answer my last letter?" I choked back a sob as I replied, "O! I don't know. I don't think I can." But I thought, O! if he only knew how inferior my ability is to his, he surely could not desire an answer from me. You write so beautifully, brother Coulter, and God has not seen fit to grant me such ability nor freedom as I would desire; but I do not want to complain, but use the little he has given me, as the widow used her mite; and should it chance to help ever so little, to him be the glory, for his is the power. The only hope I have is that some timid one may receive courage to think, Well, though I cannot do very well, I surely can do as well as that, and I will try to tell what my Lord has done for me.

You cannot tell how much we appreciated your cordial welcome and kind recognition. But I know it is Christ in you, and O how sweet it is to feel him in our hearts; for "God is love;" and he seems so very near at such a time. When we parted, I think I fully realized how poor Ruth felt while clinging to her mother, and pleading, "Entreat me not to leave thee." But God's ways are not as our ways; and as there is a time to sow, and a time to reap, so there is a time to meet, and a time to part; a time to mourn, and a time to rejoice; for it is so predestinated. O that ever-precious word! But I am very, very thankful that our hearts can never be torn asunder; for the love of God has bound them fast. Not height, nor depth, enemies nor distance, can break the union of the children of the living God. Surely, "united we stand; divided we fall."

But now I must tell you something of the recreation we have had; bodily, to be sure, but more precious to me has been the resting and feasting my poor heart has enjoyed spiritually. I enjoyed so much the remarks our dear pastor, Elder Jenkins, made in Middletown; also I learned so much from Elder White's sermon in Philadelphia; but, dear brother, I have enjoyed one continual sermon my whole journey through. In everything I saw I learned more than I can express. You know one may be greatly benefited by a delightful atmosphere, and after his return home tell to his friends how much it improved his health, and how clear and delightful was the air; but he can neither bring to his friends the atmosphere, nor impart to them the health and vigor it has given him. My heavenly teacher has been with me all the way, and like a guide has explained and shown me many things I never saw before. In one thing I would see his boundless love to the children of men; in another his power and majesty, and in another his tender forbearance and compassion, &c.; or perhaps some precious little thought would steal into my soul, causing it to rejoice and praise him for his love and watchful care; and I am still way up on the mountain, where I lose sight of mortal cares and woes, and catch only the sweet incense of thanksgiving as it floats upward to the skies, and hear but the songs of praise that seem too sweet and sacred for mortal lips to utter; and like one just waking from a lovely dream, who fears to open his eyes to the reality about him, so I keep looking up, fearing to look down, but I become dizzy, at the wondrous height, and fall to earth again. I tremble as I wonder if I am only being strengthened and prepared to suddenly drop into some bitter trial or temptation which is to try me. If so, I trust that as my day my strength shall be. We saw so many Catholic sisters while traveling, with their white cape and somber robes of black, and they always seemed so clean, gentle and sweet, that for a time I quite envied their seeming purity. I thought it looked so beautiful to see them crucify their fleshly pride by wearing the one costume so plain and neat; and how wonderful it appeared that they could bear the rude stares and remarks of the crowds about them, with such quiet patience. Then I wondered, Are they really as pure at heart as they appear to be! Do they never know what it is to feel envy, discontent and anger, and have wicked thoughts they cannot control? Then I thought, They are of the earth, earthly, just like myself; have the torment of sin and temptation the same as all the children of Adam. Yes, but they control it; they never outwardly (that I know of) display the wickedness within. I told my husband I would gladly don the same apparel, and live in seclusion the remainder of my life, if I thought it would really make me as good as they appeared to be. After talking with him awhile, he said, "Well, I take no stock in a religion where I must dress in a uniform, to show that I am better than anybody else." This amused me very much, and ended the conversation. But after reaching home I was thinking of them again one evening, something like this, Well, they are certainly a very quiet, orderly people, constantly doing good in their benevolent institutions; are poor, for they beg for the money with which to do good; and no one ever seems to oppose them, but the world seems to look upon them with the greatest respect. Suddenly as a flash came these words to me, "Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you."

"In this world ye shall have tribulation." Yes, thought I, that is so; we need not look to this world for approval and respect, nor expect peace and perfection here. No, much rather let us follow in the blood tracks of a dying, suffering Savior; for he was "a man of sorrow, and acquainted with grief." Poor soul! and don't you know that without the work and strife and weary days you would not long for rest? These are God's ways, that win you from the life below, up to his rest. And I was satisfied. While on the cars, and night came on, I rather dreaded the long, dark hours, plunging along at such great speed, through the unknown darkness; but there came to me a peaceful dependence upon the One who is able to save, till I smiled at my fears and fell sweetly asleep, thinking, Is not my Savior able to protect me in one place as well as another? And he is here; his arm is just as strong; his love and tender care is just as great. What is an arm of flesh, compared to his? and except he keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.

Sailing across lake Ontario to Toronto we quite lost sight of land for a time; and as we quietly sailed along, I felt that the great expanse of water was like to God's free, unbounded love, reaching far beyond anything we can realize, so full, so free, and O! how very, very deep; so deep that even the christian who knows it well is unable to fathom it, and no man by searching can find it out. But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory, we shall know and realize it in all its boundless depth and beauty, when we reach the home where our loving Father dwells. While in Chicago we visited the Masonic Temple, which is twenty stories high. When at the top we had a fine view, and from this dizzy height men walking on the streets looked to me about as large as ants, one restless, moving mass. Turning to my daughter, who stood beside me, looking on in amazement, I said, "And what is man, that thou art mindful of him?" If to our mortal eyes man can appear so small and insignificant, how must he appear to the eye of Omnipotence? and yet, not a sparrow falls without him. O wonder of wonders! And then to think of puny mortals professing to be able to dictate to him, proceed in opposition to his righteous will, or limit his powerful decree. O vanity of vanities! How can I express my emotions when I looked upon the beautiful falls of Niagara? I was actually dumb with wonder, overcome with awe and adoration towards the creator of such awful splendor. The falls are two thousand feet wide, with a plunge of one hundred and sixty-five feet. It is said one does not realize what an immense volume of water falls, nor the distance of its descent, as much in any other position as when looking up. It seems to me the same is true spiritually, in regard to the mercies we receive. When gazing upward at its great breadth and height, it seems to fall from the skies; so like his mercies falling in torrents full and free, from his abundant hand. The waters are of a most beautiful, clear, deep green, so refreshing and cheering to see, except where it dashes down in its wild haste and strikes a snag or rock, which causes it to send up a foam and spray, which with its exquisitely pure whiteness forms a delightful contrast to the verdant green. So come our blessings, dashing, bounding down to us in unlimited abundance, bringing encouragement, strength and good cheer. The farther they have to fall to reach the poor mortal, and the more they come in contact with man's ingratitude and forgetfulness of his Creator, the more grand the display of God's infinite love and purity, the greater the love of God to sinful, unworthy man. Just as the vapor and mist rise and float upward from the foot of the falls, so the thanksgiving and praise from christian hearts rise to his throne above; and they, too, were created by the falling of his mercy and love into the deep, dark chasm of their hearts. After looking some time in silence at the grand display, a lady turned to me and remarked, "It almost makes one feel as if they ought to take off their hats to it, doesn't it?" I only answered, "It is perfectly sublime." I felt like kneeling in reverence to the Creator of such wonderful magnificence, and a portion of a song came into my mind, "Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving and praise; for the Lord is a great God, and a great King above all gods. Who among the mighty ones, who among the mighty, can be likened unto him?" O! brother Coulter, what religion is so deep, so pure, so full and so free, as the religion of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ? So deep and secure is it that none by searching can find it out, and none but the redeemed of the Lord can know it; for "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." So full and abundant is it that it can plunge away down to the most lowly; and the poor soul cannot be so hidden in the depths of darkness, woe and despair, but the blood of Christ can find him there. No enemy can limit it or control it, and it will continue to plunge on for ages; yes, until the fountain from which it flows fails, and that can never be. So free is it that it is given not only without money and without price, but without even so much as the asking. Above all, it is so firm and lasting. "How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord, Is laid for your faith in his excellent word."

O! I am so thankful that it can never change, but will forever be the same old-fashioned religion our Savior taught upon the mountaintop to his dear disciples. How unlike the fashionable religion of the present day. To one who is quietly reclining upon a comfortable couch, at peace with all mankind, it would seem utter foolishness to say, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." But to one foot-sore and weary, whose aching head and aching heart have never known a perfect rest and peace, what a greeting it would be; a gift beyond comparison. To say to one so filled with drink that he is giddy in his drunken mirth, "Come, drink of the river of life pure and clear as crystal, flowing direct from the fountain of the King, and you shall never thirst," would be foolishness indeed, and he would laugh you to scorn; but to one who has crossed the heated sands of the desert, and knows what it is to have lips so parched and dry that he can scarcely speak the word water, to him you need say not a word; but put a well filled glass before him, and see him grasp it with an eagerness which fills your eyes with tears; and he will drink with a relish, till he has drained every drop. It would be folly to say to a company feasting on the best the world affords, Here is bread, the staff of life; come, eat, and you shall live forever; but to the hungry, starving poor it has a joyful meaning. The well fed, or those who are satisfied with worldly food, may eat with you as a compliment, but they will never relish it, and seldom swallow it. In comparison, the world and the church of Christ seem to me like this. First, the world. They beg, borrow, and in various ways get means to build a beautiful house in which to spread their banquet. Then they engage their caterer; and if he is unable to provide food agreeable to their taste, they can pay more and hire a better one. Seats are provided for royalty, and musicians are engaged to make fine music, while they sip their sweets. All are expected to appear in full dress; for this is a feast at the "Lord's house," as they term it. Now, our Lord prepares his feast. The lamb is slain, the bread is broken, and his servants are sent out to proclaim that the feast is ready. He has spread his table in the presence of his enemies, beside the still, calm waters, in green pastures, where the banner of his undying love floats out upon the pure, sweet breeze, the breath of new born souls. "Come," says the servant, "the feast is ready." "Yes," says the hungry one, "I am nearly starved; I know I need something, but I scarcely know what. I hunger, I thirst, but I know what those feasts are. There is a great variety, but so rich, so sweet, they make me sick, and I feel worse when I leave them than at first." Dear brother, I have tried it, spiritually, I think I know. "Then again," continues the bidden one, "I am too poor; I have nothing to appear in; and I would feel so uncomfortable among them in my poverty and rags; and probably they would not let me in if they knew of my true condition; or I might borrow garments; but I don't want to deceive them and play the hypocrite. No, I guess there is no one like me, and you better let me alone in my misery." "Yes," says the messengers, "but this is the order of the King, and he commands you to come." He does not wish to disobey. Reluctantly, trembling at every step, he rises to go. He feels so dependent and helpless as he leans heavily upon the strong arm thrown around him, and he allows himself to hope, just a little, that the King will not frown, that the guests will not look upon him with a sneer and a haughty toss of their heads, nor draw their silken robes away from him, though he knows he is vile; and so with words of encouragement and love he is gently drawn along the strait and narrow way, and reaches the banqueting-house. He is cleansed and purified; upon him is put the robe which the King himself prepared, and he enters among the other guests, who not only do not sneer and turn away, but fairly run to meet him; and clasped in the arms of the dear King, who smiles and does not frown, he is proclaimed

"No more a stranger or a guest,
But like a child at home."

And, dear brother and sister, I know just how he feels, and so do you. He is told to eat and drink his fill; told that they will kindly watch his steps, and if he stumbles they will kindly help to keep him from falling; for strength is given them to help a brother. They will warn him if he seems running into danger; and if he has a battle to fight, his armor is always on, and the King will cause him to gain the victory at last. I think I know the meaning now of the words, "love thy neighbor as thyself." I used to think it meant to love with a natural love the one living nearest to you, &c. Also, "love your enemies" in the same light; but as that is an utter impossibility, I have looked about and been shown that it is perfectly possible. Did not our Savior love us when we were bitter enemies to him? and if we possess that love, do we not desire to see our foes made to hear and receive the blessed truth? I have not seen a mortal so depraved and low but I would welcome him with outstretched arms to the kingdom of heaven or church of God. I love him, though he may at present seem an enemy. I love him, hoping he may yet be made manifest as a child of my heavenly Father. My neighbor, I think, is my brother or sister in Christ. They are living nearer to my heart than those of the world. They, like kind neighbors, can bear with me when I talk of my dear Father at home; and they sympathize with me, and share with me; they love to help me if I am faint and sick, as they know I would gladly do for them; and I feel a confidence in them, and they in me. And do I not love the Spirit of Christ in them with as great fervor as I do myself? If I am mistaken in my views, please correct me and I will be grateful. O! how I have rambled on; but I truly did not mean to. Can you forgive the intrusion on your time and patience? for you know we are to bear each other's burdens. I have often desired to write to some of our ministers, just for the selfish reason of easing my mind, and perhaps receiving a letter from them; but I dared not impose the task of either reading or writing upon them, as they must be so overwhelmed with better matter. So you see, dear brother, since my poor little scribble in the SIGNS came in sight, and you so kindly opened the gate of correspondence, I may intrude too often, unless you close it tight; and you will be compelled to bear the burden which otherwise some good minister of God would have to bear, or take a share of the scribble with which I must ease my mind. But I do so enjoy a letter from the Lord's children, that I cannot help throwing out the bait; and if I knew they would receive it only as bait, and not imagine I intended it as a feast, I should be better pleased, and they not disappointed. Please remember us with christian love to all the dear brethren and sisters whom we met in Philadelphia, and write just whenever it will not inconvenience you, and you want to do a kind act to a little, unworthy, but affectionate sister and her husband.

WM. & ADELA JONES.

WATERLOO, IOWA.

DEAR BETHREN BEEBE:—Many of the brethren have urged me to take up the pen again and write for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I have been silent so long I scarcely know how to begin to write of those things that all Zion's children love. My silence has not been occasioned by any feelings of neglect to the cause of my Master, nor the dear family paper; but I see so much imperfection in self, and in all I do, that I have dropped the pen out of regard rather than disregard for the cause of Christ; and as the paper has been well filled by productions from able pens, I have not deemed it necessary for me to write. But many of the dear brethren have urged me to resume, and claim to have missed my name, so that I feel to comply, knowing that the Lord does not confine his work to the great and noble alone, but it has pleased him through all ages to bring the weak things to his use. The young stripling David was chosen out from among the noble sons of Jesse. The little boy Samuel was called when a child. Even down to Paul's day we find it so, as he declares, "But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty."—1 Cor. i. 27. So if it has pleased him to speak through one so insignificant and unworthy as me, it is alone by his grace and not anything of my own.

If I speak to the poor, afflicted, tempest-tossed children of God, who are coming up through much tribulation, I must quote Paul's words, "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man; but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." When we are sorely tried, how prone we are to think no one was ever so peculiarly tried as we; but if we search the pages of inspiration we find that God's people from all time were a peculiar, tried and afflicted nation. So, no matter how grievously we are tried and tempted, no matter how heavily the hand of affliction is laid upon us, nor how the things of the world try, vex and annoy us, we have the assurance that "there hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man." Paul says further, "But God is faithful." O! have you not found him faithful many times? When the weight of trouble was ready to crush you under its ponderous load, have you not proved him faithful? He has not suffered you to be tempted above that ye are able to bear. He is as faithful to leave us to the temptation for a season, as he is to "make a way to escape." And how is that "way to escape" provided? He leaves us to be tempted long enough for us to try all our own means of escape, and also to try every humanly devised means; but after all has failed, and we are driven in our desperation to fall at the footstool of his mercy, we there sweetly and blessedly learn that it is through him alone that we are made to find the way of escape. He was tempted in all points like unto his tempted, afflicted followers, and endured it all, that he might provide a way, a blessed highway, for his dear children; a way undefiled by the enemy of souls; a way that the vulture's eye hath not seen, nor the lion's whelp trodden. Nothing ravenous or unclean can go there; but the redeemed shall walk there. O! brethren and sisters, when we are given the blessed privilege of entering into that highway, we do not go limping and stumbling along, but we "walk there." O with what confidence do we "run and not be weary, walk and not faint," while upon this highway of holiness. No darts from Satan, no temptation, but all is subdued by the might and power of him who guides us here below. When these fiery temptations are over, and all the storms of life are past, then we shall be conquerors, and more than conquerors, through him that loved us and gave himself for us. O with what fortitude then should we bear all the trials and afflictions here below, since all are under the direct command of Jesus.

Safely sequestered in that calm retreat, No more temptation or sin to meet,

Safely secured in that bower of peace, Where praises to Jesus shall never cease.

O why then cling to these trifles and toys? Why tremble to leave these transient joys?

Since Jesus has gone to prepare a place For all the redeemed who are saved by grace.

Ah, well, sin and Satan cannot do more Than was done to Christ Jesus our Lord before;

For the wrath of man shall his praise maintain,

The remainder of wrath he will restrain.

With love to all the household of faith, I am yours in hope of immortality,

SARAH A. GARRETT.

CLINTONVILLE, Ky., Oct. 17, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—I inclose two dollars, for which please send the SIGNS to me another year. I cannot do without it after having read almost every number from its first publication. I have thought from year to year it would be the last. I am now eighty-two years of age and feel as much interested in reading the rich communications contained in our family paper as I did in the first number.

Notwithstanding my age and many infirmities, I went to the Licking Association, more than forty miles from my home. I was feeling weak and trembling, not knowing that my natural strength would be sufficient for the trip. The words of one of old came into my mind, "And I said, I will go in the strength of the Lord. I will make mention of his righteousness, and of his only." I was somewhat tired when I arrived at brother Farmer's house, the dear brother who met us at Frankfort, and conveyed us to his home, where I was tenderly cared for, and every want supplied. Quite a number had arrived, among them our venerable brother Cox and his wife, and sister Theobald, who was untiring in attending to my every want. Brethren Lively, Cummings and others were also there, conversing on things pertaining to the kingdom of heaven. We had preaching four nights. We were well supplied with gospel ministers, all speaking the same language, declaring Christ Jesus the Savior of sinners. Not a discordant note was heard. On Monday morning the dear brother conveyed us to Frankfort, where all took the train for Lexington, enroute to our homes. I arrived home Monday evening, feeling none the worse for my long ride.

I had the pleasure of hearing our beloved brother Eubanks for two days since, at Mount Carmel. I think we were strengthened. Although there were but few of us gathered together in his name, I felt that Christ was in our midst.

Brethren Beebe, will you please put these lines in one corner of the SIGNS, so that my many friends may see that I am still in the land of the living? I feel it will be the last time I will bother you. May the grace of God abound with you is my prayer, and may you continue long to wield "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon."

Your unworthy sister,
CAROLINE B. ASHBURN.

CORRESPONDING LETTERS.

The Mount Pleasant Association of Regular Baptists, in session with the Cane Run Church, Henry Co., Ky., Sept. 2d, 3d and 4th, 1892, to the several Associations with whom she corresponds, sendeth greeting.

DEAR BRETHREN IN THE LORD:—In God's goodness, infinite mercy and everlasting love, we have again, according to appointment, met in our annual meeting. Our meeting has been a pleasant one, all bowing to the same law and Lord, as christian brethren bound by the same golden chain, the love of our blessed Master. We rejoice at the coming of your messengers and messages of love. We hope you still will remember us in the future, so that our hearts and hands may be joined to one Lord one faith and one baptism. Your correspondence we still hope to receive. The ministers of Zion sent to us by the Lord our King, proclaim Christ alone to the household of God, salvation in the crucified Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel, the God of the whole earth.

The next session of our association will be held with the Sulphur Fork Church, Henry Co., Ky., commencing on Friday before the first Saturday and Sunday in September, 1893, when and where we hope to again meet your messengers and hear of your welfare.

The Juniata Primitive Baptist Association, to the sister associations of like precious faith with whom she corresponds, sendeth love in the Lord.

DEAR BRETHREN:—We hear of many divisions and much strife existing among the professed children of God; we rejoice to know that we are still highly favored of the Lord, blessed in the enjoyment of peace and harmony, having no desire to follow the doctrines of the day, but content with the rich treasures of God's word as revealed in the law and testimony of his word, which are the old landmarks set up by our Lord and Master; believing that new things have a tendency to stir up strife among the dear sheep and lambs of Christ. We believe that those new things are not of God, but are devised of men, and are not profitable to the dear children of God.

We feel to thank God for the attendance of ministers and brethren from sister associations, and for the true gospel preaching by the ministers in attendance. For all this we thank God and take courage.

Brethren, we beg a continuance of your correspondence by messengers, which we hope will be kept up as heretofore. We hope they will meet with us in our next association, which will be held, God willing, with the Providence Church, in Friend's Cove, Bedford Co., Pa., to commence on Wednesday after the first Sunday in October, 1893, and continue three days.

PLEASE BE CAREFUL.

It frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. Or if the paper is being sent in her name and the renewal is sent in her husband's name the same thing is likely to occur. Please be very careful to give the same name in which the paper is already coming, also the post office address at which it is received.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DIED—On Wednesday, Nov. 2d, 1892, at her late residence in Sussex Co., Del., Mrs. Drusilla Morris, in the 71st year of her age.

Sister Morris was a daughter of the late Elder Leonard Hastings, of the Little Creek Church, and was married to brother James Morris Dec. 21st, 1847. She was baptized in the fellowship of that church July 22d, 1865, and had continued in the full enjoyment of that fellowship to the end. Her bereaved husband and oldest son were members in fellowship with her. Sincere, humble and devoted through all her life, she may be said to have adorned her profession. No one ever found any evil thing to say of her. Those who live a life of steadfast faith here give a pretty clear indication of what they shall be when he who is their life shall appear.

She was taken ill on the 20th of August last, and was a constant yet patient sufferer from a complication of diseases until her final release. I felt it rather as a privilege to be present with the family in the observance of the last rites, and fully to share their sorrow in this bereavement. I had baptized both husband, wife and son.

"And now above the dews of night
The yellow star appears;
So faith springs in the heart of those Whose eyes are dimmed with tears."

YESTERDAY afternoon there was laid to rest the mortal part of one who was closely identified with the life of this city almost from its beginning. Mrs. A. K. English, who passed from here early on Monday morning, was born in Watertown, N. Y., Nov. 15th, 1813. She was married at the age of seventeen, and had five children, four daughters and one son, of whom the only survivor is Mrs. O. D. English, of this city. Mrs. English was twice a pioneer, moving with her husband to southern Wisconsin in 1848, and, twenty-five years later, after his death in 1872, coming to South Dakota to do her share in the building up of the new commonwealth; and she did her share, and more than her share, wherever she was. Naturally energetic and self-reliant, she united to those qualities an indomitable perseverance that refused to be overcome by any obstacle. Yet she was not all strength. Her deep religious nature so mellowed her life that she was as tender and loving as she was strong. Her character was above the ordinary, and her long life was one continuous stream of usefulness and helpfulness. She had been a devoted member of the Primitive Baptist Church, and felt very deeply God's nearness to her; so that while happy and contented here, she was perfectly ready to go when the summons came.

Mrs. English's last illness was brief and comparatively painless, and she passed almost imperceptibly from this life to the one for which she had been fitted.—Sioux Falls (S. D.) Press.

Mary S. Brittingham, wife of Nathaniel Brittingham, and daughter of Deacon Elijah Laws, departed this life at her home near Pittsville, Md., on Oct. 27th, 1892, aged 73 years and 15 days.

She was born Oct. 12th, 1819. Her disease was supposed to be palsy, from which she suffered only a short time. She was as well as usual, set her dinner-table, and after thinking of something more in the dairy, on her return she fell helpless. She could use her hands and tongue a little, and told them not to send for a doctor, as she would soon get better; but she passed away the next day, her life ebbing out like a sweet sleep.

Sister Brittingham was baptized by Elder Ira Gray on May 24th, 1854, in the fellowship of the Indiantown Church. Doubtless many of the brethren, more especially ministers, will remember her pleasant manner of expression, bearing much of the pleasantness of the family known as the Laws, and in my judgment possessed much of the graces of the Spirit, by which she endeared herself to the church. The writer can say for himself that truly a vacancy is made for the present in all the relations of life, in her family, in the community, and in the church; but the Lord has promised to fill all these places. The Lord has done it, and may we all kiss his hand, though it falls heavily. May the Lord sweetly remember her lonely companion, with whom she had shared the trials and joys of this life a little more than threescore years. May he bind up the broken-hearted family; and while they miss her counsel and presence, remember that her christian life was pleasant. We would extend our heartfelt sympathy to the bereaved.

The deceased leaves four sisters, two brothers, one son, three daughters and a number of grandchildren, with the church, to mourn, but not without hope.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

POETRY.

ABSENT FROM THE BODY.

"We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord."—2 Cor. v. 8.

FREED from the world's contaminating breath,
From sin corrupting, and the realms of death,
My spirit, languishing, would soar away,
In realms of light to spend an endless day.

Where hideous forms no longer vex the soul,
Far hence from where these floods of evil roll,
Clad in his glorious robe of righteousness,
In sweet felicity be blessed, and bless.
Holy, from every stain of sin set free,
Washed in that stream which flows from Calvary,
In happiness supreme him to adore,
And sin nor suffer never, nevermore.

G. E. M.

A PRAYER.

The storm clouds gather o'er my head,
And threaten to destroy: Lord Jesus, come; Subdue the tempest's rage; say Peace;
be still.
Of old thou walkedst on the swelling sea,
To save thy trembling Peter from his fears,
And soon the angry waves were hushed to calm;
So now one word from thy almighty lips
Will spread tranquility. O speak that word!

Or, if I ever must be tossed about Upon life's billowy ocean, steer my bark
In safety to that peaceful harbor, where Nor storm nor tempest can assail it more.
O purge me from all sin; and to this end
Plunge me into that potent, cleansing fount
Of thy atoning blood, and make me white—
White as the virgin snows on Hermon's brow, Unfouled by human foot—and I am clean.
Upon a weary wanderer bestow
A token of that love which brought thee down

From highest bliss, to suffer, bleed and die;
This shall dissolve my adamant heart,
And lift my earth-bound spirit up awhile to joys supernal—happy, welcome change.
As waits the servant for his lord's commands,

So may I listen, Jesus, for thy voice,
And humbly follow thee. When thou at last

Thy jewels shalt collect, then in thy crown

O may I shine for aye, a trophy bright
Of thy redeeming, never-dying love!
And with immortal lungs loud sing thy praise

In yonder mansions of eternal day,
Where sweet, unruffled calm each breast pervades.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE FIVE TALENTS.

In my last I sought to impress the comforting assurance that God's gracious gifts of spiritual life and its accompanying talents were sure to bring forth exact and implicit fruits in proportion to the measure of his design in the talents given. I desire now to notice a few particulars, for I cannot speak of all the excellencies of the five talents.

It will be remembered that at the return of the lord of those servants they were called to a reckoning; and beginning with him who had received five talents, it was discovered that he had gained five talents more; and his lord said unto him, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things: enter thou into the joy of thy lord." As I intimated before that the one-talented servant was but a natural man, without the new birth, presented the child of God after the new birth, or the gift of eternal life, I now feel to apply the lesson to the ministry possessing five talents. The talents, or gifts of grace, with all their increase, are totally dependent upon the vitality, the intrinsic worth, and the full excellency in wealth-increasing capacities, of which those talents are not only capable, but of which they are positively endowed. Every minister of Christ is supposed to possess some gifts in addition (though not superior) to the private members of the church. "And there was also a strife among them [the apostles], which of them should be accounted the greatest. And he said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve. For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? is not he that sitteth at meat? but I am among you as he that serveth."—Luke xxii. 24-27. Thus Jesus showed that each true servant, when under the correcting and humiliating influence of his gift of spiritual discernment, will so behave himself orderly, quietly, lovingly and faithfully; and there is no rule of judgment by which a true minister of Christ is to be known or recognized but by both the spirit and the order of his behavior before the saints. Paul recognizes obedience as the evidence of true service; for he said to the Roman brethren (vi. 16), "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?" He does not intimate that it was a free agency choice, for he would not contradict himself; for, speaking of the priesthood, he said, "No man taketh this honor unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron."—Heb. v. 4. Nor does Jesus intimate that any talent or gift of God is obtainable, but freely given. "And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils: freely ye have received, freely give."—Matt. x. 7, 8. Nor does he grant indulgences or excuse for neglect of faithful discharge of duty. He said, "Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven."—Matt. v. 19, 20. Space forbids a full explanation of the relation of these commandments to the subject. Suffice it to say that they cannot be taught to the carnal, unregenerate mind; but their counterpart, or laws of Zion spiritually, written in the hearts of God's people, is by Christ working in them both taught and fulfilled, not only in the spirit, but in the outward manifestation also. This is the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which alone can fulfill his commandments. Every gift, every grace, every talent, is thus made by virtue of its divine origin to bring forth in the hand of its receiver double at the Lord's hand; and no former condition is considered, not even all our sins, as a cause for bestowing it. It comes, graciously bearing the impress of God's gift, of God's keeping, and of God's prospering both the gift and the receiver. Without this experience, without this faith, without this power, there is no obedience, there is no evidence of an unwritten law, no fruit of the Spirit, no increase of talents. This applies to the public ministry in speaking, as well as to the saints at large in hearing.

While Jesus taught that any who would break the least commandment, and teach men so, should be called the least in the kingdom of God, he had reference to the decision that the mind of Christ would make; just as Paul said, "We have the mind of Christ."—1 Cor. ii. 16. See also verses 14, 15: "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him? But we have the mind of Christ." It is only by this mind that true judgment can be rendered. He alone stands justified before the judgment seat of Christ who is led by it into paths of obedience; and so powerful is this mind that it leads the minister of Christ perforce of its own power when and where Jesus has work for him to do. It is under no absolute control outside of itself and its sender, Jesus. "The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets."—1 Cor. xiv. 32. Each servant of Christ in the church is appointed to his own special place, without interfering with any other servant's office. When carnal-minded, self-advancing arrogance takes possession of a man, and he begins to horn and push his way into favor, by flattery or guile, seeking to ingratiate himself into the favor of the brethren by commenting lightly or sneeringly upon the gifts of other ministers, it needs but a small measure of the gift of discernment of spirits to discover a very weak place in that man's faith or order, or perhaps both. I recall the remarks of a certain man who left us years ago, who when reporting on the preaching of another minister seemed to admit that he did very well at a certain time; but he could not suppress a sneering remark that that minister's preaching hardly ever had anything in it. Another one commented in a certain association against one of his own associate brethren, "O, well, you know he is soft." Can such language come from the Spirit of Christ? Surely not. It originates in carnal nature, and either speaks emphatically that the speaker is wholly ignorant of the mind of Christ, or is not under its present hallowed influence. I care not even if that man be myself; in fact, I do not care to hear a man preach who will seek to please me, unless his pleasure and mine are equally engaged in the sweetness of truth. When we speak we should only be exercised by the love of the truth, and remember that we cannot obtain that love; but we receive it only as God's gracious gift, and that so we are mutually benefited. I cannot compromise the truth, the peace nor the order of the church of God; for it is the pillar upon which he inscribes his own blessed truth, built up as a perpetual monument in all its essential forms, to stand forever.

There may be some variety in the local interests and special personalities of local bodies, but there are few things in which there are any sectional allowances to be made. Each church should receive God's graces, or special talents, for profit, with a mind free from personal prejudice or preferment, seeking only the best gifts. I assert that if each saint feels the divine spirit of preferring his brother before himself there can be no strife, except that of pleasure in the promotion of each other's joys. The service or use of the many or few talents is just as essential in the church, the few as the many. With this discernment of the needs of the church there must be harmony and order in that body. It ought not to enter the mind of any saint of God that some special exception from the order of the church for their special benefit should be made; indeed, that soul may have grave reasons to doubt his love for God if he can expect such special favor. As the ministry is supposed to possess much power in influence for good or evil, how essential that he should inquire if any of the talents he has received of God have such privileges accorded to him. Can he set an example against the peace of Zion by listening to comments of praise for himself, and censure for his brother in the ministry? I am happy that I know of no such condition in our little association or fellowship. Not that I think that our brethren are better by nature than distant brethren where such evils exist, but that we have experienced the mild hand of God in the blessings we thus receive; and I am only made to rejoice that even I, with all my unworthiness, can meet them all in peace, love and fellowship.

Yours in love,

A. B. BREES.

MOUNT MORIAH.

DEAR BROTHER IN A PRECIOUS CHRIST:—When last I heard of your welfare I judged you were one of whom the Lord is the Shepherd. You appeared to be lying down in green pastures, having grateful remembrances of our Shepherd's tender care, and of his forbearance and wondrous mercy to your soul. It is truly astonishing how great, abundant and constant is the grace of God to poor sinners. I often sing,
"Without thy sweet mercy I could not live here;
Sin soon would reduce me to utter despair;

But through thy free goodness my spirits revive,
And he that first made me still keeps me alive."

How oft, as a wayward, foolish sheep, I have wandered and strayed from the fields of Boaz (Ruth ii. 8); and, or ever I have been aware, I have come into desolate wastes, and have stumbled upon the dark mountains.

—Jer. xiii. 16. In these mountains, and amidst the darkness, my fearful, fainting heart could find no food. Often I stumbled, and many a fall I received, till I have been bruised and pained and ready to die; but in my woeful state I have remembered the days that were past, and our Shepherd's tender care. Then the bleatings of my anguished heart have been, "I have gone astray like a lost sheep. Seek thy servant; for I do not forget thy commandments." Then also it has been mine to prove the unchangeable mercy and love of our God, and I have been enabled to sing, "He restoreth my soul; he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil; for thou art with me: thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." Sheep like to feed upon the mountains. Of old the church used to sing, "Until the day break, and the shadows flee away, I will get me to the mountain of myrrh, and to the hill of frankincense."—Song iv. 6. There, under the types, in their worship in the holy mount at Jerusalem, they tasted the bitter and the sweet. So it is to-day, dear brother. Bitter is our sinfulness; but sweet, most sweet, is the mercy and salvation of our God. The Lord our Shepherd says, "I will feed them in a good pasture, and upon the high mountains of Israel shall their fold be: there shall they lie in a good fold, and in a fat pasture shall they feed upon the mountains of Israel. I will feed my flock, and I will cause them to lie down, saith the Lord God." Again, "I will make them and the places round about my hill a blessing; and I will cause the shower to come down in his season; there shall be showers of blessing."—Ezekiel xxxiv. The whole chapter is very precious. I have found, dear brother, feeding upon the mountains to be very healthful. Mountain air, a fat pasture, with a good fold, and the constant ministrations of the good Shepherd, who keepeth Israel, and who never slumbers nor sleeps, is that which my soul has oft experienced, and has made a poor sinner like me to be filled with grateful praises to our Beloved. O that I may ever listen to his voice. May my heart never be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, as it was with Israel long ago in the time of provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderness; but in my very soul I say, "Draw me; we will run after thee." I have been feeding upon the mountains; and as I know your soul craves the green pastures of the love and mercy and grace of God, let us then ascend to the mountains. Our shepherd is there, and he will feed his flock like a shepherd. He carries the lambs in his bosom, and gently leads those that are with young. I have been in times past in desert wilds, where nothing but desolation prevails. Here I should have famished; but Jehovah, the Shepherd of Israel, sought and found a wandering one, and led me forth by the right way. I know from our former companionship, when we communed with one another and were sad, that you are no stranger to the waste, howling wilderness, wherein hungry and thirsty we fainted by the way. We had no wisdom nor might to find the way out, nor to make the wilderness rejoice and blossom as the rose; but we have ever proved, though in dreary deserts we have been, that salvation is of the Lord.

Looking into Genesis xxii., Mount Moriah appears in our view. Wonderful transactions have taken place in this mountain. Indeed, it is in this very mountain that the Lord of the mountain, the Lord of hosts, has made unto all people "a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined."—Isa. xxv. 6. We shall certainly then find a fat pasture here upon this, one of the mountains of Israel. As we are about to begin our journey to the land of Moriah there is a longing in my soul that the Holy Ghost, who guides the flock into all truth and takes of the things of Jesus and shows them unto us, would so favor us that in the spirit we may be blessed to walk in the footsteps of the flock, and with the sheep of old time eat the same spiritual meat and drink the same spiritual drink. O thou who art the Shepherd of Israel, cause us while in this mountain to walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham; for unless sustained by thee, dear Lord, our faith will fail, and we shall not be able spiritually to follow Abraham in his ascent of this mount of the Lord. O Jesus, author and finisher of faith, increase our faith. Then we shall not stagger through unbelief; but favored with the evidences that we are thine, the people of thy pasture and the sheep of thy hand, our journey and stay in Mount Moriah shall be nourishing and comforting to our souls.

It seems to me, dear brother, that it must have been a wonderful and trying night when "God did tempt Abraham, and said unto him, Abraham: and he said, Behold, here I am. And he said, Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." Do you think that he slept the remainder of that night? How many things he had to take into account; and his final accounting is a miracle of the grace of God. Let us consider Abraham upon his bed that night. You remember how Isaac was given to Abraham by promise. Abraham believed God, and "against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, So shall thy seed be. And being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body now dead, when he was about a hundred years old, neither yet the deadness of Sarah's womb: he staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God; and being fully persuaded, that what he had promised, he was able also to perform."—Romans iv. 18-21. "Through faith also Sarah herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged him faithful who had promised."—Heb. xi. 11. How Abraham and Sarah loved their son, their only son Isaac! We dearly love our children; and you remember when you have been bereaved, and I remember times of bereavement also. Did it feel that our very hearts were torn and lacerated when our children died? Only the affectionate parent can know of these pangs. Our gracious God has shown us the strength of his grace, supporting and comforting us in our bereavements. The Lord said in that night, "Abraham: and he said, Behold, here I am." Ready to hear what God the Lord will speak. "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." Must this not have been an astounding and staggering communication to Abraham? What a trial! Did Abraham kick against this, and begin to murmur and complain? Did he arise in rebellion and rage against the commandment of the Lord, as severe, unreasonable and cruel, and contrary to nature that a parent should take the life and burn to ashes his son, his only son, whom he loved? Did he say, I cannot, I will not, do this? Or did he as one stupefied, unfeelingly, without a thought, arise and go to the place and offer up his son? No; that was not the way. How then? Why, there lay Abraham during those hours of the night. "The word of the Lord tried him."—Psalm cv. 19. It was a night of the trial of his faith. He was put in a hot fire. Let us linger awhile around Abraham's tent. There is good, green pasture for the tried ones of the flock. My soul would feed upon just such pasture as grows in places like this. O thou Holy Spirit, the Comforter of the blood-bought flock, lead us and feed us in this pasture, and cause us to eat the Plant of renown; then we shall not be consumed with hunger in the land.—Ezekiel xxxiv. 29. Yes, there is no question but that Abraham found that night to be a burning furnace to his soul; and he could say with the apostle, and with you, dear brother, and I hope I also can say, "Our God is a consuming fire."—Heb. xii. 29. "He is like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap: and he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver: and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness."—Malachi iii. 2, 3. Abraham loved his son, his only son Isaac. Often had Abraham and Sarah been filled with sacred laughter over their only son. He was their heart's delight. "Sarah said, God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me. And she said, Who would have said unto Abraham, that Sarah should have given children suck? for I have borne him a son in his old age."—Gen. xxi. 6, 7. Now the voice of the Lord says, "Offer him up as a burnt offering." O! if he had been taken with a sickness, and had died, that had been a sore trial. Or had he been slain by the hand of a cruel murderer, that had been a painful stroke. But the commandment of the Lord is, "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." Abraham's own hand must do the deed. He might say, I would not willfully hurt one hair of his head. When he is hurt I am pained; when he is sorrowful my heart is moved for him. I would shield him from every evil. My own body should be his defense; yea, my life I would yield up for the sake of my son, my only son Isaac, whom I love. Now the Lord my God, who promised him and gave him to me, commands me with mine own hand to take the life of my delightful one, and offer him for a burnt offering. Can I put to grief my dear son? Can my hand be stretched forth to pour out his life's blood upon the altar? Can I burn his pleasant form, his body, to ashes? Does the Lord require this at my hands? This is rather a warm place to be in, dear brother; quite a testing place. Which is the stronger, his natural parental love or his love to his God? Might not a parent's heart say, This is contrary to nature; how can I slay my darling child? Might not questioning arise, and misgivings abound, as to whether Jehovah still loves me? Innumerable natural reasonings would block the way of Abraham's obedience to his God. We know, my brother, by bitter experience that the flesh is contrary to the Spirit.—Gal. v. 17. Did Abraham walk after the flesh? Did he say, My heart as a parent forbids my obedience to God; I cannot, I will not, do this thing? Whatever may have been the exercises of his soul, we know that his love to his God was supreme. Many waters cannot quench, neither can the floods drown, the love of God shed abroad in the heart of a poor sinner. Our dear Savior speaks about giving up for his sake, and the kingdom of God's sake, our houses, brethren and sisters, father and mother, wife or children. How can such a thing be done? Then consider, dear brother, what Abraham was called upon to do to his beloved son. What a fire Abraham was in! Lovest thou me more than thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest? What answer did the heart of Abraham return? Doubtlessly the same as the apostle Peter, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee."—Luke xxi. 17. Wonderful and sovereign had been the manifestations of Jehovah's love to Abraham. God called him alone, and blessed him. He caused him to wander from his father's house, and had from time to time most signally favored him above all other men upon the face of the earth.

"High beyond imagination is the love of God to man;
Far too deep for human reason, fathom that it never can;
Love eternal richly dwells in Christ the Lamb."

We sometimes sing very easily,

"Were all the realms of nature mine,
That were a present far too small;
Love so amazing, so divine, Demands my life, my soul, my all."

Abraham is put to the test. He loved his child. The Lord reminded him of this. But he loved the Lord his God more than all. God loved Abraham with an everlasting love, and with cords of loving-kindness had drawn him to himself; and though the path be trying, though in the way of the commandments of his God the sacrifice is great, though it cost even to offer up his beloved son Isaac, he felt he must obey the God whom he loved. In his heart he said, I will go into the land of Moriah, and sacrifice unto the Lord my son, my only son Isaac, whom I love. The Lord "is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he."—Deut. xxxii. 3. The commandment of the Lord was pure, and the obedience required of Abraham right and holy in the eyes of the high and holy One that inhabiteth eternity. Although Abraham that night had to endure this fiery ordeal, the sacrificing of his beloved son was but a small part of the burning fiery furnace that the word of the Lord had cast him into. After all his wrestlings between his love as a parent to his dear son, and his love to the Lord his God, he is willing and ready out of love to God to even sacrifice Isaac as a burnt offering at the commandment of the everlasting God. But there were many other things that he had to take into account that night, and which proved a hot fire for the trial of his faith; and we shall see, beloved brother, that the trial of his faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, was found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ; whom having not seen he loved; in whom, though he saw him not, yet believing, he rejoiced with joy unspeakable and full of glory.—1 Peter i. 7, 8; John viii. 56. God had said on a previous night, long years ago, as he brought him forth of his tent, "Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be. And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness."—Gen. xv. 5, 6. Afterward the Lord expressly told him, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called."—Gen. xxi. 12. Now Abraham is called to go forth and sacrifice this very Isaac a burnt offering unto the Lord. The Lord had refused Ishmael as the accounted seed of Abraham, and had said, "My covenant will I establish with Isaac, which Sarah shall bear unto thee at the set time in the next year."—Gen. xvii. 21. How then is this to be fulfilled when Isaac is sacrificed a burnt offering unto God? Are all his soul's expectations, wrapped up in Isaac, to come to nothing? Is he to go childless, and to have no son for his heir? Natural reasoning and his fatherly affection might say, It must be a mistake. Don't go; don't offer up Isaac for a burnt offering. If you do all your hopes are blasted. Where is your hope of any seed? Has not God said, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called?" Abraham's faith was in the fire. Then again God had said, "Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates."—Gen. xv. 18. He gave Abraham none inheritance therein, "no, not so much as to set his foot on: yet he promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child."—Acts vii. 5. Is this to be a failure also? The word of the Lord, "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of," sets everything on fire, and threatens desolation to all the hopes of Abraham, the friend of God. "The word of the Lord tried him."—Psalm cv. Our dear Redeemer saith, "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you."—John xv. 14. What a test God is subjecting his friend Abraham to! Will Abraham's friendship to God endure such a trial? Will it survive, and come forth of the fire? Will he, can he, do whatsoever God has commanded him? Let us look again into that tent, and see, with the eyes of our understanding enlightened, how Abraham endures the fire. What gracious and glorious revelations the Lord had given him; and the crowning glory of all was the covenant and promise that in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed. This seed, we are told, was Christ. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He [God] saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ."—

Gal. iii. 16. The day of Christ Abraham saw by faith, and was glad.—John viii. 56. This covenant, that Christ should come of the seed of Abraham, the Lord had confirmed; and God had said, "My covenant will I establish with Isaac."—Gen. xvii. 21. But after all this God is saying, "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of." Will not this blast the whole, and overturn all that God has declared to be the counsel of his own will? Faith is in a hot place. Carnal reason, what solution hast thou for all this? There upon a mountain, at the commandment of God, is Isaac offered up a burnt offering, consumed in the fire, reduced to ashes. Look into those ashes; and what can all human wisdom do? All creature, earthly thought would be, while contemplating those ashes of the beloved Isaac, All is hopeless now! Tossed about with carnal reasonings and blind unbelief, Abraham in the night might say, Can it be that I have believed in vain? Is all my gladness of heart, in hope that Christ should come through Isaac, a myth, an hallucination of my depraved imagination? Have I misunderstood, misinterpreted, the revelations of the Lord? Is this commandment to offer up my son for a burnt offering in order to dispel my delusions? O! is all to be blasted? Are all my hopes in Isaac in vain? Is there to be no Christ to come into the world to save sinners? Are the promises forfeited? Is the blessing withdrawn? Is the covenant disannulled? Is it all to consume away, all to end in the ashes of my son, my only son Isaac, whom I love? A hot place this for the trial of faith. Does the word of the Lord, "Take now thy son," &c., burn up the faith of Abraham? O no; but it burns up all carnal reasonings, all creature wisdom, all earthly devices and human power. They cannot abide; they cannot bring forth salvation in such a hot furnace as the commandment of the Lord has cast Abraham into. All creature might and wisdom sees nothing but utter ruin, a total disaster of the promises, of the inheritance, of the blessing, of the covenant, of salvation in the coming Christ, if Isaac is to be sacrificed a burnt offering unto the Lord. All is reduced to ashes, which the winds shall chase away. But what is faith's solution—that faith of the operation of God in the heart of Abraham? How is Abraham exercised by this precious faith? The faith of God's elect is of heavenly origin. "It is the gift of God."—Eph. ii. 4. It stands not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.—1 Cor. ii. 5. It is of the operation of God, "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." This precious gift of faith in the heart of Abraham exercised him

THE KINSMAN REDEEMER.

"AND now it is true that I am thy near kinsman; howbeit there is a kinsman nearer than I."—Ruth iii. 12.

In his communication on page 345, current volume of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, our esteemed brother H. Cox refers to us the request of sister Ashbourne for a comment on the subject embraced in this text. He adds a desire for the consideration of the subject of the right of redemption as defined in Leviticus xxv. It will be understood that our compliance with this suggestion is not upon the ground that we assume a clearer comprehension of the subject than his own, but in accordance with his wish we present such thoughts as are given us upon the divinely taught doctrine of redemption. It is not so important to us that the letter of that typical law should be familiar to our memory, as that its antitypical significance should bear witness of Jesus in our own experience. Only as we see Jesus in this, or any other portion of the revealed word, can it be of real profit to us.

For the right interpretation of the subject embraced in the text, it is needful that the true meaning of the word "redemption" should be carefully considered. In a general sense it is applied to the act of buying again any property which has been sold. This is the literal meaning of the word. In the Scriptures this term is used figuratively in two general applications. In the first, and most important sense, it is used to designate that ransom of the people of God from their sins, in which Jesus is revealed as the only and omnipotent Redeemer. That redemption is forever accomplished by the victorious sacrifice of our Lord, in which he made an end of transgression by the one offering of himself without spot to God. The sufficiency of that Redemption price was acknowledged by divine justice in the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. So Paul preached the blotting out of the handwriting of ordinances which excluded the Gentiles from the revelation of divine grace, when on Mars hill he declared the gospel to the Greeks, saying, "And the times of this ignorance God winked at, but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent; because he hath appointed a day, in the which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained, whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead."—Acts xvii. 30, 31. This redemption includes every member of the body of which Christ Jesus is the head. Nothing can ever be added to it, neither can one of the members thus redeemed ever need further redemption from the bondage of sin and death. It is in consideration of this complete redemption that Paul says, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death."—Rom. viii. 1, 2. It is evident that there can be no obligation resting upon the saints to render obedience to that law from which they have been thus made free. And it is equally clear that they were condemned under the law before they were made free from its authority by the law of the Spirit of life. In no other way can there be any deliverance from condemnation but through that redemption which is in Christ. In this sense there is no more provision of redemption, neither is it possible that the chosen subjects of salvation should ever need its benefit. Thus they are complete in him. But there is still the perfect law of liberty established forever in the gospel kingdom of our Lord Jesus. His saints are not without law to God, but under the law to Christ.—1 Cor. ix. 21. This is the holy principle which abides in them, causing them to love righteousness and abhor iniquity. Having received this seal of the Spirit unto the day of redemption, they do not need the terrors of Sinai, nor yet the fear of death, to move them to hate sin and follow after righteousness. They are already redeemed from that bondage of fear by the full atonement of him who died for their offenses, and was raised again for their justification. Now they only experience the joy of liberty when they can walk in newness of life, yielding their members servants unto righteousness. When left to follow the direction of their own minds, the redeemed saints always sell themselves for nought into the service of sin against the King of righteousness to whom their allegiance is now due. From this bondage they must be redeemed by the repeated exhibition of the unchanging love and mercy of their mighty Redeemer. It is in this redemption that we see the antitypical significance of the record in our text. There can be no question that this whole book of Ruth clearly testifies the gospel of Jesus Christ as the kinsman by whom his people are saved from their sins. When the Spirit of truth takes and shows this record as the witness of eternal salvation unto the Zion of our God, Boaz clearly typifies the King of righteousness, who is the only Redeemer of his chosen people. Ruth is also a lively type of the church for whose salvation from sin our Lord Jesus gave himself a ransom. But there is a limit to the application of the figure, as there must be a particular sense in which the same truth is declared in every figure which is used by inspired servants of our God.

There is deep significance in the fact that the relationship between Boaz and Ruth was not by natural ties of consanguinity. While Boaz was an eminent man among the children of Israel, Ruth was a woman of Moab, whose marriage to the son of Naomi was the only tie which bound her to the people of God's election. Her husband being dead, it could not be upon that ground that she was entitled to the favor of Boaz. It was contrary to the commandment of the Lord that these sons of Naomi should have taken wives of the daughters of Moab, among whom they sojourned. It was in this way that Solomon was guilty of sin against God.—See 1 Kings xi. Yet it was clearly included in the purpose of God that in every particular the circumstances written in this book should come to pass exactly as they did. Through this very marriage of Boaz to the Moabite widow (Ruth) is traced the lineage of David, and the ancestry of Joseph and Mary. Can any one who believes the revelation which is given in the Scriptures, deny that this incident was before appointed in the eternal purpose of God? Doubtless Naomi spoke her feelings truly when she said, "Call me not Naomi [Pleasant], call me Mara [Bitter]; for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me. I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me home again empty; why then call ye me Naomi, seeing the Lord hath testified against me, and the Almighty hath afflicted me?" Reason could see nothing in the whole experience but the most bitter sorrow and distress. The tribulation to which the saints are subjected in the world often leads them to the same mournful conclusion. Looking at the things which are seen, they constantly find evidences that their trust in the Lord is all a delusion. Only by faith is their darkness made light before them. But there is a more comprehensive sense in which the gospel is preached in this record. Not only does the individual experience of the subjects of divine grace find its expression here, but the glorious grace of God is revealed as embracing his election among the Gentiles. While Naomi fitly represents Jerusalem which is above and free, as the mother of all the saints, the peculiar afflictions to which she was subjected, and the joyful fruit of all her sufferings, well portray the manifestation of the grace of God bringing in the Gentiles in the full freedom and fellowship of the sons of God. Indeed, it is one assurance of the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, that the whole history of the church of God as therein given is the very expression of the individual experience of those who are led by the Spirit of God.

As Ruth was by nature an alien from the commonwealth of Israel, so by nature every subject of that grace which is revealed in Jesus is an alien from the covenants of promise, and a child of wrath, even as others. So far is this wonderful grace from being dependent upon any legal conditions, that not even those natural Israelites (to whom the Mosaic law was given) could receive the manifestations of the forgiveness of their sins so long as they had any hope of acceptance by the works of that law. Much less could there be any possibility that a Gentile, who was excluded from the benefits contained in that legal covenant, could attain favor by voluntary compliance with its requirements as enjoined upon the children of Israel. Yet it was through this transgression of the sons of Naomi that Ruth was brought into the relationship by which she was made to love the mother and the people of her husband. In no other way could she have been made the mother of Obed, and thus included in the lineage of the ancestry of David. Neither Ruth nor Naomi could see the purpose of God in their deep poverty, and the severe bereavement which they were called to endure. So far as the record is given there was nothing to console these two desolate widows but the deep love by which they were united. The very unity of their distress confirmed the bond which rendered it impossible that they should be separated. So, in the antitypical relationship of Christ and his church, the sacred privilege is given to the chosen subjects of his love that they may be partakers of the sufferings through which their Redeemer was made perfect as the lawfully qualified Kinsman whose right it is to redeem his bride from legal condemnation. Finite intelligence has never fathomed the mystery of the origin of this great love wherewith God loved his people, even when they were dead in sins; by reason of which he hath quickened them together with their living Head. It can be traced no further than the revelation which he has given. It was even so, because it seemed good in the sight of the eternal Father. Therefore Paul well says, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places [things] in Christ, according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love; having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, to the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved."—Eph. i. 3-6. In nothing is this blessing more clearly manifest as resting upon any sinner, than in the fervent love which embraces those in whom the Spirit of Christ is seen to dwell.

As the only relation in which Ruth was interested in the covenant given to Abraham was by virtue of her marriage to the son of Naomi, by which she was brought into the family with her mother-in-law, to whom she was so devoted, so it is by the bond of the eternal covenant, in which infinite love embraced the election of grace, that the chosen vessels of mercy were manifested as the church and bride in union with their Redeemer. The unsearchable mystery of this glorious purpose of God is faintly shown in the unexplained righteousness of the bringing in of this Moabite woman as partaker in the blessing bestowed exclusively upon Israel. It must not be supposed that there is any mistake or oversight in the fact that there is not even an intimation of any explanation of this apparent inconsistency. It is one of those wonderful secret things, of which it is written that they belong unto the Lord our God, while only those things which are revealed belong unto us and our children forever, that we may do all the words which are enjoined upon us.—Deut. xxix. 29. This is precisely the mystery concealing the origin of the love of God to his people when they were alienated and enemies in their mind by wicked works. As the poverty and bondage of Ruth were cancelled and abolished by the redemption which was accomplished by Boaz, so the whole debt of sin and condemnation is blotted out, with the handwriting of ordinances which was against his people, by the perfect redemption that is in Christ Jesus. And as Naomi was included in the blessing which came to Ruth, so the church of the saints under the prophetic dispensation was included in the blessing which is more clearly revealed under the gospel dispensation. In this sense, God has reserved for the saints in the gospel day some better thing than those shadows which were revealed under the dispensation before the coming of Jesus as God manifest in the flesh for the deliverance of Israel. While the old saints rejoiced in the assurance of faith by which they saw the day of our Lord yet to come, they beheld only as in a shadowy figure that glory which shines in the open revelation of gospel grace in the face of our risen Savior. While Naomi represents the church under the legal dispensation, and her poverty and desolation fitly portrays the mournful condition of those who saw the utter hopelessness of attaining to justification by the works of the law, in the rich blessing bestowed upon Ruth there is a revelation of the liberty of the sons of God under the gospel dispensation. The signification of the names of these women confirms the application of the figure to the two dispensations. "Naomi" is translated "beautiful, agreeable, pleasant;" and such was the favored state of that nation to whom the Lord gave the covenant of legal ordinances. No other people was ever so highly blessed of the Lord in their temporal circumstances. In obedience to the law which was enjoined upon them they were assured of all the benefits of earth, and of the protection of the Lord in the enjoyment of the fruit of their labors. Thus was the name "Naomi" justly applicable to them as the nation whom God had chosen as his peculiar people. Yet the utter desolation of the widowed and childless exile accurately answers to the miserable condition to which that natural people was reduced in departing from the precepts which were written in that law under which they were held. In this distress the name of this once favored nation might well be "Mara" (Bitterness); for that law which should have been their life, was become by transgression death unto them. Under that covenant the election of grace was involved in the same condemnation which made the whole nation of Israel desolate. In Ruth is presented the church as delivered from legal bondage and condemnation by the perfect redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Her name signifies "satisfied," and also "the perfection of beauty." Only as seen by faith in the likeness of her Redeemer does this name appear to belong to the church which embraces all the subjects of redeeming grace. In themselves each member of this redeemed family must ever confess, "I am black;" "For I know that in me, (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing." From this bondage of corruption there is no deliverance by any willing or works of the condemned sinner. There could be no hope of salvation for one in this condition but that there was provided by the love of God a strong Redeemer, who holds the right to intervene for the salvation of this destitute and lost sinner. The tie of kindred by which he holds this right dates back from the very beginning, long before the subject of infinite grace was personally manifest in the flesh. So Boaz was the near kinsman of Naomi, and through her the rightful redeemer of Ruth even when she was still a maiden of Maob. Her ignorance of him in no wise prevented the development of the purpose of God that she should be the subject of his favor. All the bereavement of Naomi and Ruth was essentially needful to the manifestation of the great favor which God had prepared for them in their kinsman redeemer. But not all their suffering added one mite to the redemption which came to them; neither was Boaz made a near kinsman by all their affliction. In the application of this circumstance to the redemption of the spiritual Israel, it may be that the "nearer kinsman" of whom Boaz obtained the release of his previous right of redemption, represents the infinite justice of God, which must be satisfied before the condemned people of God could be redeemed by their spiritual Boaz. But it must be observed that the kindred tie was the same before as after the right of the nearer kinsman was purchased by Boaz. So the life relationship in which Christ Jesus is identified with his saints is no closer since than before he ransomed them from the death into which they were sunk by their sins. It should never be forgotten that the justice of God is magnified in the salvation which is revealed in Jesus no less than infinite love and mercy. Boaz did not violate the just claim of the nearer kinsman of Naomi when he redeemed her and her family from poverty and debt. He took witnesses that he proceeded according to the requirements of recognized law. So, our Kinsman Redeemer satisfied the utmost jot and tittle of the demands of infinite justice in the salvation of his people from their sins.

Fully conscious of the fact that we have but glanced at the important doctrine of redemption, to which our attention was invited by brother Cox, we must leave the subject for the present; and for further consideration of the theme we would direct our esteemed brother to the letter of Elder J. Beeman, on page 365, current volume of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

to take into account many glorious things embraced in the doctrine of God our Savior. You remember, my dear brother, how the apostle Paul speaks of faith, saying, "The righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise, Say not in thine heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, to bring Christ down from above): or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead). But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, the word of faith, which we preach."—Rom. x. 6-11.

Abraham believed in Jehovah's immutability; that the promises of God in Christ Jesus are yea, and in him amen, and never were forfeited yet. He believed that the Lord "is in one mind, and who can turn him?"—Job xxiii. 13. "His covenant he will not break, nor alter the word that is gone forth out of his lips."—Psa. lxxxix. 34. The thoughts of his heart stand fast to all generations.—Psa. xxxiii. 11. We believe that Abraham by faith saw Christ's day and was glad; that he was the surety of the everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure.—2 Samuel xxiii. 5. Christ was to come of the seed of Abraham. It was through Isaac that the Savior was to come. But how can faith endure this fire of the word of the Lord, commanding Abraham to offer Isaac for a burnt offering? O faith! what didst thou say in the heart of Abraham that night? Faith has taken all things into account. It has mused upon the promises, the blessing, the covenant of God, who is without variableness or shadow of turning. It has viewed Isaac slain upon the altar, made a burnt offering, his body consumed, reduced to ashes. Behold, my dear brother, Abraham's faith emerging from this fiery trial bright and glorious, radiant in hope, unto the praise and honor and glory of God! Faith made up the account, and said in Abraham's heart, The promises of God cannot fail.—Joshua xxi. 45. They are sure to all the seed.—Rom. iv. 16. The blessing of God cannot be reversed.—Num. xxiii. 20. The counsel of the Lord must stand.—Isa. xli. 10. His covenant he will never break.—Psalm lxxxix. 28-34. It is ordered in all things and sure.—2 Samuel xxiii. 5. God cannot lie. Christ's day I see, and my heart is glad.—John viii. 56. Christ must come to save his people from their sins. Isaac must live, for God has said, "In Isaac shall thy seed [which is Christ—Gal. iii. 16] be called." "God is able to raise him up, even from the dead."—Heb. xi. 19. The morning breaketh; I will arise, and go into the land of Moriah, and offer up for a burnt offering my son, mine only son Isaac, whom I love; for God shall raise him up even from the dead. O ye modern Sadducees, look into those ashes of Isaac, and what will you say? Do you say it is a thing incredible with you that God should raise him up even from the dead? Begone, for faith is nigh in the heart of the believer, saying that Christ descended and then ascended. Christ is risen from the dead, and is become the first fruits of them that slept.—1 Cor. xv. We believe, and our hearts find everlasting consolation in the faith, that our bodies shall come forth in the resurrection incorruptible, immortal and glorious.—Phil. iii. 21. For our bodies are the Lord's; they are the members of Christ. "And God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us by his own power."—1 Cor. vi. 13-20.

Well, my dear brother, we are yet around the borders of Abraham's tent. I hope you have been feeding. My soul has eaten some morsels that tasted like Jesus, the Plant of renown.—Ezekiel xxxiv. 29. Mount Moriah is yet off three days' journey. I leave thee for awhile to lie down in this pasture, to meditate, to chew the cud. The trial of faith portrayed in Abraham is in measure that which is known in the pathway of all who walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham. When we meet again let us quicken our steps and follow after Abraham; for his faith was not a dead faith. I feel it will be a blessed pasture to feed in when we arrive at the mount, and see "how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect; and the Scripture was fulfilled which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness: and he was called the Friend of God."—James ii. 21-23.

With affectionate remembrance of you in Jesus, I am, I hope, your brother in the fellowship of the gospel,

FRED. W. KEENE.

BERLIN, Md., Nov. 17, 1863.

DEAR BROTHER WOOLFORD:—In accordance with a promise made your daughter, I will make the attempt to write you. She told me you were very fond of receiving letters; but that in consequence of your failing sight you could not answer them. I know not that I can interest you in any respect; surely not in style and diction; but there is one (and only one) subject which if nothing I can say would prove interesting to you, I know that subject itself is the most interesting to you, and to all the dear children of God, of any that can be named in this world. That subject is Christ. O what sweetness is in that name! It is the only name under heaven given among men whereby we, poor, lost, condemned sinners, must be saved. And if we can only say that we have Christ in us the hope of glory, then indeed it becomes so sweet. Jesus is our only hope of salvation; and when we contemplate all the fullness that dwells in him, what tools we would be to want anything better. He is a Savior every way, exactly suited to our needs. We are polluted by sin, but his blood is able to wash us and make us whiter than snow. We are blind, but he can open our blind eyes. We are dead in trespasses and sins, but, blessed be his holy name, he can raise the dead. We have an evil, corrupt, wicked and deceitful heart, but he has promised to give us a new heart. In short, there is no depth of depravity so low but what he is an all-sufficient Savior. Yet how prone we are to doubt his power and willingness to save us. Instead of always looking to Christ, how apt we are to look to ourselves. It seems to me that if we would look only to Jesus we would never doubt. When I can keep my eyes steadfastly fixed on the cross I am happy, and feel that I am safe through the blood of Christ. But when I look at my wicked heart I doubt, fear and tremble. How I do thank God that he has given us in Christ a full Savior. If he had not finished his work and wrought a full and complete salvation for his people, I would utterly despair of ever being saved. If he had left the smallest part for me to do I would never do it. I feel to-day that if he had only done enough to carry me to the gates of heaven, and left me there, with my hand upon the latch, and nothing to do but to open and go in by my own efforts, I would then fail to enter, and would sink to perdition. But, thanks be to my Savior, he has said that all the Father has given him shall come to him. Bless God for his wills and shalls. But for them we might well despair of salvation. All that the Father hath given to the Son shall come to him. Not that they may come, or they can come, but they shall come. And he says, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." No matter how sinful, how depraved, how sunken in iniquity, he will not cast him out, but will wash him and cleanse him from all sin, put upon him a robe of righteousness, protect him from all his enemies in the world, and finally bring him to glory. With such a Savior how can we doubt? To doubt is to rob God of his honor. To believe is to give God all the glory. And should not poor, perishing sinners like us, who if saved must be saved by grace alone, try to honor him, who has vouchsafed us all this grace, by believing all and every word he has said? As to doubt is to dishonor God, let us never doubt again. Christ told Jairus, the ruler of the Jews, when he was beseeching him to heal his daughter, "Be not afraid; only believe." All that Christ requires of his people is to believe his word; and yet we, poor, sinful creatures, find it so hard to believe. O may we ever feel that to honor God is to believe him, to take him at his word. It is related of Doctor Chalmers that he was once visiting a poor, sick woman, and exhorting her to have faith in Christ. She said to him, "Doctor, that is just what I do not understand. What is faith in Christ? Do tell me." He hesitated a moment and said, "Trust Christ. Can't you trust him?" The truth in its simplicity was carried home to her heart by the Spirit, and she exclaimed, "I can trust him; I do trust him." O! my brother, may God enable us all to trust him. If you cannot see to write, some of your children can write for you, and I hope to hear from you soon. May the Lord bless and preserve you, is the prayer of your brother,

G. W. STATON.

NEWARK, Del., Dec. 13, 1871.

VERY DEAR BROTHER WOOLFORD:—Permit one who is less than the least of all saints to once more express my heartfelt sympathy for you, and all the afflicted family, in your recent terrible affliction. I read a letter to Elder Beebe from dear sister Susie, while I was in Middletown, which left me no hope that dear sister Sally's life on earth would be spared longer. This was soon followed by a telegram to Elder Purington, saying she had passed away. But I am firmly persuaded that she is not dead, but sleepeth sweetly in Jesus. She has left the shores of mortality, to awake in the blissful regions of heaven and immortal life, through the power of the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. Of this you all feel assured; but even the blessed assurance of faith cannot assuage the grief we feel in giving up our loved ones. The heart will, yea, must, mourn. And we are not forbidden to mourn for our loved ones. Pious Abraham mourned for his beloved Sarah; and Jesus wept at the grave of his beloved friend Lazarus; but for our comfort he said to the mourning sisters, "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and he that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." But truly, my dear brother, the hand of the Lord has been for the last few years heavy upon you, and you have the pity and sympathy of all the dear friends. We cannot always see and feel the love of our dear Lord manifested to us in these terrible trials, these sad bereavements; and sometimes we murmur and cry out, "Wilt thou pursue thy worm to death?" But this is because of our limited vision, and we see not as God sees. He sees the end from the beginning, and his thoughts toward us of old, even from everlasting, are love and goodness, and his undisturbed affairs roll on without let or hindrance.

"Each opening leaf, and every stroke, Fulfills some deep design."

The glorious temple of our God is steadily moving on to its completion, and our much-loved Sallie is now immovably placed as a living (not dead) stone in that glorious house, the everlasting habitation of our precious Redeemer. Through sovereign, unmerited grace she has conquered her last enemy, and entered into the joy of her Lord, to go no more out. You and I are still left to buffet a few more storms. Our passports have not yet been sealed. The longer I live the more I am convinced that the dear children of God have no resting place in this poor world, but are only pilgrims and strangers, looking for and hastening to a city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. In reading the Scriptures we find that those who shine the brightest, and whom we most fondly cherish in our hearts as bright and shining lights, are those who have suffered most. How much our hearts are drawn out toward a suffering Jacob, driven (to save his life) by the wrath of an angry brother from the paternal roof; though the son of a prince, persecuted of his sordid, covetous uncle; tormented by almost continual jealousies in his own family; his beloved Joseph ruthlessly taken from him, and long mourned as dead; the famine, and prospect of starvation; and when his trials at last seemed to be over, and he was permitted to embrace his long lost son in all his glory, and he found plenty of corn; his sight taken from him, as yours has been; well might he say, "Few and evil have the days of the years of my pilgrimage been." How much more our hearts are drawn out to him, than to the wise, rich, prosperous and honored Solomon. So may we not conclude that whom the Lord designs to honor most, and cause to shine as bright lights in his visible kingdom, he causes to pass through the most suffering? Whom he loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. In this he conforms us to himself; for the Captain of our salvation was made perfect through suffering; and when he appears we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. May the Lord heal all your wounds, and reconcile you and me to himself. May we all be enabled to kiss and to pass under the rod. My best love and sympathy to all the dear family and friends.

Your brother in hope,

G. W. STATON.

LEAD HILL, Ark., Oct. 16, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—In the SIGNS of Sept. 26th I see a request from brother Broders for my views on the third verse of the second chapter of Ephesians. I feel like trying to comply with his wishes, provided you see proper to publish the same. I feel my inability to expound any of the Scriptures, more especially those controverted points, and I wish it understood that I desire my views to be accepted only so far as they are sustained by holy writ. I suppose the reason brother Broders desires me to write on this passage is because I wrote a short piece and took the liberty to differ from some views of his. I want to be guided by the spirit of love in writing these few imperfect thoughts, and desire brother Broders and all others to throw the mantle of charity over my imperfections.

The text reads as follows, "Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others." I suppose brother Broders thinks that this text proves we were all tares before we were regenerated; but I think there is a difference between a child of wrath and a child of the devil. First, I will say that that which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Then being born of our earthly parents does not make us children, either of God or of the devil, but only children of Adam. And as Adam violated the law of God, he incurred the displeasure or wrath of God, and all his posterity stand condemned as transgressors of the law of God. Then, in order to be children of God, we must be born of God. All the elect family, the chosen of God, are children of Adam, and in their relation to the Adam family there is no difference. They are captivated by the devil at his will. By creation we are creatures or children of God, and by captivation we are the servants of the devil and violaters of the law. The prodigal son would represent a child of wrath. He was a son of a certain man, and his going off did not effect his relationship to his father. He surely did incur the wrath of his father, and had his conversation with the wicked, and ran after the lusts of the flesh and the desires of the mind; yet he did not cease to be the son of his father. Now, I think, in order to become the children of God we must be born of God. We see the faith of God's elect manifested in the person of Abel, then all along the line of the faithful. The first manifestation of the children of the wicked one is in the person of Cain. We are informed that he was of that wicked one, and slew his brother. I believe one must be born of the evil spirit, or given over to hardness of heart and reprobacy of heart, and his "conscience seared with a hot iron," before he will ever murder his brother. Now, it is spiritual children that are under consideration, when Paul says "we." Before regeneration we desire to associate with any and all the Adam family; more especially those who are under the influence of the wicked one, or following the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that worketh in the children of disobedience. In the same line of thought it is said that the strong man armed keeps his palace and goods in peace, until a stronger than he comes, and takes away his armor wherein he trusted, and divides the spoil. I believe that with all the elect or chosen of God the stronger will come, and will deliver every one of them; and that number embraces every one given to the Son in the covenant, and ordered in all things and sure; while there are some who are left to follow and to be led on after the evil spirit, and to go on to eternal ruin. These are they that Jesus speaks of when he tells them that they are the children of their father the devil. But, as before stated, this does not run in any relation to their earthly parents; but when manifest, it just shows what spirit they are actuated by. Then the seed is sown in the heart and not in the womb; that is when the seed is the wicked spirit. But when the seed is the child, as in the parable of the tares, then they are sown in the kingdom, or church.

I have run this imperfect scribble far enough. May the grace of God lead us into the truth, and keep us in the spirit of love, is my desire.

WM. J. CASEY.

MAYSFIELD, Texas, Oct. 12, 1892.

ELDER G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—I have seated myself with the view of addressing you, together with the many readers of the dear old SIGNS OF THE TIMES, of which I have been a reader at intervals for twenty years, and can say that I love the doctrine contained in its columns. Indeed I have, from the first of my acquaintance with the paper, loved it, and the more so of late, as it is the only paper in my knowledge that fearlessly and uncompromisingly contends for the whole truth. There may be other papers that are doing as much, but if so I know it not. I am a reader of several of our periodicals, but none of them come to the front with that degree of faithfulness that the SIGNS does, and ever has since its first publication in the year 1832, and from which date it had the hearty and universal indorsement of the Baptists north, south, east and west; and it continued to have it until very recently, when we began to hear complaints and objections, though privately, and not publicly. When contending against Arminian principles they all had considerable use for Gilbert Beebe and the SIGNS. It is stated by some here in Texas that the Baptists as a body from the first (meaning, I suppose, from the first issue of the SIGNS) did not indorse the doctrinal sentiments of the SIGNS, but rejected them, though not outspoken, for the reason that the Baptists had just got through with a very long and tedious war with the Missionaries or Fullerites, which war reduced the Baptists to such a small number that they were not able at that time to enter into another war, and thought it best to live a while with those holding those objectionable tenets, rather than openly oppose them; and so they have done until now; but that now, having grown to be able, they will not peaceably abide it any longer. The above is the substance of an expression used by a certain Elder, which met the hearty indorsement of several other Elders. I had always thought a Primitive Baptist would rather live alone, than with a multitude in heresy; but I have learned differently from these Elders. Elder Gilbert Beebe in his prospectus, relative to the doctrine of God, occupied the same position as did the Baptists in the years 1643 and 1689. If those who to-day occupy the ground of the unlimited decrees or predestination of God are heretics, so were the Baptists of the years 1643 and 1689, and down to about the year 1880, when some professed to see their woeful error, and declared against it in many places, perhaps, as they have here in Texas, in order to maintain their identity with their brethren of old, who, to be sure, were Arminians; for their doctrine savors more of that element than of anything else. According to their idea, God sees a heap, but does little. He saw and knew that Pharaoh's heart would be hardened, but did in no sense do it; and so also of Christ's crucifixion, of Joseph's abduction, of David's numbering the people, of Shimei's cursing David, of the Syrian war against Israel, &c., &c.

Yours in gospel bonds,

WM. LITTLE.

PALESTINE, Texas, Oct. 16, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN BEEBE:—I find myself a day or two behind with my remittance for our old and well-tried medium of correspondence, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES. I feel like I would not be satisfied if I could not get it to read. It comes to me every week bearing words of encouragement and comfort from some dear brother or sister. I am often in the condition that our dear sister J. K. Boyd, of Dilly, Oregon, spoke of in the last number. It expresses my condition at present, and for some time past. Dear tried sister, I have felt so dead for some time past that I cannot discover the things that make for peace. I say, O my leanness, my leanness, my unworthiness! I often fear that I am mistaken in the whole matter from first to last. I have of late had fearful feelings. If I try to sing, it is dry and lifeless. If I try to talk with the brethren, it is the same. And though at night, when I have gone to my bed, and all is quiet, I try to pray, it appears to me there is no prayer in it. I fear I have not the spirit of prayer. I would not be in this condition, but so it is, and I cannot help it. But if it is with me as I sometimes hope it is, in God's own good time deliverance will come. It seems that in gone by days I enjoyed some of the comforts derived from the Spirit; and those seasons of enjoyment were better and more fully realized when alone, working in my field, or walking, or riding along the road. Yet sometimes I get comfort from all those things, coupled with the words, "My leanness;" because the Bible teaches us that thus it has been with God's people from the beginning to the present time. Our Savior has said, "Without me ye can do nothing;" and by experience I find it to be so; for I have tried to deliver myself, but all in vain. But when he who is our present help in every trouble comes, then he is our Deliverer. At the same time I think I know that if I am one of God's choice in his Son before the foundation of the world, in the resurrection I will awake with his likeness, and then will I be satisfied. I do not expect to be perfectly satisfied until then; for while we are in this tabernacle we see through a glass darkly, and know in part; but in the resurrection our vile bodies will be changed from natural to spiritual bodies, the glass will be removed, and we will see face to face. We will see Jesus as he is, and be like him. This is, I believe, being born from the dead. Yet we receive an earnest here, which is the spirit of adoption. I know I do not and cannot live as I would, for I would at all times have the sweetest assurance and comfort of the blessed Spirit. Sometimes I am hedged in on either hand, and cannot come forth. God knows my frame, my weakness, yea, he knows me altogether. Sometimes I think I have a little hope that when he has tried me I shall come forth as gold. If so, it will not be for works of righteousness which I have done; but blessed be his holy name, it will be according to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world. Thus all the praise and glory and honor is due to him.

Brethren Beebe, dispose of this in your own way, and all will be right. It is like myself, very imperfect. When it is well with you, try to pray for me.

U. J. BELL.

WHO SENT IT?

WE are in receipt of an envelope postmarked "Kenton, Del., Nov. 23d, 1892," which contained two 1-dollar bills, eight 2-cent and one 1-cent stamps, but no letter saying who it was from nor how they wished the remittance credited. Will the person sending the above please write us how to apply the same?

PLEASE BE CAREFUL.

It frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. Or if the paper is being sent in her name and the renewal is sent in her husband's name the same thing is likely to occur. Please be very careful to give the same name in which the paper is already coming, also the post office address at which it is received.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

Charles W. Yates was born Sept. 26th, 1816. By hard study he acquired an education, and in his seventeenth year began his life work of teaching, which he followed up to Thursday, Nov. 10th, 1892, and died on Tuesday following. His disease was very painful at times, and the dear Lord supplied him with patience and fortitude to bear all he had to suffer. Thus has passed from earth one of its most polished gentlemen, chaste in his conversation, courteous in his manners, having spent nearly sixty years in teaching. As he remarked to me, he had taught the third generation, and with little exception in this (Rappahannock) county. He was universally loved and respected. He was born, reared, labored and died in the same locality. If his examples were followed by all we would have no use for court houses nor jails. Such is his record as a man. His afflicted companion is a confirmed invalid, confined to her room, not able even to walk on her crutches. She must feel keenly her great loss. She is a sister of our dear brother, Wm. F. Kercheval, of Hannibal, Mo.

Though a staunch advocate of the faith and practice of the Old School Baptists, yet he never connected himself with them, ever pleading his unworthiness. We will miss him much at old Thorntor's Gap Church-house, where his seat was always filled when he was able to attend. His children are scattered, having only one near him, Mrs. Richard Compton, with whom he lived. His brothers and sisters are also scattered.

The unworthy writer delivered a short discourse from Revelation xiv. 13 to the sorrowing relatives and friends at the family residence; after which we laid away the inanimate body in the family cemetery, to await the trump of God that will call it forth.

Dear, sorrowing ones, mourn not as those who have no hope, knowing that he is freed from all trouble and anxiety. If you need aid, the God who sustained and supported him can supply your every need. Cast all your cares upon our risen Lord. You know no lasting joys here; they bud only to be blasted. But in heaven they will endure forever, where we shall know even as also we are known.

J. A. NORTON.

SPERRYVILLE, Va., Nov. 20, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Please publish in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES the death of our beloved brother, B. F. Core, at the residence of his son, W. F. Core, in Lincoln, Ill., at about one o'clock on Tuesday, Oct. 25th, 1892, aged 67 years, 4 months and 7 days.

Brother Core was born in Fayette Co., Ohio, in 1825. In the year 1850 he was married to sister Elizabeth Beaty Jefferson, by the late Elder John B. Moore, and removed to Illinois, near Atlanta, in 1856. In 1859 he became a resident of Lincoln, where his life was spent in duty's path. We can use no word of praise greater to his credit than that he was looked upon as an honest man. Plain in his manner, he was beloved by all, and revered by his children and grandchildren. He loved the truth and the cause of Jesus, and his house was always a home to his brethren, where, as many can testify, everything that lay in his and his dear companion's power was done to make them welcome. Surely "given to hospitality" was applicable to them in the highest degree. He was baptized by the writer in September, 1873, having obtained fellowship with the Lebanon Church at her regular meeting by experience. All that we can say of our beloved brother never can endear him more in the hearts of his brethren and friends, nor give him a higher place in their affections; so in sweet memory of his dear life we leave him with his dear Savior, knowing that to be with him is far better.

In his last sickness he was surrounded by his loving children, who with a dear companion, their mother, did all that love would or could suggest. He was very patient in all his suffering, at times rejoicing at the prospect of meeting the blessed Savior, who did all things well. He was sick nearly four months with malarial fever, which at last broke over every barrier and ended his dear life of mortality; but by every evidence he leaves a world of care and toil for a home in heaven, often praying for the coming of his blessed Savior to take him to himself. His son, E. B. Core, of Cincinnati, was present to console and cheer him on his journey over the dark river.

His funeral was at his son's, where he died, and many friends and brethren came to pay their last tribute of respect to his life. The writer tried to speak words of comfort to them from Job xiv. 14, pointing to a more glorious life than this; after which he was laid to rest in the Lincoln cemetery to await the resurrection of the just, made so by the cleansing blood of Jesus. Surely we must say that a good man has left us; and while we mourn his loss from our midst, it is his eternal rest. May we be reconciled to the will of God.

He leaves a widow, three children and ten grandchildren, besides the church of Lebanon, at Lincoln, Ill., and numerous friends, to mourn his absence. May the widow's God comfort our dear sister and her children, and all who love our dear Savior, is the prayer of one who loves them.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOUTHAMPTON, Pa., Nov. 18, 1892.

DEAR BETHREN BEEBE:—A newly-started paper was sent me last year from Texas, whose principal object appeared to be to contend against the doctrine of the predestination of all things. The letters of those who believe this doctrine were published, with the editorial replies; and many, I have no doubt, were benefited by the clear and well-arranged scriptural arguments in defense of that doctrine. The arguments in opposition to it were as good as can be made. A ministering brother in Ohio wrote me that he had not heretofore understood that doctrine as we hold it, but that he thought if he continued to read such arguments against it he would soon fully believe it. I wrote a short letter, which was published, with an editorial reply. I wrote again, and each of the editors wrote me that my letter would be published. Some time after my second letter was received the paper passed into other hands, one of the former proprietors remaining as associate editor, and it was after that decided that enough had been said in favor of the doctrine. My letter has been returned to me at my request. With it came a reply by the associate editor. As my communication is not harsh, it certainly appears that the management did not wish the arguments as presented in it to be seen by their readers, even though followed by the reply. As that reply was not held in sufficient esteem by those managing the paper to be published by them, I need say no more about it.

I now send my letter to you to publish in the SIGNS, if you think best. I hope that some things which are presented in it may be of comfort to some of the brethren. Although the arguments upon such a subject cannot be new, and although the subject has been from time to time dwelt upon in a clear, comprehensive and comforting way by many brethren in the SIGNS, yet some edification and comfort may be received, through the blessing of God, by some dear child of God while reading what is written upon it so imperfectly in this letter. For the truth of God is like food and drink and sunshine, not to be examined once, and then laid aside as not necessary to be dwelt upon any more, but to be received again and again as nourishing and refreshing to the spiritual man. If there is a point of doctrine which I am sure is a part of the truth of God I would at all times declare it fully and faithfully when speaking at all; but I would not force it upon any one upon the ground that it is bread and he must eat it. There is but one who has charge of the sheep in this respect, and he will give "to each a portion in due season." Naturally men in ill health sometimes lose a relish for good food, and it has to be given them in small quantities, and perhaps in some other form. It may be so spiritually. A man in his right mind will not throw away a loaf of bread nor a cup of milk because it does not then suit his taste. He will know that the difficulty is with him, and will wait for recovery. So a portion of the Scriptures of truth is not to be thrown aside by saying, "It does not mean so," because we cannot be reconciled to the plain meaning of the words. It is the word of the Lord, and we must bow to it, whether we like it and can understand it or not. When the time comes for us to eat that piece of heavenly bread the Lord will give it to us in that form. Meantime we may find that the same heavenly nourishment has been ministered to our souls in measure in some other form. Medicines are sometimes bitter, but the effect is good.

There are many dear children of God who are in perplexity in regard to this and many other subjects, but are not prejudiced by the traditional opposition to the doctrine of the predestination of all things. These wish to consider what is spoken or written by those they regard as servants of God upon the subject. They are looking for the truth. They want to hear sober, scriptural arguments. Personalities and ridicule they would pass over. Such things only pain and offend them. They want to be led by the Spirit into the riches of the truth. I have such in my mind when reading discussions of spiritual subjects, and when engaging in them. Where a subject is discussed freely and fully, each presenting his own understanding, such seekers after the truth will be benefited. They will quickly see where the truth is.

One thing I wish to remark and emphasize. I have been astonished at the childish levity and coarse ridicule with which some writers assail this doctrine and those who believe it. Their flippant manner in speaking of it stands in strong and painful contrast with the solemn gravity of Job and David and Paul, and all the holy men of old, when they were moved by the Holy Ghost to speak of these deep and awful mysteries. They confessed their ignorance and their lack of understanding while declaring some of the very same sentiments against which the childish ridicule of some of these writers is directed. Heated expressions, personal thrusts and ridicule, are in my view unbecoming in one who writes or speaks on scriptural things, as much so in defense of the truth as against it. I have heard some attempt to defend the use of wit and sarcasm and laughable illustrations in opposing error and defending truth; but they get no help in such defense from the Savior nor his apostles. I do not regard Elijah's mocking the prophets of Baal as an example for a servant of God under the gospel dispensation. His position at Mount Carmel before Ahab and all Israel is one never occupied by a minister of the gospel; and no one of them has ever, in my opinion, been authorized to use his words of solemn, scathing mockery against those soon to be slain by him. I often think of Cowper's words in regard to light and humorous sayings in the pulpit:

"So did not Paul. Direct me to a quip
Or merry turn in all he ever wrote,
And I consent you take it for your text,
Your only one, till sides and benches fail."

I have known dear and faithful servants of God who mourned a great deal over their propensity to say amusing things while preaching. The times that I look back to when I have felt a light spirit control me while in the pulpit, and the few times (I remember but two or three, and am thankful to have been kept so far by fear) when I have intentionally excited merriment in the hearers, I remember with pain and regret. How painfully I have felt that a light and trifling spirit is much out of place in the pulpit, and ought not to be indulged by the servant of God anywhere. The poor, tried and tempest-tossed people of God remain hungry and comfortless under the preaching or conversation of any one when he is under the influence of such a spirit. There are times with all the saints when the solemn things of the kingdom of God rest with such weight upon the soul that gravity of speech and manner will be the necessary result. Then we can see how suitable and necessary the apostle's oft-repeated injunctions to the saints are, not to let "filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient," be once named among them, "as becometh saints." Any suggestion that an effort to put off such a spirit, and to try to be grave and sober, is but mere hypocrisy, is from the devil. We should pay good heed to the exhortations of the apostles, and not be hindered by the fear that some may think we are only trying to "put on a long face," nor by the temptation from within that we are only acting a deceitful part. The days are evil, the world is evil, and every propensity of our vile nature is evil; but the directions of the Spirit are good and holy, and there is power in the Spirit to bring these evil propensities "into captivity to the obedience of Christ." Whenever any poor sinner desires that he may "walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise," the Spirit has produced that desire, and will enable him to fulfill it; and in doing so he is "redeeming the time, because the days are evil." We shall never be any better in the flesh, shall never see any improvement in our vile natures, until our change shall come; nor can we find any true peace or comfort in connection with this evil world. The conversation of the Lord's people is in heaven, in the things of the church and kingdom of Jesus Christ. Our real treasures, our joy, our life, are there; and all the time that we are graciously enabled to pass in the holy fear of the Lord, in the felt power of faith and hope and love, in the privileges of the church, in communion with God, and in speaking with each other of the goodness and love of God, is redeemed from the evil of the days. So I understand the apostle, and so I feel that I have been taught by the Spirit.

Your brother in the hope of the gospel,

SILAS H. DURAND.

SOUTHAMPTON, Pa., March 22, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Will you kindly publish this letter, with date and address, just as I shall write it? Having received several numbers of your paper, I wrote you briefly my views on the subject of predestination, which appeared to be the principal subject discussed in your pages. My letter, with your comments, appeared in No. 9.

I presented some considerations which appear to me to warrant my understanding of the subject, and referred to some Scriptures which I regard as plainly declaring the views expressed by me. You replied by reasserting the views to which mine are opposed; but I do not find that you have in any other way noticed one of the considerations I mentioned as having weight with me, nor that you have even alluded to one of the texts of Scripture I referred to as proof. Yet you have expressed a wonder that I should believe such a doctrine, and have begged me to stop, and to lay down my will, and to pray God to give me the mind of Christ. I might have exhorted you to stop believing as you do; but what kind of conference would that be between brethren upon deep and important subjects? I understood from you that your columns were open for an interchange of views on scriptural subjects; but when one brother begins to exhort the other to stop believing as he does, he begs the question, assuming that his own views on the subject under consideration are necessarily right, and are the criterion by which to judge those of others. The advantages hoped for from conference then at once cease. I wrote to express some thoughts and refer to some portions of Scripture which compel me to believe as I do, hoping that others might also see their force, or be able to show me my error, and tell me why I should not believe just what those Scriptures plainly say. Until you do that your exhortation for me to stop believing as I do must necessarily be in vain. Your further exhortation implies that I do not wish my own will to be subjected to the will of God, and that I do not desire to be directed by the mind of Christ. I hope and believe that you are mistaken in this.

I have noticed a phrase quoted by you more than once as Scripture which I do not find in the Bible. It is this, "What God purposeth he doeth." Replying to one correspondent you say, "Do you not know that what God purposes he doeth? Do you purpose the acts of another? You know you do not." Repeating this expression to me, you ask, "How can God condemn and punish his own purpose?" You then say, "I know this is very plain; but it is hay of your own reaping, and you ought to come up to the rack and eat." If you mean by this peculiar style of argument that you think I will now refuse to accept the consequences of the doctrine I have expressed, as a horse may refuse to eat unsavory hay that has been put in the rack, I am glad to assure you that you are mistaken. I have reaped the truth, which springs up only in the gospel field; and it is just the food I love, savory and good. But I do not acknowledge what you have presented in that quoted phrase and question as any of my reaping. I do not regard it as the truth. It has not about it "the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed." As you refer to Isaiah, though you do not mention chapter and verse, I suppose the place you mean is the last part of the quotation I shall now make from Isaiah xli. 9-11: "Remember the former things of old: for I am God, and there is none else; I am God, and there is none like me, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure: calling a ravenous bird from the east, the man that executeth my counsel from a far country: yea, I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass; I have purposed it, I will also do it." This man, called "a ravenous bird," was a wicked man, who did not know the Lord, and his acts, so far as his own motives were concerned, were evil. But it was God's purpose that he should execute his counsel; and that purpose, which was one of the things he declared from the beginning, God brought to pass. It was the same with regard to those who with wicked hands crucified the Lord of life and glory. Peter says to them, "But those things, which God before had showed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled."—Acts iii. 18. The wicked acts were the acts of the "ravenous bird," the wicked men; although it is clearly declared that God purposed that they should do what they did, and that in doing it they executed his counsel. In what other way can we understand that the wicked are his sword?—Psalm xvii. 13. The Lord purposed that Shimei should curse David, even saying unto him, "Curse David;" but it does not follow that the Lord cursed David.—2 Samuel xvi. 10. The Lord hath commanded concerning Jacob, that his enemies shall be round about him. "He turned their heart to hate his people, to deal subtilly with his servants."—Lam. i. 17; Psalm cv. 25. God purposed this, but he did not do it himself. He did not himself hate his people, and deal subtilly with them. He caused his purpose to be fulfilled for the good of his people. He not only causes the furnace to be heated for them, causes their enemies to deal subtilly with them, and thus tries them as gold, chastens them, and afflicts them for their good, making all things work together for their good, but he also works in them both to will and to do of his good pleasure. But we are not authorized to say that either the wicked acts which he purposed that their enemies should do against them, or the good acts which he purposed that they themselves should do, are done by him, although an evil spirit from the Lord (1 Samuel xviii. 10), or a lying spirit sent by him (1 Kings xxii. 23), may direct the wicked act in some cases, and his own holy Spirit directs the good acts always. He purposes that his people shall ask for the blessings which he has declared he will give them (Ezekiel xxxvi. 37); but it is they who pray, not he, even though the Spirit helpeth their infirmities, so that they pray according to his will.—Rom. viii. 27. He pur-posed the acts of the raven that fed Elijah, but the raven carried the bread and flesh. He purposed the acts of Balaam in blessing Israel, but Balaam spoke the words. The goodness and benefit resulting from all the acts he purposed was his; the wickedness, where there was wickedness, was theirs. He punishes the enemies for the wickedness, though he has made it serve his purpose. He makes the wicked his sword.—Psalm xvii. 13. He made them for the day of evil.—Prov. xvi. 4. We must be sure that we understand all about his ways much better than Job did before we dare to question concerning them. See the answer of the Lord out of the whirlwind. Shimei was punished for his wickedness.—1 Kings ii. 44. So was Pharaoh, and so were all the enemies by whom the Lord scourged and tried Israel. It was of the Lord to harden the hearts of the Hivites, "that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly."—Joshua xi. 20.

I merely state what the word says. I have heard all my life the objections that are made to what is declared in these Scriptures, but with them I have nothing to do. I neither undertake to explain nor apologize for the Lord. I desire to bow to the word, and to receive what it declares, whether I can understand it or not. "God is his own interpreter." I can no more easily tell how he forms the light than how he creates darkness. I cannot understand the wonder of his work in making peace any better than how he creates evil. I simply know that he does all these things because he says so; and I know that he does all by infinite power and in infinite wisdom, and for his own glory.—Isa. xlv. I know that there would have been no evil in the world if there had been no sin; and there would have been no sin if it had been contrary to God's purpose that there should be. I know also that God hates sin, and that he causes all his people to hate it by putting his fear in their hearts. "The fear of the Lord is to hate evil." I cannot understand the mysteries that are in this, nor reconcile the contradictions which appear in it to our natural minds. Faith sees no contradiction in anything that is presented in the word.

I must repeat that the natural reason of men cannot stand against the plain declaration of the written word of God. Though our reason says it is impossible that a man should live three days and nights in a whale's belly, that a man should walk without harm in the midst of a fiery furnace, that light should be made to shine out of darkness, yet the word says these things were done by the Lord, and faith receives it with unquestioning confidence. I must still say, notwithstanding your protest, that every argument which seeks to set aside the plain meaning of any declaration of the word of God is of reason, and not of faith. We cannot try the Lord's works and ways by any standard of our own; nor has he given us any standard by which to try them except his word. He has magnified his word above all his name.—Psa. cxxxviii. 2. Whatever the word says he has done he has done, however impossible or contradictory to our reason it may appear to us; and whatever he has done was right in him, and was the wisest thing that could possibly have been done, not because it appears so to our reason, but simply because he did it.

I know well by my own experience, as well as by the word, that our reason decides that God would be unrighteous to take vengeance, "if our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God;" and that "if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory," there is no good reason why "yet I am also judged as a sinner;" and that if such doctrine be true, as it certainly is, then we might as well "do evil that good may come," "as we be slanderously reported, and as some," even among Primitive Baptists, "affirm that we say," or that our doctrine teaches.—Rom. iii. 5-8. This is the reasoning of the carnal mind, which is enmity against God, and is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. The saints are taught that they cannot safely trust their own hearts, nor lean to their own understanding, but must be led by the Spirit. "It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." Reason says, "Why doth he yet find fault," if this doctrine be true, "for who hath resisted his will?" The word answers, "Who art thou that repliest against God? Hath not the potter power over the clay?" Reason says, "If he purposed that a certain act should be done by a man, then he ought not to condemn that act as wicked, and punish the man." The word replies, "Thou thoughtest I was altogether such an one as thyself." "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts."—Isa. lv. 8. The humble servant of God, even the one pronounced by the Lord "perfect and upright," says, "I know that thou canst do everything. * * * Therefore have I uttered that I understood not; things too wonderful for me, which I knew not." The "man after God's own heart" says, "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it."—Job xlii. 1-3; Psa. cxxxix. 6. When God reveals his thoughts, and makes known his ways unto us, then we can say, "How precious also are thy thoughts unto us;" and, "His ways are everlasting."

Unlike Job and David and all the holy men of old, in whom was the meek and lowly Spirit of Christ, some to-day speak with irreverent flippancy on this solemn theme, boldly asserting the ability of reason, which means the capacity and understanding of the human mind, to understand the things of God; charging those who point to the Scriptures which appear plainly to declare otherwise with using sophistry, cunning craftiness and assertions to bolster up their unscriptural dogma, and meeting all their careful arguments and quotations from the written word with coarse ridicule and unbecoming denunciations, instead of calmly and quietly pointing out the sophistry and deceit and erroneous application of Scriptures, as one is apt to do who has a clear case, with abundant proof at hand. Others write without bitterness, and with an evident sense of the solemnity of the subject, and of the candor and sobriety that is becoming in one who presumes to speak upon it; and for this I must commend your style of writing, as a general thing, though you probably intended some ridicule in referring to the hay and the rack; yet ALL appear to avoid meeting the plain declarations of Scripture which are presented as instances of God's having purposed acts that are wicked in them that do them, and then having expressed his condemnation of those who did them, many of which I have already quoted in this and my former letter, as also have many other writers, except by saying in effect that they do not mean what they say, because if they did it would make God the author of sin.

One who asserts that the doctrine of God is a doctrine of "reason" as well as of faith, points for proof to the use of the word in 1 Peter iii. 15, probably not having noticed that the word in this place has a different meaning from the word as used by him. The apostle admonishes the saints to "be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." This word is from the Greek word logos, meaning "a word," and is the same as that used in John i. 1, and other places where Christ is meant. The works of Christ revealed to you as having atoned for your sins is the only reason of a good hope through grace, as contrasted with the works of the creature, which is the reason or ground of the hypocrite's hope. In giving a reason of your hope you tell the exercises of mind through which the revelation is made to you, and may speak of love in your heart to the dear Savior, love to the brethren, a feeling of peace, a solemn joy, heavenly desires, hatred of sin, loathing of self on account of sin, poverty of spirit and hungerings after righteousness. These, however, are not the reason of your hope, but evidences of it. These graces or fruit of the Spirit are very precious, and become the source of comfort, as confirming the hope, and of joy; but the finished work of Christ remains always the reason or foundation of our hope.

The revelation of the righteousness of God through Jesus Christ is made to faith, not to the natural mind; to babes, not to the wise and prudent.—Rom. i. 17; Matt. xi. 25; 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11. Babes in Christ have learned that their own wisdom is foolishness, and that they can make no advancement in heavenly knowledge by the reasoning powers of their natural minds; yet they have the mind of Christ, and "know all things" by the teaching of that anointing which they have of God.—1 John ii. 20, 27. Thus they are enabled, though little children, to give a reason of their hope to the one who has the same hope, and is of like precious faith; for no others can ask a reason of our hope, except with the lips. A man cannot truly even ask about what he knows nothing of. The answer would be an unknown language to him.

To the one who asserts that "the Bible nowhere says that God had a purpose in making man, and that man will answer the purpose for which God made him," I will commend the consideration of the declaration of Paul in Acts xvii. 26, and of Job in Job xiv. 5. God has determined the times before appointed concerning all the nations of men, and has so fixed the bounds of their habitation that they cannot pass them.

Brethren, one and all, let me exhort you to examine carefully what each one says, consider candidly his proofs, and refrain from indulgence of unkind feelings toward one who differs from you, even if he writes or speaks in what you may consider an unwarranted manner to you. Do not be worried because he cannot see as you do, but take more pains to show him in love, as you would a child, wherein he is in error. He cannot believe till he sees the evidence, and then he cannot help believing. The Lord only can give one ability to see that evidence. Do not pass over the texts of Scripture which he thinks declare what he believes, and content yourself with chiding him for believing "such stuff." The many thoughtful readers are looking for invincible arguments, and clear proofs from Scripture, and will not be convinced by general charges of heresy, sophistry and cunning craftiness, nor by unkind denunciations. Let us be patient with the brother who differs from us in his understanding of this or any other subject, till it shall be given him to see his error; and should it possibly turn out that it is not he, but you and I who are in the error, we shall need his forbearance.

Your brother in the hope of the gospel,

SILAS H. DURAND.

STATE ROAD, Del., Nov., 1892.

BRETHREN BEEBE:—There are subjects, without doubt, the investigation of which would be edifying and profitable to the saints. Our minds do not always take hold of them. We are naturally more inclined to follow the lead of others, especially if they are men of ability, and repeat and reiterate the same things again and again. This is, no doubt, easier than to break out in an original track of thought, though not likely to be as entertaining or as profitable. When people have to pay for what they read, it should be the aim of writers for the press to be as entertaining as possible. I will not, however, claim for myself that I ever hit the mark that I aim at. I am now minded to use as a keynote to a letter, a little sentence from the apostle John, in the second verse of the third chapter of his first epistle. "Beloved, now are we the sons of God." This relationship of the Lord's people to him, this apostle seems particularly to delight to dwell upon. Others make mention of it occasionally, but he makes it the starting point and underlying principle of everything else. When he notes the distinction among the Jewish people when Christ came to them, some receiving him, and others receiving him not, he says of those that received him and believed on his name, that they were born "not of blood, nor of the will of man, but of God." To be born of man is to partake of and manifest the life of man, which is a natural or fleshly life. To be born of God, then, is to partake of and manifest spiritual or divine life. That these brethren to whom this apostle is writing were men and woman, constituting the membership of the then existing churches, I think will not be questioned. They are those who have been born again; born into the world sometime a natural or fleshly birth, and born again, of the Spirit of God, a spiritual birth, and so passed from death unto life. This natural state being a state of condemnation and death, they are now born of that life and immortality that is brought to light through the gospel. The same persons called by the apostle little children, while they still retain this natural, fleshly life, now and henceforth live a life in the things of the Spirit. They are spoken of as being in Christ, and Christ is spoken of as being in them. This unity of life is thus repeatedly brought to view. There is sometimes some discussion as to what change is effected by this quickening of the Spirit of God, and being born into the redeemed family. Not only do the Scriptures everywhere speak of this vital and fundamental change, but every believer has the constant witness of it in himself.

The blood of pious, good men in our veins, or the wisdom or efforts of men in our behalf, or our own volition or fleshly exertions, none of these things will produce relationship. In order to be a christian we must possess the christian's life. If Christ is anything to anybody it is life; a life that they did not possess before. This life is emphatically declared to be God-given. Its capacities are spiritually discerned. I cannot conceive that there is any love to this life, or longing and yearning for it, before it is possessed. Those possessing only earthly life do not possess capacities for a higher life, and hence can have no desires for it or aspirings to it. Will it appear as a stumbling-block in the way of any, or as shutting out their hope, to tell them that their love to the Lord's people, and longing to mingle with them in their spiritual enjoyments, is unmistakable evidence of divine life already begun? The apostle is dealing with the present tense. Now. He has enough to deal with, and enough for them to contemplate, in what they are now. If they can know what it is to be sons of God, and what that relationship amounts to, they will not need any further knowledge in this world. They have not to look forward to something to be done for them hereafter. If they are now sons of God, they are heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ. Hence all things are theirs. The apostle says we know not, and we have no need to know, what we shall be, any farther than what is embraced in this relationship, being sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. All questions and all anxiety as to what we shall be, find solution in this view of what we are now. "Where I am, there ye may be also." Not merely in reference to some locality, but in the glory that he had with the Father before the world was.

The Scriptures sometimes use the word adoption. But adoption never makes sons. Neither are there any heirs but children. "If children, then heirs." But the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir. There is no process of adoption known that will ever make sons; neither is there any ingenious device of legislation that can ever make any one a child in another family than that in which it was born. It is to us children of men, like an adoption to be taken into the Redeemer's family; but the inspired apostle says expressly that they are sons. Although they are the sons and daughters of men, they are predestinated unto the relationship of children. Thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ. Adoption can produce no effect upon the disposition or capacities of the child. The fraternal ties that bind parents and children, and brothers and sisters, in endearing, happy bonds cannot be imparted by adoption. The filial affection due to parents, the spirit of obedience to the parental will, the consciousness of honor due to parents, these, all these go along with the life. The life of the parent is developed in the child.

WILL you, brethren Beebe, please give your views through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES on 2 Tim. ii. 20, and oblige a little sister, if one at all? Very sincerely,

NANCY HAHN.

But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honor, and some to dishonor."—2 Tim. ii. 20.

In considering this verse, which is specified in the request of our sister, it is necessary to observe the connection in which the pen of inspiration has introduced it. Both in this, and in the first letter to Timothy, Paul was moved by the Holy Ghost to write such instruction as should qualify every minister of Christ to discern the things which are consistent with the doctrine and order established in the gospel kingdom by the authority of our God. In the preceding context is declared the fact that there must be earnest warfare in the personal experience of every servant of the Lord Jesus. This is signified by the exhortation, "Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." For the encouragement of the servant in enduring this appointed hardness, the case of the natural soldier is cited. Then Paul refers to the trouble which he had been called to endure in defense of the doctrine of that grace which was revealed in Jesus Christ. This is not boasting of his own devotion and faithfulness; but it is left on record for the instruction and encouragement of the saints who in subsequent ages should be subjected to similar trials. By the same divine grace which sustained Paul and the primitive saints in their great fight of afflictions, every disciple of Jesus shall be strengthened to endure all the hardness of labor and of suffering which is to be encountered in following the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. But Paul does not claim that it was for personal advantage he endured the things of which he speaks. His joy was that even though he was shut up in prison and bound with fetters, the word of God was not bound, and the elect, for whose sakes he suffered, were still profited whether in his suffering or in his enjoyment of comfort. "Therefore," he says, "I endure all things for the elect's sakes, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory." In pursuing this same theme that faithful saying is cited, "For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with him; if we deny him, he also will deny us; if we believe not, yet he abideth faithful; he cannot deny himself." The faithfulness of this saying can never be forgotten by the saints without involving them in serious trouble and perplexity. Therefore the saints are to be put in remembrance of the things here written, with the solemn charge before the Lord that they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers. It is not merely to be regarded as a light matter that the servant of the Lord should heed this admonition of the apostle. He must study to show himself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth. This is not a direction to give a part of the testimony of Jesus to the saints and another part to the adversaries of the truth. The whole revelation belongs to the man of God. The right division of it consists in the proper application of each expression in the place where it belongs. The very words of inspiration are often so misapplied that they are made to sustain falsehood; and the adversary of the saints never more sorely tries them than when he thus turns the truth of God into a lie. In tempting our Lord Jesus the devil quoted the words of truth, but converted them into a lie by wresting them from their true meaning. So it was by the same deceitful working that he deceived our mother in the garden of Eden. He did not deny that God had given the commandment which Eve cited; but with lying words he led her to yield to his temptation, whereby she was made subject to the power of sin and death. "Whosoever commiteth sin is the servant of sin."—John viii. 34. The right division of the word of truth consists in the careful observance of the distinction between what is written in the legal covenant and that grace which is revealed in the gospel of the grace of God in Jesus Christ. In thus rightly dividing the word of truth, it is necessary to shun profane and vain babblings; and the reason is assigned. "For they will increase unto more ungodliness; and their word will eat as doth a canker." No false doctrine can be so insignificant as to be safe for the saints. The same poisonous principle is in the youngest viper which renders the fully developed serpent a terror. No cultivation can educate the reptile to the innocence of the dove. So no lie can ever become truth by the most careful application of moral restraints and the philosophy of carnal reason. On the contrary it will only develop more hideous enormity of falsehood as it grows more mature. As in the example to which the context calls attention, the very life of the doctrine of Christ is attacked by every inroad of falsehood. The denial of the future resurrection involves the complete overthrow of the faith of those who are entangled by its delusion. Necessarily all those who are thus bewildered must suffer the loss of the consolation of the truth to which they are blinded. For their comfort it is here written, "Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. And, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." This seal is never divided. That is a counterfeit which makes an excuse of the certainty of divine election under which to claim safety in continuing to follow the carnal directions of depraved reason. This seal gives no support to that presumption which says, "Let us do evil that good may come! whose damnation is just." The peculiar mark which identifies the foundation of God is the longing for holiness which desires freedom from iniquity. This is a very different principle from that slavish fear of punishment which seeks to revel in sin if it can be assured of escape from the punishment due to transgression. None ever hunger and thirst after righteousness unless the love of holiness dwells in them by which they are identified as led by the Spirit of God. All such are born of God. They name the name of Christ in hoping in him for salvation from their sins. In obedience to his commandment they confess their hope in him by following in his footsteps. It is iniquity for them to seek to attain a righteousness of their own by the works of the law, or by deeds which are approved among men.

"But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth." There is no difficulty in understanding the literal fact here stated; it is known by all who have natural intelligence. But in what sense are we to recognize the illustration in its application to the subject on which Paul was here writing? Certainly it is not to signify that there are some of the saints who are like golden vessels in the spiritual house of God, while others are to be compared to vessels of wood and of earth. Such an interpretation would conflict with the whole manifestation of the Spirit of grace in the doctrine and example of Jesus. How could the vessels of gold and of silver esteem others better than themselves, knowing those others to be only of earth or of wood? The absurdity of such a construction of the text is manifest. It is not designed to institute invidious comparisons among the saints, as if they were to engage in strife for the attainment of the more excellent appearance among their brethren in the church. The instruction comes to each individual saint, and it is in his daily experience that he realizes the answer of a good conscience in walking after the Spirit, which is compared to the vessel of gold; or, in yielding his members servants to the law of sin which is in his members, he is filled with conscious vileness and pollution as a vessel of wood or of earth. Let it not be forgotten that in the text the vessels of wood and of earth are presented as in the great house, just as much as are the vessels of gold and of silver. So, the saint who is captivated by sin does not thereby lose his connection with the living house of God. This is an important truth for the consideration of the subjects of divine grace. Indeed, the very same saint may be at one time made conscious of his just comparison to the vessel of wood and of earth; and at another time by the grace of the Lord Jesus he may shine in all the beauty of the vessel of gold and of silver. Still it is only as he is in the great house of the Zion of God that he is included at all in this illustration.

In considering the statement in our text it must not be overlooked that the chosen materials of which the church is composed, are sinners who were by nature the children of wrath even as others. While they remain in the flesh they are subject to the vanity of their earthly nature, by reason of which bondage even Paul was made to groan, crying, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Realizing the infirmity of his flesh, he might well compare himself to the vessel of earth. There is abundant testimony that so long as they are in the body the subjects of salvation are not above the power of temptation to obey their fleshly lusts. It is in the strife against these powers of sin that they are engaged in that perpetual warfare, which can only cease with their final discharge from this earthly house of their tabernacle. The natural mind of the saint can never learn the hidden mystery of this unceasing strife. Reason accepts the fact of the survival of the principle of sin in the natural mind as conclusive evidence that the subject of its power is not led by the Spirit of truth and holiness. Consequently every manifestation of that power in the words or action of the saint is held to be a witness against the genuineness of the hope in which he trusts. For this cause reason always decides against the validity of the believer's confidence in that grace of God which brings salvation to sinners. When judged by this standard, every saint is driven to confess not only that he is not a vessel of gold, but he dares not claim that he is worthy to be counted as belonging in the church. Instead of striving, as is the custom with worldly religionists, to secure the most honored place in the "great house" of our God, every conscious sinner despairs of any place in that glorious house until the Spirit reveals in him that grace which is in Christ Jesus, whereby sinners are saved from their sins, and justified from all their guilt. In this glorious system of sovereign grace all those who are saved must ascribe the praise exclusively to the Lamb who was slain for them, by whose blood they were cleansed from all sin. Certainly there can be no invidious assumption of superiority over others whose salvation is secured in the same infinite grace. So Paul says, "Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay; but by the law [or principle] of faith."—Rom. iii. 27. While Paul could justly declare that he had more than any other man whereof he might trust in the flesh, by grace he was made to acknowledge himself less than the least of all saints. When compelled to become a fool in glorying, he could only recount the wonderful manifestation of divine grace which had in him been revealed. "If I must needs glory, I will glory of the things which concern mine infirmities." Then he proceeds to tell what we are accustomed to call his experience. This is very different from asserting himself to be a vessel of gold in his superiority over those to whom he wrote. Even while he maintained his apostolic authority it was his joy to confess, "For I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. But by the grace of God I am what I am; and his grace which was bestowed upon me was not in vain; but I labored more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me." Thus he had nothing but what he had received; and surely he could not boast of personal superiority over his brethren upon the ground of the grace by which he had been placed in the apostleship. Rather, it would seem to be, as he regarded it, an occasion for him to consider himself a debtor to all the church, on account of the grace bestowed upon them.

"And some to honor, and some to dishonor." This clause of the text cannot be reconciled with the application of this illustration to the different members of the church. The electing love of God embraces every one of those who constitute the church of the redeemed, and it is the will of God "That he might make known the riches of his glory on the vessels of mercy, which he had afore prepared unto glory, even us, whom he hath called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles."—Rom. ix. 23, 24. In this text it is clear that every vessel of mercy is chosen unto honor and glory. It cannot be that in the expression under consideration the apostle denies this truth. But when taken in the connection in which it is written it clearly has its application in illustrating the importance of the saints walking in the Spirit, and not fulfilling the lusts of the flesh. When Peter confessed the truth, saying, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," he was a vessel of gold, and to honor. "And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." Never was any saint more honored than was this disciple at that time. Yet it was immediately after this commendation that Peter was found rebelling against the declared appointment of God, and then he could presume to rebuke Jesus, saying, "Be it far from thee, Lord; this shall not be unto thee." In this rebellion the Lord recognized the earthen vessel of carnal pride and enmity against God; therefore "he turned and said unto Peter, Get thee behind me, Satan; thou art an offense unto me; for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that to be of men."—Matt. xvi. 13-23. Now the contrast was shown in Peter between the natural man, which is enmity against God, and the spiritual man, which is conformed to the will of God in all things. While Peter is still a vessel of mercy, no less in his rebellion than in his confession of the truth, there is a very manifest contrast between the happiness found in the acknowledging of the truth and the suffering of shame and sorrow experienced under the reproof of the loving Redeemer. This is the chastisement which is visited upon all those whom the Lord loves. In no other sense can any subject of grace be a vessel unto dishonor but as thus subjected to reproof under the just judgment of the King in Zion. The carnal enemies of God are not in any sense in the great house of the church of the living God, which is the pillar and ground of the truth. They have not even the place of vessels unto dishonor in this holy place of the tabernacle of the Most High.

In accordance with this view of the text, the following verse can refer to none but the living subjects of grace. "If a man therefore purge himself from these [profane and vain babblings, &c., verse 10] he shall be a vessel unto honor, sanctified, and meet for the Master's use, and prepared unto every good work." Certainly it is not necessary to assure any believer in salvation by grace alone that this cannot apply to those men who are dead in sins. The only character to whom this assertion can apply is that which is designated in the second verse of this chapter as "faithful men." All such bear the seal of the foundation of God which standeth sure. Where this mark is set upon any sinner it is certain that it will be a living power, which will never fail to produce hunger and thirst after righteousness, and hatred of sin. This hatred will be realized most sensibly in abhorrence of that evil which is found ever present in the heart of the conscious sinner. None feel this godly sorrow of sin until the love of righteousness is wrought in them by the Spirit of holiness that is given unto all those who are born of God. There is no more sure witness that one is led by the Spirit of God than the earnest desire to be free from the dominion of sin. There is no possibility that this longing after the the perfection which is revealed in Christ Jesus, can be produced by that carnal mind which is enmity against God, which is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. Since this is all the mind which the natural man has, it is certain that every one who longs for deliverance from the dominion of sin must be led by the Spirit of God. None but the sons of God are so led. Unless he is led by the Spirit no man can ever want to "depart from iniquity." The admonition in our text gives to every subject of its address only the same direction which is experimentally written in his own heart; so that, like every other precept of the law of Christ, it is to the saints the perfect law of liberty. To this divine commandment it is the most delightful privilege of the subjects of salvation to yield sweet obedience. In so doing, they are vessels of gold and of silver, and glorify God in their bodies and in their spirits which are his.

IS THE PRICE TOO HIGH?

WE occasionally receive a complaint that the subscription price of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES is too high. We know that it is not generally understood by our brethren and friends, the difference between a paper the nature of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES and the usual local weekly papers, and for the information of all such we will try to explain.

In the first place the SIGNS is printed on paper that costs from once and a half to twice what is paid for ordinary weekly news paper.

Secondly, the SIGNS is filled nearly every number, all but about two columns, with entirely original matter, the most of which has to be either revised or rewritten to prepare it for publication, at an expense which alone equals the entire cost of many of the local weeklies.

Thirdly, the SIGNS has to prepay the postage of the paper to all of its subscribers outside of the county in which it is published, while local papers are almost entirely patronized by those living within the counties in which they are printed, and have no postage to pay.

Fourthly, the SIGNS has to rely entirely on its subscription patronage for support, while regular newspapers are mostly supported by their advertising patronage. Very few if any of the secular papers could be sustained if deprived of the income from their advertising columns.

Fifthly, the SIGNS subscribers are so scattered throughout the whole country that it costs about five times as much to mail each number as it does to mail the ordinary county papers.

Sixthly, the SIGNS copy being nearly all manuscript, we have to pay about twenty per cent. more than the usual rate to have the type set by men competent to do the work in an intelligent manner.

Now, brethren, we have given you some of the unavoidable extra expenses in publishing the SIGNS; and when you take into consideration, as we before said, that we have no income from advertising, but have to rely entirely upon our subscription patronage for support, do you still think the price is too high?

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

WE still have a number of copies of the first and second volumes of the books of "Editorials," which we will sell for the purpose of "Christmas Presents" from now until the 25th inst. at two dollars for both volumes, just half the regular price. This price is for the cloth-bound; the other bindings, as well as all other books of our publication, are already quoted too low for any further reduction.

PLEASE BE CAREFUL.

IT frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. Or if the paper is being sent in her name and the renewal is sent in her husband's name the same thing is likely to occur. Please be very careful to give the same name in which the paper is already coming, also the post office address at which it is received.

PLEASE DO NOT.

OUR subscribers are especially requested not to pay their subscriptions for the SIGNS OF THE TIMES to Postmasters to forward to us, as they generally deduct twenty or twenty-five per cent. from the amount and send us the balance, retaining the discount as their commission, and often sending what they do remit in postage stamps. We also caution our patrons against "Newspaper Agencies," as they deduct a like commission. It is a very simple matter for a subscriber to get a post-office money order or a postal note, inclose it in a letter, and direct it to us, or to put the money in the letter and have it registered; but where several are sending from the same office it is well to choose one of the number to send for all at the one time. Therefore we have advertised, under the caption of "Agents Wanted," for brethren and friends to act as our agents.

CHANGE OF RESIDENCE.

IF any of my brethren and sisters should think me worthy of corresponding with they will please address their letters to 498 Colerain Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio, instead of Ghent, Ky.

There are things that a child inherits that are of vastly more importance than property. Noah became heir of the righteousness which is by faith. Men are busy in this day converting sinners, or claiming to do so; but I am not aware that they claim to communicate that gift of God which is eternal life. If they cannot impart the life, will they impart the relationship? Will their converts live that life? Will they be plants that the Redeemer's heavenly Father has planted? Will the law of love to God and love to his people be fulfilled in them? If not, what is it, and what will it ever amount to? If he will, is the point upon which everything is supposed to turn. He that does the works and duties, he is the man that God will love and accept. The man puts on religion as he puts on his garments. It is not claimed for him that anything is done for him but what is done for every one of the human race. If it were needful to argue this I might inquire whether, in the Jewish dispensation, putting the priestly garments on a man would ever make him a priest. Was he not a priest first? An offering, be it ever so appropriate, will not make the offerer acceptable. The man is accepted first, and then his offering is acceptable.

Our natural life is being developed all the time. We do not need to go back to our birth to prove our existence. There is not a day that we live but contains abundant proof that we live, and that our life is a natural, earthly life. So if we live in the Spirit, and are led by the Spirit, we have evidence and give evidence to others every day that we are passed from death unto life. I have no faculty in the way of dividing a christian so as to find two men, one born of the flesh, and another distinct man born of the Spirit. The Redeemer addressing his disciples, said to them, "It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." "But now, being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life." "Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace." A life such as the apostle lived is so essentially different from what he lived before, and what men by nature live in the flesh, it is not difficult to see the difference. He now lived by the faith of the Son of God, who loved him and gave himself for him. Sentiments of praise and thanksgiving are the result of this blessed experience of a work of grace. Sons of God are not only related to God himself, but also to each other. It is a higher order of relationship, and consequently the fraternal bond is more endearing and more enduring. I do not understand love to God to be a mere volition or persuasion. The principle of love to God and the things of God are embodied in that life that God gives to his people. Where there is love to God there will be love to the children of God.

I am aiming to get at and present that entire distinction that exists between what a man is by virtue of that life in which is embodied the fear of the Lord, and what a man may be by virtue of what he does. The apostle speaks of things without life making a noise, but only when acted upon. They are still destitute of life, notwithstanding all the noise they make. The musical instrument remains unconscious of both the tune and the sentiment.

"Assist my soul, my heavenly King,
Thy everlasting love to sing,
And joyful spread thy praise abroad,
As one through grace that's born of God."
When that which doth not yet appear shall be fully revealed, then it will appear

"That we as sons of Christ are made As pure as he is pure."

"And when we see our Savior here,
We shall be like our Head."

It will appear that it became him for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, to bring his many sons unto glory. And here for the present I leave it.

E. RITTENHOUSE.

OAK CREEK, Oregon, Sept. 23, 1892.

G. BEEBE'S SONS—DEAR BRETHREN:—Notwithstanding I am illiterate, and feel to be so little and sinful that I am ashamed to write to you, yet I do so esteem and enjoy the subject matter contained in the SIGNS OF THE TIMES that I feel like I must say something about it to you. Simple as I am, if there is anything I do know, I know that I love the doctrine of predestination, the absolute sovereignty of God, or absolute predestination. You cannot put it too strong for me, for I glory in the fixed purposes of our God. Although it is not mine to be able to write on this glorious subject, my eyes are often filled with tears of joy and gratitude to our God for the great and blessed privilege of an understanding, so that I can enjoy and feast upon those glorious truths so ably and plainly set forth by you, and also by the well-trying and gifted army of God's called servants who write for the SIGNS. May the good Lord still enable you to wield "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon" in one hand, and to hand out the sincere milk of the word with the other, as you have so wonderfully been enabled to do in the past. How I would love to meet you all, and give you a hearty shake of the hand. I want to see the whole band of soldiers that are so familiar to me through our family paper.

Inclosed I send you a letter written by a dear brother here in Oregon, to wit, Deacon E. Loat. It contains precious truth, and was and is comforting to me; and as I cannot write anything myself I feel like sharing this precious letter with my brethren, if it meets your approbation so much that it will find a place in our medium of correspondence, the SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

Fare ye well in the Lord.

J. P. ALLISON.

Scio, Oregon, Sept. 14, 1892.

ELDER J. P. ALLISON AND WIFE—MUCH LOVED BROTHER AND SISTER IN THE LORD JESUS:—By the great goodness of God, my Maker and Savior, whose compassions fail not, and whose mercy endureth forever, my unprofitable life is spared, and I am blessed with the opportunity and with the disposition of replying to your kind letter of August 26th. It is not the least of our heavenly Father's blessings that he puts it into the hearts of his servants occasionally to write to me, for it is an evidence of that brotherly love which he has bestowed on all his dear children.

Your letter came to my hands at our meeting time, and added to my joy, and also to the joy of the brethren who read it; for I did not keep it to myself, as it belonged to all. I see that your time is very much taken up with your present temporal surroundings; yet I was glad that you could devote a little of it to write a somewhat hurried letter to me. Short as it is, I thank you for it, for it contained a great deal; for you draw my mind to the gracious Giver of all good things. "He remembereth that we are dust."

I will say something about our last meeting; it was truly one of the solemn feasts of our little Zion. The good Lord provided abundantly for all our spiritual wants by sending to visit us Elders Shanks, Matthews, Williams and George R. Girard, as well as our dear pastor, Daniel Bridges; also two visiting sisters, Shanks and Girard. The Lord was present to bless by giving his servants a door of utterance, so that his people were fed abundantly on the good things of the house, for which we bless the name of Jesus. Of our own members but five were there; but our old sister Williams, who has been a cripple for many years, was present. She had not been able to come out for about two years.

I hope to be able to attend the council of our sister church Luckiamute, and would have been glad to have met you there had you been able to come. May the King in Zion rule in every heart, and give a spirit of wisdom and discernment to act in the fear of God, having a single eye to his glory, so that whatever is done may be his will and act on this most solemn and important occasion. I was not present at Bethlehem at the ordination of Elder George R. Girard, being providentially hindered.

Dear brother, you ask me, "What is the meaning of the clause in the text you quoted, 'Ready to be revealed in the last time?' What does the last time refer to?" Though I am not competent to give a perfect answer, I will express my idea. To my mind it clearly refers to the gospel dispensation, the spiritual kingdom, commencing with the ministry of Jesus Christ and continuing all through until his second coming; then the last time ends. Time is no longer. Time, as used in the Bible, reckons from the day that God gave life to Adam until the christian dispensation is closed; the beginning and the end of time. It embraces the whole period in which God is dealing with his creature man on this earth. Time may be divided into three periods, to wit: First, Adam to Moses; man under natural law. Second, Moses to Jesus Christ; the Jewish dispensation. Third, christian dispensation or spiritual kingdom to the end of the world, when the church is completed. This view appears to me to be borne out by the parable of our Lord recorded in Matthew xiii. 33, and also in Luke xiii. 21, which reads as follows, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened." I understand the parable in this way. The leaven is the grace of God by Jesus Christ. The woman is Jerusalem which is above, and is the mother of us all (the elect). The three measures are the three dispensations. The meal in the measures represents the elect, and constitutes "the kingdom of heaven." For "your life is hid with Christ in God," said Paul. Thus to us is the salvation of Jesus revealed in the last time; and to all the elect yet to be manifested it is ready, present, or waiting to be revealed in them as time rolls onward to its end. Peter by inspiration knew that no further dispensation of the grace of God would be given to man; therefore he called it "the last time." He also knew that two other dispensations had preceded that of the gospel. He also had heard Jesus speak the above parable, as well as all the other teaching from the Lord's own mouth. Doubtlessly there is a revelation at death, a glimpse of glory; but of this I cannot speak. My answer, you see, is confined to the things of time, in this life. For the solemn and glorious things attending the second coming of the Son of man in the glory of his Father, with his angels, we wait, in hope of the resurrection of the dead; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. By the exceeding riches of his grace we have hope that God will bring us to see Jesus glorified, and with him be glorified. Amen.

E. LOAT.

COOPTOWN, Md., Sept. 25, 1892.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS:—If one so vile as I may call you so. I want to talk a little with you through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, as my mind is so full of gloom, and it has been on my mind to relate it to the Lord's people. I have had a long dark time. It seems to be night with my soul. I am longing for the return of spiritual day. I feel that I am near my home, and often I fear the summons will overtake me while in this dismal frame of mind. O how I long for it to be with me as it was in years past, when the candle of the Lord shone in my soul. Then I tasted that the Lord was gracious; but now I often fear the Lord has cast me off forever. If I would give way to my feelings the tears would burst from my eyes. Dear brethren, pray for me, that the glorious light of the Sun of righteousness may shine once more in my benighted heart. I do not know any particular cause for my darkness, only that I am a sinner. I desire to live free from sin, and to live near my God. How is it, if I am one of God's children, that I am so much of the time in darkness? I fear the blessed Lord will not be with me in the trying hour of death. My hope seems faint. Nearly all the comfort I get is when I look back to the time when I was so happy in my precious Savior. No tongue can express it. My constant trouble is on account of my shortcomings; but to whom shall I go but to him who has the words of eternal life? I feel weary of waiting so long; for it has been long since I found my Beloved, whom my soul loveth. A few days ago I felt a small ray of light from the Sun of righteousness, but soon a cloud came between it and me.

"O for a closer walk with God,
A calm and heavenly frame;
A light to shine upon the road!
That leads me to the Lamb."

We are taught in the word to speak often one to another, and through our family paper we can thus speak. But of course a poor worm like me cannot expect to be of any comfort to others, while I am such a miserable creature; yet I want the dear children of God to know exactly what I am. I sometimes have fears of being lost. I want to live without sin, but cannot do it, and so I am discontented and sorrowful.

It has been some time since I began this scribble, and I have had some little refreshment by the way, though the seasons were short and few. I thank the great Giver, from whom every good gift cometh. O that he would increase my faith and hope, and give me grace and strength as my days shall be. Dear children of God, do you think a child of God would be left so much in sadness, with such a heavy heart, and so poor in spirit? This world has no charms for me. It seems altogether vanity and vexation of spirit. O how many ways there are to sin! and I am afraid of it all the time. The name of Christ is sweeter than honey to my soul. When quite young I knew I was a sinner, and that God was just, and could not look upon sin. But in the midst of my trouble it was revealed to me by the Spirit that God sees all his people in Christ, and not in themselves. O what sweet relief it gave me! It is beyond expression. I felt that he looked on me in Christ. O how sweet is that revelation to me yet, when I look back. Let us remember that God is as near to us in darkness as in light; but in darkness we cannot see him; yet he sees us, and is taking care of us. Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. I feel that I am nearing my home.

JANE MIDDLEDITCH.

ONONDAGA CASTLE, N. Y., Nov. 28, 1892.

MESSRS. BEEBE:—Will you allow me, through the columns of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, to salute the little flock called Old School Baptists? I think they ought to be regarded as the "Regulars," seeing that the more numerous and fashionable Baptists have deviated from the old landmarks both in doctrine and practice. I suppose they thought that the Methodists were getting ahead of them, and they must adopt their Arminianism in order to keep at least even in the race. We are beginning to see, I think, to what concessions tend, and what must be the upshot in the long run. All sorts of seminary-bred fellows are advising us now that Jesus Christ did not understand the Old Testament Scriptures; that, indeed, he had but the knowledge of his times; which means that he had also the ignorance of his times. Is not this the jumping-off place into infidelity, logically considered? For me, at least, it would be just that; and I should take the leap, too, though it landed me in the horrors of despair.

Brethren of the little flock, I do not profess a circumstantial agreement with you at every point, but I hold, with you, that God has fore-ordained whatsoever comes to pass; and his people, be they few or many, were chosen in Christ their Head before the foundation of the world.

"With Christ their Lord they bear a part
In the affections of his heart;
Nor can their souls be thence removed Till he forgets his first beloved."

This divine predestination is the foundation of God which standeth sure. On this all our doctrinal superstructure must be built. On this we base our conviction that the Bible is the infallible word of God, whose providence is absolutely perfect in everything; in every hair of thy head, O believer, and in every jot and tittle of his holy word. Absurd as it may appear, it seems now as if some of our "advanced thinkers," as they call themselves, would send the Almighty to school to learn grammar, and arithmetic, and history, and astronomy, and geology. All these are well enough in themselves; but I never supposed they were the eternal things about which the word of God is conversant, or in which poor sinners are most painfully and profoundly interested. The truth is, the wise and prudent, with a wisdom imported from Germany, not from heaven, have managed to side-track the main business, and to put us on a track of speculation which leads, if anywhere, to everlasting despair. Perhaps indeed the wise and prudent do not really know everything, and are not really so wise as they look. Jesus himself thought that certain very important matters were hid from them, though revealed unto babes. Spiritual things are more real and substantial than natural things are, and yet, for want of spiritual discernment, the worldly-wise do not know them; and this ignorance of theirs is the root of all the speculative difficulties which have come in the train of the new-fangled notions involved in Arminianism.

Brethren beloved, hold fast that which you have. Let no man take your crown. Let no man spoil you through philosophy or vain deceit, vainly puffed up with the fleshly mind. It seems likely that you are that poor and afflicted people whom God will leave in the midst of us, who shall call on the name of the Lord when all other tongues have given out through sheer discouragement and exhaustion, calling on their Baal from morning till evening without receiving any reply. You have withstood the ridicule of all newspaperdom. You have been caricatured and burlesqued; and having stood all this so long, you can endure it unto the end. "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." If this present writer is not visibly with you, it is because it has been so ordered by him "who plans and orders our connections," and who orders all things after the counsel of his own will; by him who said of Cyrus, "He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure." I hope I am performing the Lord's pleasure; not as his enemies do, but with a glad heart and a willing mind, realizing the perfect freedom of his blessed service, which is not running hither and thither, like one demented, but a simple waiting on the Lord. To those who thus serve it is promised that they shall run and not be weary; walk and not faint; because they go in the strength which is divine and immortal, and not in their own. So for the present farewell, and the Lord be with you.

JOHANNES.

OBITUARY NOTICES.

BROTHER Charles B. Welch died at the residence of his son, in this city, Dec. 2d, 1892. He was taken sick the Tuesday before, and steadily failed. Brother Welch was fifty years of age. He leaves one son, Charles B. Welch, Jr., with whom he was living at the time of his death.

Brother Welch resided in Middletown until the war broke out, when he enlisted as a private in the 176th Regiment, and was soon made assistant hospital steward. After the war was over he went into business in Brooklyn and Jersey City.

A more extended obituary notice may be expected later.—Ed.

Wm. H. Mahurin was born Jan. 28th, 1816, in Grayson Co., Ky., and died Oct. 30th, 1892, at his home in Graham Co., Kansas, aged 76 years, 9 months and 2 days.

He was a firm believer in the Primitive Baptist faith. He united with the church at the age of eighteen years, and has been a faithful follower ever since that time. His disease was diabetes, from which he suffered for three years. He was married Jan. 9th, 1840, to Miss Annie Dewess. He had been a reader of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES for thirty-five years. He leaves a wife and one son at home to mourn their loss, besides eight other children in different places.

Irven Fooks departed this life at his old residence near Nassaongo, on Monday, Oct. 31st, 1892, aged 61 years, 3 months and 13 days.

Brother Fooks was baptized in fellowship with the Old School Baptist Church at Nassaongo, by Elder G. W. Staton, in the fall of 1865, and remained a firm believer until the last. Many who have visited Nassaongo will remember his kindness at the old homestead, which has been a place of Baptist resort for more than half a century, but is now left, with his lonely companion; but the Lord has done it. Our dear brother was sometimes as strong as a lion, and again was as weak as a babe, but very sincere in his convictions. I am sure he felt like the rest of us. In his nature he had much to endure, but in the Lord he had great victory. He did seem to enjoy good, solid gospel preaching so well. Nothing was more delightful to him than the theme of salvation by grace. He will be much missed, as it had been "Irven" so long.

Brother Fooks had been failing for a long time. His wretched cough gradually wore him away; and as he neared his end his hope and confidence in the Lord grew brighter and stronger. I have heard him say that he did not think the sufferings of any one else were like his. I was to see him a little while before he died. He said to me, "I love you all, and I have only got to hope on a little while longer." I think I was told that just before he breathed his last. He looked at the clock and said, "It is eleven o'clock; I shall soon leave you," and soon breathed his last. How sad was the heart of his dear companion to see the light of life go out.

I received a telegram and hastened to the call, and the last words he said to me seemed to bring the text in Hebrews vi. 19, "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul," and from which I tried to comfort the sorrowing ones; after which his remains were laid to rest in the old grave-yard near the house, to await the trump of God.

The sorrowing companion and children have our sympathy. We would point them to him who is the source of all comfort. He leaves a companion, three sons and several grandchildren, with the church, to mourn, but not without hope.

T. M. POULSON.

Mrs. Amanda Butler, widow of Elder Harrison Butler, died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Finch, in West Union, Iowa, Nov. 9th, 1892.

The deceased was born April 25th, 1819, in Ohio, and married Harrison Butler on April 14th, 1839. From Ohio they moved to Wisconsin, and from thence to Iowa, settling on a farm in Fayette County, where they remained until Elder Butler's death. She had been in feeble health about ten years, but not confined to her bed much of the time. On the 5th her daughter found her unable to speak, having received a stroke of apoplexy.

Sister Butler was of a quiet, retiring nature, and spent much of her time in reading her Bible and hymn book. She had been a consistent member of the Old School Baptist Church most of her life. She was one of the meek and lowly ones, and we have the hope that she has entered into that rest that remains to the people of God. She leaves two daughters and four sons.

I was called upon to speak at her funeral. A large assembly followed her remains to their last resting place.

THOMAS BLAKE.

WATERLOO, Iowa.

DIED—Nov. 25th, 1892, of heart disease, Mrs. Susan Poole.

Her maiden name was Carey. She was born in Middletown, N. Y., July 26th, 1826. On Sept. 11th, 1850, she was married to E. V. Poole, who died a few years ago. In 1865 they moved to Smithsborough, living there, and at Utica and Waverly, until death. She died in South Waverly, Pa., at the home of her sister, Mrs. VanNostron. She had been in poor health for some time, having had a severe attack of "La Grippe" last winter, which left her in a debilitated condition. She had been an attendant at Old School Baptist meetings more than thirty years, and a believer in the doctrine advocated by them, salvation by grace, though she had never united with them. The writer of this notice has seen her nodding assent, very many times, with a smile on her face, to the things that were spoken, showing that she had an interest in them and believed them.

She left four children, three brothers, one sister and many friends to mourn the loss of a kind and affectionate mother, sister and friend. Her children's names were Charles F. Poole, of Waverly, N. Y., M. E. Poole, of Utica, N. Y., Mrs. G. B. Baker, of Davenport, Iowa, and Mrs. T. B. Campbell, of Utica, N. Y. Her brothers and sisters are Henry D. and J. M. Carey, of New York City, Dr. D. G. Carey, of Elmira, N. Y., and Mrs. C. H. VanNostron, of South Waverly, Pa.

The writer addressed a large and attentive congregation on the occasion of the funeral in the Methodist meeting-house in Smithsborough, N. Y.; after which the remains were laid away in the cemetery near by. If in harmony with God's holy will, may each mourner realize the power of reigning grace to support and strengthen them in this severe trial and loss. The mother is at rest.

"Asleep in Jesus! blessed sleep!
From which none ever wake to weep!
A calm and undisturbed repose,
Unbroken by the last of foes."

D. M. VAIL.

WAVERLY, Pa.

My dear old mother, Lucinda J. Allen, departed this life April 17th, 1892, after suffering severely for two months from giving way of the muscles and old age. She had been almost helpless for four or five years. At the time of her death she was 75 years, 5 months and 16 days old. She was born in Mt. Carmel, Fleming Co., Ky., Dec. 9th, 1816. Her maiden name was Kemper. She came with her parents to Missouri in the year 1835. She was married to Elder B. O. Allen in the year 1837. They had three children, two girls and one boy, the boy dying in infancy. They both joined the Primitive or Old School Baptist Church in the year 1841. Soon afterward my father was ordained to the ministry, and was ever a strong defender of the doctrine of predestination and election. He was a constant reader of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, it being a regular visitor at our house ever since I can remember. Father and mother had a christian walk before their family and the world. They have left a large circle of friends to mourn and to miss their wise counsel. Only one child, and no grandchildren, survive.

The following lines were written by a friend, Mollie Spencer, of Sherman, Texas.

We know our loved one is not dead,
Though she has passed away;
Her spirit pure has only fled,
To dwell in endless day.

Along life's rugged, stormy way
She walked and talked with God;
A perfect faith she did display
While passing 'neath the rod.

And when the shadows thickly fell
She spoke no murmuring word;
She said, "God doeth all things well,
And I can trust his word."

"My child, you bear a heavy cross,"
She once to me did say;
"The Lord's consuming all your dross,
And does it in his way."

O weep not o'er the loved one's bier,
Beneath the funeral pall;
For when the hour of death drew near
She heard her Savior's call.

And all her struggles now are o'er,
Life's burdens all laid down;
For she has reached the shining shore,
And wears a heavenly crown.

Her daughter,

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MUTUAL OBLIGATIONS OF A PASTOR AND CHURCH.

THE relation of a pastor and church to each other is one that has been established by the Lord, and he has placed them under peculiar obligations to each other, which are fully made known in the Scriptures of truth. These mutual obligations are most important, for the Lord has caused the benefit and comfort of this relationship to depend upon their fulfillment. It is only by the directing and controlling power of his holy Spirit that they can be fulfilled. I do not now intend to go over the wide field of these responsibilities, and speak of them particularly, but merely express a few thoughts concerning them.

The pastor has been separated unto the gospel of Christ, and his field of labor has been appointed by the Lord. He is so set apart unto this work that it must and will be first in his mind; and he will not be allowed to let any worldly interests, not even the anxiety, which is natural to men, to provide for his family in the future, nor even in the present, turn him from that work, or hinder him in it. The command is, "Meditate on these things; give thyself wholly to them."—1 Tim. iv. 15. "Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind."—1 Peter v. 2. The care that is upon his mind concerning the church was not assumed by himself, but was placed there by the Holy Ghost, who made him overseer over them, and he cannot throw it off. He watches for their souls, as they that must give account. Not as though his work had anything to do with their eternal salvation, for that was obtained by the dear Savior when he arose from the dead. But the one whom God has given to a church as their pastor is made anxious for them, that they may enjoy the peace and comfort that attend a becoming walk, and that his labor among them may tend to this desirable result. He is given a desire to take heed unto himself and unto the doctrine, and continue in them; and he is assured by the apostle that in so doing he shall both save himself and them that hear him from the death to spiritual blessings and heavenly comforts which follow a turning from the doctrine and order of the gospel. In this great work he must be often cast down under a sense of his insufficiency, and must be with the church "in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling."

The church to whom the servant of God is sent to minister in this holy relationship have solemn, yet pleasant obligations also, resting upon them, which are defined in the Scriptures, and are laid upon their hearts by the Spirit. The apostle says, "Remember them that have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God; whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation, Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever." And again, "Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves; for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief; for that is unprofitable for you."—Heb. xiii. 7, 8, 17. In the various kindly attentions that are prompted by love, in speaking encouraging words; in giving expression to the comfort received under the preaching of the word; and, above all, in manifesting a desire to walk more and more perfectly in the truth, and to strive together for the faith of the gospel, the members of the church show to the pastor that he is remembered and obeyed, which is most encouraging to him. His hands are then upheld, as were the hands of Moses by Caleb and Joshua until the battle was ended. He thus becomes still more profitable to them through the inspiring confidence that his labors have not been in vain in the Lord, but have been blessed to their good.

It is the order of our King and the direction of his apostles that the servant shall live with those to whom he ministers in spiritual things, receiving of their temporal things as he needs. However proud and independent he may be by nature, he will be made to feel a humble and loving submission to this order. He will have many trials and perplexities; but his trust is, must be, alone in the Lord, in whose hand are the hearts of men. For some reason that we may not understand, the Lord has not so wrought upon the hearts of his people as to make them equal burden-bearers in these things. Some who appear to be less able than others will often bear a far heavier portion in fulfilling the obligations of the church, both to the pastor and to the poor. But there is such a sweet reward in the willing mind, the love of God is so manifest to the cheerful giver, that it is not felt as a burden, but a blessing. "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty," is a proverb that applies both to natural and spiritual things in the church of God.

The pastor has no need, and no right, to trouble himself in this matter; yet he will often find his mind anxious, and perplexed, and rebellious. He will sometimes find his proud spirit rising up and fretting and chafing at the apparent dependence upon others; but in his abundant labors will be the cure for such carnal sores. It is not upon the moods, liberal or illiberal, of brethren that he waits and depends, but upon the Lord, let him remember that. Sometimes he will be made very anxious concerning some dear child of God, who has become a mediator by yielding to a covetous spirit.—Col. iii. 5. He longs to see that covetous spirit bound and brought into subjection by the liberal, unselfish spirit of Christ, so that the kindly offices and duties of the brotherhood may not be regarded as a burden, but may be esteemed as a privilege and comfort, and that there may be an unwillingness to allow others to bear his portion of the responsibilities that belong to a membership in the church of Christ. The apostle says, "Not that I desire a gift, but I desire fruit that may abound to your account."—Phil. iv. 17.

It is necessary that a church should know the condition of their pastor in order to properly fulfill their obligations to him, as directed in the Scriptures. It is right for the members to arrange among themselves for his comfortable living, according to their own circumstances and ability. In order to do this they must know what his circumstances are, so far as he is dependent upon them; for they are not paying a salary, nor are they giving in order to increase the worldly possessions of one already wealthy. It is right for the church to take into consideration the expense that their pastor will be to on account of his position, the full cost of his living as it will be necessary for him to live while serving them, and such extra expenses as all are liable to have on account of sickness, and the like. In a word, they should, as the apostle so earnestly exhorts and commands, "Remember him."

Those whom the Lord calls to preach are generally poor in the things of the world when called, or are called away from the business which was their dependence, and soon become poor. The Lord does, however, call some to the work who have abundance of temporal things, and some whose field of labor allows them to continue their worldly occupation so far as to need no help. Such ministers become in the church of God stewards of temporal things, as well as "of the mysteries of God." The Lord will direct such, and also the churches they serve, as to what is right. It is not self that either pastor or church is seeking, for Jesus "died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again."—2 Cor. v. 14, 15. It is the love of Christ which constraineth them to all this work, and they are not to let any man despise them, by giving him reason to think that the love of money or of applause is their motive. I will venture to say here that I would regard any church that was freed (apparently) from these loving and sacred obligations as in a sad and dangerous state. For it is as necessary that the saints should abound in this grace as in any other. I do not, however, think that a church, or member, was ever so placed that this grace had no reason to be called into exercise. If their pastor has no need to be supplied from their temporal things, they will easily know of churches whose members are too poor to render the needed help to their equally poor pastors and will try to help them, and also those who are neglected by those they serve, as the Philippians did. And if they have none who need their help among their own members, they will be looking after poor brethren elsewhere, as the churches of Macedonia did.—2 Cor. viii. 1, 4; xi. 9; Phil. iv. 10, 15-17. There is no church where a covetous spirit can be at home, no church where one who does his duty can say, "My religion costs me nothing;" and there never will be while the Lord's "afflicted and poor people" are left in the world.

The pastor should be frank with the brethren he serves concerning his circumstances. There is no need of any one announcing his poverty, and publishing it abroad, as though it were something especial to himself.

Many who never allude to the subject of their temporal circumstances, except when proper and loving inquiry requires it, are even more limited in that respect. One may be called to the work who was raised in abject poverty, and who never was so comfortable in respect of temporal things as since he began preaching; another may be called from some most profitable business, and from most flattering prospects in a worldly point of view, or from a fixed and ample income, as was the case with the late Mr. Philpot, of England, and has been with many others. Each is poor; each has peculiar trials in that poverty, and is liable to peculiar temptations; each has to say with the apostle, "Having nothing;" but when faith is in exercise, trusting in the promise of God, each can also say with him, in holy confidence, "yet possessing all things;" for all the riches of the world are laid under tribute to supply their needs, and all would be exhausted rather than that one of the Lord's servants should lack any good thing. "My God shall supply your need, according to his riches in glory, by Christ Jesus."—Phil. iv. 19.

If the Lord sends one to a field of labor he will attend to his needs there, ordinarily. The laborer will have no need to call for help from elsewhere to enable him to live while he does the work assigned him by the Lord there. If it becomes necessary for help to come from elsewhere the Lord knows it; and somehow it will come to him without the necessity of his asking for it, as it came to Paul from the Philippians, and others. We do not read that Paul sent word to them that the brethren at such a place were too poor to help him, and those at another were entirely forgetful, or too covetous to supply his needs; nor did he speak in any general way of his circumstances, as though to attract liberality, nor make public mention of liberal individuals, as though to excite emulation in others. I have wondered sometimes, when reading from some notable ministers (I now have in my mind two in England, now deceased), who would keep presenting publicly such wonderful helps that had come when greatly needed; and soon would be able to record still others, and greater, so that costly chapels and tabernacles could be built, and personal luxuries be enjoyed by them.

The freedom of confidential personal intercourse, or correspondence, will often cause one's circumstances of great privation and hardship to be known, when such communication was made without the thought of greater publicity. That is one of the Lord's ways to bring cases of need to the notice of loving and sympathizing brethren and friends. The house of God is large in extent, yet so small that the family live in very close union with each other. Two thousand miles apart, perhaps, counting space on the earth, and having never looked upon each other's faces, yet so near together that they hear each other's sighs, feel each other's heart throbs, and rejoice in each other's joys.

When truly and experimentally dwelling in that "city which is builded compact together," the needs of each one are felt by all the rest who know of them, whatever the distance which lies between their earthly habitations, and whatever the differences in their earthly lot; and the desire to bear each other's burdens is in the heart of each one who has been born in that city. When they are led by the Spirit this desire will be acted out, as far as possible, and will always be found as great a source of blessing to the burden-bearer, as to the one who is relieved. And what an abundance of other most precious things are in this house, or city, for the comfort and joy of the family. Forbearance with each other's infirmities; charity covering from our sight the faults of brethren, and binding them together in perfectness; meekness which causes all the others to appear better to us than ourselves; forgiveness for all wrongs done us by brethren; a desire to restore a wandering brother for his own comfort; peace ruling in the heart as an officer to prevent disorder and disturbance, and to heal the sore effects of our evil propensities when they have been allowed to break forth in wars and fightings; tender sympathies for the afflicted, and brotherly kindness toward all who love the dear Savior. These are as fruits of the Spirit, very sweet and precious to the taste of those in whose hearts they are brought forth; they are also as garments that greatly comfort those who put them on, and are most beautiful to behold; and again, they are as kids, most precious and profitable to those who have them, but that will droop and die if neglected, and that need to be fed upon the gospel pastures which are found only beside the Shepherd's tents, to be nourished by careful attention to the word of truth, which is ministered in all its rich variety in the churches of the saints. How much is lost of the most pure and pleasant of all kind of enjoyment by those who neglect this sweet and wholesome fruit; by those who do not "put on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved," these beautiful gospel garments, by walking in obedience to the loving, meek and merciful Spirit of Christ; by those who neglect these kids, the graces of the Spirit, who do not feed them by devoted attention to the doctrine and order and privileges of the church, and by embracing all opportunities to manifest the love that is in the heart by kind and helpful words and acts.

The one who is writing these lines feels that he has been most backward and neglectful in this respect. The little that he has experienced of that holy, unselfish joy which fills the soul when the graces of the Spirit are in exercise, and the works of the flesh subdued, has been so sweet and precious that he cannot but feel great sorrow and regret that so much of his time has run to waste in attendance upon the barren things of earth.

May the sad remembrance of past neglect, remissness and transgressions, and the consideration of the tender mercies of the Lord that have saved us from their more direful effects, cause greater care and watchfulness in and over our deceitful natures in the time that is yet before us of our sojourn here; and may the Spirit of the Lord lead us, as sons of God, to turn away more fully from the vain and transitory things of earth, and attend more devotedly to the things which belong to the kingdom of God.

MOUNT MORIAH.

(Concluded.)

DEAR BROTHER BELOVED IN THE LORD:—I have been musing a little upon the works of the Lord; and my soul confesses that his works are great, and full of consolation and instruction. When we are favored by the Holy Ghost, dear brother, with meditations upon the wonderful doings of the everlasting God, we are therein blessed with revelations of the character of our God. The world by wisdom knoweth him not; there is none that understandeth, there is none that seeketh after God. The things of the ever-blessed God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God; but the Lord has been sovereignly gracious to us, for we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God.—1 Cor. ii. 11, 12. The truth of this doctrine we have learned; and we are continually being taught our dependence upon the ministrations of the Holy Spirit to reveal unto us the things of God. It is good to be humbled as a little child, and to sit at the feet of him who is meek and lowly of heart. "Learn of me" speaks the voice of our Beloved.—Matthew xi. 29. O to be favored to receive the words of his mouth.—Deut. xxxiii. 3. They are sweeter than honey and the honeycomb. The Lord has ordained that we shall know some bitter things during our sojourn in the world; but the kind and gracious words of our dear Savior spoken to us in our afflictions sweeten all. We can then drink the bitter waters of Marah.—Ex. xv. 23-25. The apostle Peter writes, "Unto you therefore which believe he is precious." So we have found it; and from the time of our first realization of his preciousness there have been springing up great longings of heart to know more and more the excellencies that dwell in the Redeemer, our Lord Jesus Christ. The apostle Paul wrote, "That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death; if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead."—Phil. iii. 10, 11. If then, my dear brother, we are to know more and more of our beloved Savior, our pathway at times will appear very uneven, rough, rugged and crooked; but whether it be in darkness or light, prosperity or adversity, in all the vicissitudes of life's journey the Lord of hosts shall cause us to prove the riches of his reigning grace. I sometimes have wondered, Why are the children of God ordained to such tribulation, and some so much more than others? While I pen this there comes to my remembrance the words in Genesis xxii.: "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen." These words seem to my mind as an index, telling of the gracious revelations of the character of our God, and of his wonderful doings among his dear people.

I remember when I last wrote to you that we were together upon Mount Moriah. Shall we again continue our contemplations in this mountain? May the Holy Ghost grant us a "feast of fat things" (Isa. xxv. 6) as we ponder over the remarkable scene portrayed in this twenty-second chapter of Genesis.

In this mountain the Lord of hosts has made the feast. If we are numbered among the guests, and are favored to eat and drink of the loving-kindnesses of Jehovah to poor, perishing sinners, we shall be able to say by faith in this our day, "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen." In our meditations upon the trial of Abraham you remember when last I wrote that we were viewing Abraham, knife in hand, about to slay his son; but that outstretched arm is arrested, the stroke is stayed, for the voice of Jehovah "called unto him out of heaven, and said; Abraham, Abraham: and he said, Here am I. And he said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou anything unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me." It is enough! Abraham is tried and comes forth as gold.—Job xxiii. 10. He has proved his shoes to be iron and brass; and as his day, so has his strength been. He held on his way (Job xvii. 9); for the Lord was his shield and exceeding great reward. He turned not aside from the path of obedience to his God. He exemplified that saying in the holy Scriptures, "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds; casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."—2 Cor. x. 4, 5. He was devoted to his God. "Thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me." Abraham's faith in and love to God have endured the fiery ordeal; and by the gracious and powerful hand of his God sustaining and nourishing him he has triumphed over all fleshly and earthly impediments, being enabled to cleave to the Lord with full purpose of heart.—Acts xi. 23. Our blessed God, in subjecting his dear children to manifold temptations, has his own gracious purposes to fulfill in them. That is a comforting word, my dear brother, that the apostle James writes to the twelve tribes of Israel: "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing." In all our afflictions and trials, though we may be sorely tried, the Lord our God, who subjects us to these dispensations of his providence, will by the unfailing ministrations of his grace support us, and enable us to endure, and to overcome, and to come forth to the praise of his own glorious name. Of old time there were those on the earth whose faith and love in God were such that when tortured they would not accept deliverance, for they had hope of a better resurrection.—Heb. xi. 35. Look at those three Hebrews about to be cast into the burning, fiery furnace. "Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego answered and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up."—Daniel iii. 16-18. The love of God shed abroad in the heart by the power of the Holy Ghost causes the people of God to cleave unto him. Many waters cannot quench this love, neither can the floods drown it. How precious we see this exemplified in Abraham in this mountain. His faith in God sustained and carried him through to the end in this trial. He believed that what the Lord had promised he was able also to perform; and as in Isaac was wrapped up the fulfillment of the promises, he therefore accounted that God was able to raise him up even from the dead, from whence also he received him in a figure.—Heb. xi. 17-19. When we in our small affairs have been tried, though obstacles impeded our steps, though at times we have been ready to exclaim, "Doth his promise fail forevermore?" yet out of all the obscurity and darkness in which our pathway has been overshadowed we have been drawn to look to the Lord.—Isa. xxix. 18. He only could relieve, he only could save.

"His love in times past forbids us to think He'll leave us at last in trouble to sink;

Each sweet Ebenezer we have in review Confirms his good pleasure to help us quite through."

The child of God in the midst of the furnace of affliction believes in God. He is so nourished and cherished by the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, that trusting in God he proves that nothing shall separate him from the love of Christ. Nay! in all things he is more than conqueror through him that loved us. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."—1 John v. 4. O may we trust in the Lord forever; for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength.

Let us now continue our thoughts upon Isaac. He lies low in the likeness of death, bound with cords on the altar, upon the wood. Not a word does he say why that knife in the outstretched hand of Abraham shall not descend and cut him off out of the land of the living. As a figure of a quickened sinner, called by the grace of God, we see how low sin has brought us under the law. It is good to be brought to ponder the low estate we were in when God remembered us in his mercy and caused us to rejoice in his salvation. We look to the rock whence we were hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence we were digged; we have still in remembrance the wormwood and the gall; and truly it is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed. Sin is not some trifling thing with the sinner born again; but like David, he cries, "My sins are too heavy for me." Sin is the blight of our life, subjecting us to manifold sorrows; and were it not that the Comforter in due time favors us with renewed tokens of our salvation, and the remission of our sins in the dear Redeemer's blood, we should fail by the way. Isaac is like a quickened sinner laid low under the ministration of death, feeling justly condemned, and knowing now that by the works of the law there is no hope for him of justification in the sight of God. Isaac might say, Here I lie in helplessness, bound hand and foot; under me and around me the wood; there is the fire, and in my father's outstretched hand the knife; and now I must die; for where is the lamb for a burnt offering for me? As I climbed this mountain, burdened with the wood, and burdened with my sins, I felt I needed a lamb for the atonement of my sins; and thought I had none to bring to offer unto the Lord, yet did not my father say, "God will provide himself a lamb?" Then I was hopeful that in the mount of the Lord it would be seen. But alas! I see no lamb. O can it be that the comforting hope I had that God would provide a lamb for a poor sinner like me was all a delusion? Ah, what right had I to hope? I am ready to perish. O! can there be hope for a prostrate, bound, helpless, doomed transgressor? The sorrows of death now compass me. "God, be merciful to me, a sinner." "And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham, saying, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou anything unto him." Salvation is come to Isaac. Divine justice will not slay such poor sinners for whom God in the new covenant hath provided the Lamb for the burnt offering. Christ, the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world, was verily forordained before the foundation of the world, but manifested in these last times for the elect of God, who believe in him according to the working of the mighty power of God.—1 Peter i. 17, 18. The Lord will deliver every child of promise from going down to the pit; for he hath provided their ransom.—Job. xxxiii. 24. The willing hands of Abraham untie the cords that hold Isaac fast. Rise up, my son, my beloved son Isaac; for God hath provided himself a lamb for the burnt offering. Thus Abraham in a figure received him from the dead. O the marvelous grace that saves a sinner! And yet how with glory the justice of God shines. Our God is just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. A just God and the Savior.—Isaiah xiv. 21; Romans iii. 26. "Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou anything unto him." It was on our beloved Emmanuel, the Surety of the New Testament, that the hand of eternal justice was laid; on him the stroke fell; the sword awoke against the Shepherd; for the transgressions of his people was he stricken. Being verily forordained before the foundation of the world, in due time he was manifest, the Lamb without spot and without blemish. On him Jehovah, the Father, laid our sins, and with his precious blood he hath redeemed us unto God.

"What stream is that which sweeps away
My sins just like a flood,
Nor lets one guilty blemish stay?
'Tis Jesus' precious blood.

"What mighty sum paid all my debt
When I a bondman stood,
And has my soul at freedom set?
'Tis Jesus' precious blood."

Christ Jesus was made sin for us, and poured out his soul unto death to save us from our sins. Blessed Jesus!

"Complete atonement thou hast made,
And to the utmost farthing paid
All that thy people owed.
How then can wrath on me take place,
If sheltered in thy righteousness,
And sprinkled with thy blood?"

Isaac is set free, and as a figure of the church of Christ arises from death, from under the curse of the law, and now by faith in the Lamb of God experimentally walks in newness of life. How sweet to a poor, guilty worm is the pardoning and justifying voice of the Lord! We are raised up by the mercy of the Lord from the sorrows of condemnation and death, to rejoice in the liberty, righteousness and salvation in our Lord Jesus Christ. Ponder over that gracious word in thy heart, my brother. "Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou anything to him." Isaac escapes; justice unbinds and set him free. "And Abraham lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, behind him a ram caught in a thicket by his horns, and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt offering in the stead of his son." Do we not see in this the type of the dear Redeemer? On him the hand of justice was laid.

"On him almighty vengeance fell,
That must have sunk a world to hell;
He bore it for the chosen race,
And thus became their hiding place."

Jesus suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. In this mountain Jesus is seen.—Heb. xii. 24. To him we are come, the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the sprinkling of his precious blood. The ram is caught, laid hold of, bound and laid upon the wood, upon the altar; and now the outstretched hand of Abraham pours forth the blood of the victim; and he offers up the ram in the stead of his son. O Isaac! thou art rightly named; for thy sorrows are turned into joy. And we, dear brother, having hope in the blood of the Lamb of God, may well rejoice in him. Holy Spirit, fill our mouth with laughter, and our tongue with singing; for thou has done great things for us.

"God gave me a surety, a covenant head,
To live in my name and to die in my stead;
He gave me a righteousness wholly divine,
And view'd all the merits of Jesus as mine."

After all the trials to which both Abraham and Isaac have been subjected, with what adoring gratitude they now worship the Lord in this mount. "And Abraham called the name of the place Jehovah-jireh: as it is said to this day, In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen." It is blessed to see the end of the Lord. He is very pitiful, and of tender mercy.—James v. 11. In this trial of Abraham there have been new and comforting discoveries of the character of God. In trials and afflictions we, too, have learned, I hope, what a blessed God is the God of salvation. And this name Jehovah-jireh very beautifully tells the story. "The Lord will provide," in things temporal and things eternal, in providence and grace. We have not been called upon to bear the cost of the journey, but having nothing, we have gone on step by step, from strength to strength, possessing all things in Christ Jesus our Lord. We have not gone on in the warfare against the world, the flesh and the devil at our own charges, but our blessed God hath hitherto provided, as the apostle Paul saith, "My God shall supply all you need, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus."—Phil. iv. 19. God, who provided the lamb for the burnt offering in this mount, provided for the tribes of Jacob when they journeyed those forty years in the wilderness. He gave

BLESSEDNESS OF POVERTY.

"BLESSED are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."—Matt. v. 3.

It is worthy of particular observation that in the very opening of this first recorded discourse of Jesus he begins by reversing the order in which natural wisdom has ever understood the advantages of attending circumstances. In this announcement a barrier is established which can never be surmounted by all the efforts of the will of man. It is impossible that poverty should be desired by the selfish mind of any man in the exercise of common reason. And even if one should be assured that only in poverty could he receive the blessing of the Lord, and he should therefore desire poverty, that desire would not embrace the poverty as its object; it would only accept the poverty as an unavoidable incident in the attainment of the coveted blessing.

Let us briefly consider what is the character here specified by our Lord. There are many who are very anxious to be blessed of God under the impression that such blessing will secure for them comforts and happiness which cannot be theirs without it. Such are not "poor in spirit." They have sufficient selfish reliance to enable them to expect the favor of God in consideration of their perpetual obedience to conditions which they think pleasing in his sight. Even those who are quickened by the living power of the word of the Lord, until they have seen the utter hopelessness of their condition still retain enough self-confidence to prevent their being embraced in this expression. None can be "poor in spirit" so long as they have any hope of attaining to the favor of God by earnest prayers or efforts of their own. Every one who knows the justice of his condemnation before God, must be conscious of the effort which was made for deliverance when first he felt himself under sin. Not until fully convinced of his utter destitution of strength to work, as well of merit to plead, does the living subject of divine grace present the character of the "poor in spirit." This poverty cannot be relieved by the gold of Ophir, nor by all the honors and glory of this world. Neither can all the attainments of the wisdom of this world enable a sinner to realize the destitution described in this text. The natural mind can never divest itself of the trust in his own resources which constitutes such riches in spirit that there is no possibility of the sinner who is governed by its direction ever feeling the dependence of poverty. Even in an earthly sense it is impossible that any one should wish to be sunk in real poverty. There is no effort to perform any work but the wish to avoid the destitution of poverty is the motive prompting that work. Selfishness can never choose to be subjected to poverty. Yet the Preacher of righteousness in opening his wonderful message of love and mercy to the guilty children of men, pronounces his benediction exclusively upon the "poor in spirit." To those who seek after the knowledge of truth it must be of vital interest to know what peculiar marks identify the subjects of this divine blessing. In the words of our text those marks are embraced and defined. None are the recipients of this blessing unless they are "poor in spirit." On the other hand, none are "poor in spirit" but those who are made to know their poverty by the blessing of their gracious Redeemer. Hence, those who find themselves so wretchedly poor as to have neither righteousness to commend them to the favor of divine justice, nor yet the power to utter an acceptable prayer for mercy, are certainly the very characters described as the blessed poor. It should not be forgotten that those who are here specified are described as being in just the condition to receive the blessing. This is very different from the teaching of such as exhort sinners to accept the blessings which are offered to all who will comply with the "overtures of mercy." If there were any overtures to be accepted by the sinner, then they who have accepted them are entitled to all the advantages resulting from such acceptance; and certainly they must lack just that much of being in utter poverty. But no intimation is given in the whole inspired record that any overtures of mercy have ever been offered for the acceptance of the guilty sinner. Every promise of God is positive and unconditional, like the blessing announced by our Lord in the text under consideration.

It is scarcely necessary to remind those who know what constitutes poverty, that it is impossible that carnal covetousness should desire to be subjected to its oppression. It is revolting to every instinct of the natural mind. Even in its application to temporal things, there cannot be such a thing as that it should be voluntarily chosen. Neither can the natural man desire to be "poor in spirit." As natural poverty is never chosen by the carnal selfishness of man, so it is contrary to the choice of the saints that they are subjected to that deeper poverty by which they are made "poor in spirit." They doubtless often feel a desire to be perfectly conformed to the image of their glorious Redeemer, and would wish to follow him even though it involved the loss of every temporal joy and comfort; but even in that depth of devotion they involuntarily ask that they may have the consciousness of the presence and favor of their Lord. With this desire granted there could be no such destitution realized as should constitute them "poor in spirit." This is the blessing of the Lord, and it is written of it, "The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow with it."—Prov. x. 22. None can be "poor in spirit" so long as this blessing is felt to abide upon them. Then they have all their heart can crave. In this state of perfect felicity they can have no need of the consolation of the comforting words of our text. In the full enjoyment of that assurance in the presence of their Lord they can know nothing of the sorrow of unbelieving doubts and fears. Knowing that Jesus is with them, they are raised above the assaults of doubts and temptations to sin. In seasons of such enjoyment of divine protection, there is no present experience of poverty. But the provisions of consolation and comfort in the gospel are for their support when they must walk in darkness, having no light to guide their footsteps. While in the light of the revealed presence of their Lord the saints can have no evidence that they are guided by the faith of the Son of God; but when they are made to realize the hiding of his face, and called to walk by that faith which is the fruit of his Spirit, they are indeed so "poor in spirit" that they cannot even find support in the remembrance of past mercies and deliverances. Then they are sufficiently reduced to meet the specification of the blessing under consideration. They are not merely destitute of earthly resources, and poor in the possessions of this world, but they are so "poor in spirit" that they cannot even find language to express their utter destitution of any claim upon the favor of God, while they know that the only hope of relief for them is in the grace of that God whose mercies have been so unthankfully received in the past. Such was the case of the publican, who "standing afar off, would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven, but smote upon his breast, saying, God, be merciful to me, a sinner!" The Pharisee showed no such feeling of poverty. His prayer demanded only the reward due to his boasted works of righteousness. It is not difficult to decide which of them is included in the gracious benediction of our text. While no saint would wish to occupy the position of the Pharisee, from their evil heart of unbelief arise constant questions of the genuineness of their hope, based upon their inability to claim the very ground of confidence upon which the boast of the Pharisee was predicated. This is the poverty by which the text designates the subjects of this blessing. To the wisdom of this world it seems that there can be none poor but those who have need of things which pertain to earth. This would exclude from its blessedness many of the saints whose record shines in the heaven of divine revelation. Abraham, David and Solomon were possessed of worldly riches. Yet they were "poor in spirit." With all the wealth of this world at his disposal, the conscious sinner is utterly destitute. Only to such as are "poor and needy" are the promises and blessings of the gospel addressed. On the dark cloud of utter helplessness and despair is inscribed by the sunlight of the gospel the bright bow of promise. No word of consolation can be found in the inspired record for any other character but such as are lost in just condemnation. There is no such poverty found among men as that which is felt by the sinner when brought to realize the exceeding sinfulness of sin in his own deceitful heart. So great is his poverty that he cannot conceive of the possibility of relief in accordance with the infinite holiness of God. Instead of feeling himself blessed of God, he must confess that his just desert is everlasting condemnation. His desire for deliverance appears to add to the mountain of his rebellion against God, since he can see no way in which mercy can come to him without doing violence to the purity of infinite justice and divine truth. Under this weight of guilt he must acknowledge his poverty as being beyond the reach of relief from any created power. If it were only that poverty which results from the lack of material possessions, then it might be remedied by the contributions of those to whom such wealth has been committed; but when the sinner knows that he has come under the just sentence of death, he cannot hope for relief, since his sin is against that God who is of purer eyes than to behold evil, and who cannot look on iniquity. Those who are brought to know themselves in this deplorable condition are not merely poor in their possessions; they are well described in the language of the text, as "poor in spirit." Theirs is the poverty which is without remedy, being the destitution of righteousness, without which there can be nothing but everlasting condemnation for them.

It pleased our Lord to assign the ground of the blessing which he pronounced upon the poor in spirit. It is not that they have any heritage of peculiar advantage in the earth. In the world they are assured that they shall have tribulation. Yet the blessing does not consist in what they shall receive in the ultimate glory which is their appointed portion with their Lord. It is declared as the condition of the "poor in spirit" even now, that they are blessed; and the blessing consists in the present possession of "the kingdom of heaven." In the loss of earthly consolation they can see nothing but the manifestation of divine displeasure toward them. To the natural mind this is utterly inconsistent with the assurance of their being the subjects of this blessing of our Lord. Often, when looking at the things which are seen, the afflicted and poor people of God are driven to conclude that they are mistaken in all their dependence upon the promise of divine grace. In the light of nature they can see nothing but evidence against their hope in the salvation which is in Christ Jesus. How then can they claim the assurance that they now are blessed in the present possession of the kingdom of heaven? With the old patriarch they are forced to conclude, "All these things are against me." But the word of Jesus is still immutably true. In their deepest poverty those who are included in this description are now blessed in the fact that the kingdom of heaven is theirs. Not even the subjects of redeeming grace enjoy this heavenly kingdom at any other time but when they are "poor in spirit." When they are vainly puffed up in their fleshly mind, they cannot see the kingdom of God. At such times they are saying, "I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing," and they know not that they are "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." However they may be elated with selfish gratification in this false confidence, they are never able to enter into the kingdom of heaven while trusting in such riches of this world. None but the "poor in spirit" can ever know this peculiar blessing which abides upon them who are so highly favored of the Lord as to be partakers of his sufferings, that this glory may be revealed in them. There is no separation between the poverty of these blessed ones and the kingdom of heaven which is their present blessing. They find in their destitution and poverty the fellowship of their suffering Lord; and all they can know of heaven consists in being favored to partake of his sufferings in the assurance that they are sustained by his presence. There is in this experience such exalted joy as can be known only by them who are so "poor in spirit" that they can desire nothing but the glory of their gracious Redeemer. When thus favored to dwell in the presence of their Lord, the saints know all of "the kingdom of heaven" which in their present weakness they are capable of receiving. When they shall see as they are seen, and know as they are known, they will be perfectly conformed to the image of their Lord, and then the fullness of the glorious "kingdom of heaven" will be manifestly revealed in their infinite glorification with their Savior. Of that glory no language can express the unimagined brightness.

For the comfort of the "poor in spirit," it is important to remember that this blessing is not presented by Jesus as an inducement for sinners to be "poor in spirit." It is pronounced upon those who are distinguished by the existing peculiarity specified. Without this characteristic qualification no sinner could endure the revelation of the divine perfection of holiness which constitutes the everlasting kingdom of our God. With the desire for the blessedness described in our text the witness of the Spirit always attests the possession of that kingdom by the consciousness of utter poverty. None bear this mark but those who are sealed unto the day of redemption by the holy Spirit of God. All who are included in its sacred description are subjects of the favor of the supreme Judge of quick and dead. Then well may the saints rejoice that they are called to know their poverty, and to rest in the gracious assurance of the gospel as ministered in them by the Spirit of truth. In their present sorrows and destitution they read their tittle clear to all the consolations of the gospel. The kingdom of heaven is theirs by the gift of the Lord of heaven and of earth. With Paul they have reason to glory in their infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon them. Their deepest sorrows but more clearly manifest in them the exceeding riches of that grace whereby they are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time.

"A hope so much divine
May trials well endure;
And purge the soul from sense and sin,
As Christ the Lord is pure."

CLOSE OF VOLUME SIXTY.

WITH this issue we complete the sixtieth volume of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES; and as it has been our custom to call our readers' attention to the fact in the last issue of each volume, under the caption of "Close of Volume," we suppose it will be expected this year.

Sixty years! nearly two-thirds of a century! How many who read these lines saw that little sheet, the Prospectus of the SIGNS OF THE TIMES, sent forth from New Vernon, N. Y., about two generations ago? How many of those thirteen hundred names on the subscription list of the first year of the publication of this paper are still on our list, or even numbered among the living? Our fathers, where are they? Alas! how transitory are all our earthly joys and hopes.

For about forty years the SIGNS OF THE TIMES stood practically alone, and, through the thickest of the battle and the hottest of the persecution, in defense of the principles set forth by that little band of saints gathered at Black Rock meeting-house, Baltimore Co., Md., February 28th, 1832; and to the present number it is devoted to the same cause. While we feel to acknowledge the goodness of God in sustaining the paper against such powerful opposition, we are painfully aware of our own fallibility. We know that without him we can do nothing. If we know our own heart, the cause is just as precious to us as it ever has been, and we feel that if it is God's will we wish to devote our remaining days in defense of the precious truths hitherto proclaimed in our columns; but we are grieved to announce to our brethren and friends that many are withdrawing their patronage from the paper, so that the last year our subscription receipts have been less than for any year we have ever known. The general complaint has been that they were not able financially to take it another year; and almost without exception those discontinuing their support have assured us that it was not on account of any objection they had to the principles to which the paper was devoted, but, as before stated, because they were not able to pay for it. To meet this emergency we sent forth a Supplement a few days ago, which most of our readers have doubtlessly received ere this, and which we request them to preserve for future reference, as we shall most likely allude to it from time to time in the SIGNS. We do not want a single lover of the truth to be deprived of reading the paper because they have not the money to pay for it, and so far as we are enabled we shall see that the privilege is not denied them.

INDIGENT SUBSCRIBERS.

AS MOST of our readers are aware we have on our list the names of several hundred brethren and sisters who are not able to pay for their paper, and to enable us to carry this list we have been assisted by those who felt able and willing to contribute to the "Indigent Fund." We furnish the paper below cost to this list, besides carrying a large number for whom we receive no remuneration whatever. With the volume ending with the present year the time will expire of most of those credited for a year's subscription for every dollar received for the "Indigent Fund," and unless we are assisted we will have to discontinue them; but if those whom the Lord has blessed with the means feel inclined to still contribute to this fund, we will for each dollar received continue the paper for another year to some brother or sister who may not be able to pay for it themselves, but who love to read it. All receipts for this purpose will be acknowledged through the SIGNS OF THE TIMES and applied as above stated.

PLEASE BE CAREFUL.

It frequently occurs that in renewing a subscription that we are given the wrong name, especially when it is for a married lady. The paper may be going in either her or her husband's name, and if in her husband's name and the renewal sent in her name we have no means of knowing that the credit is intended for her husband's name, and consequently her name is entered on our list as a new subscriber and two copies sent to the same parties. Or if the paper is being sent in her name and the renewal is sent in her husband's name the same thing is likely to occur. Please be very careful to give the same name in which the paper is already coming, also the post office address at which it is received.

them water to drink, and manna to eat. In all their straits Jehovah-jireh supplied them. "The Lord God is a Sun and Shield; he will give grace and glory; and no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee." The Lord provided that his prophet Elijah should be fed by the ravens, and afterward nourished him at the hand of the widow, having only a handful of meal in a barrel, and a little oil in a cruse.—1 Kings xvii. 4-14. What is our testimony? The love of Christ constraineth us to say, The Lord doth provide.

"It may not be my way,
It may not be thy way;
But yet in his own way
The Lord will provide."

When cisterns have been broken, when earthly help has failed, when it seemed no eye pitied, and no arm could save, look at that picture in the sixteenth chapter of Ezekiel. Thus the Lord deals with his people. We have found to our grief that Egypt, and horses, and chariots, were "our vain help," a broken reed, which pierced our hand when we leaned upon them. Then in our oppressions from the enemy, when we fell down, and there was none to help, Jehovah-jireh was our salvation. He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might he increaseth strength; and for our assurance and comfort he says, "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass, and as thy day so shall thy strength be." "And Abraham called the name of the place Jehovah-jireh; as it is said to this day, In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen." O, my brother, in this mount by precious faith I delight to dwell; for memorable transactions have been wrought in this mountain. Mount Mariah is the chosen place where the Almighty records his name. Moses sang of this mountain, saying, "Thou shall bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in; in the sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established. The Lord shall reign forever and ever."—Ex. xv. 17, 18. You remember when he was forbidden to cross over Jordon, how he cried unto the Lord, "I pray thee, let me go over, and see the good land that is beyond Jordon, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon."—Deut. iii. 23. Look at the scene portrayed in 1 Chronicles xxi. In this mountain stands the sin-stricken, afflicted, and repentant king. God's name is still Jehovah-jireh. In this mount the Lord has provided the oxen for burnt offerings, the threshing instruments for wood, and the wheat for the meat offering; and David said, "This is the house of the Lord God, and this is the altar of the burnt offering for Israel."—1 Chron. xxii. 1. "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen." Here Solomon built the temple at Jerusalem in Mount Moriah, where the Lord appeared unto David his father, in the place that David had prepared in the threshing floor of Oran, the Jebusite.—2 Chron. iii. 1. Look into all that pertained to that temple, and all the services therein, and surely the name of the Lord abides unchangeably, "Jehovah-jireh." "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen." To this mount the tribes go up (Psalm cxxii. 4), and spiritually here is gathered "the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are written in heaven."—Heb. xii. 23. To these assembled guests, "In this mountain shall the Lord of hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined. And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations. He will swallow up death in victory; and the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people shall he take away from off all the earth; for the Lord hath spoken it. And it shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us: this is the Lord; we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation."—Isa. xxv. 6-9. Jehovah-jireh! Here the ready to perish come to worship the Lord at the holy mount at Jerusalem.—Isaiah xxvii. 13. And here, my dear brother, by precious faith we are saved.—Heb. xii. 22. And to the praise of the Lord we will tell that our God in his great mercy doth supply all our need, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus. Come, let us then, when we are faint and needy, go up to the mount of the Lord. He will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths. He will satisfy our souls with bread. His doctrine drops as the dew in this mountain, and in Christ Jesus the Lord commands the blessing, even life forevermore.—Psa. cxxxiii. 3. Thus provided for by our gracious God, we shall grow as the lily, and cast forth our roots as Lebanon.—Hosea xiv. 5. We shall flourish in this mountain.—Psa. xcii. 14. May it be our heritage here to serve the Lord, and feast upon the mercy, love and grace of Jehovah-jireh. Then, I am sure, we shall have cause sometimes to sing, and to shout from the top of this mountain.—Isaiah xlii.

I am, I hope, your brother in Jesus,

OBITUARY NOTICES.

DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:—I am called upon at this time to write you the sad news of the death of our dear old brother, Elder John Stipp, with whom my life has been so intimately and dearly associated for many years, in the organization and history of the Siloam Association until the present time.

Our dear old brother departed this life on the morning of Nov. 23d, 1892, at half-past three o'clock, at the age of 86 years and 14 days. He was at his own home on the Molalla, Oregon, where he had been waited on by his only living child and her husband, brother J. C. Miller, besides kind friends, who did all for him that it was possible to do, we suppose. He had been living where but few of his brethren and sisters could conveniently visit him, which was very unfortunate, as many would have been able and willing to aid in taking care of him. But we must all bow to the will of our heavenly Father, and say, "Thy will be done." His death was caused by heart disease, as his doctor said, attended with difficulty of breathing, so that he became unconscious for a day and two nights. He passed away without a struggle, like one falling asleep. Before he became so bad his mind seemed to brighten, and he became even more firm in the doctrine of sovereign grace, election and predestination. He gave good advice, speaking to those present in a very able manner; as the one who wrote to me says, "His words seemed enough to have convinced even an infidel." But he is gone, and has left a good report behind him. I am not informed where they buried him, but I infer that they laid him by the side of his beloved companion, in the cemetery at the old church-house, called the Siloam Baptist Cemetery, in Marion County.

O, dear brethren, you can scarcely know how little I feel in trying to pen these lines in memory of a dear friend, and of such a great man. Well may we say, a great man in Israel has fallen; such an one, we fear, as will not be among us again soon; one whom the Lord had blessed, and enabled for so many years to preach the gospel of the Son of God with so much power and demonstration of the Spirit. He had made the Scriptures his chief study; and there are few men who had so strong and able a mind, and had so thoroughly studied the Scriptures as he. But I need not attempt to eulogize or say anything of his ability in preaching, for the brethren and sisters all know more and can do more justice to his memory than I can. Look back and think how he has stood by you all in the defense of truth, in bold opposition to all the wild heresies of the day. Think of his battles in early life against the Fullers and others. I well recollect those days, having been with him through all. He knew how to wield the sword of truth. He was a man for the times as was highly needed. But he is now gone, and well might it be said of him, as of Paul, "He has fought a good fight, he has finished his course, and henceforth there is laid up for him a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give him at that day."

Our dear brother met with a sad misfortune some years ago in the loss of his dear companion, and from that time he began to sink down. She had been a great help to him, being also of a strong mind, and firmly stood by him to encourage him to fill his appointments, and to attend to the wants of the family in his absence at his meetings.

But my mind and body fail, dear brethren, in trying to write this his obituary. We had agreed many years ago that whichever of us two should die first, the other should attend to this duty, I being only ten months and four days younger than he; so I have in my blindness tried to perform that duty. Let us all bow in humble submission to our heavenly Father, and say, Thy will be done.

INSTRUCTIONS TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Our subscribers will confer a favor on us, and enable us to keep their accounts with more accuracy, by observing the following instructions:

HOW TO REMIT.

The most convenient and safest way of sending remittances is by post-office money orders, which should invariably be made payable to G. BEEBE'S SONS, at Middletown, N. Y., and not at the New York City Post-office, and always inclose the order in the same envelope with the letter containing the information how it is to be applied. When it is not convenient to procure a post-office order, the money can be inclosed in the letter, and registered, and it may then be considered safe. We request that bank checks on distant banks be not sent, as they are subject to quite heavy discounts.

LOOK TO YOUR DATES.

Opposite the name on the slip pasted either on the margin of your paper or on the wrapper will be observed a date, this date denotes the time at which your subscription expires, and when a remittance is made to renew the subscription the date should be watched to see that it is forwarded to such time as the remittance pays to, and if neglected, by informing us, it will be corrected. By this method each subscriber has his own account, and can see that the proper credits are given for his remittances.

RULES FOR ORDERING.

In making remittances be sure to give the post-office and state of each name to be credited. In ordering an address changed always give the post-office and state at which the paper has been formerly received, as well as the post-office and state to which it is to be changed. When ordering the discontinuance of a subscription, give us the post-office and state as well as the name to be discontinued.

POETRY.
 Since Ephraim is to idols joined 1
 How many in the world's domain 1
 I know that my Redeemer lives 9
 How dark and gloomy is the hour 9
 The fatalists are they who think 32
 The Scriptures say, "Ye must be born again" 33
 From Zion's walls below 57
 Thy sovereignty, my gracious God 137
 Great God, thy way is in the sea 145
 Dear Lord, I am so weary of it all 145
 'Mid scenes of confusion and creature complaints 153
 O where shall rest be found 153
 I think of thee, my God, by night 161
 The mourners of Zion, redeemed with blood 161
 O mourning ones, inquire not why 177
 Eternity! without a bound 177
 Safe beneath the Savior's keeping 177
 True reason proves the Scriptures true 185
 O Lord, by thy indulgent care 201
 Only fifty! can it be 209
 One only Friend we have 241
 They shall be changed! Yes, all things here 241
 Joyously count I the treasures untold 249
 If thou, my Savior, would but dwell 257
 Tell me, thou whom my poor soul 257
 When all the doves are home 265
 The twilight falls, the night is near 265
 That I am vile I know full well 265
 O how the thought delights the soul 273
 In the dusk of our sorrowful hours 297
 When in carnal ways I wandered 297
 Sae cozily I nestle doon 305
 Alone upon the hill it stands 313
 God will take care of you, be not afraid 313
 The bird that soars on brightest wing 313
 Yes, Jesus wept! O why should he thus grieve 321
 Not to the mount of Sinai now 329
 One eve, when all was hushed and still 329
 Election is a truth divine 345
 Jesus, on whom my soul relies 345
 O how the thought delights the soul 361
 Freed from the world's contaminating breath 377
 The storm clouds gather o'er my head 377
